Trial Manual for Defense Attorneys in Juvenile Delinquency Cases

Randy Hertz
New York University School of Law

Martin Guggenheim
New York University School of Law

Anthony G. Amsterdam
New York University School of Law

2018 Edition

National Juvenile Defender Center
1350 Connecticut Avenue N.W., suite 304
Washington D.C. 20036
202-452-0010
http://www.njdc.info
Table of Contents

Chapter 1
The Nature, Purpose, and Structure of the Manual................................................. 1

- § 1.01 The Nature and Purpose of the Manual. .................................................. 1
- § 1.02 The Structure of the Manual. ................................................................. 1
- § 1.03 Caveat — The Uniqueness of Cases...................................................... 2
- § 1.04 A Second Caveat — The Need for a Pro. .............................................. 2

Chapter 2
Introduction to Delinquency Practice: The Role of Defense Counsel.......................... 3

- § 2.01 Overview of the Chronology of a Delinquency Case.................................. 3
  - § 2.01(a) First Stage: Representation of Clients Prior to the Initial Hearing. .............. 3
  - § 2.01(b) The Initial Hearing......................................................................... 3
  - § 2.01(c) Preparation of the Case for Trial...................................................... 4
  - § 2.01(d) The Alternative Courses of Action That Can Remove a Case from the Trial Calendar. .................................................. 4
  - § 2.01(e) Filing of Motions and the Motions Hearing........................................ 5
  - § 2.01(f) The Trial......................................................................................... 6
  - § 2.01(g) Disposition....................................................................................... 6
  - § 2.01(h) Appeal and Post-Disposition Proceedings.......................................... 7
- § 2.02 Juvenile Court Terminology................................................................. 7
- § 2.03 The Role of Defense Counsel in a Delinquency Case.................................. 8
Chapter 3
Representing Clients Before Initial Hearing; Steps To Take if a Client Is at the Police Station or Is “Wanted” by the Police

Part A. Introduction

§ 3.01 Stages at Which the Lawyer May Enter the Case.

§ 3.02 General Approach in Entering a Case: The Need to Move Quickly.

Part B. Overview of the Initial Stages of the Juvenile Justice Process

§ 3.03 Arrest.

§ 3.04 Police Practices Following Arrest – Logging-In.

§ 3.05 Interrogation and Other Investigative Procedures.

§ 3.06 Police Notification of the Respondent’s Parent(s).

§ 3.07 Police Exercise of Discretion Whether to Charge the Respondent.

§ 3.08 Booking or Slating.

§ 3.09 Fingerprinting and Photographing.

§ 3.10 Police Decision Whether to Detain the Respondent Pending Arraignment.

§ 3.11 Alleged Delinquents Detained by the Police Pending Arraignment: Transportation to the Juvenile Detention Facility and the De Novo Judgment on Detention or Release by Facility Staff.

§ 3.12 The Probation Intake Process.

Part C. Representing Juveniles Who Have Just Been Arrested and Are Still at the Stationhouse or Holding Facility: Dealing with the Police and Other Damage Control

§ 3.13 The Telephone Call from a Parent of a Child Who Has Just Been Arrested and Is Still at the Stationhouse.

§ 3.14 Locating a Client Who Was Recently Arrested.

§ 3.15 Keeping Records of Calls to Police Officers.
§ 3.16 Calls from a Client Who Is in Police Custody.................................................. 25

§ 3.17 Overview of the Steps to Be Taken After Counsel Has Succeeded in Locating the Recently Arrested Client.................................................. 25

§ 3.18 Gaining Immediate Access to the Client: Persuading Police Officers to Allow Counsel to Speak with a Recently Arrested Client on the Telephone........................................... 27

§ 3.19 The Telephone Conversation with the Client Who Is Presently in the Custody of the Police................................................................. 29

§ 3.19(a) Preliminary Matters To Discuss with the Client. ......................... 29

§ 3.19(b) Advising the Client: Protecting the Client from Interrogation........ 30

§ 3.19(c) Cautioning the Client Against Speaking with Cellmates or Visitors. .............................................. 31

§ 3.19(d) Other Advice To Give the Client: Protections Against Lineups, Show-Ups, and Other Police Investigative Procedures............................................... 32

§ 3.19(e) Eliciting Information from the Client That Will Be Useful in Attempting To Secure the Client’s Release.................................................. 33

§ 3.19(f) Concluding the Telephone Conversation with the Client in Police Custody................................................................. 35

§ 3.20 Telephone Conversations with the Police on Behalf of a Client Who Is Presently in Police Custody................................................................. 36

§ 3.21 Follow-up Conversation with the Parent or Guardian of the Client. .......... 40

§ 3.22 Counsel’s Activities on the Client’s Behalf at the Police Station. .......... 42

§ 3.22(a) Gaining Access to the Client. .................................................. 42

§ 3.22(b) Matters to Cover in the Interview with the Client........................................... 42

§ 3.22(c) Discussions with the Police................................................................. 44

§ 3.22(d) Actions for Counsel to Take in Identification or Examination Procedures................................................................. 45
§ 3.23  Actions That Can Be Taken to Protect the Client’s Rights in Lieu of a Trip to the Police Station................................................................. 47

§ 3.24  Acting on Behalf of Clients Who Have Been Moved from the Police Station to a Juvenile Detention Facility Pending Initial Hearing...................................... 48

§ 3.25  Final Steps to Take on Behalf of the Newly Arrested Client in Custody Pending Arraignment................................................................. 49

Part D. Entering the Case at the Probation Intake Stage: Representing Children Who Were Released After Arrest and Have Not Yet Gone Through Probation Intake

§ 3.26  Overview of the Role That the Attorney Potentially Can Play in the Probation Intake Process. ................................................................. 50

§ 3.27  Counseling the Child and Parent/Guardian to Prepare Them for the Probation Intake Interviews................................................................. 51

§ 3.28  The Attorney’s Opportunities for Direct Involvement in the Probation Intake Process. ................................................................. 52

Part E. The “Wanted” Client: Representing Children Who Have Not Yet Been Arrested But Who Are Being Sought by the Police

§ 3.29  The Initial Phone Call from the “Wanted” Client or from Someone Concerned about the Client................................................................. 53

§ 3.30  Making Inquiries of the Police and Prosecutor................................................................. 55

§ 3.31  The Follow-Up Conversation with the Client: Counseling the Client on the Advisability of Surrender................................................................. 56

§ 3.32  Arranging the Surrender................................................................. 57

§ 3.33  The Surrender and Subsequent Aspects of the Case................................................................. 58

Chapter 4
The Initial Hearing: Prehearing Interview; Arraignment; Pretrial Detention Arguments; Probable-Cause Hearing................................................................. 59

Part A. Introduction

§ 4.01  The Nature of the Initial Hearing; Scope of the Chapter; Terminology. .......... 59
§ 4.02 Coping with the Idiosyncrasies of Initial Hearings: Rushed Proceedings and Juvenile Court Parlance. ................................................................. 60

Part B. Appointment of Counsel

§ 4.03 The Right to Counsel at Initial Hearing. .................................................. 60
§ 4.04 The Mechanisms for Appointing Counsel or Arranging for the Presence of Retained Counsel at Initial Hearing. .................................................. 62
§ 4.05 Waiver of the Right to Counsel. ................................................................. 64

Part C. Pre-Hearing Interview of the Client and Parent, and Other Necessary Preparation for the Initial Hearing

§ 4.06 Insisting upon an Opportunity to Conduct a Pre-Hearing Interview When Counsel Is Retained or Appointed Immediately Before the Hearing. ........................................... 66
§ 4.07 The Information That Needs to Be Elicited from the Client in Order to Prepare for the Initial Hearing. ................................................................. 68
  § 4.07(a) Information To Elicit in Preparation for the Detention Hearing. ................. 69
  § 4.07(b) Information To Elicit in Preparation for the Probable-Cause Determination. ................................................................. 71
  § 4.07(c) Other Subjects To Cover in the Initial Interview. ...................................... 72
§ 4.08 Interview of the Client’s Parent or Guardian to Gather Information Relevant to the Detention Determination. ................................................................. 72
§ 4.09 Telephone Calls to Make in Preparation for the Initial Hearing. ......................... 73
§ 4.10 Examination of the Child’s Prior Record Before the Initial Hearing. ................. 73
§ 4.11 Ascertaining the Positions of the Probation Officer and Prosecutor, and Lobbying to Change Unfavorable Positions. .................................................. 74

Part D. Arraignment

§ 4.12 Notification of the Charges. ........................................................................... 75
§ 4.13 The Respondent’s Entry of a Plea. ........................................ 76

§ 4.14 Setting the Trial Date and Deadlines for Motions and Special Defensive Pleas. ........................................... 77

Part E. Pretrial Detention and Bail

§ 4.15 Introduction: Pretrial Detention and Bail in Juvenile Court. ......................... 78

§ 4.16 The Fundamental Importance of Securing the Child’s Release at the Detention Hearing. .................................................. 79

§ 4.17 Statutory and Caselaw Standards for the Detention Determination... 80

§ 4.18 Possible Places of Detention. ............................................. 83

§ 4.19 The Detention Hearing: Procedure. ....................................... 84

§ 4.20 Preventing or Objecting to Any Mention of Prior Charges That Have Been Nolled, Dismissed, or Sealed. .............................. 85

§ 4.21 Defense Arguments for Release of the Respondent............... 86

§ 4.21(a) Arguments Relating to the “Risk of Flight”.................... 87

§ 4.21(b) Arguments Relating to Future Dangerousness................. 88

§ 4.21(b)(1) Arguments Concerning the Prior Record of the Child.... 88

§ 4.21(b)(2) Arguments Concerning the School Performance of the Child. ................................. 88

§ 4.21(b)(3) Arguments Concerning Curfew.................................. 89

§ 4.21(b)(4) Arguments Concerning Psychological or Substance Abuse Problems. ................................. 89

§ 4.21(c) Arguments Relating to the Respondent’s Danger to Himself or Herself. ................................. 89

§ 4.21(d) Arguments Applicable to All of the Bases for Detention. .... 90

§ 4.21(d)(1) Arguments Citing Aspects of the Child’s Life
That Have Changed or Will Change in the Near Future. .......................... 90

§ 4.21(d)(2) Arguments Based upon the Inappropriateness of the Detention Facilities for the Particular Respondent. ........ 90

§ 4.21(d)(3) Argument That Detention of the Respondent Would Unfairly Impede Counsel’s Pretrial Investigation of the Case. .................... 90

§ 4.21(e) Fallback Requests for a Result Short of Outright Release. .... 91

§ 4.22 Using the Probable-Cause Hearing to Prevent Detention. ............... 92

§ 4.23 Preventing Detention by Attacking the Sufficiency of the Petition. .......... 93

§ 4.24 Steps to Take If the Client Is Detained. .......................................................... 93

§ 4.25 Obtaining Relief for Clients Whose Initial Hearing Has Not Been Held Promptly................................................................. 94

§ 4.26 Additional Detention Issues Arising from Other Charges or Other Legal Problems Within the Jurisdiction, in Other Parts of the State, or in Other States. .................................................. 94

§ 4.26(a) Ancillary Legal Problems Within the State in Which the Respondent Is Appearing for the Detention Hearing. .............. 95

§ 4.26(a)(1) Custody Orders To Arrest the Respondent on Another Charge. .......................................................... 95

§ 4.26(a)(2) Custody Orders Resulting from Prior Failures To Appear for Court Hearings. .................................................. 95

§ 4.26(a)(3) Petitions To Revoke Probation or Parole in Light of the Violation of Law Evidenced by the New Arrest. ........ 96

§ 4.26(b) Extradition to Another State: The Interstate Compact............. 97

§ 4.26(c) Arranging for Counsel in the Respondent’s Other Cases. ........ 99

§ 4.27 Bail............................................................... 99
§ 4.27(a) Interviewing the Client and Parent/Guardian To Elicit the Information Necessary To Argue the Issue of Bail. .............. 99

§ 4.27(b) Arguing the Availability of Bail: Interaction Between Preventive Detention and Statutory Rights to Bail. ......................... 100

§ 4.27(c) Arguing Against High Bail: The Constitutional Prohibitions Against “Excessive” Bail; Equal Protection Issues in Cases of Indigent Clients. ........................................ 100

§ 4.27(d) Arguing for the Least Onerous Type of Bail. ................. 101

§ 4.27(e) Ensuring That There Are No “Hold” Orders Before Permitting the Client’s Family or Friends To Post Bail. ....................... 103

§ 4.27(f) Assisting the Client’s Family or Friends in Posting Bond...... 103

Part F. The Probable-Cause Hearing

§ 4.28 Constitutional and Statutory Rights to a Probable-Cause Determination. .... 104

§ 4.28(a) Constitutional Requirements. .................................. 104

§ 4.28(b) Statutory Requirements. ........................................ 107

§ 4.29 The Functions of the Probable-Cause Hearing from the Defense Perspective. . 108

§ 4.30 The Decision Whether to Demand or Waive the Probable-Cause Hearing. .... 109

§ 4.31 Nature of the Probable-Cause Hearing; Defense Rights at the Hearing. ......... 111

§ 4.31(a) Nature of the Proceedings. ....................................... 111

§ 4.31(b) Right to Counsel. .................................................. 111

§ 4.31(c) Right To Cross-Examine Prosecution Witnesses and To Present Defense Witnesses; Right To Subpoena Witnesses; Right to Disclosure of Exculpatory and Impeaching Evidence . ......... 111

§ 4.31(d) Right to Transcription of the Proceedings . ........................ 112

§ 4.31(e) Procedures To Challenge Denial of Rights to or at a Probable-Cause Hearing. .................................................. 113
§ 4.32 Defensive Conduct of the Probable-Cause Hearing – Cross-Examining for Discovery and Impeachment. .................................... 114

§ 4.33 Resisting Limitations on Cross-Examination. ................................. 115

§ 4.34 Calling Adverse Witnesses. .................................................. 116

§ 4.35 Calling Favorable Defense Witnesses. ....................................... 117

§ 4.36 Objecting to Inadmissible Evidence. ........................................ 117

§ 4.37 Obtaining a Transcript. ...................................................... 118

§ 4.38 Continuances. ................................................................. 119

Chapter 5
The Client Interview. ........................................................................ 120

§ 5.01 Introduction: Scope of the Chapter; Overview of the Chronology of an Initial Interview. ......................................................... 120

§ 5.02 Preparing for the Interview. ................................................... 121

§ 5.03 The Introductory Phase: Explaining to the Family the Need for Counsel’s Meeting with the Client Alone.................................. 121

§ 5.03(a) The Reasons for Meeting with the Client Alone. .................. 121

§ 5.03(b) Explaining to Parents Why They Should Absent Themselves from the Interview. ......................................................... 122

§ 5.04 Commencing the Private Interview of the Client: Establishing Rapport, Explaining the Attorney-Client Privilege, and Other Preliminary Matters. .... 123

§ 5.04(a) The Importance of Establishing a Good Attorney-Client Relationship. ................................................................. 123

§ 5.04(b) Putting the Client at Ease and Establishing a Relationship of Trust. ............................................................. 123

§ 5.04(c) Giving the Client a Business Card. ....................................... 125

§ 5.04(d) Explaining the Attorney-Client Relationship. .................... 125
§ 5.04(e)  Settling the Roles of Attorney and Client and Explaining the Need for a Truthful Rendition of the Facts. .......................... 126

§ 5.05  Note-Taking During the Interview: Explaining the Need for Taking Notes; Techniques for Taking Notes in the Least Disruptive Manner. .......... 127

§ 5.06  Interviewing the Client About the Facts of the Offense. ................. 129

§ 5.07  Interviewing the Client About Facts Needed for Suppression Motions. .... 131

§ 5.08  Interviewing the Client About His or Her Social History. ................. 132

§ 5.09  Complaints of Brutality or Mistreatment; Other Custodial Complaints. .... 132

§ 5.10  Concluding the Private Interview of the Client. ............................. 134

§ 5.11  The Final Stage of the Interview: The Discussion with the Client and His or Her Parent(s); Fee-Setting; Obtaining Releases of Information.................. 137

§ 5.12  Subsequent Interviews with the Client. ........................................ 139

§ 5.13  Interview Checklist. ................................................................. 140

Chapter 6
Case Planning: Deciding What Things To Do To Prepare for Trial and the Order in Which To Do Them. .................................................. 167

§ 6.01  Scope and Purpose of this Chapter. ............................................. 167

§ 6.02  The Defense “Theory of the Case”: A Flexible Blueprint for Trial Preparation. ................................................................. 168

§ 6.02(a)  Defense Theories That Refute the Prosecution’s Assertion That a Crime Was Committed. ............................................. 168

§ 6.02(b)  Defense Theories That Refute the Prosecution’s Assertion That the Respondent Was the Perpetrator. .............................. 170

§ 6.02(c)  The Building Blocks for Constructing a Defense Theory of the Case. ................................................................................ 173

§ 6.02(d)  Implications of the Choice of Defense Theory for Trial Preparation. ............................................................... 174
§ 6.03 Gathering the Facts Needed to Support the Defense Theory of the Case. 176
§ 6.04 Filing Motions That Are Consistent with the Theory of the Case. 177
§ 6.05 Setting in Motion the Process Needed to Prepare for Disposition in the Event of Conviction. 178
§ 6.06 the Role of Narrative Theory in Case Planning. 179
   § 6.06(a) The Nature of Narrative and Its Importance in Litigation. 179
   § 6.06(b) The Specific Uses that a Litigator Can Make of Narrative. 181
   § 6.06(c) The Basic Structure and Process of Narrative. 184
   § 6.06(d) The Special Features of Narrative in a Jury-Trial Setting. 187
§ 6.07 Methods of Maximizing the Time Available For, and the Effectiveness of, Case Preparation in Public Defender Offices in Which Caseloads Are Prohibitively High. 189

Chapter 7
Selecting and Drafting Motions: Strategic and Practical Considerations. 192
§ 7.01 The Importance of Motions Practice; The Objectives to Be Sought. 192
§ 7.02 The Motions That Counsel Should Consider. 192
§ 7.03 Deciding Whether to Raise an Issue in a Pretrial Motion or at Trial. 194
   § 7.03(a) Reasons for Litigating an Issue by Pretrial Motion. 194
   § 7.03(b) Reasons for Litigating an Issue at Trial Rather Than in a Pretrial Motions Forum. 195
   § 7.03(c) Casting the Issue in the Form of a Pretrial Motion When the Pretrial Forum Is Preferable. 195
§ 7.04 Choosing Between Oral and Written Motions. 197
§ 7.05 Timely Filing of the Motion: Methods for Extending the Filing Deadline and for Obtaining Relief from Forfeitures Entailed as a Consequence of Untimely Filing. 197
§ 7.06 The Form of the Motion; The Need for Affidavits.

§ 7.07 Deciding Whether to Seek an Evidentiary Hearing for Claims That Can Be Proven with Affidavits Alone.

§ 7.08 Drafting the Motion so as to Gain Relief Without Unduly Disclosing the Defense Case.

§ 7.09 Invocation of State Constitutional Provisions in the Motion.

Chapter 8
Defense Investigation.

Part A. General Aspects of Defense Investigation

§ 8.01 Introduction: Scope of the Chapter.

§ 8.02 Using the Defense Theory of the Case to Guide the Investigation.

§ 8.03 Starting Promptly and Preserving Perishable Evidence.

§ 8.04 Use of an Investigator.

§ 8.05 The Importance of Personally Observing the Scene of the Crime and Other Relevant Sites.

Part B. Locating and Interviewing Defense Witnesses

§ 8.06 The Need to Interview Any Witnesses Whom the Respondent Wishes to Call.

§ 8.07 Locating Witnesses.

§ 8.08 Keeping Track of Witnesses.

§ 8.09 Interviewing Defense Witnesses.

§ 8.10 Refraining from Taking Written Statements of Defense Witnesses or Taking Verbatim Interview Notes in Jurisdictions Where They Are Discoverable by the Prosecution.

Part C. Interviewing and Taking Statements from Adverse Witnesses
§ 8.11 The Unique Aspects of Interviewing Adverse Witnesses. .......................... 214

§ 8.12 Taking Statements from Adverse Witnesses. ........................................... 215

   § 8.12(a) The Reasons for Taking Statements.................................................. 215

   § 8.12(b) Arranging To Be Accompanied to Interviews of Adverse Witnesses. . . . . 216

   § 8.12(c) Techniques for Taking a Written Statement; Content of the Statement...... 216

   § 8.12(d) Alternatives to a Signed Statement When the Witness Is Unwilling To Sign a Statement; Taking a Recorded Statement......................................................... 217

§ 8.13 Overcoming Prosecution Witnesses’ Unwillingness to Talk with an Adversary; Steps to Take If the Witness Says That S/he Has Been Advised by the Prosecutor to Refuse to Talk with the Defense......................... 218

§ 8.14 Interviewing Police Officers. ................................................................. 220

§ 8.15 Interviewing Co-Respondents and Adult Defendants Charged with the Same or Connected Crimes. ................................................................. 222

Part D. Gathering Police Reports, Other Documents, and Physical Evidence That May Be Needed as Defense Exhibits at a Motions Hearing or at Trial

§ 8.16 The Need to Gather the Materials, and the Timetable................................. 223

§ 8.17 Methods for Gathering the Materials........................................................ 224

§ 8.18 Preserving Real Evidence. ................................................................. 224

§ 8.19 Types of Materials to Gather or Generate. .............................................. 226

   § 8.19(a) Police Reports and Related Materials................................................. 226

   § 8.19(a)(1) Complaint Reports................................................................. 226

   § 8.19(a)(2) Arrest Reports................................................................. 226

   § 8.19(a)(3) Recordings of 911 Telephone Calls and <table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(a)(4)</td>
<td>Arrest Photographs.</td>
<td>227</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(a)(5)</td>
<td>Eyewitness Identification Reports.</td>
<td>227</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(a)(6)</td>
<td>Forms and Reports for Confessions.</td>
<td>228</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(a)(7)</td>
<td>Additional Police Reports That Must Be Filled Out When the Crime Is of a Certain Type.</td>
<td>228</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(a)(8)</td>
<td>Property Reports.</td>
<td>229</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(a)(9)</td>
<td>Police Photographs and Diagrams.</td>
<td>229</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(a)(11)</td>
<td>Reports and Other Materials Generated by the Booking Process.</td>
<td>230</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(a)(12)</td>
<td>Supplemental Investigation Reports.</td>
<td>230</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(b)</td>
<td>Transcripts and Other Court Documents.</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(b)(1)</td>
<td>Transcripts.</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(b)(2)</td>
<td>Search Warrants and Arrest Warrants.</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(b)(3)</td>
<td>Gerstein Proffers.</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(b)(4)</td>
<td>Psychological Evaluations.</td>
<td>231</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(c)</td>
<td>Other Exhibits and Materials To Gather.</td>
<td>232</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(c)(1)</td>
<td>Photographs.</td>
<td>232</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(c)(2)</td>
<td>Diagrams and Maps.</td>
<td>233</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(c)(3)</td>
<td>Records of Lighting and Weather Conditions.</td>
<td>233</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(c)(4)</td>
<td>School Records of the Respondent.</td>
<td>233</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 8.19(c)(5)</td>
<td>Medical Records of the Respondent.</td>
<td>234</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Chapter 9
Pretrial Discovery. .................................................................................................................. 236

Part A. Introduction

§ 9.01 The Nature of Discovery in Delinquency Cases; Scope and Organization of the Chapter...................................................... 236

§ 9.02 The General Position of the Defense on Discovery......................... 237

§ 9.03 The Advisability of Pursuing Informal Discovery Methods Before Resorting to Formal Discovery Devices................................. 239

Part B. Informal Discovery

§ 9.04 Designing a Strategy for Informal Discovery. ......................... 239

§ 9.05 The Discovery Letter................................................................. 240

§ 9.06 The Discovery Conference.............................................................. 243

Part C. Formal Discovery: Mechanisms and Legal Bases

§ 9.07 Types of Formal Discovery Procedures.............................................. 244

§ 9.07(a) Motion for a Bill of Particulars................................................. 246

§ 9.07(b) Motion for a List of Prosecution Witnesses.............................. 247

§ 9.07(c) Discovery Motions................................................................. 249

§ 9.07(d) Other Discovery-Related Motions............................................. 251

§ 9.07(e) Depositions............................................................................ 251

-xv-
§ 9.07(f) Freedom of Information Laws (FOILs) ........................................ 252

§ 9.08 General Strategy When Employing Formal Discovery Procedures ........ 253

§ 9.09 Constitutional Doctrines That Can Be Invoked in Support of Defense Discovery .................................................................................. 254

§ 9.09(a) The Brady Doctrine: The Right to Prosecutorial Disclosure of Evidence Helpful to the Defense .............................................................. 254

§ 9.09(b) Other Bases for Constitutional Contentions of Rights to Discovery ................................................................................ 261

§ 9.09(b)(1) The Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel .............................. 261

§ 9.09(b)(2) The Right to Fair Notice of Charges .................................... 262

§ 9.09(b)(3) The Sixth Amendment Right to Confrontation .................... 263

§ 9.09(b)(4) The Right To Present Defensive Evidence ........................... 263

§ 9.09(b)(5) The Right Against Concealment of Evidence That Impeaches Prosecution Testimony ......................................................... 264

§ 9.09(b)(6) The Right Against Prosecutorial Suppression of Evidence Favorable to the Defense ......................................................... 265

§ 9.09(b)(7) The Right Against an Unfair Balance of Advantage
Favoring the Prosecution ........................................................................ 267

§ 9.09(b)(8) The Obligation of the Equal Protection Clause
That a State Not Permit an Indigent Respondent
To Be Deprived of “The Basic Tools of an Adequate Defense” by Reason of Poverty ............................................................... 269

§ 9.10 Responses to Prosecutorial Assertions That the Information That the Defense Is Seeking Is Privileged ............................................................................. 269

§ 9.10(a) The “Informer’s Privilege” ...................................................... 269

§ 9.10(b) Work Product ........................................................................ 271

§ 9.10(c) Other Claims of Governmental Privilege .................................. 271
Part D. Discovery by the Prosecution Against the Defense

§ 9.11 The Prosecution’s Right to Discovery................................. 272

§ 9.12 Fifth Amendment Limitations upon Prosecutorial Discovery................. 272

§ 9.13 “Work Product” Protections Against Prosecutorial Discovery................. 277

Chapter 10
Preparing for a Motions Hearing or Trial: Selecting, Subpoenaing and Preparing Defense Witnesses; Preparing Real or Demonstrative Evidence........................................... 279

Part A. Selecting and Subpoenaing Witnesses

§ 10.01 Selection of Witnesses for a Motions Hearing or Trial................. 279

§ 10.02 The Need to Subpoena Defense Witnesses and Keep Track of Them Until the Trial Date......................................................... 279

§ 10.03 Types of Subpoenas; Persons Subject to Subpoena.......................... 281

§ 10.04 Procedures for Obtaining Subpoenas........................................ 282

§ 10.05 Right to Process at Public Expense When the Respondent Is Indigent................................................................. 282

§ 10.06 Mechanics of Serving Subpoenas............................................... 283

§ 10.07 Remedies If a Subpoenaed Witness Fails to Appear........................ 284

§ 10.08 Special Aspects of Subpoena Practice Necessitated by the Missing-Witness Doctrine............................................................... 285

§ 10.08(a) The Missing-Witness Doctrine........................................... 285

§ 10.08(b) Subpoenaing Defense Witnesses To Avoid a Missing-Witness Inference Against the Defense..................................................... 286

§ 10.08(c) Laying a Foundation for a Missing-Witness Inference Against the Prosecution................................................................. 287

Part B. Preparing Defense Witnesses To Testify
§ 10.09 Techniques of Witness Preparation. ................................. 288

§ 10.09(a) Reviewing the Facts and Trial Procedure with the Witness. . . . 288

§ 10.09(b) Instructions to the Witness About Demeanor and Dress. ........ 288

§ 10.09(c) The Dry Run of the Witness’s Testimony. ........................ 289

§ 10.09(d) Preparing the Witness for Cross-Examination by the Prosecutor. ............................ 290

§ 10.09(e) Refraining from Taking Notes or Written Statements from the Witness. ............................ 292

§ 10.10 Preparing the Respondent to Testify. ................................. 293

§ 10.11 The Respondent’s Dress for Trial. ................................. 295

§ 10.12 Co-Respondents and Accomplices. ................................. 295

Part C. Preparing Real or Demonstrative Evidence for Use at a Suppression Hearing or Trial

§ 10.13 General Considerations in Preparing and Presenting Real and Demonstrative Evidence. ................................. 295

§ 10.14 Real Evidence. ................................. 297

§ 10.14(a) Preserving Physical Evidence for Use at Trial or a Pretrial Hearing. ................................. 297

§ 10.14(b) Photographs of the Crime Scene or Other Relevant Sites or Objects. ................................. 297

§ 10.14(c) Authentication. ................................. 297

§ 10.14(d) Other Potential Evidentiary Impediments. ................................. 301

§ 10.15 Demonstrative Evidence. ................................. 301

Chapter 11
Retaining and Working with Expert Consultants and Potential Expert Witnesses. ................................. 303

§ 11.01 Deciding Whether to Retain an Expert. ................................. 303
§ 11.01(a) The Wide Range of Possible Experts to Consider in a Juvenile Delinquency Case. ................................... 303

§ 11.01(b) The Wide Range of Possible Functions for a Defense Expert in a Juvenile Delinquency Case. ............................ 304

§ 11.02 Selecting an Expert. ........................................ 308

§ 11.03 Obtaining State Funding for the Expert When the Client Is Indigent. ............................ 309

§ 11.03(a) Constitutional Rights to State-Paid Expert Assistance. ............................ 309

§ 11.03(b) Procedures for Obtaining State Funds for an Expert. ............................ 313

§ 11.04 Working with the Expert During the Pretrial Stage.................... 316

§ 11.04(a) Working with an Expert Consultant to Prepare the Case. ............................ 316

§ 11.04(b) Expert Witnesses. .................................... 316

§ 11.04(b)(1) Obtaining a Written Report from the Expert for Use at a Pretrial Hearing or Trial............................ 316

§ 11.04(b)(2) Preparing the Expert to Testify. .................................... 317

Chapter 12
Representing Clients Who Are Mentally Ill or Intellectually Disabled. ......................... 318

Part A. Overview: Stages at Which the Respondent’s Mental Problems May Be Relevant

§ 12.01 The Initial Interview and Subsequent Client Counseling. ............................ 318

§ 12.02 The Initial Hearing. .................................................... 319

§ 12.03 The Investigative Stage. ............................ 319

§ 12.04 Pretrial Motions and Other Pretrial Pleadings. ............................ 320

§ 12.05 Plea Negotiations with the Prosecutor. ............................ 321

§ 12.06 Trial. ............................ 321

§ 12.07 Disposition. ............................ 321

-xix-
Part B. Retention of a Defense Psychiatrist or Psychologist

§ 12.08 Reasons for Retaining a Mental Health Expert: The Many Functions a Defense Expert Can Perform in a Delinquency Case. 322

§ 12.08(a) Using a Mental Health Expert as a Witness at a Pretrial Hearing or Trial. 322

§ 12.08(b) Potential Functions of a Mental Health Expert Other Than Testifying at a Pretrial Hearing or Trial. 322

§ 12.09 Retaining a Mental Health Expert. 324

§ 12.10 Selecting the Mental Health Expert: Choosing Between Psychiatrists and Psychologists; Choosing Among Specialties. 327

Part C. Mental Health Examinations

§ 12.11 The Judicial Power to Order a Mental Health Examination. 328

§ 12.12 Why Defense Counsel Should Ordinarily Oppose a Mental Health Examination. 329

§ 12.13 Arguments That Can Be Used in Opposing a Mental Health Examination. 330

§ 12.14 Arguments That Can Be Used in Opposing an Order That a Mental Health Examination Be Conducted on an In-Patient Basis. 331

§ 12.15 Procedural Protections at a Mental Health Examination. 332

§ 12.15(a) Fifth Amendment Protections Against Self-Incrimination. 332

§ 12.15(b) State Law Prohibitions Against Using Statements Made During a Mental Health Examination as Proof of Guilt at Trial. 336

Part D. Incompetency to Stand Trial

§ 12.16 Applicability of the Doctrine of Incompetency in Juvenile Delinquency Proceedings. 337

§ 12.17 Standard for Determining Competency. 337
§ 12.18 Result of a Finding of Incompetency. 340

§ 12.19 Strategic Considerations in Deciding Whether to Raise a Claim of Incompetency. 341

§ 12.19(a) The General Inadvisability of Raising a Claim of Incompetency in a Juvenile Delinquency Case. 341

§ 12.19(b) The Limited Circumstances in Which an Incompetency Claim May Be Advisable or Necessary. 342

§ 12.20 Procedures for Raising and Litigating a Claim of Incompetency. 343

Part E. Insanity

§ 12.21 Applicability of the Insanity Defense to Juvenile Delinquency Proceedings. 344

§ 12.22 The Standard for Acquitting on Grounds of Insanity at the Time of the Offense. 345

§ 12.23 Inadvisability of Raising the Insanity Defense in Juvenile Delinquency Cases. 346

§ 12.24 Defending Against the Judicial Interposition of an Insanity Defense. 348

Chapter 13
Transfer or Waiver to Adult Court. 349

§ 13.01 Introduction. 349

§ 13.02 Factors That Affect the Decision Whether to Oppose Transfer to Adult Court. 354

§ 13.03 Meeting with the Prosecutor. 355

§ 13.04 The Right to a Hearing and Other Hearing-Related Rights. 356

§ 13.05 The Rights to Conduct a Complete Cross-examination and to Present a Complete Defense. 359

§ 13.05(a) Cross-Examination. 359
Chapter 14
Guilty Pleas

Part A. Introduction

§ 14.01 Guilty Pleas in Juvenile Court.
§ 14.02 Organization of the Chapter; Terminology. ............................ 381

Part B. The Decision Whether to Plead Guilty or Go to Trial: Factors To Consider in Developing and Evaluating a Potential Plea Bargain

§ 14.03 Overview of the Cost-Benefit Analysis Involved in Deciding Whether to Plead Guilty or Go to Trial. ................................. 381

§ 14.04 Assessing the Likelihood of Winning at Trial. ............................ 382

  § 14.04(a) The Strength of the Case for the Prosecution. .................... 382
  § 14.04(b) The Strength of the Case for the Defense. ....................... 384
  § 14.04(c) Circumstances That May Prejudice the Trier of Fact Against the Respondent............................................. 385
  § 14.04(d) Superior (Or Inferior) Ability, Experience, or Personableness on the Part of the Prosecutor Who Will Try the Case.. 387
  § 14.04(e) The Presence or Absence of Debatable or Dubious Legal Points Relating to Substantive or Evidentiary Matters on Which the Judge Might Commit Reversible Error in a Pretrial Ruling or in the Course of a Trial. .......................... 387
  § 14.04(f) The Possibility of a Divided Jury.................................... 387

§ 14.05 Assessing the Likelihood That the Judge Will Penalize the Respondent at Sentencing Because the Respondent Opted in Favor of a Trial Instead of a Guilty Plea................................................. 387

§ 14.06 Assessing Whether a Guilty Plea Would Produce Any Significant Advantages at Sentencing. ............................ 390

  § 14.06(a) Introduction: The Analytical Process Involved in Gauging Potential Sentencing Advantages of a Guilty Plea.................... 390
  § 14.06(b) The Concrete Sentencing Advantages Available in Juvenile Court....................................................... 391
  § 14.06(c) Mechanisms for Using a Guilty Plea to Obtain One of the Sentencing Advantages Available in Juvenile Court............. 393
§ 14.06(c)(1) Prosecutorial Commitments to Support (Or Not Object to) a Specific Sentence........................................... 393

§ 14.06(c)(2) Obtaining Judicial Ratification of the Parties’ Agreement to a Specific Sentence........................................ 396

§ 14.06(c)(3) Prosecutorial Commitments to Aid the Defense at Sentencing in Ways Other than Supporting (Or Not Objecting to) a Specific Sentence........................................ 397

§ 14.06(c)(4) The Additional Intangible Effects of a Guilty Plea in Securing the “Good Will” of the Sentencing Judge........ 398

§ 14.07 Assessing Whether the Respondent Will Suffer Any Collateral Consequences as a Result of Either a Guilty Plea or a Conviction at Trial................................................................. 398

§ 14.08 Assessing Whether a Trial Would Be Detrimental in That It Would Expose the Judge to Particularly Egregious Facts or a Highly Sympathetic Complainant and Thereby Cause the Judge to Impose a Harsher Sentence in the Event of Conviction......................................................... 404

§ 14.09 Assessing Whether the Decision to Plead Guilty Can Be Used to Steer the Case Before a Favorable Sentencing Judge.............................................................. 406

§ 14.10 Assessing Whether a Guilty Plea Would Prejudice the Respondent by Precluding Appellate Review of an Adverse Trial Court Ruling on a Suppression Issue or Other Issue Litigated Before Trial........................................ 407

§ 14.11 Assessing the Impact of the Additional Considerations That Arise in Cases in Which the Respondent Is Detained Before Trial............................................................. 408

§ 14.12 Assessing the Impact of Other Factors That Militate in Favor of Either a Guilty Plea or a Trial................................................................. 409

§ 14.12(a) The Potential Advantages of a Guilty Plea in a Case in which the Prosecutor Has Under-Charged the Respondent................................................................. 409

§ 14.12(b) Cases in Which a Client Manifests Strong Discomfort With One or the Other of the Options of Entering a Guilty Plea or Going to Trial................................................................. 409

Part C. Plea Negotiations
§ 14.13 Defense Counsel’s Obligations in Plea Negotiations. 410
§ 14.14 Opening Discussions with the Prosecutor. 410
§ 14.15 When Negotiation Should Begin. 410
§ 14.16 The Conditions Precedent of Effective Defense Negotiation – Things to Know About the Law, the Case, and the Motivations of the Prosecutor. 413
§ 14.17 Techniques of Plea Negotiation. 416
§ 14.18 The Plea Agreement with the Prosecutor. 418

Part D. Counseling the Client

§ 14.19 Advising the Client Whether to Plead Guilty. 421
§ 14.20 Discussing the Guilty Plea with the Client’s Parent. 423
§ 14.21 Making a Record of the Advice Given to the Client and the Parent. 423
§ 14.22 Special Problems in Counseling the Client Whether to Plead Guilty. 424
  § 14.22(a) The Guilty Plea and the “Innocent” Client. 424
  § 14.22(b) Clients Who Are Unrealistic About the Chances of Winning at Trial. 425
§ 14.23 Preparing the Client for the Plea Colloquy. 426
  § 14.23(a) Preparing the Client for the Colloquy on Waivers of Rights and Comprehension of Potential Sentences. 426
  § 14.23(b) Preparing the Client for the Admission of Guilt. 429
§ 14.23(c) Advising the Client of the Risk of Detention Pending Sentencing. 430
§ 14.23(d) Counseling the Client About Appearance and Demeanor at a Plea Hearing. 431
§ 14.24 Preparing the Parent for the Plea Hearing. 431

Part E. The Plea Hearing

§ 14.25 Scheduling the Plea Hearing. 432

§ 14.26 Procedure at the Plea Hearing. 434

§ 14.26(a) Essential Parties 434

§ 14.26(b) Defense Counsel’s Preliminary Recitation; Putting the Plea Agreement on the Record. 434

§ 14.26(c) The Plea Colloquy. 436

§ 14.26(d) Judicial Determination Whether to Proceed Directly to Disposition; Determination of the Respondent’s Detention Status Pending a Delayed Disposition. 437

§ 14.27 Coping with a Plea That Breaks Down. 438

§ 14.28 Procedure in Cases in Which the Plea Was Accepted and the Case Was Adjourned for a Pre-Sentence Report: Preparing the Client and the Parent for the Probation Interview. 439

Part F. Post-Conviction, Appellate, and Collateral Challenges to the Validity of the Guilty Plea

§ 14.29 Motions to Withdraw or Vacate the Guilty Plea. 439

§ 14.29(a) Motion for Leave to Withdraw a Valid Guilty Plea. 439

§ 14.29(b) Motion to Vacate an Invalid Guilty Plea. 440

§ 14.29(c) The Prohibition Against Evidentiary Use of a Withdrawn or Vacated Guilty Plea in a Subsequent Trial. 444

§ 14.30 Appellate Review in Guilty Plea Cases. 444

§ 14.31 Collateral Review in Guilty Plea Cases. 445

Chapter 15
Defense Motions to Advance or for a Continuance; Motions to Dismiss for Want of Prosecution; Speedy Trial Motions. 446
§ 15.01 Defense Motions to Advance the Date of a Pretrial Hearing or the Trial. ............................................ 446

§ 15.02 Defense Continuances. ........................................ 446

§ 15.03 Moving for Dismissal for Want of Prosecution or Other Appropriate Relief When the Prosecutor Is Not Ready to Proceed at Trial or a Pretrial Hearing. .................................................. 448

§ 15.04 Motions to Dismiss on Speedy Trial Grounds. .......................... 449
  § 15.04(a) Statutory Rights to a Speedy Trial. .......................... 449
  § 15.04(b) Federal and State Constitutional Guarantees of Speedy Trial. 450
  § 15.04(c) Procedures for Litigating Speedy Trial Issues. .............. 454

Chapter 16
Motions Hearings; Motions Arguments. ........................................ 455

Part A. Motions Hearings Generally

§ 16.01 Evidentiary and Non-Evidentiary Motions Hearings. ............... 455

§ 16.02 Scope of the Chapter. ............................................. 456

Part B. Non-Evidentiary Motions Arguments

§ 16.03 Procedure. .......................................................... 457

§ 16.04 Guarding Against Undue Disclosures of Defense Trial Evidence and Trial Strategy. ................ 457

§ 16.05 The Extent to Which Counsel Should Orally Recite Facts and Law Already Set Forth in the Motion. .......................... 458

§ 16.06 The Inadvisability of String-Citing Cases or Analyzing Court Decisions at Length. .......................... 459

§ 16.07 The Importance of Being Responsive to the Judge’s Questions. .... 460

Chapter 17
Motions to Dismiss the Charging Paper............................................... 462
§ 17.01 Types of Challenges to the Charging Paper; The Stages at Which These Challenges Can and Should Be Raised. ................................. 462

§ 17.02 Terminology................................................. 463

§ 17.03 Failure of the Charging Paper to Alleged Facts Constituting a Crime. . 464
  § 17.03(a) Failure to Charge Acts That Are Criminal in Nature............. 464
  § 17.03(b) Failure to Alleged Facts That Make Out Every Element of the Charged Offense. ................................................. 465
  § 17.03(c) Lack of Specificity........................................ 466

§ 17.04 Jurisdictional Defects: Maximum Age and Minimum Age Requirements for Juvenile Court Prosecutions.................. 467
  § 17.04(a) Maximum Age............................................. 467
  § 17.04(b) Minimum Age and the Infancy Defense. ............................. 468

§ 17.05 Dismissal of the Charging Paper for Failure to Establish Venue. . 470

§ 17.06 Technical Defects in the Charging Paper.................................. 471

§ 17.07 Statute of Limitations............................................. 471

§ 17.08 Double Jeopardy.................................................. 471
  § 17.08(a) Introduction: The General Rules...................................... 472
  § 17.08(b) Definitions.................................................... 472
    § 17.08(b)(1) “Attachment of Jeopardy”..................................... 472
    § 17.08(b)(2) “Same Offense”............................................. 472
  § 17.08(c) Reprosecution After An Acquittal.................................. 474
  § 17.08(d) Reprosecution After Conviction in the First Trial............. 475
  § 17.08(e) Reprosecution After the First Trial Ends in a Mistrial.......... 476
§ 17.08(f) Collateral Estoppel.............................................. 477
§ 17.08(g) Reprosecution by a Different Sovereign. ....................... 479
§ 17.08(h) Double Jeopardy Doctrines Governing a Juvenile Court Judge’s Review of the Findings of a Referee or Hearing Officer................. 480

Chapter 18
Motions for Severance (Or Consolidation) of Counts or Respondents.............. 481

Part A. Motions Challenging the Joinder of Counts or Seeking Consolidation of Counts

§ 18.01 Introduction: The Problem of Joined Counts; Overview of the Possible Remedies. .................................................................................. 481
§ 18.02 Deciding Whether to Oppose a Trial on Multiple Charges. ............... 482
§ 18.03 Motions to Dismiss the Charging Paper for Failure to Allege Facts
Justifying the Joinder of Counts. ................................................. 484
§ 18.04 Motions Challenging Misjoinder of Charges................................. 485 § 18.05 Motions for a Severance of Charges on the Ground of Prejudicial Joinder. ....................................................................... 485
§ 18.06 Consolidation of Counts. ..................................................... 486

Part B. Motions Challenging the Misjoinder of Respondents or Seeking Severance of Respondents

§ 18.07 Introduction: The Problem of Joined Respondents; Overview of the Possible Remedies. ....................................................................... 487
§ 18.08 Deciding Whether to Oppose a Joint Trial of Respondents.............. 487
§ 18.09 Motions Challenging Misjoinder of Respondents......................... 489
§ 18.10 Motions for a Severance of Respondents on the Ground of Prejudicial Joinder. ....................................................................................... 490
§ 18.10(a) Severance on the Basis of a Co-Respondent’s Confession Implicating the Respondent............................................................. 490

-xxix-
§ 18.10(b) Severance on the Basis of the Respondent’s Need to Call the Co-Respondent as a Witness. 493

§ 18.10(c) Severance on the Basis of the Respondents’ Conflicting and Irreconcilable Defenses. 494

§ 18.10(d) Severance on the Basis of the Disparity of the Evidence Against the Respondents. 495

§ 18.11 Defense Motions for Consolidation of Respondents. 496

Chapter 19
Motions for Diversion, ACD, Stetting. 497

§ 19.01 The Nature of the Motion; Defense Counsel’s Responsibilities. 497

§ 19.02 Invoking the Prosecutor’s Discretion in the First Instance. 499

§ 19.03 Seeking a Judicial Order of Diversion in Jurisdictions in Which Prosecutorial Consent to Diversion Is Not Required. 500

§ 19.03(a) Addressing the Circumstances of the Crime. 502

§ 19.03(b) Addressing the Circumstances of the Respondent’s Life. 503

§ 19.04 Seeking Judicial Relief Despite a Statute or Rule Requiring Prosecutorial Consent to Diversion. 507

§ 19.05 Developing and Implementing a Proposed Diversion Plan. 509

§ 19.06 Guilt, Penitence and Future Promise. 509

Chapter 20
Motions for a Change of Venue; Motions for Recusal of the Judge. 511

Part A. Motions for a Change of Venue

§ 20.01 Statutory and Constitutional Rules Governing Venue in a Delinquency Case. 511

§ 20.01(a) The Statutory Provisions. 511

§ 20.01(b) The Constitutional Provisions. 511
§ 20.02 Motions Challenging the Charging Paper on Venue Grounds.

§ 20.03 Defense Motions for a Change of Venue.

§ 20.03(a) Motions for a Change of Venue in Order to Secure Defense Access to Witnesses.

§ 20.03(b) Motions for a Change of Venue on the Ground That a Fair Trial Cannot Be Had in the Court in Which the Charge Is Pending.

Part B. Motions for Recusal or Disqualification of the Judge

§ 20.04 The Right to an Impartial Judge.

§ 20.05 Grounds for Recusal or Disqualification of the Judge.

§ 20.06 Procedures for Seeking Recusal or Disqualification.

§ 20.07 Tactical Considerations in Deciding Whether to Seek Recusal and in Framing the Recusal Request.

Chapter 21

Election or Waiver of Jury Trial; Motions Relating to the Jury.

§ 21.01 The Right to Jury Trial in Juvenile Delinquency Cases.

§ 21.02 Election or Waiver of Jury Trial.

§ 21.02(a) Procedure.

§ 21.02(b) Factors That Should Be Considered in Deciding Whether to Elect or Waive a Jury Trial.

§ 21.02(c) Counseling the Client.

§ 21.03 Motions Challenging Jury Selection and Handling.

§ 21.03(a) State Law and Federal Constitutional Grounds for Challenging the Composition or Handling of the Jury.

§ 21.03(b) Motions Challenging the Jury Selection Process on the Ground of Systematic Exclusion of a Racial or Other “Distinct Class” of Citizens................................. 531

§ 21.04 Investigation of Prospective Trial Jurors....................... 533

Chapter 22
Suppression Hearings ........................................... 535

§ 22.01 The Timing of the Suppression Hearing........................ 535

§ 22.02 Defense Goals and Strategies at a Suppression Hearing..... 535

§ 22.03 Procedural Aspects of the Suppression Hearing.............. 537

 § 22.03(a) The Defense Response When a Prosecution or Defense
           Witness Fails to Appear................................ 537

 § 22.03(b) Waiving the Respondent’s Presence in Suppression Hearings
           That Involve an Identification Suppression Claim......... 539

 § 22.03(c) Enforcing the “Rule on Witnesses” in a Suppression Hearing.... 540

 § 22.03(d) Who Proceeds First in the Suppression Hearing: The Burdens of Production and Persuasion................................ 541

 § 22.03(e) The Admissibility of Hearsay Testimony in Suppression Hearings...........................................

 § 22.03(f) The Defense Right to Disclosure of Prior Statements of Prosecution Witnesses................................... 546

§ 22.04 Techniques for Cross-Examining Prosecution Witnesses at a Suppression Hearing............................................ 547

 § 22.04(a) Examination Techniques When Counsel’s Primary Goal Is to Win the Suppression Hearing............................. 547

 § 22.04(b) Examination Techniques When Counsel’s Primary Goal in Litigating the Suppression Motion Is to Obtain Discovery... 549

 § 22.04(c) Examination Techniques When Counsel’s Primary Goal Is to Lay a Foundation for Impeachment at Trial.............. 551

 § 22.04(d) Examination Techniques When Counsel Has a Mixture of Goals at the Suppression Hearing. ........................................ 554

§ 22.04(e) Using Diagrams in Cross-Examination. ...................... 555

§ 22.05 Determining Whether to Present the Testimony of the Respondent and Other Defense Witnesses. ........................................... 555

§ 22.05(a) Testimony by the Respondent. .............................. 556

§ 22.05(b) Testimony by Defense Witnesses Other than the Respondent 558

§ 22.06 Arguing the Motion and Obtaining the Formal Judicial Findings Necessary for Effective Appellate Review. .......................... 560

§ 22.06(a) Timing of the Argument; Reasons for Seeking a Continuance....................................................... 560

§ 22.06(b) Order of the Parties’ Arguments. ........................... 561

§ 22.06(c) Using Burdens of Production and Persuasion. .......... 561

§ 22.06(d) Factors to Consider in Constructing Legal and Factual Arguments............................................. 562

§ 22.06(e) Obtaining or Avoiding Findings by the Motions Judge in Order to Improve the Respondent’s Chances on Appeal.......... 565

§ 22.07 After the Suppression Hearing: Protecting the Respondent’s Rights at Trial and Preserving Appellate Remedies. ....................... 565

Chapter 23
Motions to Suppress Tangible Evidence. ............................... 568

Part A. Introduction: Tools and Techniques for Litigating Search and Seizure Claims

§ 23.01 Overview of the Chapter and Bibliographical Note............ 568

§ 23.02 Constitutional and Statutory Restraints on Searches and Seizures. . 569

§ 23.02(a) General Principles of Fourth Amendment Law.............. 569

§ 23.02(b) State Constitutional Protections Against Searches and Seizures..................................................... 570
§ 23.02(c)  State Statutory Provisions Relating to Searches and Seizures... 571

§ 23.03  Analyzing Search and Seizure Issues: The Questions to Ask. ....... 571

Part B. On-the-Street Encounters with the Police: Arrests, Searches Incident to Arrest, Terry Stops, Terry Frisks, and Other Encounters

§ 23.04  The Spectrum of On-the-Street Encounters Between Citizens and the Police: Contacts, Terry Stops and Arrests. ....................... 577

§ 23.04(a)  Contacts. ............................................. 577

§ 23.04(b)  The Dividing Line Between Contacts and “Seizures” Within the Meaning of the Fourth Amendment. ................. 577

§ 23.04(c)  Terry Stops. ........................................... 580

§ 23.04(d)  Arrests. ............................................. 581

§ 23.04(e)  “Custody” for Purposes of the Miranda Doctrine. ............... 582

§ 23.05  Tactical Reasons for Seeking a Categorization of Police Conduct as an Arrest or as a Terry Stop. ................................. 582

§ 23.06  Criteria for Categorizing a Restraint (That Is, Any Seizure of the Person) as a Terry Stop on the One Hand or an Arrest on the Other. ... 583

§ 23.06(a)  The Length of the Restraint. ............................................. 584

§ 23.06(b)  Whether the Police Transported the Respondent from the Location of the Stop..................................................... 586

§ 23.06(c)  The Nature of the Setting in Which the Detention Takes Place. ................................................................. 587

§ 23.06(d)  Whether the Detention Was for the Purpose of Interrogation. ................................................................. 589

§ 23.07  Circumstances Justifying an Arrest. ........................................ 589

§ 23.07(a)  Authorization by Statute or Common Law. ......................... 589

§ 23.07(b)  Arrest Warrants. ...................................................... 590
§ 23.07(c) Arrests Without a Warrant: The Basic Authorizations for Warrantless Arrest in Felony and Misdemeanor Cases Respectively........................................ 591

§ 23.07(d) The Probable Cause Requirement for Arrest................. 592

§ 23.08 Searches Incident to Arrest. ........................................ 596

§ 23.08(a) The “Search Incident to Arrest” Doctrine. ...................... 596

§ 23.08(b) Searches of Containers in the Possession of Arrested Persons. .................................................. 598

§ 23.08(c) “Inventory” Search Incident to Incarceration................. 604

§ 23.08(d) Search Prior to the Point of Arrest........................ 605

§ 23.09 Circumstances Justifying a Terry Stop. .......................... 606

§ 23.10 Circumstances Justifying a Terry Frisk; The Plain Touch Doctrine. .................................................. 608

§ 23.11 Factors Commonly Relied on by the Police to Justify an Arrest or a Terry Stop or Frisk. ............................. 611

§ 23.11(a) “High Crime Neighborhood”................................. 611

§ 23.11(b) Failure to Respond to Police Inquiry; Flight.................. 612

§ 23.11(c) Furtive Gestures; Nervousness.................................. 615

§ 23.11(d) Arrests and Terry Stops Based on Tips from Informants. .. 616

§ 23.12 Police Seizures of Objects from the Respondent’s Person; Police Demands That a Respondent Hand Over an Object in His or Her Possession. .................................................. 616

§ 23.13 The Respondent’s Alleged Abandonment of Contraband upon the Arrival of the Police: The “Dropsie” Problem...................... 617

§ 23.14 Post-arrest Custodial Treatment of the Respondent............. 619

Part C. Police Entry and Search of Dwellings or Other Premises
§ 23.15 The Threshold Issue: Respondent’s Expectation of Privacy. .............. 624

§ 23.15(a) Introduction to the Concept of Constitutionally Protected Interests and “Standing” to Raise Fourth Amendment Claims. ................................. 624

§ 23.15(b) Expectation of Privacy; Areas in Which a Respondent Will Ordinarily Be Deemed to Have the Requisite Expectation. ................................. 625

§ 23.15(c) “Curtilage” and “Open Fields”; Multifamily Apartment Complexes. ........................................ 629

§ 23.15(d) Police Search or Seizure of an Object Belonging to the Respondent from Premises in Which the Respondent Has No Privacy Interest. ............... 632

§ 23.15(e) “Automatic Standing”. .................................................. 635

§ 23.16 Police Entry of Premises: General Principles. .......................... 635

§ 23.17 Entry of Premises Pursuant to a Search Warrant. ....................... 638

§ 23.17(a) “Bare Bones” Affidavits. ............................................. 640

§ 23.17(b) Improper Multi-unit Warrant Applications. ............................ 641

§ 25.17(c) Affidavits Containing “Deliberate Falsehoods” or Statements Manifesting a “Reckless Disregard for the Truth” ............................................ 641

§ 23.17(d) Warrants Based on Tainted Evidence. ................................. 643

§ 23.17(e) Neutral and Detached Magistrate...................................... 643

§ 23.17(f) The Particularity Requirement.......................................... 643

§ 23.17(g) Scope of the Search Permitted in Executing a Warrant. ............ 645

§ 23.18 Warrantless Entries of Buildings and Searches on Consent. ............ 647

§ 23.18(a) Voluntariness of the Consent.......................................... 648

-xxxvi-
§ 23.18(b) Authority to Consent: Consent by a Party Other than the Respondent........................................ 651

§ 23.18(c) Application of the “Private Search” Doctrine to Home Entries by Law Enforcement Officers. ................. 654

§ 23.19 Warrantless Entry for the Purpose of Making a Valid Arrest. ........ 656

§ 23.20 Warrantless Entry Under “Exigent Circumstances” ................. 660

§ 23.21 “Knock and Announce” Requirements: Restrictions upon the Manner of Police Entry ......................... 664

§ 23.22 Scope of Permissible Police Activity After Entering the Premises. .... 666

§ 23.22(a) The Requisite Relationship Between Police Activity Inside the Dwelling and the Purpose of the Entry. ............... 666

§ 23.22(b) Police Officers’ Search and Seizure of Objects While Searching the Premises; The “Plain View” Exception to the Warrant Requirement .................................................. 667

§ 23.22(c) Detention and Searches of Persons Found on the Premises .... 670

§ 23.22(d) “Protective Sweep” of the Premises ............................. 673

Part D. Automobile Stops, Searches, Inspections, and Impoundments

§ 23.23 The Threshold Issue: Respondent’s Interest in the Automobile or Expectation of Privacy Inside It ................................. 674

§ 23.24 Evidentiary Searches of Automobiles: The “Automobile Exception” to the Warrant Requirement .................... 676

§ 23.25 Inventory Searches of Impounded Vehicles ........................... 679

§ 23.26 Searches of Automobiles Incident to the Arrest of the Driver or Occupants .................................................. 682

§ 23.27 “Terry Stops” of Automobiles and Attendant Searches .................. 684

§ 23.28 Traffic Stops and Attendant Searches ................................. 684 <table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.29</td>
<td>License Checks; Stops of Automobiles at Roadblocks and Checkpoints</td>
<td>687</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.30</td>
<td>Border Searches of Automobiles</td>
<td>691</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Part E. Probable Cause or Articulable Suspicion Based on Information Obtained from Other Police Officers or Civilian Informants</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.31</td>
<td>Police Action Based on Information Learned from Other Police Officers</td>
<td>693</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.32</td>
<td>Police Action Based on Information Learned from a Civilian Informant</td>
<td>694</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.32(a)</td>
<td>The General Standard</td>
<td>694</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.32(b)</td>
<td>“Veracity” of the Informant</td>
<td>696</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.32(c)</td>
<td>The Informant’s “Basis of Knowledge”</td>
<td>668</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.32(d)</td>
<td>Partial Corroboration of the Informant’s Statement Through Police Investigation</td>
<td>699</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.32(e)</td>
<td>Disclosure of the Informant’s Name at the Suppression Hearing</td>
<td>700</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Part F. School Searches and Seizures</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.33</td>
<td>Applicability of Fourth Amendment Protections to the School Setting</td>
<td>700</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.34</td>
<td>Searches of the Student’s Person by School Officials</td>
<td>703</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.35</td>
<td>Searches of Students’ Lockers or Desks by School Officials</td>
<td>710</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.36</td>
<td>Searches by School Officials at the Behest of the Police</td>
<td>712</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Part G. Derivative Evidence: Fruits of Unlawful Searches and Seizures</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.37</td>
<td>The Concept of “Derivative Evidence”: Evidence That Must Be Suppressed as the Fruits of an Unlawful Search or Seizure</td>
<td>713</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 23.38</td>
<td>Prosecutorial Burden of Disproving “Taint” of Unlawful Search and</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Seizure................................................... 717

§ 23.39 Relevance of the “Flagrancy” of the Police Conduct in Ascertaining “Taint”. .................................................. 720

§ 23.40 Unavailability of “Tainted” Evidence as Justification for Any Subsequent Police Action. ................................. 722

Chapter 24
Motions to Suppress Confessions, Admissions, and Other Statements of the Respondent................................................. 724

Part A. Introduction

§ 24.01 Strategic Reasons for Seeking Suppression of the Respondent’s Statements, Whether Inculpatory or Exculpatory. .......... 724

§ 24.02 Applicability of Adult Court Suppression Doctrines to Juvenile Court Proceedings. ........................................... 724

Part B. Involuntary Statements

§ 24.03 General Standard for Assessing Voluntariness. ............... 725

§ 24.04 Police Coercion Rendering a Statement Involuntary............ 728

§ 24.04(a) Physical Force or Threat of Force. ............................. 728

§ 24.04(b) Intimidating or Overbearing Circumstances of Interrogation or Detention. ......................................................... 729

§ 24.04(c) Promises of Leniency or Threats of Adverse Governmental Action. ............................................................... 730

§ 24.04(d) Tricks or Artifices. .................................................. 731

§ 24.05 Characteristics of the Respondent That Are Relevant to the Assessment of Voluntariness. ....................................... 735

§ 24.05(a) Youth. .................................................................. 736

§ 24.05(b) Mental Illness, Intellectual Disability, Limited Education. .... 738
§ 24.05(c) Effects of Drugs or Alcohol. 739
§ 24.05(d) Lack of Prior Experience with the Police. 739
§ 24.05(e) Combination of Factors. 739

§ 24.06 Applicability of the Involuntaryness Doctrine to Coercion by School Officials or Private Citizens. 740

Part C. Miranda Violations

§ 24.07 The Miranda Doctrine Generally. 742
§ 24.08 The Precondition for Applicability of Miranda Protections: “Custodial Interrogation”. 743
  § 24.08(a) “Custody” 743
  § 24.08(b) “Interrogation” 748
§ 24.09 Validity of the Miranda Warnings. 751
§ 24.10 Validity of the Respondent’s Waiver of Miranda Rights. 754
  § 24.10(a) The Requirement That Miranda Waivers Be Voluntary. 755
  § 24.10(b) The Requirement That Miranda Waivers Be “Knowing and Intelligent”. 757
§ 24.11 Statements Taken After the Respondent Has Asserted His or Her Miranda Rights to Silence or Counsel. 762
  § 24.11(a) Sufficiency of the Language Used in Asserting the Right. 763 § 24.11(b) Assertion of the Right to Silence. 765
  § 24.11(c) Assertion of the Right to Counsel. 767
§ 24.12 Applicability of Miranda Requirements to Interrogation by School Officials or Private Citizens. 771

Part D. Other Constitutional, Common-Law, and Statutory Bases for Suppressing Statements

-xl-
§ 24.13 Suppression Under the Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel: The Massiah Principle........................................... 773

§ 24.13(a) “Critical Stages” of the Proceedings......................... 773

§ 24.13(b) Statements “Deliberately Elicited” by the Government........ 776

§ 24.13(c) Waiver............................................. 777

§ 24.14 Constitutional and Statutory Standards Governing Involvement of a Respondent’s Parent or Guardian During Police Interrogation........ 779

§ 24.14(a) Constitutional Standards.................................... 779

§ 24.14(b) Statutory Requirements....................................... 782

§ 24.15 Statements Obtained During a Period of Unnecessary Delay Following Arrest.............................................................. 783

§ 24.16 State Common-Law Doctrines Requiring the Suppression of Statements as Involuntary........................................ 785

§ 24.17 Statements Obtained by Eavesdropping on a Conversation Between the Respondent and Defense Counsel.................................... 786

§ 24.18 Electronic Recording of Interrogations............................ 787

§ 24.19 Statements Obtained Through Violation of the Respondent’s Fourth Amendment Rights or Illegal Eavesdropping.......................... 789

§ 24.20 Statements Tainted by Prior Ones That Were Unlawfully Obtained: The “Cat Out of the Bag” Doctrine...................................... 790

§ 24.20(a) Statements Tainted by a Prior Statement Taken In Violation of the Due Process Clause and the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment........................................... 791

§ 24.20(b) Statements Tainted by a Prior Statement Taken In Violation of Miranda............................................................. 792

§ 24.20(c) Statements Tainted by a Prior Statement Taken In Violation of the Sixth Amendment............................................ 796 § 24.20(d) Statements Tainted by a Prior Statement Taken In Violation of the Fourth Amendment. ............................ 796

§ 24.20(e) Potential Implications of Elstad for Physical Fruits of an Unconstitutionally Obtained Statement. ................................. 796

Part E. Trial Issues in Cases Involving Incriminating Statements by the Respondent

§ 24.21 Prosecutorial Proof of Corpus Delicti. ........................................ 797

§ 24.22 The Right of the Defense to Show the Circumstances Under Which the Statement Was Made. ........................................ 798

§ 24.23 The Prosecutor’s Power to Use a Suppressed Statement for Impeachment. .................................................. 799

§ 24.24 Admissibility of Evidence of the Respondent’s Pre- or Post-Arrest Silence. .................................................. 800

Chapter 25
Motions to Suppress Identification Testimony. ........................................ 804

§ 25.01 Introduction and Overview. .................................................. 804

Part A. Due Process Grounds for Suppressing an Identification as Unreliable

§ 25.02 The Due Process Standard. .................................................. 806

§ 25.03 Suggestiveness of Police Identification Procedures. ..................... 808

§ 25.03(a) Show-ups. .................................................. 810

§ 25.03(b) Lineups.................................................. 812

§ 25.03(c) Photographic Identifications. .................................................. 813

§ 25.03(d) Aggregation of Identification Procedures. ................................. 816

§ 25.04 Reliability of the Identification. .................................................. 817

§ 25.05 Suppression of an Identification as Unconstitutionally Unreliable Even Though Police Action Is Minimal or Non-Existent. ......................... 818
§ 25.05(a) Identifications Made for the First Time in Court................. 819

Part B. Other Grounds for Suppressing Identification Testimony

§ 25.06 Violations of the Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel. ................. 820

§ 25.07 Violations of the Fourth Amendment: Identifications Resulting from an Illegal Arrest or Terry Stop. ........................................ 821

§ 25.08 State Law Grounds of Objection to Identifications....................... 821

Chapter 26
Interlocutory Review of Pretrial Rulings by Means of Prerogative Writs........ 823

§ 26.01 The Availability of Prerogative Writs to Obtain Interlocutory Review of Pretrial Rulings. .................................................. 823

§ 26.02 Tactical Considerations: Potential Advantages and Disadvantages of Interlocutory Review. ............................................... 824

Chapter 27
Trial: General Characteristics; The Opening Stage................................ 826

Part A. General Characteristics of the Trial

§ 27.01 The Respondent’s Presence During the Trial. ......................... 826

§ 27.02 Defense Counsel’s Presence. ........................................ 831

§ 27.03 The Presence of the Respondent’s Parent or Guardian.................... 833

§ 27.04 Bench Trials: Their Nature and Implications for Defense Strategies and Techniques. ..................................................... 833

§ 27.04(a) Nature of Bench Trials........................................... 833

§ 27.04(b) Implications for Defense Strategies and Techniques............... 835

§ 27.05 Jury Trials: Procedural Matters; Adjusting Strategy and Techniques to the Idiosyncrasies of Juries. ....................................... 836

§ 27.05(a) Conduct of the Jury During Trial.................................. 836

-xliii-
§ 27.05(a)(1) Sequestration ........................................ 837 § 27.05(a)(2) Jury Misconduct; Contacts Between Jurors and Other Persons .................................... 837 § 27.05(a)(3) Contacts Between Defense Counsel or the Respondent and Jurors ..................................... 839 § 27.05(b) Adjusting Strategies and Techniques to the Idiosyncrasies of Jury Trials ................................................ 839 § 27.06 Preparation of a Trial Folder or “Trial Brief” and an Exhibit File ........ 841 § 27.07 Deciding Whether to Call the Respondent by First Name or Last Name at Trial ........................................... 841
§ 27.08 Public Trial .................................................. 842
§ 27.09 Transcription of Proceedings and the Respondent’s Right to Obtain a Transcript ........................................................ 846

Part B. The Opening Stage of the Trial

§ 27.10 The Preliminary Conference with the Judge Before Trial Begins .......... 847
§ 27.11 The Rule on Witnesses .................................... 849
§ 27.12 Discovery at Trial ......................................... 850
§ 27.12(a) Defense Discovery ..................................... 850
§ 27.12(a)(1) Prior Statements of Witnesses ............................. 850
§ 27.12(a)(2) Prior Criminal Records of Witnesses ..................... 851
§ 27.12(b) Prosecutorial Discovery .................................. 852
§ 27.12(c) Inspection In Camera Before Production of Materials Whose Disclosure is Sought by Either Party at Trial; Making a Record of Redaction Proceedings ...................... 852
§ 27.13 Requests by the Court That Counsel Estimate the Length of Time
That the Defense Case Will Take ................................ 853
Chapter 28
Selecting the Jury at Trial: The Voir Dire. .................................................. 855

§ 28.01 Introduction. .......................................................... 855
§ 28.02 Defense Objections to the Panel Prior to the Voir Dire. .......... 855
§ 28.03 Voir Dire Procedure Generally. ........................................ 855
  § 28.03(a) Challenges for Cause. ...................................... 856
  § 28.03(b) Peremptory Challenges. .................................... 859
  § 28.03(c) Variations in Voir Dire Procedure; Sorts of Voir Dire Questions Allowed. ........................................ 864
  § 28.03(d) Strategic Considerations in Exercising Challenges for Cause and Peremptories. ...................................... 866
§ 28.04 Defensive Functions of the Voir Dire; Prepared Questions; Authorities. ........................................ 867
§ 28.05 Questions Testing the Attitudes of Jurors to Lay a Basis of Challenge for Cause or to Inform the Exercise of Peremptory Challenges. .... 868
§ 28.06 Driving Home Principles Vital to the Defense Case. ............... 871
§ 28.07 Disarming Surprise Prosecution Evidence and Prejudicial Disclosures.................................................. 873
§ 28.08 Establishing a Good Relationship with the Jurors, Exploring Their Backgrounds and Thinking Patterns, and Forewarning Them of Conduct by Counsel That They May Not Like. ...................... 873
§ 28.09 Selecting Jurors. .......................................................... 875

Chapter 29
Opening Statements. ........................................................................ 877

§ 29.01 Opening Statements Generally. ........................................... 877
§ 29.02 The Opening Statement for the Prosecution. ......................... 877
§ 29.03  The Opening for the Defense. ............................................. 879

§ 29.03(a) The Opening Statement for the Defense in a Jury Trial. .......... 879

§ 29.03(b) The Defense Opening in a Bench Trial. ............................. 882

§ 29.03(c) Defense Opening Statements in Co-Respondent Trials. .......... 883

Chapter 30

Evidentiary Issues That Are Likely to Arise at Trial. .......................... 884

§ 30.01  Applicability of the Rules of Evidence. ................................. 884

§ 30.02  Procedural Devices. ........................................................... 885

§ 30.02(a) Procedures for Litigating Evidentiary Issues Out of Earshot of the Trier of Fact. .................................................. 885

§ 30.02(a)(1) Bench Trials. .............................................................. 885

§ 30.02(a)(2) Jury Trials. ................................................................. 886

§ 30.02(a)(3) Preparing to Use the Procedures. ................................. 888

§ 30.02(b) Stipulations. ................................................................. 888

§ 30.02(c) Stipulated Trials. ............................................................ 889

§ 30.03  Relevance; Probative Weight Versus Prejudice. ....................... 890

§ 30.03(a) Relevance Generally. ....................................................... 890

§ 30.03(b) Arguments for Applying the Relevance Rule in a Manner that Respects the Special Position and Needs of the Defense in a Delinquency Trial. .................................................. 891

§ 30.03(c) Probative Weight Versus Prejudice. .................................. 892

§ 30.04  Hearsay and Confrontation. .................................................. 893

§ 30.04(a) Introduction: The Relationship Between Hearsay and Confrontation Clause Issues. .................................................. 893
§ 30.04(b)  Hearsay............................................ 894

§ 30.04(b)(1)  Defense Objection to Prosecution Evidence as Hearsay. ......................... 895

§ 30.04(b)(2)  Anticipating Prosecution Objections to Defense Evidence as Hearsay. ........ 896

§ 30.04(c)  The Confrontation Clause. ......................... 898

§ 30.05  Competency of Witnesses. ............................... 909

§ 30.06  Co-Respondents’, Co-conspirators’, and Other Accomplices’ Statements. ....................... 910

§ 30.06(a)  Admissibility of Co-conspirators’ Declarations. ................................. 910

§ 30.06(b)  Admissibility of Co-respondents’ Declarations at a Joint Trial. ....................... 912

§ 30.07  Admissibility of Evidence of Convictions, Other Crimes, or [Bad] Acts by the Respondent or a Witness for the Prosecution or Defense. ................................. 913

§ 30.07(a)  Proof of Character, Propensity, Other Crimes or [Bad] Acts of the Respondent in the Prosecution’s Case-in-Chief. ............................... 913

§ 30.07(b)  Proof of the Respondent’s Prior Convictions or Prior [Bad] Acts for Impeachment or in Rebuttal. ............................... 917

§ 30.07(c)  Defense Impeachment of Prosecution Witnesses with Prior Convictions or Prior [Bad] Acts. ............................... 919

§ 30.07(d)  Defense Evidence of Prior Convictions or Prior [Bad] Acts of the Complainant or Other Participants in the Criminal Episode. ................................. 922

§ 30.07(e)  Prosecutorial Impeachment of Defense Witnesses with Prior Convictions or Prior [Bad] Acts. ............................... 922

Chapter 31
Handling Prosecution Witnesses. ............................... 924

§ 31.01  Cross-Examining Prosecution Witnesses – Generally.......................... 924
§ 31.01(a) The Right to Cross-Examine; Bases for Objecting to Judicial Curtailment of Cross-examination. .......................... 924

§ 31.01(b) Deciding Whether to Cross-Examine; The Possible Goals of Cross-examination........................................ 925

§ 31.01(c) Avoiding the Most Common Pitfalls of Cross-examination.... 928

§ 31.01(d) Framing Cross-examination Questions for Maximum Effectiveness. ..................................... 929

§ 31.02 Police Witnesses. .................................................. 930

§ 31.03 Accomplices Turned State’s Evidence. ........................................ 933

§ 31.04 Complainants in Theft Cases........................................... 935

§ 31.05 Complainants Who Identify the Respondent, and Other Identification Witnesses.................................................. 935

§ 31.06 The Complainant in a Rape or Other Sexual Offense................. 937

§ 31.07 The Mutual Assault Complainant. ........................................ 938

§ 31.08 The Child Complainant or Witness........................................ 938

§ 31.09 Prosecution Experts...................................................... 939

§ 31.10 Impeaching Prosecution Witnesses with Their Prior Inconsistent Statements.................................................. 944

§ 31.11 Impeaching Prosecution Witnesses with Their Prior Convictions and Prior [Bad] Acts........................................... 947

§ 31.12 Impeaching Witnesses with Their Reputation for Dishonesty....... 949

§ 31.13 The Prosecutor’s Tender of a Witness to Avoid a Missing Witness Inference.................................................. 949

§ 31.14 Prosecution Claim of Surprise............................................. 950

Chapter 32
Motion for Acquittal (The “Prima Facie Motion”)........................... 952
\section*{§ 32.01 The Motion for Acquittal}

\section*{§ 32.02 Reserving Ruling on the Motion; “Holding Open”}

\section*{§ 32.03 Dismissal of Some Counts or Offenses}

\section*{Chapter 33 Presenting the Case for the Defense}

\section*{Part A. General Aspects of the Defense Case}

\section*{§ 33.01 The Decision Whether to Present Defense Evidence}

\section*{§ 33.02 Planning and Presenting the Testimony of Defense Witnesses}

\subsection*{§ 33.02(a) Order of Defense Witnesses}

\subsection*{§ 33.02(b) Determining and Distributing the Content of Witnesses’ Testimony}

\subsubsection*{§ 33.02(b)(1) The Level of Detail of the Testimony}

\subsubsection*{§ 33.02(b)(2) Saving Favorable Material for Cross and Redirect}

\subsubsection*{§ 33.02(b)(3) Bringing out Unfavorable Material on Direct}

\subsubsection*{§ 33.02(b)(4) Rounding Out the Testimony}

\subsection*{§ 33.02(c) Structuring the Flow of the Witness’s Testimony}

\subsection*{§ 33.02(d) Drafting Direct Examination Questions}

\subsection*{§ 33.02(e) Conducting Direct Examination}

\section*{§ 33.03 Disclosure to the Prosecution of Pretrial Statements of Defense Witnesses}

\section*{§ 33.04 Challenging Rules and Practices That Inhibit the Presentation of Defense Evidence; The Constitutional Right to Present a Defense}

\section*{Part B. Testimony by the Respondent}
§ 33.05 The Respondent’s Right Not to Testify. ................................. 969

§ 33.06 Considerations Affecting the Decision Whether the Respondent Should Testify. ................................. 970

§ 33.07 Effect of the Respondent’s Choice. ................................. 973

§ 33.08 Presenting Direct Testimony of the Respondent. ................................. 974

§ 33.09 Cross-examination and Impeachment of the Respondent. ................................. 976
  § 33.09(a) The Basic Rules Governing the Prosecution’s Cross-examination and Impeachment of the Respondent. ................................. 976
  § 33.09(b) Orders Barring Counsel’s Consultation with the Respondent in Contemplation of Cross-examination. ................................. 979

§ 33.10 Corroboration of the Respondent. ................................. 979

Part C. Expert Witnesses

§ 33.11 Rules Governing Expert Testimony. ................................. 980

§ 33.12 Qualification of the Expert. ................................. 982
  § 33.12(a) Subjects to Cover in Qualifying an Expert. ................................. 982
  § 33.12(b) Stipulating the Qualifications of the Expert. ................................. 984

§ 33.13 General Structure of the Expert’s Testimony. ................................. 984

§ 33.14 Hypothetical Questions. ................................. 985

§ 33.15 The Expert’s Report. ................................. 987

§ 33.16 Preparing the Expert for Cross-Examination. ................................. 988

Part D. Character Witnesses

§ 33.17 Rules Governing the Presentation of Character Testimony. ................................. 988

§ 33.18 Qualifications and Form of Examination of Character Witnesses. ................................. 990
§ 33.19 Choice of the Character Witness. 991
§ 33.20 Preparation of the Character Witness. 992
§ 33.21 Expert Evidence of Exculpatory Personality Traits; Diminished Capacity. 993

Part E. Other Defense Witnesses and Other Aspects of the Defense Case

§ 33.22 Alibi Witnesses. 994
§ 33.23 Witnesses Who Are Alleged Accomplices. 995
§ 33.24 Surprise by a Defense Witness. 996
§ 33.25 Court Witnesses and Hostile Witnesses. 997

Chapter 34
Objections to Evidence; Motions for Mistrial; Proffers; Rulings on Evidentiary Questions. 1000

§ 34.01 Objections and Motions to Strike; Making a Record. 1000
§ 34.02 Time of Objection; Quieting the Witness. 1001
§ 34.03 Statement of the Basis for Objections; Argument on Evidentiary Points. 1002
§ 34.04 Anticipatory Objections. 1003
§ 34.05 Voir Dire of a Witness. 1004
§ 34.06 Continuing Objections. 1005
§ 34.07 Deciding Whether to Object. 1005
  § 34.07(a) Tactical Reasons for Objections. 1006
  § 34.07(b) Tactical Reasons for Foregoing an Objection. 1007
  § 34.07(c) Averting or Reducing the Risk in a Jury Trial that the Jury Will Be Irritated by Defense Objections. 1009

-li-
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>§ 35.06(a)</td>
<td>Inferences.</td>
<td>1025</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 35.06(b)</td>
<td>Presumptions Generally.</td>
<td>1026</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 35.06(c)</td>
<td>Presumptions That Shift the Burden of Going Forward.</td>
<td>1026</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 35.06(d)</td>
<td>Presumptions That Shift the Burden of Proof.</td>
<td>1027</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 35.06(e)</td>
<td>Conclusive Presumptions of Law.</td>
<td>1028</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 35.06(f)</td>
<td>Conclusion.</td>
<td>1028</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 35.07</td>
<td>Variance Between the Prosecution’s Proof at Trial and the Allegations of the Petition</td>
<td>1029</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>§ 35.08</td>
<td>Requesting Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law in the Event of Conviction</td>
<td>1030</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Chapter 36
The Closing Stage of a Jury Trial: Renewal of the Motion for Acquittal; Closing Argument; Jury Instructions; The Jury’s Deliberations and Verdict. .... 1033

Part A. The Renewed Motion for Judgment of Acquittal

§ 36.01 The Renewed Motion for Acquittal; Partial Directed Verdicts. .... 1033

Part B. Requests for Jury Instructions

§ 36.02 The Conference on Instructions. .... 1033
§ 36.03 The Lore of Charging the Jury. .... 1035
§ 36.04 General Areas Covered by the Charge. .... 1037
§ 36.05 Lesser Included Offenses. .... 1038
§ 36.06 Defense Requests for Instructions. .... 1041
§ 36.07 Preparing and Presenting the Defense Requests for Charge. .... 1046
§ 36.08 Learning What the Court Plans to Charge. .... 1047
§ 36.09 Objections to the Court’s Charge. .... 1047
Part C. Closing Argument

§ 36.10 Closing Argument Generally............................................. 1047

§ 36.11 The Prosecutor’s Closing.................................................. 1048

§ 36.11(a) Content of the Prosecutor’s Closing; Impermissible Areas and Arguments............................................................. 1048

§ 36.11(b) Objecting to Improper Arguments by the Prosecutor.............. 1053

§ 36.12 Defense Argument.............................................................. 1054

§ 36.12(a) General Considerations.................................................... 1054

§ 36.12(b) Structure and Content of the Defense Argument................. 1055

§ 36.12(c) Techniques to Consider Using in Closing Argument.............. 1056

§ 36.12(d) Limits on Defense Argument............................................. 1057

§ 36.12(e) Wrapping Up................................................................. 1058

Part D. The Judge’s Charge to the Jury

§ 36.13 Taking Objections to the Court’s Charge.............................. 1058

Part E. The Jury’s Deliberations and Verdict

§ 36.14 Conduct of the Jury During Deliberations............................. 1060

§ 36.15 Jury Requests for Supplemental Information or Instructions........ 1062

§ 36.16 Inability of the Jury to Agree; The “Dynamite Charge”................ 1063

§ 36.17 Mistrial for Failure to Agree................................................ 1064

§ 36.18 Return of the Verdict; Polling................................................. 1065

Chapter 37
Postverdict Proceedings................................................................... 1067

§ 37.01 Scheduling the Disposition Date; Respondent’s Detention Status
§ 37.02
Post-trial Motions to File in Cases in Which the Respondent Was Convicted.

§ 37.02(a) Errors in the Pretrial Proceedings or the Trial.

§ 37.02(b) Jurisdictional and Other Fundamental Errors.

§ 37.02(c) Newly Discovered Evidence.

§ 37.02(d) Insufficiency of the Evidence or a Verdict “Against the Weight of the Evidence”.

§ 37.02(e) Motion for Dismissal in the Interests of Justice.

§ 37.03 Requesting the Expungement or Correction of the Respondent’s Record and the Refund of Fees and Costs in the Event of Acquittal.

Chapter 38
Dispositions.

Part A. Overview of the Dispositional Stage and Dispositional Options

§ 38.01 The Unique Nature of Sentencing in Juvenile Court; Overview of the Chapter.

§ 38.02 The Role of Counsel at Disposition.

§ 38.03 The Dispositional Options Available in Juvenile Court.

§ 38.03(a) Introduction.

§ 38.03(b) The Judge’s Power to Order a Specific Program.

§ 38.03(c) The Range of Dispositional Alternatives.

§ 38.04 Procedures Prior to and at Disposition.

§ 38.04(a) The Role of the Probation Department; The Nature and Functions of the Pre-Sentence Report.

§ 38.04(b) Other Diagnostic and Evaluative Material.
§ 38.04(c) The Nature of the Dispositional Hearing. ................. 1084

Part B. Preparing for Disposition

§ 38.05 Counseling the Respondent and His or Her Parent and Advising Them How to Behave During the Dispositional Process. ................. 1085

§ 38.05(a) Counseling and Conferring with the Respondent. .......... 1085

§ 38.05(b) Discussions with the Respondent’s Parent or Guardian. .... 1086

§ 38.06 Meeting with Probation Officers and Other Court Personnel Before They Prepare Dispositional Reports. ......................... 1087

§ 38.07 Dealing with Court Mental Health Personnel. .................. 1088

§ 38.08 Obtaining a Copy of the Pre-Sentence Report and Other Reports and Records for Use at Disposition. .......................... 1090

§ 38.09 Securing Psychological Evaluations and Other Assessments of the Respondent.............................................. 1091

§ 38.10 Engaging a Social Worker........................................ 1093

§ 38.11 Gathering Mitigation Witnesses, Letters of Support, and Exhibits. .... 1093

§ 38.12 Meeting with Probation Officers and Other Court Personnel After Their Dispositional Reports Are Written. .......................... 1094

§ 38.13 Negotiating with the Prosecutor or Probation Officer. .......... 1096

§ 38.14 Finding Suitable Community-Based or Residential Alternatives to Incarceration and Arranging for the Respondent’s Admission to a Program Prior to the Hearing. .............................. 1096

§ 38.15 Timing of the Hearing: Right to a Speedy Hearing; Defense Motions for a Continuance. ................................. 1097

§ 38.16 Submitting a Sentencing Memorandum Prior to the Hearing. ...... 1098

§ 38.16(a) Reasons for Submitting a Sentencing Memorandum........... 1098

§ 38.16(b) Writing the Sentencing Memorandum.......................... 1099 § 38.17 The Right to an Evidentiary Dispositional Hearing.

§ 38.17(a) Conceptual Underpinnings for a Dispositional Hearing.

§ 38.17(b) The Constitutional Right to an Evidentiary Hearing.

Part C. Conducting an Evidentiary Hearing

§ 38.18 Strategic Reasons for Waiving the Right to a Hearing.

§ 38.19 Techniques for Conducting an Evidentiary Dispositional Hearing.

§ 38.20 The Applicability of the Rules of Evidence.

§ 38.21 Cross-Examining the Probation Officer or Mental Health Expert Presented by the Prosecution.

§ 38.22 Presenting Defense Evidence.

§ 38.23 Proposing a Dispositional Plan for the Defense.

§ 38.24 The Need for Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law.

Part D. Conducting a Non-Evidentiary Hearing

§ 38.25 Techniques for Conducting a Non-Evidentiary Hearing.

§ 38.26 What the Respondent Should Say When Addressing the Court at the Dispositional Hearing.

§ 38.27 What the Parent Should Say When Addressing the Court.

Part E. After the Hearing

§ 38.28 Preserving the Right to Appeal.

§ 38.29 Counsel’s Post-Dispositional Role.

Chapter 39
Appeal and Post-Disposition Proceedings.

§ 39.01 Scope of the Chapter.

§ 39.02 Appellate Review.
§ 39.02(a) The Right to Appeal ........................................ 1117

§ 39.02(b) The Indigent Respondent’s Right to Counsel Upon Appeal; to a Trial Transcript for Use on Appeal; and to Waiver of Appellate Filing Fees. ........................................ 1118

§ 39.02(c) The Need to Move Quickly to Preserve Appellate Remedies; First Steps ........................................ 1119

§ 39.03 Collateral Review ................................................ 1120

§ 39.03(a) State Postconviction Remedies. .......................... 1121

§ 39.03(b) Federal Habeas Corpus. .................................. 1121

§ 39.04 Revocation of Probation. .................................... 1122

§ 39.05 Revocation of Parole. ........................................ 1125

§ 39.06 Extension of a Term of Incarceration ........................ 1127

§ 39.07 Monitoring Conditions of Confinement; Seeking the Release of a Respondent Who Is Not Receiving Appropriate Treatment. ........... 1128

§ 39.08 Sealing and Expungement of Conviction Records. ........ 1129

Table of Authorities ..................................................... 1130

Table of Cases ............................................................ 1130

Table of Statutes, Rules, Regulations, and Other Authorities ........ 1242

Index of Subjects .......................................................... 1275
Chapter 1

§ 1.01 THE NATURE AND PURPOSE OF THE MANUAL

This Manual is a how-to-do-it guidebook for handling juvenile court cases from beginning to end. It differs from most books about juvenile court, which typically begin with an examination of the history and philosophy of juvenile court and thereafter focus (exclusively or predominantly) upon the aspects of juvenile practice that differ from adult criminal procedure. The Manual preterms any discussion of purely academic, historical, or philosophical matters and deals exclusively with the tasks, skills, rules of law, and issues of strategic judgment involved in representing clients in juvenile court. Rather than ignoring those aspects of juvenile proceedings that mirror adult criminal practice, the Manual examines them at every stage.

This Manual is, quite consciously, a manual for defense attorneys. While the Manual contains some material that may also be useful to other players in the system, it does not purport to describe or analyze subjects falling outside the purview of a defense attorney’s obligations to his or her client.

§ 1.02 THE STRUCTURE OF THE MANUAL

The Manual proceeds more or less chronologically, moving step-by-step through the process of handling an individual delinquency case. It begins with the earliest stages at which defense counsel may enter a case, then advances through the pretrial stages, trial, disposition, and post-dispositional proceedings.

To make this Manual easy to use during court proceedings, we have abandoned various conventions of manual-writing. We take up topics in the order in which they become relevant at each particular stage of a typical delinquency case, even when this format requires dispersing substantively related material among different chapters. For example, the topic of suppression motions is covered in five different chapters: a section on drafting these motions is found in the chapter on motions that need to be filed shortly after Initial Hearing; a later chapter spells out techniques for handling suppression hearings; then come three substantive chapters covering, respectively, motions to suppress tangible evidence, incriminating statements, and identification testimony. The latter chapters summarize the voluminous federal and state law on their respective subjects.

Where judicial opinions are cited to illustrate basic propositions accepted in a majority of state and federal jurisdictions, we have not multiplied citations but have chosen a case or two reported with headnotes that target the proposition in point. By using these headnotes to access the national data bases, attorneys in all jurisdictions can zero in efficiently on the relevant local caselaw.
Citation form in the MANUAL has also been adapted to the realities of trial practice. Thus, for example, a short-form citation to a case will only refer back to cases cited within the previous page or two, so that attorneys consulting the text when arguing a point in a trial or hearing will not need to search far afield for the full citation.

§ 1.03 CAVEAT – THE UNIQUENESS OF CASES

Although this MANUAL attempts to summarize the practices and procedures that should be followed in an ordinary juvenile court case, no case is “ordinary” in any but a highly artificial sense. Every case is intensely personal to the accused. Every accused is a complex and unique individual. Every prosecution of an accused is unique in facts and in law and makes unique demands on the defense attorney. Every defense attorney has his or her own style. There is no such thing as conducting a defense generally. What is right in one case is wrong in another. The most important attribute of the good defense lawyer is perceptive selectivity – the ability to determine the precise requirements of each case and to respond to them in a highly specific manner.

No book can capture or instill that quality. All that is attempted here is a listing of available options for the lawyer, an identification of the major strategic considerations that may affect choice among the options, an introductory description of the prevailing legal principles and potential legal arguments, procedures, and practical techniques that counsel may encounter or may wish to employ, some warnings about common problems, and some suggestions of ways to avoid them or to cope with them. Counsel will have to cull all of these things according to his or her own lights and the needs of his or her particular case in order to make the ultimate, lonely decision what to actually do.

§ 1.04 A SECOND CAVEAT – THE NEED FOR A PRO

The goal of this MANUAL is to dispel somewhat the edge of uneasiness that the lawyer with little or no juvenile court experience naturally feels when s/he is retained or appointed to represent a juvenile client. Having even a very general notion of what is coming and what can be done about it rightly inspires some confidence, and confidence can be very important in dealing with the client. However, as in all matters of grave professional responsibility, the lawyer must be careful not to let confidence get out of hand. Juvenile court practice is a specialty, and there is a lot at stake. It remains vital for the lawyer with relatively little juvenile court experience to recognize when s/he is getting into waters deeper than s/he can swim. In matters of complexity or difficulty, counsel should consider the practicability of consulting (formally or informally and on a limited or extended basis), associating with, or withdrawing in favor of, a more experienced juvenile court practitioner.
Chapter 2

Introduction to Delinquency Practice: The Role of Defense Counsel

§ 2.01 OVERVIEW OF THE CHRONOLOGY OF A DELINQUENCY CASE

§ 2.01(a) First Stage: Representation of Clients Prior to the Initial Hearing

Although defense attorneys normally begin their representation of a client at the child’s first court appearance – which is commonly called the “Initial Hearing” – there are some instances in which a defense attorney may become involved in a delinquency case prior to the child’s first appearance in court.

The attorney may be telephoned by a parent or other relative of a child, who reports that the child was just arrested and is presently at the police station. This scenario, which is described and analyzed in §§ 3.13-3.25 infra, requires prompt action on the attorney’s part. Counsel will need to go to the police station immediately to protect the client’s rights and, most important, to prevent the client from making incriminating statements. Thereafter, if the police refuse to release the child and send him or her to a juvenile detention facility pending Initial Hearing, counsel may be able to persuade the facility administrator to exercise his or her discretion to release the child. See § 3.24 infra.

If the attorney is contacted by the child or his or her parent at the time of arrest or any time prior to the child’s first appearance in court, counsel also may be able to play a role in the probation intake process. See §§ 3.26-3.28 infra. This process can be vital, since in many jurisdictions, the Probation Department has the discretion to dismiss, or at least to recommend dismissal of, cases other than certain statutorily enumerated felonies. And even when the Probation Department does not play any role in the decision to prosecute, the probation interview can be crucial because the information elicited at that interview will shape the Probation Department’s recommendation about whether the child should be released or detained pending trial.

Another fairly common scenario involving representation prior to Initial Hearing begins with a telephone call to counsel from a child or his or her relative, saying that the child is “wanted” by the police. The complex considerations involved in advising a client in this situation are described in §§ 3.29-3.33 infra.

§ 2.01(b) The Initial Hearing

The Initial Hearing normally consists of: appointment of counsel in those cases in which the child and his or her parent or guardian are financially eligible for court-appointed counsel; the juvenile respondent’s arraignment on the Petition; a judicial determination of whether the respondent will be detained or released pending trial; scheduling of a trial date; and, in cases in which the court orders detention, a judicial determination of whether there is probable cause to believe that the respondent committed the charged offense. The precise nature of these court functions and the steps that counsel must take to safeguard the respondent’s interests are discussed in Chapter 4.

In many jurisdictions the judge at the Initial Hearing has the power to order a mental examination if the respondent appears to be mentally ill or mentally retarded. The strategic considerations involved in deciding whether or not to oppose such an examination are discussed in Chapter 12, which covers the range of issues that arise when counsel represents a client who is mentally ill or mentally retarded.

§ 2.01(c) Preparation of the Case for Trial

Most of the chapters in Part I are devoted to the complex process of preparing a case for trial. This process of trial preparation will need to be undertaken in every delinquency case. Even though many cases will eventually result in a guilty plea, counsel will be unable to advise the client about the wisdom of pleading guilty until counsel has completed the investigation, discovery, and motions practice necessary to support an accurate assessment of the chances of winning at trial.

Because the tasks involved in trial preparation are scattered among so many chapters, a summary of them is provided in Chapter 6. This chapter is designed as a roadmap of the strategic decisions that counsel must make and the steps that s/he must take immediately after completing the Initial Hearing. Chapter 6 also describes the advance preparation for disposition that needs to be begun at this stage. One specific aspect of trial preparation – the preparation involved when representing a client who is mentally ill or mentally retarded – is treated separately in Chapter 12.

§ 2.01(d) The Alternative Courses of Action That Can Remove a Case from the Trial Calendar

Various events can derail a case from progressing to trial. First of all, there are a number of ways in which the case may be terminated favorably to the respondent. The Petition may be withdrawn by the prosecutor because further police investigation has shown that the case lacks merit, or because of witness problems, or for a host of other reasons. The case may be dismissed by the court in response to a defense motion, such as a motion to dismiss the Petition for legal insufficiency (see Chapter 17) or a motion to dismiss for want of prosecution (see § 15.03 infra). A motion for diversion can result in the case being removed from the court calendar, held in abeyance for a designated period of time, and ultimately dismissed if the respondent complies with all of the conditions of the diversion order (see Chapter 19).

Another event that can derail the case from progressing to trial is a proceeding instituted by the State to transfer or waive the client to adult court. If the prosecution succeeds in this venture, the case will be transferred to adult court, and the juvenile case will end. Since the sentences that can be meted out in adult court are greater than those in juvenile court, counsel will almost invariably oppose transfer. A fuller description of the transfer process and arguments that can be made in opposition to transfer are contained in Chapter 13.

The final event that can prevent a case from reaching trial is a guilty plea. After completing most of his or her investigation and trial preparation, counsel will be in a position to advise the client whether the improbability of winning a trial militates in favor of a guilty plea, as explained in Chapter 14. Chapter 14 also describes additional considerations involved in assessing the advisability of a guilty plea, tactics for plea negotiations with the prosecutor, techniques for counseling the client with respect to a plea, and the procedures involved in the actual entry of the plea.

§ 2.01(e) Filing of Motions and the Motions Hearing

In most jurisdictions the local statute or court rule sets a deadline for filing of defense motions. That deadline usually is the fifteenth or thirtieth day after the client’s arraignment at Initial Hearing. Chapter 7 lists the motions that counsel should consider filing and discusses strategic considerations in drafting the motions.

The hearing on the motions is usually held on the day of trial, immediately before the actual start of trial. In some jurisdictions the motions hearing is held a period of days or even weeks prior to trial. In still others, the motions hearing takes place in the midst of trial, when the issue that is the subject of the motion arises.

A motions hearing can consist of either oral argument by the attorneys on the applicable law or a full-scale evidentiary hearing followed by legal arguments. The non-evidentiary form of motions hearing is described in Chapter 16, along with suggestions of techniques for arguing motions. Thereafter, Chapters 17-21 cover the substantive law involved in the various types of motions that may give rise to a non-evidentiary motions hearing: motions to dismiss the charging paper for legal insufficiency, lack of jurisdiction, double jeopardy, and other basic defects (Chapter 17); motions for severance of counts or co-respondents (Chapter 18); motions for diversion (Chapter 19); motions for a change of venue or recusal of the judge (Chapter 20); and motions relating to the jury (Chapter 21). Four other types of non-evidentiary motions are integrated in larger chapters: motions for discovery are covered in Chapter 9, which examines both informal and formal discovery processes; while defense motions for a continuance, motions to dismiss for want of prosecution when the prosecutor seeks a continuance, and motions to dismiss on speedy trial grounds are all discussed in Chapter 15, dealing with the timing of pretrial proceedings and trial.

Motions to suppress evidence ordinarily generate evidentiary hearings. The complex tactical considerations involved in preparing for and handling a suppression hearing are described in Chapter 22. The substantive law of suppression then is taken up in Chapters 23-25: motions to suppress tangible evidence (Chapter 23); motions to suppress confessions and admissions (Chapter 24); and motions to suppress identification testimony (Chapter 25).

As explained in Chapter 26, pretrial rulings denying a defense motion or resolving some other issue unfavorably to the defense cannot be appealed interlocutorily. Chapter 26 describes the prerogative writs of mandamus and prohibition, which may be employed in certain circumstances to gain interlocutory review of pretrial rulings.

§ 2.01(f) The Trial

The timing of the trial and such timing-related matters as continuances and speedy trial motions are covered in Chapter 15. Chapter 27 describes the general characteristics of a trial and explores the differences in defense tactics in bench and jury trials.

The trial process has been subdivided, for easy reference, into ten subparts: the preliminary conference with the judge at the commencement of the trial, which may involve a variety of evidentiary and procedural matters (§§ 27.10-27.13); selection of the jury, when jury trial is available and has been elected (Chapter 28); opening statements (Chapter 29); an overview of the evidentiary issues that are likely to arise at trial (Chapter 30); tactics and techniques for handling prosecution witnesses (Chapter 31); the motion for acquittal (or “Prima Facie Motion”), which defense counsel must make at the conclusion of the prosecution’s case-in-chief (Chapter 32); strategic considerations involved in, and techniques for, presenting the case for the defense (Chapter 33); the law of objections and motions for mistrials, along with the tactical considerations involved in deciding whether to object and/or move for a mistrial (Chapter 34); the renewed motion for acquittal and closing argument at the end of a bench trial (Chapter 35); and the concluding stages of a jury trial, including the renewed motion for acquittal, jury instructions, jury arguments, and the jury’s deliberations and verdict (Chapter 36).

Chapter 37 takes up the subject of motions for a new trial, which, in some jurisdictions, can be made only during the period between the trial and disposition.

§ 2.01(g) Disposition

More than any other stage of the process, the dispositional phase of a juvenile case differs markedly from its adult criminal counterpart. The express goal of juvenile dispositions is rehabilitation of the offender, and dispositional hearings therefore focus upon the needs of the child rather than the nature of the crime. As a result, psychological and social-work assessments of the juvenile’s potential for rehabilitation can spell the difference between probation and incarceration. Accordingly, in cases in which incarceration appears at the outset to be a significant possibility, counsel will want to begin gathering social information about the client as early as possible, enlisting the aid of mental health experts and social workers when needed. In these cases, counsel should also explore the wide variety of community-based and residential programs that are available to juvenile offenders in most jurisdictions. Chapter 38 describes the range of sentencing alternatives, the steps that counsel should take in preparing for a dispositional hearing, and strategies for conducting the hearing.

§ 2.01(h) Appeal and Post-Disposition Proceedings

As explained in Chapter 39, appeals and post-disposition proceedings have less impact on a juvenile’s liberty than they do in adult criminal cases, since the comparatively short length of a juvenile sentence means that a sentence will have been completely served by the time appellate or collateral relief is ordered. However, appeals and post-disposition proceedings nevertheless should be pursued in juvenile cases for the sake of expunging the conviction and avoiding whatever collateral consequences may flow from the existence of a juvenile record. Chapter 39 describes the appellate and collateral remedies available in most jurisdictions.

§ 2.02 JUVENILE COURT TERMINOLOGY

Most juvenile courts subscribe to a special vocabulary that has been developed for delinquency cases as a way of emphasizing rhetorically that a delinquency offense is not a “crime.” The charging paper is a “Petition” that does not “charge” “crimes” but rather “alleges” that the child “committed acts, which, if committed by an adult, would be crimes.” The accused is not a “defendant” but a “respondent.” “Guilty pleas” are “admissions.” “Sentencing” is “disposition,” the term of incarceration to which the juvenile is sentenced is usually called either “placement” or “commitment,” and the place of confinement is denominated a “receiving home,” “youth center,” “industrial school,” “detention facility,” or “placement facility.”

As the Supreme Court recognized in In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), the “verbiage, . . . cliché [and] . . . ‘rhetoric of the juvenile court’” (id. at 29-30) has served to obfuscate the actual nature and ramifications of the actions of the juvenile court. “The fact of the matter is that, however euphemistic the title, a ‘receiving home’ or an ‘industrial school’ for juveniles is an institution of confinement in which the child is incarcerated for a greater or lesser time.” Id. at 27.

This Manual will use much of the customary juvenile court terminology, notwithstanding its obfuscating nature, since defense attorneys will have to accede to the protocol expected by the juvenile court judges before whom they appear. Frequently, however, the Manual will use an adult court term because the juvenile term is too distorting or because the juvenile term is too imprecise (such as the phrase “admission,” which is normally used in juvenile court to refer to both confessions to the police and guilty pleas).

In addition to the virtually universal juvenile court vocabulary, several jurisdictions have developed their own unique terms. For example, depending upon the jurisdiction, pretrial detention may be called “remand” or “stepback”; the probation officer who appears at the Initial Hearing may be called the “Court Liaison Officer” or “Intake Probation Officer”; the agency that oversees detention facilities may be called the “Department of Human Services,” “Social Services Administration,” “Department of Juvenile Justice,” or “Division for Youth.” Since it is impossible to cover all of these idiosyncrasies, this Manual will use only those terms that have become an established part of the universal juvenile court vocabulary, leaving it to the reader to uncover local variations.

§ 2.03 THE ROLE OF DEFENSE COUNSEL IN A DELINQUENCY CASE

Until the Supreme Court’s decision in In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), it was widely believed that delinquency proceedings should be informal, with “[t]he rules of criminal procedure . . . altogether inapplicable” (id. at 15) and the child deprived of “the procedural rights available to his elders” (id. at 17). Under that model, defense attorneys either were absent altogether from the courtroom (see id. at 35-36) or were expected to serve the “best interests of the child” by providing the court with a full picture of the child’s social problems, even if that meant assisting in obtaining the conviction and incarceration of the child.

In Gault, the Court recognized that “[f]ailure to observe the fundamental requirements of due process has resulted in instances . . . of unfairness to individuals and inadequate or inaccurate findings of fact and unfortunate prescriptions of remedy.” 387 U.S. at 19-20. Declaring that “the condition of being a [child] . . . does not justify a kangaroo court” (id. at 28), the Gault opinion spelled out a panoply of due process protections in delinquency proceedings, including the right to counsel. See id. at 34-42. In doing so, the Court recognized that the proper role of defense counsel in a delinquency proceeding is the same as in an adult criminal case: to assist the client in “cop[ing] with problems of law, to make skilled inquiry into the facts, to insist upon regularity of the proceedings, and to ascertain whether [the client] . . . has a defense and to prepare and submit it.” Id. at 36 (footnotes omitted). See also, e.g., In re Christopher T., 129 Md. App. 28, 34, 740 A.2d 69, 72 (1999) (“a juvenile’s right to counsel in a delinquency proceeding is commensurate with the right to counsel in a criminal case”); People v. Austin M., 2012 IL 111194, 975 N.E.2d 22, 40, 42, 363 Ill. Dec. 220, 238, 243 (2012) (“the type of ‘counsel’ which due process and our Juvenile Court Act require to be afforded juveniles in delinquency proceedings is that of defense counsel, that is, counsel which can only be provided by an attorney whose singular loyalty is to the defense of the juvenile”; “When counsel attempts to fulfill the role of GAL [guardian ad litem] as well as defense counsel, the risk that the minor’s constitutional and statutory right to counsel will be diluted, if not denied altogether, is too great. . . We conclude, therefore, that the interests of justice are best served by finding a per se conflict when minor’s counsel in a delinquency proceeding simultaneously functions as both defense counsel and guardian ad litem.”).

The canons of ethical conduct explicitly incorporate this conception of defense counsel’s role in juvenile delinquency cases. The Model Rules of Professional Conduct require that attorneys “maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship” with clients who are minors, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, MODEL RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT, Rule 1.14(a) (2018), even “children as young as five or six years of age, and certainly those of ten or twelve.” Id. Comment to Rule 1.14(a). As long as the client is not so incompetent as to be unable to “adequately act in the client’s own interest,” id., Rule 1.14(b), s/he must be accorded the prerogative of making “decisions concerning the objectives of representation.” Id., Rule 1.2(a). If counsel reasonably believes that the client’s young age or another factor such as mental impairment so severely “diminish[es]” the client’s “capacity to make adequately considered decisions in connection with the representation . . . [that] a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client” cannot be maintained and if counsel furthermore “reasonably believes” that the client “is at risk of substantial physical, financial or other harm unless action is taken and [that the client] cannot adequately act in the client’s own interest,” then counsel may take “reasonably necessary protective action, including consulting with individuals or entities that have the ability to take action to protect the client and, in appropriate cases, seeking the appointment of a guardian ad litem, conservator or guardian.” Id., Rule 1.14(a), (b). See also Institute of Judicial Administration – American Bar Association Joint Commission on Juvenile Justice Standards, Standards Relating to Pretrial Court Proceedings, Standard 6.7 & Commentary (1980). “In determining the extent of the client’s diminished capacity, the lawyer should consider and balance such factors as: the client’s ability to articulate reasoning leading to a decision, variability of state of mind and ability to appreciate consequences of a decision; the substantive fairness of a decision; and the consistency of a decision with the known long-term commitments and values of the client. In appropriate circumstances, the lawyer may seek guidance from an appropriate diagnostician.” American Bar Association, Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Comment to Rule 1.14. See also Marty Beyer, What’s Behind Behavior Matters: The Effects of Disabilities, Trauma and Immaturity on Juvenile Intent and Ability to Assist Counsel, 58 GUILD PRACTITIONER 112 (2001); Barry Kozak, The Forgotten Rule of Professional Conduct – Representing a Client with Diminished Capacity, 49 CREIGHTON L. REV. 827 (2016); Melinda G. Schmidt, N. Dickon Reppucci & Jennifer L. Woodard, Effectiveness of Participation as a Defendant: The Attorney-Client Relationship, 21 BEHAV. SCI. & L. 175 (2003). “In taking any protective action, the lawyer should be guided by such factors as the wishes and values of the client to the extent known, the client’s best interests and the goals of intruding into the client’s decisionmaking autonomy to the least extent feasible, maximizing client capacities and respecting the client’s family and social connections.” American Bar Association, Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Comment to Rule 1.14. See also Robin Walker Sterling, Role of Juvenile Defense Counsel in Delinquency Court (National Juvenile Defender Center 2009); Kristin Henning, Loyalty, Paternalism, and Rights: Client Counseling Theory and the Role of Child’s Counsel in Delinquency Cases, 81 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 245, 255-57, 270-80 (2005); Patricia Puritz & Robin Walker Sterling, The Role of Defense Counsel in Delinquency Court, 25 CRIM. JUST. 16 (Spring 2010).

In juvenile court, as in adult court, “[c]ertain decisions relating to the conduct of the case are for the accused; others are for defense counsel. Determining whether a decision is ultimately to be made by the client or by counsel is highly contextual, and counsel should give great weight to strongly held views of a competent client regarding decisions of all kinds.” American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice, Standard 4-5.2(a) (4th ed. 2015). “The decisions ultimately to be made by a competent client, after full consultation with defense counsel, include: (i) whether to proceed without counsel; (ii) what pleas to enter; (iii) whether to accept a plea offer; (iv) whether to cooperate with or provide substantial assistance to the government; (v) whether to waive jury trial [in those jurisdictions that afford the option of a jury trial in juvenile delinquency proceedings, see § 21.01 infra]; (vi) whether to testify in his or her own behalf; (vii) whether to speak at sentencing; (viii) whether to appeal; and (ix) any other decision that has been determined in the jurisdiction to belong to the client.” Id., Standard 4-5.2(b). See also McCoy v. Louisiana, 138 S. Ct. 1500, 1508 (2018) (“Trial management is the lawyer’s province: Counsel provides his or her assistance by making decisions such as ‘what arguments to pursue, what evidentiary objections to raise, and what agreements to conclude regarding the admission of evidence.’ . . . Some decisions, however, are reserved for the client – notably, whether to plead guilty, waive the right to a jury trial, testify in one’s own behalf, and forgo an appeal.”); Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751 (1983) (“[i]t is . . . recognized that the accused has the ultimate authority to make certain fundamental decisions regarding the case, as to whether to plead guilty, waive a jury, testify in his or her own behalf, and take an appeal”); Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 187 (2004); Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 477 (2000); Cooke v. State, 977 A.2d 803, 809, 843 (Del. 2009) (“Here, defense counsel pursued a ‘guilty but mentally ill’ verdict over Cooke’s vociferous and repeated protestations that he was completely innocent and not mentally ill. This strategy deprived Cooke of his constitutional right to make the fundamental decisions regarding his case.”); “We conclude that defense counsel’s strategy infringed upon the defendant’s personal and fundamental constitutional rights to plead not guilty, to testify in his own defense, and to have the contested issue of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt decided by an impartial jury.”); State v. Humphries, 181 Wash. 2d 708, 714, 336 P.3d 1121, 1124 (2014) (defense attorney may not “stipulate an element of the crime [at trial] . . . over the defendant’s known and express objection”); State v. Luby, 904 N.W.2d 453, 455 (Minn. 2017) (“defense counsel provided ineffective assistance by conceding the only disputed elements of the charged offenses – premeditation and intent – without his consent”). Counsel should advise the client regarding each of these issues and – in addition to informing the client about all relevant information, options, and potential consequences of alternative decisions (see McCoy v. Louisiana, 138 S. Ct. 1500, 1509 (2018) (“Counsel . . . must . . . develop a trial strategy and discuss it with her client, . . . explaining why, in her view, conceding guilt would be the best option”)) – counsel may forcefully urge the client to make choices that counsel believes to be in the client’s best interests. However, particularly when it comes to defining those interests – determining the ultimate goals that should be pursued in the litigation – the client has the last word.

In other matters (designing and implementing strategy, formulating the client’s legal contentions, selecting evidence and shaping its presentation, and so forth), the bottom-line judgments are for counsel to make. “An attorney undoubtedly has a duty to consult with the client regarding ‘important decisions,’ including questions of overarching defense strategy . . . . That obligation, however, does not require counsel to obtain the [accused’s] . . . consent to ‘every tactical decision.’ Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 417-418. . . . (1988) (an attorney has authority to manage most aspects of the defense without obtaining his client’s approval).” Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. at 187. See also Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157, 166 (1986): “[C]ounsel must take all reasonable lawful means to attain the objectives of the client” while remaining obedient to the applicable rules of professional conduct, such as the prohibition against knowingly presenting perjurious testimony.

The preceding principles, honed by scholars and practitioners, provide an indispensable compass for defense attorneys as they try to navigate the complex world of juvenile delinquency practice. Yet, even the most experienced, committed defense attorneys will admit to sometimes feeling baffled and frustrated by difficulties in dealing with particular clients. These include, for example, the client who seems hell-bent on doing something that is tactically dangerous; the client who is antagonistic to counsel for no apparent reason (or at least not one that is evident to counsel); and perhaps even a client whom counsel personally dislikes. In such situations, it is useful for attorneys to remind themselves that juvenile delinquency respondents usually are under extreme stress, not only because of the charge that hangs over their heads but also because of a variety of difficult life circumstances that comprise the background for the charge. See generally STEPHEN ELLMANN, ROBERT D. DINERSTEIN, ISABELLE R. GUNNING, KATHERINE R. KRUSE & ANN C. SHALLECK, LAWYERS AND CLIENTS: CRITICAL ISSUES IN INTERVIEWING AND COUNSELING 34-47 (2009); see also id. at 6-7 (explaining the ideal of client-centeredness). Also, counsel needs to keep in mind that a client’s decisions about the case, including decisions regarding such fundamental matters as whether or not to enter a guilty plea, may be influenced by a host of complicated feelings about family and self that the client may not feel comfortable sharing with a stranger like counsel, however well-meaning counsel may be. See, e.g., Binny Miller, Give Them Back Their Lives: Recognizing Client Narrative in Case Theory, 93 Mich. L. Rev. 485, 570-75 (1994). Defense attorneys should approach this work with a humble recognition of the limits of their ability to understand the circumstances of their clients’ lives and relationships, and should reconcile themselves to the sometimes painful reality that faithful adherence to the ethos of defense work requires providing the best possible defense even (and perhaps especially) to the most difficult clients.

Some commentators have argued that defense attorneys should view the “client” in delinquency cases as being the parent of the allegedly delinquent child. See JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN, ANNA FREUD & ALBERT J. SOLNIT, BEFORE THE BEST INTERESTS OF THE CHILD 118-29 (1979). The untenability of this position is evident when one considers that the prerogative of the “client” to define the “objectives of representation” (see AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, MODEL RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT, supra, Rule 1.2(a)) includes such crucial judgments as the decision to plead guilty, accepting an adjudication of delinquency without putting the prosecution to its proof. The courts have recognized that the rights of a child which are affected by these decisions are personal to him or her and cannot be waived by his or her parent or guardian. See, e.g., Smith v. State, 484 So. 2d 560, 561 (Ala. Crim. App. 1986); State v. Lee, 298 Ga. 388, 389, 782 S.E.2d 249, 250 (2016); In re Christopher T., 129 Md. App. at 47, 740 A.2d at 79; In re S.W.T., 277 N.W.2d 507, 512-13 (Minn. 1979); In the Matter of Butts, 157 N.C. App. 609, 614, 582 S.E.2d 279, 283 (2003). Accordingly, it is the child, and not the parent or guardian, who is the “client,” see In re Henderson, 199 N.W.2d 111, 115 (Iowa 1972); Martin Guggenheim, The Right to be Represented But Not Heard: Reflections on Legal Representation for Children, 59 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 76, 88-90 (1984); Kristin Henning, It Takes a Lawyer to Raise a Child?: Allocating Responsibilities Among Parents, Children, and Lawyers in Delinquency Cases, 6 Nev. L.J. 836 (2006), except perhaps in those rare cases in which the child is incompetent and the parent or guardian has been appointed guardian ad litem in the delinquency proceedings, see § 12.19(b) infra. See also IJA-ABA JOINT COMMISSION ON JUVENILE JUSTICE STANDARDS, STANDARDS RELATING TO PRETRIAL COURT PROCEEDINGS, supra, Standards 6.1, 6.3, 6.5 & Commentary.
Chapter 3

Representing Clients Before Initial Hearing; Steps To Take if a Client Is at the Police Station or Is “Wanted” by the Police

Part A. Introduction

§ 3.01 STAGES AT WHICH THE LAWYER MAY ENTER THE CASE

A defense attorney most commonly enters a juvenile delinquency case at the Initial Hearing. If the client is indigent, an attorney is ordinarily appointed by the court at Initial Hearing. If the client’s parent can afford to retain counsel, the parent and client most often retain the attorney immediately prior to the Initial Hearing, and the lawyer then enters his or her appearance at the hearing. The role of an attorney at the Initial Hearing and the client’s right to counsel at that hearing are discussed in Chapter 4, along with a description of the strategic considerations that should inform counsel’s actions in preparing for and conducting the hearing.

Occasionally, however, an attorney enters a case prior to Initial Hearing. The most common scenarios of this type are (i) the attorney receives a phone call from a parent or other relative of the child, stating that the child was just arrested and is presently on the way to the police station or already at the stationhouse; (ii) the attorney is contacted by the child or parent or other relative after arrest, but prior to the probation intake process, and represents the child in the Probation Department’s intake process; and (iii) the attorney receives a phone call from a client who is “wanted” by the police for a crime for which s/he has not yet been arrested, for failing to appear for a court hearing, or for escaping from a juvenile detention facility.

This chapter takes up each of these scenarios in turn, describing the steps that counsel must take in each situation to protect his or her client’s rights. As a predicate for that discussion, Part B of this chapter presents an overview of the procedures that police departments and probation offices generally follow from the time of arrest until the Initial Hearing.

§ 3.02 GENERAL APPROACH IN ENTERING A CASE: THE NEED TO MOVE QUICKLY

In each of the scenarios examined in this chapter, counsel will need to move quickly. For example, if the client is at the police station, a delay on counsel’s part may result in the client’s succumbing to police pressure and confessing before counsel can reach the station and avert the confession. In these situations, as in all stages of the case, counsel’s preparation and research should be as thorough as practicable. Knowledge of the individual case and client and of the local procedures and functionaries can spell the difference between wise choices of action and foolish ones. But at the outset of a juvenile case particularly, a trade-off does exist between the virtues of time-consuming preparation and the importance of getting started quickly to prevent the client’s interests from being irreparably damaged by fast-breaking events that will not wait for counsel to make a consummately prepared appearance.

Part B. Overview of the Initial Stages of the Juvenile Justice Process

§ 3.03 ARREST

The statutory standards for arresting a child (often termed “taking the child into custody”) for a delinquency offense usually parallel the standards for arresting adult criminal defendants. The arrest can be either: (a) pursuant to an arrest warrant (usually called a “custody order”) issued by a judge or magistrate on the basis of an affidavit establishing probable cause (often called “reasonable cause” in juvenile statutes) to believe that the child committed a delinquent offense; or (b) without a warrant, on the officer’s own determination that s/he possesses facts making out probable cause (or “reasonable cause”) to believe that an offense was committed and that this particular juvenile is the perpetrator (or aider and abettor in the perpetration) of the offense. As a practical matter, the courts rarely deal with arrest warrants (or “custody orders”) in juvenile cases because the vast majority of juveniles are arrested at or near the scene of a crime shortly after its commission.

The arrest invariably is followed by a “search incident to arrest.” See § 23.08 infra. Frequently, the police also will conduct an on-the-scene identification procedure, known as a “show-up,” in which the respondent is shown to the complainant and any other eyewitnesses for identification. See § 25.03(a) infra. Thereafter, the police usually take the alleged delinquent to the police station for “booking,” interrogation, and possibly additional identification procedures. See §§ 3.04, 3.05, 3.08, 3.09 infra.

§ 3.04 POLICE PRACTICES FOLLOWING ARREST – LOGGING-IN

Following an arrest, an alleged delinquent is generally taken immediately to the police station (or divisional or precinct headquarters) in the precinct in which the arrest took place. The respondent’s arrival at the station is ordinarily, but not invariably, noted in a police log for juvenile cases. (This is usually maintained separately from the adult log, in order to conform to local statutory requirements of confidentiality for juveniles.) In some jurisdictions the police treat logging-in as part of the “booking” or “slating” process described in § 3.08 infra. The juvenile log normally contains a dozen or so respondents to the page, and it records not merely the name and the time of logging but also the time and the place of arrest, some identifying characteristics of the respondent (such as sex, race, date of birth, and parent’s name), and the charge. Some police departments conceive logging-in as a recording routine unrelated to “booking” and maintain two books – the log and the blotter. Under this latter practice all juveniles brought to the station may be logged in on arrival, and those against whom it is decided to lodge charges may later be noted in the arrest book or “blotter.” Or children against whom it is clear that charges will be lodged may be noted immediately on the blotter, whereas children brought in “for investigation” or “on suspicion” may be noted in the log (sometimes called the “small book”).
In any event, police generally feel no compelling obligation to make an immediate log or blotter entry when there are investigative reasons for not doing so. For example, the police may refrain from logging in a respondent whom they want to interrogate at length, free of any interference from the respondent’s relatives or a defense lawyer. Such omissions or delays may violate published police procedures – and may, in some cases in some jurisdictions – violate requirements prescribed by statutes, court rules, or judicial criminal-procedure rulings; but officers dealing with a serious crime or an unappetizing respondent often take these requirements lightly.

In addition to recording the respondent’s name in a logbook showing either arrests or arrivals at the station, the police in many jurisdictions also will record the respondent’s name and any personal property taken from the respondent in a property log. Unlike property seized as proceeds or evidence of the crime (and held by the police or the prosecution until trial), this personal property can be retrieved at any time by the respondent, his or her parent, or the attorney (with proper authorization). Frequently, this personal property will include clothing, footwear, or other items that counsel will want to retrieve in order to substantiate a defense of misidentification. It may also include cell phones and other electronic appliances that counsel should retrieve promptly, before police investigation or processing of the case alerts officers to the possibility that these gadgets have potential evidentiary value and are subject to seizure and inspection with a search warrant.

§ 3.05 INTERROGATION AND OTHER INVESTIGATIVE PROCEDURES

Whatever the logging-in practice, the police usually subject the respondent to some interrogation subsequent to arrival at the station and prior to the full “booking” process. If the arrest is a misdemeanor or minor felony, the questioning will be conducted by an ordinary patrol officer (usually the arresting officer). In some jurisdictions the booking and questioning of juveniles in minor cases is handled by specially designated “Youth Services Division” police officers. In serious felony cases, particularly if the case has assumed some notoriety, the interrogation will be conducted (either in whole or in part) by detectives of the special squad (whether homicide, sex, robbery, burglary, narcotics, or vice) that investigated the case; in jurisdictions that possess Youth Services Divisions, the youth officer may sit in on the detective’s interrogation or may receive the juvenile for booking and further questioning after the detectives have completed their interrogation. If special squads of detectives are involved in the interrogation, frequently the interrogation will be held in the central headquarters of the special squad; after completion of that interrogation, the juvenile may be transported to the precinct of arrest (or, in some jurisdictions, to the headquarters of the Youth Services Division) for booking and possibly further questioning.

Regardless of the nature or title of the interrogating officer, the purposes of the interrogation are always the same: to secure the respondent’s admission or confession to the offense for which s/he was arrested, the respondent’s implication of other persons involved in the offense, and the respondent’s admission or confession of other “uncleared” or “open” offenses that s/he may have committed. In particular cases, such as those involving the arrest of persons known or believed to be youth-gang members, the police may also seek, through interrogation, to learn general information about recent developments in the neighborhood or the gang or about its members, which information they believe to be useful for intelligence or crime control.

In addition to interrogation a respondent may be subjected to other investigative procedures before or immediately after booking. S/he may be exhibited to witnesses in a lineup or show-up. S/he may be taken to the scene of the crime to “reenact” or demonstrate what happened. S/he may be taken home or elsewhere to assist the police in finding secreted or discarded weapons, loot, contraband, or evidence; and in this connection, s/he may be asked to give consent to warrantless police searches that, without this consent, would require a search warrant. Specimens of the respondent’s hair or blood, swabs, washed, or body scrapings may be taken for laboratory analysis. Each of these police actions may develop incriminating evidence. A respondent may have rights not to be subjected to some of these procedures altogether and not to be subjected to others in the absence of his or her attorney. But these rights can be waived – and they often will be waived unless counsel takes adequate steps to insure their protection.

§ 3.06 POLICE NOTIFICATION OF THE RESPONDENT’S PARENT(S)

In virtually all jurisdictions, statutes or police regulations require that the police notify a juvenile’s parent that his or her son or daughter was arrested. In some jurisdictions the requirement is a mere formality, and no sanctions attach to the police officers’ failure to notify the parent. In some jurisdictions, however, statutes or court decisions specify that the police department’s failure to make serious, good faith efforts to notify the parent and to arrange the parent’s presence during interrogation will invalidate any resulting confessions. See § 24.14 infra.

Statutory notification requirements of this sort, which police generally follow, compensate in part for police officers’ invariable refusal to grant juveniles any rights of communication after arrest. Theoretically, any arrested person – whether adult or juvenile – has the right under Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), to make contact with the outside world, in order to obtain counsel prior to undergoing interrogation. Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S.
146, 152-54 (1990). Miranda expressly requires that any in-custody interrogation be preceded by several warnings including the warning that the suspect has the right to the presence of counsel, and, if indigent, the right to court-appointed counsel, during interrogation. Dickerson v. United into custody [must] be advised immediately” of these rights, Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610, 617 (1976) (dictum); see, e.g., Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318 (1994); Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984), and “the police [must] respect the accused’s decision to exercise the rights outlined in the warnings.” Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 420 (1986) (dictum); see, e.g., Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600, 608, 611-12 (2004) (plurality opinion); id. at 620-22 (Justice Kennedy, concurring); Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. 91 (1984) (per curiam). As a practical matter, however, police rarely provide criminal defendants with the opportunity to make a phone call prior to interrogation, and it is even rarer that an officer makes that option available to a juvenile respondent. In some cases in which the police have failed to give the respondent an opportunity to contact counsel, it may be possible to argue that any resulting confession or identification testimony must be suppressed under federal or state constitutional doctrines (see Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963); and see generally Chapters 24-25 infra) or under state statutes requiring that the police afford an arrestee an opportunity to make a telephone call to an attorney. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Jones, 362 Mass. 497, 502-04, 287 N.E.2d 599, 603-04 (1972) (explained in Commonwealth v. Jackson, 447 Mass. 603, 615, 855 N.E.2d 1097, 1106 (2006)) (intentional police denial of an arrestee’s “statutory right to use a telephone” can result in suppression of “an incustody [sic] inculpatory statement or corporeal identification”); State v. Beaupre, 123 N.H. 155, 159, 459 A.2d 233, 236 (1983). (In some States, the juvenile code contains an express guarantee of a juvenile arrestee’s right to make a telephone call. See, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 627(b) (2018); NEB. REV. STAT. § 43-248.01 (2018). In those States that have an adult criminal code provision of this sort but no parallel provision in the juvenile code, the adult criminal statute often will be worded broadly enough to apply to juvenile arrestees as well.)

§ 3.07 POLICE EXERCISE OF DISCRETION WHETHER TO CHARGE THE RESPONDENT

State statutes and police regulations generally furnish the police with broad discretion to “divert” juvenile cases from the system by simply dropping the charges with a warning or, in some jurisdictions, by referring the child to a local social services agency or community service program. Statistical studies indicate that substantial numbers of juvenile cases (often as many as 50 per cent of all arrests) are resolved in this manner.

Studies of the nature and effects of this informal diversion process suggest that the primary factors influencing the charging decision include: the seriousness of the offense (note that in many jurisdictions, statutes or police regulations wholly eliminate police discretion to drop charges of certain enumerated felonies); the age of the child (with children of ages 12 and under being diverted on a regular basis); the child’s prior record of convictions, charges, and prior contacts with the police; the race, gender, and socio-economic status of the child (with indigent African American and Hispanic males facing the highest likelihood of referral to court); the demeanor of the child (with youths who seem respectful to the officers and fearful of sanctions viewed as “salvageable” and therefore diverted from the system); the comments and attitude of the parents upon being informed of the child’s arrest (with the officer assessing whether the parents are likely to appropriately punish the child and control his or her misbehavior in the future); and, finally, the individual officer’s personal feelings about the efficacy of the juvenile justice system and the likelihood that a minor offender will derive any benefits from court intervention.

In most jurisdictions, police departments maintain some sort of record of “contacts” with respondents in cases that are subsequently dropped or diverted. These records are consulted when the police wish to determine whether a newly arrested child is truly a first offender and “worthy” of diversion.

Police (or prosecutors later in the pretrial process) may condition their willingness to drop charges upon the respondent’s agreement to waive claims of civil liability for illegal arrest, mistreatment following arrest, wrongful prosecution, and so forth, against the officers and governmental agencies involved. Counsel should evaluate the costs and benefits of entering into any such agreement and should be prepared to negotiate for favorable terms. Counsel’s leverage in negotiating is enhanced by state and federal rules limiting the conditions that may be exacted as the price for dismissing charges, and limiting officials’ power to coerce respondents to accept oppressive conditions. See, e.g., Marshall v. City of Farmington Hills, 578 Fed. Appx. 516, 520 (6th Cir. 2014) (“A release-dismissal is enforceable only if a court ‘specifically determine[s]’ that: (1) it was entered into voluntarily; (2) there is no evidence of prosecutorial misconduct; and (3) enforcing the agreement ‘will not adversely affect relevant public interests.’”); cf. Town of Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386, 398 & n.10 (1987).

§ 3.08 BOOKING OR SLATING

Following the period of interrogation and the decision of the police to formally charge the respondent with an offense, the charges are noted in police records. This is the booking or slating process, which involves making a record of the name of the respondent and of some identifying data (usually gender, race, date of birth, address, phone), the time and place of the arrest, and the offenses charged. This information is recorded in summary form on a police blotter and, in more detail, on arrest cards, in arrest reports, in paper or electronic files, in computer data bases, or in more than one of these media.

The booking or slating process may also include the police officer’s filling out extensive, specialized printed or electronic forms. The forms commonly include some type of arrest report, calling for the respondent’s name, nickname, age, date of birth, identifying characteristics (gender, race, height, weight), address and phone number, parents’ addresses and phone numbers, the name and general location of the respondent’s school, and the respondent’s current grade in school. They often require information concerning the time, date, and location of the offense; the time, date and location of the arrest; whether any other juvenile respondents or adult defendants were arrested for the same offense; whether any force was employed in effecting the arrest; whether the respondent confessed to the offense and possibly also what the respondent said. In addition to these arrest reports, the police frequently prepare a supplement to the original “event” or “incident” or “complaint” report that was filed at the time when the crime was first reported. This supplement usually recounts the details of the arrest, possibly the content of any confessions or admissions, and the results of any identification procedures, and a statement of whether the arrest “closes” the case or whether there are still unarrested perpetrators being sought. Finally, in particular cases, the police may fill out additional forms: for example, firearms cases require special forms listing serial numbers and descriptions of guns and bullets; narcotics cases require detailed information about the nature and weight of the drugs and the property numbers assigned the drugs, as well as a “buy report” by the undercover officer; eyewitness identifications may require special cards or forms listing the description originally given and the words spoken by the witness in identifying or failing to identify the respondent.

The nature of the forms and the precise procedures followed by the police vary greatly among jurisdictions. It is important that counsel become familiar with both the types of forms used and the information contained upon those forms, in order to subpoena documents that can prove invaluable at trial. See §§ 8.16, 8.17, 8.19(a) infra.

§ 3.09 FINGERPRINTING AND PHOTOGRAPHING

Two common components of police booking procedures in adult criminal cases are the fingerprinting and photographing of the defendant, which enable the police to maintain fingerprint records and mug shots for use in later investigations. As a result of the juvenile court’s philosophy of confidentiality, statutes in approximately half of the States limit the power of the police to fingerprint or photograph juvenile respondents after arrest. The scope of that limitation varies widely. In some States the police must obtain the consent of a juvenile court judge in order to fingerprint or photograph a juvenile. In other States the police are empowered to fingerprint and photograph juveniles, but only in serious felonies designated in the statute and/or only if the juvenile is above a certain age.

In a few States there are restrictions on police practices of filing and disseminating fingerprint records and mug shots. These statutes generally require that the police keep juvenile fingerprint records and photographs separate from adult records, and withhold the juvenile records from the adult criminal files routinely forwarded to the F.B.I.

In several States the statutes also create mechanisms that attorneys can and should employ to compel destruction of juveniles’ fingerprint records and photographs in the event of a favorable disposition of the case or after the juvenile has passed a certain age. See §§ 37.03, 39.08 infra.

§ 3.10 POLICE DECISION WHETHER TO DETAIN THE RESPONDENT PENDING ARRAIGNMENT

After deciding to lodge charges against the respondent and after booking (and possibly also fingerprinting and photographing) the respondent, the police decide whether to detain the respondent pending the first court appearance (generally known as the “Initial Hearing”) or release the respondent to the custody of his or her parents. If the police opt for detention and court is still in session and the “cut-off time” for bringing the child to court (usually early-to mid-afternoon) has not yet passed, then the detained respondent will be brought to court immediately for arraignment and a judicial determination of the need for pretrial detention. In cases in which the police have decided to detain pending arraignment and the cut-off time has already passed, the police will bring the detained youth to a juvenile detention facility to be held overnight and transported to court in the morning. If the police opt for release, then the juvenile and his or her parents will be given a form (in some jurisdictions, called an “appearance ticket”) instructing them to come to court on a specified later date (usually about two weeks later) and to report to Probation Intake.

The ramifications of the police decision to detain or release are substantial. If a child enters court from the cell-block, then judges, prosecutors, and probation officers often apply an unspoken presumption that the detention should continue for the period pending trial. On the other hand, if the child is released and stays out of trouble for the two weeks prior to the first court appearance, there often will be an implicit presumption that the release status should continue. (Indeed, in some jurisdictions, community release cases are arraigned before a magistrate who does not even have the power to detain the child pending trial.)

State statutes and police regulations generally direct the police to base the detention/release decision on an assessment of the probability of continued criminal conduct and the probability of flight if the child is released. However, in making those assessments, the police usually will consider all of the factors described in § 3.07 supra as influencing police discretion on the charging decision. Thus the nature of the offense, the respondent’s age, prior record, gender, race, socio-economic status, and demeanor all will inform the police judgment regarding the youth’s propensity for future dangerousness or flight and thereby will determine whether the child is detained or released. In some jurisdictions the statutes or police regulations specify that a child shall not be released on charges of certain enumerated felonies.

§ 3.11 ALLEGED DELINQUENTSDETAINED BY THE POLICE PENDING ARRAIGNMENT: TRANSPORTATION TO THE JUVENILE DETENTION FACILITY AND THE DE NOVO JUDGMENT ON DETENTION OR RELEASE BY FACILITY STAFF

If the police decide to detain a child in a delinquency case and court has been adjourned for the day (or the cut-off time for bringing children to court has passed), then the police will transport the respondent to a juvenile detention facility where s/he will be held overnight so that s/he can be brought to court in the morning. For children who are arrested on a weekend, the period of pre-court detention may extend up to 72 hours.

In many jurisdictions state statutes empower some official stationed at the detention facility to make a de novo decision whether the child should be detained or released into parental custody pending the first court appearance. (That official may be an employee of the juvenile court’s probation department or a specifically designated official of the state agency charged with administering the juvenile detention facilities, or a member of the staff of the particular facility.) The governing statute or the applicable agency regulations usually direct that official to base the detention/release determination on a prediction of the child’s propensity for future criminal conduct and likelihood of flight. Frequently, agency regulations will amplify this general standard by directing the officials to consider the nature of the present offense and the respondent’s prior record. Also, statutes and agency regulations frequently prohibit release in enumerated felony cases.

If the agency official decides to release the child into parental custody, the child and parent are given a form directing them to report to the probation intake office on a subsequent date (usually two weeks later). If the parent refuses to take the child home, then the respondent will be detained overnight and brought to court in the morning. If the parent wishes to accept custody but is unable to arrange transportation from the facility, then, in some jurisdictions the child will be brought home by a facility staff member; in other jurisdictions the parent’s inability to arrange transportation results in the child’s staying in detention.

In some jurisdictions the official stationed at the detention facility has the additional option of detaining the child overnight in a group home or “shelter house” for alleged delinquent youth. That option may be employed in cases in which the parent refuses to accept custody or in which the nature of the offense or the respondent’s prior record warrant a detention option more confining than outright release but less severe than detention in a secure facility.

§ 3.12 THE PROBATION INTAKE PROCESS

Whether a child is detained or released, s/he will go through a probation intake process prior to arraignment. The timing and nature of that process vary slightly, depending on whether the child was detained or released.

In most jurisdictions the probation intake process is designed to serve two functions: (i) to assess whether the “social factors” in the case (that is, the child’s age, prior record, parental supervision, school attendance, and attitude) warrant “diversion” of the case – which can mean either outright dismissal of the charges or temporary abatement of any court proceedings and the promise of eventual dismissal after the child has completed some counseling or community service program; and (ii) in the event that the probation office concludes that diversion is inappropriate (or in jurisdictions where the probation office is not the final arbiter of the diversion decision, if the prosecutor’s office or judge concludes that diversion is inappropriate), to assess the need for a judicial order of detention of the child pending trial. The probation office’s procedures for gathering the information necessary to make these judgments invariably include an interview of the child and his or her parent(s) or guardian, consultation of prior court records concerning the child, and discussions with any present or prior probation officers of the child. The intake process usually also will include telephone conversations with the attendance officer of the child’s school and with any mental health professionals who may have been seeing the child.

In detention cases this process usually is relatively truncated, in light of the need to complete the paperwork necessary to send the case into court for arraignment quickly. As soon as the child is brought in from the juvenile detention facility, s/he will be interviewed by an intake probation officer in the cell-block. That same probation officer then will interview the parent, consult prior court records on the child, and make whatever phone calls are feasible. The probation officer then will make a decision on diversion (or, in some jurisdictions, will make a recommendation regarding diversion to the prosecutor’s office or the judge). If the case is a detention case, it most likely will not be diverted: whatever aspects of the child’s background or the current offense caused the police and the detention facility official to opt for detention usually will also result in the denial of diversion. (In fact, in some jurisdictions the intake probation office follows a policy, whether formal or informal, of automatically rejecting diversion in all detention cases.) Thus the probation officer’s primary focus in detention cases usually will be the gathering of sufficient information to make a recommendation to the court regarding the need for pretrial commitment. At arraignment the probation officer will present the recommendation and a summary of the social information underlying that recommendation to the court. See § 4.19 infra.

In cases in which the respondent was released by either the police or a detention facility official, the probation intake process will usually take place two to four weeks after arrest. When the respondent and his or her parent appear at the probation office in accordance with their “appearance ticket” (see §§ 3.10, 3.11 supra), they will be interviewed by an intake probation officer. Thereafter, the probation officer will check the child’s records and will call the child’s school, any present or prior probation officers that the child has had, and any mental health personnel who have seen the child. In some jurisdictions the practice is to complete that intake process, determine the propriety of diversion, and, if necessary, send the case into court for arraignment, all on the day of the interview with the respondent. In other jurisdictions the child and parent are instructed to return on another date for the final decision on diversion and, if necessary, for arraignment.

After the probation office has completed its intake process, the intake probation officer will send some type of form to the agency that prosecutes juvenile delinquency cases, informing that agency of the decision regarding diversion (or, in some jurisdictions, making a recommendation regarding the prosecutor’s decision on diversion). If the case is not to be diverted, the probation office or the prosecutor’s office will prepare a charging document (“petition”) and will send the petition and any necessary supporting documents to the court clerk’s office. The court clerk’s office then prepares the official court file, and when that file is received in the arraignment courtroom, the case is ready for arraignment.

Part C. Representing Juveniles Who Have Just Been Arrested and Are Still at the Stationhouse or Holding Facility: Dealing with the Police and Other Damage Control

§ 3.13 THE TELEPHONE CALL FROM A PARENT OF A CHILD WHO HAS JUST BEEN ARRESTED AND IS STILL AT THE STATIONHOUSE

A late night telephone call from a distressed parent or guardian of a recently arrested juvenile is a common occurrence in the lives of both retained and appointed counsel. The appointed lawyer is usually contacted because s/he already represents the child on some charge and therefore is known to the parent. The retained lawyer may be contacted either because of such an existing relationship with the family or because the parent has obtained the lawyer’s name from an acquaintance, a reference, or the phone book. More than any other situation, this scenario requires immediate action on the part of the lawyer. The attorney must move quickly to prevent the respondent from making any incriminating statements to the police. The lawyer’s success in that endeavor can literally mean the difference between conviction and acquittal when the case eventually reaches trial.

Because of the need for prompt action, the attorney should keep the phone conversation with the parent or guardian as brief as possible. (The attorney should be sure to explain the need for succinctness, in order to avoid seeming insensitive to the fears and concerns of the parent or guardian.) At this point the only vital information is that which is needed to locate the respondent, gain access to him or her, and establish oneself in the eyes of the police as respondent’s counsel. The attorney should get the following items:

1. The respondent’s name (with spelling).
2. The caller’s name (with spelling), relationship to the respondent, and telephone number (so the attorney can call back for a follow-up conversation after locating and communicating with the client).
3. Authorization from the caller to represent the respondent, at least at this stage.
4. Any information the caller may have about which police station the respondent was taken to. The caller may know precisely, as a result of having received a call from the police notifying him or her of the arrest. If the caller does not know, the attorney should ask: where the arrest was made; whether it was made by uniformed or plainclothes police officers; and whether the officers belonged to a special squad (such as homicide, robbery, burglary, narcotics, vice) or were otherwise identifiable by the caller.
5. The offense for which the respondent was arrested, if the caller knows. The nature of the offense may be important in attempting to locate the respondent, especially if a special squad is involved in the interrogation. Conversely, a lengthy description of the facts of the case not only is unnecessary at this stage but is counterproductive in light of the need for quick action. When, as so frequently happens, the parent launches into an explanation of why the respondent is innocent, the attorney must gently but firmly explain his or her need for acting quickly to find the respondent and should indicate that s/he would like very much to hear what the parent has to say on a later occasion when there is more time. (Such explanations are not only necessary as a matter of common courtesy but also effective lawyering, since good relations with the parent usually are essential to proper handling of the case.)
§ 3.14 LOCATING A CLIENT WHO WAS RECENTLY ARRESTED

The most effective way to locate the respondent is usually a series of trial-and-error telephone calls. The order of the calls depends in part upon the amount of time that has elapsed since the arrest, but the first call should ordinarily go to the desk officer of the police station for the precinct where the arrest occurred, and the second call should go to any officer in that precinct who has been specially designated to conduct the “booking” of all juveniles. In all but serious felony or special-squad cases, these officers are likely to know where the respondent is and what officer is in charge of “booking” and interrogating the respondent. See §§ 3.04, 3.05, 3.08 supra.

In serious felony cases and special-squad cases, detectives usually conduct an interrogation of the respondent prior to turning the respondent over to a uniformed officer or Youth Division officer for booking. See § 3.05 supra. As a result, in cases in which the detectives are still in the process of interrogating the respondent, and especially if that interrogation is taking place in a special-squad headquarters in another region, the desk officer and other officers in the precinct stationhouse are unlikely to have any knowledge of the whereabouts of the respondent. Accordingly, if counsel fails to obtain information about the respondent’s location from the precinct-station desk or Youth Services officer for that region, calls should next be made to the commanding officer of any detective squads for that precinct and then to the commanding officers of special squads (such as homicide, narcotics, vice) whose headquarters are in other regions. Counsel should also check with the local juvenile detention facility, in the unlikely event that an officer brought the child directly to the facility without first filling out all of the usual paperwork at the police station.

If these phone calls prove fruitless, counsel should call the commanding officer on duty in the arrest precinct, explain that the client has disappeared following an arrest in the commander’s precinct, and request that the commander locate the client immediately and inform counsel where s/he is being held. If the commander claims ignorance, counsel should ask for the name and phone number of the highest ranking official of the police department then on duty and should call this official to confront him or her with the client’s disappearance and make the same requests. Counsel should next call a member of the prosecutor’s staff and object to the incommunicado detention of the respondent. “‘Holding incommunicado is objectionable because arbitrary – at the mere will and unregulated pleasure of a police officer,’” Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143, 152 n.8 (1944); it violates both Due Process (Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004); Jauch v. Choctaw County, 874 F.3d 425 (5th Cir. 2017)) and the Fourth Amendment to the federal Constitution. “[T]he Fourth Amendment requires a judicial determination of probable cause as a prerequisite to extended restraint of liberty following arrest.” Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 114 (1975). All else failing, counsel should call a judge of the court of record of the county and ask to appear before the judge at the earliest possible time to present a petition for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the chief of police, the prosecutor, or both, charging them with the illegal custody of the respondent. See Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 474 (2004): “[a]t its historical core, the writ of habeas corpus has served as a means of reviewing the legality of Executive detention, and it is in that context that its protections have been strongest.’ INS v. St.
(Jackson, J., concurring in result) (‘The historic purpose of the writ has been to relieve detention by executive authorities without judicial trial’).”

§ 3.15 KEEPING RECORDS OF CALLS TO POLICE OFFICERS

It is essential that counsel keep a record of the times at which s/he made telephone calls to locate the respondent and the names (correctly spelled), ranks, and badge numbers of all officers to whom s/he spoke. These may be needed in moving to suppress incriminating statements on the ground of unnecessary police delay in producing the respondent before a judicial officer (see § 24.15 infra) or on the theory that such delay was a factor in producing an involuntary statement (see § 24.04(b) infra and particularly Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963)). In more extreme cases of police delay, the information may be needed for petitions for a writ of habeas corpus to free the respondent from police custody.

§ 3.16 CALLS FROM A CLIENT WHO IS IN POLICE CUSTODY

It is the rare case in which counsel will receive a phone call directly from a juvenile client in police custody, since the police invariably violate juvenile respondents’ rights to contact an attorney prior to interrogation. See § 3.06 supra. When counsel does receive a call directly from the client, counsel should immediately elicit the client’s precise whereabouts. The client should be asked to identify his or her location by precinct or headquarters’ name and street address or, if these are unknown, by general location and building description. S/he should be asked whether s/he has heard or seen anything suggesting that s/he might be taken by the police to any other location; if so, where and when. As a failsafe, s/he should also be asked the street location where s/he was arrested, the charge, and whatever s/he knows about the identity of the arresting and investigating officers.

Once counsel has completed obtaining this information concerning the client’s location, the steps that must be taken are the same as those followed in cases in which the attorney was contacted by the parent or guardian and tracked the respondent down through trial-and-error telephone calls. Those steps are summarized in § 3.17 infra and described in greater detail in §§
3.18-3.25 infra.

§ 3.17 OVERVIEW OF THE STEPS TO BE TAKEN AFTER COUNSEL HAS SUCCEEDED IN LOCATING THE RECENTLY ARRESTED CLIENT

After counsel has located the recently arrested client, counsel should take the following steps to safeguard the client’s immediate interests and to further the long-range goal of winning the case at trial.

If the client is still in police custody and has not yet been moved to a juvenile detention facility pending arraignment:

1. Gain immediate access to the client by phone in order to relay the information the client needs most urgently. For techniques for persuading police officers to permit counsel to speak with the client by phone, see § 3.18 infra.

2. In the phone conversation with the client, counsel should:
   a. Secure the client’s permission to represent him or her. See § 3.19(a) infra.
   b. Warn the client, in the strongest possible terms, against: making any statements whatsoever to the police; speaking with cellmates or visitors; or agreeing to searches or other police investigative procedures. See § 3.19(b)-(d) infra.
   c. Obtain any other information that will be useful in attempting to secure the client’s immediate release. See § 3.19(e) infra.
   d. Instruct the client to tell a police officer, while counsel is still on the phone to hear this said, that the client does not want to talk with the police or prosecuting authorities in counsel’s absence but wants to conduct all future communications with the authorities through counsel as his or her attorney.

3. Speak with the investigating officer and the booking officer and:
   a. Clearly and firmly declare that, as counsel for the respondent, counsel is informing the police that the respondent is exercising his or her constitutional rights: to refuse to answer questions; to refuse to answer questions without the presence of counsel (an assertion that is separate from and even more important than the invocation of the general right to silence); and to refuse to consent to any searches, identification procedures, or other investigative procedures. See § 3.20 infra.
   b. In the event that counsel intends to follow the preferred course of action of going personally to the police station, request that the officer not conduct any interrogation, identification procedure, or other investigative procedure with the client until counsel arrives at the station and confers with the client. See § 3.20 infra.
   c. Obtain other information that will be useful in attempting to secure the client’s immediate release or in handling later stages of the case. See § 3.20 infra.
4. After speaking with the investigating officer and booking officer, call the respondent’s parent/guardian and:

   a. Obtain whatever additional information is needed to attempt to secure the respondent’s immediate release. See § 3.21 infra.

   b. Make whatever arrangements are necessary for the parent/guardian to accept custody of the respondent in the event that counsel succeeds in securing the respondent’s release. See § 3.21 infra.

5. Take whatever steps are necessary to prevent the police from interrogating the respondent and to attempt to secure the respondent’s release:

   a. Preferably, counsel should go personally to the police station to prevent interrogation of the client and to attempt to negotiate his or her release into parental custody. See § 3.22 infra.

   b. If counsel cannot follow the preferred course of going personally to the police station, then counsel should make whatever telephone calls can be made, as the next best alternative for protecting the respondent’s rights and interests. See § 3.23 infra.

6. If counsel fails to persuade the police to release the respondent, then counsel must speak with any officials at the juvenile detention facility or officials of any other agency who have the power to release the respondent notwithstanding the police decision to detain and attempt to secure the respondent’s release. See § 3.24 infra.

   If, at the time that counsel first locates the client, s/he no longer is in police custody and already has been moved to a juvenile detention facility:

1. Gain access to the client by phone, secure the client’s permission to represent him or her, and caution the client against speaking about the facts of the offense with any cellmates or visitors. See § 3.24 infra.

2. If any officials at the facility (or other agency) have the power to release the respondent notwithstanding the police decision to detain, then speak with those official[s] and attempt to secure the respondent’s release. See § 3.24 infra.

§ 3.18 GAINING IMMEDIATE ACCESS TO THE CLIENT: PERSUADING POLICE OFFICERS TO ALLOW COUNSEL TO SPEAK WITH A RECENTLY ARRESTED CLIENT ON THE TELEPHONE

The first step after locating the client should be to talk with the client by phone. See § 3.19 infra. Unfortunately, in the vast majority of cases, police officers will be very resistant to the notion of counsel’s speaking with the client.

In attempting to cut through police interference, it is usually wise to begin by seeming cooperative and congenial. Most police officers experience a surfeit of angry phone calls from citizens, victims, and lawyers, and they usually react to aggressive calls from defense lawyers truculently. By contrast, a cordial phone conversation that attempts to deal with the officer on a professional-to-professional basis may be disarming and eventually successful. In dealing with the police, it is always useful to anticipate their interests and, if possible, offer counsel’s assistance in achieving the officers’ goals in exchange for counsel’s access to the client. Thus, for example, counsel might say:

Officer, until I speak with my client, it’s my duty, as [his] [her] lawyer, to tell you that [he] [she] does not wish to answer any questions until I get there. Now, if I can have a chance to talk with [him] [her] on the phone right now, so that I can get a better sense of what this case is all about, it may be that I’ll end up advising [him] [her] to cooperate with you and possibly to cut a deal. But, I can’t make any decision about that, and I certainly can’t advise my client about that unless you let me talk with [him] [her] on the phone.

Although it is very rare that counsel will ever end up advising the client to cooperate with the police, the fact that that advice is prudent in even a small number of cases means that counsel should not feel reluctant to promise to consider advising the client in that manner.

In all such dealings with the police, counsel should take precautions against later being misquoted (for example, by an officer who testifies that s/he questioned the respondent only after both the client and the attorney waived counsel’s presence during the interrogation). Counsel should make notes of the conversation immediately and, when time permits, write a memo to the file regarding the content of the conversation.

If an amiable approach fails to shake police refusals to allow counsel to speak with his or her client, more aggressive demands are in order. Insistence that the police respect the client’s rights to communication (see § 3.06 supra) can be ratcheted up by threatening to hold the officers legally responsible if they continue to stonewall. Successful civil-rights actions against police for violating the rights of arrestees are not commonplace, but there have been enough of them to make many officers buckle in the face of defense counsel who appear determined to enforce those rights by litigation. See, e.g., Shuford v. Conway, 666 Fed. Appx. 811 (11th Cir. 2016); Martinez v. Mares, 613 Fed. Appx. 731 (10th Cir. 2015); Goodman v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, 613 Fed. Appx. 610 (9th Cir. 2015); Al-Lamadani v. Lang, 624 Fed. Appx. 405 (6th Cir. 2015); Coggins v. Buonora, 776 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2015); Crowe v. County of San Diego, 608 F.3d 406, 432 (9th Cir. 2010), and cases collected in § 5.09 infra.

If the officer allows counsel to speak to the client, counsel should cover the matters described in § 3.19 infra. Counsel should also talk further with the police to try to obtain additional information about the case, provide protections for the client from interrogation and other police investigative procedures, and explore the possibility of the police releasing the client to his or her parent(s) or guardian(s). See § 3.20 infra. Thereafter, counsel should go to the police station if at all possible and follow the steps recommended in § 3.22 infra. Section 3.23 presents some alternative precautions counsel can take if s/he is unable to go to the police station.

If the officer does not allow counsel to talk with the client on the telephone, counsel should record the officer’s name and badge number and the name and phone number of his or her commanding officer and should then give the officer the precautionary instructions itemized in § 3.20 subdivision 2(F) infra. Counsel should immediately call the commanding officer and attempt to persuade him or her to order the arresting officer to permit counsel to speak with the client on the phone. If the commanding officer proves unbudging, counsel should deliver the same set of precautionary instructions and should inform the commanding officer that counsel is memorializing those requests and the time when counsel gave them to both the arresting officer and the commanding officer. Counsel should then go promptly to the police station where the respondent is being held (see § 3.20 infra). Frequently, counsel will obtain better results in person than s/he did on the phone.

§ 3.19 THE TELEPHONE CONVERSATION WITH THE CLIENT WHO IS PRESENTLY IN THE CUSTODY OF THE POLICE

§ 3.19(a) Preliminary Matters To Discuss with the Client

If the attorney succeeds in persuading the police to permit him or her to speak with the client on the phone, the first thing to do is to obtain an explicit statement by the client that s/he wants counsel to represent him or her. If counsel was initially contacted by a caller on behalf of the client, counsel should explain that the caller asked counsel to represent the client and to give whatever help counsel can provide. Counsel should ask the client whether s/he wants counsel to represent him or her and explain that counsel is willing to represent the client for the time being, at least until there is time to get together and talk about whether the client wants counsel to continue on the case. Assuming the client is willing to be represented by counsel, counsel should obtain an explicit statement to that effect from the client and then should tell the client that counsel is now formally the client’s lawyer. In the event that counsel is able to follow the preferred course of personally traveling to the police station, counsel should also tell the client that s/he will be coming down to see the client immediately (or as soon as counsel judges that s/he can get there), giving a specific time estimate.

The other preliminary matter to which counsel should attend in the phone conversation with the client is to ensure that the remainder of the conversation will be private. Counsel should ask the client where the telephone the client is using is located (detectives’ room? pay telephone in the corridor?) and whether any officer is listening to the call. (The client should be instructed to answer this last question “yes” or “no” without indicating that the subject of the conversation... is the risk of eavesdropping.) The client also should be asked whether any other individuals, such as nonpolice employees of the stationhouse or persons arrested with the client, are within earshot. If there is a possibility that any police officer or other individual may be eavesdropping on the conversation, counsel should warn the client to use “yes” and “no” answers whenever possible. In serious felony cases, particularly those with some notoriety or those involving gang activity or major drug rings, counsel also must be alert to the possibility of wiretapping of the police phone or of police officers listening on an extension phone and must modify his or her own end of the phone conversation accordingly. Surreptitious eavesdropping on attorney-client conversations is impermissible (see, e.g., Matter of Neary, 84 N.E.3d 1194 (Ind. 2017)) but it does happen and is difficult to prove, so counsel is wise to avoid touching on any subjects that may reveal incriminating information or potential defense activity.

§ 3.19(b) Advising the Client: Protecting the Client from Interrogation

The first and most emphatic advice that the attorney should give in a telephone conversation with a client who is presently in custody is:

Say nothing to the police. Tell them nothing at all. Do not answer any questions from the police until you and I have had a chance to talk privately.

If the police try to question you or to talk to you at all – about anything – tell them your lawyer told you not to talk. If they say anything about having evidence against you or if they tell you what the evidence is or if they bring in someone else who says something against you, then they are just trying to get you to talk. Don’t fall for it. If they promise to drop the charges after you confess or if they threaten to stick you with more charges if you don’t talk, they’re just trying to trick you. Don’t fall for any of their tricks. Whatever they say, tell them your lawyer told you not to talk.

Sometimes, the police tell arrested kids that their lawyers don’t know anything and that only the police know what’s good for the kid. That’s just another police trick. They’re trying to get you to say something so that they can get the judge to lock you up for a long time.

So, make sure you don’t say anything to them. Just keep saying that your lawyer told you not to talk.

This phraseology is preferable to any of the other standard formulations used by lawyers in advising their clients not to confess. Telling the client not to say “anything” is better than telling him or her not to “make a statement,” since many clients believe that a “statement” means a written, signed confession. It is also better than advising the client not to make any written or oral confessions, since often clients will not understand that “confessions” include what they believe to be exculpatory statements (for example: “I didn’t break into the house, I just stood outside as a lookout”). Advising the client to say explicitly “My lawyer told me not to say “anything” is better than advising the client to remain silent, because it is more concrete and therefore easier for the client to understand; it gives the client something to say instead of having to suffer the discomfort of standing mute in the face of questions or accusations, and so may be easier for the client to do; and it avoids the risk that the client’s total silence may later be used against him or her as a “tacit admission.” See § 24.24 infra.

The advice not to talk to the police should be given in all cases. Concededly, there is sometimes a possibility that wholehearted cooperation on the client’s part might result in the police exercising their discretion to drop the charges or at least to release the client pending arraignment. See §§ 3.07, 3.10 supra. However, the possibility of obtaining those benefits is usually so slim and the consequences of confession so devastating in the long run that a cost-benefit analysis has to result in advising the client not to talk. In the few cases in which the client’s alibi or explanation is so foolproof that it would have persuaded the police to drop the charges, that same result can usually be achieved through negotiations with the prosecutor involving none of the risks that talking to the police entails. Similarly, in the few cases in which cooperation would have resulted in a police decision to release the respondent, that same result can usually be achieved without a confession by persuading a detention facility official or probation officer to exercise his or her discretion to release the respondent. See § 3.24 infra. Finally, counsel can minimize even the comparatively negligible risk of adverse consequences flowing from a lack of cooperation with the authorities by telling the client to explain that s/he is refusing to speak with the police solely because of counsel’s advice. By placing the onus on the attorney, the client can obtain whatever benefits might accrue from appearing to be a cooperative child (see §§ 3.07, 3.10 supra) while avoiding the overwhelmingly detrimental consequences of a confession.

§ 3.19(c) Cautioning the Client Against Speaking with Cellmates or Visitors

In addition to telling the client not to speak with the police, counsel should caution the client against speaking with cellmates, co-respondents, and adult co-defendants. Cellmates may be snitches, and co-respondents and adult co-defendants may become turncoats. Counsel should be aware that this is a lesson that most juveniles find hard to accept. Lacking the adult criminal defendant’s experience with cellmates or co-defendants who “turned,” juveniles tend to trust naively the loyalty of their friends and peers. For this reason, counsel should stress the importance of not talking with cellmates, co-respondents, and adult co-defendants and may wish to mention that a large number of people who get busted end up snitching in order to save their own skins.

Counsel should also warn the client about the possibility that the police will eavesdrop on any visits or telephone conversations that s/he may have with family or friends while at the police station. To minimize this danger, it is wise to advise the client (i) to make and receive no visits or phone calls except from counsel or from close family members who need to be reassured that the client is all right, and (ii) during any family calls and visits, to say nothing unnecessary and certainly nothing about the client’s actions or whereabouts before s/he was arrested or anything else that might have any connection with the case.

§ 3.19(d) Other Advice To Give the Client: Protections Against Lineups, Show-ups, and Other Police Investigative Procedures

Once counsel has fully warned the client against speaking with the police (§ 3.19(b) supra) and against speaking with cellmates, co-respondents, adult co-defendants, and visitors (§ 3.19(c) supra), counsel will have established the most urgently needed protections of the client’s interests. There is additional advice that counsel can give regarding other police investigative procedures, but this should be given if, and only if, counsel believes that the youthful client is capable of assimilating the lengthy discourse involved and will not suffer such information overload that s/he ends up forgetting some of counsel’s critical advice about talking to no one. That judgment by counsel needs to be based on the child’s age, emotional state, and degree of physical exhaustion. Throughout the phone conversation, counsel should periodically ask the client questions that will force the client to repeat back the advice that counsel has just given (for example: “Okay, now what are you going to say when the police say that if you tell them what happened, they’ll drop the charges and you can go home?”). Such questions will not only serve as a mechanism for double-checking the client’s comprehension of the previously given advice, but they will also enable the attorney to gauge whether the client’s current attention span warrants venturing into the realm of useful-but-not-indispensable additional advice.

If the client seems reasonably alert, counsel should next advise him or her how to deal with lineups and other identification procedures that may occur while s/he is at the police station. It is presently unclear to what extent the police can lawfully compel an unwilling accused to submit to identification confrontations in the absence of counsel. See § 25.06 infra. The client should accordingly be advised to object to any lineup, show-up, or confrontation for identification purposes that is held in counsel’s absence, and to tell the police, if they say anything about showing the client to any witness for possible identification, that the client wants to have his or her lawyer present and that s/he is asking the police either to phone the lawyer (giving them the lawyer’s number) or to let the client phone the lawyer, so that the lawyer can come down to the station and represent the client during any identification procedure. The client should also be instructed that in the event that the police do display the client to any person for identification, the client should not speak any words or answer any questions – including his or her name – during the procedure. S/he should not, however, physically resist being exhibited; and if the police insist on going ahead with the exhibition after s/he has told them that s/he objects to it, the client should follow whatever orders the police may give with regard to the client’s going up onto a lineup stage or stepping forward or walking about or speaking words that everyone in the lineup is asked to speak. S/he should never attempt to hide his or her face or to make faces. These tactics, or a failure to obey instructions to step forward or to walk about or to say words that other persons in the lineup speak, will only focus attention on him or her and thereby increase the chances of being identified as the perpetrator; they may also be used against the client as evidence of guilt; and physical resistance to the officers may result in a beating or the lodging of assault-upon-an-officer charges or both. If the police tell the client that s/he is being taken to a lineup or identification room, s/he should orally object to the absence of counsel but should not sit down or physically refuse to go, since this action may result in the witnesses being brought back to view the client in the cell – a far more suggestive form of confrontation than the lineup itself. If the police tell the client that s/he is being taken anywhere to be shown to witnesses, s/he should insist, first, that s/he be given a chance to phone his or her lawyer and to have the lawyer present and, second, that s/he not be shown to witnesses except in a lineup with other people who resemble the client. Once in a lineup or identification confrontation, s/he should observe and remember everything about it that s/he can, particularly (a) how many other persons were in the lineup, how they were dressed, and what they looked like (getting their names, if possible without attracting attention to the client or afterwards if the client sees these persons again while s/he is in custody); (b) how many witnesses were asked for identifications, what they said, what the officers said to them, their names, and what they looked like; (c) how many police officers were present and their names, badge numbers, and descriptions; and (d) the time and place of the lineup. The client should not attempt to take notes during the lineup or in any place where s/he may be observed by the witnesses to the lineup, but when s/he returns to the cell, s/he should request paper and a pen from the guards and immediately write down everything that s/he can remember.

The client should also be instructed that if anyone asks for permission to go to the client’s house or to any other place in order to search for evidence or weapons or pieces of clothing or anything else, s/he should say, “My lawyer told me to say, ‘No,’” whether or not s/he thinks that the things the police are looking for will be found or that the search will prove the client innocent. S/he should be instructed to give the same answer if the police ask the client to lead them to any place or thing or to act out or demonstrate any action; and to object to being taken from the cell area for any reason, saying that s/he wants to stay there and wait for an attorney who is coming. S/he should be instructed not to sign any forms or papers and not to write down anything for the police. Again, the proper answer is “My lawyer told me to say ‘No’ until s/he gets here.” The client should be instructed that if anyone attempts to inspect or examine his or her body, to take swabs or washes or scrapings from it, to cut nails or take hair samples, the client should tell them “My attorney said to wait until s/he gets here”; but if they go ahead anyway, the client should not try to fight them off.

§ 3.19(e) Eliciting Information from the Client That Will Be Useful in Attempting To Secure the Client’s Release

In the relatively rare situation in which the attorney was initially contacted by the client directly rather than by a parent or other relative on the youth’s behalf (see § 3.16 supra), it is essential that the attorney elicit from the client his or her parent’s (or guardian’s or close relative’s) name and phone number. In addition, since this is the only situation in which the attorney will not already know the client’s current location (since it is the only situation in which the attorney did not track down the client before talking to him or her), the attorney must elicit from the client his or her current location by precinct or headquarters’ name and street address or, if these are unknown, by general location and building description.
Whether it was the client who called, or the more common situation of the attorney reaching the client, counsel should ask the client precisely where within the building s/he is. This information will be important later when the attorney goes to the station, in order to deal with desk officers who profess ignorance of the client’s being in the station. Counsel should also ask the client whether s/he has heard or seen anything suggesting that s/he might be taken by the police to any other location; if so, where and when.

Counsel should ask the following questions to elicit information that will be useful in attempting to secure the client’s release:

1. Counsel should ask the client what the police have said that the client is being charged with. Counsel should be sure to ask: “Is that all of the charges that they have told you?” Counsel also should inquire whether the police said anything about possibly adding any other charges or about the client’s being involved in any other criminal matters, and specifically what. In asking these questions, counsel must, of course, refrain from eliciting any statements that could be overheard by police regarding the client’s version of the present offense or any other offenses with which s/he may be charged. The discussion should be limited to the charges the police are contemplating and should not get into the facts underlying any of those charges. Since many juvenile clients are eager to tell their version of the facts and will doubt counsel’s competency or loyalty if s/he refuses to allow the client to relate the facts, counsel must explain the need for confidentiality at this point and reassure the client that there will be time later to discuss the facts in a private setting, free of the risk of police eavesdropping.

2. If the client’s age and the nature of the charges make waiver to adult court a realistic possibility under local statutes, counsel should ask the client whether the police have said anything about seeking waiver to adult court. This will enable counsel to start preparing immediately for a major battle on the issue of waiver. See Chapter 13.

3. If, as in most jurisdictions, local statutes permit the police to release the child into the custody of his or her parents, counsel should ask the client whether the police have said anything about the possibility of the client’s being released to his or her parents.

4. If counsel is practicing in one of the relatively few jurisdictions that permit bail in juvenile cases, then counsel should ask the client whether s/he has been told (and, if not, ask the client to ask the police now) whether bail has been set for the client and at what amount. Counsel also should ask the client who should be called (parent, grandparent, other relative, or friend) to put up bail money or to pay the bond premium.
In addition to these questions, which provide information necessary for attempting to secure the client’s release, counsel should also inquire into the client’s immediate medical needs. Counsel should ask the client whether s/he is hurt or injured or needs any sort of medical attention. Counsel also should ask the client whether the police are mistreating the client in any way.

§ 3.19(f) Concluding the Telephone Conversation with the Client in Police Custody

Counsel should keep in mind that most juveniles have had very little experience with the criminal justice system, and they are likely to be frightened both by their current incarceration and by the unknowns of what will happen in court (and what will happen when they have to face their undoubtedly enraged parents). Counsel should try to reduce the client’s anxiety by letting the client know when counsel will be back in touch with the client and what counsel will be doing to try to secure the client’s release:

1. If counsel intends to adopt the preferred course of action of going to the police station, counsel should tell that to the client, and give the client a reasonable time estimate of how long it will take for counsel to get to the station. Counsel should tell the client not to worry if the client is moved before counsel arrives, since counsel will try to track the client down and visit the client wherever s/he has been taken. Counsel should add, however, that there is a possibility that the police will not allow counsel to see the client and that if the client does not see counsel, it is because of police interference and not through any lack of effort on counsel’s part.

2. If counsel is not going to go to the station or if counsel is not planning to leave for the station immediately, counsel should give the client a telephone number at which counsel can be reached.

3. Whether counsel intends to go to the police station or not, counsel should tell the client that:
   a. Counsel will call the client’s parents immediately to reassure them that the client is all right, to arrange for their presence in court so as to increase the client’s chances of being released in court, and to enlist the parents’ aid in trying to secure an even earlier release of the client;
   b. Counsel will also take whatever other steps might help in attempting to secure the client’s immediate release, including talking with the police and any probation officers and/or agency officials who might have some power over the client’s current detention;
   c. If the client is not released, then the client will be taken to court, and the judge will decide whether to release the client; counsel will be in court with the client, and counsel will try to convince the judge in court to release the client [adding when appropriate: and counsel feels confident that the judge will release the client to the custody of his or her parent(s)].

Before ending the conversation, counsel should instruct the client to get the attention of a police officer and tell the officer, while counsel listens on the phone, that the client does not wish to talk further with the police in the absence of counsel and that the client wants all further dealings with the police to be conducted by counsel on the client’s behalf. Once the client has made a statement of this sort, with counsel in a position to testify that s/he heard it made, the client has obtained the fullest possible protection against police interrogation while in custody, short of counsel’s physical presence. For, under the rule of Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981), the police may not thereafter question the client, even with full Miranda warnings and waivers, “unless the [client] . . . himself [or herself] initiates further communication, exchanges or conversations with the police.” Id. at 485; see also Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146, 150-56 (1990); Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. 91, 95 (1984) (per curiam); Shea v. Louisiana, 470 U.S. 51, 54-55 (1985); Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778, 794-95 (2009) (dictum). The procedure advised in this paragraph is important; without it, counsel’s own admonitions to the police not to interrogate the client may be ignored, and any promises made by the police that they will not interrogate the client, may be broken. See Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412 (1986). But cf. People v. Grice, 100 N.Y.2d 318, 321-22, 324, 794 N.E.2d 9, 10-12, 13, 763 N.Y.S.2d 227, 229-30, 232 (2003) (state constitutional right to counsel attaches, and “interrogation is prohibited unless the right is waived in the presence of counsel,” if an attorney or “the attorney’s professional associate” informs the police “of the fact that the defendant is represented by counsel or that an attorney has communicated with the police for the purpose of representing the defendant”).

§ 3.20 TELEPHONE CONVERSATIONS WITH THE POLICE ON BEHALF OF A CLIENT WHO IS PRESENTLY IN POLICE CUSTODY

In dealing with the police on behalf of a recently arrested client who is still in police custody, counsel should pursue three major goals: (i) to prevent the police from interrogating the client or conducting other investigative procedures; (ii) to secure the immediate release of the client; and (iii) to obtain as much information as possible about the facts of the offense for which the client has been arrested. The prevention of interrogation should be counsel’s primary objective, since a confession will severely limit counsel’s chances of winning the case at trial and preventing long-term incarceration. However, in structuring conversations with the police, the topic of interrogation should normally be left for last, since counsel’s efforts to prevent interrogation will be seen by the police as marking the beginning of an adversarial relationship between them and counsel; from that point onward, counsel can expect that the officer(s) will cease being cooperative and providing information.

Thus counsel should ordinarily structure conversations with the police in the following manner:

36
1. Ask to speak to whatever officer happens to be with the client at the moment, whether that is the investigating officer, the booking officer, a detective, or a special Youth Services Division officer. (This will be the officer most likely to be on the verge of – or in the course of – interrogating the client. Imminent interrogation should be the attorney’s immediate concern; later phone calls or a trip to the police station can deal with officers who might be planning to interrogate the client later on; as for interrogations that have already taken place, there is very little counsel can do about those until the time comes to start preparing motions to suppress.)

2. In the conversation with the officer, counsel should:

   A. Begin by explaining that counsel is an attorney and has been asked by the respondent’s parent or guardian or other close relative to represent the client and is, in fact, now representing the client.

   B. “Confide” in the officer that counsel has no information about the case whatsoever, and therefore would appreciate some idea of why the client was arrested. (As a practical matter, this approach is much more likely to elicit information about the case than an aggressive demand for information or a series of lawyer-like questions.) Follow up with questions about the facts of the crime and the grounds for the arrest as the officer sees them (couching the questions, to the extent plausible, as requests for clarification of things that the officer has already said). In the course of any ensuing conversation about the arrest, counsel should ask the officer what specific charges are now placed against the client (being sure to ask “Is that all the charges?”); whether other charges are being considered; and if so, what they are. (Although the police have discretion to drop charges and divert the respondent from the juvenile justice system (see § 3.07 supra), there is not much point in counsel trying to persuade the police to drop the charges: the police tend to view the arrest and charging decisions as their prerogative and generally resent attorney attempts to influence the diversion decision; counsel’s only real hope for shaping the police decision regarding diversion is through advice to the parent. See § 3.21 infra.)

   C. Attempt to find out whether the police might be willing to release the respondent to his or her parent(s) pending arraignment. This should be a preliminary broaching of the subject of release, to be followed up by additional negotiations after counsel has spoken with the client’s parent(s) further and obtained social information that can be used in attempting to persuade the police to release the client. (The additional negotiations preferably will take place at the police station when counsel goes there; but, if counsel is not able to go to the station, those negotiations should be conduct in a follow-up phone call to the police. See §§ 3.22, 3.23 infra.)

D. If counsel is practicing in a jurisdiction that permits bail in juvenile cases, ask the officer whether bail has been set for the client; if so, how much; if not, whether stationhouse bail is ordinarily fixed for charges such as those against the client and how much; and, if the officer has indicated a possibility that additional charges may be placed against the client, what the bail on those charges will be.

E. Ask the officer where the client is now, including the precise location within the building; whether there are any plans to move the client elsewhere and, if so, where and when; whether the officer will be handling all of the remaining booking of the client or whether that will be handled by other officers, and who.

F. Having obtained all possible information concerning the charges, facts of the offense, and possibilities for release, deliver the following instructions, advice, and requests regarding police interrogation and other investigative procedures:

(i) Tell the officer that counsel is requesting the officer not to interrogate the client or to ask the client any questions; tell the officer that counsel has instructed the client to say nothing, to answer no questions, and to waive no rights; tell the officer that, as attorney for the respondent, counsel is informing the officer that the client is hereby asserting his or her right to refuse to answer questions and his or her right to refuse to answer questions without the presence of counsel; if counsel intends to go to the police station, add that counsel is requesting that no interrogation take place until counsel arrives at the station (expressing the hope that counsel will be able to cooperate with the officer as soon as s/he arrives but saying that s/he must really ask the officer not to deal any further with the client at this time, until counsel has had a chance to confer with the client and to find out what the matter is all about).

(ii) Tell the officer not to ask for the client’s consent to conduct any search or investigation; tell the officer that counsel has instructed the client to give no consents; and tell the officer that counsel, on behalf of the client, is informing the officer that the respondent refuses to consent to any searches or other investigations.
(iii) Tell the officer not to place the client in a lineup or exhibit the client for identification or make any physical or mental examination, body inspection, or test of any sort on the client in the absence of counsel; tell the officer that counsel has instructed the client to give no consents and to participate in no investigative procedures in the absence of counsel; state that, as counsel for the respondent, counsel is asserting the respondent’s right to have counsel present during any identification or other investigative procedure.

(iv) Say to the officer that counsel is formally requesting that the officer relay the foregoing instructions and requests for the handling of the respondent to any other officers who may become involved in the booking or interrogation of the respondent or who may come into contact with the respondent while s/he is at the police station.

G. Conclude the phone conversation with the officer as follows:

(i) If the client has indicated that s/he needs medical treatment, tell the officer to take the client to the hospital (see § 5.09 infra), and then ask what hospital the client will be taken to [adding, if appropriate, that counsel will meet them at the hospital].

(ii) If counsel intends to go to the police station, tell the officer that counsel will be at the station as soon as s/he possibly can, and request that the officer not move the client from the station for any purpose (except for medical treatment if the client has indicated that s/he needs medical treatment).

(iii) Take the officer’s name (with spelling), rank, and badge number, and ask the officer where s/he will be and how counsel can contact him or her during the next few hours.

3. Having completed the phone conversation with the officer who currently has custody of the client, counsel then should repeat that conversation: (A) with any officers that the first officer indicated would later be involved in the booking of the respondent or investigation of the case; and (B) with any officers – such as the precinct’s Youth Services Division Officer – who will likely take part in the booking or investigation or in interrogating the respondent, notwithstanding the first officer’s failure to mention them.
§ 3.21 FOLLOW-UP CONVERSATION WITH THE PARENT OR GUARDIAN OF THE CLIENT

After counsel has finished talking with the police on the phone, counsel will need to call the parent or guardian of the client. (If it was the parent or guardian who initially contacted counsel, this will, of course, be a follow-up call; if counsel was initially contacted by the client himself or herself or by some other concerned relative or friend, counsel will need to make contact with the parent or guardian for the first time.)

The first and most important topic to discuss with the parent/guardian is the subject of the client’s release. If the police expressed to counsel their willingness to release the client to parental custody, then counsel should determine whether the parent/guardian is willing to accept custody of the child pending arraignment. If the parent/guardian is unwilling to accept custody either because of frustration with the child or a notion that a “taste of jail” will teach the child a needed lesson, then counsel should educate the parent/guardian regarding certain realities of the juvenile court system: that, frequently, children who are detained prior to arraignment will be ordered detained for the much longer period pending trial, notwithstanding the parent/guardian’s desire at that point to take the child home; and that the ensuing pretrial detention could have devastating effects upon both the chances of winning at trial and the chances of preventing a subsequent sentence of incarceration. In addition, if counsel has knowledge of any harsh conditions or inadequate services at the local juvenile detention facility (and particularly if counsel has knowledge of recurring physical and sexual assaults upon inmates by other inmates), counsel has a legal obligation to the juvenile client and a moral obligation to the parent/guardian to let the parent/guardian know that the facility is not the ideal rehabilitative facility the parent/guardian may be envisioning.

Assuming that the parent/guardian is (or becomes) willing to accept custody of the child and assuming that the police already have expressed their willingness to release the child to parental custody, counsel then must make the necessary arrangements for the parent/guardian to go to the police station and pick up the child. Preferably, counsel will arrange to meet the parent/guardian at the station, so that counsel can facilitate the release process and also so that counsel can prevent both the child and the parent/guardian from making any damaging statements to the police. If counsel is unable to go to the station, counsel will need to instruct the parent/guardian which station to go to and which officer(s) to see, and counsel should caution the parent/guardian against saying anything (or allowing the child to say anything) to the police about the crime for which the child was arrested. See § 3.19(b) supra. Finally, counsel will need to discuss the subject of transportation: counsel should assist the parent/guardian in finding out the right route (by car or mass transit) to the police station; or if the parent/guardian is totally unable to arrange transportation and if counsel is driving to the station, counsel should consider offering to give the parent/guardian a lift to the station.

If the police did not indicate a willingness, or if they expressed an outright unwillingness, to release the respondent, then counsel will need to take the following steps to try to secure the respondent’s release: (i) ask the parent/guardian whether the police have already called to notify him or her of the child’s arrest; if the police have not yet called, then advise the parent/guardian that s/he can improve the client’s chances for release by being as cooperative as possible with the police (without making any damaging statements or giving consent to interrogation or searches or other investigative procedures) and by letting the police know that the parent/guardian intends to take steps to discipline the child even if the child is released by the police (without describing such severe disciplinary measures that the child will end up being removed from the home because of police allegations of child abuse); (ii) advise the parent/guardian, whether or not the police have already called him or her, to be cooperative and express appropriate disciplinary intentions in the event that the parent/guardian is called by any police officers who may be reconsidering the issue of detention as a result of counsel’s efforts or by any probation officers or detention facility officials who may be making a de novo judgment regarding the need for detention pending arraignment; (iii) counsel should then elicit from the parent/guardian social information about the child that counsel can use in attempting to persuade the police to release the child: information about the child’s behavior at home, school attendance, conduct in school, school grades, part-time and summertime employment experiences, prior record of convictions and arrests, whether the child is presently on probation and the probation officer’s name and phone number, and other information bearing on the likelihood that the parent/guardian can control the child and that the child will stay out of trouble if s/he is released to the parent; (iv) under this scenario, when the police have not yet indicated any willingness or have expressed an unwillingness to release the respondent, there is no reason to send the parent/guardian to the police station unless counsel can change the police officers’ minds; thus counsel should simply obtain a phone number at which the parent/guardian can be reached during the next several hours in the event that counsel can persuade the police to release the client into parental custody.

If counsel is practicing in a jurisdiction that permits bail in juvenile cases, counsel also will need to ask the parent/guardian whether s/he can and will pay the bond premium or put up sufficient assets to cover any bail that is realistically likely to be set and, if not, whether there are any other relatives or friends who can provide all or part of the bail money. If the parent/guardian can put up the bail money, then counsel should arrange to have the parent/guardian meet counsel at the police station or court where bail will be posted (or at a bail bonder’s office) at a designated time. If counsel is unable to go to the police station or bail bonder’s office to personally oversee the payment of the bond, then counsel will need to give the parent/guardian detailed instructions on how to contact the bail bonder (giving a group of names of bail bonders from which the parent/guardian can choose) and how to navigate through the bail bond payment process.

After fully covering the topic of potential release of the client, counsel should elicit from the parent/guardian any information that the police may have given him or her regarding the facts of the offense, the charges that the police intend to lodge against the client, and whether the police intend to seek waiver to adult court. This information may prove useful in immediate discussions with the police (see §§ 3.22, 3.23 infra); on the other hand, there is still a premium on time and if the parent/guardian embarks on a lengthy discourse, it may be necessary to curtail the conversation tactfully. See § 3.13 supra.

§ 3.22 COUNSEL’S ACTIVITIES ON THE CLIENT’S BEHALF AT THE POLICE STATION

After speaking by telephone with the client (if possible), the police, and the parent/guardian, counsel should go as quickly as possible to the police station. The following discussion canvasses the matters that counsel should attend to at the police station. If counsel is unable to go to the station personally or to send someone (like a law partner or law clerk), then counsel should make the additional phone calls described in § 3.23 infra.

§ 3.22(a) Gaining Access to the Client

Upon arriving at the police station, counsel should show the desk officer some identification (like a Bar I.D. card) or other document confirming that counsel is an attorney. S/he should say that s/he is representing the respondent (or has been asked to represent the respondent) and that s/he wishes to see the respondent immediately. If a delay of more than a few minutes occurs, s/he should repeat this request and ask, alternatively, to see the commanding officer. If the commanding officer proves obstructive, counsel may be able to obtain assistance from the prosecutor’s office. In some urban areas, a deputy prosecutor is assigned to be on call for after-hours emergencies and can be reached through the prosecutor’s office switchboard. In extreme situations, counsel should call a judge of the local court of record and arrange to present a prompt petition for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the chief of police, the prosecutor, or both. Again, in some areas, there is an emergency judge available for after-hours crises. If the desk officer or the commanding officer tells counsel that s/he can see the client but only after the completion of interrogation (or lineup procedures, or other investigative procedures, or booking), counsel obviously should insist that the procedures stop until counsel has had a chance to confer with the client.

§ 3.22(b) Matters to Cover in the Interview with the Client

Once counsel reaches the client, s/he should request the use of a room in which the two can consult privately. As soon as counsel and the client are out of earshot of the police and other persons, counsel should immediately instruct the client that:

(a) s/he should respond to any questions from the police or anyone else by saying “my lawyer told me not to talk”;

(b) s/he should respond to any requests for permission to search for evidence or weapons or anything else by saying “my lawyer told me to say, ‘No’”;

(c) s/he should not sign or write any papers for the police or anyone else;
(d) s/he should not agree to leave the cell area or go with the police to any other place except to court or to a detention facility (but s/he should not forcibly resist a police officer’s attempt to take him or her to another location); and

(e) if the police say that they intend to exhibit the client to any witnesses or subject him or her to any sort of bodily or mental examination, s/he should ask to phone counsel so that s/he can confer with counsel and have counsel present during the proceeding, and she should say that s/he does not want the exhibition or examination to be held in the absence of counsel.

It is a wise practice for counsel to make and carry a supply of “rights cards” or forms that s/he can give to clients in custody for their use in preserving their rights during police investigation. Such a card may read, for example:

My lawyer has instructed me not to talk to anyone about my case or anything else and not to answer questions or reply to accusations. On advice of counsel and on the grounds of my rights under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments, I shall talk to no one in the absence of counsel. I shall not give any consents or make any waivers of my legal rights. Any requests for information or for consent to conduct searches or seizures or investigations affecting my person, papers, property, or effects should be addressed to my lawyer, whose name, address, and phone number are _______________. I want all communications with the authorities henceforth to be made only through my lawyer. I request that my lawyer be notified and allowed to be present if any identification confrontations, tests, examinations, or investigations of any sort are conducted in my case, and I do not consent to any such confrontations, tests, examinations, or investigations.

The client should be instructed to show this card to any officer or other person who asks the client questions, accuses the client of anything, talks to the client in any way about the case, or starts to examine or exhibit the client while in custody. Cards of this sort serve four important purposes. First, they enable the client to assert his or her rights even if s/he is unable to remember what they are or what to say in order to claim them. Many clients who are simply given the oral advice suggested above will forget most of it. Second, they allow the client to make an express claim of his or her rights. In some situations, the mere silence of the client may not be sufficient to protect the client’s interests fully. See §§ 24.10, 24.24, 33.06(I) infra. Also, as a practical matter, it may be difficult for the client psychologically to maintain silence in situations that seem to call for some response; the response of flashing the card gives the client something to do to relieve this tension. Third, the card makes it easier for the defense to prove in court that the client claimed his or her rights and waived none of them. Any lawyer who has seen a police witness flash a “Miranda card” in the courtroom appreciates the probative force of a written record in the inevitable disputes about what was said between officers and arrestee behind the closed doors of a stationhouse. Defense counsel should attempt to give the client something of an even break in this swearing contest. Fourth, the card gives the client a sense of reassurance in his or her capacity to handle the often frightening experience of confronting police investigators in confinement, and it also gives the client an added ground for confidence in counsel’s professional ability and concern.

Once these crucial cautionary instructions have been given, counsel can move on and ask the client for information about the client’s background (home life, school, employment, and after-school activities) that counsel can use in trying to persuade the police to release the client. Thereafter, to the extent that time permits, counsel can question the client about the information that counsel will need at the Initial Hearing (see § 4.07 infra) and about the facts of the offense (see § 5.06 infra).

§ 3.22(c) Discussions with the Police

After the interview with the client has been completed, there are several matters that counsel will need to discuss with the police. The first matter that should be covered (before the conversation with the police takes a confrontational turn, leading to the drawing of battle lines) is the subject of the client’s release to parental custody. Counsel should ask whether the police intend to release the client; if the police have decided against release or have not yet reached a decision, then counsel should use the positive social information that counsel elicited from the parent/guardian (§ 3.21 supra) and from the client interview to try to persuade the police to release the client; in making these arguments, counsel should emphasize that s/he is primarily trying to provide additional information to assist the police and is not trying to infringe upon police prerogatives. In jurisdictions that permit bail in juvenile cases, counsel also should discuss the availability (and applicable amount) of “stationhouse bail” – that is, bail set by the police, usually according to a prescribed schedule.

After the subject of the client’s release has been resolved, counsel should ask the investigating officer whether the client has made any written or oral statements. If s/he has, counsel should request to see them or, in the case of oral statements, to be told of their contents immediately. Counsel should ask whether the client has been exhibited to any possible witnesses for identification purposes and whether any tests or examinations have been conducted on the client. If so, counsel should ask the nature of the identification proceedings or tests, who conducted them, what results they produced, and the names of all persons present during the identification or testing procedures. Counsel should ask whether any future identification or testing procedures are anticipated, what procedures and when; and s/he should ask and arrange to be present when they are conducted. Counsel should tell the investigating officer that s/he has instructed the client not to talk to anyone and not to give any consents or waivers in counsel’s absence; and s/he should ask the officer not to question or talk with the client unless counsel is present and not to take any consents or waivers from the client without counsel’s prior approval. Before leaving a client in custody, counsel should have the client inform an officer, in counsel’s presence, that the client does not wish thereafter to talk or deal with the police or prosecuting authorities without counsel but wants to communicate with them only through counsel. See § 3.19(f) supra. Counsel should give the officer counsel’s professional card and should also give one to the desk officer on the way out.

§ 3.22(d) Actions for Counsel to Take in Identification or Examination Procedures

Counsel who obtains permission to attend identification or examination procedures should ordinarily act as unobtrusively as possible. S/he should not attempt to interfere with them in any way or to play any part in them while any potential identifying witness is present. Prior to the exhibition of the client and out of sight and earshot of any potential identifying witness, counsel should (a) inform the police that s/he objects to the identification proceeding altogether, if she does (for example, if s/he contends that the client has been illegally arrested or is being illegally detained, see § 25.07 infra), and (b) object to any feature of the proposed exhibition procedure that she believes will impair its reliability (see §§ 25.02-25.04 infra). Counsel should couple the latter objection with affirmative suggestions for modification of the procedure only if s/he is reasonably confident that (i) the police will adopt those suggestions and (ii) the result will be that the client is not identified. (If the client is identified through a procedure endorsed by counsel, counsel’s role in shaping the proceeding can only hamstring subsequent defense challenges to the propriety or reliability of the identification; if the police reject counsel’s suggestions, a prosecutor will later be able to contend that those suggestions limit the aspects of the identification proceeding about which the defense can complain in a suppression motion.) During the proceeding itself – while potential identifying witnesses are present – counsel’s role is strictly that of an observer. S/he should watch and take notes on everything that happens, be sure to get the names of all persons present, and ask questions both before and afterwards about anything s/he does not understand.

Before the proceeding begins, counsel should ask whether it will involve the respondent’s performing any kind of action – for example, speaking (to provide a voice exemplar) or turning or walking about on a lineup stage. If so, counsel should request the opportunity to confer privately with the respondent in advance of the exhibition procedures, so that s/he will not have to interrupt them for the purpose of giving the respondent advice. Counsel may or may not have suggestions to offer the client about how s/he should behave in performing the actions s/he will be called upon to take. But even if counsel does not, it is ordinarily helpful for counsel to forewarn the client specifically what those actions will be, because foreknowledge may reduce the danger that the client will exhibit guilty-looking signals as a result of nervousness or surprise.

At a lineup or show-up, counsel should ask to speak to the possible identifying witnesses before the respondent is exhibited to them. It will be the rare case in which the police will permit such interviews. But at the earliest time when counsel can obtain access to the witnesses, counsel should ask them (i) to think back to their original observation of the person whom they saw in connection with the offense and to describe that person as s/he then appeared; (ii) to describe the circumstances under which they observed that person; (iii) how sure they are that they could recognize the person if they saw the person again; (iv) by what characteristics they could recognize the person; (v) what descriptions of the person they gave to the police prior to the present identification proceeding; (vi) whether they have been asked by the police to attempt to identify any persons other than those exhibited in the current proceeding, either in the flesh or by photograph or video, and whether they made any identifications on these occasions; and (vii) what they were told by the officers who brought them or asked them to come to the station today.
When there is more than one identifying witness, counsel should, if possible, speak separately with each. Interviewing identifying witnesses as a group will result in the loss of important information unique to each of them and will probably cause them to homogenize their impressions, to the client’s ultimate detriment.

Whenever counsel is permitted to attend a show-up, counsel should object to the show-up procedure and request that the police conduct a lineup instead. Counsel should point out the likelihood that any show-up results will be suppressed in court because there are no exigencies requiring a show-up instead of a lineup. See § 25.03(a) infra.

Counsel should urge the officers conducting the lineup to follow procedures which assure against unreliable identifications. In localities where statutes, court rules or law-enforcement guidelines prescribe protective practices (such as those modeled by the Louisiana statute summarized in § 25.03 infra), counsel should insist that they be followed. Elsewhere, s/he should try to persuade the officers to adopt as many of these “best practices” (La. Code Crim. Proc. art.
251 (A)) as s/he can. At the least, s/he should attempt to ensure that any lineup is composed of at least six persons who resemble the respondent in general characteristics – age, skin color, height, weight, body type, hair style, clothing, and accessories; and counsel should ask that all subjects be exhibited in street clothes, not jail garb or, in the case of police officer “fillers” in the line, articles of clothing that are identifiable as parts of a police uniform. If more than one witness is to view the lineup, the witnesses should not be present during one another’s viewings; the positions of all subjects in the lineup should be changed between witnesses; and the witnesses should not be assembled where they can talk together either before or after the conclusion of the proceedings. At the lineup, counsel should record the names, descriptions, and means of later contacting all witnesses who are present to view the lineup (whether or not they attempt to make any identifications), what is said to them, and what they say. Counsel should also record the names, descriptions, and contact information for all persons in the lineup array. Counsel should record the manner in which the lineup is conducted, including distances, lighting, any directions to the subjects to walk, motion, or speak; what they do; and when in the course of these proceedings any identification is made. S/he should also note the names, ranks, and badge numbers of all officers present and of those who brought witnesses to the lineup. Similar interviews, observations, and notes should be made at show-ups.

Police detectives and officers usually record their own observations of lineups and show-ups in handwritten notes and typed reports. It is commonplace for the array of persons on a lineup stage to be photographed in a composite still, and in some jurisdictions the entire lineup proceeding is videotaped by the police. Counsel should note whether any of these records are being made, so that s/he can later subpoena them or request their production through pretrial discovery proceedings. See §§ 8.17, 8.19(a)(5) infra.
In the case of other testing procedures, counsel should record the names of all technicians and officers present and the means of contacting them and should ask them to describe for counsel what procedures, materials, substances, chemicals, and so forth, they are using, as they proceed. If possible, counsel should get them to describe, before any testing is done, what indicators or results they believe will demonstrate positive and negative findings. Counsel should also ask them whether their testing procedures will affect the substances being tested and, if so, request that they leave a sufficient amount of the substances untouched for subsequent defense testing. Any refusals of the technicians or officers to cooperate in these regards or to explain what they are doing should be noted.

§ 3.23 ACTIONS THAT CAN BE TAKEN TO PROTECT THE CLIENT’S RIGHTS IN LIEU OF A TRIP TO THE POLICE STATION

There is no fully adequate substitute for a trip by counsel to the police station. However, if for some reason counsel cannot go to the station, there are phone calls s/he can make that will further some of the same objectives.

After speaking with the client by telephone (§ 3.19 supra), having a preliminary phone conversation with the police officer(s) (§ 3.20 supra), and speaking by phone with the parent/guardian of the client (§ 3.21 supra), attorneys who cannot go to the stationhouse should phone the police again, ask for the officer who is currently responsible for handling the client’s case, and:

1. Discuss the possibility of the respondent’s release to parental custody, using the social information elicited from the client and the parent/guardian to try to persuade the officer to agree to release (and couching all arguments in terms of providing the officer with additional information, so as not to seem to be attempting to encroach upon police prerogatives).

2. In jurisdictions that permit bail for juveniles, elicit all information necessary for obtaining stationhouse bail. See § 3.20(2)(D) supra.

3. Reiterate and reinforce all advice, instructions, and requests that counsel gave in the earlier phone conversation with this officer or other officers regarding police interrogation of the client, identification procedures, and other investigative procedures. See § 3.20(2)(F) supra.

If counsel was able to persuade the police to release the client to parental custody (or, in jurisdictions permitting bail for juveniles, if counsel was able to arrange the setting of stationhouse bail), then counsel should call back the parent/guardian and arrange for the parent/guardian to secure the client’s release. This will require detailed instructions to the parent/guardian regarding the place to go (police station, detention facility, bail bonder’s office), the individuals to speak with, and the procedures to follow. The parent/guardian also must be cautioned against making any statements to the police and should be urged to restrain the client from making any statements to the police.

§ 3.24 ACTING ON BEHALF OF CLIENTS WHO HAVE BEEN MOVED FROM THE POLICE STATION TO A JUVENILE DETENTION FACILITY PENDING INITIAL HEARING

Counsel will need to deal with detention facility officials in either of two situations: (i) when, upon first receiving the phone call regarding a newly arrested client and tracking down the client’s current whereabouts, counsel discovers that the client has already been moved from the police station to a juvenile detention facility pending arraignment; or (ii) when counsel got to the client or the police prior to any such movement of the client, but counsel was unable to sway the police from their decision to detain the client in the detention facility pending Initial Hearing. The measures that must be employed to protect the client’s interests in these two situations are essentially identical, with one exception: In the first situation, when counsel is establishing contact with the client for the first time, counsel will need to go through the usual preliminary steps of first speaking with the client by phone (and covering all of the matters described in § 3.19(a)-(c) and (e)-(f) \textit{supra}) and speaking with the parent/guardian about his or her willingness to accept custody of the client and about the client’s prior behavior and prior record (§ 3.21 \textit{supra}). Once counsel has completed these telephone conversations, s/he will be ready to attempt to persuade the detention facility officials to release the client to his or her parent/guardian.

In many jurisdictions an official stationed at the detention facility – a probation officer, social services agency employee, or member of the staff of the facility – has the power to make a de novo decision about whether children received at the facility should be detained or released into parental custody pending Initial Hearing. The governing statute or the applicable agency regulations usually direct this official to base the detention/release determination on a prediction of the child’s propensity for future violence and likelihood of flight. Frequently, statutes or agency regulations prohibit the agency from releasing respondents charged with enumerated serious felonies.

Counsel’s goal obviously is to persuade the official to release the respondent to parental custody. The ammunition for counsel’s arguments should be the social information that counsel elicited during the interview of the client and during the phone conversation with the client’s parent/guardian. The factors to emphasize should be: the young age of the respondent; his or her lack of any prior record (or, as appropriate: lack of prior convictions, although s/he may have been arrested before; lack of many prior convictions or arrests; lack of convictions for serious felony offenses; lack of convictions for serious felony offenses involving violence; or lack of serious, violent offenses in the recent past); the child’s good behavior at home, as reported by the parent/guardian; the child’s good school attendance record, good conduct in school, and good school grades; any summertime or part-time employment experiences showing the respondent’s reliability or industriousness; and the comparatively minor nature of the present offense (or, as appropriate: the lack of violence even though the offense was serious; the lack of any concrete police evidence linking this respondent to the offense; and any other factors making it plausible that the respondent actually is innocent and falsely arrested).

If it is simply impossible for counsel to go to the detention facility, then these arguments will need to be made over the phone to the appropriate official. However, counsel’s chances of securing the client’s release will be vastly improved by a personal trip to the detention facility. Facility officials are not used to seeing attorneys (especially late at night), and they will often respond to an attorney’s appearance by treating the case as an exceptional situation that warrants something other than routine rubberstamping of the police officers’ decision to detain the child.

If the respondent is currently (or was previously) on probation or parole (in many jurisdictions, called “aftercare”) and if the respondent has a good relationship with his or her current or former probation or parole officer, counsel should telephone the officer and enlist his or her aid in lobbying the facility official to release the respondent. Frequently, an agency official will respond far more favorably to a fellow worker than to a defense attorney, in part because of the inevitable institutional loyalty to others in the same line of work (even when they are from another division of the same agency or another agency) and in part because s/he will view the worker as being less partisan than a defense attorney. If it is after work hours and if the probation or parole officer’s home number is not listed in the phone book, counsel can try asking the respondent’s parent or guardian, since some officers give out their home numbers to respondents’ parents in case problems crop up after hours. If counsel is unable to learn the officer’s home number and if counsel is confident that the officer will give a good report, counsel can ask the agency official to call the officer at home; frequently these officials have listings of the home numbers of their colleagues.

If counsel succeeds in persuading the detention facility official to release the respondent into parental custody, then counsel usually will need to call the parent/guardian and arrange his or her picking the client up from the facility. In some jurisdictions, if the parent/guardian is unable to arrange transportation, the facility will arrange to bring the child home. Facilities that lack provisions for transportation may, depending upon local regulations and custom, permit the attorney to take the child home if the parent/guardian is unable to come to the facility to pick up the child.

Finally, in jurisdictions that permit bail in juvenile cases, if the attorney has not as yet arranged bail, the detention facility official’s decision to deny release will necessitate the arranging of bail. Procedures for securing the client’s release on bail are discussed in § 4.27 infra.

§ 3.25 FINAL STEPS TO TAKE ON BEHALF OF THE NEWLY ARRESTED CLIENT IN CUSTODY PENDING ARRAIGNMENT

If counsel has taken all the steps described in §§ 3.20 and 3.22 or 3.23 supra for dealing with the police and in § 3.24 supra for dealing with detention facility officials and has nevertheless been unable to secure the release of the respondent pending Initial Hearing, counsel has done everything possible to try to bring about release. Counsel now will need to take steps to prepare for Initial Hearing. Since the respondent is detained, that hearing will take place at the earliest possible opportunity: later the same day if court has not yet been adjourned for the day and the “cut-off time” for bringing children to court has not yet passed; the following morning (or, if into a weekend, the following Monday morning) after court has adjourned or the cut-off time has passed. Counsel will need to speak with the parent/guardian promptly to: (i) arrange that the parent/guardian attend the hearing, since the judge probably will not release the child if the parent/guardian does not appear; (ii) ensure that the parent/guardian will be willing to accept custody of the child during the pretrial period if the judge orders release; and (iii) coach the parent/guardian on the need for relating positive information about the client to the probation officer in the upcoming probation intake interview. See § 3.27 infra. Counsel should take advantage of any remaining time to gather whatever additional information about the child will help to construct persuasive arguments for pretrial release. See § 4.09 infra.

If the client was released by the police or by a detention facility official, then counsel will have considerably more time to prepare for Initial Hearing. In most jurisdictions children who are released by the police or a detention facility are not required to report to court for at least two weeks. (Upon being released, the child and his or her parent or guardian are given a document instructing them to report to court (or the probation office) on a certain date.) Counsel thus will usually have a period of at least two weeks to consult with the client and his or her parent/guardian regarding the probation intake interview and the Initial Hearing and to do any other necessary preparation for the hearing and the arguments on pretrial detention.

Part D. Entering the Case at the Probation Intake Stage: Representing Children Who Were Released After Arrest and Have Not Yet Gone Through Probation Intake

§ 3.26 OVERVIEW OF THE ROLE THAT THE ATTORNEY POTENTIALLY CAN PLAY IN THE PROBATION INTAKE PROCESS

In most jurisdictions the probation intake process is designed to provide social information for a probation officer’s determinations (i) whether to “divert” the case out of the juvenile justice system (or in some jurisdictions whether to recommend that the prosecuting agency divert the case); and (ii) if the case is not diverted, whether to recommend pretrial detention or release of the child at Initial Hearing. See § 3.12 supra. The probation intake process generally consists of a probation officer’s interview with the child and with the parent, consultation of prior court records on the child, discussion with any other probation officers who have previously supervised or are currently supervising the child on probation, telephone calls to check on the child’s attendance and behavior in school, and possibly also telephone calls to the supervisors of the child in any part-time or summertime jobs and to mental health professionals who may have seen the child previously.

The most common situation in which defense counsel confronts the probation intake process is when s/he has been retained by a parent/guardian whose child was released immediately after arrest and who was directed to appear in court (or in the probation office) for a probation intake interview prior to Initial Hearing. Court-appointed counsel may deal with the probation intake process if a former or current client is rearrested and contacts the attorney for advice prior to probation intake on the new case. Attorneys who enter the case at or after the Initial Hearing usually will not encounter probation intake issues, since the process already will have been completed by that time.

The role that the attorney can play in influencing the probation intake process ordinarily is a very limited one. The attorney usually will not be permitted to attend the probation officer’s interview with either the child or the parent/guardian. Also, most probation officers will be at least somewhat resistant to attempts by attorneys to advocate to them what their decisions should be. There are, however, two ways in which the attorney can indirectly influence the outcome of the probation intake process: (i) by counseling the child and parent/guardian how to deal with the probation officer and what information to provide during the intake interviews (see § 3.27 infra); and (ii) by gathering positive social information about the child and relaying that information to the intake probation officer (see § 3.28 infra).

§ 3.27 COUNSELING THE CHILD AND PARENT/GUARDIAN TO PREPARE THEM FOR THE PROBATION INTAKE INTERVIEWS

The first and most important task in preparing a child and parent/guardian for the probation intake process is to let them know that any information they give to the probation officer will probably be relayed to the judge. Many probation officers begin a probation intake interview by assuring the child and parent/guardian that anything they tell the probation officer will be kept confidential. Although that statement may be technically accurate in that juvenile probation files are not available to the general public, it is incumbent upon defense counsel to ensure that the child and parent/guardian do not suffer from the misconception that the probation officer will keep secret everything s/he is told. Counsel should inform the child and parent/guardian that any social information disclosed to the probation officer may be relayed to the judge at the Initial Hearing and, if the child is convicted, may find its way into the presentence report. Thus any unfavorable social information related to the probation officer may impair the child’s chances of pretrial release at Initial Hearing and, if the child is convicted, may hurt the child’s chances of receiving a favorable sentence. By educating the child and parent/guardian in this manner, counsel can ensure that any decision by the child or parent/guardian to disclose negative social information is based on an informed judgment and not on a misimpression of absolute confidentiality. Simultaneously, counsel should encourage the child and parent/guardian to relate to the probation officer any positive social information about the child’s school performance, employment experiences, and other activities. However, counsel should warn the child and parent/guardian that any information they give the probation officer may be verified through telephone calls to schools, prior employers, and so forth; thus the child and parent/guardian should be careful not to succumb to the natural temptation to exaggerate the child’s good points and accomplishments.
How the child and parent/guardian behave during the probation intake interviews is often as important as what they say. In deciding whether to exercise discretion in favor of diverting a case or recommending pretrial release, many probation officers will be affected by such intangible factors as the attitude and demeanor of the child and parent/guardian, the degree of respect that the child seems to accord to both the parent/guardian and the probation officer, and the degree of emotional support that the parent/guardian seems to be providing to the child. In order to advise the child on these matters in a way that will make sense to the child and will simultaneously not be demeaning, the attorney might consider using the analogy of a job interview: The child should be advised to dress up as if s/he were trying to get a good job, should look the probation officer in the eye while talking to him or her, and should act respectfully both towards the probation officer and towards his or her parent or guardian. In advising the parent/guardian, counsel should just be straightforward about the power that the probation officer wields and the degree of impact that these probation intake interviews can have on the child’s case and freedom.

§ 3.28 THE ATTORNEY'S OPPORTUNITIES FOR DIRECT INVOLVEMENT IN THE PROBATION INTAKE PROCESS

Since most probation officers will resist and resent any attempts by the attorney to play the role of advocate in the diversion or pretrial detention decisions of the probation office, the attorney usually can achieve the best results by assuming the seemingly neutral role of information-provider: relaying to the probation officer positive social information about the child that the probation officer might not have obtained otherwise. Most probation officers are heavily burdened with high caseloads and have too little time to attend to each case. As a result, probation officers will make only the most urgently needed phone calls on each case and often will fail to uncover available mitigating facts. Thus, in a relatively common example, the probation officer may call the attendance officer of the child’s school and be told that the child was marked absent for most of the year; the child tells the attorney, and the attorney verifies by obtaining the school records, that the child actually attended each day, but simply skipped homeroom period and thus was marked absent when attendance was called. In some cases, the attorney might learn that the child is indeed skipping school but that the attendance problems are caused by the child’s frustration and humiliation at being unable to keep up with the class as a result of undiagnosed or inadequately remedied learning disabilities. When facts of this sort are relayed to the probation officer, they will often bring about the desired result far better than counsel’s arguments.

Thus when an attorney enters a case during the probation intake stage, s/he should promptly interview the child and parent/guardian, elicit all possible positive social information about the child, and obtain the written releases of information from parent/guardian and child necessary for counsel’s examination of school records and other agency records concerning the child. See § 5.11 infra. The attorney then should take whatever steps are necessary to obtain third-party verification of the positive social information. That verification should preferably be in written form, since documents will be more persuasive than the attorney’s affirmation that s/he received verification in a phone conversation. Thus the attorney might obtain copies of school records and arrange to have letters written by teachers, former summertime employers, coaches, after-school activity program supervisors, priests or ministers, and even neighbors. The key is to think creatively both in exploring the question of the child’s positive traits with the parent/guardian and child and in gathering supporting documents. For example, the best supporting document might be a photograph of the child’s trophies for sports accomplishments or a piece of pottery that the child made in an after-school program that s/he regularly attends. Any such mitigating evidence can be passed on to the probation officer either by the attorney or by the parent/guardian in the interview with the probation officer. Of course, the goal of obtaining written or tangible evidence of the child’s positive traits must be given up if there is no time for it; in such cases, phone conversations with teachers or other relevant individuals will have to suffice. Once the attorney has located and spoken with such supportive individuals, s/he can recount the phone conversation to the probation officer and possibly urge the probation officer to call that individual.

The limited role of the attorney that has been described here can be expanded when an attorney has developed a good reputation within the probation office and has developed a good prior relationship with the particular probation officer who is handling the case. A probation officer who has come to know and trust a certain attorney will often be much less resistant to overt arguments by the attorney directed to swaying the probation office’s decisions. For this reason attorneys can significantly increase their effectiveness by taking the time to get to know probation officers.

After the probation office has completed its intake process, either the case will be diverted or the paperwork on the case will be sent to the prosecutor’s office for preparation of the charging document. If the case is going forward (and will be “papered” or “petitioned” by the prosecutor’s office), then counsel’s next step must be to prepare for arraignment. See Chapter 4.

Part E. The “Wanted” Client: Representing Children Who Have Not Yet Been Arrested But Who Are Being Sought by the Police

§ 3.29 THE INITIAL PHONE CALL FROM THE “WANTED” CLIENT OR FROM SOMEONE CONCERNED ABOUT THE CLIENT

An attorney may receive a call from a client who is “wanted” by the authorities in either of two basic situations: when a potential client contacts the attorney for the first time because of his or her suspicions (or knowledge) that s/he is being sought by the police; or when an already-existing client suspects (or knows) that s/he is being sought by the police for crimes other than the one(s) on which s/he is already being represented by the attorney. If the attorney is contacted by the client himself or herself (rather than by a parent or other relative or friend on behalf of the client), the contact is usually in the form of a phone call: Few clients trust an unknown (or even partially known) attorney enough to appear in the attorney’s office and face what the client believes to be a significant risk of betrayal to authorities.
Sometimes counsel may receive a call or visit from the parent or guardian, another family member, or a friend of a potentially “wanted” client, acting at the client’s instance or because the caller is independently worried about the prospect of an arrest. If this person appears to be genuinely concerned with protecting the client and promoting the client’s best interests, counsel should have him or her put counsel directly in touch with the client, and counsel should then proceed as described in the following paragraphs and sections through § 3.33. If the person appears to be motivated by his or her own interests without regard to the client’s, and especially if such an individual is not the client’s parent or guardian, counsel will ordinarily want to decline any involvement in the matter. Representation of anyone in this situation is all too likely to embroil counsel in ethical and personal conflicts s/he would be wise to avoid.

In all dealings with “wanted” clients, the attorney must be sensitive to the paranoia that develops when an individual leads the life of a fugitive. In the beginning of any phone conversation with a “wanted” client, counsel should explain that the attorney-client privilege covers anything that the client may say about his or her situation and current whereabouts. It is clear under the code of ethics that such conversations do, indeed, fall within the attorney-client privilege. If any attorney labors under the delusion that lawyers are obliged to surrender their clients’ arrests by telling the authorities where the client can be found, ethical considerations militate that that attorney either refuse to speak with the “wanted” client at all or, at the very least, begin the conversation by warning the client that the attorney may relay to the police any or all of the information that the client divulges. If an attorney, albeit aware of the attorney-client shield, nevertheless feels personally uncomfortable with knowing the client’s location, that attorney certainly has the prerogative of asking the client not to reveal his or her whereabouts to the attorney. (Indeed, that type of request may have the fringe benefit of noticeably reducing the client’s suspicions about the attorney.)

In any event, after settling the issue of attorney-client privilege, counsel should elicit precisely why the client believes that s/he is wanted by the authorities. A client ordinarily becomes aware that s/he is wanted for arrest because of police efforts to locate the client, because of news reports, or because s/he learns of the arrest of companions. S/he may be wrong in believing that s/he is wanted, and counsel acting on behalf of a supposedly wanted client should be careful when making inquiries of the authorities not to give them any ideas or information that they do not already have. Before calling them, the attorney should question the client thoroughly about why the client believes that s/he is wanted, in order to assure that his or her belief is well-founded. If its source is a family member or acquaintance whom the client trusts but whose information seems to counsel to be vague or dubious, counsel is advised to speak to that source directly before making any contact with law enforcement.

The preliminary interview should also cover: (i) what the client knows about the nature of the charges; (ii) what the client knows about the events underlying the charges; (iii) the client’s assessment of whether s/he appears to be in danger of immediate arrest before counsel can discuss with the authorities the possibility of a voluntary surrender; (iv) information that the attorney will need in order to make a strategic judgment and advise the client about the likelihood of release in the event that the client does surrender to the authorities (including information concerning the prior criminal record of the client; the willingness of the client’s parent/guardian or other relatives to accept custody of the client pending trial; the client’s record of school attendance; and, in jurisdictions that permit bail in juvenile cases, the sources and amount of the client’s resources for making bail); and (v) depending upon the degree of trust that has been established between attorney and client thus far and depending upon the client’s assessment of the imminence of arrest, the attorney may wish to begin a conversation about the advisability of a voluntary surrender if the client should indeed turn out to be wanted by the police (see § 3.31 infra). If the attorney does not broach the final subject – the advisability of surrender – in this preliminary interview, counsel should at the very least note that s/he will suggest some advice on that issue after ascertaining the client’s actual status as well as other pertinent information. Finally, the attorney should obtain the client’s permission to contact the authorities on his or her behalf and, without revealing the client’s whereabouts, inquire whether s/he is actually wanted and whether the police would be willing to enter into any agreements regarding the client’s release in the event of surrender.

§ 3.30 MAKING INQUIRIES OF THE POLICE AND PROSECUTOR

After obtaining the client’s permission to contact the authorities, counsel needs to consider how much information can be revealed to them without suggesting that the client feels or is guilty of some offense and ought to be wanted by the police if s/he is not already. Forearmed with a plausible, nonincriminating reason for the inquiry, counsel should phone the police officer who would logically handle the client’s arrest (either those officers who are said to be looking for the client or the desk officer or Youth Services Division officer for the district of the client’s residence, or a “warrants squad” officer if the department has a separate section responsible for serving arrest warrants and if a warrant may have been issued) or the prosecutor’s office (if, in this locality, the prosecutor’s office customarily gets involved in prearrest investigations and charging decisions) or, in some jurisdictions, the division of the court clerk’s office that is responsible for maintaining records of all judicially approved arrest warrants or “custody orders.” Counsel should identify himself or herself as an attorney, say that s/he has been informed that the police may be looking for the client, and ask whether this is so. If it is, s/he should ask whether an arrest warrant for the client has been issued and what the charges are. In jurisdictions that permit bail in juvenile cases, counsel should also ask whether the warrant specifies a bail figure; if it does not, counsel should ask whether the police are authorized to release a juvenile arrestee on his or her own recognizance or to the custody of his or her parent or guardian, or to set bail on the charges for which the client is sought and what the amount of any bail required will be.

Particularly in cases in which the police are seeking the client for a warrantless arrest, the precinct desk officer may have little information to give counsel and may refer counsel to the investigating officers. In any event, on the basis of the information counsel receives from the desk officer (or prosecutor or court clerk), counsel should consider whether s/he wants to speak directly with the investigating officers in order to ask them about the nature of the charges, the circumstances of the supposed offense or offenses, and the likelihood of police release after arrest (or, in some jurisdictions, the likelihood of the police setting stationhouse bail). This will depend on whether counsel believes that s/he can get more information than s/he will be giving out in such a conversation. It also will depend on counsel’s assessment of the likelihood that an offer to arrange the surrender of the wanted client can be used as leverage to bargain for concessions from the police on the issue of postarrest release of the client. Thus, for example, counsel should attempt to extract a commitment from the police that they will exercise their discretion to release the child pending arraignment if s/he surrenders. See § 3.10 supra. Even in jurisdictions where the police are barred by statute or police regulations from releasing juveniles charged with certain enumerated felonies, the officers can nevertheless opt for release by redefining the crime for purposes of arrest as a less serious offense – unless, of course, the arrest was pursuant to a warrant specifying one of the enumerated felonies. In jurisdictions that permit bail in juvenile cases, counsel can bargain for stationhouse bail as the quid pro quo for surrender. Although the police may have (or may claim that they have) little discretion in setting the amount of bail because it is fixed by a bail schedule, they sometimes do possess some de jure discretion in regard to stationhouse bail, and they – or the prosecutor – can always exercise de facto discretion either by (i) changing the offense charged (unless a warrant has been issued) in order to change the applicable bail schedule figure or (ii) agreeing to go jointly with counsel to a magistrate or judge (who is not bound by the bail schedule) and to recommend that bail be set in an amount different from the bail-schedule figure.

In some cases, the police will refuse to make any concessions on release or bail in return for the client’s surrender, because they feel that they do not have discretion to make them, because they are confident that they can soon and easily arrest the client anyway, or because they want to have the client detained following his or her apprehension in order to further their in-custody investigations or to keep the client “off the street.” If the police stonewall, counsel should phone the prosecutor’s office and attempt to negotiate a surrender and the setting of reasonable release terms (or, in some jurisdictions, setting of manageable bail) directly with a prosecuting attorney. If the prosecutor is willing, the arrest of the respondent can take place in the courthouse itself, and then the arresting officer can take the respondent directly to the court detention area to await the prosecutor’s completion of the charging documents preliminary to the client’s immediate release. If the prosecutor is unwilling, counsel often can arrange with a courtroom clerk and intake probation officer to have the case called so that the client can surrender in open court.

Even though these alternative procedures for arranging surrender are available, counsel should begin by attempting to negotiate with the police. Generally, police officers are more interested than prosecutors in “closing” open police cases by arrest, since the officers will thereby generate self-serving statistics. Accordingly, police officers have the greatest incentive to agree to bargains proposed by defense counsel, such as the trade-off of surrender for postarrest release.

§ 3.31 THE FOLLOW-UP CONVERSATION WITH THE CLIENT: COUNSELING THE CLIENT ON THE ADVISABILITY OF SURRENDER
After talking with the authorities, counsel will want to confer again with the client, to discuss the client’s feelings about surrendering and to advise the client concerning the wisdom of that course in general as well as the specifics of any agreements that counsel thinks s/he can negotiate with the authorities and the mechanics of surrender if one is arranged. There are several potential benefits to surrendering: (i) The most significant from the client’s perspective will be the possibility of postarrest release by the police, pursuant to any agreements that counsel can negotiate; (ii) a less immediate but equally tangible benefit will be the enhanced likelihood of release at arraignment, since counsel will be able to argue to the judge that the client’s decision to surrender voluntarily demonstrates both that flight is unlikely and that the respondent is a responsible individual; (iii) by surrendering at a prearranged time with counsel present, the client can avoid the embarrassment and inconvenience of being dragged out of his or her home or school by the police and can preclude the risk of physical injury from a violent confrontation with the arresting officer; (iv) by surrendering in the presence of counsel, the client ensures that there will be no postarrest custodial interrogation.

The alternative course of not surrendering and of attempting to evade the police entails significant risks (of inconvenience, embarrassment, possible physical injury, and greater likelihood of detention) and usually provides very little benefit. Although the client may buy a little time “on the street,” the police, at least in serious cases, are usually fairly prompt in executing arrest warrants. Moreover, the police usually have little trouble in finding fugitive juveniles: Since children are generally dependent upon their parents or other relatives for shelter and food, most juveniles tend to “hide” in their own homes or the homes of close relatives, where they are readily found by the police. There is one exceptional situation in which a client’s successful evasion of the police will produce a distinct benefit. In many jurisdictions there is a maximum age (usually 18 or 21) beyond which a child cannot be incarcerated in a juvenile placement facility. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 355.3(6) (2018). In these jurisdictions a child who commits a crime that is not subject to “waiver” or transfer to adult court (see Chapter 13) and who eludes capture until s/he has passed the maximum age for commitment to a juvenile facility has gained absolute immunity from imprisonment. Moreover, s/he probably will not be prosecuted for the crime: A prosecutor is unlikely to incur the expense of prosecution solely to put a conviction on the child’s record when that conviction can thereafter be sealed or expunged (see § 39.08 infra).

Counsel will need to advise the client concerning all of these factors so that the client can make an informed decision whether to surrender. Although counsel can (and often should) advise the client to surrender, the final decision of course must be left to the client.

§ 3.32 ARRANGING THE SURRENDER

If the client decides to surrender, then the attorney can finalize the negotiations with the police and arrange the mechanics of the surrender. Counsel should insist upon securing assurances from the police that the client will not be interrogated, exhibited to witnesses for identification, or subjected to searches or examinations while in custody prior to being released.
A time and place for surrender should be agreed upon, and counsel should accompany the client to assure that the arrangements which s/he has made with the police or prosecutor are carried out. Before the surrender, counsel should make a detailed file memorandum recording the agreed-upon surrender terms, identifying the officer or official with whom they were arranged, and noting the time and manner (e.g., a phone conversation between specified phone numbers) in which the officer or official agreed to the terms.

In jurisdictions that permit bail for juveniles, arrangements should also be made in advance, either with a professional bail bonder or by getting the requisite cash, securities, or property deed in hand, to have the necessary security for posting bail available at the time of surrender.

§ 3.33 THE SURRENDER AND SUBSEQUENT ASPECTS OF THE CASE

If in the course of the actual surrender of the client, a police officer begins to renege on his or her agreements with counsel, the attorney should inform the officer that unless s/he adheres to the agreed-upon surrender terms, counsel will inform the local defense bar that that particular officer cannot be trusted in negotiations on surrender or any other matters. Since many officers are very concerned with closing cases and amassing arrest statistics, the threat to their credibility as honest traders may cause (or at least encourage) the officer to adhere to the original terms of the agreement. Should the officer persist in violating the terms of a surrender agreement, counsel should make a file memorandum detailing the incident, for potential use in (a) seeking immediate corrective action from superior officers, a prosecutor, or a judge (in a habeas corpus or injunctive proceeding) and (b) later litigating motions to suppress any evidence obtained by the police during the client’s detention (see Chapters 23-25 infra).

Once the surrender has been accomplished, counsel then will need to take all the steps that normally must be followed at that particular postarrest stage of a juvenile case. If release of the client was not part of the agreement with the police, counsel will need to try to persuade detention facility officials to release the client to parental custody. See § 3.24 supra. If release was part of the agreement and the client in fact was released, then counsel will need to deal with the probation intake process. See §§ 3.26-3.28 supra. Then, once the case reaches court, counsel will need to handle the Initial Hearing, a topic that is taken up in the next chapter.
Chapter 4

The Initial Hearing: Prehearing Interview; Arraignment; Pretrial Detention Arguments; Probable-Cause Hearing

Part A. Introduction

§ 4.01 THE NATURE OF THE INITIAL HEARING; SCOPE OF THE CHAPTER; TERMINOLOGY

“Initial Hearing” (or “Initial Appearance”) is the term used in most jurisdictions to refer to the first hearing at which the respondent appears before a judicial officer – a judge, magistrate, or court commissioner. Depending upon the jurisdiction, the hearing may encompass all or some of the following court functions:

1. Ascertainment of the respondent’s eligibility for court-appointed counsel and, if the respondent is eligible, appointment of defense counsel (see § 4.04 infra);

2. Arraignment of the respondent on the charging paper (commonly known as the “Petition”) (see §§ 4.12, 4.13 infra);

3. Determination whether the respondent will be released or detained pending trial and, in some jurisdictions, setting of bail (see §§ 4.15-4.27 infra);

4. Scheduling of a trial date (see § 4.14 infra);

5. Referral of the respondent for a mental health examination (see §§ 12.11-12.15 infra).

Most jurisdictions conduct the arraignment at Initial Hearing, see, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 320.4(1) (2018), although some jurisdictions permit the prosecution to postpone the filing of a Petition and the arraignment for a limited period of time under exceptional circumstances. See, e.g., In the Matter of T.G.T., 515 A.2d 1086 (D.C. 1986) (construing a D.C. statute to permit a prosecution continuance of the filing of the Petition for up to five days following Initial Hearing upon a “clear showing of a legitimate state objective to be served by the postponement,” id. at 1087; but detention or shelter care can only be ordered in such circumstances “if the juvenile is given reasonably specific notice of the nature of the charge,” id.). Some jurisdictions incorporate both the detention determination and the probable-cause determination in the Initial Hearing, see, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 16-2310(a), 16-2312(e)-(f) (2018), while others provide for an adversarial detention determination at Initial Hearing followed some days later by a probable-cause hearing, see, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 325.1(2) (2018).

Because of the substantial diversity in the order in which the various stages are reached, this chapter will simply address each stage – arraignment, detention, probable-cause hearing, and scheduling of the trial date – as a separate topic, without attempting to elaborate upon the numerous permutations that result from combining or separating the stages.

Terminology also varies substantially among jurisdictions. For purposes of this chapter and the rest of the book, the term “arraignment” will be employed to refer to the formal proceeding at which the respondent is advised of the charges and enters a plea. That plea – which juvenile court parlance styles an “admission” or “denial” – will be designated a plea of “guilty” or “not guilty” in this discussion, to avoid confusion with the concept of incriminating admissions in the context of police interrogation and suppression of confessions. Finally, for the sake of simplicity, the term “judge” will be employed to refer to the judicial officer conducting the Initial Hearing, even though some jurisdictions assign such hearings to a magistrate or court commissioner rather than a judge.

§ 4.02 COPING WITH THE IDIOSYNCRASIES OF INITIAL HEARINGS: RUSHED PROCEEDINGS AND JUVENILE COURT PARLANCE

Counsel should expect that the Initial Hearing will be a pretty rushed proceeding, especially in metropolitan courts where dozens of cases are scheduled for Initial Hearing each day. The setting inside the courtroom is often chaotic, with juvenile respondents, their parents, the prosecutors, defense attorneys, and bailiffs moving about the well of the courtroom, periodically approaching the bench, and going back and forth to the cell-block. Sometimes the prosecution will request a continuance to complete its investigation, and this will be granted before defense counsel even reaches counsel table.

The defense attorney will have to maintain composure in this confusion. When s/he does not understand what the judge is doing, or has done, with counsel’s case, s/he should ask the court respectfully for an explanation. The record should be clear on whether the arraignment has been held or continued and, if continued, on whose motion. Defense objections to a prosecution-sought continuance should be noted. If defense counsel is confronted by something unexpected, s/he should ask for time to confer with the client or for a continuance to a later hour or date. S/he should resist being harried or pressured into snap judgments on matters that s/he has not previously considered.

Counsel will also encounter local idioms and acronyms that can bewilder novice attorneys and even experienced attorneys whose practice has been in adult criminal court or juvenile courts of other jurisdictions. See § 2.02 supra. Attorneys who are first beginning practice in a juvenile court are well advised to learn the vocabulary quickly by consulting other attorneys who regularly appear in the court and by watching court proceedings.

Part B. Appointment of Counsel

§ 4.03 THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL AT INITIAL HEARING
A juvenile respondent in a delinquency proceeding, like an adult defendant in a criminal proceeding, has a constitutional right to counsel, including the right to court-appointed counsel if s/he is indigent. See In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 41 (1967). In every delinquency case the “child and his parents must be notified of the child’s right to be represented by counsel retained by them or, if they are unable to afford counsel, that counsel will be appointed to represent the child.” Id.

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies at every “critical stage” of the proceedings, White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59 (1963) (per curiam), “at or after the time that adversary judicial proceedings have been initiated against [the individual] . . . – ‘whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment.’” Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 398 (1977). See also Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778, 786 (2009); Rothgery v. Gillespie County, Texas, 554 U.S. 191, 198, 213 (2008). The right is triggered at “such time as the ‘government has committed itself to prosecute, and . . . the adverse positions of government and defendant have solidified.’” Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 432 (1986). It extends through sentencing (Mempa v. Rhay, 389 U.S. 128 (1967); Lafler v. Cooper, 566 U.S. 156, 165 (2012)), and through at least the first appeal as of right from conviction and sentence (Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963); Swenson v. Bosler, 386 U.S. 258 (1967); Halbert v. Michigan, 545 U.S. 605 (2005); and compare Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722 (1991), with Martinez v. Ryan, 566 U.S. 1 (2012) and Davila v. Davis, 137 S. Ct. 2058 (2017)). See also Shabazz v. State, 2018 Ark. App. 281, 2018 WL 2034517, at *9 (May 2, 2018) (“the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies to suppression hearings”); Schmidt v. Foster, 891 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2018) (a defendant questioned in chambers by the trial judge to determine whether he could make the requisite “some evidence” showing necessary to present a provocation defense was entitled to full participation by counsel; the court had allowed defense counsel to be present at the ex parte proceeding but limited counsel’s role to that of a passive listener; this restriction at a “critical stage” of the proceedings violated the Sixth Amendment); People v. Smith, 30 N.Y.3d 626, 92 N.E.3d 789, 69 N.Y.S.3d 566 (2017) (the defendant had a right to representation by counsel on the prosecution’s pretrial motion to compel him to submit to a buccal swab).

Under these principles it has long been clear that the Sixth Amendment requires the appointment of counsel to represent indigents at arraignment. Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52 (1961); see, e.g., Rothgery v. Gillespie County, Texas, 554 U.S. at 198, 213; Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. at 428; see also Missouri v. Frye, 566 U.S. 133, 140 (2012); Gonzales v. Commissioner of Correction, 308 Conn. 463, 68 A.3d 624 (2013). Accordingly, when, as in the majority of jurisdictions, Initial Hearing includes an arraignment, a juvenile respondent is entitled to be represented by counsel at the Initial Hearing. In those jurisdictions where Initial Hearing does not involve an arraignment but consists of an adversarial detention hearing and a determination of probable-cause, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel should also apply. Although the Supreme Court has occasionally described the time at which the right attaches as the “first formal charging proceeding” (Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. at 428), it plainly can attach earlier, depending upon the “state system[ ] of criminal procedure,” Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 123 (1975). See, e.g., Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1 (1970). See also, e.g., State in the Interest of P.M.P., 200 N.J.
166, 177-78, 975 A.2d 441, 447-48 (2009) (state statutory right to counsel, which applies to “every critical stage of the proceeding which, in the opinion of the court may result in the institutional commitment of the juvenile,” is triggered when “the Prosecutor’s Office initiates a juvenile complaint and obtains a judicially approved arrest warrant”). In Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220 (1977), the Court concluded that the right to counsel attached at a prearrest preliminary hearing whose purpose under state criminal procedure was “to determine whether there was probable-cause to bind petitioner over to the grand jury and to set bail.” Id. at 228. In reaching this conclusion in Moore, the Court emphasized that the accused “found ‘himself faced with the prosecutorial forces of organized society, and immersed in the intricacies of substantive and procedural criminal law.’” Id. This is no less true of a juvenile detention proceeding, in which the prosecutor is seeking detention and an effective response requires a knowledge of the complex statutory and caselaw standards governing detention determinations. Indeed, because of the special disabilities of youth, there is particular reason to conclude that “[t]he child ‘requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him.’” In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 36 (1967) (dictum). See also Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 279 (1984) (in approving the constitutionality of preventive detention for juveniles, the Court emphasizes that the detention statutes in question conferred upon juveniles “the right to a hearing [and] . . . to counsel”).

§ 4.04 THE MECHANISMS FOR APPOINTING COUNSEL OR ARRANGING FOR THE PRESENCE OF RETAINED COUNSEL AT INITIAL HEARING

Whenever a child appears at arraignment without an attorney, the parent or guardian of the child will be asked whether s/he intends to retain counsel for the child or whether the family is requesting that the court appoint counsel for the child. If the parent opts for appointment of counsel, there will be an inquiry into the parent’s financial status to determine whether the parent can afford to retain an attorney.

The mechanism for conducting that inquiry varies widely among jurisdictions. In some localities the inquiry is conducted by the intake probation office; in others the court has created a special agency whose sole responsibility is to oversee the administrative details of the appointment process; in still others the judge conducts the inquiry in court. Depending upon local practice (and often upon the preferences of the inquirer), the inquiry into financial status may be brief or very detailed. If an attorney is consulted by an indigent parent beforehand, the attorney should urge the parent to be realistic in his or her declaration of financial means. All too many parents inflate their financial status for the sake of pride, and as a result, they lose the opportunity to obtain the court-appointed counsel to which they are entitled.
If the family qualifies for appointment of counsel, the judge will assign either a staff attorney of the local public defender’s office or a member of the sector of the private bar that accepts appointment to cases of indigent clients. (There is usually a procedure for attorneys who are willing to be appointed to enter their names on either a monthly or daily list; counsel newly entering the juvenile law field should consult private attorneys who are already practicing regularly in juvenile court for instructions on the local procedure.)

In some jurisdictions public defenders and private attorneys are available in court each day for appointment to cases. In these jurisdictions an attorney will be appointed, and arraignment will take place immediately thereafter. In other jurisdictions there is no corps of attorneys available for daily appointment, and the ordinary practice is to appoint a particular attorney by name, then adjourn the arraignment to another date (possibly two to four weeks later) to permit the designated attorney to appear. In the latter jurisdictions, if the prosecutor requests immediate pretrial detention, the judge will usually make a temporary assignment of an attorney who happens to be in court to handle an arraignment and a pretrial detention hearing in the case.

In appointing attorneys to represent indigent clients, the court normally will not consult the child and parent about their preferences regarding the identity of the attorney. However, there are two situations in which the child (and/or parent) has a right to express a preference. First, if the child has been through the system before and has formed a special relationship of trust with a particular attorney and if that attorney is willing and able to take the new case, then the court should honor the already-existing attorney-client relationship by reappointing that attorney. See, e.g., Harris v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. 3d 786, 797-99, 567 P.2d 750, 757-58, 140 Cal. Rptr. 318, 325-26 (1977); People v. Horton, 11 Cal. 4th 1068, 1098-1101, 906 P.2d 478, 496-98, 47 Cal. Rptr. 516, 534-36 (1996). See also, e.g., People v. Griffin, 20 N.Y.3d 626, 630, 632, 987 N.E.2d 282, 284, 286, 964 N.Y.S.2d 505, 507, 509 (2013); People v. Burton, 28 A.D.3d 203, 204, 811 N.Y.S.2d 663, 663-64 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2006); Davis v. State, 261 Ga. 221, 222, 403 S.E.2d 800, 801 (1991). Accordingly, if the court attempts to appoint a new lawyer for a client and the lawyer learns during the initial interview that the child and/or parent prefer reappointment of an attorney who previously represented the child, the lawyer should bring this matter to the court’s attention and request reappointment of that attorney.

Second, the child, the parent, or both may object to the court’s selection of counsel on the ground that the designated attorney previously represented the child in a manner that the child, the parent, or both found grossly unacceptable. If the attorney is aware of the client’s dissatisfaction or learns of it through the client interview, s/he should gauge whether it will nevertheless be possible to form a sound relationship of trust with the client. If such a relationship will be impossible, the attorney cannot provide effective assistance of counsel and should request that the court assign a different lawyer. If the attorney believes that the current problems in attorney-client relations can be surmounted, s/he should still bring the matter to the court’s attention so that the court can inquire into the client’s grievances and make an independent assessment of the need for appointing a different attorney.
If the parent declares that s/he will retain counsel or if the family is deemed financially ineligible for court-appointed counsel, the arraignment usually will be adjourned to a new date (usually two to four weeks later) to give the parent time to find and hire an attorney. If the prosecutor requests immediate pretrial detention, the judge ordinarily will appoint a public defender or private attorney to “stand in” for purposes of representing the child in an arraignment and pretrial detention hearing.

The process by which attorneys are retained and thereafter enter their appearances at the adjourned arraignment is normally clear-cut. There are, however, two difficult situations that are worthy of mention. First, attorneys should be very reluctant to be retained by the parent if the alleged delinquent also has a pending PINS case. The parent, after all, is the party who is pressing charges against the child in the PINS case. Accordingly, the attorney, in effect, is being paid by an individual who is an opposing party in another proceeding. In order to attempt to eliminate this conflict-prone situation, the attorney should ask the court to appoint counsel for the child (and possibly to appoint the attorney himself or herself under the court-appointment process for cases of indigent clients). If the court is unwilling to do so, and if there is no alternative to parental payment of the attorney, then the lawyer should accept the case but only after very carefully cautioning the parent about the attorney’s necessary loyalty to the child. See, e.g., INSTITUTE OF JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION-AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION JOINT COMMISSION ON JUVENILE JUSTICE STANDARDS, STANDARDS RELATING TO PRETRIAL COURT PROCEEDINGS, Standard 5.3(C) (1980) (“If a parent has retained counsel for a juvenile and it appears to the court that the parent’s interest in the case conflicts with the juvenile’s interest, the court should caution both the parent and counsel as to counsel’s duty of loyalty to the juvenile’s interests”).

The second difficult situation, which is analogous, arises when the familial relationship between a parent and an allegedly delinquent child has deteriorated to the point of hostility. Although the legal interests of parent and child may not be technically antagonistic here, there usually is a clear divergence between the goals of the client and the paying parent. See, e.g., id., Commentary to Standard 5.3(C) (“[p]arents often resent their children for the trouble, embarrassment and expense brought upon the family by court involvement”). In such circumstances the attorney once again should seek court appointment of counsel for the child and, if that proves impossible, should caution the parent about the primacy of the attorney’s loyalties to the child. See id., Standard 5.3(C).

§ 4.05 WAIVER OF THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL

In adult criminal cases, a mentally competent defendant has the federal constitutional right to waive counsel, including the right to dismiss court-appointed counsel, and to proceed pro se. Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975). See, e.g., Tatum v. Foster, 847 F.3d 459 (7th Cir. 2017); Tennis v. State, 997 So.2d 375 (Fla. 2008). The standard of competency for this purpose is the same as the standard for competency to stand trial under Dusky v. United States, 362 U.S. 402 (1960), and cognate cases discussed in § 12.17 infra. Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389 (1993). However, defendants may be denied the right to proceed pro se if the court finds that their mental condition is such that, while “competent enough to stand trial under Dusky . . . [if represented by counsel, they] . . . still suffer from severe mental illness to the point . . . [of being] not competent to conduct trial proceedings by themselves.” Indiana v. Edwards, 554 U.S. 164, 178 (2008). See also McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984) (defendant’s right to self-representation was not violated by judge’s appointment of standby counsel and by standby counsel’s intermittent, unsolicited participation in the trial). (Reconciling Edwards and Godinez is not easy. See Todd A. Berger, The Aftermath of Indiana v. Edwards: Re-Evaluating the Standard of Competency Needed for Pro Se Representation, 68 BAYLOR L. REV. 680 (2016).) When a defendant indicates that s/he wishes to exercise the right of self-representation, the nearly ubiquitous procedure is for the presiding judge to conduct a hearing in which the defendant is advised of his or her right to counsel (including court-appointed counsel if s/he is indigent) and of his or her right, alternatively, to proceed pro se; the perils of self-representation are explained to the defendant; and the judge engages the defendant in the colloquy to determine competency. See, e.g., Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. at 392-93; United States v. Bankston, 820 F.3d 215 (6th Cir. 2016); State v. Murray, 469 S.W.3d 921 (Mo. App. 2015); State v. Klessig, 211 Wis. 2d 194, 207, 564 N.W.2d 716, 721 (1997); State v. Victor, 167 So. 3d 118 (La. App. 2014); Cortez v. State, 2014 WL 1423339 (Tex. App. 2014); People v. Curry, 2017 WL 2870482 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t July 6, 2017); but see Iowa v. Tovar, 541 U.S. 77, 81 (2004) (holding that the federal Constitution does not require an admonition regarding the dangers and risks of self-representation but permits a defendant to waive counsel and plead guilty if “the trial court informs the accused of the nature of the charges against him, of his right to be counseled regarding his plea, and of the range of allowable punishments attendant upon the entry of a guilty plea”). The court may order the defendant to undergo a mental examination and/or may receive extrinsic evidence of relevant mental impairment. See, e.g., People v. Shiga, 6 Cal. App. 5th 22, 210 Cal. Rptr. 3d 611 (2016); People v. Davis, 352 P.3d 950 (Colo. 2015); State v. Connor, 292 Conn. 483, 528-30, 973 A.2d 627, 656-57 (2009); State v. Bartlett, 271 Mont. 429, 898 P.2d 98 (1995).

In In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), the Court implicitly assumed, without actually deciding, that the same right to waive counsel would be afforded juveniles in delinquency proceedings. See id. at 42 (Gault and his mother had “a right . . . to be confronted with the need for specific consideration of whether they did or did not choose to waive the right [to counsel]”). However, the Court in Gault also indicated that the right to counsel can be waived in a delinquency case only if the waiver is made by both the child and his or her parent or guardian. See id. at 41-42.

There is a sound basis for limiting the right of juveniles to waive counsel, even with the assent of a parent. The empirical evidence regarding juveniles’ waivers of rights demonstrates that a large portion of the population of juveniles is incapable of comprehending and executing a knowing waiver of the right to counsel. See Thomas Grisso, Juveniles’ WAIVER OF RIGHTS: LEGAL AND PSYCHOLOGICAL COMPETENCE 193-94 (1981); for further discussion of this empirical evidence, see § 24.10(b) infra. And although the involvement of a parent or guardian does bring an adult’s comprehension and perspective to bear on the waiver decision, some parents and guardians have interests antithetical to their children’s. See § 4.04 supra.
The problematic aspects of juvenile waivers of the right to counsel have led some state legislatures to flatly prohibit such waivers, see, e.g., IOWA CODE ANN. § 232.11(2) (2018); TEX. FAM. CODE ANN. § 51.10(b) (2018), and this approach is advocated by the Juvenile Justice Standards Project of the Institute of Judicial Administration and the American Bar Association. See IJA-ABA JUVENILE JUSTICE STANDARDS PROJECT, STANDARDS RELATING TO PRETRIAL COURT PROCEEDINGS, Standard 6.1(A) (1980). See also WIS. STAT. ANN. § 938.23(1)(m)(a) (2018) (prohibiting waiver of counsel by juveniles below the age of 15 and specifying that, if a court accepts a knowing and voluntary waiver of counsel by a “juvenile 15 years of age or older,” the court “may not place the juvenile in a juvenile correctional facility or a secured residential care center for children and youth, transfer supervision of the juvenile to the department for participation in the serious juvenile offender program, or transfer jurisdiction over the juvenile to adult court”). Other States follow the course of permitting waivers, but only after the youth has been fully advised of the consequences of waiver by an attorney, State ex rel. J.M. v. Taylor, 276 S.E.2d 199 (W. Va. 1981), or the judge, In re B.M.H., 177 Ga. App. 478, 339 S.E.2d 757 (1986); A.S. v. State, 923 N.E.2d 486, 492-93 (Ind. App. 2010); In re Christopher T., 129 Md. App. 28, 40-41, 740 A.2d 69, 75-76 (1999), or after a hearing at which it is shown by clear and convincing evidence that the child has knowingly and intelligently waived the right to counsel and that such a waiver is in the child’s best interest, N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 249-a (2018); see also In re Interest of Dalton S., 273 Neb. 504, 515, 730 N.W.2d 816, 825-26 (2007); In re C.S., 115 Ohio St. 3d 267, 283-84, 874 N.E.2d 1177, 1192-93 (2007). Cf. United States v. Ross, 703 F.3d 856, 868-71 (6th Cir. 2012) (although the record “clearly support[ed]” the district court’s initial finding that the adult defendant “had knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to counsel,” the district court erred, when new questions about the defendant’s competency surfaced, by “permitt[ing] him to represent himself at the competency hearing”: “the Constitution requires a defendant to be represented by counsel at his own competency hearing, even if he has previously made a knowing and voluntary waiver of counsel”).

Part C. Pre-Hearing Interview of the Client and Parent, and Other Necessary Preparation for the Initial Hearing

§ 4.06 INSISTING UPON AN OPPORTUNITY TO CONDUCT A PRE-HEARING INTERVIEW WHEN COUNSEL IS RETAINED OR APPOINTED IMMEDIATELY BEFORE THE HEARING

If an attorney enters a case before the day of Initial Hearing (see Chapter 3), s/he will ordinarily have the time to conduct a full-scale initial interview of the client, covering both the information needed in order to handle the Initial Hearing (including all of its components: arraignment, detention hearing, and probable-cause hearing) and the information needed in order to begin preparing for trial. However, attorneys who are retained by a client shortly before, or on the day of, the Initial Hearing and attorneys who are appointed by the court on the day of the hearing face the dilemma of insufficient time to fully interview the client and prepare for the hearing.
Some judges may be amenable to a newly retained or appointed attorney’s request to continue the Initial Hearing for a few days to allow counsel sufficient time to interview the client and prepare for the hearing. Of course, such a continuance should not be sought if the client will be detained during the period until Initial Hearing unless counsel has reason to believe that the continuance would make it possible to gather information that would spell the difference between a longer period of pretrial detention and release. If the client will not be detained during the period until the hearing, and particularly when a currently detained client will be released during that period, counsel should ordinarily ask the court for the continuance unless: there is a significant risk that a parent or guardian or some other individual who has come to court on the respondent’s behalf (like a counselor from a community program) will fail to reappear on the new date; or counsel is aware of detrimental information about the respondent that the prosecutor and probation officer have not yet learned and a continuance would give them a chance to uncover the detrimental information.

In most jurisdictions, however, the judges will not be amenable to defense requests to continue the Initial Hearing, and counsel will have to make do with the limited time that is available. In this situation counsel will have to focus the initial client interview upon the subjects that must be covered in preparation for the hearing itself. See § 4.07 infra.

Sometimes, counsel will have to take firm action to assure that s/he can interview the client at all prior to the Initial Hearing. In some jurisdictions attorneys for indigent respondents are appointed at the beginning of the Initial Hearing and are then expected to conduct the hearing immediately, even though they have not yet interviewed their clients. While this dilemma arises with far less frequency when counsel is retained, last-minute retention of the attorney may result in counsel’s meeting the client just as the case is being called, and the judge may reject counsel’s request that the case be recalled later in the day. Any such judicial pressures to conduct a hearing without a prior client interview are simply unacceptable. Counsel should insist upon interviewing the client before going forward with any of the components of the Initial Hearing. S/he should insist upon adequate time for the interview: The information necessary to provide effective assistance at the Initial Hearing, described in § 4.07 infra may take some time to elicit, especially with an uncommunicative client; and counsel cannot afford to give short shrift to any of the topics that must be covered. Finally, counsel should insist upon a private setting for the interview – a setting that avoids the risk of eavesdropping by guards or other prisoners and in which the client will feel comfortable revealing confidences.

If the judge wishes to forge ahead with the Initial Hearing notwithstanding counsel’s request for an opportunity to conduct an adequate first interview with his or her new client, counsel should ordinarily take the position that the client’s Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel will be violated unless sufficient time is allowed for counsel to interview the client and prepare for the hearing. However, there are no hard-and-fast rules here. In some cases in which there is a risk of pretrial detention, it may be possible to take advantage of the judge’s impatience and desire to push cases along, to extract a commitment from the judge not to detain the respondent. For example, counsel can state:
Your Honor, I have not yet had an opportunity to interview my client. If there is any possibility that the Court will detain my client, then the Sixth Amendment requirement of effective assistance of counsel demands that I conduct a full and adequate interview and effectively prepare to argue the issue of pretrial detention.

Frequently, counsel will find that the lateness of the hour and the prospect of protracting a lengthy Initial Hearing calendar will lead a judge to make a commitment that the respondent will not be detained. Under these circumstances there is a tactical benefit to going forward, and there will be no disadvantages as long as counsel is careful not to waive any rights, such as the right to a probable-cause hearing.

In some jurisdictions public defenders and other court-appointed attorneys are informed early in the morning, some hours prior to Initial Hearing, that they will be appointed to a certain respondent’s case at the hearing if that respondent is eligible for court-appointed counsel. In these jurisdictions counsel should seize the opportunity to interview the respondent as soon as s/he receives notice of a possible appointment. Inevitably, there will be more time and opportunity for a calm, effective client interview at that point in the day than after the Initial Hearings begin. Moreover, this type of early start on the case will enable counsel to contact relatives, teachers, and social workers who may have information about the respondent that can be used at arraignment in arguing against pretrial detention. See §§ 4.08, 4.09 infra. Finally, in many jurisdictions, there will be an additional logistical reason for conducting the interview early in the day whenever the respondent has been detained pending arraignment: In these jurisdictions early interviews can be conducted in the relatively private setting of the general cell-block area of the courthouse; later interviews must be conducted in small holding cells adjoining the courtroom, in the presence of other juveniles who are being held in the cells.

When interviewing the client prior to formal appointment, counsel need not worry about the applicability of the attorney-client privilege as a safeguard of the confidentiality of their communications. Whenever a client consults with an attorney for the purposes of possible representation, the conversation is fully protected by the attorney-client privilege, whether it occurs in a private office or in a cell-block. All that counsel needs to do to guarantee this protection is to conduct the interview in a fashion that minimizes the risk that it will be overheard by third parties, taking whatever precautions against eavesdropping the physical surroundings permit.

§ 4.07 THE INFORMATION THAT NEEDS TO BE ELICITED FROM THE CLIENT IN ORDER TO PREPARE FOR THE INITIAL HEARING

As explained in § 4.01 supra, jurisdictions vary on the matters taken up at Initial Hearing. Since counsel’s pre-hearing interview of the client should be designed to cover the topics necessary to prepare for the Initial Hearing, the nature of the pre-hearing interview will vary somewhat among jurisdictions. The following sections describe the information that needs to be elicited for purposes of the two crucial judicial determinations made at Initial Hearing in most jurisdictions: (a) the determination whether the respondent will be detained pending trial and (b) the probable cause determination. Usually, no facts will be needed to prepare for the arraignment phase of the Initial Hearing. See § 4.13 infra.

§ 4.07(a) Information To Elicit in Preparation for the Detention Hearing

Counsel should cover the following matters in the pre-hearing interview of the client in order to elicit the information needed to argue for pretrial release:

1. Whether the child behaves at home and gets along with his or her parent/guardian well enough that the parent/guardian will be willing to take the child home in the event of release.

2. Whether, to the child’s knowledge, the parent/guardian plans to be present at the Initial Hearing. If the interview is being conducted in the courthouse shortly before the Initial Hearing and counsel has not personally seen the parent/guardian at the courthouse, counsel should ask the child whether the parent/guardian is there and should also ask the child for his or her home phone number so that counsel can telephone the parent/guardian, if necessary, as well as the phone numbers of other relatives in the event that no one is home at the child’s house. If the child believes that the parent/guardian will not be present, counsel should elicit the reasons for this absence, whether the presence of the parent/guardian can be arranged (either at the time set for the present Initial Hearing or at another time to which it might practicably be adjourned), and, if not, the names and phone numbers of other adult relatives, such as siblings, who could come to court in lieu of the parent/guardian and convey the parent/guardian’s willingness to take the child home.

3. If the parent/guardian is not willing to take the child home, counsel should learn whether there is some other adult relative – such as a grandparent, aunt or uncle, or adult sibling or cousin – who would be willing to take in the child for the period pending trial. Counsel should ascertain not only the name but also the address and phone number of the relative so that counsel can verify the relative’s willingness and furnish this verification to the court during counsel’s argument.

4. Whether the child regularly attends school, the grade level s/he is in, and a rough estimate of academic performance, including any incidents of suspension or expulsion. Counsel will need the name of the school so that counsel can telephone its attendance officer and verify a lack of truancy and other gross misconduct.

5. Whether the child is presently employed (either full-time or part-time) and whether the child has had any previous jobs, including summer jobs. Counsel should elicit not only the nature, place, hours, and approximate dates of employment but also the names of any employers or supervisors who can verify that the child was a reliable and trustworthy worker.

6. Whether the child is presently on probation or parole (called aftercare in several jurisdictions) and, if so, the name of the child’s probation or parole officer and the child’s assessment of what the probation or parole officer is likely to say about the child’s adjustment.

7. Whether the child has ever been arrested previously and the outcome of the prior case(s). Counsel will have to check the client’s record independently, but the client’s rendition of it may tip counsel off to charges that are missing from the central records – such as very old or very recent charges – that might nevertheless be known to the probation officer who recites the child’s record to the judge. In asking about prior record, counsel must bear in mind that many children are unsophisticated regarding the court system and may believe, for example, that a prior grant of unsupervised probation was a “dismissal” of the case because the child was neither incarcerated nor on active probationary supervision.

8. Whether the child presently has a curfew set by his or her parent/guardian, what that curfew is, how often the child complies with it, and, in the event of noncompliance, how late the child comes home.

9. Whether the child uses alcohol or drugs, and whether s/he is undergoing or has undergone treatment for alcohol or drug abuse.

10. Whether the child is presently, or has in the past been, involved in any counseling programs or after-school or weekend community programs and, if so, the names (and, if the child knows, phone numbers) of any counselors who can speak about the child’s reliability and lack of dangerousness.

11. Whether there are any significant mitigating facts about the offense – or prior or pending offenses – that can be cited to dispel the notion that the seriousness of the offense[s] necessitates the child’s detention for the protection of the community.

In cases in which counsel believes that there is a significant chance of detention, counsel should also discuss with the client the possibility that counsel will request detention in a group home or other non-secure environment if it becomes clear that the judge is going to detain the client. This type of advance warning is advisable because the signals that the judge gives off during the hearing may not be evident to the client, and the impression s/he will receive is that the lawyer has sold him or her down the river. Post-hearing explanations will be futile, since counsel will already have lost the trust of the client, and counsel’s explanations will appear to be post hoc excuses.
On rare occasions counsel will see a client who expresses a desire to be incarcerated at the secure detention facility. Requests of this sort must be handled with great sensitivity. Most often, they are fueled by either (i) the child’s desire to flee abuse by the parent/guardian or some other adult relative living in the house, or (ii) the child’s depression at having been arrested and having disappointed his or her family. Any client would be loth to discuss such personal matters with an attorney whom s/he has just met, and some clients may not even be consciously aware of their own motivations. In such situations a viable option may be to describe shelter care to the client and ascertain whether s/he would be willing to be detained in a community-based setting of this sort. Most clients who manifest this type of disturbance will agree to shelter care, and once placement in a shelter house has been achieved, counsel can arrange for the respondent to talk over his or her problems with a psychiatrist or psychologist.

§ 4.07(b) Information To Elicit in Preparation for the Probable-Cause Determination

As explained in § 4.28 infra, Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), requires that in any case in which the court orders pretrial detention, the judge must first determine that there is probable-cause to believe that the respondent committed the charged offense. Some jurisdictions provide for a full-scale evidentiary hearing on the issue of probable-cause as part of the Initial Hearing; others provide only that the judge at the Initial Hearing must review the sufficiency of sworn affidavits submitted by the prosecution; still others provide for review of affidavits and similar documents at the Initial Hearing and convene an evidentiary probable-cause hearing some days later. See §§ 4.01 supra, 4.28(b) infra.

If counsel is practicing in a jurisdiction in which evidentiary probable-cause hearings are held as part of the Initial Hearing and if the case is one in which the respondent may be detained, counsel will need to prepare for the Hearing by interviewing the client about the facts of the offense. Such an interview should generally follow the format for fact interviews described in § 5.06 infra, although that format should be adjusted to the limited time available for a pre-hearing interview and the limited functions of a probable-cause hearing. For example, since counsel ordinarily will not be calling defense witnesses at a probable-cause hearing, counsel should not waste valuable time by eliciting the addresses and phone numbers of potential defense witnesses. Rather, counsel should focus on facts that can be used in cross-examining any complainant, police officer, or eyewitness who is likely to be called by the prosecutor. Thus counsel’s interview might cover, for example, biases on the part of the complainant that might cause him or her to lie or deficiencies in lighting that might have led to an error in eyewitness identification.

If counsel is practicing in a jurisdiction in which the probable-cause determination at Initial Hearing is made solely on the basis of affidavits, counsel will not need to use the client interview to prepare for the probable-cause determination. The issue in such a jurisdiction is only whether the affidavits are sufficient to make out probable-cause of every element of the offense, and thus counsel’s argument will be limited to the sufficiency of the documents. However, counsel will still need to conduct at least a skeletal interview concerning the circumstances of the offense in order to gather mitigating facts that can be used in arguing against pretrial detention.
See § 4.07(a)(11) supra.

§ 4.07(c) Other Subjects To Cover in the Initial Interview

For the attorney appointed on the day of Initial Hearing, the pre-hearing interview of the client will be the attorney’s first contact with the client. Accordingly, counsel will need to preface the interview with an introduction of himself or herself and an explanation of the attorney’s function and the attorney-client privilege. See § 5.04 infra.

§ 4.08 INTERVIEW OF THE CLIENT’S PARENT OR GUARDIAN TO GATHER INFORMATION RELEVANT TO THE DETENTION DETERMINATION

In addition to conducting a pre-hearing interview of the client, counsel also will need to interview the client’s parent or guardian. The paramount question to resolve in talking with the client’s parent or guardian is his or her willingness to take the child home in the event that the judge releases the child. As indicated in § 3.21 supra, some parents and guardians initially may be in favor of a brief period of detention, either because they are angry at their children for having been arrested or because they have the misconception that detention will teach the child a needed lesson. As § 3.21 supra explains, it may be necessary to offset the anger or dispel the misconception by telling these parents and guardians about the harsh realities of institutional life and the potentially devastating impact of detention on the likelihood of winning at trial.

Counsel should interview the parent or guardian about the child’s behavior at home, inquiring particularly into: whether the child has a curfew, what that curfew is, and how regularly s/he complies with the curfew; whether there have been any problems with the child running away from home; whether the child has any psychological or substance abuse problems that require immediate attention; whether the parent or guardian has received adverse reports from the child’s school regarding attendance, behavior, or academic performance; and whether the parent or guardian can recall the nature and disposition of any prior arrests of the child (since the parent/guardian may have a better recollection and understanding of the prior cases than does the child).

Counsel should ascertain from the parent or guardian whether s/he has already been interviewed by the probation officer and, if so, what s/he told the probation officer about each of these aspects of the child’s background and home situation.

Assuming that the parent/guardian is willing to take the child home, counsel should tactfully inquire into the employment of the parent/guardian and any adult relatives who live in the home. If any of these individuals are employed in jobs that are likely to impress the judge with the individual’s responsibility, particularly jobs in law enforcement or the court system, that individual’s promise to watch over the child during the pretrial period and to bring the child to court on the trial date could be decisive in securing release.
Counsel’s interview of the parent or guardian prior to the Initial Hearing will usually be brief because of the limited time available. However, at some point after the hearing, counsel will need to explain to the parent or guardian that counsel represents the child and not the parent or guardian. See §§ 5.03(b), 511 infra; see also § 4.04 supra.

§ 4.09 TELEPHONE CALLS TO MAKE IN PREPARATION FOR THE INITIAL HEARING

In preparing for the detention hearing phase of the Initial Hearing, counsel will need to make the following telephone calls:

1. To the client’s parent or guardian if s/he is not present at court (or to another relative if the parent or guardian cannot be reached or, having been reached, is unable to come to court), to arrange that an adult be present at the Hearing prepared to represent that the parent or guardian is willing to take the client home if released before trial;

2. To another adult relative willing to take the child into his or her home for the period of time until trial if the parent or guardian is unwilling to do so;

3. To the child’s school, to verify a lack of truancy, suspensions, and expulsions;

4. To any employers and counselors named by the child, to verify the facts reported by the child and to elicit favorable descriptions of the child; and

5. If the child is currently on, or was previously on, probation or parole, to the child’s probation or parole officer, in order to: ascertain the child’s adjustment (which counsel can cite in arguing for release); lobby the worker in the event that s/he is consulted by the Intake Probation Officer regarding the probation department’s recommendation for detention; and if the worker has favorable things to say about the respondent, ask the worker to contact the Intake Probation Officer (in the event that the Intake Probation Officer does not seek the worker’s input) and make a pitch to the Intake Probation Officer on the respondent’s behalf.

§ 4.10 EXAMINATION OF THE CHILD’S PRIOR RECORD BEFORE THE INITIAL HEARING

It is essential that counsel examine an accurate compilation of prior charges against the child in advance of the detention hearing phase of an Initial Hearing. As explained in § 4.19 infra, the judge will hear a full recitation of the client’s prior record from the probation officer. If the client has a prior record of convictions or even arrests, that may be the central factor relied upon by the probation officer and prosecutor in asserting that s/he is so dangerous as to require pretrial detention. Counsel’s review of the record prior to the hearing is necessary in order to gather facts and construct arguments to rebut the inference of dangerousness advanced to support these requests for detention. In addition, thorough familiarity with the record may prove to be useful in correcting any factual inaccuracies in or misimpressions conveyed by the probation officer’s recitation of the respondent’s prior record. As explained in § 4.20 infra, the probation officer may describe a prior charge, of which the respondent was acquitted at trial, by simply declaring that that charge was “dismissed.” It is clearly in the respondent’s interest for defense counsel to amplify that kind of ambiguous description and let the judge know that there was an acquittal at trial and not merely a dismissal on a technicality. Moreover, occasionally the probation officer who appears in court may not have the most current information about the respondent’s charges; and counsel may, for example, need to correct the probation officer’s characterization of a charge as still pending by explaining that that charge was recently withdrawn by the prosecution for lack of evidence.

In most jurisdictions the most up-to-date compilation of a juvenile’s prior record will be found in the juvenile court clerk’s office. Because juvenile files are not public records, the clerk may be resistant to counsel’s examination of the prior records of the client. Counsel should insist on seeing the records, explaining that access to these records is essential to counsel’s preparation for the detention hearing and therefore required by the child’s Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel. If necessary, counsel should obtain an order from the judge permitting access to the records.

§ 4.11 ASCERTAINING THE POSITIONS OF THE PROBATION OFFICER AND PROSECUTOR, AND LOBBYING TO CHANGE UNFAVORABLE POSITIONS

In the detention hearing phase of the Initial Hearing, a probation officer will report on the child’s prior record and background and will make a recommendation regarding the appropriateness of release. See § 4.19 infra. The probation officer’s report will be based on court records and an interview of the respondent. The interview may or may not have been conducted by the probation officer who will appear in court. Some jurisdictions divide the Probation Office into different units, with certain units interviewing all new arrestees and other units appearing in court and relating the facts gathered by the interviewers. If a child is already on probation, the courtroom probation officer will usually rely on a report from the child’s current probation officer.

It is advisable for counsel to consult the courtroom probation officer before the Initial Hearing in order to elicit any facts about the respondent’s background that counsel does not already know, to ascertain the recommendation that the probation officer intends to make regarding the need for detention, and, if that recommendation is unfavorable, to gently lobby the probation officer regarding release. Most probation officers will be amenable to such discussions with counsel if the attorney is polite and deferential to the probation officer’s greater experience in working directly with children. If counsel can learn the precise motivations of the probation officer, then counsel may be able to propose alternatives to detention that will address the probation officer’s concerns. For example, if the probation officer is primarily concerned about the respondent’s disobedience of a curfew set by the parent, s/he may be amenable to counsel’s suggestion that the respondent be released with a curfew set – and enforced – by the court.

If the courtroom probation officer resists counsel’s arguments and if there is a probation officer who has had greater contact with the respondent than the courtroom probation officer – for example, in cases in which the respondent is already on probation for another offense or in which the courtroom probation officer is relying on an interview by a different probation officer – it may prove fruitful to contact that other probation officer and engage his or her assistance in lobbying the courtroom probation officer. This must be done very carefully, however, in order to avoid arousing the courtroom probation officer’s ire for seemingly going behind his or her back to enlist the aid of his or her colleagues.

Finally, depending upon the prosecutor who is handling the case, it may be useful to consult the prosecutor as well, eliciting the recommendation that s/he intends to make and possibly lobbying him or her. Some prosecutors adopt an extremely adversarial stance, refusing to divulge information in advance of the hearing; some prosecutors are happy to discuss the matter; still others are guardedly willing to talk, in exchange for an equal amount of information from defense counsel. Here again, it is important to understand the adversary’s motivation and to tailor requests and arguments to address his or her concerns. See § 14.16 infra.

Part D. Arraignment

§ 4.12 NOTIFICATION OF THE CHARGES

The arraignment usually begins with the court advising the respondent of the charges in the Petition. Due process requires that “the child and his parents or guardian be notified, in writing, of the specific charge or factual allegations to be considered at the [trial].” In re Gault, 487 U.S. 1, 33 (1967). In several states notice requirements are also prescribed by statute. See, e.g., In the Matter of Michael M., 3 N.Y.3d 441, 821 N.E.2d 537, 788 N.Y.S.2d 299 (2004).

Usually, at arraignment the clerk of the court or the bailiff hands a copy of the Petition to defense counsel and the respondent or gives counsel an extra copy to give the respondent. Thereafter, most judges read the Petition aloud so as to advise the respondent orally of the charges and then ask the respondent (or defense counsel on behalf of the respondent) whether the respondent understands that these charges have been lodged against him or her. This procedure varies considerably, depending upon the predilections of the particular judge, the age of the child, and the number of cases on the docket for that date. Some judges carefully explain the charges to the child in informal language, especially if the child is very young. In metropolitan jurisdictions with heavy arraignment calendars, many judges employ the shorthand procedure of having counsel waive the formal reading of the Petition aloud, with the understanding that counsel will explain the charges to the child after the hearing has been completed. As long as counsel faithfully fulfills the obligation of explaining the Petition to the child afterwards, there is no reason to refuse to follow local custom in waiving formal reading of the Petition.
Since, technically, the parent/guardian must be advised along with the child, some judges refuse to go forward with an arraignment if the parent or guardian failed to come to court with the child. Usually, there is no reason to resist a continuance, since delay tends to favor the defense. See § 15.01 infra. There may be reasons, however, why counsel will wish to avoid delay in a particular case. If the child has been detained, it is clearly in his or her interest to move forward through all stages of the case as quickly as possible. In addition, some clients who are not detained are anxious to move the proceedings along quickly and end the anxiety of awaiting trial. If counsel has sound reasons for avoiding delay, and the client wishes to go forward without his or her parent or guardian being present, then counsel can inform the court that the child wishes to waive the presence of a parent or guardian. Depending upon the jurisdiction and the particular judge presiding over the arraignment, the judge may simply accept counsel’s representation or may inquire of the child to ensure that the waiver is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. (The client can be prepared for such judicial inquiries by means of a role-play in which counsel plays the role of judge and asks the respondent all of the questions that the judge might ask, such as: “Do you understand that you have the right to have a parent or guardian present during your arraignment on this Petition?” “Do you understand what an arraignment is?” “Do you want to proceed without your parent or guardian being present?” “Have you spoken with your attorney about your decision to proceed without your parent or guardian being present?” “Did your attorney explain to you your right to have your parent or guardian present?” “Do you know where your parent [guardian] is?” “Do you know why s/he is not in court today?” “Why do you want to proceed without your parent or guardian here?”)

§ 4.13 THE RESPONDENT’S ENTRY OF A PLEA

After the respondent has been notified of the charges, the judge will request the respondent’s entry of a plea of “guilty” or “not guilty.” In jurisdictions that strictly observe juvenile court parlance, the question will be framed in terms of an “admission” or “denial” of “acts that, if committed by an adult, would be crimes.”

In all but the most unusual case, counsel will advise the client against entering a plea of “guilty” at this stage of the proceedings. As explained in Chapter 14, a decision to plead guilty requires a complex analysis of the facts of the case and other strategic considerations that counsel will not be in a position to make until after investigation and negotiations with the prosecutor. Nothing is lost by delaying the decision about a guilty plea until counsel and the client are adequately informed, since there will be ample opportunity at later stages of the case to enter a guilty plea if the client so chooses.

The rare case in which counsel might advise a client to plead guilty on the day of arraignment would be one in which counsel’s representation of the child began prior to arraignment and counsel has already had an opportunity to investigate the case and confer at length with the child. Even then, counsel must be cautious about urging a guilty plea at arraignment, since there are likely to be concrete benefits to delaying the guilty plea as long as possible. See §§ 14.15, 14.25 infra.
Counsel should check local procedural rules governing arraignment in juvenile court to make sure that the old common-law procedure for special pleas and demurrers is not followed. Under the common law, such special pleas had to be made prior to the entry of a general plea of guilty or not guilty, and a plea of “not guilty” would waive all special pleas not previously entered. Although this procedure is still followed in adult criminal courts in some States, it is seldom employed in juvenile court.

§ 4.14 SETTING THE TRIAL DATE AND DEADLINES FOR MOTIONS AND SPECIAL DEFENSIVE PLEAS

After the respondent has been advised of the charges and has entered a plea of “not guilty,” some judges proceed immediately to scheduling of the trial. But if this scheduling process takes place prior to the judge’s determination of the respondent’s pretrial detention status, counsel will not be in any position to know what s/he wants in the way of a trial date. Counsel’s preferences regarding the scheduling of the trial will depend almost entirely on the respondent’s detention status: If the client is released pending trial, then counsel will wish as late a trial date as possible in order to thoroughly investigate the case and also to enable the child to amass a relatively lengthy period of good behavior that can be cited at sentencing in the event that the respondent is convicted; if, on the other hand, the respondent is detained pending trial, then counsel will wish as early a trial date as possible to minimize the length of detention.

Accordingly, in all cases other than those in which counsel is fully confident that the child will be released (such as cases of first offenders charged with minor offenses), counsel should respond to a judge’s attempt to set the trial date before determining the child’s detention status by stating respectfully that counsel wishes to defer a setting of a trial date until after the judge has resolved the detention issue. If the judge nevertheless proceeds immediately with scheduling the trial date, counsel should state for the record that s/he may wish to accelerate the trial date in the event that the respondent is detained.

In cases in which the respondent is released pending trial, counsel should insist upon sufficient time to conduct necessary investigation. If the judge attempts to pressure counsel into accepting an early trial date, counsel should invoke the client’s right to effective assistance of counsel and point out that counsel cannot be effective without sufficient time to investigate and prepare the case for trial. Counsel can also note that the Supreme Court expressly recognized in In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), that juveniles, no less than adults, have the right to a “reasonable opportunity to prepare for trial” and sufficient time “in advance of the hearing to permit preparation.” Id. at 33. See § 15.02 infra.

In cases in which the respondent is detained pending trial, counsel will have a much more difficult task gauging the amount of preparation time to request. Although counsel naturally will wish to avoid prolonging the child’s pretrial detention, counsel cannot allow this consideration to eclipse the goal of preparing with sufficient thoroughness to win the case at trial and thereby prevent the far greater loss of liberty that could occur at sentencing. As a general rule, counsel should select the earliest practicable date and seek a continuance later if counsel cannot complete pretrial preparation by that date.

In most jurisdictions, statutes or court rules establish a certain deadline for filing suppression motions, discovery motions, and other defense motions. In addition, many jurisdictions establish a deadline (possibly the same one, possibly earlier or later) for announcing that the defense intends to employ an insanity defense or an alibi defense. See §§ 9.11-9.12 infra. Under most deadlines of this sort, the clock starts ticking at arraignment. For example, counsel may have 15 days from arraignment to file a discovery motion and 30 days from arraignment to file suppression motions and a notice of intention to invoke an alibi defense. If, at arraignment, counsel anticipates that s/he will be unable to comply with the deadlines, s/he should ask the court to extend them for a specified amount of time (whether that be two weeks or a month). Most judges will accede to such requests if counsel has an adequate reason for the extension (such as when counsel will be in trial for most of the time period). For other methods of extending deadlines for motions, see § 7.05 infra.

As noted in § 4.13 supra, counsel will need to consult local practice to make sure that the old common-law procedure of special pleading is not followed. Under that procedure certain “special pleas” – such as objections to jurisdiction and pleas of double jeopardy – had to be made prior to the entry of a general plea of guilty or not guilty at arraignment. Under the procedure usually followed in juvenile court, objections of this sort are raised in pretrial motions. See Chapter 17.

Part E. Pretrial Detention and Bail

§ 4.15 INTRODUCTION: PRETRIAL DETENTION AND BAIL IN JUVENILE COURT

In adult criminal court the vast majority of defendants are either released on recognizance or held subject to release on bail in an amount set by the court. Although the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition against “excessive bail” does not preclude preventive detention pending trial, see United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987), very few adult criminal defendants are, in fact, preventively detained.

The situation is very different in juvenile court. “Every State, as well as the United States in the District of Columbia, permits preventive detention of juveniles accused of crime.” Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 267 (1984); see id. at 267 n.16 (listing statutes). Pretrial detention is used with considerable frequency in some jurisdictions, especially in metropolitan areas.

The majority of jurisdictions have rejected the use of bail in juvenile court. In some of these jurisdictions, statutes expressly prohibit bail for juveniles. See, e.g., HAW. REV. STAT. § 571-32(h) (2018); OR. REV. STAT. § 419C.179 (2018); UTAH CODE ANN. § 78A-6-113(13) (2018) (prohibiting bail except when the juvenile lives out-of-state or when the offense is a traffic violation or certain other minor infractions). In other jurisdictions, in which the juvenile Finally, in several jurisdictions in which the statutes are silent on the issue of bail for juveniles and the appellate courts have never addressed the issue, trial judges simply assume that bail is inapplicable in juvenile court because the juvenile code provides only for detention or release. In roughly one fourth of the States, the juvenile code does allow bail in delinquency cases. See COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 19-2-509 (2018); CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 46b-133(b) (2018); MASS. GEN. LAWS ANN. ch. 119, § 67 (2018); MINN. STAT. ANN. § 260B.176(1) (2018); NEB. REV. STAT. § 43-253(5) (2018); OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 10 A, § 2-2-403(B) (2018); S.D. CODIFIED LAWS § 26-7A-52 (2018); TENN. CODE ANN. §§ 37-1-114(c)(7), 37-1-117(c) (2018); WASH. REV. CODE ANN. §§ 13.40.040(5), 13.40.050(6) (2018); W. VA. CODE § 49-4-706(a) (2018). The nature of these statutory schemes, and particularly the relationship between bail and preventive detention, is discussed in § 4.27(b) infra.

The right to bail for juveniles presently exists exclusively as a creature of statute. Although a constitutional right to bail for juveniles has in the past been founded upon a construction of the Eighth Amendment as guaranteeing bail for all persons regardless of age (Trimble v. Stone, 187 F. Supp. 483 (D. D.C. 1960); but see Fulwood v. Stone, 394 F.2d 939, 943 & n.13 (D.C. Cir. 1967)) and a construction of the Due Process Clause as requiring bail to preserve the presumption of innocence (State in the Interest of Banks, 402 So. 2d 690, 694-95 (La. 1981)), the Supreme Court in United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. at 752-55, held that the Eighth Amendment does not guarantee a right to bail for all persons charged with criminal offenses, and the Court in Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. at 272-74, rejected the argument that preventive detention of juveniles is per se a violation of due process. The state courts are, of course, free to construe state constitutional provisions differently from their federal counterparts, see § 7.09 infra, and some state constitutional provisions concerning bail would naturally lend themselves to more protective constructions because they expressly guarantee a right to bail whereas the Eighth Amendment does nothing more than prohibit “excessive bail.” However, the state courts thus far have proven unwilling to construe state constitutional bail provisions (including provisions establishing an apparently universal right to bail) as applicable to juveniles. See L.O.W. v. District Court, 623 P.2d 1253, 1258-59 (Colo. 1981); Morris v. D’Amario, 416 A.2d 137, 139-40 (R.I. 1980); Baker v. Smith, 477 S.W.2d 149 (Ky. 1971).

The standards for pretrial detention are discussed in § 4.17 infra. The criteria governing the awarding of bail in those jurisdictions that permit bail for juveniles are discussed in § 4.27 infra.
§ 4.16 THE FUNDAMENTAL IMPORTANCE OF SECURING THE CHILD’S RELEASE AT THE DETENTION HEARING

It is essential that counsel prepare carefully for the detention hearing, since its outcome can have a decisive impact on the entire case. As the empirical evidence suggests, and as trial lawyers can attest from personal experience, pretrial detention significantly increases the likelihood of conviction at trial and incarceration at sentencing. See Stevens H. Clarke & Gary Koch, Juvenile Court: Therapy or Crime Control, and Do Lawyers Make a Difference, 14 Law & Soc’y Rev. 263, 293-94 (1980); Patricia Wald, Pretrial Detention and Ultimate Freedom: A Statistical Study, 39 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 631 (1964). One explanation for this phenomenon is that the incarceration of the accused prevents him or her from assisting defense counsel in finding witnesses and preparing the case for trial. Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 533 & n.35 (1972); Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 297 & n.24 (1984) (Marshall, J., dissenting); Kinney v. Lenon, 425 F.2d 209 (9th Cir. 1970). Other factors may include “[c]onditions of confinement . . . that are so harsh or intolerable as to induce [the accused] to plead guilty, or that damage his appearance or mental alertness at trial.” United States v. Edwards, 430 A.2d 1321, 1355 (D.C. 1981) (Ferren, J., concurring and dissenting). Finally, the increased likelihood of conviction at trial may be attributed in part to the psychological impact of detention on the finder of fact, who is, in most jurisdictions, a judge. Since judges are well aware that detention is most often ordered because of a significant prior criminal record, the judge is likely to presume that a juvenile who has been detained pending trial has a prior record, and this presumption may in turn render the judge more willing to conclude that the respondent is guilty of the present charge. The greater likelihood of incarceration at sentencing may be attributed in part to the fact that the respondent, unlike children who were released before trial, cannot point to recent evidence of ability to adjust in the community.

Detention is also a crucial issue because of its potentially devastating impact on the child’s development. As Judge Patricia Wald of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has observed, juvenile detainees are “[o]ften brutalized” and a young detainee “may be sodomized within a matter of hours.” Patricia M. Wald, Pretrial Detention for Juveniles, in Pursuing Justice for the Child 119 (Margaret K. Rosenheim, ed., 1976); see also D.B. v. Tewksbury, 545 F. Supp. 896, 903 (D. Or. 1982); Douglas E. Abrams, Reforming Juvenile Delinquency Treatment to Enhance Rehabilitation, Personal Accountability, and Public Safety, 84 Or. L. Rev. 1001 (2005). In addition, detained juveniles are “demoralized by lack of activities and trained staff. . . . Over half the facilities in which juveniles are held have no psychiatric or social work staff. A fourth have no school program.” Wald, supra at 119. Finally, as Justice Marshall has pointed out, “the impressionability of juveniles may make the experience of incarceration more injurious to them than to adults; all too quickly juveniles subjected to preventive detention come to see society at large as hostile and oppressive and to regard themselves as irremediably ‘delinquent.’” Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. at 291 (Marshall, J., dissenting) (footnote omitted)

§ 4.17 STATUTORY AND CASELAW STANDARDS FOR THE DETENTION DETERMINATION

In most jurisdictions the juvenile code contains a statutory provision requiring that a detention hearing be held within a specified period of time following arrest. See, e.g., ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. ch. 705, § 405/5-415(1) (2018) (40 hours excluding weekends and holidays); IND. CODE ANN. § 31-37-6-2 (2018) (within 48 hours excluding weekends and holidays); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 307.4(5) (2018) (within 72 hours “or the next day the court is in session, whichever is sooner”); W. VA. CODE § 49-5-8(c)(4), (d) (2018) (“In no event may any delay in presenting the juvenile for a detention hearing exceed the next day after he or she is taken into custody.”). See also JV-111701 v. Superior Court In and For County of Maricopa, 163 Ariz. 147, 149-52, 786 P.2d 998, 1000-03 (Ariz. App. 1989) (juvenile court rule providing for initial hearing within 24 hours violated the Equal Protection Clause by excluding weekends and holidays from calculation of the 24-hour period while the parallel rule for adult criminal defendants included weekends and holidays within the 24-hour period for bringing an adult arrestee before a magistrate). Such detention hearings are ordinarily conducted as nonevidentiary arguments by the attorneys. See § 4.19 infra. However, in some jurisdictions, the factual statements made in support of detention must be in the form of sworn testimony. See, e.g., Doe v. State, 487 P.2d 47, 53 (Alaska 1971); In re Luis M., 180 Cal. App. 3d 1090, 1094, 226 Cal. Rptr. 39, 41 (1986) (respondent who is detained can request a detention rehearing, at which s/he can confront and cross-examine the authors of reports relied upon to justify detention).

The substantive standard employed in most jurisdictions authorizes detention in cases in which: (i) there is a substantial probability that the respondent will flee the jurisdiction to avoid trial; or (ii) there is a serious risk that the respondent will be a danger to others by committing further crimes before the trial date. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 320.5(3) (2018). Some jurisdictions add to this list an imminent risk that the respondent will be a danger to himself or herself by attempting suicide or other seriously self-destructive behavior. See, e.g., D.C. SUPER. CT. JUV. RULE 106(a)(3)(iii)-(iv) (2018).

In assessing whether there is a risk of flight, the courts generally will consider: whether the respondent has failed to appear for court proceedings in prior cases; whether the respondent has a stable address where s/he can be reached by the court if necessary, and the length of time that the child and his or her family have been living at this or another stable address; and whether there is an adult – whether parent, guardian, or adult sibling – who can take responsibility for ensuring that the child will return to court on the correct date. In the case of children who live out-of-state, the courts are generally more prone to assign a higher risk that the child will fail to return although, in fact, there is no reason to treat these cases differently from those of local children as long as there is a responsible adult who will ensure the child’s return to the jurisdiction. Some judges also consider a history of running away from home as relevant to the risk of flight, although such indicia of problems in the child’s relationship with his or her parents should not control the resolution of the very different question of the likelihood of the child’s complying with a court order.
In predicting whether the child is likely to commit future crimes if released, the courts generally consider a host of factors, including:

- the nature and seriousness of the charges; whether the charges are likely to be proved at trial; the juvenile’s prior record; the adequacy and effectiveness of his home supervision; his school situation, if known; the time of day of the alleged crime as evidence of its seriousness and a possible lack of parental control; and any special circumstances that might be brought to [the judge’s] attention by the probation officer, the child’s attorney, or any parents, relatives, or other responsible person accompanying the child.

_Schall v. Martin_, 467 U.S. 253, 279 (1984) (describing the factors generally relied upon by Family Court judges in New York City). In authorizing consideration of other crimes of the respondent, the detention standards of some jurisdictions carefully distinguish between crimes against the person and crimes against property, limiting the judge’s consideration of other crimes against property to crimes involving “serious loss or damage,” D.C. SUPER. CT. JUV. RULE 106(a)(2)(iii) (2018), or property “offense[s] constituting a felony.” _Tenn. Code Ann._ § 37-1-114(c)(2) (2018).

In some jurisdictions the juvenile code not only sets forth a substantive standard for the detention decision but also specifies that an order of detention must be supported by a finding that there is an “immediate and urgent necessity” for detention. _See, e.g., Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code_ § 636(a) (2018); _Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann._ ch. 705, § 405/5-501 (2018); _Neb. Rev. Stat._ § 43-253(5) (2018). In such a jurisdiction counsel can argue that the statute requires that the prosecution make a two-part showing to justify detention. First, the prosecution must show that detention is justified under the governing substantive criterion of risk of flight or dangerousness. Second, the prosecution must show that this risk of flight or dangerousness is so grave as to give rise to an “immediate and urgent necessity” for detention.

In many States the detention statute or caselaw limits detention to those cases in which there is no less restrictive alternative. _See, e.g., Doe v. State_, 487 P.2d 47, 53 (Alaska 1971); _Commonwealth ex rel. Sprowal v. Hendricks_, 438 Pa. 435, 265 A.2d 348 (1970); _State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder_, 317 S.E.2d 150, 156-57 (W. Va. 1984); _Tenn. Code Ann._ § 37-1-114(c)(7) (2018). Counsel should stress this requirement and argue against detention on the ground that less restrictive measures (such as home detention, daily telephone calls to a probation officer, or, if necessary, placement in a group home) would be sufficient to guard against the risks identified by the prosecutor.

Many States specify that children below a certain age (usually designated as age ten) cannot be placed in a secure detention facility. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 304.1(3) (2018). See State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder, 317 S.E.2d 150, 157 & n.19 (W. Va. 1984) (listing the statutory minimum age limits of several States). Even in jurisdictions that lack such a statutory age limit, most judges are extremely reluctant to place a very young child in detention and will do so only if the charged offense is heinous. If detention of a young child is necessitated by the parent’s unwillingness to take the child home, the judge usually will place that child in a group home rather than a secure detention facility.

§ 4.18 POSSIBLE PLACES OF DETENTION

Knowledge of the types of juvenile detention facilities that are commonly employed by the court are important for several reasons. First and most fundamentally, that knowledge enables counsel to formulate requests for alternatives to detention in a secure facility. Familiarity with the services and programs provided at the various detention facilities will furthermore enable counsel to argue that detention is inappropriate in cases in which a facility cannot attend to the child’s special educational or psychological needs. Familiarity with private group homes and community-based programs will make it possible to quickly construct alternatives to pretrial detention.

Most jurisdictions provide for two forms of detention: “secure detention” and “shelter care” (called “non-secure detention” in some jurisdictions).

“Secure detention” means, in most states, placement in a penal-type facility for juveniles. These facilities may differ from adult penal institutions in that they may provide “educational and recreational programs and counseling sessions run by trained social workers.” Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 271 (1984) (describing New York City’s Spofford Juvenile Center). However, notwithstanding the existence of such programs, “secure detention entails incarceration in a facility closely resembling a jail . . . [in which] the detainee suffers stigmatization and severe limitation of his freedom of movement.” Id. at 290-91 (Marshall, J., dissenting) (also describing Spofford). In addition, despite the existence of programs, a juvenile detainee may be physically and psychologically damaged by sexual assaults by other inmates. See id. at 290; Patricia M. Wald, Pretrial Detention for Juveniles, in PURSUING JUSTICE FOR THE CHILD 119 (Margaret K. Rosenheim, ed., 1976). Finally, there is reason to doubt the adequacy of the educational and counseling programs provided at many of these detention facilities. See Wald, supra at 119.

A “shelter house” or “non-secure detention facility” has been described as “an open facility in the community, a sort of ‘halfway house,’ without locks, bars, or security officers where the child receives schooling and counseling and has access to recreational facilities.” Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. at 271 (describing New York City’s non-secure detention facilities). Children detained in these shelter houses attend school in the community, either the school they attended prior to detention or the school closest to the shelter house. Most of the facilities are “secure” in the sense that the children are locked in the shelter at night, and their activities during the day are carefully monitored.
Several jurisdictions have a system of “home detention” as an alternative to placement in a detention facility. Children placed in “home detention” live at home and attend their usual school, but their activities are monitored by a home detention worker, who regularly checks with the school and the child’s parent or guardian. Home detention is usually reserved for children who have been charged with relatively minor offenses and have a limited prior record.

Some States permit pretrial detention of juveniles in adult facilities in regions of the State in which there is no juvenile detention facility or in which the juvenile facilities that do exist are too small to house the entire population of pretrial detainees. See, e.g., MONT. CODE ANN. § 41-5-349 (2018); N.D. CENTURY CODE ANN. § 27-20-16(1)(e) (2018). When authorizing placement of juveniles in adult jails, statutes of this sort usually require that juveniles be placed in a division of the jail “separate and removed from those for adults.” N.D. CENTURY CODE ANN. § 27-20-16(1)(e) (2018). However, tragic cases of physical and sexual abuse of children placed in adult jails (see, e.g., Doe v. Burwell, 537 F. Supp. 186 (S.D. Ohio 1982); see also Cox v. Turley, 506 F.2d 1347, 1350-53 (6th Cir. 1974); AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL, BETRAYING THE YOUNG: HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS AGAINST CHILDREN IN THE U.S. JUSTICE SYSTEM 37-39 (November 1998); AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION STEERING COMMITTEE ON THE UNMET LEGAL NEEDS OF CHILDREN, AMERICA’S CHILDREN STILL AT RISK 265-67 (2001)) have led some States to flatly prohibit placement of children in adult jails, see, e.g., Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 211.151(2), (4) (2018); OHIO RULE JUV. PROC. 7(H) (2018); PA. CONS. STAT. ANN. tit. 42, § 6327(a), (c) (2018); see also Official Comment to PA. CONS. STAT. ANN. tit. 42, § 6327 (2018) (quoting Uniform Juvenile Act’s explanation that such prohibitions “‘are designed to avoid the harm resulting from exposing children to adult criminals and the degrading effect of jails, lockups, and the like’”), and has led to federal legislation requiring that States receiving funds under the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act refrain from placing juveniles in adult jails and lockups except for brief periods of up to 48 hours (excluding weekends and holidays) pending an initial court appearance. See 34 U.S.C. § 11133(a)(13)(B) (2018). The practice of placing juvenile pretrial detainees in adult jails has also been found to be “fundamentally unfair” in violation of due process, in that the juvenile court’s invocation of the parens patriae rationale to deny the normal procedural rights accorded to adult criminals necessitates a corresponding parental “solicitude” in the choice of where to detain the child pending trial. D.B. v. Tewksbury, 545 F. Supp. 896, 906-07 (D. Or. 1982).

§ 4.19 THE DETENTION HEARING: PROCEDURE

Although practice varies somewhat among jurisdictions, most juvenile courts adhere, more or less, to the same general procedure for detention hearings.

The hearing usually commences with an oral report by a probation officer, covering: the respondent’s record of prior and pending cases; prior incidents of failure to appear for court proceedings; whether the respondent is presently on probation or parole and, if so, how the respondent’s current probation or parole officer describes the respondent’s adjustment; regularity of attendance at school, incidents of suspension or expulsion, and possibly whether the respondent is failing one or more classes; whether the parent or guardian has any complaints about the child’s behavior at home or the child’s compliance with the curfew set by the parent/guardian; and whether the child has any psychological or substance abuse problems. The probation officer concludes by making a recommendation regarding the appropriateness of detention and, if s/he recommends detention, the appropriate level of detention. (For discussion of the possible levels of detention, see § 4.18 supra.)

During the probation officer’s recitation or at its conclusion, the judge may ask for clarification of aspects of the report or for more details. The prosecutor or defense counsel also can seek clarification or additional details by asking the judge to question the probation officer or, in courts following a less formal procedure, by asking the probation officer directly. However, counsel should be wary of asking for clarification or further details; unless counsel has good reason to believe that the answer will be favorable, counsel should avoid the risk of eliciting unfavorable information.

If the probation recommendation is for release, the judge will usually move quickly, summarily asking the prosecutor whether s/he agrees with the recommendation. Assuming that the prosecutor concurs, the judge will order release and move on to the scheduling of the trial.

If the probation officer recommends detention or if the prosecutor objects to a probationary recommendation of release, the prosecutor will address the court next. The prosecutor is likely to highlight any negative facts described by the probation officer and to supplement those facts with a description of any aggravating aspects of the current offense or prior offenses of the respondent. The prosecutor will conclude by making his or her recommendation regarding the need for detention and the appropriate level of detention.

The judge then will turn to defense counsel. Defensive arguments are described in § 4.21 infra.

Most judges rule at the conclusion of defense counsel’s presentation, although some judges allow the prosecutor and defense attorney to engage in reply and rebuttal arguments. Some judges address questions to the parent/guardian, asking whether s/he is willing to take the child home, whether there are problems in the child’s behavior at home, and whether the parent/guardian is willing to take responsibility for ensuring that the child will return to court on the correct date. Some judges address the respondent directly, asking him or her whether s/he will behave and attend school if released. (Although technically, defense counsel can object to a judge questioning the respondent directly rather than through counsel, it is not advisable to do so if counsel is confident that the questions are harmless and that a judicial colloquy with the child may turn the tide in favor of release.)

§ 4.20 PREVENTING OR OBJECTING TO ANY MENTION OF PRIOR CHARGES THAT HAVE BEEN NOLLED, DISMISSED, OR SEALED
In many jurisdictions the probation officer’s recitation of prior charges of the respondent includes a variety of dismissed charges such as: cases in which the respondent was arrested but the prosecutor elected not to bring charges (an exercise of prosecutorial discretion known in some jurisdictions as “no-papering” or “NPD” (“No Petition Drawn”)); cases in which the respondent was charged by the prosecution, but the prosecutor subsequently withdrew the charges because of lack of prosecutorial merit or witness reluctance or any of a host of other reasons (a process called, depending upon the jurisdiction, “withdrawing the Petition,” “entering a nolle prosequi,” or simply “dismissal by the prosecution”); cases in which the respondent successfully completed a period of diversion and the case subsequently was sealed (see Chapter 19); cases dismissed as part of a plea bargain; and cases that resulted in acquittal at trial. The common practice in reciting the existence of such a dismissed case is for the probation officer to declare ambiguously that the case was “dismissed after arrest.”

This practice is highly prejudicial to the respondent, since some judges subscribe to the maxim that “where there’s smoke, there’s fire.” A judge may erroneously believe (either consciously or unconsciously) that a crime was dismissed for technicalities and was actually committed by the respondent when, in fact, the ubiquitous characterization of “dismissal” is concealing an acquittal at trial or a withdrawal of the case because the prosecutor determined that the wrong child was arrested.

Accordingly, when practicing in jurisdictions in which probation officers recite dismissed charges, counsel should routinely request at the beginning of every detention hearing that the court bar any mention of dismissed cases. Counsel should argue that those cases are irrelevant because they are not probative on the issue of the respondent’s character and future dangerousness. Cf. In the Matter of Moe v. New York City Department of Probation, 133 Misc.2d 98, 102, 506 N.Y.S.2d 830, 833 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1986), aff’d, 72 N.Y.2d 662, 532 N.E.2d 1254, 536 N.Y.S.2d 26 (1988) (prohibiting inclusion of “arrests which were favorably terminated” in juvenile pre-sentencing reports because that “information is not material or relevant as to petitioner’s character”). The inevitable response to this request will be a rejoinder (on the part of either the prosecutor or the judge) that juvenile court procedure presumes the judge’s ability to ignore irrelevant and even prejudicial matters in making a decision. Counsel should preempt that argument by pointing out that if the judge intends to ignore such information, then there can be no legitimate justification for the probation office’s even relating it.

Attorneys who practice frequently in juvenile court are well-advised to obtain a dispositive ruling from the bench and then seek the probation office’s establishment of a policy precluding the practice of reciting dismissed charges. The inadequacy of raising the issue case-by-case is that even if the judge excludes prior dismissed charges, s/he has been alerted that charges of this sort exist in the respondent’s record. Nor can counsel solve this problem by making the request routinely in every case, including cases in which the respondent has no prior arrests, since the attorney’s ethical obligations to the first-offenders prohibit jeopardizing their position by causing the judge to believe that they, too, have sealed or dismissed cases in their background.
§ 4.21 DEFENSE ARGUMENTS FOR RELEASE OF THE RESPONDENT

In framing arguments for release, counsel must decide initially whether it is in the respondent’s interest to distinguish between factors relating to risk of flight and factors relating to future dangerousness. Most probation officers and prosecutors fail to make this distinction and instead indiscriminately rattle off a roster of the child’s failings without identifying whether the listed problems relate to flight or dangerousness. In certain cases the defense position will be improved by pointing out the distinction. For example, if it is evident that the probation officer and prosecutor are seeking detention solely to curb the risk of flight, then counsel can point out that the respondent’s criminal record and behavior problems at school are irrelevant to the stated reason for detention. Even if the probation officer and prosecutor are proceeding on both grounds, distinguishing the grounds is beneficial if the argument for detention is weak on each ground and increases in strength only through the mixing of factors. Conversely, if the case for detention is strong on both grounds, and the favorable points that can be cited by counsel relate only to one ground, it is in the respondent’s interest to leave the muddle unclarified and argue that the favorable points outweigh the reasons for detention.

§ 4.21(a) Arguments Relating to the “Risk of Flight”

In arguing that there is no significant risk of flight, counsel should stress any of the following factors that are applicable, arguing that these factors indicate that the respondent will appear for trial:

1. The way the respondent was arrested was that s/he went to the police station and surrendered, and this fact demonstrates that the respondent has no desire to flee or avoid responsibility for the offense.

2. Upon being released initially by the police or the detention facility, the respondent thereafter responsibly came to court for the detention hearing.

3. The respondent has reliably appeared for any prior proceedings in the case or any prior meetings with the probation intake officer.

4. The respondent has no history of prior failures to appear in any court cases. (If the respondent has a lengthy record, counsel can turn it to the defense’s advantage by pointing out that in all of the prior cases, the client consistently appeared for trial rather than fleeing.)

5. The respondent and his or her family have a stable address in the community, where they have lived for a significant period of time, and there is no reason to believe that the child would flee his or her only means of support.

6. The parent/guardian is willing to take responsibility for ensuring the child’s return on the trial date.

7. The regularity of the child’s school attendance and/or regularity of appearances for probation or parole meetings demonstrates the child’s compliance with officially imposed obligations.

If the respondent does have a history of prior failures to appear, and the probation officer or prosecutor brings up this devastating fact, counsel will need to either give an explanation for the failures to appear (assuming that counsel has learned from the client that s/he had a legitimate reason for missing those court appearances) or else minimize their impact (by pointing out, for example, that the failures to appear happened a long time ago when the respondent was much younger and less mature than s/he is now; and/or that the respondent was living with an irresponsible parent or guardian at the time and is now living with a more responsible adult relative).

§ 4.21(b) Arguments Relating to Future Dangerousness

In urging that the factors cited by the probation officer or prosecutor do not warrant a finding that the respondent is so dangerous as to require detention, counsel can make the following arguments.

§ 4.21(b)(1) Arguments Concerning the Prior Record of the Child

If the child has no prior record of convictions or arrests, this is by far the most compelling defense argument and should be stressed by counsel. Counsel should point out that the lack of any prior record proves that the instant offense, even if committed by the respondent, was an isolated event, and there is no basis for predicting future dangerousness. See, e.g., In re M.L.DeJ., 310 A.2d 834, 836 (D.C. 1973) (“the nature and circumstances of the pending charge[ ] standing alone, . . . would not constitute sufficient grounds for detention”). If the respondent does have a prior record (and if counsel has been unable to exclude mention of the prior charges, see § 4.20 supra), then counsel should characterize the record in whatever way is most favorable. For example, counsel can make any of the following arguments in appropriate cases: Although the child has prior charges or pending charges or both, there have been no convictions, and the child must be presumed innocent of what are merely allegations; although the respondent does have prior convictions, these convictions happened a long time ago (pointing out that a year is a significant period of time developmentally in a child’s life), and there have been no new arrests (or, if there have been arrests, no new convictions) since that time; although there are prior or pending charges, there are mitigating aspects of these offenses (for example, the respondent was a passive follower in a crime committed by older children or the offense was a minor property offense or both).

§ 4.21(b)(2) Arguments Concerning the School Performance of the Child
If the respondent is attending school regularly but the probation officer or prosecutor stresses that s/he is failing classes, counsel can respond that academic failure merely shows the need for a more appropriate school placement, and possibly a special educational placement, but does not relate to either risk of flight or dangerousness. If the problem described by the probation officer or prosecutor is truancy, similar arguments can be made, but most judges regard truancy as relevant to dangerousness, since they view truants as “problem children” with a poor prognosis for their future conduct. This view can be rebutted, however, if counsel can explain the truancy as linked to a legitimate problem that can be corrected. For example, if the respondent has been avoiding school because of the embarrassment of being unable to keep up with the academic material, counsel can explain this problem to the judge and furthermore explain that counsel will talk with the special education teachers at the school to find the child a more appropriate school placement. Similarly, if the respondent has been staying away from school because s/he has been left back so many times that s/he is now in a class with children who are much younger and physically smaller, counsel can make a commitment to explore “alternative school” programs for adolescents. In discussing the educational deficits of the child, counsel should, whenever possible, avoid stating these problems in open court and embarrassing the child further; the best course is to ask leave to approach the bench to discuss a sensitive issue.

§ 4.21(b)(3) Arguments Concerning Curfew

If the probation officer or prosecutor stresses the inappropriately late curfew set by the parent or guardian, counsel can simply suggest that the court set an earlier curfew to be enforced by the parent or guardian. If the curfew problem described by the probation officer or prosecutor is that the child has not been complying with a reasonable curfew set by the parent or guardian, counsel can respond that the inevitable resistance to parental authority can be remedied by the court imposing a curfew, with the parent or guardian directed to report any violations of the court-imposed curfew.

§ 4.21(b)(4) Arguments Concerning Psychological or Substance Abuse Problems

If the probation officer or prosecutor predicates the request for detention wholly or in part upon psychological or substance abuse problems of the child, counsel can respond that these problems can and will be adequately remedied through community-based programs if the child is released. Counsel can significantly enhance the persuasiveness of this argument if s/he can relate that s/he has already telephoned an appropriate program prior to the hearing and obtained the program’s commitment to promptly interview the client for admission.

§ 4.21(c) Arguments Relating to the Respondent’s Danger to Himself or Herself

As mentioned in § 4.17 supra, danger to self is listed as a basis for detention in some state statutes and court rules. In jurisdictions that list only risk of flight and danger to others as predicates for detention, see, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 320.5(3) (2018), counsel should object to any judicial reliance on the detainee’s danger to self as a reason for detention, pointing out that the legislature established an exclusive list of permissible bases for detention.

In jurisdictions that do authorize detention on the basis of the child’s danger to self, counsel should argue that detention and placement in a facility for delinquents is not an appropriate solution to mental problems and, indeed, is likely to exacerbate those problems. Counsel should point out that the particular problem highlighted by the probation officer or prosecutor can be addressed in a community-based program, and counsel should commit himself or herself to finding an appropriate program for the child. (Preferably, counsel will already have made the necessary phone calls, in which case counsel can notify the court that the child already has an admissions interview scheduled.)

§ 4.21(d) Arguments Applicable to All of the Bases for Detention

§ 4.21(d)(1) Arguments Citing Aspects of the Child’s Life That Have Changed or Will Change in the Near Future

As the previous sections have indicated, prosecutorial reliance on problematic aspects of the child’s life or behavior can be rebutted by pointing out that the underlying cause of the problems has been remedied already or will be remedied in the immediate future. There are a host of arguments of this sort that can be made. If the respondent is charged with being an accomplice to a crime by an older youth or adult and that older youth or adult has been detained pending trial, counsel can argue that the primary bad influence on the respondent is now gone. If the respondent’s delinquent behavior or self-destructive behavior stems in part from parental neglect or abuse, it will be persuasive to point out that the respondent henceforth will be living with a grandparent or other relative. And, if the respondent’s criminal conduct can be linked in part to his or her belonging to a neighborhood gang, it will be significant that the relative whose house s/he is moving into lives in a distant region.

§ 4.21(d)(2) Arguments Based upon the Inappropriateness of the Detention Facilities for the Particular Respondent

As explained in § 4.18 supra, a knowledge of the services offered at the various detention facilities can be a powerful tool in the hands of a defense attorney. If counsel can point to specific rehabilitative needs of the child – such as special educational or psychological needs – and is sufficiently familiar with the facilities to know that they lack such services, counsel probably can derail an otherwise certain rush to detain. If counsel knows that the facilities house only (or mostly) children above a certain age, s/he can argue that a respondent who is much younger than that age would be in danger of assaults by other inmates if detained. In jurisdictions that detain children in adult jails (see § 4.18 supra), it is often worthwhile to inform the court that such practices have been prohibited in other jurisdictions because of the grave danger to the child’s physical and mental health.

§ 4.21(d)(3) Argument That Detention of the Respondent Would Unfairly Impede Counsel’s Pretrial Investigation of the Case
Whenever an individual is “locked up, he is hindered in his ability to gather evidence, contact witnesses, or otherwise prepare his defense.” Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 533 (1972). See also Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 297 & n.24 (1984) (Marshall, J., dissenting). This general effect on pretrial preparation could be cited in support of release in every case, but a mere generalized argument will usually be unpersuasive. In cases in which counsel can make a particularized showing that the respondent’s liberty is crucial to defense investigation of the case, this sort of showing may prove decisive in effecting pretrial release. Thus in Kinney v. Lenon, 425 F.2d 209 (9th Cir. 1970), the court held that a trial court’s “failure to permit [the juvenile respondent’s] . . . release for the purpose of aiding the preparation of his defense unconstitutionally interfered with his due-process right to a fair trial” (id. at 210) because there had been a “strong showing” (id.) that the respondent was the only person who could track down defense witnesses. The respondent in Kinney, charged with assault and battery for a schoolyard fight, had “allege[d] that there were many potential witnesses to the fight, that he cannot identify them by name but would recognize them by sight, that [the defense] . . . attorneys are white though he and the potential witnesses are black, that his attorneys would consequently have great practical difficulty in interviewing and lining up witnesses, and that [the respondent] . . . is the only person who can do so.” Id. This showing was found sufficient to compel release even in the face of the prosecution’s assertion of “previous instances of harassment of the state’s witnesses.” Id.

In making a showing of specific need for the respondent’s assistance in pretrial investigation, counsel should be careful to avoid giving the prosecutor discovery of the defense case. When it is necessary to cite details of the proposed defense, counsel should seek leave of the court to make an ex parte proffer. See §§ 11.03(b), 16.04 infra.

§ 4.21(e)  Fallback Requests for a Result Short of Outright Release

If it becomes clear to counsel that the judge will not entertain the possibility of outright release of the respondent, then counsel will have to propose an alternative in order to avoid the drastic consequence of detention in a secure facility. Depending upon local facilities and practices, counsel will wish to consider the following alternatives in the following order:

1. Home detention (see § 4.18 supra);

2. Bail;

3. Home detention during the week to enable the child to attend school, combined with weekends in a shelter house (or, if necessary, in a secure detention facility) so that the judge can be confident that the child’s conduct is monitored on weekends;

4. Full-time detention in a private group home willing to accept the child (assuming that the level of care and the degree of liberty in such a private facility make it preferable to a state-administered shelter house);

5. Detention in a shelter house (see § 4.18 supra);

6. Detention in a secure facility combined with school release or work release or both.

In some jurisdictions counsel also can employ the fallback argument that the judge should leave the determination of level of detention to the administrative agency in charge of detention. Obviously, counsel will resort to such an approach only when s/he has good reason to believe that the agency is likely to be more lenient than the judge in selecting the site of detention. In cases in which counsel elects this option, counsel can argue to the judge that the agency can gather more facts about the child and/or has the social work expertise to assess the most appropriate place of detention.

In going to any of these fallback arguments, the most difficult issue is timing. If counsel proposes the fallback alternative too soon, the judge may seize upon it as a compromise solution even though s/he would have ordered release in the end. Conversely, if counsel waits too long, the judge may fix upon secure detention, convince himself or herself of the correctness of that result, and then be unwilling to consider counsel’s fallback proposals. There are no fixed rules that can be set forth to handle the timing issue. Counsel must listen carefully to the judge’s rejoinders to counsel’s and the prosecutor’s arguments and deduce the way the judge is leaning and his or her degree of flexibility at each point in the arguments.

§ 4.22 USING THE PROBABLE-CAUSE HEARING TO PREVENT DETENTION

Under Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), it is a prerequisite for detention that the State show that there is probable-cause to believe that a crime was committed and that the respondent was the perpetrator. See § 4.28(a) infra. Some States provide for an evidentiary hearing on probable-cause as part of the Initial Hearing whenever the judge is inclined to detain the respondent; other States provide for a determination of probable-cause at Initial Hearing on the basis of affidavits and may also provide for a second determination of probable-cause at an evidentiary hearing three to five days later. See § 4.28(b) infra. Under any of these statutory schemes, the defense can prevent detention by showing that the evidence which the State has proffered (either in the form of affidavits or testimony) is insufficient. If counsel can persuade the judge that the State has failed to make out probable-cause on some element of the crime or that the State has failed to show probable-cause to believe that the respondent was the perpetrator, then the judge must release the respondent. The finding of “no probable-cause” also may result in dismissal of the Petition, either by operation of law or because the judge’s reaction to the evidence leads the prosecutor to dismiss the case. See § 4.28(b) infra.

In some cases the prosecution’s evidence will be marginally sufficient to make out probable-cause but apparently too weak to sustain a conviction at trial under the more rigorous “reasonable doubt” standard. Even though the judge can lawfully detain in such cases, many judges will respond to a basic-fairness argument that stresses the injustice of subjecting the respondent to several weeks of detention in a case that is likely to result in acquittal at trial.

Finally, in some cases, the evidence at the probable-cause hearing, while strongly satisfying the probable-cause standard and perhaps even strongly showing guilt, will highlight mitigating aspects of the offense. In these cases the mitigating facts may supply a predicate for asking that the judge reconsider the earlier assessment that the respondent is dangerous to others.

§ 4.23 PREVENTING DETENTION BY ATTACKING THE SUFFICIENCY OF THE PETITION

Sections 17.01-17.07 infra describe the legal bases for challenging the sufficiency of the Petition. In most jurisdictions these challenges are made in the form of a written motion to dismiss the Petition, filed within a certain period of time (usually 30 days) following the arraignment. However, in cases in which the judge orders pretrial detention, counsel should orally raise any defects in the Petition that render the charging paper invalid. Counsel should argue that both the juvenile statutes and due process require that there be a valid charge, and charging paper, on which to detain the respondent.

§ 4.24 STEPS TO TAKE IF THE CLIENT IS DETAINED

Detention can be a terrifying experience for a child, especially one who has never been detained before. If the judge orders detention, counsel should confer with the client immediately afterward in the cell-block, informing the client that counsel will explain to the client’s parent/guardian how to visit the child at the detention facility and that counsel will come to the facility (specifying the date) to discuss the case with the child. Thereafter, counsel should inform the parent/guardian of visiting hours and travel directions to the facility. (Attorneys who practice extensively in juvenile court are well-advised to carry several sets of written travel directions to give to parents and guardians.)

If the child requires special attention at the facility – because s/he needs psychological services or special medication or because s/he is extremely young or vulnerable and therefore needs protection against assaults by other inmates – counsel should request that the court write provisions for this special treatment into the detention order. If the judge complies with the request, counsel should telephone the administrator of the facility to ensure that s/he is notified of the court order. If the judge denies the request, stating that the facility will surely take care of these matters, then a telephone call to the facility is particularly crucial, to inform the administrator of the child’s special needs and the judge’s assumption that the facility will attend to them. If the facility refuses, then counsel will need to return to court and seek a supplemental order.

Finally, in the event that counsel obtained a court order delegating the selection of the level of custody to the administrative agency that oversees detention facilities (see § 4.21(e) supra), counsel will have to speak to the appropriate agency officials to lobby for the least restrictive level of custody.

§ 4.25 OBTAINING RELIEF FOR CLIENTS WHOSE INITIAL HEARING HAS NOT BEEN HELD PROMPTLY

As explained in § 4.17 supra, most jurisdictions specify a precise time limit within which a newly arrested child must be brought to court for a hearing on the issue of pretrial detention. In some jurisdictions, however, the statute establishes only a general requirement that the juvenile be brought before a judge “promptly” or within a “reasonable period of time.”

In jurisdictions that specify a time limit, counsel representing a child held beyond that limit without a hearing should petition the juvenile court for an immediate hearing or apply for a writ of habeas corpus. See, e.g., People v. Clayborn, 90 Ill. App. 3d 1047, 414 N.E.2d 157, 46 Ill. Dec. 435 (1980); State ex rel. Morrow v. Lewis, 55 Wis. 2d 502, 200 N.W.2d 193 (1972). In jurisdictions that do not specify a time limit, counsel representing a child who has been held for a period of time longer than 24 hours (excluding weekends and legal holidays) should petition the juvenile court for a hearing or seek habeas corpus relief, arguing that the general statutory requirement of promptness has been violated. See, e.g., United States v. DeMarce, 513 F.2d 755 (8th Cir. 1975) (delay of 80 hours between arrest and presentment before magistrate violated Federal Juvenile Delinquency Act, which prohibits the detention of a newly arrested child “for longer than a reasonable period of time before brought before a magistrate”). See also County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 56-57 (1991) (discussed in § 4.28(a) infra) (setting an outer limit of 48 hours, absent “a bona fide emergency or other extraordinary circumstance,” for the judicial determination of probable cause required by the Fourth Amendment, and cautioning that even a hearing “provided within 48 hours . . . may violate . . . [the Fourth Amendment] if the arrested individual can prove that his or her probable cause determination was delayed unreasonably”); In the Matter of Benjamin L., 92 N.Y.2d 660, 668, 708 N.E.2d 156, 160, 685 N.Y.S.2d 400, 404 (1999) (the inherent nature of the juvenile justice system and various developmental aspects of adolescence create a particularly compelling “need for swift and certain adjudication at all phases of a delinquency proceeding”).

If the court rules that the detention period was excessive, then this statutory violation may supply a basis for suppressing statements taken during the period (see, e.g., United States v. DeMarce, 513 F.2d at 758; see § 24.15 infra) as well as tangible evidence whose seizure stemmed from statements made or consent given by the respondent during this period (see § 23.14 infra).

§ 4.26 ADDITIONAL DETENTION ISSUES ARISING FROM OTHER CHARGES OR OTHER LEGAL PROBLEMS WITHIN THE JURISDICTION, IN OTHER PARTS OF THE STATE, OR IN OTHER STATES
Frequently, a respondent faces legal problems and the possibility of detention as a result of more than just the delinquency case in which counsel has been appointed. These include: (i) custody orders issued by a judge of the same jurisdiction in which the respondent is presently appearing, authorizing the respondent’s arrest either on an additional charge or for failure to appear in a hearing on another pending charge; (ii) petitions filed within the same jurisdiction to revoke probation or parole that the respondent received in a prior case, in light of the violation of law underlying the new arrest; (iii) custody orders issued by judges in other parts of the State, authorizing the respondent’s arrest in connection with additional charges for which the respondent has not previously been arrested, pending cases in which the respondent failed to appear, or petitions to revoke probation or parole in light of the present new charge; and (iv) requests for extradition to another State on the grounds that the child is a runaway (from either a parent/guardian or a detention facility) or that the child is “wanted” for a crime in the other State. These ancillary legal problems may impact upon the child’s liberty in either of two ways. The mere existence of the additional legal problems may lead the judge to order detention in the case in which counsel is defending the respondent. Or, if counsel secures the respondent’s release in the new case, that victory may be rendered meaningless because the child continues to be held in custody pending the resolution of his or her other legal problems. The remedies available to defense counsel vary, depending upon the nature of the child’s ancillary legal problem and whether it arose within the State or out-of-State.

§ 4.26(a) Ancillary Legal Problems Within the State in Which the Respondent Is Appearing for the Detention Hearing

§ 4.26(a)(1) Custody Orders To Arrest the Respondent on Another Charge

Under the statutory standards of most jurisdictions, the existence of another charge (whether already filed or not yet filed) can be considered by the judge in assessing whether the respondent needs to be detained pending trial on the present charge on the grounds of future dangerousness. See § 4.17 supra. If the other charge is minor, counsel can certainly argue that its existence is not very probative of dangerousness; indeed, some jurisdictions exclude minor property crimes from the detention analysis. See id. Moreover, because the charge is still only an allegation and has not been proven, counsel can argue that the presumption of innocence precludes any reliance on it in assessing the respondent’s dangerousness.

The judge may order release on the present charge but indicate that s/he intends to hold the child in custody pending his or her Initial Hearing on the other charge (or, if the other charge emanates from a different part of the State, pending transportation to that locale for Initial Hearing). In such instances counsel should argue that the judge’s finding that there is no appreciable risk of flight on the present charge militates for release of the child so that s/he can appear on his or her own for Initial Hearing on the other charge as well.

§ 4.26(a)(2) Custody Orders Resulting from Prior Failures To Appear for Court Hearings
The fact that a custody order has been issued upon the respondent’s failure to appear for a prior hearing is one of the most severe problems that counsel can encounter when trying to secure a child’s release at a detention hearing. The judge can certainly consider such a failure to appear as evidence of a risk of flight in deciding whether to detain the child on the present charge. See § 4.17 supra. Moreover, even if the judge releases the child on the present charge, the judge can hold the child pursuant to the custody order pending the child’s appearance before the judge who issued the custody order.

The only realistic prospect of success in this situation exists in cases in which the respondent can interpose a factual defense that: (A) s/he was not aware of the obligation to appear at the hearing which s/he missed, because s/he did not receive notice of that hearing or because s/he was told by her attorney or a court official that appearance was not necessary; (B) s/he was unable to attend the hearing for legally sufficient reasons, such as that s/he was incarcerated or appearing in a court in another jurisdiction on the date of the hearing; or (C) s/he was unable to attend for some reason which, although not technically sufficient to excuse the nonappearance, is strongly mitigating, such as that s/he was taken out-of-state by his or her parent/guardian and could not return on his or her own or that s/he was attending the funeral of a relative. When the nonappearance can be excused on grounds of this sort and if the respondent has no other record of failure to appear, a judge will frequently overlook the single transgression and release the respondent pending his or her appearance before the judge who issued the custody order.

§ 4.26(a)(3) Petitions To Revoke Probation or Parole in Light of the Violation of Law Evidenced by the New Arrest

As explained in §§ 39.04-39.05 infra, a petition can be filed to revoke the respondent’s probation or parole on a prior charge if the respondent is arrested for a new crime or if the respondent commits “technical violations,” such as missing appointments with his or her probation or parole officer. When the respondent appears for a detention hearing on a new charge, s/he may discover that the probation or parole agency has placed a “hold” on him or her, requesting detention until a hearing can be held to determine whether the new charge (and any technical violations that are now being pressed in addition to the new charge) justify revocation of probation or parole.

The key to overcoming probation and parole holds is to telephone the probation or parole officer who requested the hold and convince him or her that: (A) proceedings to revoke probation or parole should be delayed until after the resolution of the new charge at trial, and the probation or parole officer should defer to the judge’s assessment of whether the respondent needs to be detained pending that trial; or (B) even if the probation or parole officer is unwilling to continue the revocation proceedings, the determination of the child’s detention status pending a revocation hearing should be left to the judge presiding at Initial Hearing on the new charge. In attempting to persuade the probation or parole officer, counsel should stress: any facts about the new offense that indicate that the respondent’s guilt is dubious or that the offense is relatively minor even if the respondent is guilty; and any favorable aspects of the respondent’s adjustment to probation or parole that suggest that this is an isolated lapse from grace and that the progress otherwise made by the child should not be undone by incarceration, at least prior to a determination that s/he is guilty of the new charge.

§ 4.26(b)  Extradition to Another State: The Interstate Compact

An Interstate Compact regulates the extradition of youth who have left their home state without permission of a parent or guardian and also provides for transfer of supervision of an adjudicated delinquent when s/he moves to another State. The original Interstate Compact on Juveniles, drafted in 1955 and adopted by all States, has been replaced by an Interstate Compact for Juveniles. The Compact was drafted between 2000 and 2002 and then presented to the States and Territories for adoption. As of 2018, it has been adopted by all of the States, the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands.

Articles III and IV of the Compact establish an “Interstate Commission for Juveniles” (“ICJ”), which is empowered to “promulgate rules” that have “the force and effect of statutory law” and are “binding in the compacting states” (Article IV, § 2). The ICJ issued a set of rules in December 2009, which became effective on March 1, 2010, and which were amended in various ways in the ensuing years. The current version of the rules (which has an effective date of March 1, 2018) is available at http://www.juvenilecompact.org.

The ICJ also has issued a number of advisory opinions, which can be found in Appendix IV of the ICJ’s “Bench Book for Judges & Court Personnel” (2018), also available at the above website.

A child who has run away from a lawful custodian (which may be a parent, guardian, group home, or detention facility) to another jurisdiction can either elect to return voluntarily or to resist extradition and demand a hearing. If the child voluntarily consents to return home, s/he will be transported home promptly in accordance with ICJ Rule 6-102.

If the child declines to return voluntarily, and if s/he is an “Escapee, Absconder or Accused Delinquent,” then the “demanding state” must “present to the court or appropriate authority a . . . Requisition . . . requesting the juvenile’s return” (ICJ Rule 6-103A(3)), accompanied by “copies of supporting documents that show entitlement to the juvenile” (ICJ Rule 6-103A(3)(a)), such as, for example, an “Order of Adjudication” or “Petition Alleging Delinquency” (id.). See, e.g., In the Matter of a Proceeding Involving the Interstate Compact on Juveniles, Aubree C., 2018 WL 3462521 (N.Y. Family Ct., Monroe County May 9, 2018) (denying the State of Delaware’s “request for return” of a youth who was on pre-adjudication probation in Delaware, had traveled to New York for “‘testing placement,’” and was alleged to have “breached his probation by committing a new crime” (id. at *1, *4, *6); “[A]fter a facial examination of requisition the court finds that it is not in order and that it is substantially defective. Furthermore, the basis for entitlement for return outlined in the requisition, that Aubree breached his probation, has not been demonstrated. Therefore, the request for return is denied and the youth is discharged.” Id. at 6. “While there is no decisional case law guidance as to when the requisition is ‘in order,’ Rule 6-103A(3)[a] mandates that the requisition be verified by affidavit unless a judge is the requisitioner. A facial examination of the requisition and amended requisition reveals that neither document is not [sic] properly verified. Moreover, the ground cited for return, breach of probation conditions, is not supported by documentation.” Id. at 5. “The conditions of pre-adjudication probation submitted to this court do not include any requirement that Aubree refrain from criminal behavior. He was only directed to perform community service, stay away from Buffalo Wildwings/Target, complete Shoplifter’s Alternative, pay a $10 victim’s compensation fund fee and pay restitution if a request was made in 90 days. Thus, on the face of the documents presented by Delaware there was no breach of probation. ¶ While the level of due process in Compact proceedings is generally minimal, at the very least a juvenile is entitled to notice in the requisition of the reasons the demanding state wants his return, as well as notice of which legally appropriate official is demanding return. Here the requisition was not properly signed or properly verified. Probation Officer Krystall Hall is listed as the requisitioner, but was not a proper person for execut[ing] the requisition. It further appears that someone other than Ms. Hall signed the requisition, but the identity of that individual is not apparent since the signature is illegible and there is no name under the signature. The verification subsequently signed by Deputy Compact Administrator Francis C. does not cure the defects concerning the identity and signature of the requisitioner since she did not sign the requisition herself.” Id. at 6.)

If the youth is “already in custody,” the Requisition and accompanying documents must be submitted “within sixty (60) calendar days of notification of the youth’s refusal to voluntarily return.” ICJ Rule 6-103A(3). If a youth is “not already detained, the court shall order the juvenile be held pending a hearing on the requisition.” ICJ Rule 6-103A(5). A hearing must be held in “the state where the juvenile is located” within 30 calendar days of the receipt of the requisition, but “[t]his time period may be extended with the approval of both ICJ Offices.” Id.

If the court orders the juvenile’s return to the demanding state, the return ordinarily must take place “within five (5) business days of the receipt of the order granting the requisition” (ICJ 6-103A(9)), although “[t]his time period may be extended with approval from both ICJ Offices” (id.). “[W]hen pending charges exist in the holding/receiving state,” “[j]uveniles shall be returned only after [the] charges are resolved . . . unless consent is given by the holding/receiving and demanding/sending states’ courts and ICJ Offices.” ICJ Rule 7-103. “Juveniles held in detention, pending non-voluntary return to the demanding state, may be held for a maximum of ninety (90) calendar days.” ICJ Rule 6-103A(8).

In counseling a child whether to return voluntarily or demand a hearing, the attorney should inform the child that there are two major disadvantages to contesting extradition: (i) the child will probably remain detained for a period of time, which could be up to 90 days; and (ii) that period of detention will not buy any significant promise of victory at the extradition hearing, since the only issue at the hearing will be whether the extradition papers comply with the technical requirements. Naturally, if the client wishes to contest extradition, counsel should comply with the client’s wishes notwithstanding counsel’s own view that this course is not in the child’s best interests.

§ 4.26(c) Arranging for Counsel in the Respondent’s Other Cases

Once the detention hearing is completed, the respondent will probably face additional hearings on the other charges or probation/parole holds or fugitive warrants. If these matters arise out of an existing case – if, for example, they involve allegations that the respondent failed to appear for a hearing or violated probation or parole – counsel must notify the attorney who represented the child in that case, so s/he can continue representation of the child. On the other hand, if the problem arises out of a charge that has not as yet been filed and if counsel is unable to represent the child on the new charge, then counsel must arrange to have another lawyer take responsibility for the new case. If the child’s parent/guardian is not eligible for a court-appointed lawyer, counsel should give the parent/guardian a list of defense attorneys who practice in juvenile court in the relevant jurisdiction. If the child and his or her family are indigent, counsel should contact the public defender’s office in the relevant jurisdiction and notify the appropriate supervisor or staff attorney that a hearing will be held and that the child needs representation. All of these steps should be taken as soon as possible after the conclusion of the detention hearing so as to allow the maximum amount of time for preparation for the next hearing.

§ 4.27 BAIL

Section 4.15 supra lists the States that permit bail in juvenile court. The following sections describe the concrete steps that an attorney must take with respect to bail in those jurisdictions.

§ 4.27(a) Interviewing the Client and Parent/Guardian To Elicit the Information Necessary To Argue the Issue of Bail

Section 4.07 supra described the information that counsel must elicit from the client during a pre-hearing interview in order to argue effectively against preventive detention. Much of this information will also be relevant in arguing that a low bond should be set. The amount of the bond is supposed to reflect the sum that is necessary to guarantee the respondent’s appearance for trial. Hence factors such as lengthy residence in the community, substantial family ties in the community, and steady attendance at school not only tend to demonstrate that preventive detention on the basis of a risk of flight is unwarranted but also indicate qualities of reliability and stability that militate for low bail if a bond is to be imposed.

In addition to the information pertinent to both preventive detention and bail, counsel practicing in jurisdictions that permit bail for juveniles will also need to elicit facts regarding the family’s financial resources. This financial information will assist counsel to argue both that a modest bond is all that is necessary to assure the respondent’s appearance at trial and also that a larger amount of bail is legally excessive (see § 4.27(c) infra). Inquiries regarding family finances will usually have to be directed to the client’s parent or guardian, since most children are unfamiliar with their parents’ or guardian’s income levels and assets. Counsel should inquire, in particular, into: salary (both gross and net) if employed; amount of unemployment benefits received if unemployed; any supplementary income, such as social security; any welfare or public assistance payments received; value of all significant assets, such as a home, automobile, bank account, and real property; liabilities, such as debts, installment payments, and mortgages; number of dependents, and the strain they put on (or contributions they make to) family income.

§ 4.27(b) Arguing the Availability of Bail: Interaction Between Preventive Detention and Statutory Rights to Bail

As explained in § 4.15 supra, roughly one fourth of the States permit bail for juveniles. However, the juvenile code in each of these jurisdictions also contains a preventive detention statute, authorizing detention to guard against flight or future crimes. See Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 267 n.16 (1984) (listing the juvenile preventive detention statutes of the 50 states and the District of Columbia). Thus the first issue that defense counsel confronts in framing an argument for bail is whether the guarantee of bail qualifies the authorization of preventive detention or vice versa.

A few of the jurisdictions provide some guidance in the statutes themselves. See, e.g., Neb. Rev. Stat. § 43-253(5) (2018) (indicating that the right to bail can be overridden when there is a need for detention); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 13.40.040(5) (2018) (“a juvenile detained under this section may be released upon posting a probation bond set by the court”); see also Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 13.40.050(6) (2018). However, the juvenile codes in most of the bail-authorizing States shed little light on the relationship between bail and preventive detention. See, e.g., L.O.W. v. District Court, 623 P.2d 1253, 1260 (Colo. 1981) (observing that “[t]he detention criteria” and “the statutory right to bail” “appear to conflict” and provide little assistance in resolving the conflict).

The courts that have confronted this dilemma have responded by construing the detention system as incorporating the concept that bail provides a substitute for detention even in cases in which the judge finds that detention is needed to guard against flight, L.O.W. v. District Court, 623 P.2d at 1261; State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder, 317 S.E.2d 150, 158-59 & n.25 (W. Va. 1984), or future crimes, Kinder, 317 S.E.2d at 158-59 & n.25. Under this construction, which counsel should urge upon the courts of bail-authorizing jurisdictions that have not as yet adopted it, the judge must first apply the statutory detention criteria in choosing between release without bail and preventive detention; once the judge has concluded that detention is appropriate under the flight and dangerousness criteria, then the judge must go on and make a bail determination. See id.

§ 4.27(c) Arguing Against High Bail: The Constitutional Prohibitions Against “Excessive” Bail; Equal Protection Issues in Cases of Indigent Clients
The Eighth Amendment to the federal Constitution and most state constitutional provisions governing bail prohibit “excessive bail.” Accordingly, “when the Government has admitted that its only interest is in preventing flight, bail must be set by a court at a sum designed to ensure that goal, and no more.” United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 754 (1987). Accord, Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1 (1951). Similarly, in jurisdictions in which bail is used as an alternative to detention in deterring future crimes (see §§ 4.15, 4.27(b) supra), “the government’s proposed conditions of release or detention [must] not be ‘excessive’ in light of the perceived evil.” Salerno, 481 U.S. at 754. Employing the information about the family income that counsel elicited during pre-hearing interviews (see § 4.27(a) supra), counsel can argue that a bond which is a substantial but affordable expense for the family will both deter the child from committing infractions which can result in forfeiture of the money and induce the parent or guardian to monitor the child’s behavior carefully.

An argument for the proposition that detention of an indigent in default of bail which s/he cannot make violates the Habeas Corpus Clause, the Eighth Amendment, the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, and cognate state constitutional guarantees is developed in Caleb Foote, The Coming Constitutional Crisis in Bail, 113 U. PA. L. REV. 959, 1125 (1965), and may be pressed on habeas corpus in state and federal courts. Professor Foote’s Equal Protection arguments, in particular, draw strong support from subsequent decisions condemning the incarceration of indigents in default of payment of fines imposed upon conviction. Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235 (1970); Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395 (1971); In re Antazo, 3 Cal. 3d 100, 473 P.2d 999, 89 Cal. Rptr. 255 (1970). Cf. Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660, 664-68 (1983); Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501, 505-06 (1976) (dictum). Similar arguments prevailed in a path-breaking decision in Pugh v. Rainwater, 557 F.2d 1189 (5th Cir. 1977), which, while reversed on narrow grounds en banc, 572 F.2d 1053 (5th Cir. 1978), resulted in an en banc endorsement of the panel’s essential conclusion that “[t]he incarceration of those who cannot [afford to post money bail], without meaningful consideration of other possible alternatives [that is, other forms of pretrial release], infringes on both due process and equal protection requirements.” 572 F.2d at 1057. See also, e.g., Robertson v. Goldman, 179 W. Va. 453, 369 S.E.2d 888 (1988). This conclusion is particularly persuasive in the juvenile context because incarceration of indigent juveniles penalizes them for matters wholly beyond their control – the indigency of the children’s parent/guardian and the federal and state labor laws and mandatory school attendance laws that preclude the children themselves from working. Significantly, many jurisdictions have juvenile court statutes or rules limiting restitution by setting a minimum age and/or a maximum amount (see, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 353.6(1) (2018)) or using other devices to ensure that an order of restitution does not exceed the juvenile’s financial means (see, e.g., N.C. GEN. STAT. § 7B-2506(4), (22) (2018) (“the court shall not require the juvenile to make restitution if the juvenile satisfies the court that the juvenile does not have, and could not reasonably acquire, the means to make restitution”).

§ 4.27(d) Arguing for the Least Onerous Type of Bail

In jurisdictions that allow bail for juveniles, the court may have the option of choosing among various types of bail:

1. A surety bond posted by a licensed bail bonder is ordinarily put up by the bonder in exchange for the client’s payment of a premium (usually about 10 per cent of the face of the bond, or a little more or less, depending upon the face amount of the bond and the nature of the charge) and often also on condition that the client’s family post some collateral security, such as a house or automobile. Whether or not the client appears for trial, the bail bonder keeps the premium of roughly 10 per cent as a fee for writing the bond; and in the event that the client fails to appear for trial and forfeits the bond, the bail bonder will seek to attach the collateral or will institute an action against any individual who served as guarantor or will do both.

2. A bond that permits the client or a family member or friend to make bail by depositing the premium amount set by statute or local practice (usually 10 percent) directly with the court avoids the necessity of purchasing a surety bond from a licensed bonder. The great virtue of this system is that the person who deposited the premium amount can recover it from the court at the conclusion of the case if the client faithfully appears for all hearings. In some jurisdictions the clerk of court is required to retain a portion of the deposit as an “administration fee,” but this is usually a very small amount.

3. A cash bond requires that the full amount of the bond be paid to the court in cash or negotiable securities and permits the recovery of the cash or securities at the conclusion of the case.

4. A real property bond requires that a deed to property or other document of title be lodged with the court clerk. This too can be recovered at the conclusion of the case.

In jurisdictions that permit juvenile respondents to make bond by posting a recoverable premium with the court, this is usually the form of bail that counsel should seek to arrange, since it will ordinarily demand the smallest expenditure of money to put up the bond and will usually enable the client to recover that money later. When this option is not available, either because local practice does not permit it or because the judge has rejected it, counsel’s choice among other forms of bail will ordinarily depend upon the financial resources of the client, the amount of the premium that would be charged by a bail bonder, and what, if any, collateral the bonder would insist upon. If a family member or friend can afford to post a cash bond or a real property bond, the temporary surrender of these assets with the assurance that they will be returned later (as long as the client faithfully appears) may be more palatable than paying an unrecoverable premium to a bail bonder. However, clients of limited means often have no real choice other than the bail bonder.
§ 4.27(e) Ensuring That There Are No “Hold” Orders Before Permitting the Client’s Family or Friends To Post Bail

As explained in § 4.26 supra, a respondent may be subject to a “hold” order as a result of another charge (or other legal problem) within the jurisdiction, or in another part of the State or another State. If there is such a “hold” order, the only effect of posting bond will be to free the respondent from any restrictions imposed with respect to the charge upon which the bail was set, while leaving him or her still in custody on the other charges or other legal problems. Obviously, counsel needs to guard against such futile expenditure of bail money. Usually, counsel will learn about any “hold” orders during the detention hearing because the existence of the “hold” and the reasons for it will be mentioned by the probation officer. However, in rare cases, the probation office is uninformed, and the “hold” is not discovered until later, after the family member or friend has posted bond. Thus, prior to any posting of bond, counsel should ask the client whether s/he is on probation or parole in another case or another jurisdiction or has pending charges in or is “wanted” in another case or another jurisdiction. If counsel learns that there is a potential for a “hold” which has not yet materialized, counsel may decide to defer attempts to make bail until the various “holds” have been lodged and s/he has had a chance to deal with them through the remedies described in § 4.26 supra.

§ 4.27(f) Assisting the Client’s Family or Friends in Posting Bond

Even after bail has been set by the court and after counsel has determined that there are no “hold” orders, his or her job with respect to bail is not completed. The family members or friends who intend to put up bail will usually need counsel’s assistance in actually posting the bond and securing the child’s release.

In cases in which the bond is to be paid to the court (whether that bond is a premium deposit, cash bond, or real property bond (see § 4.27(d) supra)), the steps for posting bond will usually include: obtaining the signatures of the client and the surety on a bond (ordinarily a form document), delivering the signed bond and the security to the court, and then taking whatever receipt is provided by the court to the appropriate authority (which may be another office in the court, the administrator of the court marshals, the police, or an official designated by the agency in charge of juvenile detention facilities). The assistance of counsel will usually be invaluable in negotiating these steps, since bureaucrats are far less likely to give the run-around to an attorney than to an uninformed and usually distraught parent or guardian of the child.

In cases in which a surety bond is ordered, counsel will need to help the client’s family or friend obtain the services of a professional bail bonder. Counsel should compile a periodically updated list of the names, addresses, and phone numbers of local bail bonders and should hand copies of the list to clients’ family members or friends who request that information. Once the relative or friend has selected a bail bonder, it will usually be necessary for counsel to help find that particular bonder: most bonders are away from their offices precisely because they have to be in court (either juvenile or adult court) posting bond and appearing with clients. If counsel is unfamiliar with the local bonders’ usual haunts, s/he can obtain that information by asking other attorneys who practice regularly in juvenile and adult court. Once the bonder has been located, the bonder will usually take charge of the situation and attend to all of the steps needed to secure the client’s release. However, some bonders are insufficiently attentive to respondents’ interests and do not move through the posting process as quickly as they could; thus counsel should keep a watchful eye over the bond-posting process and prod the bonder when necessary.

Part F. The Probable-Cause Hearing

§ 4.28 CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY RIGHTS TO A PROBABLE-CAUSE DETERMINATION

§ 4.28(a) Constitutional requirements

In Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Fourth Amendment to the federal Constitution, which has long been construed as forbidding arrests without probable-cause (see § 23.07 infra), entitles every arrested person to “a judicial determination of probable-cause as a prerequisite to extended restraint of liberty following arrest.” 420 U.S. at 114. Consequently, persons arrested without an arrest warrant (and hence without a prearrest judicial finding of probable-cause) may not be confined pending trial unless they are given the opportunity for a probable-cause determination “by a judicial officer . . . promptly after arrest.” Id. at 125. Accord, Powell v. Nevada, 511 U.S. 79, 80 (1994); County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44, 47, 52-53 (1991); Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318, 352 (2001) (dictum); Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 274 (1994) (plurality opinion) (dictum); Baker v. McCollan, 443 U.S. 137, 142-43 (1979) (dictum).

Although the Court has been “hesitant to announce that the Constitution compels a specific limit” on how “promptly” after arrest the constitutional probable-cause determination must be afforded, the Court has provided guiding principles “to provide some degree of certainty so that States and counties may establish procedures with confidence that they fall within constitutional bounds.” County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. at 56. “[A] jurisdiction that provides judicial determinations of probable cause within 48 hours of arrest will, as a general matter, comply with the promptness requirement of Gerstein.” Id. But even a hearing provided within 48 hours “may nonetheless violate Gerstein if the arrested individual can prove that his or her probable cause determination was delayed unreasonably.” Id. “Examples of unreasonable delay are delays for the purpose of gathering additional evidence to justify the arrest, a delay motivated by ill will against the arrested individual, or delay for delay’s sake.” Id. In cases in which “an arrested individual does not receive a probable cause determination within 48 hours,” the government bears the “burden . . . to demonstrate the existence of a bona fide emergency or other extraordinary circumstance” to justify the delay. Id. at 57. Accord, Powell v. Nevada, 511 U.S. at 80. “The fact that in a particular case it may take longer than 48 hours to consolidate [the probable cause determination with other] pretrial proceedings[, such as arraignment,] does not qualify as an extraordinary circumstance. Nor, for that matter, do intervening weekends.” County

The rule of Gerstein is, however, a very narrow one in several regards. First, it fails, by its terms, to protect persons arrested under arrest warrants (Gerstein, 420 U.S. at 117 n.19; Michigan v. Doran, 439 U.S. 282, 285 n.3 (1978)) unless the warrant itself is assailable because the procedures for issuing it failed to provide the requisite probable-cause determination (cf. Manuel v. City of Joliet, Ill., 137 S. Ct. 911 (2017)). (But see In re Walters, 15 Cal. 3d 738, 543 P.2d 607, 126 Cal. Rptr. 239 (1975), extending Gerstein to require a postarrest probable-cause determination in cases of arrests made under a warrant.)

Second, Gerstein does not require that the probable-cause determination be “accompanied by the full panoply of adversary safeguards – counsel, confrontation, cross-examination, and compulsory process for witnesses.” Gerstein, 420 U.S. at 119. Accord, Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 275 (1984). To the contrary, it sanctions “[t]he use of an informal procedure,” Gerstein, 420 U.S. at 121, in which there is no constitutional right to the appointment of counsel, id. at 122-23, no “confrontation and cross-examination” need be allowed, id. at 121-22, and the determination of probable-cause may presumably be made “on hearsay and written testimony,” id. at 120. All that is constitutionally required is “a fair and reliable determination of probable-cause.” Id. at 125; see also Baker v. McCollan, 443 U.S. at 143 & n.2; Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460, 475-77 (1983). But see Manuel v. City of Joliet, Ill., supra, which opens the door to challenging a probable-cause determination based upon perjury or fabrication of evidence by investigative or prosecutorial agents; Sanchez v. Hartley, 810 F.3d 750, 754 (10th Cir. 2016) (“According to Mr. Sanchez, the detectives and investigator sought legal process based on the confession even though they either knew the confession was untrue or recklessly ignored that possibility. If Mr. Sanchez’s allegation is credited, it would involve a constitutional violation, for we have held that the Fourth Amendment prohibits officers from knowingly or recklessly relying on false information to institute legal process when that process results in an unreasonable seizure.”); accord, Miller v. Maddox, 866 F.3d 386 (6th Cir. 2017); Black v. Montgomery County, 835 F.3d 358 (3d Cir. 2016); and see § 23.17(c) infra for elaboration of this principle in the context of challenges to search warrants.

Finally, failure to give an accused a prompt probable-cause determination does not foreclose subsequent prosecution or provide grounds for its dismissal; it merely renders the accused’s pretrial confinement unconstitutional. Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. at 119; see Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 534 n.15 (1979).

Gerstein’s basic requirement of a prompt probable-cause determination in cases of warrantless arrests does not add much to the general procedures prescribed by many state statutes for the protection of juveniles taken into custody. See § 4.28(b) infra. A significant number of States go beyond Gerstein by providing, as a matter of state law, for an immediate non-adversarial determination of probable cause at the detention hearing, followed soon after by a formal adversarial probable-cause hearing. See, e.g., Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253 (1984) (New York Family Court Act, which permits detention only when the “supporting depositions . . . establish probable-cause” at the detention hearing (id. at 275-76) and “[a] formal probable-cause hearing is then held within a short while thereafter” (id. at 277), “provides far more predetention protection for juveniles than we found to be constitutionally required for a probable-cause determination for adults in Gerstein” (id at 275)). In some States, however, Gerstein’s requirement of “prompt” probable-cause determinations may have the salutary effect of “acceleration of existing” state procedures. Gerstein, 420 U.S. at 124. As noted above, the United States Supreme Court has established the rule of thumb that promptness for Gerstein purposes ordinarily means within 48 hours, and it has said explicitly both that delays beyond 48 hours must be justified by a showing of extraordinary circumstances and that the practice of consolidating Gerstein determinations with other preliminary proceedings (such as an adversarial hearing on probable cause) “does not qualify as an extraordinary circumstance.” County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. at 57.

Moreover, when the Gerstein requirement is violated, any confessions or other statements taken from the respondent during the period of excessive delay are arguably inadmissible in evidence as the fruits of an unconstitutional detention. Although the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on the question whether “a suppression remedy applies” to a Gerstein violation through “failure to obtain authorization from a magistrate for a significant period of pretrial detention” (Powell v. Nevada, 511 U.S. at 85 n.*), the rationale of the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule should require suppression. See, e.g., Anderson v. Calderon, 232 F.3d 1053, 1071 (9th Cir. 2000) (dictum) (“we conclude that the appropriate remedy for a McLaughlin violation is the exclusion of the evidence in question – if it was “fruit of the poisonous tree”); Norris v. Lester, 545 Fed. Appx. 320, 321, 327 (6th Cir. 2013) (“appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to argue [under County of Riverside v. McLaughlin] that [Norris’] confession was obtained after the violation of his constitutional right to a prompt probable-cause determination”). But see Lawhorn v. Allen, 519 F.3d 1272, 1290-92 (11th Cir. 2008); People v. Willis, 215 Ill. 2d 517, 831 N.E.2d 531, 294 Ill. Dec. 581 (2005); and compare State v. Huddleston, 924 S.W.2d 666, 673 (Tenn. 106 we conclude that the exclusionary rule should apply when a police officer fails to bring an arrestee before a magistrate within the time allowed by McLaughlin” with State v. Carter, 16 S.W.3d 762, 766-68 (Tenn. 2000) (In State v. Huddleston, this Court determined that when a person confesses after having been detained for more than 48 hours following an arrest without a warrant and without a judicial determination of probable cause, the confession should be excluded unless the prosecution establishes that the confession “was sufficiently an act of free will to purge the primary taint of the unlawful invasion.” . . . The burden is on the State to prove by a preponderance of the evidence the admissibility of a confession obtained under the circumstances here presented. . . . Huddleston . . . focused on the reason for the continued detention of the arrestee; that is, whether the individual was being held without probable cause ‘for the purpose of gathering additional evidence to justify the arrest. . . .’ . . . Here . . . there is no evidence that Carter was held for the purpose of gathering additional evidence or for other investigatory purposes”; this consideration and others support a finding that the prosecution met its burden showing dissipation of the taint of a Gerstein violation.). In this respect, Gerstein provides the constitutional predicate for an updated version of what used to be known as the “McNabb-Mallory” exclusionary rule. See § 24.15 infra.

In addition to the Fourth Amendment Gerstein rule and any applicable state statute, there are Due Process protections against protracted detention of a suspect without fair and reliable procedures for determining his or her probable guilt. See Tatum v. Moody, 768 F.3d 806 (9th Cir. 2014) (holding that “[w]here . . . investigating officers, acting with deliberate indifference or reckless disregard for a suspect’s right to freedom from unjustified loss of liberty, fail to disclose potentially dispositive exculpatory evidence to the prosecutors, leading to the lengthy detention of an innocent man, they violate the due process guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment,” id. at 816); Lopez-Valuenzuela v. Arpaio, 770 F.3d 772 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (holding that the blanket preclusion of bail or pretrial release for undocumented aliens arrested on any of a broad range of felony charges, without regard to whether the individual alien’s release would involve a risk of flight or other danger, violates due process); Jauch v. Choctaw County, 874 F.3d 425, 427 (5th Cir. 2017) (“Jessica Jauch was indicted by a grand jury, arrested, and put in jail — where she waited for 96 days to be brought before a judge and was effectively denied bail. The district court found this constitutionally permissible. It is not. A pre-trial detainee denied access to the judicial system for a prolonged period has been denied basic procedural due process . . . .”).

§ 4.28(b) Statutory Requirements

Several States have enacted statutes requiring a probable-cause hearing in any case in which the respondent is detained pending trial. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 16-2312(e)-(f) (2018); ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. ch. 705, § 405/5-501 (2018); ME. REV. STAT. ANN. tit. 15, §§ 3203-A(4-A), 3203-A(5)(C) (2018); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT §§ 325.1-325.3 (2018); PA. CONS. STAT. ANN. tit. 42, § 6332(a) (2018). Some states even provide by statute or court rule for a probable-cause hearing in cases in which the child is not detained. See, e.g., J.T. v. O’Rourke, 651 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1982) (preliminary hearing must be granted “[i]n cases where the juvenile is charged with the commission of an act which if committed by an adult, would be a felony or class 1
The statutes commonly require that the court make a two-pronged determination that: (i) there is probable-cause to believe that an offense took place; and (ii) there is probable-cause to believe that the respondent was the perpetrator. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 325.3(1)(a)-(b) (2018). If the court finds that the prosecution has not made the requisite showing of probable-cause on either of these prongs, the respondent must be released. See, e.g., D.C. CODE § 16-2312(f) (2018). In cases in which the court concludes that probable-cause is lacking, some jurisdictions also require dismissal of the Petition, permitting its reinstatement only if the prosecutor can show newly discovered evidence. See, e.g., ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. ch. 705, § 405/5-501(1) (2018). Other jurisdictions do not explicitly provide by statute that the Petition must be dismissed. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 325.3(4) (2018) (if court finds that probable-cause is lacking, “the case shall be adjourned and the respondent released from detention”). However, the practical result will usually be dismissal, since most prosecutors will exercise their discretion to dismiss a case rather than going to trial on evidence that is so flimsy that it could not support even a determination of probable-cause.

§ 4.29 THE FUNCTIONS OF THE PROBABLE-CAUSE HEARING FROM THE DEFENSE PERSPECTIVE

The most important function of the probable-cause hearing is the one contemplated by Gerstein v. Pugh and state statutes: preventing the pretrial detention of a respondent when the State cannot show probable-cause to believe that s/he committed the offense. See § 4.28 supra. It should be noted that some judges will make a finding of “no probable-cause” if the evidence suggests that the respondent is innocent even though it marginally establishes probable-cause. Although such rulings are not contemplated by the technical purposes of the probable-cause hearing, they represent a dictate of fundamental fairness that a child should not be exposed to the harms of pretrial detention (see § 4.16 supra) when the evidence is so weak that the prosecution is realistically unlikely to prove its case at trial.

As explained in § 4.28(b) supra, a judicial finding that probable-cause is lacking can also result in the dismissal of the Petition – by operation of statute in some jurisdictions, by discretionary prosecutorial action in others.

In addition to the functions of testing the predicates for detention and continued prosecution, there are various informal or extralegal uses of the probable-cause hearing that are almost as important to the defense.

The first of these is discovery. By hearing the prosecution’s witnesses and cross-examining them, defense counsel can learn a good deal about what s/he is going to have to meet at trial. This opportunity for discovery is particularly important because, in most jurisdictions, other opportunities and procedures for discovery are rather limited. (See Chapter 9.) Although the discovery function of the probable-cause hearing is not formally recognized as legitimate by state statutes or most state courts – and, indeed, many judges sustain objections to defense cross-examination questions that appear to be motivated by the desire for discovery – there is caselaw supporting its legitimacy. See, e.g., Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1, 9 (1970) (plurality opinion) (in reasoning that preliminary examination is a “critical stage” for Sixth Amendment purposes, the plurality adverts to the discovery function as a legitimate defense interest); Adams v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 278, 282 (1972) (plurality opinion) (recognizing the defense interest in discovery, although holding it insufficient to warrant the retroactive application of Coleman in the absence of a showing of “actual prejudice,” 405 U.S. at 285, at least in a jurisdiction that provided “alternative [discovery] procedures,” id. at 282); Hawkins v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. 3d 584, 588, 586 P.2d 916, 918-19, 150 Cal. Rptr. 435, 437-38 (1978) (recognizing “the important discovery function served by an adversarial preliminary hearing”); Manor v. State, 221 Ga. 866, 148 S.E.2d 305, 307 (1966) (mentioning the denial of discovery opportunities in holding that a defendant whose waiver of preliminary examination was coerced is entitled to a reversal of the ensuing conviction, notwithstanding supervision of an otherwise valid indictment); People v. Hodge, 53 N.Y.2d 313, 318-19, 423 N.E.2d 1060, 1063, 441 N.Y.S.2d 231, 234 (1981) (“because discovery and deposition, by and large, are not available in criminal cases, [discovery by means of the preliminary examination] . . . may not only be an unexampled, but a vital opportunity to obtain the equivalent” and “early resort to that time-tested tool for testing truth, cross-examination, in the end may make the difference between conviction and exoneration”); Harris v. State, 841 P.2d 597, 599 (Okla. Crim. App. 1992) (“A preliminary hearing is conducted for the benefit of the accused . . . and serve[s] as a means of discovery for the defendant”).

Discovery can, of course, serve purposes in addition to preparation for trial. The opportunities for discovery at a probable-cause hearing also “provide the defense with valuable information about the case against the accused, enhancing its ability to evaluate the desirability of entering a plea.” Hawkins v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. 3d at 588, 586 P.2d at 919, 150 Cal. Rptr. at 438.

The second of the informal functions of a probable-cause hearing is the creation of transcribed, sworn testimony that can be used at trial. The hearing provides the opportunity for “skilled interrogation of witnesses by [the defense] . . . lawyer [that] can fashion a vital impeachment tool for use in cross-examination of the State’s witnesses at the trial, or preserve testimony favorable to the accused of a witness who does not appear at the trial,” Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. at 9.

The probable-cause hearing also provides counsel with an opportunity to demonstrate to the client that counsel is committed to fighting for the client’s rights. The resulting rapport between attorney and client can be crucial in subsequent stages of the case.

§ 4.30 THE DECISION WHETHER TO DEMAND OR WAIVE THE PROBABLE-CAUSE HEARING

The statutory right to a probable-cause hearing can be waived by the respondent, just like any other right, as long as the waiver is made knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily. Because the hearing provides opportunities to realize the substantial benefits described in § 4.29 supra – avoidance of detention, dismissal of the Petition, discovery, creation of valuable transcript material for use at trial, and establishment of rapport with the client – waiver is ordinarily highly inadvisable. There are, however, a few instances in which defense counsel should consider advising the client to waive the probable-cause hearing.

The first instance arises in jurisdictions in which the detention determination and probable-cause determination are parts of the same proceeding. If the judge is obviously wavering between secure detention and shelter care, it may be prudent for the client to waive the probable-cause hearing to prevent the judge’s exposure to gruesome evidence that could tip the balance in favor of secure detention.

Counsel should also consider advising the client to waive the hearing if the chances of a defense victory are slim and the taking of evidence would benefit the prosecutor by preserving the testimony of a witness who probably would not appear at trial because of declining health, plans to leave the jurisdiction, or other circumstances. See Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 57 (2004) (prosecution may be able to introduce, at trial, recorded “probable-cause determination” of a currently unavailable witness “if the defendant had an adequate opportunity to cross-examine” the witness on the pertinent subject matter at the preliminary hearing). Cf. People v. Fry, 92 P.3d 970, 972 (Colo. 2004) (preliminary hearing testimony of an unavailable prosecution witness was not admissible at trial “[b]ecause preliminary hearings in Colorado do not present an adequate opportunity for cross-examination”).

A waiver also might be appropriate in cases in which the complainant is likely to mellow prior to trial if s/he is not further antagonized. This is particularly so when the complainant is the respondent’s relative or close friend, who filed charges in the heat of anger. It may also hold true in cases of extremely minor offenses, such as trespass or trivial destruction of property, in which the complainant’s initial annoyance is likely to fade over time. The potential vice of the probable-cause hearing in cases of this sort is that defense counsel’s rigorous cross-examination of the complainant at the hearing may intensify the complainant’s hostility, ensuring his or her commitment to pressing charges, solidifying his or her version of the events at a time when s/he is most angry, and guaranteeing that s/he will later refuse to be interviewed by anyone representing the respondent’s interests.

Finally, a waiver is advisable in any case in which the probable-cause hearing will tip off the prosecutor to facts of which s/he is not presently aware, if that revelation will hurt the respondent. This would be true in situations in which counsel learns of a defect in the prosecution’s case that, in all probability, will not be corrected before the case goes to trial if not brought to the prosecutor’s attention at the probable-cause hearing. It would also be true in situations in which the facts known to defense counsel suggest that the respondent could have been charged with more serious offenses than those contained in the Petition, and a probable-cause hearing would alert the prosecutor to the more serious offenses in time to amend the Petition prior to trial.

§ 4.31 NATURE OF THE PROBABLE-CAUSE HEARING; DEFENSE RIGHTS AT THE HEARING

§ 4.31(a) Nature of the Proceedings

The probable-cause hearing is in most respects conducted like a trial. The rules of evidence are ordinarily enforced, although several jurisdictions permit the introduction of hearsay evidence. See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 46b-133(e) (2018); ME. REV. STAT. ANN. tit. 15, § 3203-A(4-A) (2018); contra, N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 325.2(3) (2018) (requiring “non-hearsay evidence”). The prosecution must make a showing of probable-cause of every element of the offense and of the respondent’s identity as its perpetrator. The corpus delicti must ordinarily be proved before any admissions by the respondent may be received in evidence, but the judge has some discretion to allow variance from this order of proof. Compare § 24.21 infra. Witnesses are questioned in the ordinary fashion, and real evidence is admitted as exhibits. Cross-examination of witnesses is permitted, although some judges tend to limit its scope to a narrower compass than would be allowed at trial. See § 4.33 infra. Sequestration of witnesses is allowed within the sound discretion of the judge. There is modification of these rules in varying degrees in some jurisdictions, and local practice must be consulted.

§ 4.31(b) Right to Counsel

The right to counsel at an Initial Hearing is discussed in § 4.03 supra. As explained in that section, a juvenile has a Sixth Amendment right to counsel at a probable-cause hearing and, in most jurisdictions, also has a statutory right to counsel.

§ 4.31(c) Right To Cross-Examine Prosecution Witnesses and To Present Defense Witnesses; Right To Subpoena Witnesses; Right to Disclosure of Exculpatory and Impeaching Evidence

State law also commonly accords the defense the right to present evidence at a probable-cause hearing. See, e.g., State in the Interest of Morrison, 406 So. 2d at 248; D.C. Code § 16-

The respondent’s right to call witnesses to testify at the probable-cause hearing is reinforced by the ancillary right to subpoena them, see, e.g., Coleman v. Burnett, 477 F.2d 1187, 1202-07 (D.C. Cir. 1973), in forma pauperis under the Equal Protection principle of Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), if the respondent is indigent and makes an adequate showing that the witness’s testimony will be material and helpful to the defense on the issue of probable-cause, see Washington v. Clemmer, 339 F.2d 715, 718-19, 725-28 (D.C. Cir. 1964); In the Matter of R.D.S., 359 A.2d at 139-40; cf. United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 866-71 & n.7 (1982).

There is disagreement among the state courts as to whether the disclosure rights assured to defendants at the trial stage by Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and its progeny (discussed in § 9.09(a) infra) apply at a probable-cause hearing. For a holding that they do and for reference to the conflicting authorities, see People v. Gutierrez, 214 Cal. App. 4th 343, 153 Cal. Rptr. 3d 832 (2013).

Although Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), holds that the rights discussed in this section are not necessary incidents of the probable-cause determination required by the Fourth Amendment, Gerstein does not deny that they may be constitutionally obligatory in the “full preliminary hearing . . . procedure used in many States.” Id. at 119. Rather, Gerstein says that “[w]hen the hearing takes this form, adversary procedures are customarily employed” and “[t]he importance of the issue to both the State and the accused justifies the presentation of witnesses and full exploration of their testimony on cross-examination.” Id. at 120. Analogously, Gerstein recognizes no constitutional right to counsel at a Fourth Amendment probable-cause hearing, id. at 122-23, but asserts that if the State chooses to conduct a full preliminary examination in lieu of a minimal probable-cause hearing, then “appointment of counsel for indigent defendants” is required. Id. at 120. In Routhier v. Sheriff, Clark County, 93 Nev. 149, 151-52, 560 P.2d 1371, 1372 (1977), the Nevada Supreme Court relied on Sixth Amendment precedent as well as state law to hold that a defendant had a right to a continuance of a preliminary hearing in order to locate, call, and cross-examine an informant whose identity was first disclosed at the hearing and who was involved in setting up the drug transaction for which the defendant was arrested.

§ 4.31(d) Right to Transcription of the Proceedings

An indigent respondent can assert a federal constitutional right to the transcription of the proceedings at state expense, since (a) the transcript would be an important aid to defense trial preparation as well as to impeachment of prosecution witnesses at trial, cf. Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1, 9 (1970) (plurality opinion); Britt v. North Carolina, 404 U.S. 226, 228 (1971); (b) a solvent respondent could employ a stenographer to make a transcript; and (c) the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as construed in Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), forbids the states to deny an indigent, for the sole reason of indigency, an important

In localities where it is not routine practice to have probable-cause hearings attended by a court reporter or stenographer, counsel should be sure to have a stenographer or recording device present and should move for payment of the cost by the state if the client is indigent.

§ 4.31(e) Procedures To Challenge Denial of Rights to or at a Probable-Cause Hearing

In most jurisdictions the appropriate form of procedure by which to seek redress for the denial of a right at the probable-cause hearing is a prerogative writ proceeding – prohibition or mandamus – challenging the actions of the judge, magistrate, or commissioner who is conducting the hearing. For example, if the judge refuses to subpoena defense witnesses or refuses a defense request for free transcription of the testimony in the case of an indigent, counsel should seek mandamus to compel the judge to provide these services or prohibition to restrain the completion of the hearing without them. In some jurisdictions a bill in equity is used in lieu of the prerogative writs; in others a simple motion in the court of record is appropriate if the probable-cause hearing is being conducted by a magistrate or court commissioner who is subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of the judge.

If counsel is retained or appointed after the probable-cause hearing stage, s/he should immediately ascertain from the client, the prosecutor, or court records whether a probable-cause hearing was, in fact, held. (Since the client is unlikely to know what a “probable-cause hearing” is and may confuse it with the non-evidentiary detention hearing, the best question to ask the client is whether there was a hearing at which people took the witness stand and testified.) If any part of a probable-cause hearing was held, ordinarily counsel should have the stenographic notes transcribed or, if the client is an indigent, move for their transcription at state expense. See § 4.37 infra. If the transcript shows defects in the hearing that counsel wishes to challenge or if there has been no hearing and no valid waiver or if there is no transcript of the hearing and no valid waiver of a transcript, counsel should decide whether s/he wants a probable-cause hearing at this time. See § 4.30 supra. If so, then s/he should move the judge who is presently presiding over the case (in other words, the judge to whom the case has been assigned for trial) to hold proceedings in abeyance and to transfer the case back to the judge who presided over the Initial Hearing so that a procedurally correct probable-cause hearing can be held. Counsel should point out that the transfer back to the earlier judge is necessary to avoid the trial judge hearing potentially prejudicial information that is relevant solely to the detention and probable-cause determinations and would not be admissible at trial. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 16-2312(j) (2018). If the trial judge refuses to order a hearing or refuses to transfer the case or if the Initial Hearing judge, upon receiving the case, refuses to convene a hearing, the appropriate form of relief in most jurisdictions will be, again, prohibition or mandamus.
§ 4.32 DEFENSIVE CONDUCT OF THE PROBABLE-CAUSE HEARING – CROSS-EXAMINING FOR DISCOVERY AND IMPEACHMENT

As explained in § 4.29 supra, defense counsel has three principal goals at the probable-cause hearing: (1) to show that the prosecution has not met its burden of proof and thereby to prevent detention of the respondent and, in some jurisdictions, also secure dismissal of the charges against the respondent; (2) to put the testimony of the prosecution witnesses on record in a way that makes them most impeachable at trial; and (3) to discover as much of the prosecutor’s case as possible.

Once the prosecution has made out a prima facie case, there is no great likelihood that cross-examination will destroy it so completely as to prevent a finding of probable-cause.
Accordingly, at that point, counsel should proceed with the objectives of discovery and of nailing down impeachable prosecution testimony.

Frequently counsel may find that s/he is working at cross-purposes in seeking to discover and to lay a foundation for impeachment simultaneously. S/he will obviously have to accommodate these objectives in particular situations with an eye to which objective is more important in dealing with an individual prosecution witness. If counsel vigorously cross-examines the witness, in an effort to get a contradiction or concession on record, the witness will normally dig in and give a minimum of information in an effort to save his or her testimonial position; and, more than likely, s/he will be uncooperative if counsel thereafter attempts to interview the witness prior to trial. On the other hand, if counsel engages the witness in routine examination, amiable and ranging, counsel may be able to pick up many clues for investigation and for planning of the defense. Of course, some witnesses resent any kind of cross-examination.
If counsel thinks that this type of witness is lying or confused, counsel may wish to pin the witness down. Under no circumstances, however, should counsel educate the witness about the weaknesses of his or her testimony. To avoid mutual education by prosecution witnesses, the rule on witnesses should ordinarily be invoked. See § 27.11 infra.

The probable utility of cross-examining for impeachment depends almost as much on the prosecutor as on the witness. If the prosecutor is one who prepares witnesses as carefully for the probable-cause hearing as for trial, the likelihood is small of getting anything out of the witness at the hearing that will be useful to impeach him or her at trial. Most prosecutors, however, do not have the time to prepare witnesses thoroughly for the probable-cause hearing, with the result that the hearing provides a unique opportunity to catch the prosecution witnesses, on record, with their guards down. Counsel should be loth to pass up any opportunity for thorough questioning of witnesses at the probable-cause hearing, since this may be counsel’s only real chance to learn their stories in detail prior to trial. Although counsel will certainly attempt to obtain statements from the prosecution witnesses during subsequent investigation (see § 8.12 infra), the reality is that most defense attorneys have limited investigative resources, are often unable to track down prosecution witnesses, and commonly have trouble persuading them to cooperate and be interviewed even after they have been tracked down. And while the formal discovery process will provide counsel with some information about the prosecutor’s case (see Chapter 9), it allows only limited access to witness statements (see § 27.12(a) infra).

§ 4.33 RESISTING LIMITATIONS ON CROSS-EXAMINATION

Many judges allow defense counsel very grudging room for cross-examination at the probable-cause hearing on the reasoning that guilt is not at issue, that the prosecution needs only show probable-cause and not proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and that, therefore, nothing cross-examination might disclose is relevant.

The theoretical answers to this reasoning are (a) that it would be plainly relevant if cross-examination forced the witness to withdraw his or her testimony on direct examination, and (b) that the statute expressly permitting the respondent to cross-examine prosecution witnesses, call defense witnesses, or both at the probable-cause hearing (as most statutes do) assumes that the judge is not to restrict the inquiry to a bare-bones hearing of the prosecution’s evidence, untested for credibility. The cases cited in § 4.29 supra contain quotable language endorsing the right of the defense to conduct a probing cross-examination at the probable-cause hearing.

Most judges, however, like to push the hearing along and will often not be persuaded by these theories. Counsel should continue to attempt to cross-examine, as long as s/he can decently do so, in order to make clear for the record the extent of the limitations imposed on cross-examination. S/he should then respectfully ask the judge whether all cross-examination is going to be disallowed and, if not, what areas the judge is precluding. If the judge says that s/he cannot tell until counsel asks the questions, counsel should resume attempts to cross-examine. Eventually the judge will shut counsel off altogether. Counsel should then object to the denial of cross-examination on the grounds of the client’s statutory right to a probable-cause hearing (§ 4.28(b) supra) and the statutory and constitutional rights to cross-examination and to confrontation (§ 4.31(c) supra), effective representation by counsel (see § 9.09(b)(1) infra), and a fair hearing, as well as on the ground that the statute giving respondents a right to present testimony (see § 4.31(c) supra) envisions that the judge will hear both sides of the case. The record should be clear that this objection has been overruled if it has. Counsel is now in a position to pursue the type of prerogative writ proceeding described in § 4.31(e) supra.

An unfortunate dictum in a plurality opinion of the Supreme Court appears to accept, without federal constitutional quarrel, a state law practice permitting the magistrate “to terminate the preliminary hearing once probable cause is established.” Adams v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 278, 282 (1972). This language may be seized upon by lower courts as giving the judge virtually unlimited power to curtail defensive cross-examination. But the Supreme Court did not, in fact, have before it in the Adams case any instance of curtailment of the defensive conduct of a preliminary hearing. The plurality opinion was merely noting, as relevant to the question of the retroactivity of the constitutional requirement of appointed counsel at preliminary hearing (see § 4.03 supra), that “because of limitations upon the use of the preliminary hearing for discovery and impeachment purposes, counsel cannot be as effectual as at trial.” 405 U.S. at 282. So it is fair to urge that the Adams dictum must be read narrowly: as allowing judicial discretion to curb cross-examination pursued “for discovery and impeachment purposes” only, “once probable-cause is established,” id., but not as authorizing the restriction of cross-examination designed to test the foundation of the probable-cause showing itself, even if the cross-examination does also provide some discovery. For it seems plain that if, with one exception not presently relevant, a parolee has a right “to confrontation and cross-examination” at a preliminary parole-revocation hearing, Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 487 (1972), juvenile respondents have rights that are at least as ample at a probable-cause hearing, which is “part of a criminal prosecution,” id. at 480. See also Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 781-82, 788-90 (1973). (Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), does not hold to the contrary. See § 4.31(c) supra.)

Certainly, counsel is on far firmer ground when s/he can justify his or her questions on cross-examination as going to probe the prosecution’s showing of probable-cause than when they have no justification other than discovery. Only when there is no possibility of successfully urging that a line of questioning goes to probable-cause and that therefore it is within the purview of the classic functions of the probable-cause hearing (see § 4.29 supra) should counsel attempt to justify it on the basis of a right to discovery as such (see § 9.09 infra; cf. § 4.29 supra), pointing out, if possible, why in the case at bar, unlike Adams, there are no effective “alternative procedures” for discovery. 405 U.S. at 282.

§ 4.34 CALLING ADVERSE WITNESSES

Because the prosecution needs do nothing more than make a prima facie case at the probable-cause hearing, the prosecution will frequently call only some of the witnesses whom it plans to use at trial. When persons whom defense counsel has identified as potential prosecution witnesses refuse to be interviewed by the defense, counsel may want to serve them with defense subpoenas for the slated date of the probable-cause hearing, approach them before court, and offer them the opportunity to talk with counsel – or with counsel’s investigator – outside of the courtroom instead of having to appear in court. This cage-rattling technique can produce useful discovery. Similarly, issuing subpoenas ducès tecum for the production of records, other documents and physical objects can provide a means for prying these materials out of the hands of uncooperative custodians at an earlier stage than the formal discovery process discussed in Chapter 9.

However, two cautions need to be observed here – one simple and obvious, the other more complex.

First, counsel should not subpoena any person or material that the prosecutor is otherwise unlikely to identify as a potential source of relevant information.

Second, counsel will seldom be advised to actually put an adverse witness on the stand, as distinguished from releasing him or her from the defense subpoena after out-of-court questioning. Most jurisdictions continue to follow the traditional rules of witness examination.
that prohibit a direct examiner from asking leading questions or impeaching his or her own witness, and most jurisdictions apply the same restrictions at probable-cause hearings as at trials. Under these conditions, calling an unfriendly witness is a bad gamble: Counsel will be handicapped against extracting any useful testimony, and anything useful that s/he does extract will be exposed to deconstruction or reconstruction by the prosecutor’s use of leading questions and impeachment on cross. Consequently, counsel should ordinarily refrain from putting any adverse witness on the stand unless (a) the evidence rules applicable to probable-cause hearings in counsel’s jurisdiction do not forbid direct examiners to lead and impeach their own witnesses, or (b) the presiding judge is known to be liberal in granting defense requests to declare witnesses hostile (see § 33.25 infra). (Counsel’s best chances for getting witnesses declared hostile are (i) situations in which a witness has publicly demonstrated strong personal animosity toward the respondent apart from the events giving rise to the delinquency charge, and (ii) situations in which other prosecution witnesses have recounted incriminating hearsay declarations of the witness. In the latter situations, counsel can invoke the respondent’s state-law right to contest the prosecutor’s prima facie case and can also make some mileage out of the constitutional rights of confrontation and Due Process (see § 4.31(c) supra; §§ 9.09(b)(3), 9.09(b)(4) infra).

Nevertheless, most judges will almost always exercise their discretion to refuse to allow defense counsel to use hostile-witnesses questioning techniques at a probable-cause hearing.)

§ 4.35 CALLING FAVORABLE DEFENSE WITNESSES

Presentation of defense witnesses – particularly the respondent – at the probable-cause hearing will have damaging and probably irreversible consequences for the respondent’s chances of prevailing at trial. The prosecutor will obtain complete discovery of the defense case and can send the police out to undermine the defense theory of the case. In addition, the prosecutor will be able to lay a foundation for impeachment of defense witnesses at trial. When, as frequently occurs, the client wishes to take the stand, or to present other defense witnesses at the probable-cause hearing, counsel must carefully explain to the client that: (a) the prosecutor’s burden of proof at the probable-cause hearing is so minimal that s/he is bound to win the hearing regardless of defense testimony; and (b) the presentation of that testimony will probably doom the respondent’s chances of winning at trial.

There is, however, one narrow circumstance in which counsel should consider the presentation of defense witnesses. On rare occasions, the presentation of defense testimony will prevent the judge from ordering pretrial detention, either because it precludes a finding of probable-cause or because it sufficiently mitigates the crime to dissuade the judge from ordering detention notwithstanding the existence of probable-cause. In these cases – and it should be emphasized that they are very rare – the goal of securing the child’s liberty will outweigh the tactical advantages of reserving the evidence until trial.

§ 4.36 OBJECTING TO INADMISSIBLE EVIDENCE

To the extent that local practice makes the rules of evidence applicable at a probable-cause hearing (see § 4.31(a) supra), counsel will sometimes have the opportunity to object to prosecution evidence as inadmissible. Ordinarily s/he should object only if (a) there is a good chance that the prosecution will fail to make a prima facie case if the objectionable evidence is excluded; or (b) counsel is sure s/he already knows everything s/he could learn from the evidence. If the prosecution has a facially sufficient case, counsel will need investigative leads to defend against it. One of the best methods of discovery is to permit the witness to make all the hearsay and other inadmissible statements that s/he wants. By allowing the testimony, counsel can also obtain the means to guard against the disclosure of prejudicial information to the fact-finder at trial. Prior to a bench trial, counsel can use the notes of the probable-cause testimony to support a motion in limine and argue before a judge other than the trial judge that the prosecutor should be forbidden to present the prejudicial matter at trial. See §§ 7.03(a), 7.03(c), 30.02(a)(1) infra. If a jury trial is to be had, counsel can make a similar pretrial motion in limine or can use the probable-cause hearing notes to make and argue anticipatory objections out of the hearing of the jury at trial. See § 30.02(a)(2) infra.

The tactic of nonobjection can sometimes turn out to be a two-edged sword, enabling the prosecutor, as well as defense counsel, to learn previously unknown facts. This consideration will weigh more or less heavily against defense counsel’s use of the tactic, depending upon how careless or careful the prosecutor is known to be in his or her investigation and preparation both before and after the probable-cause hearing.

§ 4.37 OBTAINING A TRANSCRIPT

Many of the tactical suggestions made in the preceding sections have assumed that there will be a reporter or stenographer transcribing the testimony. Whether a court reporter routinely attends probable-cause hearings depends on local practice. Counsel should not assume that a reporter will be in attendance but should inquire. If local practice does not provide for a court reporter, the expense of a stenographer should be considered by the defense. Alternatively, the judge can be asked to allow counsel to operate a recording device at the defense table. Either a court reporter’s transcript or a defense recording will usually serve as an invaluable aid in counsel’s preparation for cross-examination at trial. The added advantage of a transcript is its greater utility at trial to impeach a witness who alters his or her testimony. A defense-made recording of the witness’s probable-cause hearing testimony will be subject to prosecutorial quibbles about accuracy and intelligibility when offered for impeachment purposes at trial.

In some jurisdictions in which the testimony is routinely recorded, it is nevertheless not transcribed unless specially ordered by a party. Again, counsel should inquire whether this is the situation and should order a transcript if necessary.

When both recording and transcription are routine, the transcripts are usually forwarded within several days after the hearing to the office of the clerk of court. Counsel may wish to examine the hearing transcript in the clerk’s office before deciding whether to order a defense copy, in order possibly to save the client an unnecessary expense. If the client is unable to afford a transcript – or a stenographer, when testimony is not reported – counsel should request transcription – or reporting and transcription, as the case may be – at state expense. In the event that local law does not give counsel a right to what s/he wants, s/he should invoke the federal Equal Protection and Due Process doctrines adverted to in § 4.31(d) supra and § 11.03(a) infra. Procedures for enforcing an indigent client’s rights under these doctrines and/or state law are discussed in § 4.31(e) supra.

§ 4.38 CONTINUANCES

In a few jurisdictions a continuance of the probable-cause hearing may be made only with the respondent’s assent. The more ordinary practice permits continuances in the discretion of the judge upon the application of either prosecution or defense. That discretion is doubtless now limited by Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), and County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991), see § 4.28(a), (b) supra; and the citation of Gerstein in opposition to a prosecution-sought continuance is appropriate unless local law can be construed to permit the judge to make a probable-cause determination upon affidavits without a full evidentiary hearing. If the judge grants the prosecution a continuance that defense counsel believes is excessive, counsel may challenge it for abuse of discretion by mandamus, or file a petition for a writ of habeas corpus if the client is in custody.

The defense itself may want a brief continuance to investigate prior to cross-examining the prosecution’s witnesses. In addition, a continuance may provide a useful opportunity to try to persuade the prosecutor to divert the case. See Chapter 19 infra. A defense request for a continuance can invoke the respondent’s federal Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment rights to counsel (see § 4.03 supra and §§ 9.09(b)(1), 15.02 infra) as well as local statutory provisions granting the judge discretion to continue the probable-cause hearing on defense motion. However, when the result of a defense continuance will be the elongation of the respondent’s period of detention, counsel should not request such a continuance unless absolutely necessary, and even then only with the client’s approval.
Chapter 5

The Client Interview

§ 5.01 INTRODUCTION: SCOPE OF THE CHAPTER; OVERVIEW OF THE CHRONOLOGY OF AN INITIAL INTERVIEW

There are essentially three types of initial interviews, which differ according to the circumstances under which counsel is meeting the client and conducting the interview. The first type, which will be denominated the “full-scale interview,” is conducted without extraneous time pressures and covers all of the information that counsel will need to know in preparing for trial as well as for all pretrial and posttrial proceedings. This “full-scale interview” may take place in counsel’s office when the client first comes to see counsel, or at a detention facility when counsel goes to see the client at the behest of a parent or upon appointment by the court. The second type of initial interview is the one described in § 3.22 supra, in which counsel meets a newly arrested client at the police station and, because of the limited time and restrictive setting, must focus upon the crucial message to convey to the client at this point: that the client should refrain from making any statements to the police about the crime for which s/he was arrested. The third type of initial interview is the one described in § 4.07 supra, in which counsel meets the respondent on the day of the Initial Hearing and, again under rushed circumstances, must interview the client with a focus on information needed for the detention hearing and probable-cause hearing. In the latter two scenarios, the rushed interview that counsel conducts in his or her first meeting with the client will have to be supplemented by a later interview (in counsel’s office if the client is released; at the detention facility if s/he is not), in which counsel covers all of the elements of the “full-scale interview” that s/he was forced to neglect in the first meeting with the client.

A “full-scale interview” consists of essentially six separate stages:

1. The introductory phase, in which counsel introduces himself or herself to the child and parent, and explains counsel’s need for meeting with the child alone (see § 5.03 infra);

2. The initial phase of counsel’s private meeting with the child, in which counsel establishes rapport with the child, explains the attorney-client privilege, and discusses other preliminary matters (see § 5.04 infra);

3. Questioning of the client about the facts of the offense, defense witnesses, and other matters that counsel needs to know in order to prepare for trial and prepare pretrial motions (see §§ 5.06, 5.07 infra);

4. Eliciting the client’s social history, especially facts needed for the detention hearing if that hearing has not yet taken place (see § 5.08 infra);
5. Final instructions to the client about refraining from talking with the police or anyone else about the case and instructions about the importance of promptly relaying any new information to counsel (see § 5.10 infra); and

6. Upon completion of the separate interview of the client, further discussion with the parent or guardian, which counsel should conduct in the presence of the client (see § 5.11 infra).

§ 5.02 PREPARING FOR THE INTERVIEW

Proper preparation for an interview is required if counsel hopes to achieve the objective of inspiring confidence and trust in the client. It is important that counsel be acquainted with the specific charges against the respondent and the elements of the charged offenses in order to avoid floundering when taking the client’s story. Knowledge of the applicable penalty provisions is indispensable in order to answer the question – which the client will almost certainly ask – about what kind of a sentence the client is facing. If the interview takes place prior to the detention hearing, counsel should also be prepared to answer the client’s questions about the likelihood of avoiding pretrial detention.

§ 5.03 THE INTRODUCTORY PHASE: EXPLAINING TO THE FAMILY THE NEED FOR COUNSEL’S MEETING WITH THE CLIENT ALONE

§ 5.03(a) The Reasons for Meeting with the Client Alone

In order to get the accurate account of the facts that counsel will need to investigate the case, counsel must meet with the client outside the presence of the child’s parent or guardian. If the parent or guardian is present, the client may be afraid to speak truthfully about his or her participation in the crime, either because s/he is afraid of the sanctions the parent/guardian will impose or because s/he is afraid of disappointing the parent/guardian. Even those clients who admit involvement in front of the parent/guardian often minimize their involvement and distort the facts in order to present the best picture. Clients may be unwilling to admit even noncriminal conduct in the parent/guardian’s presence if that conduct violates parental directives such as a curfew or an order to stay away from certain friends.

In addition to creating subtle impediments to accurate interviewing, some parents overtly intrude on the interview process, telling certain events from their own perspective and preventing the child from relating the events.

Moreover, the presence of the parent or guardian can have detrimental legal consequences. The vast majority of jurisdictions do not recognize a parent-child privilege. See, e.g., United States v. Davies, 768 F.2d 893, 896-900 (7th Cir. 1985); Cissna v. State, 170 Ind. App. 437, 439-40, 352 N.E.2d 793, 795 (1976); State v. Gilroy, 313 N.W.2d 513, 518 (Iowa 1981); State v. Bruce, 655 S.W.2d 66, 68 (Mo. App. 1983); In the Interest of O.F., 773 N.W.2d 206, 210-11 (N.D. 2009); DeLeon v. State, 684 S.W.2d 778, 782 (Tex. Crim. App. 1984). See generally Catherine J. Ross, Implementing Constitutional Rights for Juveniles: The Parent-Child Privilege in Context, 14 STAN. L. REV. & POL’Y REV. 85, 90-102 (2003). Thus parents who wish to testify against their children and recount the child’s incriminating statements are free to do so, and parents who do not wish to testify can be subpoenaed to testify against their will. Even in the few jurisdictions that have established a parent-child privilege, there are exceptions to the privilege, and thus counsel can never be confident that the privilege will shield statements made during an interview in the parent/guardian’s presence. See, e.g., In the Matter of Mark G., 65 A.D.2d 917, 917, 410 N.Y.S.2d 464, 465-66 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 1978) (notwithstanding New York’s common-law parent-child privilege, father could testify, over defense objection, to his son’s admission of delinquency offense because the statement was not made “in confidence and for the purpose of obtaining support, advice or guidance” from the father, and the father did not “wish[ ] to remain silent and keep respondent’s answer confidential”).

§ 5.03(b) Explaining to Parents Why They Should Absent Themselves from the Interview

If the initial client interview takes place in a detention facility or the juvenile detention area of the courthouse, the child’s parent or guardian obviously will not be present during the interview.

If, on the other hand, the interview takes place in counsel’s office, the client’s parent will usually enter the office with the client. Counsel then confronts the difficult task of explaining to the parent counsel’s need for a private interview with the client. The parent is likely to resist any explanation that his or her presence could bias the interview and will instead insist that the child feels perfectly comfortable in discussing any subject whatsoever in front of the parent. If counsel insists upon the biasing effect of the parent’s presence, that insistence may produce nothing but ill will and intransigence on the parent’s part.

In attempting to bring about the parent’s departure, counsel cannot afford to anger or irritate the parent. Besides the obvious dictates of common courtesy, maintenance of a good relationship with the parent is essential because the parent will play a pivotal role in the determination of the child’s pretrial status and posttrial disposition. Counsel may need to persuade a reluctant parent to keep the child at home in order to avoid pretrial detention or a disposition of incarceration. In addition, certain community-based programs demand the parent’s involvement in the admissions interview and therapeutic programs, and counsel may need to talk the parent into participating.

Counsel should ordinarily begin the interview by meeting briefly with the child and parent together. During this group session, counsel should explain the nature of the charges, the potential consequences, and the chronology of the legal proceedings to come. Counsel then should describe the functions of a defense attorney in a delinquency case and explain, in the clearest possible terms, that counsel is the attorney for the child and not for the parent or for the family as a whole. Having laid that groundwork, counsel can state the all-important bottom line: that, because the child is the client, counsel will need to meet with him or her alone to discuss the case.

122

Most parents will accept counsel’s explanation of roles and the need for a private meeting between attorney and client. If the parent still is unwilling to absent himself or herself from the interview, counsel can explain the potentially detrimental legal consequences of the parent’s presence. As explained in § 5.03(a) supra, most jurisdictions lack a parent-child privilege and even the few States that possess such a privilege have created exceptions to the privilege. Most parents will be amenable to absenting themselves from the interview once they understand that their presence could expose them to the risk of being subpoenaed to testify against the child.

§ 5.04 COMMENCING THE PRIVATE INTERVIEW OF THE CLIENT: ESTABLISHING RAPPORT, EXPLAINING THE ATTORNEY-CLIENT PRIVILEGE, AND OTHER PRELIMINARY MATTERS

§ 5.04(a) The Importance of Establishing a Good Attorney-Client Relationship

The first interview with a client in a delinquency case is probably the most important exchange that counsel will have with the client. It largely shapes the client’s judgment of the lawyer. Any initial impressions counsel makes may be indelible. At the least, this interview will strongly affect all future dealings between the two. The lawyer’s primary objective in the initial interview is to establish an attorney-client relationship grounded on mutual confidence, trust, and respect.

§ 5.04(b) Putting the Client at Ease and Establishing a Relationship of Trust

There are always difficulties in interviewing and relating to clients, whether they are adults or juveniles, because of differences in perspective — and possibly in goals — as well as whatever cultural, class, and racial differences may exist. When the client is a juvenile, the attorney-client relationship is further complicated by the age gap between counsel and client. Children often are reluctant to speak to adult strangers about anything important. A child may give different meanings to words and may make a host of assumptions about how adults (including adult attorneys) feel and act. A juvenile client may distrust the lawyer simply because s/he is an adult and thus reject the attorney’s declaration that his or her loyalty is to the client and that s/he will carry out the client’s wishes.

An understanding of the client’s mind set is essential in striking up an attorney-client relationship. Counsel must remember that the client is a person in trouble and that the last thing s/he needs is more trouble from counsel. Counsel should therefore make the beginning of the initial interview with the client as undemanding as possible. Questions should be kept very simple until the client’s abilities to understand questions, to think, and to articulate answers have been evaluated. Thereafter, counsel should keep well within the limits of the client’s vocabulary.
Counsel should avoid displaying any indication that the client is making a bad impression or is at fault for failing to answer counsel’s questions relevantly. Conversely, counsel wants to convey the sense that the client is doing well and is giving counsel helpful information. The client usually enters upon this meeting with certain preconceptions about lawyers that are far from favorable. These include the notions that lawyers are self-interested, uncaring, grasping, and untrustworthy. If the client is street-wise, s/he is also likely to hold the more specific belief that criminal defense lawyers only want to talk their clients into pleading guilty to save themselves the trouble of trying cases. Counsel should attempt to rectify, or at least alleviate, these preconceptions by showing genuine concern for the client as an individual human being – not just another faceless client in a parade of stereotyped clients – and by showing a willingness to work on the client’s behalf.

To build rapport with the client, counsel should make use of any available personalizing touches. For example, in addition to asking the client’s name, counsel should ask the client’s nickname and, having learned the nickname, ask the client whether s/he would prefer counsel’s using the nickname or the client’s given name. Offering to do concrete things for the client (for example, if the client is in detention, offering to contact the client’s family) is a more credible demonstration of counsel’s willingness to work for the client than general self-touting professions of industriousness in the future. If the client evidences particular concern over the police officers’ seizure of the respondent’s cash or other personal property, counsel should promise to look into the situation and do whatever can be done to retrieve the property.

Perhaps the single most important impression to convey is that counsel views his or her own job as being exclusively to serve and help the client to the best of counsel’s abilities. S/he should avoid giving the client any grounds for suspicion or confusion about the lawyer’s role or loyalties or motives – doubts which may arise if the lawyer begins to ask for information without saying why s/he wants it. The client should be told that the lawyer’s only purpose and only interest are to represent the client and that, in order to make sure that nothing is overlooked which could help the client, counsel needs certain information. If the relevance of counsel’s questioning to the client’s needs and interests is not perfectly obvious – obvious, that is, to a layperson, not a lawyer – counsel should explain why s/he is asking this or that.

The client should be made to feel comfortable and secure in the presence of counsel. When explaining something to the client, it is usually better to ask “okay?” than “Do you understand that?” Whatever the client tells counsel should be received with interest and an attempt to understand, even if it does not appear relevant to the immediate tasks at hand as counsel conceives them. Patience in hearing the client out is crucial, since under stress s/he will frequently be rambling and inarticulate. S/he should not be shut off without explanation – or at all, unless time is pressing; and, when s/he must be turned from one subject to another, counsel should explain the need to change the subject in a way that does not make the client feel foolish.
§ 5.04(c) Giving the Client a Business Card

As a means for establishing rapport and putting the client at ease, it is often useful to give the client a business card and to use the card as a prop to reinforce certain messages. Pointing out the lines on the card containing counsel’s phone numbers, counsel should explain that s/he is giving the client the numbers so that the client can call whenever the client has questions or has information to impart to counsel. Counsel can say explicitly that it will be necessary for counsel and the client to keep in touch and to work together closely in fighting against the charges. This reinforces the message that counsel is there to help the client, and it also conveys the crucial idea that the client should inform counsel about any and all case-related information s/he can think of. Finally, it implicitly tells the client that the client will also need to make an effort to get along with counsel and to assist in finding witnesses and preparing the case.

§ 5.04(d) Explaining the Attorney-Client Relationship

A useful way to emphasize that counsel’s sole interest lies in serving the client, without sounding like this is a sales pitch learned on a used car lot, is to find some obviously relevant, operational reason for describing counsel’s role. Often the best occasion comes in connection with an explanation of the attorney-client privilege – an explanation that is independently necessary, in any event, in order to assure the client that s/he can tell his or her story to counsel in complete confidence. Counsel may say something like this, for example:

Now, I’m going to ask you to tell me some things about yourself and also about this charge they have against you. Before I do, I want you to know that everything you tell me is strictly private, just between you and me. Nothing you tell me goes to the police or the prosecutor or the judge or your parent(s) or anybody else. Nobody can make me tell them what you said to me, and I won’t.

Maybe you’ve heard about this thing that they call the attorney-client privilege. The law says that when a person is talking to [his] [her] lawyer, whatever [he] [she] tells the lawyer is confidential and secret between the two of them. This is because the law recognizes that the lawyer’s obligation is to [his] [her] client and to nobody else; that the lawyer is supposed to be 100 per cent on the client’s side; that the lawyer is only supposed to help [his] [her] client and never do anything – or tell anybody anything – that might hurt the client in any way. The prosecutor is the one who is supposed to represent the government in prosecuting cases; and the judge’s job is to judge the cases. But the law wants to make sure that – even if everybody else is lined up against an accused – there is one person who is not supposed to look out for the government but to be completely for the person who’s accused of the crime. That is the person’s lawyer.

As your lawyer, I am completely for you. And I couldn’t be completely for you if I could be forced to tell anybody else the things that you say to me in private. So you can trust me and tell me anything you want without worrying that I will ever pass it along to anyone else because I won’t. I can’t be questioned or forced to talk about what you tell me, even by a court, and I am not allowed to tell it to anyone else without your permission because I am 100 per cent on your side, and my job is to work for you and only for you; so everything we talk about stays just between us. Okay?

§ 5.04(e)  Settling the Roles of Attorney and Client and Explaining the Need for a Truthful Rendition of the Facts

Counsel can further allay the client’s suspicions by explaining that all of the fundamental decisions about the objectives of representation will be made by the client and not by counsel. Counsel should indicate that every major decision about how the defense will proceed – such as whether to go to trial or to offer a guilty plea – will be the client’s to make: Counsel will keep the client advised of any developments in the case and, when decisions of any consequence have to be made, counsel will discuss all of the options with the client, so that the client can make well-informed choices. Counsel should explain that s/he will raise any defense that the law permits and will take any action necessary to protect the client’s rights. But counsel should also mention that it will be counsel’s role to make strategic judgments about how to investigate the case, how to formulate the defense in legal terms, and what evidence to present if the case goes to trial. Counsel should promise to talk with the client about issues of this sort, and to get the client’s thinking about the best possible strategies to adopt, before counsel makes decisions that will necessarily depend, in the final analysis, upon counsel’s legal training and experience.

The explanation of roles also provides a convenient opportunity for impressing on the client that counsel will need to get from the client a complete, truthful account of all of the facts relating to the case, in order to investigate and prepare for trial effectively. If counsel delays making this point until counsel begins asking questions about the circumstances of the crime and the client’s involvement or non-involvement, the client may get the impression that counsel expects the client to lie and is warning the client not to. It’s better to use counsel’s preliminary explanations of attorney-client role relationships, near the beginning of the interview, to introduce the point that counsel’s ability to defend the client effectively depends on the client giving counsel a complete, accurate, honest picture of the facts.

Having covered the roles of attorney and client, counsel can easily turn to the need for a full and accurate account of the facts that the client knows, believes, or can foresee that other people will believe concerning the crime, the client’s whereabouts and behavior at the time of the crime, and the client’s interactions with other persons (complainants and victims, potential co-respondents, individuals who may be charged as adult defendants, potential witnesses, police and other law-enforcement personnel) who may be involved in the case. Counsel should explain that some clients think an attorney wants to hear only favorable information, but that is incorrect and harmful to the client’s defense. Unless counsel is told about every unfavorable fact that the police and the prosecution could try to show, counsel will be unprepared to challenge those facts, and counsel may develop a defense strategy that will fall apart instead of one that will work. Counsel can also mention that many people accused of a crime have gotten convicted precisely because they did not tell their lawyers about damaging facts that the prosecutor came up with at trial, catching defense counsel by surprise. Counsel should reassure the client that it is not counsel’s job to judge the client, but rather to represent the client whether s/he is guilty or innocent, and that that is precisely what counsel intends to do. In addition to saying these words, counsel has to incorporate their message in counsel’s own conduct and questioning style: Counsel must avoid giving any sign of moral condemnation of the client’s conduct.

§ 5.05 NOTE-TAKING DURING THE INTERVIEW: EXPLAINING THE NEED FOR TAKING NOTES; TECHNIQUES FOR TAKING NOTES IN THE LEAST DISRUPTIVE MANNER

It is advisable to explain to the client early in the interview counsel’s need to take notes. Naive clients will often be apprehensive about counsel’s recording things they say which are incriminating or even merely embarrassing. They may fear that counsel will turn these notes over to the prosecutor or the judge or will disclose them to the client’s parent or guardian. Systemsavvy clients will often fear that a record of what they told counsel in an initial interview will box them in against subsequent changes in their story.

An effective way of alleviating these concerns is by linking the explanation of note-taking with counsel’s preceding explanation of the attorney-client privilege. Counsel should begin by saying: “I hope you won’t mind if I take notes of some of the things you tell me” and then explain that these notes are only for counsel’s own use, to help counsel remember details of what the client says. Counsel should tell the client that counsel will never show the notes to anyone else, and that no one – not even a court – can force counsel to show them the notes, because whatever counsel writes down is legally protected by the rule of attorney-client privilege. In this manner, counsel simultaneously reinforces his or her earlier explanation of attorney-client privilege by giving the client a concrete demonstration of how the privilege works in practice. It is also useful to tell the client that counsel understands that the client may later remember or learn information which differs from the client’s present recollections, and that counsel’s notes are only intended to record the client’s best efforts to recall relevant facts at the time of this preliminary discussion.

When the client begins to relate relevant facts about his or her background or the circumstances of the offense, counsel will have a natural tendency to start taking notes immediately. This is a temptation to be resisted. Counsel does better to postpone writing or typing anything for a while after the client starts providing pertinent information, because looking the client in the eye and appearing interested in the client’s words – not immediately falling into the role of indifferent stenographer – are the most effective techniques for establishing rapport and encouraging recollection and disclosure. After engaging the client in a conversational run-through of the gist of the information counsel is seeking (or hearing the client out if s/he has a story s/he is anxious to tell), counsel can move on into note-taking mode by (a) asking “would it be okay now if I took some notes about what we’ve been discussing?”, (b) summarizing aloud the essential material that the client has thus far related, while counsel writes it down and asks, item by item, “have I got that right?”; and then (c) continuing with alternating periods of conversational interchange and this kind of note-taking.

In summarizing things the client has said and requesting his or her ratification of them while counsel takes notes, counsel should not preface this procedure with language like “let’s go back over what’s important” or “I want to get down the key points in what you’ve said.” These throat-clearing overtures imply that everything the client has said but counsel omits from the summary is unimportant, not “key.” The result of these inadvertently judgmental pronouncements is likely to be to leave the client miffed by counsel’s apparent dismissal of some matters that the client cares about, or to telegraph to the client, prematurely, that there is a particular version of the story that counsel wants the client to tell, or both. Deadpan formulas like “let me make sure I’m understanding what you said about [event A] or [topic B]” work best. As counsel summarizes and writes, s/he can ask clarifying or amplifying questions.

Long periods of writing in silence should be avoided. If an extended note has to be written, counsel should vocalize it as s/he writes and then ask the client, “Is that correct?” (At later stages of the relationship with a client, writing or reading notes silently for a protracted period may occasionally be useful for particular purposes – for example, to give the client a chance to absorb or think over a point without feeling pressured to respond quickly, or to unnerve a client who counsel believes is lying – but these are exceptions to the general rule that the client should not ordinarily be left hanging while counsel concentrates on counsel’s notes.) Once the client gets into the swing of his or her story, it is usually wise for counsel to take notes of every significant point while the client is talking. Excessive writing is ill-advised, however, because it impedes counsel’s ability to observe the client’s nonverbal expressions and also suggests that counsel is more interested in the facts than in the client as a person.

Perhaps the best way to take sufficiently detailed notes without excessive writing is to develop the knack of writing down key words and key phrases, using the client’s own language rather than translating it or summarizing it in counsel’s terms. After the interview, when counsel is alone, s/he can go over the notes while memory of the interview itself is fresh and can write out or dictate a lengthier, more detailed and coherent version of what the client said, together with counsel’s observations, interpretations, and impressions. Using the client’s exact words in the original notes will stimulate counsel’s recall of the things that were said before and after the noted words. Counsel should review the notes and prepare the refined interview report as soon as possible after the interview. When counsel has enough control over his or her schedule, s/he will find it useful to leave a half-hour or so free immediately following interviews for the latter purpose. This may appear profligate, but experience shows that it is more efficient than either trying to write out copious notes during an interview or trying to reconstruct the details of information obtained in an interview by going over terse notes half a day or more after they were taken.

Detailed records of client interviews, particularly of interviews conducted shortly after the time of the offense with which the client is charged, are invaluable tools in defense work. They serve subsequently to refresh both counsel’s and the client’s memories. They can be used for a wide range of practical purposes: e.g., to support counsel’s representations of fact during efforts to convince the prosecutor to drop or reduce the charges or during plea bargaining; to support counsel’s representations to the court in support of requests for continuances, state-paid investigative or consultative assistance, or forma pauperis subpoenas to gather defensive evidence; to support counsel’s representations to the court in support of motions; to assist in preparing the respondent to testify. They will also be admissible at trial in the client’s behalf if the prosecution seeks to create the impression that the client’s trial testimony is a recent fabrication. In addition, notes will shield counsel from unwarranted attacks (such as inadequate representation and suppression of facts favorable to the defense) should the respondent ultimately be convicted.

In some jurisdictions, however, interview notes or reports may be discoverable by the prosecution and usable to impeach the client if s/he testifies at trial. See §§ 9.11, 27.12(b), 33.03 infra. When this is the case, counsel may be able to insulate these materials against disclosure by (1) including within counsel’s written notes of the client’s oral statements sufficient analytic and evaluative commentary to imbue the whole writing with “work product” protection, see Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 397-402 (1981); and (2) not reading or submitting the notes to the client for approval after counsel has put them into final form (cf. Goldberg v. United States, 425 U.S. 94, 105-07 (1976)). For discussion, see §§ 8.10, 9.13 infra. Counsel can develop and employ a set of covert codes through which s/he – but not a judge who may later inspect the notes on a prosecutor’s motion for discovery – can distinguish counsel’s summaries and commentaries from phrases that are direct quotations of the client’s words. (As simple a gimmick as consistently using “S/he states” and “S/he believes” to signal direct quotation, while using “S/he says” and “S/he feels” to signal other matter, will usually do the trick.) But, even with these precautions, “work product” protection is not completely guaranteed, particularly if the client testifies at trial (see United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 236-40 (1975), discussed in §§ 9.10, 9.12, 9.13, 33.03 infra). Where disclosure to the prosecution is a possibility under local practice, counsel must weigh its risks against the advantages of preserving retrievable, contemporaneous documentation of client-interview material.

§ 5.06 INTERVIEWING THE CLIENT ABOUT THE FACTS OF THE OFFENSE

In situations other than the rushed interview at the police station or on the day of Initial Hearing (see § 5.01 supra), counsel is advised to begin the substantive portion of the initial interview by asking about the facts of the offense charged. A client expects his or her attorney to be interested in the client’s innocence or justification and in hearing about defense witnesses. Counsel’s avoiding or even delaying these subjects may be viewed by the client as incompetent lawyering or as a manifestation that the lawyer doubts the client’s innocence.

While homing in on the facts of the offense, counsel’s opening questions should avoid appearing to assume that the client knows anything about the crime itself, since the obvious corollary is that counsel thinks the client is guilty (or at least involved). A neutral way of beginning is by asking the client what the police say s/he did. A question like “Let’s start with anything you know about what the police are saying happened” will usually prompt a narrative by the client, in which s/he will relate both the nature of the charges and the degree to which s/he has personal knowledge of the facts of the crime or, conversely, claims to know nothing about it. If s/he responds initially with nothing more than an abstract statement of the charges, counsel can follow up with “What led the police to think [that you’re involved] or [that you did that], do you suppose?”

An effective way of conducting a fact interview is to employ a three-stage interviewing process:

1. Counsel should begin by inviting the client to tell the story in his or her own words, with few, if any, interruptions by the lawyer. This puts the client most at ease and gives the lawyer insight into what the client thinks is more and less important. It provides a collection of unsolicited details on which to cross-examine the client later if the lawyer suspects untruth. And it tells the lawyer something about how the client’s mind works, how the client conceptualizes his or her situation, the client’s concerns and attitudes, his or her intelligence and verbal ability. There is no sense in starting to ask questions that may be beyond the client’s comprehension level or entirely at odds with what s/he thinks and feels the case is all about.

2. Once the client’s narrative rendition of the facts is completed, counsel should go over the story again, aiding the client to remember and recount everything s/he can about the relevant events, conditions, things, and people. An effective way to tease out detail is to take up delimited blocks or parts of the client’s story (bounded by a time period or event [“what happened that night before you left the house?” or “what was going on while you were with Sam?” or whatever] or by coherent topic lines [“how you and Sam came to be together that night” or “everything you remember about what the person you saw there looked like” or whatever]) and go through each block, one after another, using the journalistic “who, what, why, when, where, and how” approach to fill in specific, concrete observations omitted by the client when s/he related that block of information. A technique that works well with some clients is to cast all questions and answers in the present tense (for example: “and what do you do next?”), thereby stimulating the client’s reliving of the experience.

3. In the third round of the interview, counsel should fill in additional details and elicit explanations. Counsel should pick up on words used by the client in rounds one and two, asking the client to explain any terms that are unfamiliar to counsel. Counsel should elicit the names, street addresses, phone numbers, email and e-text addresses of any and all witnesses to the crime or related events that happened prior to or subsequent to the crime. If the client is unable to provide a full name, counsel should seek out any identifying information, such as the witness’s nickname, social-media logo, place of employment, vehicle s/he uses, relatives, and friends. If the client is unable to provide a street address or phone number, counsel should ask the client where the witness hangs out or goes on particular recurring occasions (“goes bowling” or “shops for food,” or whatever) so that counsel can arrange for the client or a relative or friend of the client to accompany counsel or a defense investigator to the spot and try to point out the witness. Counsel should also fill in any omissions or unclarities in the client’s rendition of the events. Counsel can spot the less obvious omissions by putting himself or herself in the client’s situation and deducing what the client would be likely to have seen, heard, and felt, as well as by imagining the natural consequences of the events described by the client.

In interviewing the client about the facts of the offense, counsel should refrain from overtly cross-examining the client unless the client is obviously lying and discovery of the truth appears immediately necessary for effective defense investigation. Blatant manifestations of distrust can irreparably injure the attorney-client relationship. Counsel will have ample opportunities later to put tough questions to the client, after the attorney-client relationship has solidified. See § 5.12 infra.

§ 5.07 INTERVIEWING THE CLIENT ABOUT FACTS NEEDED FOR SUPPRESSION MOTIONS

To gather the facts needed for drafting and litigating suppression motions, counsel will need to elicit all of the information that the client knows about the police investigation of the case as well as the circumstances of the client’s arrest, booking, and interrogation. Counsel should begin with any contact that the client had with the police in connection with the case prior to arrest – for example, investigative interviews that did not lead to arrest at that point in time, police searches of the client’s house prior to the arrest, and police interviews with relatives or friends of the client prior to the arrest. Counsel then should take the client step-by-step through the sequence of events beginning with the police accosting of the client to arrest him or her, teasing out a detailed account of the arrest, police searches and seizures, administration of Miranda warnings, and interrogation. Thereafter, counsel should use the same sort of chronological approach to cover all of the details of the booking process and any interrogation that took place in the police car on the way to the station or at the stationhouse.

If the client was arrested on the scene rather than some days or months later, and if s/he has been in custody since the time of arrest, counsel also will want to record the articles of clothing that the client is wearing and their colors. These could be highly significant in showing that the client’s attire at the time of arrest did not match the complainant’s and/or eyewitnesses’ description of the perpetrator. If the client was not arrested on the scene, or if the client was released after arrest and thus has had an opportunity to change clothes prior to seeing counsel, counsel will need to ask the client to describe what s/he was wearing on the day of arrest (if s/he remembers) and to identify any witnesses who can corroborate the client’s description.

§ 5.08 INTERVIEWING THE CLIENT ABOUT HIS OR HER SOCIAL HISTORY

A full social history of the child – particularly home life, education, work record, and prior criminal record – is essential to much of counsel’s work on the case. This social information plays a crucial role at the detention hearing (see §§ 4.17, 4.19 supra) and at disposition (see Chapter 38). It may provide the basis for seeking diversion (see Chapter 19) and can be a useful tool in plea negotiations with the prosecutor (see § 14.16 infra).

If counsel’s first interview with the client takes place on the day of Initial Hearing, the interview will have to cover much of the client’s social history (see § 4.07(a) supra), but the rushed circumstances of the interview will preclude comprehensive coverage. In the post-hearing interview counsel should pick up any details s/he missed in the earlier interview.

The checklist in § 5.13 infra suggests a host of topics to be covered in exploring the client’s social history. The list includes the information needed to conduct the detention hearing, in the event that the interview takes place prior to Initial Hearing. See also § 4.07(a) supra. In going through the topics contained in the checklist, counsel should be alert to subtle indications of deep-rooted problems. For example, the way in which the client describes his or her home life may hint at the existence of child abuse or neglect. The client’s description of his or her school history may suggest the existence of special educational problems that even the school has not yet noticed.

§ 5.09 COMPLAINTS OF BRUTALITY OR MISTREATMENT; OTHER CUSTODIAL COMPLAINTS

If the client reports that s/he has been abused by the police, custodial personnel, or other inmates, counsel should promptly investigate these allegations. The client should be questioned in detail respecting the time, place, and nature of any official misconduct (including any failure by officers to prevent or stop or record abuse of the client by other inmates), its background, and the identity or description of all persons involved or present at the time. Observable contusions and lacerations on the client should be photographed in color. A private physician should be summoned to examine major injuries if possible; the county medical society or a civil liberties group, like the American Civil Liberties Union, can help find a physician for this purpose. Witnesses should be interviewed who last saw the client prior to arrest and who can testify concerning his or her physical condition at that time. Counsel should also investigate whether any police officers or facility guards who were involved in the incident sustained injuries of their own, since the justification most commonly given for injuries to a client is that the officer or guard had to use force to effectuate the arrest or subdue an unruly prisoner.

As long as counsel takes these steps to avert the risk of further abuse and to gather evanescent evidence before bruises and memories fade, counsel can delay until later any decisions about what should be done to rectify injuries already inflicted upon the client. If there appears to be merit in an action for damages in a state court or in the federal courts under the Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (see Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961); and see § 3.18 supra), counsel can subsequently speak with the client about the desirability of filing such an action, through counsel or some other attorney whom the client and his or her parent(s) select. See, e.g., Atencio v. Arpaio, 674 Fed. Appx. 623 (9th Cir. 2017). Sometimes the prospect of a civil-rights action can provide valuable leverage in plea-bargaining in the delinquency case; sometimes threats to bring such an action will arouse resentment and sour the bargaining atmosphere. Some clients will view the mention of a possible civil-rights action as a sign that counsel cares for their welfare and knows how to protect them; but there is a risk that by advertising to that possibility, counsel will raise unrealistic expectations on the part of the client or the client’s parent(s) about the likelihood of success in § 1983 actions or about counsel’s subsequent availability to file one. All told, counsel does best to restrict discussion during early client interviews to gathering detailed factual information regarding any abuse and any means for documenting it; s/he should not affirmatively broach the subject of civil litigation and – if the client brings up that subject – s/he should tell the client that the time is not yet ripe to talk about it.

Frequently, clients who are in custody complain about lack of medical treatment, exercise, food, and numerous other things. Most of these problems can be corrected administratively by informing the authorities in charge about them. Counsel should see the commanding officer on duty if the client is in a police station or the ranking administrator of a detention facility if s/he is detained. State-court relief may be available if the conditions of the client’s confinement are substantially out of line with civilized standards; federal court relief is available if they expose him or her to a substantial risk of serious physical harm (see, e.g., Mendiola-Martinez v. Arpaio, 836 F.3d 1239 (9th Cir. 2016) (applying Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), to sustain the section 1983 claim of a pretrial detainee who was shackled and restrained during labor and postpartum recovery); Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1064, 1069-73 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (parsing Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979), and Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), to uphold the grant of section 1983 relief to a pretrial detainee for violation of his “due process right . . . to be protected from harm at the hands of other inmates”); Pittman v. County of Madison, Ill., 746 F.3d 766, 778 (7th Cir. 2014) (“When an inmate presents an officer with a request to see a crisis intervention person and the officer also is aware that the reason for the request well may be a serious psychological condition that is beyond the officer’s capacity to assess definitively, the officer has an obligation to refer that individual to the person who, under existing prison procedures, is charged with making that definitive assessment. The danger of serious consequences, including death, is obvious.”)) or are arbitrarily intrusive (e.g., Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island County, 850 F.3d 849 (7th Cir. 2017); Ware v. Louisiana Department of Corrections, 866 F.3d 263 (5th Cir. 2017)) or punish constitutionally protected conduct such as the exercise of First Amendment rights (cf. Burns v. Martuscello, 890 F.3d 77 (2d Cir. 2018) (holding that a prison inmate may not constitutionally be placed in restrictive custody for refusing to serve as a snitch or to provide false information regarding a purported assault); Fuqua v. Ryan, 890 F.3d 838, 848-49 (9th Cir. 2018) (holding that the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act [42 U.S.C. § 2000cc-1] requires a federal court to hear an administratively exhausted claim that a state prisoner was disciplined for refusing to work on a religious holiday). Recourse to the courts is appropriate if requests for necessary medical attention are not promptly honored. In addition to state statutes and regulations that impose responsibility on custodial officers for the well-being of prisoners, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that a prisoner’s serious medical needs be met by his or her custodians. Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439, 453 (7th Cir. 2017) (under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment standards applicable to arrestees detained prior to a probable-cause determination, when “‘the State takes a person into its custody and holds him there against his will, the Constitution imposes upon it a corresponding duty to assume some responsibility for his safety and general well-being’’’); Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 553 (7th Cir. 2017) (recognizing, in the context of arrestees detained following a probable-cause determination, that “[t]he Supreme Court has long held that prisoners have an Eighth Amendment right to treatment for their ‘serious medical needs’”); Lancaster v. Monroe County, Ala., 116 F.3d 1419, 1425 (11th Cir. 1997) (“the case law ha[s] made it clear that an official acts with deliberate indifference when he knows that an inmate is in serious need of medical care, but he fails or refuses to obtain medical treatment for the inmate”); accord, Gordon v. County of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2018); Kindl v. City of Berkley, 798 F.3d 391 (6th Cir. 2015); Rife v. Oklahoma Department of Public Safety, 854 F.3d 637 (10th Cir. 2017); see City of Revere v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 463 U.S. 239, 244-45 (1983) (dictum) (“The Due Process Clause . . . does require the responsible government or governmental agency to provide medical care to persons . . . who have been injured while being apprehended by the police.”); Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307, 315 (1982) (dictum) (“The mere fact that Romeo has been committed under proper procedures does not deprive him of all substantive liberty interests under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Indeed, the state concedes that respondent has a right to adequate food, shelter, clothing, and medical care. ¶ . . . [T]he right to personal security constitutes a ‘historic liberty interest’ protected substantively by the Due Process Clause . . . [and] not extinguished by lawful confinement, even for penal purposes.”); Collins v. City of Harker Heights, Texas, 503 U.S. 115, 127-28 (1992) (dictum) (“The ‘process’ that the Constitution guarantees in connection with any deprivation of liberty . . . includes a continuing obligation to satisfy certain minimal custodial standards.”); Williams v. York, 891 F.3d 701, 707 (8th Cir. 2018) (“[a]n inmate’s right to treatment for serious and painful dental conditions has been clearly-established for more than three decades”); cf. City of Canton, Ohio v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989). And “[i]t would be odd to deny an injunction to inmates who plainly proved an unsafe, life-threatening condition in their prison on the ground that nothing yet had happened to them. The Courts of Appeals have plainly recognized that a remedy for unsafe conditions need not await a tragic event.” (Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 33 (1993)). (Helling is a prison case, but the law is clear that “[p]retrial detainees are entitled to the same, if not greater, medical care as are convicted inmates” (Anderson v. City of Atlanta, 778 F.2d 678, 686 n.12 (1985))).

§ 5.10 CONCLUDING THE PRIVATE INTERVIEW OF THE CLIENT

At the conclusion of the private interview with the child, counsel should give him or her the warnings set forth below. These warnings should be given, whether or not the client is in custody and whether or not s/he has previously been given the same warnings. Counsel should advise the client to:

1. Say nothing at all to the police, tell them nothing under any circumstances, and reply to all police questions or approaches by saying that the client’s lawyer has told the client not to answer questions or to talk with anyone unless the lawyer is present.

2. Tell police officers who start any conversation with the client or who make any requests of the client that they need to talk to counsel about whatever they want; show the officers counsel’s business card (see § 5.04(c) supra) and tell them to phone or email counsel; and (if counsel has given the client a rights card (see § 3.22(b) supra)) show that to the officers as well.

3. Handle approaches by prosecuting attorneys in the same way, and under no circumstances discuss any offer or deal with the police or prosecuting attorneys in counsel’s absence.

4. Discuss the case with no one, including cellmates, co-respondents, adults who are being charged in criminal court with the same or connected crimes, lawyers for any such co-respondents or adult defendants, other purported juvenile or adult co-perpetrators, reporters, or any persons who may have been involved in events relating to the case or who may have information about those events; and tell anyone who wants to discuss the case or who has information about it to contact counsel.

5. Neither write nor sign any papers or forms requested by the police or prosecuting attorneys or relating to the case in any way.

6. Refuse (if the client is at liberty) to go anywhere with the police or with prosecuting attorneys who may ask the client to accompany them, unless they have an arrest warrant; and tell them that if they want the client to go anywhere or to do anything, they should contact counsel first.

7. Refuse (if the client is in custody) to participate in any lineup or to appear before any person for possible identification in counsel’s absence; refuse to accompany the police or prosecuting attorneys to any place outside of the regular cell and recreation areas of the detention facility, except to court, in counsel’s absence; object to any inspection of the client’s body, physical examination, or test of any sort in counsel’s absence; request permission to telephone counsel immediately in the event that the police begin any lineup or identification procedure, inspection, examination or test; and, if put in a lineup or exhibited for identification over his or her objection, observe and remember all of the circumstances (see § 3.19(d) supra).

8. Refuse consent to anyone who may ask the client’s permission to search the client’s home or automobile or any place or thing belonging to the client (including items in the possession of the police), or who may request access to the client’s cell phone, computer, camera, or other communications or recording device.

9. Respond to all accusations and to anyone who gives any evidence against the client or says anything against the client by stating that the client’s lawyer has told the client not to talk to anybody unless the lawyer is present.

10. Telephone counsel as soon as possible if anything at all comes up relating to the case – if anyone whom the client does not know tries to talk to him or her about it; if the client hears that a co-respondent or adult defendant or other person involved in events relating to the case has snitched on the client; or if the client gets any new information or receives any communication from the court about the case.

11. If the client goes or is taken to court and counsel is not present when the client’s case is called, tell the judge that counsel is supposed to be present and request that the judge wait for counsel to arrive (if the client knows that counsel is aware of this court date) or that the judge telephone counsel or permit the client to telephone counsel and inform counsel that the client is in court (if the client suspects that counsel does not know about the proceedings).

In some situations, counsel may decide that it is in the client’s interest to make a statement to the police or to the prosecutor or otherwise to cooperate in their investigation. This is most common in cases in which counsel believes that the authorities can be persuaded to drop charges (see §§ 8.14, 9.06 infra) or in cases in which a favorable plea bargain appears to be negotiable (see §§ 14.15, 14.18 infra), particularly when the authorities and the client are considering the client’s turning state’s evidence and testifying against accomplices. Even if the client is contesting guilt and a trial appears likely, there are instances (rare, to be sure) in which the defense stands to gain by cooperating with the prosecution’s evidence-gathering efforts. For example, defense counsel who has interviewed an eyewitness to the offense and is confident that the witness will not identify the respondent in a lineup may want to have a lineup held. Or if the respondent’s story includes an admission of some incriminating facts (for example, presence at the scene of the offense or commission of the actus reus) but denies others (for example, taking any part in the actus, or having the requisite mens rea) or asserts facts supporting some affirmative defense (for example, self-defense, or mistake of fact), a written or oral statement to the police may be advised as the best means of putting the respondent’s version of the facts before a judge or jury without the respondent’s being subject to impeachment. (Prosecutors tend to present these incriminating admissions in their case-in-chief, even when they have ample independent proof of the facts admitted. And if the prosecution offers only a portion of the respond-ent’s statement, the defense is entitled to put the whole of it into evidence.) Thus adduced at trial — whether by the prosecution or the defense — the statement does not open the respondent up to either cross-examination or the sorts of impeaching evidence (see §§ 33.06, 33.09(a) infra) to which the respondent would be exposed if s/he told the same story on the stand in court. Counsel’s decisions to cooperate in the staging of a lineup, to permit the client to make a statement, or to provide other evidence to the prosecution in these situations will, of course, qualify the general advice to the client described earlier. In all of these cases, however, counsel should be present during any face-to-face dealings between the client and the police or prosecutors, and counsel should examine any writing or physical evidence before it is turned over to them. The client should never be allowed to communicate with the authorities in counsel’s absence. Hence it is best always to give the client the full roster of advice in this section without modification; then if circumstances justify exceptions to the general rules stated here, counsel can subsequently work with the client to decide upon these exceptions and to implement them.

If the client is in police custody at the time of the interview, counsel should not leave without first having the client personally tell a police officer, with counsel listening (and coaching if necessary), that the client does not wish to speak to the police or prosecuting authorities at any time in the future in the absence of counsel but wants to conduct all communications with the authorities from now on solely through the medium of counsel. See § 3.19(f) supra.

§ 5.11 THE FINAL STAGE OF THE INTERVIEW: THE DISCUSSION WITH THE CLIENT AND HIS OR HER PARENT(S); FEE-SETTING; OBTAINING RELEASES OF INFORMATION

After counsel has completed the separate interview of the client, counsel should bring the parent back into the room and talk with the client and parent together. It is essential that the client remain in the room during counsel’s discussion with the parent. Since children are naturally disposed to believing that adults stick together, s/he would inevitably view his or her exclusion as motivated by counsel’s intention to abrogate the attorney-client privilege and reveal to the parent everything the client said. Thus, excluding the child can undo whatever progress counsel has made toward establishing a good attorney-client relationship and quite possibly prevent any future meaningful relationship with the client.

The parent will naturally be curious about what counsel discussed with the client. Counsel can satisfy the parent’s curiosity and simultaneously convey an important message to the client by seizing the opportunity for explaining the attorney-client privilege to the parent. After noting that counsel discussed the case with the client, counsel then should explain to the parent that the attorney-client privilege forbids counsel from revealing the content of that discussion to anyone, including, unfortunately, the parent. Counsel should furthermore explain that if the parent questions the child about the facts or about the child’s discussion with counsel, the parent could learn facts (whether inculpatory or exculpatory) that would render the parent vulnerable to being subpoenaed as a witness for the prosecution. As explained in § 5.03(a) supra, the vast majority of jurisdictions have no parent-child privilege, and even the handful of jurisdictions that recognize such a privilege make various exceptions to it.

There are numerous questions that counsel may need to address to the parent. If the parent is a potential witness in the case (for example, if the parent may be an alibi witness, or observed the crime take place, or was present during police interrogation when Miranda warnings might or might not have been given), counsel will have to conduct a factual interview of the parent, just as counsel would with any other factual witness. If the child was unable to provide certain background information, such as the names of prior schools s/he attended or the addresses and phone numbers of relatives or witnesses, counsel may be able to get the needed information from the parent. However, counsel should always inform the client during the earlier private session with him or her that counsel intends to ask these questions of the parent, and that s/he will ensure that the client is present during the interview of the parent.

If counsel is going to handle the case on a fee basis rather than as court-appointed counsel for an indigent client or as a pro bono matter, counsel also will need to discuss fees with the parent. Misunderstandings about fees are a vexatious and unnecessary irritant, and it behooves counsel to come to an early and very clear fee agreement. After determining the nature of the case and the evidentiary and investigatory problems likely to be involved, counsel should calculate a fair fee and agree upon it with the parent. Fee-setting in a delinquency case is normally based on an advance estimate of the amount of time that will be necessary to handle the case and not on a post-audit hourly basis. What expenses are to be paid by whom and what exact stages of the process (that is, through to, but not including, trial; through trial; through a first appeal; and so forth) are to be covered by the fee should be explicitly stated and the agreement reduced to writing and signed. Counsel is cautioned to advise the parent that failure to pay the full fee before trial will result in counsel’s withdrawal from the case; experience indicates that fees in delinquency cases, like fees in criminal cases, are hard to collect after trial, no matter what its outcome.

Counsel should ask the client and his or her parent to sign “Release of Information” forms so that counsel will be able to obtain records about the client from his or her school and other agencies that preserve confidentiality of records. The form signed by the client should contain wording such as the following:

RELEASE OF RECORDS AND INFORMATION

I, [name of client], am currently being represented by [name of counsel and counsel’s organization or law firm].

I hereby authorize you to release to [name of counsel] and his or her law partners, investigators, social workers, and other employees, any and all records including (but not limited to) educational evaluations and school records (including my cumulative record folder and all its contents, all academic records, special education records, guidance reports, anecdotal records, incident reports, records kept by the guidance counselor, and any other records maintained by the school), as well as medical, social, psychiatric and psychological records, and any and all records and reports prepared by social workers.

I understand that my right to confidentiality means that you cannot share this information without my consent. I fully understand that I am requesting that you reveal confidential information to the named individual(s). I feel that [name of counsel] will be able to use the material to help me, and I am authorizing the release of this information for that reason.

________________
Signature of client

________________
Client’s date of birth

________________
Date of Signature

The form signed by the parent or guardian should be entitled “Consent by Parent or Guardian to Release of Confidential Records and Information Pertaining to a Child” and should parallel the language of the client’s release form, with the words “my child” substituted where appropriate. Before the client and the parent or guardian sign the forms, counsel should carefully explain the content of the forms and their legal effect. Counsel should explain that s/he may need the records in order to prepare for trial and in order to prepare motions. Since some clients will be apprehensive that counsel may show unfavorable records to the judge, counsel should reassure the client and the parent or guardian that counsel will keep the records to himself or herself unless they help the case, and only in that event will s/he show the records to the court. If the client continues to be apprehensive about counsel’s disclosure of the records to the judge, counsel can offer to consult the client after the records have been obtained to verify that the client approves of counsel’s decision to use the records. Counsel should also inform the client that counsel will not show the records to anyone outside the court system and that the court system must maintain the confidentiality of any records about a juvenile.

At the conclusion of the interview, counsel should explain to the parent and child the upcoming stages of the case, describe the actions counsel intends to take in investigating the case and preparing for trial, and schedule any further meetings that will be needed.

§ 5.12 SUBSEQUENT INTERVIEWS WITH THE CLIENT

Usually the client must be interviewed on more than one occasion. In counsel’s preparation for trial, facts will be discovered that were untouched in earlier interviews, and these must be reviewed and analyzed with the client. Increasingly, the client should be cross-examined in a fashion that may range from counsel’s mild expression of surprise at a contradiction to open incredulity and grilling, depending upon counsel’s best judgment of what is necessary at once to preserve the lawyer-client relationship and to get the truth. Clients may lie to their lawyer for a variety of reasons (e.g., fear of alienating the lawyer by revealing that the client actually committed the crime or some other act the lawyer might dislike; an attempt to cover up a family member’s or friend’s involvement; bad advice from cellmates or others about the need to withhold unfavorable information from counsel). If a client is to be saved from himself or herself, s/he must be made to tell counsel the truth. And whether or not s/he is lying, s/he must be confronted with any inconsistencies among the pieces of the story s/he is telling or between the client’s story and other information obtained by counsel, since these inconsistencies may be exposed at trial.

One way to cross-question the client vigorously without creating the impression that counsel disbelieves or distrusts the client is to engage in an explicit exercise of role-playing, in which counsel first prepares and rehearses the testimony that the client might give in his or her own defense at trial and then plays prosecutor for purposes of cross-examining the client. This kind of dry run of cross-examination, as well as direct examination, will be necessary later, in any event, in any case in which the client is considering testifying at trial. (See §§ 10.09(c), (d), 10.10 infra). During the case-planning and investigative stages (see Chapters 6 and 8 infra) and before undertaking plea bargaining or deciding on a plea (see Chapter 14 infra), the same technique can be used to confront the client with any embarrassing holes or contradictions in the client’s story while maintaining an attitude of complete confidence in the client’s truthfulness, although “the prosecutor” will have some pretty tough questions to throw at the client. At some point during these interviews with the client, preferably near the time of trial when counsel has all the information that s/he will have at trial, the client should be given an objective appraisal of the case, with counsel avoiding unfounded optimism or pessimism.

§ 5.13 INTERVIEW CHECKLIST

The following checklist covers most of what the lawyer will have to learn from a client in order to develop an effective defense at all stages of a juvenile delinquency case from first contact through trial. It models a thorough interviewing process; more than a single interview will ordinarily be needed to gather all of the information it includes. When the charge is relatively minor, less extensive fact-gathering may be adequate. But counsel will do well to assume at the outset that all of the subjects flagged by this checklist need to be on the agenda; decisions to curtail coverage should be made deliberately only after counsel has enough of a sense of the case to be sure that it is safe to omit the matters listed in any specific area.

(to be completed by attorney following the interview)

Attorney’s file no.: ________________________________
INTERVIEW SHEET

Name (have the client spell even common names):

All aliases and nicknames:

Street address (if apartment or room, include number):

Phones, land and cell (and name of person whose phone it is, if not the client’s own):

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Date of birth:

Place of birth:

Place of residence at time of arrest:

Prior places of residence (from latest to earliest):

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Residence</th>
<th>From (date)</th>
<th>To (date)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

Education:

Name/location of school | Current Grade | Date last attended Frequency of Attendance:

Passing or Failing Subjects?

Present and prior employment, including summer jobs and part-time jobs) (separate notation of all employers if more than one):

Name of employer:

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Type of business:

Narrative description of what the client does in the usual course of his or her work:

Hours and days of work:

Period of employment:

Reason employment terminated if client is not still employed in this job:

Social security number:

Client’s father:

Name: Type of work:

Living □ Deceased □

If living:

Age:

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses
Employed: □ Yes □ No

Employer’s name:

Employer’s street address:

Employer’s phone:

Employer’s email, e-text, and website addresses

Narrative description of what father does in the usual course of his work:

Client’s mother:

Name: Type of work:

Living □ Deceased □

If living:

Age:

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses

Employed: □ Yes □ No

Employer’s name:

Employer’s street address:

Employer’s phone:

Employer’s email, e-text, and website addresses

Narrative description of what mother does in the usual course of her work:

Siblings:

For each sibling:
Name:

Age:

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Employed:  □ Yes  □ No

Employer’s name:

Employer’s street address:

Employer’s phone:

Employer’s email, e-text, and website addresses

Narrative description of what sibling does in the usual course of his or her work:

By whom was the client raised? Indicate if parents were separated during any period of the client’s childhood. If the client was raised by persons other than a parent, get data for those persons as for parents, supra.

Immigration-related issues:

Is the client a non-citizen? If so, what is his or her immigration status? (Even legal immigrants may be at risk of immigration consequences following an arrest or charge, either as a result of the unfavorable outcome of the delinquency case or merely because government officials learn of the client’s non-citizen status. For discussion of potential immigration issues, see § 14.07 infra.) What is the client’s nationality if not U.S.? Is the parent or guardian with whom the client lives a non-citizen? If so, what is his or her immigration status? What is his or her nationality? Has the client or his or her parent or guardian expressed concern about immigration problems if government officials learn of his or her non-citizenship status or whereabouts?

Has the client or his or her parent or guardian had contact with immigration authorities? If so, what is the name of any individual immigration agent known by the client to be involved, and what is that agent’s title, office or department, street address, phone, email, e-text, and website addresses? If the names of individual agents are unknown, what is the name of the agency or department involved, and its street address, phone, email, and website addresses? Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain this contact information?

Does (or did) the client use drugs? □ Yes □ No

Type(s):

Since (date):

Present frequency of use:

Has the client received treatment for a drug problem or participated in any form of detoxification or rehabilitation program (including peer-group programs)? □ Yes □ No

For each occasion:

Describe treatment or regimen:

Dates of beginning and end of treatment or regimen:

Name of agency:

Address:

Phone:

Email and website addresses

Name(s) of counselor(s) or professional personnel:

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain this contact information or information about the client’s treatment or performance?

Does (or did) the client use alcohol? □ Yes □ No

Volume and frequency of use:
If heavy drinker, since (date):

Has the client received treatment for an alcohol problem or participated in any detoxification or rehabilitation program (including AA or other peer-group programs)?  □ Yes  □ No

For each occasion:

Describe treatment or regimen:

Dates of beginning and end of treatment or regimen:

Name of agency:

Street address:

Phone:

Email and website addresses:

Name(s) of counselor(s) or professional personnel:

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain this contact information or information about the client’s treatment or performance?

Client’s physical and mental condition:

Present physical disabilities:

Present physical illnesses:

Is client presently under medical care?  □ Yes  □ No

Doctor’s name:

Street address:
Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Serious physical injuries (and all head injuries):

For each injury:

Type:

Cause:

Date:

If hospitalized, name, street address, and city of hospital, and dates of hospitalization:

Name[s] of physician[s] and other individual professional personnel:

For each individual known:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain identifying or contact information for this hospital or information about the client’s treatment or performance?

Has the client ever been in a mental hospital or institution? □ Yes □ No

For each hospital or institution:

Name, street address, and city of hospital:

Admission date: Discharge date:

Event[s] leading to hospitalization:

Diagnosis:

Name[s] of physician[s] and other individual professional personnel:

For each individual known:
Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain identifying or contact information for this hospital or institution or information about the client’s treatment or performance?

Has the client ever been found mentally incompetent by a court? □ Yes □ No

For each occasion:

Name and location of court:

Name of judge:

Name[s] of attorney[s]:

Date of adjudication:

Nature of proceeding:

Event[s] leading up to proceeding:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain this contact information or information about the client’s treatment or performance?

Has the client ever been treated by a psychiatrist or psychologist? □ Yes □ No

For each treating professional:

Name:

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Date treatment began: Date treatment ended:

Circumstances leading to treatment:
Diagnosis:

Nature of treatment:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain this contact information or information about the client’s treatment or performance?

Has the client ever undergone a psychiatric or psychological evaluation?  □ Yes  □ No

For each evaluator:

Name:

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Circumstances leading to evaluation:

Diagnosis or result of evaluation:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain this contact information or information about the client’s treatment or performance?

Prior record (all arrests, from latest to earliest and any pending juvenile [and, if applicable, adult] charges, in any jurisdiction):

Date of arrest:

Jurisdiction (city and state):

Charge(s):

Dismissal, diversion, or other resolution without trial or guilty plea:

Plea (guilty or not guilty; if guilty, of what charges):

Trial by judge or jury:
Name of judge:

Adjudication (guilty or not guilty; if guilty, of what charges):

Disposition:

Date disposition handed down:

Name of attorney:

Street address of attorney:

Phone number of attorney:

Email, e-text, and website addresses of attorney:

Time served:

Institution:

Sentence of probation or parole:

from (date): to (date):

Names of all probation and parole officers:

Street address of each officer:

Phone number of each officer:

Email, e-text, and website addresses of each officer:

Was the client ever charged with violation of probation or parole conditions?

☐ Yes ☐ No

Date of violation and nature of violation charged:

Disposition of violation charge:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain identifying or contact information for the courts, judges, cases, prosecutors, defense attorneys, probation and parole officers involved or information about the proceedings and dispositions?

Was the Client on Probation or Parole at the Time of this Arrest?  □ Yes  □ No

On which of the above prior charges? (indicate by number):

Check whether probation □ or parole □

Amount of back time owed:

Was the Client Under any Pending Charges at the Time of this Arrest?  □ Yes  □ No

Which of the above prior charges was pending (indicate by number):

Form of conditional release on that charge:

If the client was on bail for that charge, obtain the data specified below under “Present custodial status / Bail.”

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain identifying or contact information for the courts, judges, cases, prosecutors, defense attorneys, probation and parole officers involved or information about the proceedings and dispositions?

Was the Client Wanted for Arrest on Other Charges in any Jurisdiction at the Time of this Arrest?  □ Yes  □ No

For each charge:

Jurisdiction:

Charge(s):

Nature of incident:

How client knows s/he is wanted:

Name of law enforcement agency involved, if known:

Street address:
Phone number:

Email and website addresses:

Officers involved, if known:

Street addresses:

Phone numbers:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents (such as a warrant or notice) that would contain identifying or contact information for the agencies and agents involved or information about the nature of the charges and status of proceedings?

Has the client consulted an attorney about these charges?  □ Yes □ No

Name of attorney:

Street address of attorney:

Phone number of attorney:

Email, e-text, and website addresses of attorney:

Present custodial status:

Jail or other detention facility (name and address):

I.D. number within the facility (if any):

Bail:

Where posted:

When posted:

Amount:

Form (cash, property, professional surety):
If bonding company:

Street address:

Phone number:

Contact person:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Who paid for the bail:

Has collateral security been put up?  □ Yes  □ No

If so:

Nature of collateral: ____________________________

Amount secured: _______________________________

Who put up the collateral: ________________________

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents that would contain identifying or contact information for the bondsman and terms of the bond?

Other form of conditional release (describe):

Facts relating to the offense charged and the client’s connection with it or whereabouts and activities at the time of the offense; facts relating to the client’s arrest and subsequent interactions with law enforcement agents:

The client should be asked to tell everything s/he knows about the present charge, in chronological order: what s/he did, what happened to him or her, who was involved, when and how the client was arrested, and everything that the police have done with the client since arrest. At the conclusion of the client’s story, counsel should ask questions – who, what, why, when, where, and how – for clarification. Before terminating the interview, counsel should be sure s/he knows at least the following:

The client’s version of the events on which the charge is based or, if the client denies involvement, where the client was and what s/he was doing at the time of the events on which the charge is based.
Witnesses (indicate if immediate contact is advised for any reason):

Witnesses to the events on which the charge is based (including the complainant and persons who may be prosecution witnesses):

Alibi witnesses:

Background and character witnesses:

For each witness:

Name (get spelling and all aliases and nicknames):

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

Other information helpful in locating the witness (where does s/he go to school and/or work, where does s/he hang out, is s/he on public assistance, and so forth, as appropriate):

Arrest:

Who, what, why, when, where, and how?

For all officers involved in the event, everything the client knows about the officer’s:

Name:

Badge number:

Rank or title:

Agency or Department:

Street address:

Phone number:

Email and website addresses:
Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have paper or electronic documents (such as a warrant or notice) that would contain identifying or contact information for the agencies and officers involved or information about the nature of the charges and status of proceedings?

Who was with the client when s/he was arrested? Were they also arrested? Get information as for witnesses, supra.

Was the client under the influence of drugs when arrested or had s/he taken drugs recently? □ Yes □ No

Was the client drunk when arrested or had s/he taken alcohol recently? □ Yes □ No

Was the client ill when arrested? □ Yes □ No If so, describe illness:

Was the client struck or roughly handled during arrest or thereafter? □ Yes □ No

If so, describe injuries:

Date and time of arrest:

Exact location of arrest:

Did the arresting officers have a warrant? □ Yes □ No

What did they say the charge was?

What questions did they ask the client?

What did the client tell them?

Did the police at the time of the arrest or any other time take anything from the client’s person, home, school, place of work, automobile, place where the client was, or from the premises or property of any other person? □ Yes □ No

Things taken:

Did police have a search warrant? □ Yes □ No

Describe circumstances under which the things were taken:
For all officers involved, everything the client knows about the officer’s:

Name:

Badge number:

Rank or title:

Agency or Department:

Street address:

Phone number:

Email and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

For all other persons present, get information as for witnesses, supra:

Did the police make any other search of the client’s person or possessions, or enter the home, school, place of work, automobile, or place where the client was, or search the property or enter the premises of any other person?  □ Yes □ No

Did police have a search warrant?  □ Yes □ No

For all officers involved, everything the client knows about the officer’s:

Name:

Badge number:

Rank or title:

Agency or Department:

Street address:

Phone number:

Email and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:
For all other persons present, get information as for witnesses, supra:

After arrest:

Every location to which client was taken by police:

Exact times of confinement in each place:

Number of officers present in each place:

For all officers involved, everything the client knows about the officer’s:

Name:

Badge number:

Rank or title:

Agency or Department:

Street address:

Phone number:

Email and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

Was the client interrogated? □ Yes □ No

Where did the interrogation take place?

When and how long?

For all officers involved, everything the client knows about the officer’s:

Name:

Badge number:

Rank or title:

Agency or Department:
Street address:

Phone number:

Email and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

For all other persons present, get information as for witnesses, supra.

Was a lie detector test given? □ Yes □ No

What specific questions did the officers ask? (This is often a good means of learning something about the prosecution’s case.)

Did the police confront the client with any evidence against the client? If so, what:

Did the police tell the client that any person had incriminated the client or that any co-respondent or purported juvenile or adult co-perpetrator had confessed? If so, who:

Did the client tell the police anything? □ Yes □ No

Did the client make a written statement? □ Yes □ No

Did s/he sign it? □ Yes □ No

Did the client fill out or sign any forms? □ Yes □ No

Describe the forms:

What did the client say in any written or signed statement or in filling out any form? (The client should be asked to tell counsel everything s/he remembers, in detail.)

Did the client make an oral statement? □ Yes □ No

Was it tape-recorded or video-recorded? □ Yes □ No

Was it stenographically transcribed? □ Yes □ No

Did anybody write it out or take notes on it? □ Yes □ No

Other circumstances at the time of the client’s statement, in detail:
What did the client say in any oral statement? (The client should be asked to tell counsel everything s/he remembers, in detail.)

For each written or oral statement or form filled out:

Was the client previously warned:

That s/he had a right to remain silent? □ Yes □ No

That anything s/he said could be used against him or her? □ Yes □ No

That s/he had a right to a lawyer before making a statement? □ Yes □ No

That if s/he could not afford a lawyer, one would be appointed before any questioning? □ Yes □ No

What did the client say in response to these warnings?

Was the client asked whether s/he understood each warning? □ Yes □ No

How did s/he respond?

Was s/he asked whether s/he was willing to make a statement after having been given these warnings? □ Yes □ No

How did s/he respond?

Was s/he asked to sign a form or card with these warnings on it? □ Yes □ No

How did s/he respond to each warning, waiver, or question on the form or card?

Did any co-respondent or purported juvenile or adult co-perpetrator confess or incriminate the client? If so, everything the client knows about the person’s:

Name (get spelling and all aliases and nicknames):

Street address:

Phone:

Email, e-text, and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:
Other information helpful in locating the person (where does s/he go to school; where does s/he work; where does s/he hang out; is s/he on public assistance; and so forth, as appropriate):

Was the client given any physical examination? was a DNA or blood sample taken; was hair taken or combed; was a drug or alcohol test administered or body inspection of any sort made; was the client examined by a doctor or mental health professional?

Where:

When:

Describe the examination, test, or inspection:

For all persons present, everything the client knows about the person’s:

Name:

Badge number:

Rank or title:

Agency or Department:

Street address:

Phone number:

Email and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

Did anyone say anything about what the examination, test, or inspection showed?

☐ Yes    ☐ No

Was the client asked for permission to make the examination, test, or inspection?

☐ Yes    ☐ No

How did s/he respond?

Was s/he told that s/he had a right to refuse or to have an attorney present?

☐ Yes    ☐ No

160
How did s/he respond?

Was the client exhibited in a lineup or brought, under any circumstances, before any person for identification?

- [ ] Yes
- [ ] No

Where:

When:

Describe the situation:

All persons present (including police, identifying witnesses, other persons in lineup, co-respondents, adult defendants): everything the client knows about the person’s:

- Name:
- Badge number:
- Rank or title:
- Agency or Department:
- Street address:
- Phone number:
- Email and website addresses:
- Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

What did the police say to the identifying witness:

What did the identifying witness say:

Was the client asked for permission to put him or her in the lineup or to exhibit him or her for identification?

- [ ] Yes
- [ ] No

How did s/he respond?

Was s/he told that s/he had a right to refuse or to have an attorney present?

- [ ] Yes
- [ ] No

If so, how did s/he respond?
Was s/he asked to do anything during the identification procedure (walk around, turn to one side, gesture, speak)? □ Yes □ No

If so, what did s/he do or say?

Was s/he told that s/he had a right not to do these things? □ Yes □ No

If so, how did s/he respond?

Was the client asked to reenact anything? □ Yes □ No

If so, get the same information as for lineup and identification procedures, supra:

Was the client asked to give permission for the search of any place or thing? □ Yes □ No

Where:

When:

By whom was the request made?

For all persons present, everything the client knows about the person’s:

Name:

Badge number:

Rank or title:

Agency or Department:

Street address:

Phone number:

Email and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

For what place or thing was permission to search requested?

What was the search supposed to be looking for?
What was said to the client by the person requesting permission?

What did the client say?

Was the client told that s/he had a right to refuse permission?  □ Yes  □ No

How did s/he respond?

Was anything said about a search warrant?  □ Yes  □ No

What was the client told about the warrant?

Prior judicial proceedings on the present charges:

Has the client already appeared in court on the present charges?  □ Yes  □ No

For each prior court appearance:

When:

What court:

Name, street address or location, department and room number of court:

Nature of proceedings:

Who was present (names or descriptions of judge, prosecutor, police):

For all persons present (judge, court reporter, prosecutor, police, co-respondents, adult defendants, witnesses), everything the client knows about the person’s:

Name:

Badge number:

Rank or title:

Agency or Department:

Street address:

Phone number:
Email and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

Were charges read or shown to the client? □ Yes □ No

What were they:

Was the client asked to plead? □ Yes □ No

What did s/he plead:

Who testified:

What did they testify:

Did the client testify?

What did s/he testify?

Was the client represented by a lawyer? □ Yes □ No

Name of attorney:

Street address of attorney:

Phone number of attorney:

Email, e-text, and website addresses of attorney:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

Does the client or his or her parent or guardian have the attorney’s card or any paper or electronic documents that would contain identifying or contact information for the attorney or information about the nature of the charges and proceedings?

What else happened in court:

Was the client given a slip of paper or a form of any sort? □ Yes □ No

If so, where is it? (Counsel wants to obtain this form as soon as s/he can get it from the client or the client’s family, since it will state the charges and next court appearance date
Are there any co-respondents, adults who have been charged in criminal court for the same or connected offenses, or uncharged, purported juvenile or adult co-perpetrators? □ Yes □ No

For each one, everything the client knows about the person’s:

Name:

Street address:

Phone number:

Email and website addresses:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

If the person is in custody, where:

If at liberty, get information as for witnesses, supra.

What role did the co-respondent, adult defendant, or uncharged, purported juvenile or adult co-perpetrator play in connection with the offense charged, according to (1) the police; (2) the prosecutor; (3) the co-respondent, adult defendant, or uncharged, purported juvenile or adult co-perpetrator himself or herself; (4) any witnesses who spoke to the issue?

For each attorney who represented a co-respondent or adult defendant, everything the client knows about:

Name of attorney:

Street address of attorney:

Phone number of attorney:

Email, e-text, and website addresses of attorney:

Physical characteristics useful for identifying the individual:

Counsel should obtain:
1. The client’s and parent’s or guardian’s signatures on releases giving counsel the right to inspect all school, medical, psychological, and other agency records relating to the client (see § 5.11 supra);

2. Where appropriate,

   (a) Information relating to bail (see § 4.27(a) supra).

   (b) A signed retainer and fee agreement (see § 5.11 supra).
Chapter 6

Case Planning:
Deciding What Things To Do To Prepare for Trial and the Order in Which To Do Them

§ 6.01 SCOPE AND PURPOSE OF THIS CHAPTER

Effective defense work requires counsel to attend to an extensive roster of tasks simultaneously during the period prior to trial. In addition to various court appearances, defense counsel must seek out and take statements from prosecution witnesses, conduct discovery and field investigation, draft and litigate motions, interview defense witnesses and prepare them to testify, engage in plea negotiations with the prosecutor, subpoena police reports and other documents, consult defense experts, and confer with the client.

This complex set of tasks is complicated further by time pressures. Counsel will often have only a short period of time between arraignment and trial in which to perform the tasks. In a case in which the respondent is not detained, counsel may have a month or a month and a half in which to prepare for trial; if the respondent is detained, the time period likely will be two to three weeks. And some of the tasks may involve long delays beyond counsel’s control. For example, if counsel subpoenas reports from a police department, hospital or public agency, s/he should anticipate that the records division of that institution will be slow in responding; if counsel plans to retain an expert witness, s/he should expect that it will take some time to locate an appropriate expert and for the expert to schedule and perform the examinations or tests that counsel needs.

The only possible solution to this problem – albeit an imperfect solution – is to begin performing the tasks as soon as counsel has a skeletal understanding of the facts of the case, and thereafter to revise counsel’s plans and strategies progressively as additional information becomes known. The first substantial interview of the client will tell counsel the most important foundational facts: the circumstances surrounding the offense from the client’s perspective, or the client’s account of his or her whereabouts and activities elsewhere if s/he denies involvement in the offense. Counsel needs to form a tentative plan of action immediately after this interview. That plan had best take the form of a provisional “theory of the case” (see § 6.02 infra) which will shape counsel’s next moves, at least until such time as new information warrants a revision of counsel’s working strategy.

This chapter is designed to assist counsel in forming a plan of action and implementing it. Every case is unique in its facts and in the series of tasks that must be performed to prepare it for trial. But some generalizations are possible regarding techniques and considerations that can usefully guide counsel’s strategic planning. Section 6.02 infra explains the nature and functions of a defense theory in counsel’s preparation for trial. Section 6.03 infra describes the steps that counsel should take to conduct the vital fact-gathering process and the order in which those steps should be taken. Sections 6.04 and 6.05 infra provide an overview of, respectively, the defense motions that counsel should consider filing and the actions that counsel should take at this early stage of the case to begin preparing for disposition. Section 6.06 discusses ways in which counsel can use narrative thinking in case planning. Finally, § 6.07 infra suggests some short-cuts that public defenders with high caseloads can use to minimize the amount of time involved in performing the numerous tasks involved in case preparation.

§ 6.02 THE DEFENSE “THEORY OF THE CASE”: A FLEXIBLE BLUEPRINT FOR TRIAL PREPARATION

On the basis of the first full-scale client interview (see § 5.01 supra) and whatever other information counsel obtains when entering a case (see §§ 3.20, 3.30), counsel should formulate a preliminary defense “theory of the case.” The “theory of the case” is a detailed summary of the defense that counsel will mount at trial; it weaves together the version of the facts and an articulation of the legal rules or normative precepts on which counsel will rely to secure a favorable verdict. The theory of the case that counsel develops at this stage must be tentative and flexible enough to change as new information is gathered. Counsel does not yet have a complete picture of what the prosecution witnesses and defense witnesses will say and what pertinent scientific, tangible, or documentary evidence exists or can be produced to prove or disprove guilt. So counsel’s initial theory of the case should always be considered a work-in-progress. As new facts are learned, counsel should continually update the theory of the case, interpolating the new information and reassessing previous judgments about options and alternative courses of action.

In order for the prosecution to establish guilt at trial, it will have to prove both: (i) that a crime was committed, and (ii) that the respondent was the person who committed it. A defense theory of the case will usually involve attacks upon either one or both of these two components.

§ 6.02(a) Defense Theories That Refute the Prosecution’s Assertion That a Crime Was Committed

There are essentially three ways of precluding the prosecution from proving that a crime was committed.

First, the defense can show that, even accepting the prosecution’s basic version of events, there is insufficient proof of one or more of the legal elements of the crime charged. For example, if the crime (or the degree of crime) requires proof of a certain monetary value (such as Grand Larceny or certain degrees of Destruction of Property), counsel can refute the existence of that particular crime either by contending that the prosecution has failed to prove the requisite value or by presenting defense evidence that the object in question was not worth as much as the prosecution asserts. Or, if the crime involves a mental element, the defense can refute it either by contending that the prosecution’s evidence is not sufficient to warrant the inference that the respondent entertained the requisite mens rea or by presenting defense evidence (through the respondent, other defense witnesses, or both) that controverts the existence of the guilty mental state.
Second, the defense can show that, even accepting the prosecution’s basic version of events, some affirmative defense renders the respondent’s actions noncriminal. For example, in a murder case, the prosecution witnesses may be truthfully recounting their observations of the respondent’s stabbing of the victim; but when their testimony is meticulously parsed and/or supplemented with defense evidence (consisting of testimony by the respondent, other defense witnesses, physical evidence, and so forth), the defense will ask the fact-finder to conclude that the victim provoked the attack by actions which induced the respondent to have a reasonable fear of imminent bodily harm, within the applicable doctrine of self-defense.

Third, the defense can show that the prosecution’s witnesses are not telling the truth, either because they are fabricating (i.e., lying or fantasizing) or because they are honestly mistaken. For an illustration of a strategy for challenging the prosecution’s theory of the case as the product of honest but premature tunnel vision and confirmation bias on the part of the police, see § 31.02 infra. As a general matter, it is easier to prove mistake than outright fabrication because the fact-finder (judge or jury) will ordinarily be reluctant to believe that a prosecution witness is lying under oath. However, a theory of fabrication may prevail if the defense can show that the witness has a compelling motive to lie. A theory that the complaining witness is fabricating the existence of a crime can be supported with evidence that:

1. The witness has a motive to accuse the respondent falsely in order to get him or her into trouble because of past incidents that have caused the witness to be angry at or jealous of the respondent or the respondent’s family or friends;

2. The witness has some other motive for fabricating a crime, such as: to collect insurance money; to cover up some other criminal behavior of the witness or the complainant; or to win a reward from law enforcement authorities for snitching (for example, dismissal of pending charges against the complainant; a financial reward; admission into a witness protection program); or

3. (In cases in which the complaining witness is a police officer) the officer fabricated the crime in order to inflate his or her arrest figures and thereby gain credit with superiors (by, for example, planting drugs on the respondent in a drug case) or in order to cover up an ill-founded arrest that would have made the officer look bad or exposed the officer to a civil suit for false arrest (and, when violence was involved in the arrest, for assault and battery).

A theory that the complaining witness is mistaken in thinking a crime took place can be supported by showing that some innocent set of events occurred which the complainant misinterpreted as a crime. For example: the respondent merely asked the complainant for a handout, and the complainant thought the respondent was shaking him or her down in a robbery; the police encountered the respondent running away from the vicinity of a closed shop with a burglar alarm ringing and therefore assumed the respondent had attempted to break in, when, in fact, the alarm went off because of a short circuit and the respondent was running to find and alert the shop owner; a store security guard observed the respondent taking merchandise past a cash register and arrested the respondent for shoplifting, when the respondent was merely looking for a register that was less crowded. Of course, in addition to explaining away the complainant’s testimony as a fabrication or a mistake, counsel will have to explain away the testimony of any eyewitnesses. The theory may be the same for the eyewitnesses as for the complainant, or it may be different (as, for example, when the defense asserts that the complainant is mistaken and that an eyewitness is lying in a desire to support the complainant, who is a relative or co-worker).

§ 6.02(b) Defense Theories That Refute the Prosecution’s Assertion That the Respondent Was the Perpetrator

The prosecutorial evidence linking the respondent to the crime will usually take the form of one or more of the following: (i) an identification of the respondent by the complainant, an eyewitness, or both; (ii) an incriminating statement by the respondent, confessing to the offense, admitting conduct or exhibiting knowledge that implicitly implicates the respondent, or reciting an alibi that the police have shown to be false; (iii) testimony or statements by a co-respondent or uncharged snitch identifying the respondent as the perpetrator; and/or (iv) scientific evidence, such as serology evidence in sex offenses, fingerprint analysis, hair analysis, fiber analysis identifying threads found at the crime scene as stemming from an article of the respondent’s clothing, or a swab of the respondent’s hand showing that s/he recently fired a gun.

Several of these forms of prosecutorial evidence are subject to suppression or exclusion on pretrial motions. Motions to suppress confessions and admissions are covered in Chapter 24, and motions to suppress identification testimony in Chapter 25. Motions to sever a co-respondent’s case from the respondent’s on the ground that the co-respondent made a statement incriminating the respondent, and back-up arguments that the statement should, at the very least, be redacted to remove all references to the respondent, are described in § 18.10(a) infra.

Assuming that the defense does not succeed in suppressing or excluding the incriminating evidence of the respondent’s identity as the perpetrator, there are several ways of refuting the evidence at trial.

Identification testimony by the complainant or an eyewitness can be challenged by asserting that the witness, although honest, is mistaken in identifying the respondent for one or more of the following reasons:

1. The respondent bears some resemblance to the actual perpetrator and was selected because s/he was the only one among the suspects viewed (in a show-up, lineup or photo array) who fit the perpetrator’s description.

2. The police caused (or helped to cause) the identification by something they said to the witness or by their employment of a suggestive identification procedure that conveyed to the witness who it was that the police wished the witness to identify.
3. Some event occurred that caused the witness to superimpose the respondent’s face, which s/he saw after the offense (or, less usually, on an unrelated occasion before the offense), on top of the memory of the perpetrator’s face, and the witness now honestly but mistakenly believes that respondent’s face was the perp’s. This theory can be used when, for example: the witness saw the respondent in police custody or at the police station and deduced that the police naturally would have caught the right person; the witness saw the respondent in the vicinity of the crime or heard the respondent saying something similar to the words spoken by the perpetrator or saw the respondent wearing clothes similar to those worn by the perpetrator; or the witness and the respondent had an encounter that suggested to the witness that the respondent was the perpetrator.

4. The witness is identifying a person of another race, and thus the identification process is subject to the weaknesses and vagaries of cross-racial identification.

Identification testimony by the complainant or an eyewitness also can be refuted by asserting that the witness is lying. To make this theory persuasive, the defense might urge, for example, that:

1. The witness bears a grudge against the respondent.

2. The witness needs to pin the crime on somebody in order to escape prosecution for his or her own complicity in it or in order to gain some benefit, such as the dismissal of pending charges against the witness or cash compensation as an informer, and the respondent happens to be an available scapegoat (because the respondent fits the description of the perpetrator or was at the scene of the crime or possesses a criminal record that would make the respondent’s guilt believable).

3. Although there is no clear motive to which the defense can point, the defense does not bear the burden of proving why the eyewitness is lying but merely has to raise a reasonable doubt of his or her veracity; and the untrustworthy demeanor of the witness is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt.

These same theories can be used to discredit a co-respondent or snitch who identifies the respondent as the perpetrator.

A confession or incriminating statement by the respondent, that the defense was unable to suppress on constitutional grounds in a pretrial hearing may nevertheless be assailable at trial under state law doctrines of involuntariness. See § 24.16 infra. Even when such challenges are unavailable or unlikely to prevail, counsel can argue to the fact-finder at trial that the circumstances under which the statement was made render it untrustworthy. See § 24.22 infra. Typical circumstances that may persuade a judge or jury to discredit a respondent’s confession in whole or in part are overbearing police interrogation; police promises of leniency if the respondent confesses; a respondent’s drug or alcohol intoxication, physical injuries, depression or lack of sleep; a respondent’s suggestibility (resulting from, e.g., young age, mental impairment, or a desire to please the authorities) or limited competence in the language in which s/he confessed; fear of recrimination by a third party if the respondent does not take the rap; and motivation to protect a family member or loved one by taking the rap. When details in a purportedly incriminating statement make the difference between guilt and innocence, counsel can contest the prosecution’s interpretation of the statement by pointing out ambiguities in the respondent’s words or in the questions to which s/he was responding. Finally, the facts may support a thesis that the police fabricated the statement in an attempt to bolster their case. (Judges sitting as the fact-finder in a bench trial are often loth to conclude that police officers are lying; juries may be more receptive to claims of police perjury, particularly if jurors or their relatives or friends have had bad experiences with cops or come from communities where cops are in bad odor at the time of the trial.)

In challenging a prosecution case based on scientific evidence, counsel can employ any one or more of three approaches. (i) S/he can use a rival expert to show that this expert reached a conclusion contrary to that of the prosecution expert, and can assert that the defense expert’s conclusion is the correct one, or at least that a reasonable doubt has been raised. (ii) S/he can use a defense expert, or cross-examination of the prosecution expert, to show that even if the prosecution expert’s conclusions are correct, they are not very damning. For example, the impact of a scientific finding that the respondent has the same blood type as the perpetrator can be minimized by showing that one quarter of the human race shares that blood type. (iii) S/he can use a defense expert, or cross-examination of the prosecution expert, to show that there are potential inaccuracies or uncertainties in the scientific method employed (in general, or under the circumstances of this particular case) that raise legitimate doubts about the correctness of the prosecution expert’s results. Most genuine experts are sufficiently cautious that they will freely admit the potential for inaccuracy that plagues many scientific tests.

In any case in which the prosecution is likely to use scientific evidence at trial, counsel should consider retaining a defense expert to consult with counsel about these possible approaches and to testify at trial if appropriate. When the client is indigent, counsel can request court funds to retain the expert. See § 11.03 infra. Often, it will be worthwhile to test the waters by talking with the prosecution’s expert prior to retaining a defense expert. Many forensic experts on the police force, unlike line police officers, are willing to talk with defense attorneys. By questioning the prosecution’s expert about the nature, bases, and degree of certainty of his or her conclusions, and particularly by inquiring whether there is anything unusual or difficult about the analysis of the data being interpreted in this case, counsel can make a preliminary assessment of the utility of challenging the expert testimony with a rival witness. If, for example, the prosecution’s scientific evidence is based upon a simple chemical test, the test is normally highly accurate, its application in the present case was routine, and the tester seems unshakeable, it may be wise to stick to factual defenses rather than retaining a rival expert, especially if the respondent is a paying client who can ill afford the expert’s fee. Additional factors to consider in assessing the likelihood of successfully challenging the prosecution’s forensic-science evidence are discussed in § 31.09 infra.

In a case in which the prosecution seeks to identify the respondent through a chain of circumstantial evidence linking him or her to the criminal episode, defense counsel can challenge the chain as a whole – instead of, or in addition to, attacking particularly vulnerable links – on a theory that the police investigation went astray at the outset, latched onto the wrong person as a suspect, and then locked into this mistake as a result of tunnel vision. See § 31.02 infra; and see Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 446 (1995).

§ 6.02(c) The Building Blocks for Constructing a Defense Theory of the Case

Ultimately, counsel’s selection of a theory of the case will depend on an evaluation of the relative strengths of the prosecution’s evidence and the evidence available to the defense. The respondent is often a vital source of ideas and information pointing to potential defense evidence, because s/he is positioned at the center of events from the defense perspective and can give counsel both a general framework for constructing a favorable version of what happened and specific leads to possible defense witnesses. S/he may also be able to provide some insights into provable biases of prosecution witnesses. S/he is substantially less likely, however, to be able to assist counsel in identifying other areas of weakness in the prosecution’s evidence. So constructing a successful theory of the defense will usually require counsel to take the initiative in identifying, investigating, and developing exploitable flaws in the prosecution’s case. And counsel will almost always have to bear primary responsibility for canvassing the full range of potential challenges to the prosecution’s theory of the case, for determining whether these can be combined or are mutually incompatible (or incompatible with theories based upon potential defense evidence) and for assessing what combination or election of defenses has the greatest likelihood of success.

In looking for potential weaknesses in the prosecution’s case, counsel should obtain all pretrial statements made by each prosecution witness – whether to police or other persons – and should minutely compare the texts of what the witness said at different times. If a version of events that a witness gave soon after the crime is more favorable to the defense than the witness’s present version, the defense theory of the case may be that the witness’s memory has faded over time and that the witness’s present inability to remember significant details casts doubt on anything s/he now says that was not in his or her original statement. Or the theory may be that the witness’s self-inconsistencies demonstrate that s/he is fabricating his or her entire tale (or at least its incriminating parts) in order to procure the respondent’s conviction (because that will benefit the witness in some way, or because of personal animosity arising from jealousy, anger, revenge-seeking, or other bias); the witness has never been able to tell a straight story; so none of his or her conflicting versions of the tale are worthy of belief. Inconsistencies between the statements of different prosecution witnesses can be used to support similar defense theories. When those witnesses have had opportunities to talk with one another before trial, defense counsel will often be able to demonstrate that their successive statements are increasingly compatible and to argue that this homogenization discloses the factual vacuum at the core of the prosecution’s case. The homogenizing process may be demonstrable even when prosecution witnesses have interacted little during the pretrial period; it is a natural consequence of the prosecutor’s rehearsing witnesses to present a unified version of what happened; and defense counsel can argue that it has critically impaired the fact-finder’s ability to reach any confident, reliable conclusions about facts that the prosecution is required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt.

Another technique for pinpointing exploitable weaknesses in the prosecution’s case is to consider whether there are aspects of the prosecution witnesses’ conduct that fail to comport with normal human behavior. For example, if the complainant or eyewitness has known the respondent for years, it stands to reason that s/he would give the police the respondent’s name as soon as s/he is interviewed by them. If s/he failed to give the respondent’s name to the authorities until some time later, counsel can use this quirk to support a theory that the witness has decided to pin the crime on the respondent falsely as a result of a grudge that began after the date of the crime (or a longstanding grudge that the witness was not quick enough to act upon at the time of the police interview). In order to detect anomalies of this sort, counsel will often find it productive to trace through, from beginning to end, an imaginary “normal” scenario for a crime like the one charged. By comparing that scenario with the provable events in the respondent’s own case, counsel can identify actions and statements on the part of prosecution witnesses that are out of whack with behavior that a trier of fact would expect from people in the witnesses’ purported circumstances.

A similar fact-modeling process, mentally tracing step-by-step the normal sequence of police procedures in a case such as the respondent’s, will enable counsel to pinpoint exploitable flaws in the police officers’ versions of searches, seizures, confessions, and identification procedures. For example, in a case in which counsel is challenging a police officer’s Terry frisk of the respondent (see § 23.10 infra) and the officer claims that s/he believed the bulge in the respondent’s pocket was a gun, counsel can develop the officer’s failure to take the normal steps for protecting himself or herself from an armed suspect, such as radioing for backup, drawing his or her own service revolver, and immobilizing the respondent by having him or her “assume the position” with hands up against a wall or against a car, well away from coat or pants pockets.

§ 6.02(d) Implications of the Choice of Defense Theory for Trial Preparation

There are several ways in which the defense theory of the case will shape counsel’s trial preparation.

First of all, the theory of the case will inform the way in which counsel assigns priorities to the tasks to be performed in the defense investigation of the case. As a practical matter, even though counsel may wish to arrange an investigative interview of every possible prosecution and defense witness, often that will not be feasible. In many jurisdictions, the prosecution is not obligated to inform the defense of the identity of all of its witnesses (see § 9.07(b) infra), and the investigator will have to spend considerable time searching for unknown prosecutorial witnesses. Even defense witnesses may not be easy to find, since often the client has no idea of the names or addresses of people who were standing on the street, observing the events. In an imperfect world, in which each aspect of the defense investigation consumes time and limited investigative resources, counsel will have to determine the relative importance and temporal urgency of tasks, looking first – or directing an investigator to look first – for certain witnesses, documents, and exhibits. Thus, for example, in an assault case in which the respondent’s self-defense claim does not dispute the occurrence of the assault or even the manner in which the assault was committed but instead depends upon an incident earlier the same day in which the complainant threatened to kill the respondent the next time they met, counsel will assign priority to finding any witnesses to the earlier threat and witnesses who can recount a history of threats and violence by the complainant against the respondent or attest to the complainant’s reputation for violence. Of course, counsel’s initial assignment of priorities will have to be progressively revised in accordance with new information that is learned. For example, if the prosecution reveals in discovery that government witnesses will recount the respondent’s making statements during the assault that are inconsistent with a theory of self-defense, counsel then will have to assign top priority to finding defense witnesses who describe the sound track of the assault differently.

Once counsel has identified the most important witnesses, the defense theory of the case determines what questions should be asked of those witnesses. In essence, counsel is working backwards from a goal defined by the theory of the case. Having identified what ultimate picture of events and people the defense will want to ask the fact-finder to accept at the end of the trial, counsel can specify what defensive facts need to be elicited during the trial, and thence counsel can deduce the questions that need to be asked of witnesses to learn those facts. This focusing function of the defense theory of the case also plays an important role in deciding, for example, which expert witnesses to retain and what to ask them to evaluate; what legal research has to be conducted in preparation for drafting jury instructions or making bench arguments on the merits at trial; and what additional legal research and planning have to be undertaken in anticipation of evidentiary issues that are likely to come up at trial.

Third, the defense theory of the case will shape counsel’s decisions about what motions to file. For example, if the respondent made a statement to the police telling a wholly exculpatory story of self-defense and if the defense theory at trial will mirror that statement, counsel may decide to refrain from filing a motion to suppress the statement. Or if the defense’s theory at trial depends upon testimony by a co-respondent and if a severance of the co-respondent’s case from the respondent’s probably will have the practical result of rendering the co-respondent unavailable as a defense witness, counsel may opt in favor of abandoning a legally viable severance motion. See § 18.08 infra.

Fourth, the defense theory of the case will shape the way in which counsel conducts the probable-cause hearing and any suppression hearings. As explained in § 4.29 supra and § 22.02 infra, evidentiary hearings of this sort can be used for the purpose of laying a foundation for later impeachment of prosecution witnesses at trial. If, at the time of the probable-cause or suppression hearing, counsel has a vision of what the defense theory will be at trial, counsel can design his or her cross-examination at the hearing to serve this purpose most effectively, creating the best possible transcript material for use at trial even if this requires the curtailment or sacrifice of some lines of cross-examination that might have increased the defense’s relatively marginal chance of winning the hearing itself. See § 22.04 infra.

These are only some of the most significant ways in which the defense theory of the case can shape trial preparation. It would not be an overstatement to say that the theory of the case should inform every single act of counsel’s. For example, counsel’s decision whether to seek a continuance or whether to assert a speedy trial demand when the prosecution seeks a continuance will depend upon the availability of defense witnesses needed to prove the defense theory of the case. Counsel’s advice to the client about whether to take the witness stand at trial will depend upon the theory of the case, as well as additional considerations such as whether the judge is likely to penalize the respondent at sentencing for what the judge may view as perjurious testimony.

§ 6.03 GATHERING THE FACTS NEEDED TO SUPPORT THE DEFENSE THEORY OF THE CASE

There are four institutionally recognized methods for gathering factual information bearing on a case:

1. Client interviews (see Chapter 5).

2. Defense investigation, including interviewing potential prosecution and defense witnesses, collecting and examining police reports and other documents (whether onsite or by subpoenaing them), and inspecting physical scenes and objects (see Chapter 8).

3. Informal and formal procedures for discovery of materials from the prosecution (see Chapter 9).

4. Retention of expert witnesses who can perform scientific tests, such as ballistics, serology, or fingerprint examinations, that will shed light on the pertinent facts (see Chapter 11).

In addition to these methods, there are three informal means of gleaning facts: filing motions that will require the prosecutor to respond with pleadings that reveal aspects of the prosecution’s case; conducting hearings, such as the probable-cause hearing and suppression hearings, in such a way as to gain disclosure of the prosecution’s case at trial (see §§ 4.29, 4.32 supra; §§ 22.02, 22.04(b) infra); and informal conversations with the prosecutor about the case during plea negotiations, other meetings, or casual conversations while waiting for a court hearing to begin (see § 14.15 infra).

Counsel should take advantage of all of these means of obtaining factual information.
Because some of them involve more lag time than others, the former procedures should be set in motion first so that they will be completed in time for trial. Generally, the following steps should be taken at the earliest practicable time, on the day of the Initial Hearing if possible:

1. Counsel should prepare subpoenas for documents. These will not take counsel long to prepare and must be prepared early because it may take a long while for the relevant agencies to comply with the subpoenas.

2. Counsel should direct an investigator to start tracking down and interviewing prosecution and defense witnesses and gathering necessary documents and exhibits. As explained in § 6.02 supra, counsel should use the theory of the case to assign priorities to these investigative tasks, explaining to the investigator the order in which s/he should perform the various necessary tasks. If counsel does not have an investigator and the client is indigent, counsel should promptly file a motion for court funds to retain an investigator (see §§ 8.04, 11.03 infra).

3. Counsel should identify and contact any expert consultants and witnesses who may be needed (see §§ 11.01, 11.02, 11.04, 12.08-12.10 infra), or, if counsel is representing an indigent client, file a motion for court funds to retain the experts (see § 11.03 infra).

4. Counsel should conduct an immediate informal discovery session with the prosecutor or, if the prosecutor is unable to meet that day, schedule an appointment as early as possible.

By taking these steps expeditiously, counsel will gather the information needed to shape further investigation of the case, the information needed to prepare suppression motions and other substantive motions (see Chapter 7), and the information needed to conduct plea negotiations effectively (see § 14.16 infra). The motions proceedings and plea negotiations, in turn, will provide counsel with more facts, which can be used in conducting suppression hearings and the trial.

§ 6.04 FILING MOTIONS THAT ARE CONSISTENT WITH THE THEORY OF THE CASE

The motions that counsel should ordinarily consider filing – in addition to motions for state-paid defense resources that the respondent cannot afford (see §§ 10.05, 11.03 infra) – are:

1. Motions for discovery (see § 9.07 infra);

2. Motions for protective orders to forestall potentially damaging prosecutorial activities (see §§ 7.02, 8.13, 9.07(d), 9.09(b)(6), 9.09(b)(7) infra);
3. Motions to suppress tangible evidence, confessions and incriminating statements, and identification testimony (see Chapters 22-25);

4. Motions for severance of counts or respondents (see Chapter 18);

5. Motions challenging the sufficiency of the Petition or the jurisdiction of the court (see Chapter 17);

6. Motions seeking a change of venue (see §§ 20.01-20.03 infra) or recusal of the judge (see §§ 20.04-20.07 infra);

7. Motions for diversion (see Chapter 19);

8. Motions to expedite or delay the pace of proceedings (see Chapter 15).

This is not, of course, an exclusive list: counsel may have to develop motions to deal with case-specific problems, such as, for example, prosecutorial interference with defense access to witnesses (see § 8.13 infra). Counsel should familiarize himself or herself with local rules setting deadlines for the filing of motions. In many jurisdictions the applicable statute, court rule, or local custom requires that motions be filed within a specific time (usually set at 15 or 30 days) after arraignment. See § 7.05 infra.

§ 6.05 SETTING IN MOTION THE PROCESS NEEDED TO PREPARE FOR DISPOSITION IN THE EVENT OF CONVICTION

As explained in Chapter 38, counsel can often prevent a sentence of incarceration in the event of conviction by presenting evidence of the respondent’s potential for rehabilitation and by offering community-based (or, when necessary, residential) programs as alternatives to incarceration. An attorney who waits until the respondent has been convicted to begin preparing for disposition will discover that s/he is unable to gather the necessary background information or obtain interviews for the child at programs in the short time between trial and disposition. Accordingly, as explained in § 38.09 infra, counsel is well advised to begin the process of preparing for disposition as early as possible.

Counsel should obtain the child’s school records in every case. In addition to playing a crucial role in counsel’s preparation for disposition, the school records may reveal comprehension and reading problems that will support a motion to suppress a confession (see § 24.10(b) infra) or may be so favorable as to supply a basis for a motion seeking diversion (see § 19.03(b) infra).

If the client appears to be suffering from mental problems – either mental illness or mental retardation – counsel should arrange a mental examination by a psychiatrist or psychologist. See §§ 12.08-12.10 infra.
If the client’s record or the nature of the current offense makes the client a likely candidate for incarceration, counsel should begin contacting appropriate community-based programs and arranging for interviews for the client. See § 38.14 infra. In such cases counsel also should make use of opportunities to enlist the aid of social workers in locating suitable programs and preparing a study of the child’s background. See §§ 38.10, 38.14 infra.

§ 6.06 THE ROLE OF NARRATIVE THEORY IN CASE PLANNING

§ 6.06(a) The Nature of Narrative and Its Importance in Litigation

“Narrative,” as we use the term, means constructing and telling stories and includes the rhetorical creation of an imaginative world in which the story can happen – a world that gives the story its point. See Jerome Bruner, Acts of Meaning 86 (1990); Jerome Bruner, The Narrative Construction of Reality, 18 Crit. Inquiry 1, 13-14 (1991). There are several reasons why this narrative process is crucial in litigation.

First, narrative is “a primary and irreducible form of human comprehension” (Louis O. Mink, Narrative Form as a Cognitive Instrument, in Robert H. Canary & Henry Kozicki (eds.), The Writing of History: Literary Form and Historical Understanding 129, 132 (1978)) – humankind’s basic tool for giving meaning to experience or observation – for understanding what is going on. It is the way most people make sense of the world most of the time. “[N]arrative . . . gives shape to things in the real world and often bestows on them a title to reality.” Jerome Bruner, Making Stories: Law, Literature, Life 8 (2002). We link perceptions into happenings, happenings into events, events into stories; and our narrative expectations tell us how each story hangs together and how it will end. Jurors bring this everyday sense-making process to their work and use it to descry the “facts” from the evidence. See, e.g., Reid Hastie, Steven D. Penrod & Nancy Pennington, Inside The Jury (1983); Nancy Pennington & Reid Hastie, A Cognitive Theory of Juror Decision Making: The Story Model, 13 Cardozo L. Rev. 519 (1991). Trial lawyers seeking to persuade jurors of a particular version of the facts need to tap into the process. See, e.g., Anthony G. Amsterdam & Randy Hertz, An Analysis of Closing Arguments to a Jury, 37 N.Y.L. Sch. L. Rev. 55 (1992).

Second, the narrative process also tells us how a story should end. “[N]arrative is necessarily normative” (Bruner, Narrative Construction of Reality, supra at 15), providing the interface between facts and values. “Stories fly like arrows toward their morals.” William H. Gass, Tests of Time 4 (2002). They embody a society’s manifest of moral imperatives. See

---

1 This section is a shortened version of the Introduction in Ty Alper, Anthony G. Amsterdam, Todd Edelman, Randy Hertz, Rachel Shapiro Janger, Jennifer McAllister-Nevins, Sonya Rudenstine & Robin Walker-Sterling, Stories Told and Untold: Lawyering Theory Analyses of the First Rodney King Assault Trial, 12 Clinical L. Rev. 1 (2005). Elaboration of the points presented here and additional authorities can be found at pages 4-32 of that article.
Bruner, Acts of Meaning, supra at 47. So, effective story-telling by a lawyer can help to make the lawyer’s case to jurors who want to reach the right result.

Third (an elaboration of the preceding point), the narrative process is specialized for reconciling our expectations about the normal, proper course of life with deviations from it. “Deviance is the very condition for life to be ‘narratable.’” Peter Brooks, Reading for the Plot: Design and Intention in Narrative 139 (1992). The launching pad of narrative is breach, a violation of expectations, disequilibrium. See Bruner, Making Stories, supra at 15-20. The landing pad of narrative is balance, the reestablishment of equilibrium. See Anthony G. Amsterdam & Jerome Bruner, Minding the Law 45-47, 121-24 (2000). Narrative has always done for the human mind what juries are called upon to do for the body politic in every trial, and particularly in criminal trials – to deal with deviance by restoring order. Small wonder, then, if jurors resort to narrative to do much of the work.

Fourth, jurors come to their task equipped not only with the narrative process as a mode of thought but with a store of specific narratives channeling that process. Stock scripts and stock stories accreted from exposure to the accountings and recountings that continually bombard us – through television, movies, newspapers, books, the internet, and word of mouth from our earliest childhood (see Bruner, Acts of Meaning, supra at 82-84) – provide all of us with walk-through models of how life is lived, how crimes are committed, how reality unfolds. When a juror perceives the familiar lineaments of one or another of these narratives emerging from the evidence, s/he “recognizes” what is afoot and s/he is cued to interpret other pieces of evidence and eventually the whole of it consistently with the familiar story line. “This means that in order to perform effectively, many lawyers, particularly litigators, may be obliged to keep abreast of (in order to tap into) the popular storytelling forms and images that people commonly carry around in their heads.” Richard Sherwin, The Narrative Construction of Legal Reality, 18 Vt. L. Rev. 681, 692 (1994).

Fifth, evidentiary trials in which facts are contested are not conducted on the premise of Kurosawa’s Rashomon – that multiple inconsistent versions of reality are all equally true – nor do most jurors operate on this premise. The uncompromising ontological first principle of every trial is that something real really happened out there. Jurors are permitted to vote that they cannot tell what happened, but this verdict is conceptualized as a failure of persuasion on the part of whichever party bears the burden of proof. And every trial lawyer knows that it is very dangerous – a desperation tactic of last resort – to stake his or her case on the argument that the truth is so recondite that the opposing party has failed to meet its burden on that account alone. Even if the lawyer’s aim is simply to cast enough doubt on the opponent’s case to prevent the jury from agreeing that an applicable burden of proof has been met, s/he will almost always want to suggest some alternative thing or things that could plausibly have really happened out there, instead of the thing that the opponent needs to prove. Under these circumstances trials of “the facts” tend to turn into story-telling contests. There is a hard core of material that the contestants must incorporate and account for in their stories – for example, the jury in a homicide trial may know from seemingly incontrovertible ballistics and fingerprint evidence that at some point in time the defendant or juvenile respondent handled the gun that fired the fatal shots – and the story-teller is required to encompass these mandatory materials in his or her plot. But where they cease to “tell the whole story,” the story-telling competition begins; and the story-teller whose tale best interprets the mandatory materials consistently with the audience’s understanding of the human scene can hope to carry off the prize.

Sixth, story-telling offers the litigator a vital means to expand or change the audience’s understanding of the human scene. And it equips the litigator to explore in his or her own head, as a necessary prelude, a range of possibilities for expanding or changing the audience’s perception of that scene. For, in addition to its other functions, narrative serves as the mind’s primary way of surveying alternative possible worlds. It is imagination’s instrument for getting beyond the familiar and the obvious, for playing out never-experienced scenarios and projecting the consequences of counterintuitive conceptions. It enables us to travel paths we have not walked before and to see where they lead, to create realms of what if where we can experiment with new varieties of thinking and believing, of doing and being. See Amsterdam & Bruner,

So, what follows from all this? Our reason for rehearsing the functions that the narrative process serves in litigation is not to encourage litigators to make greater use of narrative. That would be as superfluous as exhorting fish to make greater use of water. Litigators are inextricably immersed in narrative; they cannot survive without it. See Amsterdam & Bruner, Minding the Law, supra at 110. Our aim is rather to suggest that litigators will navigate the medium more effectively to the extent that they focus consciously on narrative construction as an integral part of their work, survey systematically and creatively the range of options available to them in constructing narratives, and make strategic choices among the options with an understanding of the basic elements of narrative construction and how those elements fit together.

§ 6.06(b) The Specific Uses that a Litigator Can Make of Narrative

The following inventory enumerates potential uses of narrative in jury-trial litigation.
Some involve the litigator’s own thinking (categories 1 and 2 immediately below). (We include in the term “litigator” all members of a litigation team.) Some have to do with gauging the thinking of other people in the litigation process (category 3). Some involve making explicit references or implicit allusions to stock scripts in communications aimed at the jury (categories 4, 5 and 6). In subpart 7, we catalog the range of techniques by which a litigator communicates to the jury; and in subpart 8, we briefly discuss the choice between explicit and implicit invocations of stock scripts.

1. Using narrative to generate hypotheses that guide investigation and to avoid shutting down investigation by making premature judgments. To be efficient, factual investigation must be directed by working hypotheses about what happened and why. See § 7.2.1.4 supra.
Hypotheses fleshed out in narrative form – with a scene, characters, actions, instruments, and motives (see § 6.06(c) infra) – serve this function particularly well, because their projection requires the litigator to construct in his or her imagination a world containing all of the details that are necessary for the plot to unfold. These details in turn suggest others that would probably exist in conjunction with the necessary details, or that could not coexist with the necessary details, providing specific focuses for investigation.

Projecting alternative possible causal or explanatory stories that could fit around information already in hand enables a litigator to multiply hypotheses. And having multiple hypotheses in mind throughout a litigation can be crucial to success. Litigators tend too often to zero in on the first plausible version of events that emerges from available information, or at most the first couple of plausible scenarios. They tend to confine their investigations to attempting to confirm the most immediately obvious favorable scenario (or two) or to refute the most immediately obvious unfavorable scenario (or two). They forget that the fundamental tenet of effective investigation is: The world is a mysterious, surprising place, where strange things happen. Narrative provides the best safeguard against these tendencies. Narrative restores the mystery of the world. Insisting upon telling oneself alternative possible stories even after it has become “obvious” what happened is an invaluable check against premature closure.

2. Using narrative to develop a theory of the case. As explained in § 7.2.1 supra, a defense lawyer’s theory of the case is a detailed summary of the factual propositions that counsel plans to assert as the basis for a favorable verdict or decision, with the facts organized in such a way that they invoke the application of the normative dictates (substantive rules of law; procedural rules, such as those relating to burdens of proof and presumptions; considerations of fairness, propriety, and other moral values; empathy or sympathy) that counsel will rely on. The defense theory of the case should inform every aspect of counsel’s preparation and presentation. See § 7.2 supra. Because of the efficacy of narrative in mediating facts and norms, the theory of the case usually takes the form of a story. When it does, counsel will often benefit from modeling it on one or more of the stock stories current in the culture, and s/he will almost always benefit by considering alternative possible versions of the story and assessing their relative believability by drawing on the culture’s current register of accepted stories as examples of what is plausible and coherent, what makes a tale hang together sufficiently to be convincing.

Even when counsel’s theory of the case cannot be encompassed by a single story, it is likely to depend in part upon the persuasiveness of key facts. Jurors’ probable reactions to evidence of those facts can sometimes be usefully gauged by reference to the prevalence of similar factual elements in the scenes, plots, and characters of currently accepted story types. Conversely, if a theory of the case calls for discrediting the opposing party’s story or components of it, popular narratives featuring an appearance/reality dichotomy – as many popular detective stories, courtroom dramas and other suspense “thrillers” do – can suggest useful litigation strategies for reducing the opponent’s evidence to the status of deceiving appearances.

3. Using narrative to fathom or affect the thinking of witnesses and other sources of information, jurors and other trial participants. Litigators must constantly make strategic decisions on the basis of predictions about how people are thinking or how they will react to something that the lawyer does. In investigative interviewing and in interviews preparing witnesses to testify at trial, the litigator frames questions in ways that are designed both to elicit information and to shape it by structuring the framework within which the witness understands the information and its significance. Because memories are commonly stored and recounted in narrative form and the information remembered is affected by the stories the witness has in mind or can be gotten to think about as giving the information meaning (see Bruner, Acts of Meaning, supra at 55-58), counsel needs to be alert to detect those stories and the possibilities for rewriting them. This is equally true in cross-examining the prosecution’s witnesses. Witnesses who have had little or no prior experience with the law are frequently playing out in their heads scripts for appropriate witness responses that they have picked up from TV or the movies; this is a setting in which life tends to imitate art almost slavishly. And even witnesses who have had considerable prior experience in a witness role (such as police officers) often have organized aspects of that experience (such as cross-examination by defense lawyers) – together with the courtroom stories they have heard (e.g., at the precinct station) – into scripts that can be put to good use by a cross-examiner who discerns them.

Voir dire examination of prospective jurors calls for much of the same sensitivity to narrative processes and stock scripts as witness interviewing and examination. So, often, does predicting how the prosecutor will interpret and react to what defense counsel does. And whether or not counsel makes deliberate use of narrative strategies, techniques and allusions in his or her own presentation of the case, the jurors are likely to be perceiving and interpreting the evidence they hear as the unfolding of a story that they recognize from familiar models. Counsel has to anticipate the stories jurors will see in the evidence, in order either to deconstruct them or to turn them to advantage.

4. Using narrative to attune the jury to lines of thinking that advance the litigator’s case or set back the opposing party’s case. Narrative involves a special way of thinking, of processing information, of proceeding from premises to conclusions. If a litigator can get jurors into a narrative mindset early in a trial – by, for example, stressing in voir dire interchanges with prospective jurors, in an opening statement, and/or in the way s/he talks about the trial process when making and arguing objections in the hearing of the jury – that the jury’s job is to [reconstruct the story] [figure out the real story] [get to the bottom of the story] of what happened, s/he can tap into this mode of thinking and use it to shape the jurors’ understanding of the case.

One important characteristic of narrative thinking, for example, is that it is inescapably hermeneutic. In a story, the meaning of the whole is derived from the parts at the same time that the meaning of the parts is derived from the whole. See Bruner, Narrative Construction of Reality, supra at 7-11. In a deductive evidence-marshaling jury argument, this process can be derided as “circular” or as “bootstrapping,” but a litigator can make it acceptable, even necessary, to a jury despite this derision if s/he can persuade the jurors that the process is the best way to see how the story hangs together.
Another important characteristic of narrative thinking is that it generates expectations through a presumption of relevancy. This is why a reader knows that if s/he is told in Chapter One there is a gun hanging on the wall, s/he can expect a gunshot and a dead body or at least a near miss by the end of Chapter Three. See ANTON TCHERKOV, LITERARY AND THEATRICAL REMINISCENCES 23 (Samuel S. Koteliansky trans. 1927). A related structural feature of stories is that they translate Time into a sequence of events that must be “of relatively equal importance (or value), and . . . of approximately similar ‘kinds.’” GASS, supra at 11. These aspects of narrative thinking can be used to imbue small items or events with large significance. And narrative thinking not only intensifies people’s ordinary tendency to regard the actions of other people as a product of will – indeed, of character – rather than of external circumstances. It also gives this tendency the twist of focusing attention on “‘reasons’ for things happening, rather than strictly [on] . . . their ‘causes.’” BRUNER, THE CONSTRUCTION OF REALITY, supra at 7. By working with these and other distinctive qualities of narrative thinking, a litigator can cue the jurors to process what they see and hear at trial in ways that bolster his or her case, undermine the opposition’s, or both.

5. Using particular narratives to accredit, discredit, configure or code pieces of evidence or information. A jury is likely to find evidence persuasive to the extent that the “facts” it portrays conform to the jurors’ understanding of The Way the World Works. Jurors enter a trial with strong views, based on personal experience and on the second-hand information prevalent in their cultural milieu, about The Way the World Works. But these views are neither monolithic nor immutable. We all carry around in our heads an inharmonious assortment of notions, sometimes even flatly inconsistent notions, about what is usual, plausible, probable, possible, right, in human affairs. These notions usually take story form. See AMSTERDAM & BRUNER, MINDING THE LAW, supra at 39-47. Depending on which stories are salient when we are trying to make sense of things, we can come to different conclusions about what happened and why. By reminding the jury of apt stories to be thinking about as it receives and evaluates the evidence at a trial, a litigator can prompt the jurors to be more trusting or more skeptical regarding particular kinds of evidence or the facts the evidence is offered to prove.

The stories can be drawn from “news” or fiction. For example, when objecting in open court to the admission of crime-lab evidence on grounds of unreliability (see § 33.11 infra), counsel might refer to media exposés of ineptitude at forensic laboratories (see § 31.09 infra). Additionally or alternatively, counsel could make disparaging comparisons between the crime-scene investigators in the present case and those in well-known TV entertainment series like CSI, where the forensic science techniques are invariably sophisticated and flawless.

Stories are also useful in coding items of evidence or other pieces of a case. Coding is the process by which words, images, objects, and ideas become associatively linked with others, so that the former bring the latter to mind. See AMSTERDAM & BRUNER, MINDING THE LAW, supra, at 187-92. Narrative construction involves considerable coding, which contributes heavily to the verisimilitude of good stories. And the conceptual, emotional, even sensory “baggage” packed into an item by narrative coding travels with the item beyond the story where the packing was
6. Using particular narratives to cue the jury’s interpretation of the case as a whole or to free the jury from sets that dispose it to fit the case into a harmful mold. The ultimate task of the jurors in any jury trial is not only to decide what happened in terms of physical bodies moving in space and time, or even bodies moved by minds possessing specified mental states. It is also to interpret and categorize the actions and mental states as understandable human behavior susceptible to legal and moral judgment. “Placing things, events, and people in these categories is very much a matter of what stock script one recognizes as being in play or what story one chooses to tell.” Id. at 47. A litigator who taps into stock narratives familiar to jurors – either the conventional story lines of prevalent news and entertainment genres or specific books, films, or TV shows that are recognizable by name, by leading characters, or by other signature features – can put those narratives to work as a cognitive framework for the jury’s interpretation of the evidence that will shape an understanding of “what really happened” and what it means.

7. Techniques for communicating narratives to the jury. One virtue of grounding a litigator’s case in stock stories is that s/he can begin to evoke the scripts and trappings of the story during pretrial proceedings or at the very outset of the trial. This makes it possible to use the voir dire examination of prospective jurors to sound out the jury’s likely reactions to a story before the litigator commits to it by presenting evidence or even taking an overt position regarding the facts of the case in opening argument.

If story-based images have attached to a case in pretrial publicity, that makes it easier for the litigator to advert to them in connection with voir dire examination of prospective jurors. But if they have not, it may still be possible to use language evocative of stock narratives in talking with the jurors on voir dire or in framing written voir dire questions in courts where the judge conducts the oral questioning. These evocations have the dual purpose of priming the jury early to think in terms of the narratives that a litigator expects to tap into later and of giving the litigator an opportunity to observe any reactions of prospective jurors to the narrative. Their reactions may suggest that s/he will be wise to play it down – or, conversely, to play it up – or to strike particular jurors.

Means for suggesting narratives to the jury at later points in the trial abound. During opening and closing argument, counsel may or may not be permitted to make explicit references to stories current in public discourse, but s/he will usually be able to trigger recognition of widespread and recurrent stock narratives – and even of the better-known books or films or TV series that exemplify them – by implicit allusions. She can usually find occasions for similar allusions in questioning witnesses and in making and arguing objections. Witnesses can be prepared to testify in ways that make the narratives come to mind. The litigator’s style of witness examination and even his or her physical activity in the courtroom can be designed to summon up the narratives s/he wants the jurors to recognize in the evidence. For example, it is advisable for counsel to consult the client extensively at the defense table in cases where the prosecution is seeking to depict the client as impulsive and lacking in self-control but not in cases where the prosecution’s theory is that the defendant or juvenile respondent was a criminal mastermind.

8. Choosing between explicit and implicit invocation of stock stories. When a litigator has the option of making more or less explicit references to the stock stories that s/he wants jurors to have in mind, s/he needs to balance the values of clarity and dramatic emphasis against their risks. One risk is related to the risk of premature commitment. The more unequivocally a litigator has announced his or her reliance on a particular narrative, the more difficult it will be to back off it if subsequent developments weaken that theory of the case or reveal a better one. Overt or overly clear identification of a particular stock story as the theme of a litigator’s case invites opposing counsel to argue that the case is built around a fable or that the facts don’t fit the fable. More oblique reference to the stock story would confront opposing counsel with a hard choice between ignoring it or reinforcing it by recognizing it and undertaking to refute it. And if a refutation seemed sufficiently persuasive, the litigator could always reply, “That isn’t what I meant at all.” Similarly, the clarity of a reference increases the extent to which it offers traction for resistance. A juror may be roused to quarrel with the story who would not have reacted to a more ambiguous reference that was nonetheless sufficient to engage the imaginations of jurors more in tune with the tale.

§ 6.06(c) The Basic Structure and Process of Narrative

Journalists learn and teach that the recipe for making stories is the Five W’s: Where? Who? What? When? Why? There is a conspicuous resemblance between this formula and literary theorist Kenneth Burke’s Pentad or “Five Key Terms of Dramatism”:

1. Scene: the situation, the setting, the where and when;
2. Agent: the actors, the cast of characters;
3. Act: the action, the plot;
4. Agency: the means, the instruments of action;
5. Purpose: the motivations, goals, aims of the characters.

KENNETH BURKE, A GRAMMAR OF MOTIVES xv (1945). Either roster will serve as a handy checklist of the elements that need attention in constructing stories for the uses identified in the preceding subsection. “Elements” as in elemental. For each element represents a whole dimension in which choices are possible and arrays of variables should be canvassed before making the final choices.

The five dimensions are, of course, interconnected. They need to be in tune. See id. at 3. Choices made in one dimension affect each of the others. (For example, adding characters to a story may require an expansion of the scene to encompass a longer period of time or a wider stage. It may also, by increasing the complexity of the interpersonal dynamics, change the motivations of the characters previously onstage.) Intensifying the focus upon one dimension may diminish the significance of another. See id. at 17. And transmutations from one dimension to another can be accomplished by the narrative alchemy that Kenneth Burke describes as re-forging distinctions in the “great central moltenness” where all of the dimensions have a common ground. See id. at xix. (Capital defense attorneys, for example, transmute Scene into Agent when they construct mitigation stories in which the defendant’s or juvenile respondent’s childhood environment becomes the Villain of the plot.)

The interdependence and partial interchangeability of Scene, Agent, Act, Agency, and Purpose make narrative a highly variable and flexible medium. Still, there is a certain constancy in the way in which agents act to pursue their purposes within the temporal framework of the scene. This constancy resides in what is usually called “plot” – the “principle of interconnectedness and intention [necessary] . . . in moving through the discrete elements – incidents, episodes, actions – of a narrative.” BROOKS, supra at 5. It reflects “a ‘mental model’ whose defining property is its unique pattern of events over time.” Bruner, Narrative Construction of Reality, supra at 6. Most stories have a common plot structure. The unfolding of the plot requires (implicitly or explicitly):

(1) an initial steady state grounded in the legitimate ordinariness of things
(2) that gets disrupted by a Trouble consisting of circumstances attributable to human agency or susceptible to change by human intervention,
(3) in turn evoking efforts at redress or transformation, which lead to a struggle, in which the efforts succeed or fail,
(4) so that the old steady state is restored or a new (transformed) steady state is created,
[(5) and the story often concludes with some point or coda – say, for example, Aesop’s characteristic moral of the story: “Bird of a feather flock together,” or “One lie will lead to another and ultimately seal one’s doom” – a/k/a “This is the Way the World Works.”]

See AMSTERDAM & BRUNER, MINDING THE LAW, supra at 113-14. For illustrations of the structure in appellate opinions, see id. at 77-99, 143-64.

§ 6.06(d) The Special Features of Narrative in a Jury-Trial Setting

Although stories have a core of common elements and a common basic structure, they differ widely depending upon the purposes for which they are told, the setting in which they are told, and the conventions and constraints of that setting. Fictional stories told for didactic purposes (in the tradition of Aesop’s Fables) have different conventions and constraints than do cautionary tales, or novels and dramas aimed at exploring the human condition, or novels and movies and TV shows aimed at entertainment. Purportedly nonfiction stories told by historians have different conventions and constraints than those told by ethnographers and anthropologists or by propagandists. The following conventions and constraints bind the stories that litigators can tell in jury trials:

First, the stories that litigators ask the jury to believe as constituting “the facts” of the case (although not necessarily the stories to which they refer for analogies or illustrations) must appear to be true. Jurors view their job as getting at the truth of what happened. A litigator’s version of events must appear to be true not only from the standpoint of verisimilitude (lifelikeness) but from the standpoint of external referentiality (conformity to any information that jurors will take to be objective “fact”). And a trial litigator’s resources for creating facts are limited. S/he cannot, like a novelist or playwright, conjure physical props out of thin air or put into the mouths of witnesses any words that s/he cannot convince them to utter under oath. If admissible evidence of fact X just isn’t out there (or if bad luck or a client’s inability to pay for thoroughgoing investigation prevents the litigator from obtaining evidence of fact X), then the litigator’s story at trial has either got to jibe with the nonexistence of fact X or contain a sub-story that explains why fact X is unprovable though true.

Further, some jurors have an unshakeable belief that truth is a matter of objective fact to be discerned exclusively by logical deduction from physical evidence and the accurate testimony of reliable witnesses. These jurors will resent and resist any suggestion by a trial attorney that the jury needs to interpret the evidence. They will be positively outraged at the idea that stories have anything to do with truth-finding. Such jurors are not immune to the influence of narrative. Indeed, their denial of the need for interpretation in fact-finding may make them peculiarly prone to reach uncritical conclusions on the basis of stories that they do not realize they have in their heads – like the very story that the only way to get at truth is Sherlock Holmes’. But a litigator facing jurors of this sort needs to tell his or her stories in the manner advised by the classic rhetors, using art to conceal his or her art.

Second, a litigator’s story to a jury usually needs to accommodate the opposition’s story (because it needs to trump it) and always needs to be made as immune as possible against challenge. Trial stories are stories told in contemplation of contest. Except on the rare occasions when a story can be unveiled for the first time in rebuttal closing argument, the opposition will get a chance to refute it or coopt it. This means that, to the extent possible, stories should be built in such a way that an assault on any piece will not bring down the whole; vulnerable pieces should be eliminated; loose ends are usually better left hanging than tucked in, if the opposition is likely to pull them out again. And, the litigator always needs to consider whether something s/he is thinking of putting into his or her story can be spun by the opposition to support a competing story.

Third, a litigator’s story to a jury will invariably be an incomplete story, a story without a last chapter. It has to point to a concluding chapter that the jury’s verdict will write. It has to have a role for jury to play, and that role has to be made an attractive one – sleuth, quester-after-Truth, avenger, righter-of-otherwise-irremediable-wrongs.
And, fourth, of course, the last chapter that the jury is called upon to write must be a verdict in favor of the litigator’s client. Q.E.D.

§ 6.07 METHODS OF MAXIMIZING THE TIME AVAILABLE FOR, AND THE EFFECTIVENESS OF, CASE PREPARATION IN PUBLIC DEFENDER OFFICES IN WHICH CASELOADS ARE PROHIBITIVELY HIGH

Probably the most difficult aspect of being a public defender is coping with the high caseload that assistant public defenders normally carry. In some jurisdictions staff attorneys in a public defender’s office have active caseloads of more than a hundred cases pending trial at any one time. When a new staff attorney begins work, s/he is often thrown into a courtroom and assigned to handle the heavy caseload left behind by his or her predecessor, with little or no training. Attorneys thrown into such a position may feel that manuals such as this one are simply irrelevant to their practice because the high caseload, constant court appearances, and perennial deadlines preclude the type of individual attention to cases and careful preparation that this MANUAL contemplates. If the attorney succumbs to this bleak view and sacrifices case preparation in some or all of his or her cases, s/he will not only deprive the clients of their Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel, but s/he will also violate the canons of ethics requiring thorough and competent preparation. See AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, MODEL RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT, Rule 1.1 (2018); AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, CODE OF PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY EC 6-4 (1980); American Bar Association, Formal Op. 06-441 (May 13, 2006) (“Ethical Obligations of Lawyers Who Represent Indigent Criminal Defendants When Excessive Caseloads Interfere with Competent and Diligent Representation”); Barbara Fedders, Losing Hold of the Guiding Hand: Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Juvenile Delinquency Representation, 14 LEWIS & CLARK L. REV. 771 (2010); Wilbur v. City of Mount Vernon, 989 F. Supp. 2d 7122 (W.D. Wash. 2013); In re Edward S., 173 Cal. App. 4th 387, 412-15, 92 Cal. Rptr. 3d 725, 745-48 (2009); Public Defender, Eleventh Judicial Circuit of Florida v. State, 115 So. 3d 261, 270, 274, 279, 282 (Fla. 2013); State ex rel. Missouri Public Defender v. Waters, 370 S.W.3d 592, 597, 605-08, 612 (Mo. 2012); State v. A.N.J., 168 Wash. 2d 91, 112, 225 P.3d 956, 966-67 (2010).

The high caseload of a public defender undoubtedly does make the job of defending each individual client more difficult. However, there are countervailing virtues in an institutional defender’s office that offer the possibility of maximizing efficiency in case preparation.

The first of these is the fact that the attorney’s practice is highly specialized. Because all or most of the cases handled by the attorney will be delinquency cases, the attorney will need to take the same actions and can use the same pleadings and forms again and again. For example, counsel will need to subpoena police reports and the school records of the respondent in every single case. This ministerial task, which tends to be very time-consuming, needs be done personally only once at the start of the attorney’s career. Once the attorney has developed a format for these subpoenas, s/he can leave it to a law clerk, investigator, or administrative assistant to do the routine and mechanical job of copying the language devised by the attorney.
onto a subpoena bearing each new case’s name and docket number. Similarly, certain routine motions, such as motions for discovery, can be duplicated with relatively little adaptation in each case.

A second type of routinization of counsel’s practice takes advantage of the recurrence of fact patterns in delinquency cases. For example, counsel will probably handle several drug possession cases involving the so-called “dropsie” fact pattern (see § 23.13 infra) and will be able to use virtually the same motion to suppress tangible evidence and virtually identical questions for cross-examining the police officer and the prosecution chemist in every such case. This type of replication of fact patterns also can be found in, for example, cases in which the prosecution’s proof turns upon a show-up identification (see § 25.03(a) infra), and counsel can consistently litigate an identification suppression motion and thereafter stress at trial the factors that precluded the witness from getting a good look at the perpetrator and the suggestiveness of the show-up procedure. Obviously, there is no need to reinvent the wheel in case after case. Since either the attorney himself or herself or some other attorney in the office is likely to have handled a particular fact pattern before, counsel can resort to that prior case file to obtain forms for writing the necessary motions, drafting direct and cross-examination questions, and preparing the prima facie motion and closing argument.

Another, and perhaps the most important, virtue of an institutional defender’s office is a factor that has already been implicit in this discussion: the existence of a number of colleagues with whom to share information and resources. Other trial attorneys in the office are likely to have motions, names of expert witnesses, cross-examination techniques, and even artful phrases for closing arguments, that counsel can use in his or her own practice. In addition, the appellate attorneys on the staff will have briefs containing caselaw needed to litigate in new cases the various issues raised on earlier appeals. The key to making use of these large resources is establishing an office-wide “motions bank” (a central file containing copies of all substantive motions filed by the trial attorneys), a “brief bank” of appellate briefs, and a central file listing the cases (with the attorneys’ names) that present issues likely to recur (such as the previously mentioned identification and drug issues and, for example, issues relating to serology, ballistics, alibi, character evidence, and self-defense).

Of course, a staff attorney in a public defender’s office cannot do an adequate job unless the office provides him or her with sufficient resources. The most important of these is investigative assistance. Unfortunately, many public defender offices depend upon a small band of professional investigators to handle all of the investigative work for the office. Because the caseload carried by the office is far too heavy to be served by a handful of investigators (especially in view of the large number of witnesses to be interviewed and other investigative tasks to be done in each case), the investigative division soon degenerates into doing nothing more than serving subpoenas. A very effective solution to this problem was developed by the Public Defender Service for the District of Columbia and thereafter duplicated in public defender offices in Minneapolis and Seattle. These offices make use of law students and college students from local schools who spend a semester or a year working on a volunteer basis as investigative interns. The interns are recruited and trained by a staff investigator who also supervises the investigations performed by the interns. The interns are assigned to individual attorneys, and they meet with their attorneys to discuss the witnesses that should be interviewed, the statements that should be taken, and the exhibits that should be gathered in each case. The offices that have created a system of this sort have discovered that it produces benefits for all involved: the attorneys obtain a corps of dedicated and enthusiastic workers who, albeit inexperienced, quickly learn the ropes and devote the time and energy necessary to perform first-rate investigation; the students, in turn, obtain credit from their schools for the work and can obtain a valuable credential on their résumés as well as letters of recommendation from the attorneys for whom they worked.

Another essential resource for public defender offices that handle delinquency cases is a division of social workers. As explained in §§ 38.10, 38.14 infra, much of the dispositional work in a delinquency case is the social work involved in finding an appropriate community-based program to propose to the judge at disposition. Social workers have the expertise and the knowledge of community resources necessary to effectively perform the tasks of diagnosing the child’s or parent’s needs and finding a program to suit those needs. A prototype of this sort of social work complement exists at the New York City Legal Aid Society’s Juvenile Rights Division, which has a large corps of social workers assisting the attorneys on delinquency cases.

Assuming that the office maintains adequate investigative and social work divisions and assuming that the office possesses motions banks, brief banks, and other central information systems, a staff attorney can start most of the work needed to prepare a case for trial on the day of the Initial Hearing. Immediately after completing the hearing and conducting a full-scale interview of the client, the attorney would develop a defense theory of the case (see § 6.02 supra); meet with an investigator, relate the theory of the case, and inform the investigator which witnesses need to be located and interviewed and which documents and other exhibits need to be gathered; give the case name and number to an administrative assistant and instruct him or her to fill out subpoenas for police reports and for the child’s school records, which can be served by the investigator; locate motions and other materials from prior cases with similar fact patterns, adapt them to the unique facts of the new case, and give the adapted versions of the motions to the administrative assistant to type; telephone and retain expert witnesses who will be needed for trial or disposition; and, if the child appears to have psychological or emotional problems or special needs, meet with an office social worker, brief him or her on the case, and request that s/he meet with the client and investigate programs suitable to the child’s needs. Once freed of all of the mechanical and nonlegal aspects of case preparation, the attorney will be able to devote time (in this as well as other pending cases) to the functions that only an attorney can perform – working with witnesses and drafting examination questions and legal arguments.
Chapter 7

Selecting and Drafting Motions: Strategic and Practical Considerations

§ 7.01 THE IMPORTANCE OF MOTIONS PRACTICE; THE OBJECTIVES TO BE SOUGHT

Pretrial motions practice is crucial to effective defense work. Successful litigation of motions can win the case – either by producing outright dismissal of the Petition (for example, when the defense prevails on a motion challenging the legal sufficiency of the Petition or the jurisdiction of the court) or by excluding evidence that the prosecution needs in order to win the case at trial (for example, when the defense prevails on a motion to suppress tangible evidence, incriminatory statements, or identification testimony).

Even when the defense loses a motion, there are often net benefits to litigating it. Motions practice serves as a highly effective discovery technique. The prosecutor’s written and oral responses to a defense motion may provide defense counsel with information about the prosecution’s case that it would not otherwise be able to obtain before trial. Evidentiary hearings on motions provide invaluable opportunities to ferret out such information in detail and also to pin down prosecution witnesses on the record, developing transcripts that can be used at trial to impeach the witnesses with prior inconsistent statements.

The defense also gains other fringe benefits from motions practice. The judge’s ruling on the motion may provide a fertile source of reversible error on appeal. In cases in which a guilty plea is under consideration but counsel is not sure about the strength of the government’s case, an evidentiary hearing on a motion to suppress can provide a preview of the prosecution’s evidence that will enable counsel to evaluate realistically the wisdom of taking the offered plea. Or if counsel has concluded that a plea is wise but the client is unconvinced, the client’s observation of the prosecution’s witnesses at an evidentiary suppression hearing may change the client’s mind and enable him or her to reach the right decision. In instances in which police conduct is particularly reprehensible, the unpleasant prospect of its exposure at a motions hearing may occasionally persuade the prosecutor to drop the charges or may give the defense considerable leverage in plea bargaining. Hearings on motions, whether they are evidentiary hearings or oral arguments, may also strengthen the attorney-client relationship and lead the client to place greater trust in the attorney’s advice generally, since the client sees the attorney fighting for him or her in court.

§ 7.02 THE MOTIONS THAT COUNSEL SHOULD CONSIDER

Counsel will need to make a decision early in the case about what motions to file. In most jurisdictions a local statute or court rule establishes a deadline (usually 15 days or 30 days after arraignment) for filing motions. See § 7.05 infra.
Counsel should begin by examining the Petition to determine whether it suffers from deficiencies that render it subject to a motion to dismiss. See §§ 17.03, 17.05-17.07 infra. Other grounds for dismissing the Petition that counsel should consider are jurisdictional defects (see § 17.04 infra) and double jeopardy (see § 17.08 infra). If the charges in the Petition are based on more than one incident, counsel should consider a motion to sever counts (see §§ 18.01-18.05 infra), and if the client is charged jointly with one or more co-respondents, counsel should consider a motion for severance of respondents (see §§ 18.07-18.10 infra). In rare cases motions for consolidation of charges or respondents may be advisable. See §§ 18.06, 18.11 infra.

On the basis of counsel’s interviews with the client (see Chapter 5 supra), informal discovery obtained from the prosecution (see Chapter 9 infra) or at the probable-cause hearing (see §§ 4.29, 4.32 supra), and independent defense investigation (see Chapter 8 infra), counsel should determine whether the prosecution’s case is likely to include any tangible evidence obtained by searches or seizures, any confessions or incriminating admissions by the respondent, or any identification testimony. If so, counsel should evaluate the potential of a motion to suppress evidence under the doctrines summarized in Chapters 23 (tangible evidence), 24 (confessions and admissions), and 25 (identifications).

If the informal discovery process has proven inadequate and the prosecutor has refused to turn over information that the defense requires, counsel should file motions for discovery. See § 9.07 infra. Counsel should also consider motions for sanctions if counsel learns that evidence has been destroyed (see §§ 9.09(b)(6), (7) infra) or that the prosecutor has told witnesses not to talk with counsel or defense investigators (see § 8.13 infra).

If the client has a limited prior record and appears to be doing well in school, counsel should consider seeking diversion of the case. See Chapter 19 infra.

Counsel then should give thought to the trial forum. If there are reasons to believe that the respondent would not receive a fair trial in the jurisdiction in which the case is presently pending, counsel can file a motion for a change of venue. See §§ 20.01-20.03 infra. If there are reasons to believe that the judge presiding over the case may not be impartial, counsel can file a motion for recusal. See §§ 20.04-20.05 infra.

If counsel is practicing in a State that allows jury trials in juvenile cases, s/he will want to consider motions to challenge aspects of juror selection. See § 21.03 infra.

Depending upon the defense theory of the case (see § 6.02 supra), counsel may need to retain expert consultants or witnesses or an investigator. If so, and if the client is indigent, counsel will have to file a motion for state funds. See § 11.03 infra.

Developments during the pretrial stage may necessitate motions addressed to the timing of pretrial proceedings and trial. It may become strategically desirable to advance the date of pretrial hearings, the trial, or both (see § 15.01 infra), or counsel may want to file a motion for a continuance in order to gain more time for investigation and preparation (see § 15.02 infra). If the prosecution seeks a continuance, counsel may respond with a motion to dismiss for want of prosecution (see § 15.03 infra) or on grounds of denial of a speedy trial (see § 15.04 infra) or both.

§ 7.03 DECIDING WHETHER TO RAISE AN ISSUE IN A PRETRIAL MOTION OR AT TRIAL

Local practice may give the defense the option of raising certain defenses and contentions either by pretrial motion or at trial. Counsel should consider the following reasons for and against litigating a motion prior to trial.

§ 7.03(a) Reasons for Litigating an Issue by Pretrial Motion

Election of the pretrial motion forum ordinarily results in an earlier adjudication of the issues raised. This may be important not only when success on the issues will require dismissal of the entire prosecution, so that termination of the case in the respondent’s favor is expedited, but also when success on the issues will weaken the prosecution’s litigating posture or morale and thereby increase the defense’s leverage in plea bargaining. Conversely, when there is substantial likelihood that the defense will lose the issues no matter when they are presented, they may be more effective bargaining counters if mentioned to the prosecutor during plea negotiations as contentions that the defense intends to raise at trial rather than being raised and definitively lost prior to the negotiation.

A major reason to opt for the pretrial motion forum exists whenever defense motions may produce discovery of the prosecution’s case that can be used to guide defense investigation and improve defense trial preparation (see, e.g., § 8.13 supra; §§ 7.07, 22.02, 22.04(b) infra) or provide an opportunity to cross-examine prosecution witnesses and get them committed on record to statements which will curb their trial testimony or be usable to impeach it (see §§ 7.07, 22.02, 22.04(c) infra).

If interlocutory appellate review of adverse rulings on pretrial motions is available (see § 26.01 infra), the motions procedure will give counsel a chance to obtain appellate remedies for errors that, as a practical matter, are uncorrectable after verdict.

Depending upon the idiosyncrasies of local practice, there may be various other benefits to litigating certain issues by pretrial motion. In jurisdictions in which motions scheduled in advance of the trial date are heard by a motions judge rather than the trial judge, counsel can use the choice of forum to select the more favorable judge. In such jurisdictions, litigating issues before a judge other than the trial judge also avoids the risk that the trial judge will hear evidence during the motions hearing that is inadmissible at trial but may unconsciously affect the judge’s trial verdict. In jurisdictions that permit juries in juvenile trials, the pretrial motion procedure minimizes the risk of lengthy sidebar proceedings or proceedings in the jury’s absence that will bore or irritate the jurors; it also reduces the risk that prejudicial material exposed in these proceedings will be leaked to the jury.

If counsel is seeking dismissal on a legal issue that is both technical and close, litigating it in a pretrial motion forum rather than at trial may also improve the defense’s chances of prevailing. Judges are understandably reluctant to dismiss a case on a narrow legal point after the parties have prepared and all of the witnesses have appeared for trial.

§ 7.03(b) Reasons for Litigating an Issue at Trial Rather Than in a Pretrial Motions Forum

On the other hand, there may be considerable advantages to postponing the presentation of certain defenses and contentions until after trial has begun. Some defense contentions will be more compelling in the context of the case as it develops at trial than in isolation as they appear on pretrial motion.

A consideration militating strongly in favor of delaying various issues until trial is that this plan of action can prevent the prosecutor from ever obtaining appellate review of a ruling favorable to the defense. Local practice may permit prosecutorial appeals (or petitions for prerogative writs) following pretrial rulings but not following rulings made in the course of trial. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Surina, 438 Pa. Super. 333, 652 A.2d 400 (1995). Moreover, the beginning of trial marks the point at which jeopardy attaches for purposes of the federal constitutional guarantee against double jeopardy. See § 17.08(b) infra. Rulings in favor of the respondent prior to that point may be appealed by the prosecution to the extent permitted by local practice, whereas rulings in favor of the respondent after that point may not be appealed if either: (A) they are tantamount to an acquittal, or (B) they result in an acquittal. Probably also they cannot be appealed if they result in the termination of the trial without a general verdict or finding of guilty, other than upon the respondent’s own motion – such as, for example, when the charges are dismissed by the court sua sponte or at the instance of the prosecution following a trial ruling in favor of the respondent upon a motion or objection that does not affirmatively request dismissal or a mistrial – at least in the absence of “a manifest necessity” for terminating the trial. See §§ 17.08(c), 17.08(e) infra. Although the law in this area is tortuous and confused, the bottom line is that serious, often insurmountable practical, statutory, and constitutional difficulties impede prosecutorial appeals from midtrial rulings in the respondent’s favor, whereas pretrial (or posttrial) rulings of identical purport can be readily appealed by the prosecutor.

§ 7.03(c) Casting the Issue in the Form of a Pretrial Motion When the Pretrial Forum Is Preferable

If, after weighing the competing considerations, counsel concludes that they favor motions litigation, counsel should employ any applicable pretrial motion procedure provided by statute or court rule. If neither statutes nor rules authorize any such procedures, counsel will have to be resourceful in inventing them. In a number of jurisdictions, for example, courts will entertain common-law motions in limine seeking pretrial rulings on:

(i) issues of law whose disposition importantly affects defense trial strategy (such as the admissibility of evidence that the prosecution is expected to offer to impeach the respondent if the respondent elects to testify), e.g., People v. Patrick, 233 Ill. 2d 62, 73, 908 N.E.2d 1, 7, 330 Ill. Dec. 149, 155 (2009) (“We conclude that a trial court’s failure to rule on a motion in limine on the admissibility of prior convictions when it has sufficient information to make a ruling constitutes an abuse of discretion.”); State v. Lamb, 321 N.C. 633, 365 S.E.2d 600 (1988); State v. Lariviere, 527 A.2d 648 (R.I. 1987); compare New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450 (1979), with Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984);

(ii) the admissibility of prosecution evidence when its preclusion “renders the state’s proof with respect to the pending charge so weak in its entirety that any reasonable possibility of effective prosecution has been destroyed,” City of Defiance v. Kretz, 60 Ohio St. 3d 1, 4, 573 N.E.2d 32, 35 (1991);

(v) the admissibility of defense evidence, cf. United States v. Helstoski, 442 U.S. 477 (1979) (prosecution motion for ruling in limine on the admissibility of prosecution evidence); or

(The latter two kinds of motions in limine are particularly useful when defense counsel expects to lose the motion at the trial level but wishes to preserve the legal issue for appeal and when the defense evidence in question is difficult or costly to gather or present or is inconsistent with alternative defense trial strategies or may be less persuasive factually than is the legal claim for its admissibility.)

§ 7.04 CHOOSING BETWEEN ORAL AND WRITTEN MOTIONS

When local practice gives the defense the option to make pretrial motions orally or in writing, it is ordinarily better to make them in writing. Written motions assure that both the relief sought by the defense and the grounds upon which it is sought are preserved in the record, whereas oral motions entail the risk that counsel may omit to make (or the court reporter may fail to hear) significant points. Many state appellate courts will not entertain claims of error unless the record shows that the specific legal contention sought to be raised on appeal was presented to the trial court; and federal constitutional contentions must ordinarily be made in state trial courts with explicit reference to the provision of the Constitution on which counsel relies in order to support subsequent Supreme Court review (see § 39.02(a) infra) and to avoid the danger that the federal claim will be held to have been waived for purposes of postconviction federal habeas corpus (see § 39.03(b) infra). If, for any reason, a motion is made orally, counsel should be sure that a stenographer or reporter is present. Similarly, a stenographer or reporter should be present when the judge rules orally on any matter.

§ 7.05 TIMELY FILING OF THE MOTION: METHODS FOR EXTENDING THE FILING DEADLINE AND FOR OBTAINING RELIEF FROM FORFEITURES ENTAILED AS A CONSEQUENCE OF UNTIMELY FILING

In most jurisdictions the applicable state statute or court rule specifies a certain time period within which all motions must be filed. The deadline usually is either 15 days or 30 days after arraignment. Counsel must pay careful attention to the deadline; failure to meet it will almost always result in the court refusing to entertain the motion.

If counsel finds that s/he will be unable to file a motion on time (because, for example, counsel cannot obtain discovery from the prosecutor within the specified time period or because counsel’s heavy trial schedule precludes the preparation and timely filing of the motion), counsel will need to take one of the following measures to protect the client’s rights: (i) at arraignment, request that the court extend the normal period for filing motions; (ii) on or before the deadline, file a motion for an extension of time (commonly called an “EOT”) for filing a particular motion or all defense motions, as the situation warrants; (iii) if the impediment is a lack of necessary factual information resulting from insufficient discovery or investigation, file the motion on time but in an incomplete or even skeletal form, and explain in the body of the motion that the supporting facts will be supplemented at a later time after discovery or investigation has been completed; (iv) secure a firm commitment from a trustworthy prosecutor that s/he will consent to (or will not oppose) defense counsel’s filing of the motion \textit{nunc pro tunc} after the expiration of the normal filing period.

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that defense attorneys must not rely on longstanding local customs of permitting late filing of motions without prior leave of court. All too many defense attorneys have found, to their dismay, that theirs was the first case in which the customary informality and relaxed filing procedure was suddenly abrogated.

In the event that counsel does encounter the unfortunate situation in which s/he missed a filing deadline without prior leave or prosecutorial assent, all is not necessarily lost. Depending upon the facts of the case, counsel may be able to argue that the usual procedural requirement of timely filing is unenforceable or should be waived for one or more of the following reasons:

2. Prior to the expiration of the filing period, the defense did not know, and could not reasonably have known, the facts that provide the basis for filing a motion. \textit{Gouled v. United States}, 255 U.S. 298, 305 (1921); \textit{United States v. Johnson}, 713 F.2d 633, 649 (11th Cir. 1983) (defense lacked knowledge of facts because prosecutor failed to provide adequate discovery); \textit{DiPaola v. Riddle}, 581 F.2d 1111, 1113-14 (4th Cir. 1978) (circumstances of the incident prevented the defendant from knowing of the illegal aspects of the police officers’ actions, and therefore the defendant could not have told counsel); \textit{In re Anthony S.}, 162 A.D.2d 325, 557 N.Y.S.2d 11 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1990) (Family Court abused its discretion by denying leave to late-file a suppression motion which counsel was unable to file prior to trial because counsel was appointed to the case only four days before trial and the client’s detention status impeded access to the client); \textit{and see Murray v. Carrier}, 477 U.S. 478, 488 (1986) (dictum). This doctrine would also justify the waiver of the timeliness requirement if the client’s inability to communicate effectively with counsel (because of, for example, the client’s particularly young age or educational deficits) prevented counsel from learning the relevant facts from the client in time to meet the filing deadline.

3. Prior to the expiration of the filing period, the defense did not know, and could not reasonably have known, of the legal basis for the motion because the caselaw giving rise to such a motion had not yet been decided. \textit{Reed v. Ross}, 468 U.S. 1, 16 (1984); \textit{see Murray v. Carrier}, 477 U.S. at 488 (dictum).

5. Counsel reasonably relied on a longstanding local practice under which late-filing was always permitted. See Spencer v. Kemp, 781 F.2d 1458, 1470-71 (11th Cir. 1986).

6. Regardless of whether there was or was not good cause for counsel’s procedural default, filing of the motion nunc pro tunc should be permitted because, at this stage, there will be no prejudice to the prosecution or to the administration of justice if the defense is permitted to file the motion, whereas preclusion of the motion may well result in a later finding of ineffectiveness of counsel (see Kimmelman v. Morrison, 477 U.S. 365 (1986); see, e.g., Grumbley v. Burt, 591 Fed. Appx. 488, 499-501 (6th Cir. 2015); Tice v. Johnson, 647 F.3d 87, 106-08 (4th Cir. 2011); Thomas v. Varner, 428 F.3d 491, 499-504 (3d Cir. 2005); People v. Ferguson, 114 A.D.2d 226, 228-31, 498 N.Y.S.2d 800, 801-03 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1986)) and a retrial that will be costly both to the parties and to the administration of justice.

The foregoing arguments may result in the court’s agreeing to entertain the motion on the merits despite its lateness. If the court does not do so, counsel will have to put on the record any facts that bring the case within one of the six enumerated principles or could otherwise be viewed as excusing counsel’s procedural default, so as to lay the groundwork for an appeal contending that the trial judge abused his or her discretion in holding the motion procedurally barred. Counsel should not expect to prevail on many such appeals. The watchword here is to be very careful not to miss motions deadlines.

§ 7.06 THE FORM OF THE MOTION; THE NEED FOR AFFIDAVITS

Requirements regarding the form of the motion vary considerably among jurisdictions, and counsel will need to check the applicable statutes and court rules as well as local practice and custom in his or her particular court. In some jurisdictions law and facts are combined in a single pleading; in other jurisdictions the motion is limited to factual averments and may or must be accompanied by a separate memorandum of points and authorities setting forth the law.

Some jurisdictions require the attachment of affidavits or affirmations. Often, this requirement can be satisfied by an affirmation of counsel, setting forth all the facts that s/he has a good-faith basis for believing to be true. Depending upon local rules, counsel may or may not have to specifically identify the sources of each of the facts which s/he is affirming and may or may not have to state that any facts of which she has no personal knowledge are asserted “on information and belief.” In those jurisdictions in which counsel is required to attach affidavits by the witnesses themselves, counsel should keep these affidavits as cursory as possible to avoid giving the prosecutor material with which to impeach the witness at an evidentiary hearing on the motion or at trial.

§ 7.07 DECIDING WHETHER TO SEEK AN EVIDENTIARY HEARING FOR CLAIMS THAT CAN BE PROVEN WITH AFFIDAVITS ALONE

When counsel’s position on a motion depends upon the establishment of facts that are not already in the record, counsel should decide whether to request an evidentiary hearing of the motion or to file supporting factual affidavits with the motion. Of course, local practice may compel one of these procedures or the other for certain motions. In the case of motions to suppress evidence, for example, the defense is ordinarily required to prove the facts by oral testimony and authenticated documents at an evidentiary hearing and may also be required to make a factual proffer or to file affidavits as a threshold matter in order to establish his or her entitlement to a hearing. See § 7.06 supra; § 7.08 infra.

On the other hand, in many jurisdictions, counsel will have the option of proceeding by affidavit or seeking an evidentiary hearing on motions such as a motion for a continuance to procure the attendance of a defense witness, or a motion to dismiss the charging paper because prosecutorial delay has violated the respondent’s right to a speedy trial, or a motion for change of venue on the ground of prejudicial publicity, or a motion for sanctions against the prosecution for concealing or destroying potential defense evidence or harassing defense witnesses or instructing prosecution witnesses to refuse to talk to the defense. When local practice leaves the option to the movant, counsel should consider the following factors in making the choice:

(a) the relative persuasiveness of the factual showings that can be made, respectively, by affidavit and by live testimony;

(b) the opportunities that an evidentiary hearing may give the defense for pretrial discovery of the prosecution’s case and for locking potential prosecution witnesses into impeachable positions by cross-examination;

(c) the opportunities that an evidentiary hearing may give the prosecution for pretrial discovery of the respondent’s case and for locking defense witnesses into impeachable positions by cross-examination;

(d) the delay of the trial that may be necessitated by a pretrial evidentiary hearing; and

(e) in courts in which “long” or evidentiary pretrial motions are heard by a different judge from “short” or on-the-papers motions, the judge who will be most favorable to the defense.
§ 7.08 DRAFTING THE MOTION SO AS TO GAIN RELIEF WITHOUT UNDULY DISCLOSING THE DEFENSE CASE

In drafting written motions that will have to come on for an evidentiary hearing – which will usually include all motions to suppress evidence – counsel should be careful to avoid unnecessary disclosure of either the facts or law that s/he intends to rely upon at the hearing. If a motion gives the prosecutor unnecessary advance notice of the points on which counsel intends to cross-examine prosecution witnesses, the prosecutor can coach those witnesses to avoid traps and undermine defense strategies. For example, if a suppression motion sets out in detail the police conduct that counsel is challenging, the police officers (who are, by nature, deeply interested in sustaining their arrests, searches, and confessions) are likely to conform their testimony to fit whatever theories validate their conduct. In addition, undue disclosure of counsel’s factual and legal theories will give the prosecutor the time and opportunity to gather rebuttal witnesses and adjust the prosecution’s proof.

Thus the best practice in drafting evidentiary motions is (a) to state the relief wanted with great clarity, (b) to state the source of law relied on (statute, rule of criminal procedure, state constitutional provision, federal constitutional provision, leading precedent (e.g., “Miranda v. Arizona”), or whatever) specifically, but (c) to disclose as little as possible of the legal theory and the factual matter that will be presented in support of the motion. If counsel thinks it desirable to clarify the defense’s factual and legal contentions for the court, this can best be done by a brief filed and served at the close of the evidentiary hearing.

This approach may need to be modified, however, in jurisdictions in which local statutes or court rules require a threshold showing of law and fact in order to get an evidentiary hearing. The key in such jurisdictions is (a) to draft the motion so as to meet the applicable standard just marginally, without revealing any additional facts or law, and (b) to the extent possible, to stick to the facts already known to the prosecution and the legal theories that will be obvious to the prosecutor or that cannot be cured by prosecutorial coaching of witnesses. Thus, for example, if counsel moves to suppress an identification from a photo spread, counsel should cite the state and federal due process clauses, document the proposition that unreliable and unnecessarily suggestive police-staged identification procedures violate due process (see §§ 25.02, 25.03(c) infra), and then relate one or more obvious defects in the photo spread (such as, for example, the fact that the respondent is the only child in an array full of adults) without mentioning other less obvious defects and particularly without adverting to defects that can be patched up testimonially by the prosecutor (such as the suggestive writing on the backs of the photographs, which the identifying witness can be coached to say s/he never saw) and without revealing any materials that counsel will use in cross-examining prosecution witnesses (such as the statement the identifying witness gave to a defense investigator, admitting that s/he saw the suggestive writing and also mentioning suggestive comments by the police).

A sufficient reason for sometimes diverging from the general strategy of keeping the legal expositions in defense motions as sparse as possible is that there are some judges who will be impressed by an elaborately reasoned, thoroughly documented legal analysis and will take the motion more seriously, according the defense more latitude at the evidentiary hearing, than they would on a bare-bones motion. They believe that short, boilerplate motions are likely to be nonmeritorious; consequently, they will insist that hearings on such motions be kept to a bare minimum of fact development and will truncate counsel’s examinations of witnesses. Experienced juvenile court practitioners in the locality will know which judges are of this bent. Even when drafting a motion which will be heard by one of them, though, counsel should refrain from spelling out its factual basis in any greater detail than is necessary to provide a point of entry for counsel’s learned legal arguments.

§ 7.09 INVOCATION OF STATE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS IN THE MOTION

In the years since the Warren Court era, the Supreme Court of the United States has increasingly cut back on the protections that the federal Constitution’s Bill of Rights gives criminal defendants, particularly in regard to searches and seizures, interrogations and confessions. Quite a few state supreme courts have reacted by construing the parallel provisions of their state constitutions so as to preserve some of the safeguards eliminated by the United States Supreme Court. State v. Short, 851 N.W.2d 474, 486 (Iowa 2014) (“As a result of the United States Supreme Court’s retreat in the search and seizure area, there has been a sizeable growth in independent state constitutional law. A survey of jurisdictions in 2007 found that a majority of the state supreme courts have departed from United States Supreme Court precedents in the search and seizure area to some degree.”). See generally Shirley S. Abrahamson, Criminal Law and State Constitutions: The Emergence of State Constitutional Law, 63 TEX. L. REV. 1141 (1985); William J. Brennan, Jr., The Bill of Rights and the States: The Revival of State Constitutions as Guardians of Individual Rights, 61 N.Y.U. L. REV. 535 (1986); William J. Brennan, Jr., State Constitutions and the Protection of Individual Rights, 90 HARV. L. REV. 489 (1977); Judith S. Kaye, State Courts at the Dawn of a New Century: Common Law Courts Reading Statutes and Constitutions, 70 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1 (1995); Judith S. Kaye, Dual Constitutionalism In Practice And Principle, 42 RECORD BAR ASS’N CITY OF NEW YORK 285 (1987); Hans E. Linde, First Things First: Rediscovering the States’ Bills of Rights, 9 U. BALTIMORE L. REV. 379 (1980); Robert F. Utter, The Practice of Principled Decision-Making in State Constitutionalism: Washington’s Experience, 65 TEMP. L. REV. 1153 (1992).

In urging state courts to rely on the state constitution to reach a result contrary to a holding of the Supreme Court of the United States, counsel should provide the court with a rationale for interpreting the state constitutional provision more expansively than its federal analogue. Although the state courts need not cite a rationale for resorting to the state constitution, counsel’s identification of a rationale may prove decisive in persuading a trial judge – and later the state appellate courts – to adopt state grounds of decision. So:

(1) When dealing with a state constitutional provision whose wording differs from its federal counterpart, or whose history suggests the framers’ intent to establish a standard different from the federal constitutional standard, counsel can argue that “well established rules governing judicial construction of constitutional provisions . . . [forbid courts to] . . . presume . . . that the framers of the . . . [state] Constitution chose the . . . [distinctive state] form ‘haphazardly,’ nor may we assume that they intended that it be accorded any but its ordinary meaning.” People v. Anderson, 6 Cal. 3d 628, 637, 493 P.2d 880, 886, 100 Cal. Rptr. 152, 158 (1972); see, e.g., State v. Glass, 583 P.2d 872 (Alaska 1978); State v. Simpson, 95 Wash. 2d 170, 622 P.2d 1199 (1980).

(2) When dealing with a state constitutional provision whose wording mirrors the federal constitutional guarantee and whose constitutional history proves of no avail, counsel can:

(a) argue that the U.S. Supreme Court’s precedents are unworkably vague (see, e.g., Commonwealth v. Upton, 394 Mass. 363, 373, 476 N.E.2d 548, 556 (1985) (“We reject the ‘totality of the circumstances’ test now espoused by a majority of the United States Supreme Court. That standard is flexible, but is also ‘unacceptably shapeless and permissive,’ . . . The Federal test lacks the precision that we believe can and should be articulated in stating a test for determining probable cause.”); People v. Griminger, 71 N.Y.2d 635, 640, 524 N.E.2d 409, 412, 529 N.Y.S.2d 55, 58 (1988) (“[W]e have recognized that the more structured ‘bright line’ Aguilar–Spinelli test better served the highly desirable ‘aims of predictability and precision in judicial review of search and seizure cases’, and that ‘the protection of the individual rights of our citizens are best promoted by applying State constitutional standards.’”)), or otherwise dysfunctional (see, e.g., State v. Pierce, 136 N.J. 184, 211, 642 A.2d 947, 961 (1994) (“We also perceive that the Belton rule, as applied to arrests for traffic offenses, creates an unwarranted incentive for police officers to ‘make custodial arrests which they otherwise would not make as a cover for a search which the Fourth Amendment otherwise prohibits’”); State v. Jacumin, 778 S.W.2d 430, 436 (Tenn. 1999) (“We agree with the Courts cited above that the principles developed under Aguilar v. Texas . . . and Spinelli v. United States . . . if not applied hypertechnically, provide a more appropriate structure for probable cause inquiries incident to the issuance of a search warrant than does Gates.”));

right to counsel because of Connecticut’s history of rigorous enforcement of the right to counsel; Commonwealth v. Hernandez, 456 Mass. 528, 532, 924 N.E.2d 709, 712 (2010) (declaring to follow Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164 (2008) because “the exclusion of evidence is an appropriate remedy when a defendant is prejudiced by an arrest made without statutory or common-law authority. . . . [Earlier Massachusetts cases] explained that the application of the exclusionary rule is appropriate where it is ‘inherent in the purpose of a statute which the government has violated,’ and that such a purpose is inherent in ‘statutes closely associated with constitutional rights.’”); State v. Bauder, 181 Vt. 392, 396, 924 A.2d 38, 42 (2007) (“we have . . . long held that our traditional Vermont values of privacy and individual freedom – embodied in Article 11 [of the state constitution] – may require greater protection than that afforded by the federal Constitution”); State v. Jones, 706 P.2d 317, 324 (Alaska 1985) (“In previous cases, we have stated that the state constitutional guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures is broader in scope than Fourth Amendment guarantees under the United States Constitution. In part, this broader protection results from the more extensive right of privacy guaranteed by Article I, Section 22 of our state constitution.”); and/or

(c) cite state constitutional decisions from other States rejecting that ruling of the Supreme Court, commentators’ criticisms of the Supreme Court ruling, and analyses in the opinions of the dissenting Supreme Court Justices. See, e.g., State v. Pierce, 136 N.J. at 200-03, 642 A.2d at 955-57; State v. Novembrino, 105 N.J. at 152-56 & nn.35-38, 519 A.2d at 853-56 & nn.35-38; State v. Cordova, 109 N.M. 211, 217, 784 P.2d 30, 36 (1989).

In any event, counsel should always invoke parallel state constitutional guarantees when making any federal constitutional claim, even in States whose highest court has adopted the posture that it will construe its Bill of Rights provisions as coextensive with those of the federal Constitution as construed by the United States Supreme Court, and whether the federal precedents are unfavorable, favorable, or nonexistent. If counsel wins a friendly state court decision based exclusively on federal constitutional grounds, it will be subject to review and reversal by an unfriendly U.S. Supreme Court. See, e.g., Kansas v. Marsh, 548 U.S. 163 (2006). Were the same ruling based on the state constitution, or on alternative federal and state constitutional grounds, it would be immune against U.S. Supreme Court tampering. See, e.g., Colorado v. Nunez, 465 U.S. 324 (1984). “If the state court decision indicates clearly and expressly that it is alternatively based on bona fide separate, adequate, and independent grounds, we, of course, will not undertake to review the decision.” Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1041 (1983).
Chapter 8

Defense Investigation

Part A. General Aspects of Defense Investigation

§ 8.01 INTRODUCTION: SCOPE OF THE CHAPTER

Hang out for long with experienced defense attorneys and you will hear this story about the seventy-year-old indigent drunk-and-disorderly recidivist appearing for arraignment in front of a judge who had sent him to jail half-a-dozen times in the past. “As you know, Sam,” the judge tells him, “if you can’t afford to hire yourself a good defense lawyer, I can assign you one cost-free.” “Thanks,” says Sam, “but if it’s all the same to Your Honor, this time I’d rather you assign me one or two good defense witnesses.”

Believable facts are the fuel that drives criminal defense work. Factual information is always counsel’s most vital resource, not only in litigating the case at trial but in performing every other crucial defense function: – urging the police or prosecutor to drop or reduce charges, negotiating a plea bargain with the prosecutor, advocating a favorable sentencing disposition to a probation officer or a judge.

Investigation is counsel’s principal means for obtaining and vetting the information s/he needs. Although there are other fact-gathering tools – formal discovery proceedings (see Chapter 9); motions practice (see Chapters 7, 16, 22); plea-bargaining discussions (see Chapter 14); informal interchanges with a prosecutor (see § 6.03 supra) – they tend to be less reliable and comprehensive than independent defense spadework: meticulously searching the streets, paper and electronic files and records, and the internet.

One key aspect of defense investigation, the interview with the client, is described in Chapter 5. The following aspects of investigation are discussed in the present chapter:

1. Locating and interviewing defense witnesses (see §§ 8.06-8.10 infra);
2. Interviewing and taking statements from prosecution witnesses (see §§ 8.11-8.15 infra);
3. Observing the scene of the crime and other relevant sites (see § 8.05 infra); and

An additional form of investigation – the retention of expert consultants to look into aspects of a case that may have forensic-science angles – is discussed in Chapter 11.
§ 8.02 USING THE DEFENSE THEORY OF THE CASE TO GUIDE THE INVESTIGATION

Chapter 6 describes a process for counsel’s developing a defense theory of the case and using it to guide investigation. Because counsel’s time and resources are not unlimited, the investigation must be selective – often painfully so. A well-considered theory of the case provides the basis for efficient selectivity and thoughtful assignment of priorities.

In most cases, one single issue or a very few issues should stand out as having paramount importance. The prosecution must prove all of the elements of the crime it has charged, but the defense needs to do nothing more than defeat one of those elements. It is seldom profitable to take on more than one or, at most, a couple. The defense should aim at the few weakest points in the prosecution’s case or at the few strongest points in the respondent’s defense.

As Chapter 6 also suggests, however, counsel must avoid premature fixation on his or her initial defense theory. While searching for facts to support that theory, counsel must be alert to those that do not and to facts that suggest a preferable theory. Counsel’s best investigative strategy will be to go first to the sources that are most likely to contain information relevant to his or her preliminary, working theory of the case; but in exploring those sources, s/he should collect all other information potentially germane to the case that can be gathered from the same or nearby sources with relatively little additional time and effort. Counsel must constantly re-evaluate the information s/he has thus far gathered and determine whether to stay on the same track or switch to a new one. By keeping his or her eyes open and plans flexible as s/he excavates the locations of most likely paydirt, s/he may find unexpected nuggets that call for digging in new directions. Counsel must always have priorities but be willing to change them.

§ 8.03 STARTING PROMPTLY AND PRESERVING PERISHABLE EVIDENCE

Counsel’s first priority should be to establish a rational order of priorities. To do this, counsel must get a quick picture of the case in broad outline. In addition to interviewing the client to obtain his or her version of events, counsel will need to learn the essence of the prosecution’s version. Because the discovery process described in Chapter 9 may take some time to launch, and because most police officers are reluctant to talk with a defense attorney or investigator, the most effective technique for rapidly uncovering the prosecution’s basic version of events is usually to go to the police station and obtain a copy of the incident report filled out by the police at the time the complainant first called in about the crime (see § 8.19(a)(1) infra) and/or the arrest report filled out when the respondent was apprehended (see § 8.19(a)(2) infra).

A quick start is essential in investigation. Physical evidence and human memory deteriorate rapidly. An object of importance may be discarded or carried off by persons unknown. Witnesses may disappear or forget. Particularly in urban areas, individuals are highly mobile. They may go away suddenly and leave no trace. Or if they remain in the area, they may soon blend into the neighborhood, becoming impossible to locate as their principal identifying
It is especially important to move quickly in tracking down and speaking with alibi witnesses. Alibis depend critically upon the witness’s having a detailed recollection of what s/he and the respondent were doing at a precise point in time. Since often those activities will be quite ordinary, such as hanging out on a street corner, even the slightest delay on counsel’s part can cause uncertainties to creep in. After a couple of days, and certainly after a couple of weeks, the witness will no longer be certain whether a street-corner conversation with the respondent took place at, for example, 3 p.m. or 3:10. And the entire alibi could depend on that ten minute difference if the distance between the scene of the crime and the location of the conversation could be traversed in ten minutes. There are certain techniques the defense can use in jogging alibi witnesses’ memories and preserving alibi evidence, see § 33.22 infra, but the best technique is to get to the witness while his or her memory is fresh.

Before presenting an alibi theory at trial, defense counsel will have to make a rigorously critical review of the credibility of the testimony supporting that theory. Alibis are often difficult to sell to a judge or jury. But counsel should not allow initial skepticism regarding a client’s claim of alibi to dampen or delay thoroughgoing investigation of potential alibi witnesses. See Syed v. State, 236 Md. App. 183, 269, 181 A.3d 860, 909 (Md. Special App. 2018) (collecting the precedents and concluding that “[w]e learn from the above cases that, once a defendant identifies potential alibi witnesses, defense counsel has the duty ‘to make some effort to contact them to ascertain whether their testimony would aid the defense.’ . . . Such identification normally includes names and addresses of potential alibi witnesses, but need not if sufficient information is provided or acquired to enable defense counsel to contact the witnesses.”); Stitts v. Wilson, 713 F.3d 887, 893 (7th Cir. 2013) (“When a defendant’s alibi is that he was at a nightclub at the time of the shooting, where there are presumably many people, we cannot fathom a reason consistent with Supreme Court precedent that would justify a trial counsel’s decision to interview only a single alibi witness without exploring whether there might be others at the venue who could provide credible alibi testimony. There is simply no evidence in the record to suggest that exploring the possibility of other alibi witnesses ‘would have been fruitless’ under these circumstances.’”). See also, e.g., Rivas v. Fischer, 780 F.3d 529, 531, 532-33, 550 (2d Cir. 2015) (when the chief medical examiner “changed his estimate as to the time of death six years after the fact, seemingly on the basis of no new evidence,” to a time when the defendant “had an incomplete alibi,” “any reasonable attorney . . . would have] conclude[d] that investigating the basis of [the medical examiner’s] new findings was essential,” and therefore defense counsel’s failure to investigate further violated his “duty to make reasonable investigations or to make a reasonable decision that makes particular investigations unnecessary”).

Counsel’s other top priorities when starting the investigation should be to locate and preserve contact with items or information sources that are perishable – physical objects that are mobile or changeable; witnesses who are mobile or imprecisely identified but related to some specific location at a recent point in time; witnesses whose involvement is such that they may forget if not questioned quickly. Counsel should move on these items as rapidly as s/he can. This is so not only because of the risk of irreparable losses but also because early investigation makes the most efficient use of counsel’s limited resources: an hour’s search while the track is warm may be worth days later. Once a reasonable effort has been made to find the known perishable items, counsel should evaluate everything s/he has, estimate the points of strength, and proceed with further investigation to consolidate them.

§ 8.04 USE OF AN INVESTIGATOR

Whether counsel should hire an investigator or conduct the investigation personally will depend in part upon the financial resources available to the defense. If the respondent is indigent, counsel can request state funding for investigative services. State statutes and rules commonly provide for such funding. See, e.g., Kimminau v. Avilez, 2014 WL 5507295 (Ariz. App. 2014); Johnny S. v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. App. 3d 826, 153 Cal. Rptr. 550 (1979). Insofar as they do not, or to the extent that they fall short of providing the amount of funding needed by the defense, counsel can invoke the constitutional doctrines surveyed in § 11.03(a) infra, as the basis for requesting adequate investigative support. See, e.g., State v. Wang, 312 Conn. 222, 245, 92 A.3d 220, 235 (2014); State v. Second Judicial District Court, 85 Nev. 241, 453 P.2d 421 (1969); Staten v. Superior Court, 2003 WL 21419614 (Cal. App. 2003); Mason v. Arizona, 504 F.2d 1345, 1351-52 (9th Cir. 1974) (dictum); and cf. Hinton v. Alabama, 134 S. Ct. 1081, 1083, 1085, 1088 (2014) (per curiam); Stubbs v. Thomas, 590 F. Supp. 94, 99-102 (S.D.N.Y. 1984). Procedures for seeking state funding are discussed in § 11.03(b) infra.

An investigator is recommended, when practicable, for several reasons. Money spent to hire an investigator is usually economically spent, since an investigator’s time is less costly than counsel’s. Counsel does, or will, have other things to do in the case that can be done only by a lawyer, which may occupy counsel at times when investigative needs are critical. A good investigator also has sources of information unavailable to all but the most experienced defense lawyers in a locality – community contacts, official contacts (acquaintances in the police department, prison records department, probation department, and so forth), and contacts with other professional fact gatherers (news reporters, social workers, local politicians and their staffs). An investigator can be called to testify if any conflicts arise between the stories given by witnesses at trial and the stories they previously gave in an investigative interview, whereas judges usually have discretion to refuse to allow a lawyer to take the witness stand in a case in which s/he is appearing as counsel. And, if counsel decides that photographs or recordings are necessary for the defense, a person other than counsel will have to take them and be available to testify to lay a foundation for their admission into evidence, should the prosecutor not stipulate to their authenticity and accuracy.

Intelligent use of an investigator, however, requires thoughtful attention by counsel. Counsel must explain the case and the initial theories of the defense fully to the investigator at the outset and must inform the investigator periodically of counsel’s current thinking in order to avoid squandering defense resources in the collection of useless information. Frequent, regularly scheduled check-ins by phone ordinarily serve this purpose best; most of the time, they can be kept brief.

If counsel is practicing in a jurisdiction that permits the prosecutor to obtain notes of interviews of witnesses who testify at trial for the defense, counsel will need to explain to the investigator the reasons for refraining from taking notes when interviewing defense witnesses and for reporting orally to counsel about the content of the interviews. See § 8.10 infra.

§ 8.05 THE IMPORTANCE OF PERSONALLY OBSERVING THE SCENE OF THE CRIME AND OTHER RELEVANT SITES

Whether or not counsel uses an investigator, it is usually wise for counsel personally to inspect the site of any important event in the case: the offense, the arrest, a search and seizure. Although counsel will be principally looking for specific items, s/he will often perceive others that put a whole new complexion on the case – items having a significance that would escape anyone but counsel. Frequently, for example, at the time of trial, when a prosecution witness is testifying about events in detail not previously known to the defense, it becomes apparent to counsel who has been at the scene – and only because s/he has been at the scene – that the witness is mistaken or confused on matters of spatial relations. (A witness who, on direct examination, has carefully drawn a diagram of an unobstructed street corner can be quite visibly flustered by the question on cross-examination whether there is not, in fact, a substantial construction barrier on that corner.) Where necessary, counsel should seek a court order for access to a crime scene that is not otherwise available to counsel. See, e.g., State in the Interest of A.B., 219 N.J. 542, 547, 554, 561, 99 A.3d 782, 785, 789, 793 (2014) (the family court did not “abuse[ ] its discretion by entering a discovery order allowing the accused, his attorney, and his investigator to inspect and photograph specified areas of the alleged victim’s home for no more than thirty minutes in the presence of a prosecutor’s investigator”; “The right to the effective assistance of counsel in a criminal proceeding includes the right to conduct a reasonable investigation to prepare a defense.”; “a defense attorney’s visit to the scene of the crime is a rather ordinary undertaking, and in some circumstances, such an inspection might constitute a professional obligation. . . . The State generally will have thoroughly investigated a crime scene, securing evidence and taking photographs. Familiarity with a crime scene may be essential for an effective direct or cross-examination of a witness – and even for presenting exculpatory evidence.”; “[The] court issued the inspection order only after carefully weighing the juvenile’s fair-trial rights and [complainant] N.A.’s privacy interests and imposing reasonable time and manner restrictions.”).

It is also helpful in many cases for counsel to participate in a re-enactment of pertinent events, such as a search-and-seizure episode in which the client claims that the police barged through an apartment doorway without knocking, whereas the police will expectably claim that they knocked and saw illicit activities inside when the door was opened. By playing the role of a police officer in this situation, counsel can become dramatically aware of physical restrictions on the witness’s field of vision that may break the officer’s testimony wide open on a motion to suppress. Of course, counsel should be sure that the scene has not undergone changes between the time of the critical events and that of counsel’s visit. And re-enactments should not be undertaken, if avoidable, in places where the public or the police can watch the replay.

Part B. Locating and Interviewing Defense Witnesses

§ 8.06 THE NEED TO INTERVIEW ANY WITNESSES WHOM THE RESPONDENT WISHES TO CALL

As explained in § 8.02 supra, counsel will ordinarily determine the order and scope of the defense investigation, and which witness interviews have priority, in accordance with counsel’s theory of the case. The one exception to this rule is that counsel must talk with any witnesses whom the client requests be interviewed, however tangential they may appear to counsel. Notwithstanding counsel’s belief that these witnesses are unimportant, counsel may be wrong. Moreover, every client is entitled to the small comfort, at least, that his or her lawyer does not disbelieve the client without fair inquiry. Cf. Moore v. Secretary Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 640 Fed. Appx. 159, 163 (3d Cir. 2016) (“counsel is deficient where . . . they did not fully investigate a witness that they knew may be exculpatory”). Finally, failure to look for witnesses named by the client is, perhaps, the most frequent ground of post-conviction attacks against the competence of trial counsel. See, e.g., Cannedy v. Adams, 706 F.3d 1148, 1159-62 (9th Cir. 2013). See also Mosley v. Butler, 762 F.3d 579, 587-88 (7th Cir. 2014). Accordingly, counsel should make efforts to find the witnesses and, if the witnesses cannot be located, inform the client of that fact and also make notes of counsel’s efforts to find them and of the conversation with the client. If counsel succeeds in finding the witnesses but decides, after talking with them, that they have nothing useful to say or are unconvincing, counsel should discuss these matters with the client and make a file note both of the reasons for counsel’s conclusions and of the discussion of them with the client. See §§ 2.03, 5.04(e) supra.

§ 8.07 LOCATING WITNESSES

Primary sources for identifying and locating witnesses include the respondent, his or her family and friends (and their phones and handhelds), the police, the prosecutor, news media and their reporters, social media, and various websites. If these provide inadequate leads, counsel must resort to visiting the scene as quickly as possible and contacting any person who might be connected with the incident to inquire who knows or saw anything relevant. This aspect of defense investigation is time-consuming and often frustrating. Its importance, however, cannot be emphasized enough.

Counsel should always ask any person interviewed whether other witnesses were present and then get the fullest possible description of them. When identification is by name, the spelling of the name and its phonetic spelling should be taken, if possible. The more kinds of contact information counsel can obtain for each witness – street addresses, phone numbers, e-mail and e-text addresses, website and social media logos – the better. Counsel should ask whether the witness has any aliases or nicknames; where the witness lives or lived; where s/he works or worked; whether s/he is on public assistance and, if so, where s/he collects checks, food stamps, or any other regular source of income; whether s/he belongs to a union or frequents a hiring hall and, if so, which one; where s/he “hangs out” and with whom; whether s/he has a girlfriend or boyfriend, and where that person lives; whether the witness plays the numbers or gambles in some other manner and where; whether s/he has ever been in prison, been arrested, or been in the military.

In trying to locate a witness when only the witness’s name is known, checks should be made of on-line resources, electric and gas companies, voting registrations, tax assessment records, traffic courts, the Department of Motor Vehicles, credit card companies, credit-rating bureaus, hospital and department store billing records, probation and parole departments, the Veteran’s Administration, the Department of Public Welfare, and the Social Security Office. If the neighborhood is known as well, counsel should also check local social work agencies, settlement houses, churches, finance companies, debt-collection agencies, employment agencies, labor union offices and hiring halls, political ward leaders, liquor stores, bars, and the precinct station.

If the crime took place in a public area (on the street or in the lobby or the hallway of a building), it is often productive to go door-to-door to every store front, house, and apartment or room that abuts or overlooks the scene of the crime. This canvassing technique will usually produce witnesses who were in a position to see the crime or events immediately preceding or following it. Counsel also should check whether any CCTV or other electronic surveillance equipment covers the location. If so, counsel should take steps to examine the recordings as soon as possible and, if they look helpful, to obtain copies. Here again, time is of the essence: Many surveillance devices do not retain recordings for more than 24 or 48 hours.

If the scene of the investigation will be a low-income or working class neighborhood, counsel and/or the investigator should dress in casual clothes. Dressing in a suit will make the attorney or investigator look like a plain-clothes police detective or probation officer, thereby ensuring that no one on the street will talk to him or her. It is often very effective to have the respondent or one of his or her adult relatives or friends accompany counsel or the investigator to demonstrate that counsel or the investigator has benign intentions and to introduce counsel or the investigator to contacts on the street.

§ 8.08 KEEPING TRACK OF WITNESSES

Having located and interviewed the defense witnesses, counsel should be sure to gather the information necessary to keep track of the witnesses in the event that they change their address and/or telephone number prior to the trial date. Although counsel may decide provisionally that particular individuals will not be called as witnesses (because their information is not helpful or because their appearances, backgrounds, or uncertainty of recollection leaves them too susceptible to discrediting cross-examination), it is rare that counsel can predict all the future contingencies that may make it necessary to call any individual as a witness after all. It is wise therefore to keep tabs on every witness interviewed who knows anything about the case.

In interviewing the witness, counsel should ask for not only (a) the witness’s current contact information – street address, land and cell phone numbers, e-mail and e-text addresses, website and social media logos, place of employment – but also (b) any plans the witness may have to move, and when and where, and (c) in any event, the full range of contact information for other persons through whom s/he can be reached when needed. The rapport-building preliminary conversation described in § 8.09 infra lends itself naturally to a discussion of the witness’s interests, hobbies, work and leisure activities; if counsel makes notes of these, it may be possible to use the information to track the witness down in the event that s/he changes his or her address and phone number.

§ 8.09 INTERVIEWING DEFENSE WITNESSES

Counsel (or the defense investigator) should ordinarily begin any interview of a witness by identifying himself or herself as the attorney (or attorney’s investigator) for the respondent. Counsel (or the investigator) should show the witness some form of identification. Then it is usually advisable to engage the witness briefly in some topic of casual conversation to put the witness at ease and establish rapport. The choice of topic will depend upon the witness and upon counsel’s (or the investigator’s) own style. If the respondent is detained, and the witness is a relative or friend of the respondent’s, the witness will usually be eager to hear about the respondent’s health and emotional state, and this topic can serve as an effective ice-breaker. If the witness is a stranger to the respondent, counsel will need to come up with some topic that the witness and counsel have in common: photographs, trophies, and posters on the witness’s wall may suggest hobbies or interests about which counsel can speak knowledgeably. Of course, if counsel is ignorant of the subject matter or if such casual conversation is not consistent with counsel’s personal style, s/he should skip these rapport-building devices. Visibly artificial attempts at striking up a conversation are often worse than jumping immediately into the business at hand.

Frequently, counsel will need to overcome a witness’s reluctance to talk. The witness may be unwilling to “get involved” because s/he is queasy about what s/he will have to do as a witness or because s/he is worried about the degree of inconvenience it will entail. Counsel will need to overcome this reticence by an effective pitch of some sort. One argument that sometimes works is to stress the importance of the witness’s giving information, since s/he is the only one who has it and the client’s liberty is at stake. Counsel can also say that the right thing for the witness to do as [a member of respondent’s family] [a friend of the respondent] [a neighbor of the respondent] [a citizen] [or whatever], is to step up and tell counsel whatever s/he knows; and that if the witness were, unfortunately, placed in the predicament of counsel’s client, s/he would expect others to come forward. If all else fails and counsel believes the witness has important information, counsel can subpoena the witness and hope that the witness will talk to counsel.
prior to trial. However, this should not be done – except in an otherwise altogether hopeless case – if the prosecutor is probably unaware of the witness and if there is a substantial chance that the witness’s story will be damning.

The basic three-stage interviewing process sketched in § 5.06 supra is usually effective in taking a witness’s story. In addition, counsel should ask every witness whether the witness has discussed the case with anyone else, with whom, and what was said. Particular care should be taken to have the witness describe in detail what s/he has told the police and any prosecution agents to whom s/he has spoken, what they said, and what specific questions they asked. The line of questioning pursued by these investigators often gives counsel valuable insights into the opposition’s theory of the case, as well as leads to areas and sources of information that the defense would not otherwise hit upon.

Just as counsel must cross-examine his or her client, when interviewing the client, so s/he must cross-examine other witnesses. This has several purposes: to dig out the truth – and in detail – as an aid to counsel’s further investigation; to evaluate the witness’s potential contribution to the defense if called to testify at a trial; and to educate and prepare the witness for cross-examination by the prosecutor. The latter two purposes can generally be served at a subsequent interview; therefore, unless the first purpose is compelling, counsel may be advised to forego too t Vigorous cross-examination in an initial witness interview. Counsel stands to gain considerably by being in the witness’s good graces, and it makes no sense to anger the witness unnecessarily by pressing the witness hard before favorable relations are established. If a witness finds it an uncomfortable or unpleasant experience to be interviewed by counsel, the witness will not be readily available for subsequent interviewing and may even shade his or her story so as to discourage counsel from calling him or her at trial. The approach to cross-examining one’s client suggested in § 5.12 supra – describing the questioning as a role play or dry run of the cross-examination that the prosecutor might conduct at a trial – is also a useful device for asking other potential defense witnesses the probing questions that are necessary to test the durability of their stories without implying that counsel personally has any doubts about their truthfulness.

If cross-questioning shakes a witness (or may leave the witness feeling shaken) but conclude that the witness’s story is nevertheless sufficiently solid to be potentially useful to the defense, counsel should follow up with some supportive questioning that will assist the witness to regain a warranted measure of confidence and should end by reassuring the witness that the witness is doing just fine. Counsel should never let a witness leave an interview feeling that his or her story has been demolished or disbelieved unless, in fact, counsel is convinced that the story is a fabrication. Minor inconsistencies and errors that counsel realizes are unimportant because they are perfectly natural and will not seriously impair the witness’s credibility may nevertheless cause a legally unsophisticated witness to experience painful self-doubts. Unless those doubts are assuaged by some comfort from counsel at the end of the interview, the witness is likely to dwell on them following the interview, and the witness’s story is likely to become weaker, more hesitant, and more heavily qualified than it needs to be or should be.
§ 8.10 REFRINGING FROM TAKING WRITTEN STATEMENTS OF DEFENSE WITNESSES OR TAKING VERBATIM INTERVIEW NOTES IN JURISDICIONS WHERE THEY ARE DISCOVERABLE BY THE PROSECUTION

In some jurisdictions, the prosecution can obtain court-ordered discovery of written statements that defense counsel or a defense investigator obtains from defense witnesses and (less frequently) even the attorney’s or investigator’s notes of oral statements taken from defense witnesses. See §§ 9.11, 27.12(b), 33.03 infra. The statements and notes can be used by the prosecutor both to impeach the witnesses’ testimony at trial and more generally to guide prosecution investigation aimed at refuting the defense case. Accordingly, defense attorneys in these jurisdictions should ordinarily refrain (and instruct investigators to refrain) from taking written statements of defense witnesses or taking notes during the interview of a defense witness.

Section 9.13 infra suggests that the information given by the witness can usually be preserved (to assist counsel to remember it and possibly for the purpose of refreshing the witness’s recollection later), with minimum risk of prosecutorial discovery, by recording the information in a “strategy memorandum.” Particularly if this is done by counsel rather than by counsel’s investigator, the contents of the memo are likely to be insulated from discovery as “attorney work product.” Whenever counsel conducts an interview personally, s/he should record the information in such a strategy memorandum, interweaving legal theories and strategic considerations with the information obtained from the witness. If a defense investigator conducts the interview, s/he should be instructed to report the content of the interview orally to counsel so that counsel can record the information in a strategy memorandum. The concluding paragraph of § 5.05 supra suggests a technique for writing the memo so that counsel can later identify the passages in it that are verbatim transcriptions of the witness’s own words – the passages that are simultaneously most useful for defense trial preparation and most susceptible to prosecutorial discovery – but a judge examining the memo on the prosecutor’s motion will probably not be able to segregate and disclose those passages.

Part C. Interviewing and Taking Statements from Adverse Witnesses

§ 8.11 THE UNIQUE ASPECTS OF INTERVIEWING ADVERSE WITNESSES

Many of the investigative techniques that have been described in connection with defense witnesses will also prove effective in dealing with adverse witnesses. The methods described in § 8.07 supra for tracking down witnesses, in § 8.08 for keeping tabs on witnesses, and in § 8.09 for interviewing witnesses will ordinarily be useful, whether the interviewee is a potential defense witness or a potential prosecution witness.

The primary difference in dealing with potential prosecution witnesses is that counsel will usually want to take a written or recorded statement from all such witnesses, or, if the witness refuses to write out or to record a statement, counsel will want to take verbatim notes of what the witness says. Techniques for taking these statements and notes are described in §§ 8.12.
(Unlike defense-friendly witnesses, potential prosecution witnesses are not likely to be willing to write out a statement in longhand.) There are additional considerations when the adverse witness is a police officer (see § 8.14 infra) or a co-respondent or purported co-perpetrator (see § 8.15 infra). Finally, there are special steps that counsel will need to take and possibly motions to file when an adverse witness reports that s/he has been instructed by police or prosecutors to refuse to talk with the defense. See § 8.13 infra.

§ 8.12 TAKING STATEMENTS FROM ADVERSE WITNESSES

§ 8.12(a) The Reasons for Taking Statements

In interviewing prosecution witnesses, the defense has two central goals: (i) to learn facts about the prosecution’s case that will enable counsel to pinpoint weaknesses and develop rebuttal evidence; and (ii) to elicit statements from the witness, at a time when s/he probably has not yet been coached by the prosecutor (or at least has not been extensively coached), which can be used to impeach the witness at trial.

The best way of nailing down the witness’s statements for use as impeachment material is to record what s/he says in a written document signed by the witness. S/he will have a hard time credibly disowning the making or the details of statements s/he has signed, and an even harder time if s/he has handwritten the statements. Local practice may prescribe a form that gives written statements the effect of sworn affidavits (see, e.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1746); counsel should have this form in an electronic file for instant retrieval when interviewing adverse witnesses, so that it can be inserted into the witnesses’ statements without fanfare or delay which may cause a witness to think twice about signing anything.

Section § 8.10 supra advises counsel ordinarily not to take written statements from potential defense witnesses because they are susceptible to court-ordered discovery by the prosecution. Taking written statements from a prosecution witness usually presents no such risk because most jurisdictions’ pretrial discovery rules provide that the prosecutor can obtain statements only of those witnesses whom defense counsel intends to call to testify in the defense case-in-chief at trial. There are a few jurisdictions that extend the prosecution’s discovery rights to include statements taken by defense counsel from prosecution witnesses. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Durham, 446 Mass. 212, 843 N.E.2d 1035 (2006). But even in these jurisdictions, it is usually advisable for counsel to take written statements from adverse witnesses because the statement will seldom tell the prosecutor anything that s/he cannot learn directly from the witness, and the impeachment value of a statement made in writing is particularly high.

If counsel is not sure whether a particular individual will turn out to be a likely defense witness or a likely prosecution witness, the safest course of action is to interview the witness initially without taking notes. If it then appears that the witness’s story is more damaging than helpful to the defense, counsel can take a written statement.
§ 8.12(b) Arranging To Be Accompanied to Interviews of Adverse Witnesses

Whenever counsel conducts an interview of an adverse witness, counsel will want to bring along an observer (either counsel’s investigator or a law partner or some other employee). This “shotgun rider” serves two principal functions. First, s/he will be available to testify concerning what the adverse witness said, should occasion arise for the defense to impeach that witness with a prior inconsistent statement. Second, the “shotgun rider” can protect counsel against possible charges of berating, overbearing, or attempting to corrupt the witness.

§ 8.12(c) Techniques for Taking a Written Statement; Content of the Statement

The preliminary procedures for identifying oneself and attempting to build rapport, described in § 8.09 supra, should be used in interviewing potential prosecution witnesses. The identification of counsel (or counsel’s investigator) is essential to ward off a witness’s claiming at trial that the interviewer misrepresented himself or herself as working for the police or the prosecutor’s office. Establishing some degree of rapport – some human connection between interviewer and witness – is important, if at all possible, in order to break through the witness’s reluctance to talk with someone “from the other side” and the witness’s almost inevitable disinclination to sign a document proffered by a stranger.

Once counsel (or the investigator) has established as much rapport as seems likely on a first contact, s/he should go through the witness’s version of the facts once without taking a statement or even mentioning the possibility of a written statement. Having heard the story once through, counsel should then ask the witness to go through the story once more, and while s/he does so, counsel or the investigator should write up the witness’s account in narrative form in a multi-page statement. The three-round format for fact-interviewing, described in § 5.06 supra, lends itself nicely to the interviewing of an adverse witness. The first round, in which the witness tells the story in his or her own words, is conducted without anything being written down. The second round, in which counsel goes through the witness’s statement in detail, is the stage at which counsel (or the investigator) will simultaneously write down what the witness is saying. And, during the third round, as counsel asks the witness for additional details and clarification, counsel (or the investigator) can make corrections and additions to the written statement.

The statement should begin with a formal heading containing wording such as the following:

This is the statement of [name of witness], date of birth _________, given to [names of counsel or investigator and of any other individual who accompanies the interviewer], on [date and time of statement] at [location where the statement is given, such as “the living room of my apartment, 250 Main Street, apartment 4W”].

I have been told by [name of counsel or investigator] that [he or she] is working for the defense of respondent, [name of respondent], who has been charged with committing an offense on [date of offense] at [location of offense].

The body of the statement should be written in the first person singular, since it will be signed by the witness himself or herself. It should be written in the witness’s own vernacular: counsel (or the investigator) should faithfully record any grammatical errors or slang terms rather than damaging the statement’s accuracy by correcting the witness’s speech.

The statement should be written out in narrative form, in full sentences and paragraphs. Every other line should be skipped so that there is room for corrections by the witness. The pages of the statement should be consecutively numbered so that it will be impossible for the witness to claim later that counsel or the investigator added or deleted pages.

When counsel (or the investigator) has finished writing the statement, s/he should read the statement aloud to the witness, sitting next to him or her and allowing him or her to read along as counsel (or the investigator) reads aloud. The witness should be invited to make any additions, deletions, or corrections that s/he wishes, and every single alteration of this type should be initialed by the witness. As each page is completed, the witness should be asked to initial the bottom of the page.

When the entire statement has been read aloud, the witness should be asked whether s/he has anything to add or correct, and any such additions or corrections should be made. Then counsel (or the investigator) should write a concluding paragraph with wording such as the following:

I have read this [number of pages in the statement]-page statement and have had it read to me by [name of counsel or investigator]. I have also had the opportunity to make all of the additions, deletions, and corrections I desired. To the best of my knowledge, this statement is accurate, correct, and complete.

The witness then should be asked to sign the statement on the line immediately below the concluding paragraph and to record the date of the signature. Procedures for preserving and authenticating hard-copy witness statements are discussed in §§ 8.18 and 10.14(c) infra.

§ 8.12(d) Alternatives to a Signed Statement When the Witness Is Unwilling To Sign a Statement; Taking a Recorded Statement

As persuasive as defense counsel or the investigator may be, some witnesses will never consent to sign a statement. However, there are some alternatives to a signed statement that are almost as effective for impeaching a witness at trial who strays from the account s/he gave counsel or the investigator.

Even if the witness is unwilling to sign the statement, s/he may be willing to initial each of the pages of the statement as well as all of the corrections. This initialing is, for counsel’s purpose, tantamount to a signature, since it evidences the witness’s adoption of the statement. Alternatively, the witness who is unwilling to sign or initial anything may be willing to write out in longhand on the statement any corrections that s/he wishes to make to counsel’s (or the investigator’s) original written version. This too can later be said persuasively to manifest an implied adoption of the whole document as corrected. Counsel can sometimes trigger written corrections by omitting some insignificant details when s/he (or the investigator) first writes out the statement; then, when reading the statement to the witness, recalling those details orally and asking the witness to pen them in briefly.

If the witness is unwilling to sign, initial, or even hand-correct the statement, counsel nevertheless should review the statement with the witness in its entirety and elicit the witness’s oral ratification of its accuracy. If the witness is unwilling to orally ratify the statement, s/he should be asked to orally ratify counsel’s (or the investigator’s) notes. A casual-sounding question (like “Okay, so [what I’ve shown you here] or [what I’ve read to you] is what you remember, right?”), followed by an affirmative answer from the witness will suffice for impeachment purposes, allowing the defense investigator (or other shotgun rider) to testify that the witness orally ratified counsel’s written statement or notes. Cf. Goldberg v. United States, 425 U.S. 94, 105, 107-08 n.12, 110-11 & n.19 (1976).

Electronic recording of an adverse witness’s statement is an alternative to be considered. An audio recording is usually less effective for impeachment than a written statement taken as advised in § 8.12(c) because the imprecision of spoken language almost invariably produces a narrative that fails to commit the witness to the kind of specific, unambiguous admissions or assertions that can be nailed down in writing. When an adverse witness refuses to give counsel a written statement but is willing to make an audio recording, counsel should prepare the witness for the recording by going through the steps set out in the first two paragraphs of § 8.12(c). Until the witness’s statement has been rehearsed to counsel’s satisfaction in unrecorded form, it is unwise to make a record of it. An unrehearsed recording made by a witness of doubtful allegiance is a formula for disaster. Even after a satisfactory rehearsal, witnesses will often omit or blur important details, and counsel will have to follow up with pinpoint questions before ending the recording. Procedures for preserving the recording and authenticating it at a trial or hearing are discussed in §§ 8.18, 10.13 - 10.14 infra. Some jurisdictions have communications-security legislation that counsel will need to consult before opting for electronic recording of witness statements. See, e.g., McDonough v. Fernandez-Rundle, 862 F.3d 1314 (11th Cir. 2017).

§ 8.13 OVERCOMING PROSECUTION WITNESSES’ UNWILLINGNESS TO TALK WITH AN ADVERSARY; STEPS TO TAKE IF THE WITNESS SAYS THAT S/HE HAS BEEN ADVISED BY THE PROSECUTOR TO REFUSE TO TALK WITH THE DEFENSE

With some prosecution witnesses it will be necessary to overcome not only the natural reluctance to speak with a stranger (see § 8.09 supra) and whatever animosity the witness may be feeling toward counsel’s client, but also a notion that witnesses are forbidden to speak with “the other side.” Counsel will need to explain to these individuals that witnesses do not “belong” to one side or the other; that the witness has as much obligation as a citizen to talk to defense counsel as to the prosecution; and that if the witness does not do so, the trial will be unfair. Of course, an unsubpoenaed witness has no legal obligation to talk to either the prosecution or the defense (e.g., United States v. White, 454 F.2d 435, 438-39 (7th Cir. 1971)), and counsel must not suggest that s/he has. But the witness’s moral obligation to tell what s/he knows to the defense, as well as to the police or prosecutor, should be emphasized.

If a prospective prosecution witness continues to refuse to talk to counsel, counsel should ask whether the prosecutor (or a police officer) has told the witness not to talk to the defense. If the answer is yes or if counsel is not satisfied with the truth of a no answer, counsel should call the prosecutor and ask whether any instructions have been given to any witness. If they have, counsel should point out to the prosecutor that the courts have repeatedly held that such instructions violate an accused’s due process right to investigate the case. See, e.g., Gregory v. United States, 369 F.2d 185 (D.C. Cir. 1966); United States v. Munsey, 457 F. Supp. 1, 4-5 (E.D. Tenn. 1978); Kines v. Butterworth, 669 F.2d 6, 8-9 (1st Cir. 1981) (dictum), and cases cited; State v. Simmons, 57 Wis. 2d 285, 203 N.W.2d 887, 892-93 (1973) (dictum), and cases cited; see also Soo Park v. Thompson, 851 F.3d 910 (9th Cir. 2017); United States v. Gonzales, 164 F.3d 1285, 1292 (10th Cir. 1999); United States v. Carrigan, 804 F.2d 599, 603-04 (10th Cir. 1986); Johnston v. National Broadcasting Company, Inc., 356 F. Supp. 904 (E.D.N.Y. 1973); Coppolino v. Helpern, 266 F. Supp. 930 (S.D.N.Y. 1967); State v. Murtagh, 169 P.3d 602, 608, 610-13, 615, 617 (Alaska 2007); People v. Eanes, 43 A.D.2d 744, 350 N.Y.S.2d 718 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1973); State v. Hofstetter, 75 Wash. App. 390, 395-403, 878 P.2d 474, 478-82 (1994), and cases cited. See generally Brad Rubin & Betsy Hutchings, Blockading Witnesses: Ethical Pitfalls for Prosecutors, N.Y. Law J., Dec. 6, 2006, at 4, col. 4. Counsel should add that such instructions clearly violate canons of professional ethics. See AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, MODEL RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT, Rule 3.4(f) (2018) (except in certain designated special circumstances, “[a] lawyer shall not . . . request a person other than a client to refrain from voluntarily giving relevant information to another party”); AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, CANONS OF PROFESSIONAL ETHICS, Canon 39 (1937) (“[a] lawyer may properly interview any witness or prospective witness for the opposing side in any civil or criminal action without the consent of opposing counsel or party”); AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, Standard 3-3.4(h) (4th ed. 2015) (“The prosecutor should not discourage or obstruct communication between witnesses and the defense counsel, other than the government’s employees or agents if consistent with applicable ethical rules. The prosecutor should not advise any person, or cause any person to be advised, to decline to provide defense counsel with information which such person has a right to give. The prosecutor may, however, fairly and accurately advise witnesses as to the likely consequences of their providing information, but only if done in a manner that does not discourage communication.”). Cf. In re: Eric G. Zahnd, Mo., No. DHP-17-023, disciplinary panel decision, December 7, 2017, summarized in 86 U.S.L. Week, No. 23, p. 850 (finding that a prosecutor violated the rules of professional conduct by issuing a press release naming and castigating individuals who had submitted letters of support at the sentencing of a convicted child abuser: “The threat of a public shaming of a non-suspect, non-criminal citizen should not be a tool of the Prosecutor’s Office, used to force citizens to obey its will.”).

Counsel then should ask the prosecutor to call the witness immediately and tell him or her that s/he can talk to the defense. Counsel should request that the prosecutor’s phone conversation with the witness take place with defense counsel on the phone. If the prosecutor is resistant to this notion, counsel should explain that counsel’s inability to independently verify the prosecutor’s removal of the taint of the earlier instructions will necessitate counsel’s filing a motion for sanctions in order to safeguard the respondent’s constitutional right to unimpeded access to witnesses.

Unless the prosecutor gives complete satisfaction, counsel should file a motion with the court of record having jurisdiction of the case. Depending upon local practice, such a motion may be styled like ordinary motions or in the form of an Order to Show Cause. The motion should seek the following alternative forms of relief: (a) dismissal of the Petition on the ground that the prosecutor’s misconduct has so severely interfered with the preparation of the defense that there is no way either of knowing how much harm has been done or of setting it right at this stage; (b) a court-ordered deposition of each of the witnesses with whom the prosecutor or any police officer has discussed the case, so that counsel can ask the questions that s/he would have asked in an investigative interview if not for the prosecutor’s interference, see, e.g., United States v. Carrigan, 804 F.2d 599, 604 (10th Cir. 1986) (upholding a trial court’s order of a deposition: “[a]n order merely to cease . . . [prosecutorial] interference, after the fact, might be insufficient because the witnesses’ free choice might have been already perverted and the witnesses likely to refuse voluntary interviews”); or, at least (c) a hearing in which each of the witnesses who has spoken with the prosecutor or any police officer is brought before the court and instructed by the judge that s/he is free to speak to the defense. Cf. the procedure approved in United States v. Mirenda, 443 F.2d 1351, 1355 n.3, 1356 (9th Cir. 1971); and see United States v. Vole, 435 F.2d 774, 778 (7th Cir. 1970): “[w]itnesses are the special property of neither party and in the absence of compelling reasons, the . . . court should facilitate access to them before trial whenever it is requested.”

Of course, counsel may decide that the trouble and friction involved in this procedure are not justified by its likely yield or that at least this course of action should be delayed until counsel sees whether more ordinary discovery procedures (see Chapter 9) reveal what counsel wants.

§ 8.14 INTERVIEWING POLICE OFFICERS

Except in cases in which there are particular reasons to keep a low profile (for example, when counsel’s independent researches disclose that the police conducted a slipshod initial investigation and are doing no further investigating, so that counsel prefers to let sleeping dogs lie), counsel should always try to speak with the arresting officer and all officers who participated in the police investigation of the case. Often these attempts will prove fruitless, since many police officers are so distrustful of defense attorneys that they will refuse to talk. However, there are a variety of factors that might motivate a police officer to speak with a defense attorney in a particular case, including: a willingness to give juveniles in general a break or a liking for the particular respondent; qualms about whether the respondent really is guilty; a liking for defense counsel or a desire to match wits with a defense attorney; or a desire to “cut a deal” with the respondent under which the respondent will incriminate other suspects, testify against co-respondents or adult defendants charged in criminal court with the same or connected crimes, “cooperate” by becoming an informer, or “close” unsolved cases by admitting them.

If the officer refuses to speak with counsel, counsel should ask why. If the officer indicates that s/he has been instructed not to talk by the prosecutor or by a superior officer or that s/he is following a departmental policy, counsel should file the type of motion described in § 8.13 supra, challenging the prosecutor’s or police department’s interference with the respondent’s due process right to investigate the case. Even if the officer’s refusal to talk is not the product of prosecutorial or departmental interference and is merely an individual choice, counsel nevertheless may want to seek a judicial order compelling him or her to tell counsel what s/he knows, on the theory that police officers are not mere private witnesses but are state officials with criminal law enforcement duties and due process obligations, Curran v. Delaware, 259 F.2d 707 (3d Cir. 1958), and hence may no more instruct themselves than they may instruct one another to refuse information to the defense. Cf. Coppolino v. Helpern, 266 F. Supp. 930 (S.D.N.Y. 1967).

Even when counsel succeeds in getting a police officer to talk, it is unlikely that counsel will persuade the officer to sign a written statement or even to permit counsel to write out a statement. However, as long as counsel conducts the interview with an investigator or other employee of counsel’s present, that individual can serve as an impeachment witness if, at trial, the officer denies the information s/he related to counsel. See § 8.12(b) supra. Some officers may also be willing to ratify counsel’s notes orally if counsel reads them aloud and asks “have I got that right?” See § 8.12(d) supra.

If counsel succeeds in getting an officer to talk, it is usually advisable to see the officer again on other occasions and conduct as many follow-up conversations about the case as time permits. Inevitably, the officer will feel progressively more comfortable with counsel and will increasingly reveal information about the case. In addition, the more frequent the conversations between an officer and counsel, the more difficult it is for the officer to recall what s/he has said to counsel and the more cautious s/he will be at trial to refrain from embroidering the facts.

If an officer expresses a desire to “cut a deal” with the respondent, counsel should ordinarily deflect any discussions of the actual deal by explaining that counsel first needs to hear everything the officer can tell counsel about the case so that counsel can advise the client whether a deal would be worthwhile. Counsel should almost never make any actual agreements with the police. If the client is going to enter into an agreement, that agreement should be made with the prosecutor, since it is only the prosecutor who has the power to drop or reduce charges, and the police officers’ promises are not necessarily binding upon the prosecutor.
The one exception to this general rule is the situation in which the police are willing to bargain away charges that the prosecutor does not yet know about and the police are willing to include in the bargain a commitment to withhold all information about the charges from the prosecutor. If the officer can be trusted (a fact which counsel will need to verify by speaking with other members of the local defense bar who have dealt with the officer in the past), then it may well be wise to take the risk of making an agreement directly with the officer in order to prevent the prosecutor and the court from ever learning of the charge.

§ 8.15 INTERVIEWING CO-RESPONDENTS AND ADULT DEFENDANTS CHARGED WITH THE SAME OR CONNECTED CRIMES

It is essential that counsel speak to any juveniles who are jointly charged with the respondent as co-respondents, any juveniles who are charged separately (in juvenile or adult court) with the same or connected crimes, and any adult defendants charged in criminal court with the same or connected crimes. Although their version of the events may parallel and support the client’s, it is equally likely that any such co-respondents and defendants have turned state’s evidence, or may do so in the future, and will end up testifying for the prosecution against the client. In addition, even when co-respondents or adult defendants don’t turn state’s evidence, they may present a defense at trial that denies their own guilt by placing all of the blame on the respondent.

Before questioning co-respondents or adult defendants, counsel should ascertain whether they are represented by an attorney. If they are, a local rule or ethics opinion may require that counsel obtain consent from that attorney before interviewing his or her client. Even in jurisdictions that have no such rule, counsel should ordinarily follow this procedure as a matter of professional courtesy.

An interview with a co-respondent or adult defendant should cover everything s/he knows about the criminal episode and charges and should get a detailed account of everything s/he has said or given to the authorities. Counsel should ask whether s/he has been approached about possibly testifying for the prosecution, and, if so, what s/he has discussed with whom and when. Counsel should take a written statement from each co-respondent and adult defendant if s/he will give it. If not, counsel should attempt to get his or her oral confirmation of the accuracy of counsel’s write-up or notes of what the co-respondent or adult defendant has said. If s/he later testifies against the respondent, s/he can be impeached with a written statement or counsel’s memorialization of what s/he said orally. See § 31.10 infra. If s/he does not testify, and if counsel wishes to call him or her as a defense witness but is stymied by a claim of the Fifth Amendment privilege, a written or memorialized oral statement may be admissible as an admission against penal interest, provided that counsel has followed the procedures required by local rules or caselaw for taking a statement against penal interest. (These usually include the requirement that the witness know at the time of the statement that it is against his or her penal interest. Accordingly, counsel or the investigator may need to advise the witness of that fact just before finalizing the statement.)
Part D. Gathering Police Reports, Other Documents, and Physical Evidence That May Be Needed as Defense Exhibits at a Motions Hearing or at Trial

§ 8.16 THE NEED TO GATHER THE MATERIALS, AND THE TIMETABLE

Counsel’s prospects of prevailing at an evidentiary motions hearing or at trial will usually depend upon the thoroughness with which s/he has sought out and obtained police reports, other pertinent documents, electronically stored materials, and physical evidence relevant to the case. Police reports containing witnesses’ prior statements are often the only way of learning what the prosecution witnesses will say at trial (since many will refuse to talk to counsel), so as to plan an effective cross-examination. These police reports are also indispensable for impeachment purposes. Official documents such as hospital records, Weather Bureau records, and the medical examiner’s report in a homicide case are similarly invaluable in planning the defense theory of the case and in cross-examining prosecution witnesses whose stories are at odds with the official reports. Social media communications data – posts, comments, messages, bulletin boards, photos, logs and subscriber information stored by providers such as Facebook, Twitter, and Instagram – can provide crucial information: leads to locating witnesses; materials usable to refresh the recollections of the respondent and potential defense witnesses; materials usable for impeachment of complainants and alleged crime victims, co-respondents who may flip, and other possible prosecution witnesses; similar materials in the accounts of the respondent and potential defense witnesses that counsel needs to know about because they may be available to the prosecutor as substantive evidence or for impeachment. Counsel is advised to track down these materials early in the defense-investigative process: they provide a relatively easy and inexpensive means of information gathering; they can open avenues, guide directions, and establish priorities for follow-up investigation that involves more difficult and expensive methods; and they are susceptible to being deleted at any time at an originator’s instance. After they have been taken offline, they may still be reachable by defense subpoenas duces tecum directed to the social media service provider (see Facebook, Inc. v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. 5th 1245, 417 P.3d 725, 233 Cal. Rptr. 3d 77 (2018)), and counsel may want to seek such subpoenas as his or her investigation progresses. But getting hold of the social media communications data before they are deleted is a major trouble-saver. Conversely, if there are materials open for public viewing in the social-media accounts of the respondent, the respondent’s family, or potential defense witnesses, counsel wants to learn about them early. They may include unflattering items that can be used by the prosecution for impeachment or that may be seized upon by news reporters and go viral, poisoning the atmosphere and making it difficult for the respondent to get a fair trial. Counsel will want to consider whether matters of this sort should be promptly deleted. Deletion may be ill-advised when the prosecutor is one who, in a case of the present kind, can be expected to conduct a comprehensive background investigation of electronic resources: if s/he is assiduous enough to obtain the deleted posting, s/he can do even more with the fact of deletion – as an indication that the respondent or witness is attempting to conceal embarrassing information – than s/he could have done with the contents of the posting itself. But in the case of prosecutors whose research is less thorough-going, deletion can put potentially damaging appearances completely out of play.
Counsel will need to begin gathering the documents and other materials as quickly as possible. Certain real evidence such as objects dropped at the scene of the crime – or the layout of the crime scene as it was at the time of the crime – is highly perishable and will disappear if counsel does not retrieve it or photograph it quickly. Even less obviously perishable objects may be lost through delay: In some jurisdictions, recordings of police radio communications are routinely erased after a certain number of months and the tapes re-used by the police department; private CCTV recordings tend to be destroyed by recycling much sooner, often after only after 24 or 48 hours. Finally, many documents (like police reports, hospital records, school reports, and even court transcripts) may take weeks to acquire; the acquisition process must be started early so that it can be completed in time for trial.

§ 8.17 METHODS FOR GATHERING THE MATERIALS

Some of the materials that counsel will wish to gather are public documents, available for the asking. For example, in many jurisdictions, the initial police report (usually called a “complaint report” or “incident report”) is a public document that can be obtained by simply going to the police station in the precinct in which the crime occurred and paying a nominal fee for the photocopying of the document.

Most of the documents and exhibits that counsel will wish to gather, however, will need to be subpoenaed. The constitutional and statutory law governing subpoena practice are described in §§ 10.04-10.05 infra; the procedures for obtaining subpoenas, in § 10.04 infra; and the procedures for serving and enforcing them, in §§ 10.06-10.07 infra.

Subpoenas for documents, called subpoenas ducès tecum, are addressed to the custodian of records of whatever agency or entity is in possession of the documents, directing the custodian to appear in court with the original documents on the date of the motions hearing or trial. These subpoenas are ordinarily required to specify with considerable particularity the documents or records sought. In theory the subpoenas ducès tecum are not to be employed for discovery but only to procure evidentiary matter for use at trial. As a practical matter, however, counsel can often persuade the custodian to permit counsel to inspect the subpoenaed document prior to the beginning of the court proceedings, or counsel may persuade the judge to order the custodian to show counsel the document before court, during preliminary proceedings, or during a recess, in the interest of saving time at trial.

Physical objects and artifacts (including recordings) that are in the possession of law enforcement agencies or officers, government officials, or third parties can also be reached by subpoenas ducès tecum. If counsel wishes to inspect them or to have them tested by defense experts before trial, a motion for production and inspection should be made. See § 9.07(c) infra.

§ 8.18 PRESERVING REAL EVIDENCE

When counsel obtains a physical object that has evidentiary value in the case, counsel will need to take certain steps to preserve it in its original form and to guard against allegations at trial that the object has been altered.

The object should be retained in the custody of some credible person (an investigator or counsel’s administrative assistant will do) under lock and key. The custodian should bag the object and tag it with the name and number of the case to which it relates, and the date and time when the custodian received it and locked it down. S/he can then be called at trial to identify it and to testify that there has been no change in its condition since the time it was first received. Defense lawyers who maintain a strict, routine procedure of this sort for handling evidence will usually find that their reputation for doing so – or a pretrial representation to the prosecutor of counsel’s proposed chain-of-custody testimony in the case at hand – will elicit a prosecution stipulation of authenticity and unchanged condition, rendering unnecessary any actual in-court appearance of defense chain-of-custody witnesses.

If the physical condition of any object is important and is subject to change, counsel should have the custodian inspect the object, photograph it, and make a written, signed description of its relevant characteristics at the time of its receipt. One copy of the photograph and of the description should be retained with the object, additional copies in counsel’s case file. At trial, counsel will either have to get an authenticity-and-unchanged-condition stipulation from the prosecutor or present witnesses who trace the chain of custody of the object between the time and place of its acquisition by counsel (or counsel’s investigator) and the time and place of its deposit in counsel’s locked evidence facility. These witnesses will have to identify the object in the courtroom as the one they handled; they will have to recount when, where, how, and from whom they received it, and when, where and how they subsequently deposited it in the secure facility or turned it over to the next person in the chain en route to the facility; and they will have to attest that the object was not altered while in their possession. For this reason, counsel should, if possible, have the object picked up in the first instance by counsel’s investigator or administrative assistant rather than by counsel personally, since it is undesirable – and, in some courts, forbidden – for counsel to testify. The fewer people who handle the object on its way to the secure facility, the better. In most cases, counsel will also have to present the same kind of chain-of-custody testimony covering the period between the object’s connection to relevant events (the crime scene, or whatever episode the object is offered to document) and the object’s acquisition by counsel. It is wise to have written, signed statements made by all witnesses who will be called to provide this testimony. These statements, too, should be duplicated, and copies kept both with the object in lock-down and in counsel’s file.

If counsel wishes to have tests made of the object or to show it to anyone, counsel should have the custodian deliver the object manually to the tester or person in question, and the custodian should then recover it manually when the test or inspection has been completed. The custodian should make notes of the date, time, place, and recipient of delivery and a similarly detailed record of the object’s return, all to be locked in with the object. This simplifies problems of proving the identity of the object and the lack of change in its condition at the time of trial. If the object is to be left with the tester or person, even briefly, s/he should be instructed (1) not to allow it out of his or her possession until it is recovered by the custodian; (2) to keep it in a secure place, under lock-down, whenever s/he is not actually working with it; and (3) that s/he will very likely be required to testify in court (a) that s/he complied with the preceding two instructions, and (b) that s/he did nothing to impair the object’s probative value while handling it. When an object is to be tested, counsel should also instruct the tester to bag-and-tag it or to make some mark on the object that, while not affecting its probative quality, will allow the tester to identify it at trial as the same object that s/he tested. The expert’s written report to counsel should describe the object and indicate what tag or mark the expert made.

§ 8.19 TYPES OF MATERIALS TO GATHER OR GENERATE

There are as many sources of information as there are different factual situations. Among the most useful to keep in mind are:

§ 8.19(a) Police Reports and Related Materials

§ 8.19(a)(1) Complaint Reports

The complaint report (sometimes called “event report” or “incident report”) is filled out by an investigating officer when the complainant first reports the crime. This document usually contains: identifying information about the complainant (name, address, phone number); a record of the time and location of the crime; the complainant’s description of the crime; the complainant’s or eyewitnesses’ descriptions of the perpetrator(s); and a list of any injuries suffered by the complainant. The complaint report is extremely useful at suppression hearings and at trial. The complainant’s account of the events can be used to impeach the complainant if s/he diverges from this account in his or her testimony. The description of the perpetrator’s appearance and attire is usually the only written record of the complainant’s and eyewitnesses’ descriptions prior to their observing the respondent in a show-up or lineup, and it can be used to impeach these witnesses if they subsequently mold their descriptions of the perpetrator to fit the respondent. Often the description of the injuries suffered by the complainant will contain the name of the hospital that treated those injuries, thereby identifying the hospital to which counsel should direct a subpoena for the complainant’s medical records. See § 8.19(c)(6) infra.

§ 8.19(a)(2) Arrest Reports

The arrest report is filled out by the officer who arrested (or assisted in the arrest of) the respondent. This document will identify the respondent by name and physical description (including supposed ethnicity and sometimes apparel) and may also contain some information about the respondent’s background (including supposed gang affiliation). The report will be useful in suppression hearings because it often lists: incriminating statements allegedly made by the respondent; property allegedly seized from the respondent; the precise time of arrest (which serves as a baseline for calculating the length of any interrogations before, during, and after the booking process); and the respondent’s height and weight at the time of arrest (useful if the respondent has grown by the time of the suppression hearing and the defense needs to show that the respondent’s height and build at the time of the offense did not match descriptions of the perpetrator). If arrest reports in the jurisdiction also contain a factual account of the offense, then counsel should obtain the arrest reports for all juvenile co-respondents and adult co-perpetrators who were arrested, since the accounts in those reports will often be inconsistent with the accounts in the respondent’s arrest report, and such inconsistencies can be used to impeach the witnesses who gave the accounts to the officers, the officers who prepared the reports, or both.

§ 8.19(a)(3) Recordings of 911 Telephone Calls and Police Radio Communications

If a crime is reported by an emergency phone call to the police (usually called a “911 call”), many police departments record and temporarily store the recording of the telephone conversation between the caller and the police operator. Similarly, if the investigating officers engage in radio communications with the police dispatcher or with each other during the investigation of a case, many jurisdictions record and store recordings of the transmissions. These various recordings can be crucial, since they may contain descriptions of the perpetrator given by the complainant prior to viewing the respondent in a show-up or lineup, or they may demonstrate a sequence of events at odds with the complainant’s or police officers’ versions of the crime or the police investigation, or both. In many jurisdictions these recordings are routinely erased after a designated period of time (in some jurisdictions, three months) and the tapes reused; accordingly, defense counsel must subpoena them immediately after starting work on the case. Cf. Freeman v. State, 121 So. 3d 888, 895-97 (Miss. 2013).

§ 8.19(a)(4) Arrest Photographs

When arrest photographs were taken, these will often be relevant and should be subpoenaed. When length of hair or facial hair is relevant to the description of the perpetrator, a mug shot will often be the best available evidence of the respondent’s appearance at the time of the offense. In some jurisdictions the police take full-color photographs; if the respondent was arrested shortly after the offense, these will show the clothing s/he was wearing and can be used at a suppression hearing (to demonstrate inconsistencies with the complainant’s description of the perpetrator – and thereby that the police lacked probable cause to arrest – or that the identification procedures were unreliable) and at trial (to argue that discrepancies between the appearance of the perpetrator and the appearance of the respondent on the day of the offense raise a reasonable doubt).

§ 8.19(a)(5) Eyewitness Identification Reports

In some jurisdictions the police prepare special forms whenever an identification procedure is employed, to record the result of the procedure and the precise words used by the eyewitness in identifying (or failing to identify) the respondent. These forms are obviously important in connection with any identification suppression claim and also can be used to impeach the witness at trial if s/he claims a greater degree of certainty or a different basis for recognizing the respondent than is reflected in the witness’s words at the time of the pretrial identification.

§ 8.19(a)(6) Forms and Reports for Confessions

If the respondent gave a written statement, it will often be handwritten onto a police form which contains not only the content of the statement but the date and time when it was completed and signed by the respondent, and sometimes also the date and time of the beginning of the interrogation session that produced the statement. The form may also indicate the names and badge numbers of the officers who took the statement. This form – or whatever paper or electronic document the police use to record the statement if not a standard form – is ordinarily invaluable in providing information that counsel needs in order to calculate the duration and circumstances of interrogation as the basis for a suppression motion (see Chapters 22 and 24 infra) or for arguing at trial that the statement was made under conditions that render it unreliable. However, counsel should be aware that the times noted on a respondent’s written statement may not be accurate: unscrupulous police officers may juggle them to improve the prosecution case. Some police departments video-record respondents’ statements and all or part of the preceding interrogation. See § 24.18 infra. Counsel must obtain these recordings by subpoena or discovery; but, once again, s/he will want to be alert to the possibility that the police have been self-servingly selective in recording only portions of their interchanges with the respondent, or that they have doctored the recording ex post. If a respondent’s incriminating statement was oral and was never put into writing, there will often be notes about its making and contents in the arrest report or in supplementary investigation reports.

§ 8.19(a)(7) Additional Police Reports That Must Be Filled Out When the Crime Is of a Certain Type

Depending upon the nature of the case, any one or more of the following reports may also exist. These reports frequently contain a factual narrative of the crime that will prove useful at a suppression hearing or trial.

1. In drug possession or sale cases there will frequently be a “buy report” describing the transaction in detail if it was conducted by an undercover officer. There will always be a chemist’s report documenting the nature and weight of the drug and possibly containing a police officer’s description of the circumstances under which the drug came into the officer’s possession.

2. In cases in which the police recover a firearm, there will usually be a weapons report describing the gun and its serial number and also describing any slugs and shell casings that were recovered. There will also usually be a ballistics report describing the results of a test-firing of the gun, reporting whether the gun is operable, and possibly also reporting the results of any tests to match the gun with expended bullets recovered in connection with this case or other cases.

3. In cases in which scientific evidence of the perpetrator’s identity was recovered from the scene of the crime or the putative crime weapon – fingerprints, footprints, body fluids, hairs, clothing or fabric fragments, and so forth – there will usually be (a) reports by evidence technicians describing their collection of the evidence and (b) reports by the relevant police or lab experts describing the degree to which the recovered materials match the respondent’s prints, secretions, hair, clothing, or whatever.

4. In cases of sex offenses there will usually be (a) reports of a physical examination of the complainant, describing physiological indications of forcible intercourse and noting the blood type and/or DNA of any foreign body fluids found on the complainant or the complainant’s clothes, or at the scene of the offense, and (b) serology or DNA reports detailing test procedures used to identify the individual who is the source of these body fluids.

5. If the crime involved a shooting and the respondent is arrested shortly after the commission of the crime, there may be a report of an examination of the respondent’s body or clothing to determine whether s/he recently fired a gun (a “gunshot residue” or “GSR” test).

6. If a complainant was injured, some jurisdictions require that the police fill out a specialized report describing the nature and extent of the injury and of any treatment administered before the complainant was turned over to hospital or other medical personnel.

7. In homicide cases there will usually be an autopsy report available from the medical examiner’s or coroner’s office.

§ 8.19(a)(8) Property Reports

These are of two kinds: (a) In many jurisdictions the investigating officers are required to fill out property reports whenever any tangible evidence is recovered from the suspect or from the scene of a crime. If the crime was a serious felony, some police departments dispatch a special “crime scene squad” which will produce its own reports on property recovered from the scene. (b) Whenever a respondent is incarcerated, personal property in his or her possession that is not viewed by the police as having evidentiary value is vouchered and stored in the lockup. Listed items on the voucher may have relevance for defense purposes overlooked by the officers.

§ 8.19(a)(9) Police Photographs and Diagrams

The police may have photographs and diagrams of the crime scene and possibly also a police artist’s sketch or composite of the suspect. These materials are usually available to the defense only through the discovery procedures described in Chapter 9.

§ 8.19(a)(10) Police Regulations and Policy Statements

In many localities the police department has regulations or policy statements governing procedures for making arrests and Terry stops, conducting on-the-street pat-downs, taking confessions, and conducting identification viewings. Copies of these regulations and policy statements should be obtained, either informally from the police department or via subpoena. An officer’s violation of his or her own department’s internal regulations can be a weighty factor in a judge’s determination of the validity of the police actions that produced evidence against counsel’s client.

§ 8.19(a)(11) Reports and Other Materials Generated by the Booking Process

Various reports and materials are generated during the booking process described in §§ 3.04 and 3.08. Those most often useful at a suppression hearing or at trial include:

1. The arrest photographs of the respondent described in § 8.19(a)(4) supra;

2. Notations on the police blotter indicating the time when the respondent was received at the police station (often useful at a hearing on a motion to suppress incriminating statements, as a means for establishing the length of interrogation);

3. Notations in the property book at the precinct station showing

   (A) property that was seized from the respondent as evidence and

   (B) other personal property that was in the respondent’s possession at the time of arrest;

4. Reports by the juvenile division of the police department regarding their processing and possibly also interrogation of the respondent; and

5. Reports by the detention facility at which the respondent was placed pending Initial Hearing, regarding staff processing and possibly also interrogation of the respondent.

§ 8.19(a)(12) Supplemental Investigation Reports

In addition to the complaint report and the arrest report, one or more supplemental investigation reports may be written up by the detectives or other officers who are interviewing potential witnesses, conducting searches for physical evidence, and/or seeking various sorts of incriminating information. In heavy felony cases, a series of supplementary reports (sometimes called “evidence supplements”) will often track the progressive stages of an extended evidence-gathering process.

230

§ 8.19(b) Transcripts and Other Court Documents

§ 8.19(b)(1) Transcripts

As suggested in § 4.31(d), (e) supra, if a probable-cause hearing was held in the case, counsel should obtain a copy of the transcript. Frequently, that transcript will prove useful in impeaching the police officers and other witnesses who testified.

If a separate probable-cause hearing was held for a juvenile co-respondent or if a preliminary hearing was held in the case of an adult co-perpetrator, transcripts of those hearings should also be obtained.

§ 8.19(b)(2) Search Warrants and Arrest Warrants

If a search was conducted by the police pursuant to a search warrant or if the respondent was arrested pursuant to an arrest warrant, counsel should obtain the warrant and any affidavits the police filed in order to obtain the warrant(s). These items will usually be turned over by the prosecutor in informal discovery, see Chapter 9. Alternatively, counsel can obtain them from the office of the clerk of the court that issued the warrant. In addition to their obvious utility in litigating suppression motions, they ordinarily contain informational details that can be used at trial to undermine the prosecution’s latter-day version of the criminal episode or the prosecution’s retrospectively embroidered testimony identifying the respondent as a perpetrator.

§ 8.19(b)(3) Gerstein Proffers

In some jurisdictions there is a practice of placing a written “Gerstein proffer” (see § 4.28(a) supra) in the court files of detained adult defendants and juvenile respondents, showing probable cause to believe that the individual committed the crime charged. Such documents, usually prepared by the police officers on the case, will be useful in impeaching those officers and possibly also the civilian witnesses who provided the facts that the officers incorporated in the Gerstein proffer.

§ 8.19(b)(4) Psychological Evaluations

Particularly in cases in which counsel is seeking to show that the respondent was mentally, educationally, or emotionally impaired in ways that adversely affected his or her capacity to make a valid waiver of Miranda rights, confess voluntarily, give competent consent to a search, or form the mens rea of a particular crime, counsel will need a relatively contemporaneous psychological evaluation of the respondent. Counsel may be able to save the time and expense of obtaining a new evaluation if the respondent has been the subject of prior delinquency, PINS, or neglect proceedings. Frequently, the court files, probation files, or other agency files for those proceedings will contain a psychological evaluation of the respondent that is sufficiently recent to serve counsel’s purposes.

§ 8.19(c) Other Exhibits and Materials To Gather

§ 8.19(c)(1) Photographs

Although police photographs of the crime scene are often available through discovery, see Chapter 9, these will seldom be adequate to fulfill all defense needs, and counsel will have to commission the taking of additional photographs. Defense photographs should be taken from several angles and at several distances, so that all spatial relations involved are fully depicted. Counsel should remember that photographs are not admissible until a foundation has been laid by a person who testifies that they are an accurate reproduction of the scene that s/he observed. A photographer should therefore be selected who will be available at the time of the trial and who will make a good and personable witness. S/he should be informed that s/he will be asked at trial, as a basis for testifying that the photographs are accurate, whether s/he has a present recollection of the scene that s/he photographed. Counsel should ordinarily obtain:

1. Photographs of the scene of the crime (to show matters that are not apparent in the police photographs, such as the absence of street lights, in support of a contention that the scene was too dark for the complainant and eyewitnesses to get a good look at the perpetrator; or the presence of CCTV cameras in cases where the police appear to be claiming that no electronic surveillance records exist).

2. In cases involving motions to suppress tangible evidence, photographs of the scene of a challenged arrest or Terry stop (to help illustrate the precise course of events) or of the scene of a challenged search (to show, for example, that items which the police will testify were in “plain view” could not in fact have been seen from the officers’ vantage point).

3. In cases involving a motion to suppress identification testimony or a misidentification defense at trial, photographs of the scene of a show-up identification (to illustrate, for example, how far the witness actually stood from the respondent during the show-up, or the dim lighting in the location where the show-up took place at the relevant time of day).

4. In cases in which the respondent was injured, and that injury is relevant to the theory of the defense (for example, as evidence of physical abuse by the police in a hearing on a motion to suppress a confession or as evidence of an assault by the complainant in a self-defense case), photographs of the respondent’s injuries. These should be taken as quickly as possible before the bruises fade or the injuries heal.

5. In cases in which the respondent’s facial appearance, hair length, height, or build at the time of the incident will be relevant to an identification suppression motion, motion to suppress tangible evidence (to show lack of probable cause to arrest), or misidentification defense at trial, photographs of the respondent. These should be taken as soon as possible after counsel enters the case because the physiognomy of a juvenile can change markedly within a relatively short period of time, and, if it does not, the prosecution will doubtless argue that it did. When taking photographs for the purpose of depicting the respondent’s height, the respondent should be photographed next to a measuring stick or next to an adult who is the same size, is a personable witness, and can testify to his or her exact height at the suppression hearing or trial.

§ 8.19(c)(2) Diagrams and Maps

Diagrams of the scene of the crime, the scene of the arrest, or the scene of a search will frequently prove useful in suppression hearings and at trial. In jurisdictions that have or can arrange the technology in the courtroom for projecting computerized images onto a screen for the factfinder, such diagrams can be prepared in digital form. Otherwise, diagrams can be displayed on poster board or on large sheets of graph paper. Diagrams and maps should be drawn to scale whenever possible. In some cities it may be possible to obtain a large area map from the city planner’s office. Street maps available online will suffice only if the characteristics of an area covering several square blocks is in issue and if precise measurements are unimportant. When a crime site is indoors and precise measurements are important, the architect’s plans for the building may be available from the office of the building owner, construction company, or a government agency responsible for approving construction plans or conducting periodic inspections.

§ 8.19(c)(3) Records of Lighting and Weather Conditions

In hearings on identification suppression motions and in presenting a defense of misidentification at trial, it will frequently be important to show that an eyewitness’s or complainant’s ability to observe was limited because of poor lighting or weather conditions. Records showing weather conditions and the time of sunrise and sunset can usually be obtained from the United States Weather Bureau.

§ 8.19(c)(4) School Records of the Respondent

Whenever a juvenile case involves a confession, the respondent’s school records should be obtained as quickly as possible. Frequently, these records will demonstrate the existence of a learning disability, a language problem, or reading or comprehension deficits that will strongly support a claim that the respondent lacked ability to understand and competently waive Miranda rights. If the records suggest significant impairment, counsel should interview the respondent’s school teachers (and, if possible, the teacher or psychologist who prepared the records) to determine whether these witnesses will suffice to substantiate the defense claim. If not, then counsel should consider the possibility of hiring a psychologist to examine the respondent for the specific purpose of determining his or her ability to understand and competently waive Miranda rights. See § 24.10(b) infra.

§ 8.19(c)(5)  Medical Records of the Respondent

If a motion to suppress a respondent’s incriminating statements involves a claim that the respondent was physically abused by the police, or that the respondent was ill or suffering some physical injury at the time of the statement, it will be essential to obtain hospital and other medical records pertaining to any examination or treatment that the respondent received more or less contemporaneously with the statement. Similarly, in assault prosecutions in which counsel is considering a self-defense theory, hospital and medical records bearing on any injuries the respondent received at the time of the episode underlying the charge are invaluable.

§ 8.19(c)(6)  Medical Records of the Complainant

If one of the offenses charged is an assault or battery count that depends upon the prosecution’s proving a certain kind or degree of injury, the medical records of the complainant will provide crucial information. Even when the nature of the complainant’s injuries is not technically an element of the charge, his or her medical records may be useful to show that s/he is exaggerating the harm or the suffering s/he claims to have experienced, and counsel can then argue that the rest of the complainant’s testimony is no more credible than his or her inflated account of injuries. Also, medical records frequently record the complainant’s version of how s/he was injured, and this account may be useful in impeaching a complainant who testifies at a trial or motions hearing.

§ 8.19(c)(7)  Records To Support an Alibi Defense

Various kinds of records can support an alibi defense. Depending upon the facts, counsel may find it useful to obtain: time-clock entries to demonstrate that the respondent was at school or at an after-school job or a community center at the time of the crime; electronic records corroborating that the respondent’s subway-fare card or bus pass or some other sort of transportation card or pass was used at a particular location at a particular time; phone or social-media records or electronic surveillance recordings placing the respondent elsewhere than at the crime scene at a relevant time; and network or local TV station logs documenting that the television program which the respondent claims s/he was watching (and the precise activity s/he describes seeing on the show) was, in fact, being aired at the time s/he says s/he viewed them.

§ 8.19(c)(8)  News Media Files and Photographs

234
If the crime involved a certain amount of notoriety, it may have been reported in the local newspapers or “hot” media. If so, the news items may quote statements by the complainant or other witnesses that will be useful in impeaching them. In addition, newspapers may possess still photographs and TV stations may possess footage of relevant scenes, events, or people.

§ 8.19(c)(9) Other Possible Sources of Video Recordings of the Crime or Arrest or Other Relevant Events

Video footage of a crime or an arrest or some other episode relevant to a criminal case may be obtainable from a wide array of other sources than the news media. There are often videocameras recording events inside and directly outside stores, malls, places of entertainment, parking garages, apartment houses and private homes, public housing projects, police stations, hospitals, other public buildings, parks, playgrounds and street areas. Counsel will need to move quickly to find and view any such recording and to have it copied if it appears useful, because many private and public establishments obliterate their recordings (by destroying them or by re-using the storage material) after a relatively short period of time. In some jurisdictions, police officers wear body cameras and/or their patrol cars have dashboard cameras; counsel can seek recordings made by these devices through formal or informal discovery proceedings (see Chapter 9 infra) or by subpoena (see § 8.17 supra). Videos recorded by passersby on their cellphones may be posted on YouTube, Facebook, or some other social media site, and searchable through the site. Witnesses to an event may have recorded some or all of the event on their cellphones; whenever counsel interviews a witness, counsel should ask whether the witness made such a recording and still has it.
Chapter 9

Pretrial Discovery

Part A. Introduction

§ 9.01 THE NATURE OF DISCOVERY IN DELINQUENCY CASES; SCOPE AND ORGANIZATION OF THE CHAPTER

The jurisdictions differ significantly with respect to the nature of the discovery procedures employed in juvenile court and the specificity with which those procedures are spelled out in the applicable juvenile court statute, court rules, and caselaw. Several jurisdictions conduct discovery in delinquency cases in accordance with adult criminal court procedures for discovery. This result is accomplished in some jurisdictions by juvenile court statutes or court rules mirroring the adult standards (see, e.g., D.C. SUPER. CT. JUV. RULE 16 (2018) (based on D.C. SUPER. CT. CRIM. RULE 16); FLA. RULE JUV. PROC. 8.060 (2018) (based on FLA. R. CRIM. PROC. 3.220); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT §§ 330.1, 331.1-331.7 (2018) (derived from CRIM. PROC. LAW § 200.9 and article 240)), in other jurisdictions, by juvenile statutes or court rules declaring that the adult discovery rules shall be applicable to delinquency proceedings (see, e.g., IND. CODE ANN. § 31-32-10-1 (2018); WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.140(7) (2018)), and in still other jurisdictions, by caselaw holding that in the absence of a statute or court rule, discovery procedures in delinquency cases should approximate those followed in adult criminal cases, see, e.g., Joe Z. v. Superior Court, 3 Cal. 3d 797, 801, 478 P.2d 26, 28, 91 Cal. Rptr. 594, 596 (1970). Some jurisdictions have reacted to the civil nature of delinquency proceedings by providing for discovery that is more liberal than criminal discovery (see, e.g., People ex rel Hanrahan v. Felt, 48 Ill. 2d 171, 175, 269 N.E.2d 1, 4 (1971) (notwithstanding a state statute that applies criminal discovery rules to delinquency proceedings, court holds that juvenile court has discretion to “allow a broader discovery than is allowed in criminal cases”)) or that is virtually equivalent to the liberal discovery rules employed in civil proceedings (see T.P.S. v. State, 590 S.W.2d 946, 954 (Tex. Civ. App. 1979) (acknowledging that Texas Family Code calls for application of civil discovery rules to delinquency proceedings, but construing the statute in a restrictive manner and holding that discovery in delinquency cases can be more limited than in other civil cases)). Finally, in some jurisdictions the statutes and court rules are silent about the procedures for, and scope of, discovery in delinquency cases, and the courts have not yet addressed these issues.

Since most jurisdictions that have addressed the issue treat delinquency proceedings as subject to criminal discovery procedures, this chapter will focus on the devices available for criminal discovery and the arguments that can be made for broadening its scope in delinquency cases. Attorneys who practice in those few jurisdictions that authorize civil discovery in delinquency cases should consult local statutes and caselaw, as well as the numerous treatises available on the subject of civil discovery.

As a matter of practice, criminal discovery involves two processes or phases: informal and formal discovery. Most prosecutors are willing to hand over to the defense upon request certain categories of materials which it is clear that a court would order the prosecutor to divulge if the defense made a motion to discover them. Informal discovery devices (such as the discovery letter, see § 9.05 infra, and the discovery conference, see § 9.06 infra) provide a quick route to obtaining this material. When the informal devices fail because the prosecutor refuses voluntarily to divulge information requested by the defense, counsel must turn to formal discovery devices, such as motions to compel the prosecutor to disclose the information.

Part B of this chapter examines the informal methods for obtaining discovery. Part C canvasses the formal discovery procedures, describing the devices that can be employed and exploring constitutional doctrines that can be invoked in support of motions for court-ordered discovery going beyond that provided by statutes and local common law. Finally, Part D discusses the prosecutor’s right to discovery from the defense.

While employing informal and formal discovery devices, defense counsel should not lose sight of opportunities to use other pretrial proceedings to acquire information about the prosecution’s case. The recognized mechanisms for overt discovery in criminal cases – both informal and formal – remain far more limited than those in civil practice and are usually inadequate to advise the defense of everything it needs to know to prepare fully for trial. In this current state of the practice, defense counsel’s ingenuity in devising self-help techniques is distinctly at a premium.

Several motions that counsel can file will lead to the prosecutor’s disclosing facts not previously known to the defense. See Chapter 7. Evidentiary hearings, such as the probable-cause hearing (see §§ 4.28-4.37 supra) and suppression hearings (see Chapter 22), present invaluable opportunities to uncover additional information. Police and court records and transcripts of prior judicial proceedings are also important sources to delve into. See §§ 8.16, 8.19 supra. In particular cases there may be other adventitious opportunities for discovery, such as the coroner’s inquest in homicide cases or a prior trial resulting in a mistrial. And counsel’s pretrial discovery strategy must, of course, be coordinated with a complementary strategy of defense investigation. See Chapter 8.

Counsel should be aware that there are additional discovery processes that are activated at trial. Section 27.12 infra describes those processes and suggests techniques for invoking their benefits at a sidebar conference immediately prior to the commencement of the trial.

§ 9.02 THE GENERAL POSITION OF THE DEFENSE ON DISCOVERY

As explained in § 9.01 supra, in those jurisdictions that have addressed the scope of discovery in delinquency proceedings, the statutes or court decisions usually regulate such discovery in accordance with the discovery procedures employed in adult criminal cases rather than the more liberal discovery procedures employed in civil cases.
When practicing in a jurisdiction that has not as yet resolved the scope of discovery in delinquency proceedings, counsel should argue that the civil nature of delinquency cases calls for application of civil discovery rules, or at least for discovery that is more liberal than ordinary criminal discovery. See, e.g., People ex rel. Hanrahan v. Felt, 48 Ill. 2d 171, 269 N.E.2d 1 (1971).

Even when practicing in jurisdictions that have authoritatively resolved to use criminal discovery rules in delinquency proceedings, counsel can make certain policy arguments in support of the expansion of those rules to permit broader discovery to the defense. Counsel can point out that the quest for truth at trial is better served, under an adversary system of litigation, if the evidence of one party does not come as a surprise to the other but, being known at a time in advance when there is opportunity to check it out through adequate investigation, appears in court subject to meaningful cross-examination and rebuttal.

One of the rationales commonly relied upon to deny liberal discovery in adult criminal cases is the notion that criminal defendants, more than civil litigants, once forewarned are likely to flee the jurisdiction, bribe or intimidate witnesses, or engage in other misbehavior. Even if this spectre were real in the adult criminal context – and there has never yet been any adequate showing made to support the proposition that the dangers are greater in criminal cases generically than in civil cases (compare NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214, 239-41 (1978), finding a special danger of witness intimidation in NLRB proceedings because of the “peculiar character of labor litigation,” id. at 240) – these fears are usually inappropriate in the juvenile context. Juveniles, heavily dependent upon their parents for basic necessities, are unlikely to flee the jurisdiction even if forewarned. And, even if risk of flight or of witness intimidation were a significant danger in an individual case, the greater availability of pretrial detention in juvenile cases (see § 4.15 supra) would make it possible to eliminate the danger by detaining the child pending trial. Counsel can, therefore, urge that an attitude of openness akin to that which animates modern civil discovery practice should prevail in juvenile cases unless the prosecutor can make some particularized showing that in this case and with respect to this discovery request, the speculative dangers that so largely shape adult criminal discovery practice have some factual substance to them.

The other principal argument advanced against liberal discovery in adult criminal cases is the supposed inefficiency or unfairness of giving the defendant discovery against the prosecutor when such discovery must inevitably remain a “one-way street” because the Privilege Against Self-Incrimination precludes prosecutive discovery against the defendant. However, the evolving caselaw suggests that the Fifth Amendment is not an absolute bar to criminal discovery in favor of the prosecution but would permit the prosecutor to obtain disclosure of the products of defense investigation in an appropriate case. See §§ 9.11-9.13 infra; cf. Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. 596 (2014). Moreover, even if it were an absolute bar – or to the extent that it is a bar – the “one-way street” argument is nonetheless basically unsound. That is so because the Fifth Amendment itself is a one-way street and was designed to be. No one would suppose that because it protects an adult defendant or juvenile respondent against compulsory self-incrimination, the prosecution should be permitted to incriminate the accused with perjurious or unreliable evidence. See § 9.09(b)(5) infra. The efficiency and fairness of prescreening the prosecution’s evidence for veracity and reliability is not diminished simply because the overriding policy of the Fifth Amendment makes impossible what would be equally, but independently, desirable – the prescreening of defense evidence as well. Aversion to one-way streets, in this dimension, is nothing more or less than a repudiation of the constitutional Privilege. Such a repudiation is particularly indefensible because the best founded attacks on the policy of the Privilege have always rested upon its tendency to protect the guilty, whereas it is the innocent who are worst hurt by denial of discovery on one-way street logic. Finally, the realities of criminal investigation are a one-way street the other way. Police and prosecutors have resources to gather and preserve evidence incomparably greater than those of the accused. See Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470, 475-76 n.9 (1973). If equal advantage were the measure of fairness in criminal procedure – which the Fifth Amendment fundamentally denies – discovery in favor of the defense would nevertheless be required in virtually all situations.

§ 9.03 THE ADVISABILITY OF PURSUING INFORMAL DISCOVERY METHODS BEFORE RESORTING TO FORMAL DISCOVERY DEVICES

As a general rule, counsel should always pursue informal discovery options, asking the prosecutor for whatever is wanted, before counsel embarks upon discovery motions and other formal discovery devices. Judges understandably dislike being asked for coercive orders when it is not clear that coercion is necessary, and they are likely to tell counsel to pursue informal remedies first. (Indeed, in some jurisdictions, the discovery rules require that defense attorneys employ informal discovery procedures before resorting to discovery motions.) Also, when defense counsel has sought and been denied informal discovery, the balance of goodwill tips in the defense’s favor, with the judge blaming the prosecution for the expenditure of court time on a discovery matter.

Part B. Informal Discovery

§ 9.04 DESIGNING A STRATEGY FOR INFORMAL DISCOVERY

Prior to engaging in informal discovery, counsel will need to thoroughly familiarize himself or herself with local discovery rules and the constitutional doctrines (described in § 9.09 infra) that can be invoked in support of defense discovery. Even though counsel will usually not explicitly cite these rules and doctrines, a knowledge of the scope of the respondent’s formal discovery rights is important in deciding what information to request and the degree to which counsel can insist that s/he is entitled to the information. And occasionally it may be possible to break through an impasse in informal negotiations by demonstrating to the prosecutor that a particular doctrine or citation supports counsel’s discovery request.

Counsel should not restrict informal discovery requests to the information to which the defense is entitled as a matter of law; instead counsel should seek everything that a liberal and enlightened criminal procedure would allow to the defense. Later in the process, when counsel is seeking judicial relief because of the prosecutor’s refusal to disclose information, counsel will need to calculate whether to be venturesome or to limit discovery motions to materials that are plainly discoverable under the recognized statutes, rules, and constitutional doctrines. At that stage, there are considerations to be weighed against over-ambition. See § 9.08 infra. But, given the basic notion of informal discovery – that defense counsel is merely asking for whatever information the prosecutor is willing to disclose voluntarily – counsel need not, and should not, feel restricted to the categories of information that the prosecutor can be compelled to disclose through formal discovery.

§ 9.05 THE DISCOVERY LETTER

Ordinarily, it is preferable to make discovery requests in written form. Discovery letters permit the type of careful phrasing that is difficult to achieve in oral requests. Moreover, if the prosecutor denies the request and counsel moves the court for a discovery order, it will be important to show precisely what counsel requested; a letter serves as the best record that any particular request was made and obviates arguments about how the request was framed. Finally, the written format permits an extended series of requests that would tax a prosecutor’s time and patience if made orally in a discovery conference or a phone conversation.

To the extent possible, counsel should make the requests in the discovery letter highly specific. The more precisely a request identifies the item or information sought, the more unreasonable – and potentially unconstitutional – the prosecutor’s refusal to produce it will appear. Cf. United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 106-07 (1976). On the other hand, a discovery request limited to materials that defense counsel has sufficient information to identify with particularity may fail to cover some items that are crucial to the defense. One device for dealing with this problem is to frame discovery requests in the form of a series of concentric circles of increasing breadth and generality. Thus, for example, in an armed robbery prosecution, counsel might request:

(I) The following real or physical objects or substances:

(A) The “thing of value” that it is alleged in Count One of the Petition the respondent took from the complainant, John Smith, on or about May 1, 2018;

(B) Any other thing that it is claimed was taken from John Smith during the course of the robbery alleged in Count One;

(C) The “pistol” described by Detective James Hall at page 6, line 4 of the transcript of the probable-cause hearing in this case;

(D) Any other weapon that it is claimed was used by the respondent during the course of the robbery alleged in Count One of the Petition;

(E) Any other thing that it is claimed was used by the respondent as an instrumentality or means of committing the robbery alleged in Count One;

(F) Any real or physical object or substance that:

1. the prosecution intends to offer into evidence at any trial or hearing in this case;

2. the prosecution is retaining in its custody or control for potential use as evidence at any trial or hearing in this case;

3. is being retained for potential use as evidence at any trial or hearing in this case by, or within the custody or control of:

   a. any personnel of the Oak City Police Department;

   b. any personnel of the State Bureau of Investigation;

   c. any personnel of the Oakland County Criminalistics Laboratory;

   d. [The following paragraphs would designate other relevant agencies];

4. has been submitted to any professional personnel [as defined in a “Definitions” paragraph of the discovery request, encompassing all forensic science experts and investigators] for examination, testing, or analysis in connection with this case by:

   a. the Office of the Corporation Counsel [or whatever agency prosecutes juvenile delinquency cases];

   b. the District Attorney’s office;

   c. any person previously described by paragraph (I)(F)(3)(a), (b), (c) or (d);

5. has been gathered or received in connection with the investigation of this case by:

   a. the Office of the Corporation Counsel [or whatever agency prosecutes juvenile delinquency cases];

(b) the District Attorney’s office;

(c) any personnel previously described by paragraph (I)(F)(3)(a), (b), (c), or (d);

(6) is relevant to:

(a) the robbery alleged in Count One of the Petition;

(b) the identity of the perpetrator of that robbery;

(c) the investigation of that robbery;

(d) the physical or mental state, condition, or disposition of the respondent at the time of:

(i) that robbery;

(ii) the confession allegedly made by the respondent, described by Detective James Hall at page 10, lines 12-23 of the transcript of the probable-cause hearing in this case;

(iii) any other confession, admission, or incriminating statement allegedly made by the respondent;

(iv) the present stage of the proceedings or any previous or subsequent stages of the proceedings;

(G) Every real or physical object or substance within the categories previously described by paragraphs (I)(A) through (I)(F), which hereafter comes into the possession, custody, or control of, or is, or hereafter becomes, known to:

(1) the Office of the Corporation Counsel [or whatever agency prosecutes juvenile delinquency cases];

(2) the District Attorney’s office;

(3) any person previously described by paragraph (I)(F)(3)(a), (b), (c), or (d).
(II) [The following paragraphs would describe other categories of materials – respondent’s statements, witnesses’ statements, police and investigative reports and records, lab test results, exculpatory materials, and so forth – in a similar manner.]

Discovery requests in this form have the virtue of covering everything that might be discussable, whether known or unknown to defense counsel, while insulating counsel’s requests for narrower or more specific categories from denial on the ground that the broader or more general categories are impermissible “fishing expeditions” or include undiscoverable material.

Counsel should always include in every discovery letter a paragraph stating that each request for discovery should be construed as seeking not only information presently in the possession of the prosecution or its agents, but also “all like matter that hereafter comes into the possession of, or becomes known to, an attorney for the prosecution, the police, any other law enforcement or investigative agency, or any other agent of the prosecution.”

§ 9.06 THE DISCOVERY CONFERENCE

As a general rule, counsel should attempt to meet with the prosecutor for a discovery conference in addition to sending the type of discovery letter described in § 9.05 supra. The conference often will yield information not produced in the prosecutor’s written response to the discovery letter.

The key to conducting a discovery conference effectively is to set an informal, conversational tone from the beginning. If counsel treats the conference as governed by strict rules, s/he will soon find the prosecutor denying every request on the theory that discovery in criminal and delinquency cases is very limited. If, on the other hand, counsel suggests that the two attorneys simply “talk over the case,” the give-and-take of ordinary conversation usually will result in the prosecutor’s disclosing information to which the defense is not technically entitled.
Of course, “give-and-take” means precisely that: prosecutors usually will not give information that they are not required to give unless they feel that they are getting information in exchange.
Accordingly, counsel should decide in advance what bits of information can be disclosed to the prosecutor as barter without in any way damaging the defense case or giving away too much of the defense strategy.

In addition to seeking information about the case, counsel should use the discovery conference as a vehicle for learning the prosecutor’s attitude toward the seriousness of the offense and for discussing the possibility of dismissal of the Petition or diversion of the case. If counsel can convincingly urge the client’s innocence or the unfounded nature of a given charge, s/he may attempt to convince the prosecutor at this stage to drop charges or to present lesser ones. Counsel should remember that the prosecutor’s personal view of guilt or innocence is important and that it is based on information – both favorable and unfavorable to the respondent – that may not be admissible as evidence in court. A complainant’s shabby character or prior unfounded complaints may do counsel no good when the case goes to trial; it is with the prosecutor that they can be put to good effect. If counsel has arranged for the client to take a polygraph test and if the results are favorable, it is often effective to show those results to the prosecutor in support of a bid for dismissal. It will often also prove productive to mention any favorable background information about the respondent, such as lack of a prior record, good school attendance and performance, and participation in school sports or after-school or community activities. See § 19.03(b) infra.

It may also be useful to let the prosecutor know that counsel intends to work hard at the case (either explicitly, by saying so and explaining counsel’s concern for the client, or implicitly, by describing the motions that counsel intends to file or other work counsel intends to do on the case). The value of this is two-fold. First, if the prosecutor thinks that defense counsel is going all out, the prosecutor’s estimate of the time and trouble involved in trying the case will increase and so may the prosecutor’s willingness to offer concessions in order to settle the case before trial.
Second, counsel’s visible dedication to a client often tends to make the prosecutor’s own attitude toward the client more sympathetic, because the prosecutor figures that the client probably must have something on the ball to inspire all that zeal. Both of these impressions can, of course, backfire in some cases, causing the prosecutor to prepare more thoroughly or to develop a more competitive turn of mind. Counsel should seek to learn as much as possible about this particular prosecutor’s practices and psychology by asking other informed defense practitioners.
Particularly when a prosecutor is carrying a heavy caseload, counsel may be wise to keep contact with him or her to a minimum, in order to decrease the visibility of the case or to avoid arousing the prosecutor’s combativeness.

Finally, if the respondent is interested in “cutting a deal” with the State – furnishing testimony against a co-respondent or adult defendant who is charged with the same or connected crimes in criminal court, or furnishing testimony against other persons, or supplying criminal-telligence wanted by law enforcement, in exchange for dismissal of the Petition or reduction of the charges or acceptance of a plea to a lesser charge (see §§ 5.10, 8.14 supra; §§ 14.15, 14.18 infra) – counsel might begin discussing this possibility with the prosecutor at the discovery conference.

Part C. Formal Discovery: Mechanisms and Legal Bases

§ 9.07 TYPES OF FORMAL DISCOVERY PROCEDURES

Local practice varies widely with regard to whether and which discovery procedures are available. Statutes and court rules in an increasing number of jurisdictions require that the prosecution produce specified categories of information to the defense upon request and, in some cases, without a request. See, e.g., VERNON’S ANN. TEX. CODE CRIM. PRO. art. 39.14 (amendment effective September 1, 2017, requiring that the prosecution routinely disclose detailed information about the record and performance of custodial snitches whom it intends to call as witnesses; this automatic disclosure supplements an extensive list of other prosecutorial

The most commonly recognized formal discovery devices are discussed in §§ 9.07(a)-9.07(d) infra.
§ 9.07(a)  Motion for a Bill of Particulars

Upon the filing of a charging paper that is insufficiently detailed to inform the respondent of the vital statistics of the offense charged, s/he may move for a bill of particulars, setting out in the motion the additional information that s/he seeks. S/he is ordinarily entitled to:

1. The specific date and time of the offense;
2. Its street location;
3. The name of the complainant or victim; and
4. The means by which it is asserted that the respondent committed the offense.

See, e.g., Dzikowski v. State, 436 Md. 430, 449-50, 82 A.3d 851, 862 (Md. App. 2011) (“The State violated . . . [the applicable statute] when it filed a bill of particulars in which, rather than inform the petitioner of the conduct that was the basis for the reckless endangerment count, it instead simply directed the petitioner to discovery. In so doing, the State switched the burden to the petitioner to identify the facts underlying the indictment. Because a charging document must inform the defendant ‘of the specific conduct with which he is charged,’ . . . logically, and . . . [under the applicable rule of criminal procedure], a bill of particulars, in supplementation of a short form indictment that fails to so inform, must specify the alleged conduct to which the subject charge relates. Discovery, even open-file discovery, that includes police reports and witness statements, is not the same and cannot substitute for a legally sufficient bill of particulars. While such discovery may contain the full facts of the case, when a defendant is charged using a short form indictment, it is not, and cannot be, a substitute, or satisfy a demand, for a bill of particulars. Discovery does not particularize or relate, from the perspective of the State, the factual information contained therein to the offense charged. It is this perspective and relation of factual information to the offense charged that satisfies the form and substance of a bill of particulars.”); State v. Larson, 941 S.W.2d 847, 850-53 (Mo. App. 1997) (“Dr. Larson was charged by information with fifty counts of Class A misdemeanor animal abuse . . . ¶ Dr. Larson filed a motion for bill of particulars claiming that the information was deficient. Specifically, he asserted that each charge identified neither the acts of abuse nor the specific animal. As a result, Dr. Larson claimed prejudice in the preparation of his defense and the inability to prevent multiple prosecution for the charged offenses. The trial court denied Dr. Larson’s motion. ¶ . . . Where an information alleges all essential facts constituting the offense, but fails to assert facts necessary for an accused’s defense, the information is subject to a challenge by a bill of particulars. . . . A bill of particulars clarifies the charging document. It prevents surprise and restricts the state to what is set forth in the bill. ¶ The information in Counts 1 through 50 did not sufficiently apprise Dr. Larson of which hog – male, female, dead, alive, white, black, red, Hampshire, Yorkshire or Duroc – he was charged with having abused. Without providing some reasonable description identifying each hog allegedly abused, Dr. Larson would be subject to multiple prosecutions with no way to disprove that the State of Missouri had already litigated criminal charges against him for abusing a particular hog. ¶ . . . The trial court, therefore, abused its discretion in not granting Dr. Larson’s motion for a bill of particulars.”). Cf. Hunter v. State, 829 P.2d 64, 65 (Okla. Crim App. 1992) (“Initially, we are very disturbed by the fact that the prosecution in the present case did not file the Bill of Particulars seeking the death penalty until seven days prior to trial. At present, there is no set time prior to trial within which the State must file a Bill of Particulars. . . . However, both parties agree that the notice need only be given within a reasonable time prior to trial. We find that giving notice that the State intends to seek the death penalty seven days prior to trial is clearly unreasonable. By comparison, the State is required to give ten days notice of its intention to use evidence of other crimes. . . . It is our opinion the State knows or should know no later than the preliminary hearing whether or not they intend to seek the death penalty in a particular case. We find the notice in the present case simply inadequate. The defendant has the right to a fair trial; how can one properly prepare for a death case trial in one week. This Court adopts the standard that the State must file the Bill of Particulars prior to or at the arraignment of the defendant. The trial court may for good cause shown, extend this time but should use its sound discretion in so doing.”).

Allowance of a bill of particulars is generally said to rest in the discretion of the court, and the standard jargon is that the bill does not lie to discover prosecution “evidence” (that is, means of proving facts, as distinguished from the operative facts of the offense themselves). But counsel should note the more liberal practice recognized in Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 99 (1967). In most jurisdictions the respondent may not demur to the facts stated in the bill or move to dismiss it on the ground of failure to state an offense (see § 17.03 infra); and in the event that the prosecution’s proof at trial varies from the particulars contained in the bill, the respondent is usually given nothing more in the way of relief than a continuance (or mistrial and continuance if continuance without a mistrial is not feasible); only very rarely will a court dismiss a prosecution for variance of the proof from a bill of particulars. The bill is therefore a device of limited utility. But cf. People v. Bradley, 154 A.D.3d 1279, 1279-81, 63 N.Y.S.3d 159, 160-61 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2017) (reversing the defendant’s convictions of criminally negligent homicide and reckless assault while operating a motor vehicle because the prosecution had responded to the defense’s pretrial demands for a bill of particulars with respect to the element of recklessness by specifying that the “‘[t]he ingestion of marihuana and a failure to take medication were both factors that contributed to the defendant’s recklessness,’” but the prosecution’s “evidence presented at trial varied from the limited theories alleged in the indictment, as amplified by the bill of particulars,” in that the prosecution “presented evidence that defendant was reckless based upon not only marihuana use and failure to take medication, but also based upon, inter alia, his lack of sleep, failure to inform his doctors of his syncope events, and failure to control his alcohol consumption”; “Inasmuch as there was a variance between the People’s trial evidence and the indictment as amplified by the bill of particulars, and that evidence was insufficient to support the theories of defendant’s recklessness set forth in the bill of particulars, defendant was essentially tried and convicted on charges for which he had not been indicted . . . .”).

§ 9.07(b) Motion for a List of Prosecution Witnesses

In many jurisdictions the statutes, court rules, or caselaw confer upon the defense a right to the names of all witnesses whom the prosecution plans to use at trial. Usually this is limited to witnesses in the prosecution’s case-in-chief and does not extend to potential rebuttal witnesses.
The right to a witness list is given by statutes or rules of two sorts: those that require the names of witnesses to be endorsed on the charging paper and those that authorize the defense to demand the names from the prosecutor. Even under statutes of the former sort, it is often common for prosecutors to withhold a witness list unless defense counsel ask them for it. If local rules require the inclusion of witnesses’ names in the Petition, counsel can move to dismiss the Petition for failure to state the names. If the local rules do not establish such a requirement, counsel should either demand the list from the prosecutor directly or move the court for an order requiring the prosecutor to produce a list, as occasion warrants.

If the prosecutor responds to a motion or order for production of a witness list by serving up an obviously inflated list calculated to hamper defense preparation, counsel can seek the court’s intervention to extract a more realistic list. Cf. Chafin v. State, 246 Ga. 709, 713-14, 273 S.E.2d 147, 152-53 (1980). If counsel’s independent investigation suggests, conversely, that the prosecutor is probably withholding the names of some potential prosecution witnesses, counsel can bring the matter to the court’s attention by a motion to compel full disclosure; or alternatively counsel can (1) move at a pretrial conference or other pretrial, post-discovery proceeding to preclude the testimony of an unlisted witness (see, e.g., State v. Martinez, 124 N.M. 721, 954 P.2d 1198 (N.M. App. 1998)), or (2) await trial and, when the prosecutor calls an unlisted witness, object to his or her testifying (see, e.g., Rouse v. State, 243 So. 2d 225 (Fla. App. 1971); People v. White, 123 Ill. App. 2d 102, 259 N.E.2d 357 (1970)). At trial the judge will have discretion to (a) exclude the testimony of the witness, or (b) allow the witness to testify and allow the defense a continuance to prepare for cross-examining the witness and to gather defense witnesses responsive to the unannounced witness’s testimony. State v. Prieto, 366 Wis. 2d 794, 876 N.W.2d 154 (Wis. App. 2015). See, e.g., Rogers v. State, 261 Ga. 649, 649-50, 409 S.E.2d 655, 656-57 (1991) (“[I]f a defendant makes a timely written demand for a list of witnesses, a witness whose name does not appear on the list may not testify without defendant’s consent. The prosecution’s failure to list a witness can be cured in many situations, however, if defendant is granted a continuance or allowed to interview the witness before the testimony is given.”). In this case, Rogers made a timely written demand for a list of witnesses . . . . We conclude that the testimony of the witness should not have been allowed without giving Rogers some remedy for the prosecution's noncompliance with the statute. The record is clear that Rogers insisted on his right to a witness list and on his right to a remedy for the failure of the witness to appear on the list.”); People v. Kysar, 158 A.3d 544, 544, 69 N.Y.S.3d 649, 650 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2018) (reversing a conviction because the trial court failed to grant appropriate relief when the prosecution violated the witness-list rule by presenting the testimony of the complainant, who had been omitted from the witness list because the prosecution was “unable to locate him in the two years between the incident and the trial” and who was located “after the jury was selected, and just before opening arguments”; “[d]efense counsel clearly ‘relied to her detriment [in voir dire] on her expectation that the People would not call this witness,’” and therefore the trial court, “having denied defense counsel’s request to preclude the complainant’s testimony, should have granted counsel’s alternative request, made prior to opening arguments, to select a new jury”).
In a few jurisdictions, the respondent’s right to a witness list is not limited to potential prosecution witnesses but extends to witnesses whom the prosecutor knows to have exculpatory evidence. See, e.g., Richardson v. State, 246 So. 2d 771 (Fla. 1971). Local rules should be consulted.

§ 9.07(c)  Discovery Motions

In addition to the two specific types of discovery motions that have been described thus far – motions for a bill of particulars and motions for a list of witnesses – most jurisdictions provide for a generalized discovery motion in which the defense can seek production of any other information to which it is entitled by statute, court rule, or caselaw.

Depending upon the facts of the case, the defense may wish to move for production or inspection of:

1. Physical objects. Counsel should ask that these be released for testing by defense experts, if advised; or the court can be asked to order that defense experts be allowed to attend testing by prosecution experts.

2. Police and other investigative reports; records and materials generated by police procedures and activities (911 telephone calls; arrest photographs; booking records; eyewitness identification forms; and so forth); photographs, diagrams, and other items generated by law enforcement and prosecutorial evidence gathering. See § 8.19 supra for a roster of the kinds of documents and materials that are commonly accumulated in the course of police processing and prosecutorial working-up of a case.

3. Medical and scientific reports.

4. Written and oral statements of the respondent.

5. Written and oral statements of any co-respondents, adult co-perpetrators, or other alleged accomplices.

7. Official records (maintained by detention facilities, prisons, jails, hospitals, probation departments, and so forth) relating to the respondent, co-respondents, adult co-perpetrators, and prosecution and defense witnesses, including materials relevant to credibility in the personnel files of police witnesses; investigative reports relating to previous complaints by the present complainant; and records of all police and prosecutorial transactions with any undercover agents or informants involved.
8. Criminal records of the respondent, co-respondents, adult co-perpetrators, prosecution and defense witnesses, and informants.

9. Grand jury transcripts, if grand jury proceedings were held in connection with any purported co-perpetrators charged as adults. A special shibboleth of secrecy has traditionally surrounded grand jury proceedings and made courts reluctant to disclose grand jury records. There has, however, been some erosion of this protectionistic attitude, “consonant with the growing realization that disclosure, rather than suppression, of relevant materials ordinarily promotes the proper administration of criminal justice.” Dennis v. United States, 384 U.S. 855, 870 (1966). See also § 27.12(a)(1) infra (explaining that in a number of jurisdictions, a statute or rule requires that the prosecutor turn over, at trial, any prior statements of prosecution witnesses, for purposes of impeachment).

11. Other documents or data that are “within the government’s possession, custody, or control and . . . [that are] material to preparing the defense” (Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 16(a)(1)(E)). See, e.g., United States v. Soto-Zuniga, 837 F.3d 992 (9th Cir. 2016) (the district court in a drug possession case abused its discretion by denying the defense motion for discovery of “checkpoint search and arrest statistics” (id. at 998); Federal Rule 16(a)(1)(E)’s requirement of production of items “‘material to preparing the defense’” includes “discovery related to the constitutionality of a search or seizure” (id. at 1000)).

12. Other materials that are obtainable by law enforcement through special accommodations not available to defense counsel See, e.g., Black v. State, 2017 Wyo. 135, 405 P.3d 1045, 1051 (2017) (conviction reversed, in part because of the prosecution’s failure to comply with a discovery order that it obtain and produce to the defense a six-month batch of Verizon cell phone and Facebook records: “One of the exhibits in support of the motion for sanctions was an email from the prosecutor to defense counsel. The email contained a Facebook policy for addressing record requests from law enforcement. According to the policy, law enforcement ‘may expeditiously submit formal preservation requests through the Law Enforcement Online Request System at facebook.com/records, or by email . . . .’ Once the request is received, according to the policy, Facebook ‘will search for and disclose data that is specified with particularity in an appropriate form of legal process and which we are reasonably able to locate and retrieve.’” 405 P.3d at 1051. Defense counsel’s motion for production had alleged that “‘[i]t is believed that it is much easier and more convenient for the State to obtain these requested records than the Defendant. It is known, in fact, that such a request for Facebook to provide records is made frequently by law enforcement in Teton County, Wyoming. See Records Request at www.facebook.com/records/login (stating that “If you are a law enforcement agent who is authorized to gather evidence in connection with an official investigation, you may request records from Facebook through this system.”). Whereas, it is unduly cumbersome and costly, both in time and resources for the Office of the State Public Defender to obtain these records via court subpoena, or subpoena duces tecum, and the required modes of providing notice and service.” 405 P.3d at 1049.

§ 9.07(d) Other Discovery-Related Motions

In addition to the foregoing motions, local practice may recognize (or counsel may be able to persuade the judge to recognize) one or more of the following types of motions, which involve the court’s ordering the prosecution or prosecution witnesses to participate in certain discovery-related procedures:

1. Motions for medical or psychiatric examination of the complainant or other prosecution witnesses.

2. Motions for an order requiring the complainant and other prosecution witnesses to speak with the defense because of prosecutorial or police interference with the defense right to investigate. See § 8.13 supra.

3. Motions for an order requiring police witnesses to speak with the defense. See § 8.14 supra.

In addition, counsel can, in certain circumstances, move for the detention of persons as material witnesses (see §§ 9.10(a), 10.02 infra).

§ 9.07(e) Depositions

Although depositions are a key feature of discovery in civil cases, most jurisdictions do not authorize depositions in criminal and juvenile delinquency cases, except when it is necessary to preserve the testimony of a witness for trial (see, e.g., Fed. Rule Crim. Proc. 15(a)) or in other exceptional circumstances (see, e.g., § 8.13 supra, discussing deposition as a possible remedy for the prosecutor’s impermissibly advising a witness to decline to talk with defense counsel or a defense investigator).

In a small number of jurisdictions, depositions are available in criminal and juvenile delinquency cases for their customary function of discovery. See, e.g., Fla. Rule Juv. Proc. 8.060(d) (2018) (establishing a procedure for depositions in delinquency cases, patterned after the deposition procedure employed in adult criminal cases); Vt. Rule Fam. Proc. 1(d)(4) (2018) (expressly incorporating the adult criminal procedure rules for depositions). In these jurisdictions, depositions may be broadly available or limited to specific categories of cases (e.g., exclusively felonies) and/or conditioned upon a showing of need.

In jurisdictions that permit depositions by the prosecution as well as the defense, the applicable rule commonly recognizes that the accused may not be deposed by the prosecution. Even if such a limitation were not set by the relevant statute or rule, the Fifth Amendment’s Privilege Against Self-Incrimination would preclude the prosecution from deposing the respondent. See § 9.12 infra.

Where depositions are available to defense counsel, they will ordinarily be an invaluable tool for discovery of the prosecution’s case and for locking prosecution witnesses into statements that can be used to impeach the witness at trial if s/he changes his or her account. In these respects, depositions offer the kinds of tactical benefits discussed in other chapters with regard to preliminary hearings (see § 4.32 supra) and suppression hearings (see §§ 22.02, 24.04 infra). But depositions can be even more effective for these purposes because they usually cover a wider range of subjects and because their use as a discovery tool is not merely tolerated but specifically intended.

An issue that may arise at trial in a jurisdiction that affords depositions in criminal and juvenile delinquency cases is whether, in the event that a prosecution witness who was deposed is unavailable at trial, the prosecution can introduce the witness’s deposition into evidence. The rule of Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), discussed in § 30.04 infra, should bar such a practice. See, e.g., Corona v. State, 64 So. 3d 1232, 1241 (Fla. 2011) (discovery depositions, available to the defense in criminal cases under state rules, “do not meet Crawford’s cross-examination requirement” of “afford[ing] [the accused] an adequate opportunity to cross-examine the . . . declarant” because, inter alia, such depositions are “‘not designed as an opportunity to engage in adversarial testing of the evidence against the defendant,’” and they are admissible at trial solely “‘for purposes of impeachment’” and not as “‘substantive evidence’”). But see Thomas v. State, 966 N.E.2d 1267, 1272 (Ind. App. 2012) (concluding that the prosecution’s introduction of a deposition of an unavailable witness at trial did not violate Crawford because defense counsel had an adequate prior opportunity to cross-examine that witness at the deposition, but ultimately holding that “even assuming that Crawford’s requirements were not met, any error in admitting the deposition was harmless”).

§ 9.07(f) Freedom of Information Laws (FOILs)

A number of jurisdictions have enacted freedom of information laws (commonly called FOILs), some of them patterned on the federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552 (2018). Although the Supreme Court has said of the federal Act that it “was not intended to supplement or displace rules of discovery” (John Doe Agency v. John Doe Corp., 493 U.S. 146, 153 (1989)), and lower courts have said the same of their state FOILs, these laws may be written sufficiently broadly to reach certain government records that defense counsel would like to examine. See, e.g., United States Department of Justice v. Julian, 486 U.S. 1 (1988); Jones v.
Unless the jurisdiction’s statute or other controlling authority explicitly forbids its use by parties to litigation against the government or exempts the types of records counsel is seeking (compare Arkansas State Police v. Wren, 2016 Ark. 188, 491 S.W.3d 124 (2016), with Martin v. Musteen, 303 Ark. 656, 799 S.W.2d 540 (1990)), counsel may find it profitable to follow the statutory procedures for requesting access to records that arguably fall within its compass. See, e.g., In the Matter of Gould v. New York City Police Department, 89 N.Y.2d 267, 274-75, 675 N.E.2d 808, 811-12, 653 N.Y.S.2d 54, 57-58 (1996) (even though “petitioners seek [to use FOIL] to obtain documents relating to their own criminal proceedings, and . . . disclosure of such documents is governed generally by CPL [Criminal Procedure Law] article 240 [on discovery in criminal cases,] . . . the Criminal Procedure Law does not specifically preclude defendants from seeking these documents under FOIL, [and therefore] we cannot read such a categorical limitation into the statute”; “the Police Department’s argument and the dissent’s concern that the requests serve not the underlying purposes of FOIL, but the quite different private interests of petitioners in obtaining documents bearing on their [criminal] cases and will produce an enormous administrative burden” are “unavailing as the statutory language imposes a broad duty to make certain records publicly available irrespective of the private interests and the attendant burdens involved”; the rulings below “establishing a blanket exemption from FOIL disclosure for [police] complaint follow-up reports and police activity logs” are reversed and the cases are remitted to the trial courts “to determine, upon an in camera inspection if necessary, whether the Police Department can make a particularized showing that any claimed exemption applies”).

FOIL requests are ordinarily submitted in writing directly to the governmental agency whose records are sought. If the agency does not produce them, a civil action is brought against the agency to compel production. The FOIL specifies the court or courts in which the civil action may be brought and the procedure for bringing it.

§ 9.08 GENERAL STRATEGY WHEN EMPLOYING FORMAL DISCOVERY PROCEDURES

Section 9.04 supra advised that counsel seek as much information as possible through informal discovery procedures. A different tack may be advisable in making formal discovery motions. By limiting these motions to what counsel is likely to get as a matter of settled law and local custom, counsel can display an attitude of undemanding reasonableness that may persuade the court to exercise its discretion in favor of discovery in areas where the prevailing practice allows discovery but does not require it. Since discovery law in most jurisdictions confers broad discretion on the trial judge, it often makes sense to get or keep on the judge’s good side by requesting nothing that s/he could regard as exorbitant. In deciding whether to employ this strategy, or whether to go for broke and ask for everything that an enlightened criminal procedure would give the defense, or whether to take some intermediate position between these two extremes, counsel will need to assess the temperament of his or her individual judge. When counsel’s theory of the case makes one or a few particular items crucial subjects for discovery (see § 6.02(d) supra), s/he may do best by focusing on those items in his or her requests for court-ordered discovery, and forgoing other items – or at least forgoing any other items which are not routine, unremarkable staples of local discovery practice.

In any event counsel should make discovery requests as specific as possible, identifying the material that is wanted (cf. United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 106-07 (1976)) and describing its relevance and importance for the preparation of the defense unless self-evident (cf. United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 871-74 (1982)). If counsel is unable to identify with specificity some of the information that s/he wants, counsel should use the concentric circles approach described in § 9.05 supra to guard against the risk that the judge will deny the entire discovery motion as a “fishing expedition.”

When requesting a discovery order, counsel should recount his or her attempts to obtain the information through informal discovery, and the prosecutor’s refusal to disclose it. See § 9.03 supra. If counsel sent a discovery letter to the prosecutor (see § 9.05 supra), a copy of the letter as well as any prosecutorial responses should be attached as an appendix to the discovery motion. When seeking materials or information to which the defense is not plainly entitled as a matter of routine under established precedent, counsel should take pains to demonstrate his or her efforts and inability to obtain the information independently: for example, counsel should recite his or her attempts to interview the prosecution witness(es) who know the information and the fact that the witness(es) refused to speak with counsel or the defense investigator. By documenting his or her assiduity, counsel demonstrates that s/he genuinely needs the judge’s intervention and is not just being lazy. The absence of any alternative to judicial process as a means for obtaining vital information strengthens counsel’s entitlement to the court’s assistance. Compare California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479, 488-90 (1984).

§ 9.09 CONSTITUTIONAL DOCTRINES THAT CAN BE INVOKED IN SUPPORT OF DEFENSE DISCOVERY

The Brady rule described in § 9.09(a) infra, gives the defense a federal constitutional right to discovery of exculpatory information and information that impeaches prosecution evidence. This is a firmly established doctrine, recognized in all jurisdictions. The other doctrines described in this section, which provide constitutional rationales for broader defense discovery rights, have not as yet been authoritatively recognized. Accordingly, when relying on the latter doctrines, counsel will need to fully brief their legal basis and should also present a compelling factual showing of need.

§ 9.09(a) The Brady Doctrine: The Right to Prosecutorial Disclosure of Evidence Helpful to the Defense

Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and its progeny require that the prosecution disclose, upon defense request, evidence in the prosecutor’s possession that is material and potentially helpful to the defense. The Court ruled in Brady that “suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution.” Id. at 87. Accord, Turner v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 1885 (2017) (dictum); Wearry v. Cain, 136 S. Ct. 1002 (2016) (per curiam); Smith v. Cain, 565 U.S. 73 (2012); Cone v. Bell, 556 U.S. 449, 451, 469-70 (2009); Banks v. Dretke, 540 U.S. 668, 691 (2004); Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 280-81 (1999); Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 432-38 (1995); Dennis v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 834 F.3d 263 (3d Cir. 2016) (en banc); Gumm v. Mitchell, 775 F.3d 345, 363-74 (6th Cir. 2014); United States v. Tavera, 719 F.3d 705, 711-12 (6th Cir. 2013); and see Floyd v. Vannoy, 894 F.3d 143, 162-63 (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam) (the prosecution’s failure to disclose lab reports indicating that fingerprints lifted at the crime scene did not match the defendant’s violated Brady: “The State’s assertion the fingerprint-comparison results were effectively disclosed through the crime-scene report and list of evidence distorts Brady’s requiring prosecutors to offer exculpatory evidence absent a specific request by the defense. . . . Floyd’s Brady claim does not stem from the fingerprints themselves, but from the results of the State’s fingerprint-comparison test. ¶ The State does not demonstrate compliance with Brady’s disclosure requirement by asserting a possibility Floyd could deduce that, based on the general evidence provided to him, additional evidence likely existed. . . . Further, the State’s assertions the evidence was not withheld because Floyd could have conducted his own analysis are in direct contrast to clearly-established Brady law rejecting the defense’s ability to conduct their own analysis as justification for prosecutorial non-disclosure.”); People v. Bueno, 2018 Colo. 4, 409 P.3d 320, 328 (Colo. 2018) (alternative ground) (“The People urge us to follow several federal circuit decisions holding that where evidence is otherwise available through reasonable diligence by the defendant, that evidence is not suppressed under Brady. . . . The Supreme Court has at least twice rejected arguments similar to the People’s assertion that the defense must make reasonable efforts to locate Brady materials.”). “When there are multiple Brady claims, the Supreme Court instructs that we consider materiality ‘collectively.’ . . . We must imagine that every piece of suppressed evidence had been disclosed, and then ask whether, assuming those disclosures, there is a reasonable probability that the jury would have reached a different result.” Browning v. Baker, 875 F.3d 444, 464 (9th Cir. 2017).

In Brady, the evidence improperly suppressed by the prosecution was a co-defendant’s confession that identified the co-defendant as the lone triggerman in a robbery-murder. In United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667 (1985), the Court made clear that “[i]mpeachment evidence . . . as well as exculpatory evidence, falls within the Brady rule,” and thus the Brady doctrine extends to “evidence that the defense might . . . use[ ] to impeach the Government’s witnesses by showing bias or interest.” Id. at 676. Accord, Wearry v. Cain, 136 S. Ct. at 1006-07 (“the rule stated in Brady applies to evidence undermining witness credibility”); Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. at 280; Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. at 433. See also Smith v. Cain, 565 U.S. at 75-76; United States v. Walter, 870 F.3d 622, 629-31 (7th Cir. 2017); Barton v. Warden, 786 F.3d 450, 465-70 (6th Cir. 2015) (per curiam); Lewis v. Connecticut Comm’r of Correction, 790 F.3d 109, 113, 123-24 (2d Cir. 2015); Amado v. Gonzalez, 758 F.3d 1119, 1133-34, 1138-39 (9th Cir. 2014); Johnson v. Folino, 705 F.3d 117, 129-30 (3d Cir. 2013); United States v. Mahaffy, 693 F.3d 113, 130-33 (2d Cir. 2012); In re Stenson, 174 Wash. 2d 474, 488-89, 276 P.3d 286, 293-94 (2012). For example, “Brady requires prosecutors to disclose any benefits that are given to a government informant, including any lenient treatment for pending cases.” Maxwell v. Roe, 628 F.3d 486, 510 (9th Cir. 2010), and cases cited. See also, e.g., Fuentes v. Griffin, 829 F.3d 233, 247 (2d Cir. 2016) (“if the prosecution has a witness’s psychiatric records that are favorable to the accused because they provide material for impeachment, those records fall within Brady principles”). To satisfy the “materiality” standard of Brady and its progeny, the defendant must show that “there is a reasonable probability that the result of the trial would have been different if the suppressed documents had been disclosed to the defense.” Strickler v. Greene, supra, 527 U.S. at 289. “In determining whether ‘there is a reasonable probability’ that the result of the trial would have been different[,] . . . a court must consider ‘the aggregate effect that the withheld evidence would have had if it had been disclosed[’] . . . . In order to determine ‘the aggregate effect’ of the withheld evidence, the court must both ‘add[ ] to the weight of the evidence on the defense side . . . all of the undisclosed exculpatory evidence’ and ‘subtract[ ] from the weight of the evidence on the prosecution’s side . . . the force and effect of all the undisclosed impeachment evidence.’” Juniper v. Zook, 876 F.3d 551, 568 (4th Cir. 2017).

Brady has also been held to apply to prosecutors’ failures to disclose factual information which would support a procedural contention (such as the contention that prosecution evidence was unconstitutionally obtained and therefore required to be suppressed), even though the information does not go to the issue of guilt-or-innocence in the strictest sense. People v. Geaslen, 54 N.Y.2d 510, 516, 430 N.E.2d 1280, 1282, 446 N.Y.S.2d 227, 229 (1981) (“[W]here, as here, there is in the possession of the prosecution evidence of a material nature which if disclosed could affect the ultimate decision on a suppression motion, and that evidence is not disclosed, such nondisclosure denies the defendant due process of law. The failure of the District Attorney in this instance to disclose to the suppression court the Grand Jury testimony of Officer Wheeler (which on its face can only be classified as ‘favorable’ to defendant) to allow the suppression court to make an in camera inspection to determine whether the testimony should be made available to defendant prior to or at the suppression hearing, constitutes a denial of the due process required by the Federal Constitution under the principles of Brady v. Maryland . . . and its progeny.”); Biles v. United States, 101 A.3d 1012, 1020 (D.C. 2014) (“[T]he suppression of material information can violate due process under Brady if it affects the success of a defendant’s pretrial suppression motion. We have described as ‘eminently sensible’ a broad formulation of the government’s Brady obligation that would reach the kind of evidence ‘that would suggest to any prosecutor that the defense would want to know about it,’ . . . . and a rule prohibiting the government from suppressing favorable information material to a Fourth Amendment suppression hearing would impose little if any additional burden on prosecutors and police beyond the obligations that court rules and professional standards already impose.”); United States v. Gamez-Orduno, 235 F.3d 453, 461 (9th Cir. 2000) (dictum) (“The suppression of material evidence helpful to the accused, whether at trial or on a motion to suppress, violates due process if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed, the result of the proceeding would have been different”); Smith v. Black, 904 F.2d 950, 965-66 (5th Cir. 1990), ruling on another issue vacated, 503 U.S. 930 (1992); cf. United States v. McElroy, 697 F.2d 459, 464 (2d Cir. 1982) (Federal Criminal Rule “16(a)(1)(A) requires the government to disclose the substance not only of the incriminating post-arrest oral statements which it intends to use at trial, but also the substance of the defendant’s responses to any Miranda warnings which preceded the statements. Disclosure, to be meaningful, must be made of the defendant’s responses both to the warnings which immediately preceded his admissions and to any other set(s) of warnings given the defendant from arrest onwards. Requiring the government to make such disclosure will bring to light Miranda violations that might otherwise remain hidden because the defendant misunderstands his rights, fails fully to inform defense counsel, or is unable to remember. Disclosure is clearly consistent with the view that pretrial discovery is an important avenue to the protection of defendants’ rights. As prudence and long practice require law enforcement officers to record a defendant's responses to the Miranda warnings, disclosure imposes no significant additional burden on law enforcement agencies. We believe that our interpretation of Rule 16 will, at little cost to effective law enforcement, help to make meaningful in practice the important rights which motivated the Miranda decision.”).

The Brady “rule encompasses evidence ‘known only to police investigators and not to the prosecutor’ . . . [and] therefore, ‘the individual prosecutor has a duty to learn of any favorable evidence known to the others acting on the government’s behalf in this case, including the police.’” Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. at 280-81 (quoting Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. at 437-38). See Youngblood v. West Virginia, 547 U.S. 867 (2006) (per curiam); Barton v. Warden, 786 F.3d at 465; Aguilar v. Woodford, 725 F.3d 970, 982-83 (9th Cir. 2013); State ex rel. Griffin v. Denney, 347 S.W.3d 73, 78 (Mo. 2011) (“Even if the prosecutor was subjectively unaware that a weapon was confiscated from . . . [a suspect other than the defendant], the State is nonetheless under a duty to disclose the evidence. . . . In this case, the murder occurred in prison, and the prison guards were acting on the government’s behalf. Therefore, the State had a duty to discover and disclose any material evidence known to the prison guards.”); McCormick v. Parker, 821 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 2016) (the prosecutor violated Brady by failing to disclose to the defense that the alleged Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner (SANE) who testified for the state at trial “wasn’t certified as a SANE nurse in Texas when she testified” and that she had “misrepresented herself as a certified SANE nurse ‘to patients, court officials and the public’” (id. at 1244); there was no indication that “the prosecutor actually knew about [witness] Ridling’s lapsed credentials” (id. at 1246) but “Ridling was part of the prosecution team for Brady purposes . . . [and] accordingly, we must impute her knowledge of her own lack of certification to the prosecutor” (id. at 1247); and see Carillo v. County of Los Angeles, 798 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 2015). A fortiori, a prosecutor’s duty to learn about exculpatory and impeaching evidence “includes evidence held by other prosecutors;” “knowledge of that evidence is imputed to . . . [the trial prosecutor] under Brady.” Aguilar v. Woodford, 725 F.3d at 982.

“It is well established that the state violates a defendant’s right to due process under Brady when it withholds evidence that is ‘favorable to the defense’ (and material to the defendant’s guilt or punishment). . . . In describing evidence that falls within the Brady rule, the Supreme Court has made clear that impeachment evidence is ‘favorable to the defense’ even if the jury might not afford it significant weight.” Lambert v. Beard, 537 Fed. Appx. 78, 86 (3d Cir. 2013). See also id. at 85-86 (“We further hold that, to the extent the state court determined that the Police Activity Sheet was not exculpatory or impeaching under Brady because it was ambiguous, such determination was an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court precedent.”); Jones v. Medlin, 807 S.E.2d 849, 854 (Ga. 2017) (“The admissibility of the undisclosed material itself is not a prerequisite to finding a Brady violation; the question is whether, had the material ‘been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different,’ in reasonable probability. . . . Thus, ‘inadmissible evidence may be material [under Brady] if it could have led to the discovery of [material] admissible evidence. . . .’”). Compare Turner v. United States, 137 S. Ct. at 1892-95 (finding that undisclosed evidence, which the Government conceded to have been “‘favorable to the accused,’” was not “material” for Brady purposes and therefore did not require the reversal of the defendants’ convictions, because there was no “‘reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed,’” the outcome of the trial “‘would have been different’”; prosecution witness Carrie Eleby’s undisclosed statement to a prosecutor that “she had been high on PCP during a . . . meeting with investigators” essentially duplicated evidence that “the jury heard multiple times about Eleby’s frequent PCP use, including Eleby’s own testimony that she and [prosecution witness Linda] Jacobs had smoked PCP shortly before they witnessed Fuller’s attack,” and “it would not have surprised the jury to learn that Eleby used PCP on yet another occasion”; an undisclosed prosecutorial note reporting that Kaye Porter, “a minor [prosecution] witness,” had “changed her mind about having agreed with Eleby’s claims,” would have added “little . . . [of] significance,” given that Porter was “impeached at trial with evidence about changes in her testimony over time”; although the prosecution failed to disclose a detective’s note that Linda Jacobs “‘vacillated’ [during an interview] about what she saw,” the “jury was . . . well aware of Jacobs’ vacillation, as she was impeached on the stand with her shifting stories about what she witnessed”; the Court explicitly describes its non-materiality holding as “fact-intensive” and as dictated by “‘the context of this trial, with respect to these witnesses’”; and it says that “We of course do not suggest that impeachment evidence is immaterial with respect to a witness who has already been impeached with other evidence,” citing Wearry v. Cain, supra.). “The dispositive question . . . is whether the guilty verdict . . . is worthy of confidence in the absence of the suppressed evidence.” Thomas v. Westbrooks, 849 F.3d 659, 663 (6th Cir. 2017) (in a state-court prosecution, “the State violated . . . [the defendant’s] due process rights as articulated in Brady v. Maryland when the prosecution failed to inform him that . . . [the key prosecution witness] had received $750 from the FBI prior to trial” under the auspices of “‘the Safe Streets Task Force – a joint federal-state working group charged with investigating and prosecuting gang-related crime’” (id. at 661-63)).

Defense counsel should always make a general Brady request in his or her discovery letter to the prosecution (see § 9.05 supra) and in discovery motions (see § 9.07(c) supra). Such a request might be framed in terms such as the following:

any and all materials and information within the possession of the prosecution or law enforcement agents which could constitute evidence favorable to the accused, or which could lead to material favorable evidence, including exculpatory or mitigating matters and any matters that could be used to impeach the prosecution’s evidence or to undermine the prosecution’s case, within the meaning of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963).

In addition, counsel should make particularized requests for any specific items or categories of Brady information that counsel can identify, on the basis of defense investigation, as likely to be in the hands of prosecuting or law enforcement authorities. While the prosecution does not escape its obligation to turn over Brady information when the defense request is “merely a general request” – or even when “there has been no [defense] request at all” – United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. at 106-07; Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. at 280; Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. at 433-34, the chances of reversal of a conviction may be somewhat improved if the prosecution failed to honor a specific Brady request. See United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. at 682-83 (opinion of Blackmun, J.); Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 58 n.15 (1987). See also, e.g., People v. Vilardi, 76 N.Y.2d 67, 71-78, 555 N.E.2d 915, 916-21, 556 N.Y.S.2d 518, 519-24 (1990) (a specific Brady request by defense counsel triggers the enhanced protections afforded by the state constitutional version of the Brady doctrine).

Because Brady and its progeny involved invalidations of convictions in response to post-trial revelations that the prosecutor had failed to disclose information favorable to the accused at any time prior to the conclusion of a trial, they do not speak directly to the requisite timing of Brady disclosures. But their rationale implies that disclosure of Brady material “must be made at such time as to allow the defense to use the favorable material effectively in the preparation and presentation of its case.” United States v. Pollack, 534 F.2d 964, 973 (D.C. Cir. 1976). See, e.g., Fuentes v. Griffin, 829 F.3d at 249-50 (the prosecution’s failure to turn over a psychiatric report about the complainant was prejudicial for a number of reasons including, “importantly, [that] timely disclosure of the [report] . . . would have provided defense counsel with an opportunity to seek an expert opinion with regard to the [report’s] . . . indication of other significant symptoms, in order to establish reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors because of [complainant] G.C.’s predisposition toward emotional instability and retaliation – an opinion he was able to obtain after he eventually learned of the psychiatric record but not in time to present it to the jury”); Blakeney v. State, 236 So.3d 11, 24 (Miss. 2017) (“Because the prosecution’s late disclosure of previously undisclosed witnesses left the defense without adequate time to prepare, we find that a continuance should have been granted”). See also, e.g., AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, Standard 11-2.1(a) (3d ed. 1996) (“Prosecutorial Disclosure”) (disclosure “within a specified and reasonable time prior to trial”). Compare United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622, 625, 631, 633 (2002) (Brady doctrine “does not require the Government to disclose material impeachment evidence prior to entering a plea agreement with a criminal defendant,” given that pre-plea prosecutorial disclosure of “information establishing the factual innocence of the defendant” and other constitutional and systemic protections guard against the risk that “innocent individuals, accused of crimes, will plead guilty”), with State v. Huebler, 275 P.3d 91, 96-98 (Nev. 2012) (“the considerations that led to the decision in [United States v.] Ruiz do not lead to the same conclusion when it comes to material exculpatory information”: “While the value of impeachment information may depend on innumerable variables that primarily come into play at trial and therefore arguably make it less than critical.
information in entering a guilty plea, the same cannot be said of exculpatory information, which is special not just in relation to the fairness of a trial but also in relation to whether a guilty plea is valid and accurate.”; “We are persuaded by language in Ruiz and due-process considerations that a defendant may challenge the validity of a guilty plea based on the prosecution’s failure to disclose material exculpatory information before entry of the plea.”), and Bridgeforth v. Superior Court, 214 Cal. App. 4th 1074, 1077, 1087, 154 Cal. Rptr. 3d 528, 530, 538 (2013) (“applying the traditional three-factor due process analysis utilized in Ruiz . . . [and] the remaining considerations cited in Ruiz” to hold that the due process clauses of the federal and state constitutions require “the prosecution to disclose, prior to the preliminary hearing, evidence in its possession that is both favorable to the defense and material to the probable cause determination to be made at the preliminary hearing”). And, in any event, both prosecutors and judges should be sensitive to the argument that timely pretrial discovery is a better way to run a system than disclosure at trial, with a constitutionally compelled mistrial and continuance, or postconviction litigation of questions of nondisclosure. “[T]he aim of due process ‘is not punishment of society for the misdeeds of the prosecutor but avoidance of an unfair trial to the accused.” Smith v. Phillips, 455 U.S. 209, 219 (1982). This is why, as the Supreme Court noted pointedly in Agurs, “the prudent prosecutor will resolve doubtful questions in favor of disclosure.” 427 U.S. at 108. See also Cone v. Bell, 556 U.S. at 470 n.15 (“Although the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as interpreted by Brady, only mandates the disclosure of material evidence, the obligation to disclose evidence favorable to the defense may arise more broadly under a prosecutor’s ethical or statutory obligations. . . . As we have often observed, the prudent prosecutor will err on the side of transparency, resolving doubtful questions in favor of disclosure.”); Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. at 439-40 (“Unless . . . the adversary system of prosecution is to descend to a gladiatorial level unmitigated by any prosecutorial obligation for the sake of truth, the government simply cannot avoid responsibility for knowing when the suppression of evidence has come to portend such an effect on a trial's outcome as to destroy confidence in its result. ¶ This means, naturally, that a prosecutor anxious about tacking too close to the wind will disclose a favorable piece of evidence. . . . This is as it should be. Such disclosure will serve to justify trust in the prosecutor as ‘the representative . . . of a sovereignty . . . whose interest . . . in a criminal prosecution is not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done.’ . . . And it will tend to preserve the criminal trial, as distinct from the prosecutor's private deliberations, as the chosen forum for ascertaining the truth about criminal accusations.”); Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. at 281 (the Brady doctrine reflects “the special role played by the American prosecutor in the search for truth in criminal trials” and the prosecutor’s interest in ensuring that “‘justice shall be done’” (quoting Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 88 (1935))); Banks v. Dretke, 540 U.S. at 696 (“[a] rule . . . declaring ‘prosecutor may hide, defendant must seek,’ is not tenable in a system constitutionally bound to accord defendants due process.”); Turner v. United States, 137 S. Ct. at 1893 (“Consistent with the[ ] principles [that “the Brady rule’s “overriding concern [is] with the justice of the finding of guilt”” and that “the Government’s “interest . . . in a criminal prosecution is not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done,””], the Government assured the Court at oral argument that subsequent to petitioners’ trial, it has adopted a ‘generous policy of discovery’ in criminal cases under which it discloses any ‘information that a defendant might wish to use.’ . . . As we have recognized, and as the Government agrees, . . . ‘[t]his is as it should be.’”); In re Kline, 113 A.3d 202, 204, 213 (D.C. 2015) (District of Columbia Rule of Professional Conduct 3.8(e), which “prohibits a prosecutor in a criminal case from intentionally failing to disclose to the defense any evidence or information that the prosecutor knows or reasonably should know tends to negate the guilt of the accused,” “requires a prosecutor to disclose all potentially exculpatory information in his or her possession regardless of whether that information would meet the materiality requirements of Bagley, Kyles, and their progeny”).

§ 9.09(b) Other Bases for Constitutional Contentions of Rights to Discovery

The following subparagraphs sketch additional constitutional principles that defense counsel can invoke in developing arguments to support discovery requests for particular kinds of materials or information that are not encompassed – or are only dubiously encompassed – by the Brady doctrine.

§ 9.09(b)(1) The Sixth Amendment Right to Counsel

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel, incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment by Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); see also, e.g., Alabama v. Shelton, 535 U.S. 654, 661-62 (2002) – “a bedrock principle in our justice system” (Davila v. Davis, 137 S. Ct. 2058, 2067 (2017), quoting Martinez v. Ryan, 566 U.S. 1, 12 (2012)) – guarantees more than that the respondent must have a lawyer. It assures “effective aid in the preparation and trial of the case,” Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 71 (1932), and it is violated whenever defense counsel’s performance is inadequate to “ensure that a defendant has the assistance necessary to justify reliance on the outcome of the proceeding.” Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 691-92 (1984); see id. at 685-86; Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374, 387-90 (2005); Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510, 521-22, 524-28, 533, 534-35 (2003); Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 390-91, 395-97 (2000). The Amendment is not solely – or even primarily – an admonition to defense attorneys to do the best job they can under the circumstances. More basically, it invalidates any state-created procedure that compels counsel to operate under circumstances which preclude an effective defense effort. Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. at 71-73; Holloway v. Arkansas, 435 U.S. 475, 481-86 (1978); Holt v. Virginia, 381 U.S. 131 (1965); Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570 (1961); Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972); Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976); Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 344 (1980) (dictum). “[T]he right to the assistance of counsel has been understood to mean that there can be no restrictions upon the function of counsel in defending a criminal prosecution in accord with the traditions of the adversary factfinding process that has been constitutionalized in the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments.” Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 857 (1975). For example, the Sixth Amendment has repeatedly been held to condemn eve-of-trial appointments of counsel that leave the lawyer inadequate time to prepare for trial. E.g., Jones v. Cunningham, 313 F.2d 347 (4th Cir. 1963); Martin v. Virginia, 365 F.2d 549 (4th Cir. 1966); Roberts v. United States, 325 F.2d 290 (5th Cir. 1963); Townsend v. Bomar, 331 F.2d 19 (6th Cir. 1964); People v. Stella, 188 A.D.2d 318, 318-19, 590 N.Y.S.2d 478, 478-79 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1992). See also, e.g., Catalan v. Cockrell, 315 F.3d 491, 492-93 (5th Cir.

261
Routhier v. Sheriff, Clark County, 93 Nev. 149, 151-52, 560 P.2d 1371, 1372 (1977); Blakeney v. State, 236 So.3d 11, 24 (Miss. 2017) (“Because the prosecution’s late disclosure of previously undisclosed witnesses left the defense without adequate time to prepare, we find that a continuance should have been granted”). Timely appointment of counsel was required by Powell v. Alabama, the fountainhead of all right-to-counsel cases, because during the pretrial period “consultation, thoroughgoing investigation and preparation were vitally important.” 287 U.S. at 57. If adequate time to prepare is a constitutional mandate, adequate information to prepare is arguably no less necessary. For, as the Supreme Court has recognized, the pretrial gathering of this information is a vital part of the effective assistance of counsel that the Constitution commands. See Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1, 9 (1970); Adams v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 278, 281-82 (1972); see also Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. at 387 (“The notion that defense counsel must obtain information that the State has and will use against the defendant is not simply a matter of common sense.”); Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. at 522, 524-26, 531-32, 534; Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. at 396; Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. at 690-91.

§ 9.09(b)(2) The Right to Fair Notice of Charges

In Cole v. Arkansas, 333 U.S. 196, 201 (1948), the Supreme Court recognized the “principle of procedural due process . . . that notice of the specific charge, and a chance to be heard in a trial of the issues raised by that charge, if desired, are among the constitutional rights of every accused in a criminal proceeding in all courts, state or federal.” In In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 33-34 (1967), the Court recognized that a juvenile charged with a delinquency offense has the same right to fair notice of the charges as an adult criminal defendant. “These standards no more than reflect a broader premise that has never been doubted in our constitutional system: that a person cannot incur the loss of liberty for an offense without notice and a meaningful opportunity to defend.” Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 314 (1979).

“Notice, to comply with due process requirements, must be given sufficiently in advance of scheduled court proceedings so that reasonable opportunity to prepare will be afforded, and it must ‘set forth the alleged misconduct with particularity.’” In re Gault, 387 U.S. at 33. This principle may – though it probably needs not – be derived from the express right given an accused by the Sixth Amendment “to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation.” See Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 818 (1975) (dictum); Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 856-57 (1975). Even in noncriminal matters the Supreme Court has found a due process right to adequate notice of the issues posed for adjudication in a proceeding affecting individual interests. E.g., Morgan v. United States, 304 U.S. 1 (1938); Gonzales v. United States, 348 U.S. 407 (1955); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 267-68 (1970) (dictum); cf. Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 563-64 (1974); Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565, 578-82 (1975); Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 494-96 (1980); but see Greenholtz v. Inmates of the Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex, 442 U.S. 1, 14 n.6 (1979). A passing dictum in United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 112 n.20 (1976), says that “the notice component of due process refers to the charge rather than the evidentiary support for the charge”; but the line between these two will often be shadowy.
§ 9.09(b)(3) The Sixth Amendment Right to Confrontation

The extent to which the Sixth Amendment right to confrontation governs pretrial discovery is unclear in light of Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39 (1987). The lead opinion in Ritchie, written by Justice Powell, is a majority opinion except on one point: its analysis of the Confrontation Clause. On that point, Justice Powell, with three other Justices concurring, concluded that “the right of confrontation is a trial right” and cannot be “transform[ed] . . . into a constitutionally-compelled rule of pretrial discovery.” Id. at 52. However, three Justices – Justices Brennan and Marshall in dissent, and Justice Blackmun concurring solely in the plurality’s result on this point – concluded that the Confrontation Clause does confer upon the defense a constitutional right to discovery of information that would facilitate effective cross-examination. See id. at 61-62 (Blackmun, J., concurring) (“In my view, there might well be a confrontation violation if, as here, a defendant is denied pretrial access to information that would make possible effective cross-examination of a crucial prosecution witness”); id. at 66 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (“the right of cross-examination . . . may be significantly infringed by . . . the wholesale denial of access to material that would serve as the basis for a significant line of inquiry at trial”; the trial court’s “denying access to the prior statements of the victim . . . deprived Ritchie of material crucial to any effort to impeach the victim at trial . . . [and was] a violation of the Confrontation Clause”). The remaining two Justices, Justices Stevens and Scalia, took no position on the Confrontation Clause issue, concluding that the writ of certiorari should have been dismissed because the lower court’s judgment was not yet final. See id. at 78 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

The elements of a Confrontation Clause argument in support of discovery are set forth in Justice Brennan’s dissent in Ritchie. See 480 U.S. at 66-72. Since the argument has not been rejected by a majority of the Court – and, indeed, was expressly supported by three members of the Court – counsel can continue to press it as a basis for discovery requests. See, e.g., State v. Peseti, 101 Hawai’i 172, 186, 65 P.3d 119, 133 (2003); Commonwealth v. Barroso, 122 S.W.3d 554, 559-60, 561 (Ky. 2003).

§ 9.09(b)(4) The Right To Present Defensive Evidence

The Sixth Amendment guarantees a criminal defendant or juvenile respondent the right “to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor.” In Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39 (1987), a majority of the Court recognized that “[o]ur cases establish, at a minimum, that criminal defendants have the right to the Government’s assistance in compelling the attendance of favorable witnesses at trial and the right to put before a jury evidence that might influence the determination of guilt.” Id. at 56. “[C]onclu[ding] . . . that compulsory process provides no greater protections in this area than those afforded by due process,” the Court elected to analyze the claim solely as a Brady issue, id. at 56; see § 9.09(a) supra, without “decid[ing] . . . whether and how the guarantees of the Compulsory Process Clause differ from those of the Fourteenth Amendment.”
Pending the Court’s resolution of the parameters of the compulsory process right, counsel can argue that the Compulsory Process Clause of the Sixth Amendment, when coupled with the Due Process Clause, confers a right to present defensive evidence (Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95 (1972)) (“The right to offer the testimony of witnesses, and to compel their attendance, if necessary, is in plain terms the right to present a defense, the right to present the defendant’s version of the facts as well as the prosecution’s to the jury so it may decide where the truth lies [quoting Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 19 (1967)]’’); Holmes v. South Carolina, 547 U.S. 319, 324 (2006) (“Whether rooted directly in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or in the Compulsory Process or Confrontation Clauses of the Sixth Amendment, the Constitution guarantees criminal defendants “a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense [quoting Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 690 (1986)].’’”); Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973); see § 33.04 infra, which, in turn, implies a corollary right to pretrial discovery of information in the sole possession of the prosecution that might lead to defensive evidence. Cf. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957); United States v. Augenblick, 393 U.S. 348, 356 (1969) (dictum). See generally Jean Montoya, A Theory of Compulsory Process Clause Discovery Rights, 70 IND. L.J. 845 (1995).

§ 9.09(b)(5) The Right Against Concealment of Evidence That Impeaches Prosecution Testimony

A line of decisions from Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103 (1935), to Miller v. Pate, 386 U.S. 1 (1967), condemns the prosecution’s presentation of perjured testimony. See generally Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 281 & n.19 (1999) (dictum); United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 103-04 (1976) (dictum). Specifically, the Court has held that the Due Process Clause invalidates a state conviction obtained after a trial at which the prosecutor has knowingly elicited false testimony from a witness, even on a matter relating to the witness’s credibility rather than directly to the defendant’s guilt, Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28 (1957), or at which the prosecutor has knowingly permitted the witness to testify falsely on such a matter, Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959). Under Napue, if the prosecution knows of any evidence inconsistent with the testimony of one of its material witnesses and “relevant to his credibility,” the defense and “the jury [are] . . . entitled to know of it.” Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150, 155 (1972). See, e.g., Haskell v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 866 F.3d 139 (3d Cir. 2017); Dow v. Virga, 729 F.3d 1041, 1047-51 (9th Cir. 2013); Guzman v. Secretary, 663 F.3d 1336 (11th Cir. 2011); Sivak v. Hardison, 658 F.3d 898 (9th Cir. 2011). See also Morse v. Fusto, 804 F.3d 538, 541, 547-48 (2d Cir. 2015) (upholding section 1983 relief for a defendant who was “deprived . . . of his constitutional right to a fair trial” as a result of a prosecutor’s and state investigator’s intentional presentation of “false or misleading evidence” to the grand jury in support of an indictment). Cf. Coggins v. Buonora, 776 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2015); Stinson v. City of Milwaukee, 2013 WL 5447916, at *18 (E.D. Wis. 2013), rulings on other issues aff’d in part and appeal dism’d in part, 868 F.3d 516 (7th Cir. 2017 (en banc) (“a police officer who manufactures false evidence against a criminal defendant violates the due process clause if the evidence is later used to deprive the defendant of her liberty in some way’’’); Moore v. Illinois, 408 U.S. 786, 797-98 (1972) (dictum). And see Phillips v. Ornosky, 673 F.3d 1168, 1183-85 (9th Cir. 2012) (“Hayes v.
Brown, 399 F.3d 972 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc) controls this case. . . . In Hayes, as here, the prosecutor had reached a deal with the attorney for a key state witness, James, providing for the dismissal of all felony charges against him . . . if he testified against Hayes at trial. Id. at 977. As in this case, the prosecution elicited a promise from James’s attorney that James would not be informed of the deal, and at trial James testified that he had received no promise of benefits in exchange for his testimony. Id. at 977, 980. As we observed in Hayes, and as is equally applicable here, that a witness may have been unaware of the agreement entered into on his behalf may mean that his testimony denying the existence of such an agreement is not knowingly false or perjured, but it does not mean it is not false nevertheless. As we explained in Hayes: ¶ ‘[T]hat the witness was tricked into lying on the witness stand by the State does not, in any fashion, insulate the State from conforming its conduct to the requirements of due process. . . . The fact that the witness is not complicit in the falsehood is what gives the false testimony the ring of truth, and makes it all the more likely to affect the judgment of the jury. That the witness is unaware of the falsehood of his testimony makes it more dangerous, not less so.’ ¶ . . . In Hayes we made clear in no uncertain terms that the practice of ‘insulating’ a witness from her own immunity agreement so that she can profess ignorance of the benefits provided in exchange for her testimony is an egregious violation of the prosecution’s obligations under Napue.”). It is but a short step to hold that since the whole of every witness’s testimony impliedly asserts its veracity, nondisclosure of any material known to the prosecution that is legally admissible to impeach the witness would also violate due process. Cf. Giles v. Maryland, 386 U.S. 66 (1967). The California Supreme Court, for example, has required disclosure of the felony record of a prosecution witness on this theory. In re Ferguson, 5 Cal. 3d 525, 487 P.2d 1234, 96 Cal. Rptr. 594 (1971). See also State v. Ireland, 11 Or. App. 264, 500 P.2d 1231 (1972).

§ 9.09(b)(6) The Right Against Prosecutorial Suppression of Evidence Favorable to the Defense

The Brady doctrine described in § 9.09(a) supra governs prosecutorial disclosure of evidence favorable to the defense. A closely related, but older and conceptually distinct doctrine prohibits the prosecutor from suppressing such evidence. This right was recognized as an alternative ground of decision in Pyle v. Kansas, 317 U.S. 213 (1942), and Wylde v. Wyoming, 362 U.S. 607 (1960). It is best expounded in United States ex rel. Almeida v. Baldi, 195 F.2d 815 (3d Cir. 1952). See also Soo Park v. Thompson, 851 F.3d 910 (9th Cir. 2017) (“[I]t is well established that “substantial government interference with a defense witness’s free and unhampered choice to testify amounts to a violation of due process.”” Id. at 919. “[W]rongful conduct by prosecutors or law enforcement officers can . . . constitute ‘substantial government interference’ with a defense witness’s choice to testify.” Id. “Detective Thompson contacted Ayala after Park gave notice to the District Attorney of her intention to use Ayala as a defense witness at her criminal trial. During the course of the phone conversation, Thompson told Ayala that ‘John [Gilmore] was really upset about the whole thing because he – he feels like they just made you lose faith in him, I guess.’ . . . [I]t is plausible to infer that Thompson intended to intimidate Ayala, a domestic violence victim, by informing her that Gilmore, her abuser, was ‘really upset’ by her potential testimony.” Id. at 920. “Moreover, Park contends that Thompson’s actual motive in asserting Gilmore’s innocence, Park’s guilt, and the defense team’s dishonesty was to dissuade Ayala from testifying. . . . During the phone call in question, Thompson declared, among other things, that Gilmore was certainly innocent and that Park was in fact the killer: ‘And first, what I want to tell you is that John [Gilmore] is not the killer . . . . But the two people who showed up at your house two weeks ago . . . they are private investigators who were hired by the defense team that is representing the killer [Park] [in] this case.’ Id. at 920-21. “Park further alleges that Thompson made false representations of the evidence against Park, incorrectly stating, for example, that Park ‘left her blood DNA on the door handle.’ Detective Thompson also encouraged Ayala not to ‘believe what they’re [the defense team] saying,’ because they were ‘going to tell every lie they can to try and get [Park] off.’ Thompson described the defense team as ‘private investigators who are hired by [Park’s] defense attorneys to try and shoot holes in – in our prosecution of their – of the bad guy’ and stated that they ‘bent the facts to try to, you know, make you think something else.’ Taken together, the allegations regarding Thompson’s misrepresentation of the evidence against Park, coupled with her statements about Park’s guilt, Gilmore’s innocence, and the defense investigators’ duplicity (as well as her statement that Gilmore was ‘really upset’ with Ayala), can reasonably be interpreted as adequately pleading a deliberate intent on the part of Thompson to intimidate and otherwise attempt to persuade Ayala to refuse to testify on behalf of the defense.” Id. at 921.; Morse v. Fusto, 804 F.3d 538, 541, 543, 547-48 (2d Cir. 2015) (the prosecutor’s and state investigator’s alteration of documents – which were then presented to a grand jury in support of an indictment – to remove exonerating details supported a grant of section 1983 relief for violation of the “‘right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer acting in an investigative capacity’”).

This doctrine is at the heart of the caselaw described in § 8.13 supra, establishing a right to judicial relief when the prosecution suppresses evidence by instructing witnesses not to speak with defense counsel or a defense investigator. The doctrine would also seem to imply a right of defense access to any exculpatory or favorable materials that are within the exclusive control of the prosecutor, such as impounded physical objects. The Supreme Court has recognized that if a police officer or prosecutor, acting in “bad faith,” destroys evidence “potentially useful” to the defense, its destruction violates the accused’s due process rights. See Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51, 57-58 (1988) (dictum); Illinois v. Fisher, 540 U.S. 544, 547-48 (2004) (per curiam) (dictum). Accord, Blakeney v. State, 236 So.3d 11, 27-28 (Miss. 2017) (“Blakeney argues that the ATF reports [regarding electronic evidence obtained from cell phones and discarded by the prosecution] were forensic evidence that did not support the State’s theory that Blakeney had murdered V.V. in order to demonstrate that he was worthy of entry into the Aryan Brotherhood. Moreover, Blakeney contends that in a world that is full of digital photography on cell phones with the ability to share with others, the fact that the cell phone and computer records contained nothing incriminating demonstrates evidence in favor of Blakeney. We find that the prosecutor’s failure to disclose the contents of the ATF reports was in error and in bad faith. Clearly, information on Blakeney’s and Viner’s cell phones and computer potentially could be useful. One of the most monumental defenses that Blakeney presented was an attempt to show that he had pursued membership into the Aryan Brotherhood only after he had been in jail for years and only for protection in prison. Thus, a recent picture of Blakeney without swastika tattoos could have emphasized the defense’s point that Blakeney had not been involved with the Aryan Brotherhood before he went to jail. And, as Blakeney argued, the lack of the presence of any incriminatory evidence would be in Blakeney’s favor, especially in a case with minimal direct evidence against a capital murder suspect. Surely had any mention of anger or gang initiation been present on the ATF reports, the prosecution would have introduced it into evidence. In addition, the prosecutor’s statement that he had engaged in a practice of disposing of exculpatory evidence demonstrates bad faith. Therefore, prosecutorial misconduct also requires reversal in this case.”). State constitutional due process protections may be broader in this regard: As Justice Stevens’ concurring opinion in Fisher notes (540 U.S. at 549 n.*), “[s]ince Youngblood was decided, a number of state courts have held as a matter of state constitutional law that the loss or destruction of evidence critical to the defense does violate due process, even in the absence of bad faith.” See State v. Tiedemann, 162 P.3d 1106, 1115-17 (Utah 2007) (rejecting Arizona v. Youngblood’s “bad faith” requirement on state constitutional grounds); People v. Handy, 20 N.Y.3d 663, 669, 988 N.E.2d 879, 882, 966 N.Y.S.2d 351, 354 (2013) (declining to reach the question of whether to reject Youngblood on state constitutional grounds and instead “resolv[ing] this case, following the approach taken by the Maryland Court of Appeals in Cost v. State, 417 Md. 360, 10 A.3d 184 (2010), by holding that, under the New York law of evidence, a permissive adverse-inference instruction should be given when a defendant, using reasonable diligence, has requested evidence reasonably likely to be material, and when that evidence has been destroyed by agents of the State”). As long as the evidence has not been destroyed but is still in the state’s possession, the language and logic of the Supreme Court’s federal Due Process decisions are clear that “the good or bad faith of the prosecution is irrelevant” and that the prosecution “must disclose material exculpatory evidence.” Illinoi v. Fisher, 540 U.S. at 547. Accurd, Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. at 57.

§ 9.09(b)(7) The Right Against an Unfair Balance of Advantage Favoring the Prosecution

The decision in Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470 (1973), appears to be seminal inasmuch as it recognizes that the Due Process Clause “does speak to the balance of forces between the accused and his accuser.” Id. at 474. See also United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300, 309 (1973), noting the Sixth Amendment’s concern against “the imbalance in the adversary system that otherwise [is], without defense counsel resulted with the creation of a professional prosecuting official.” These decisions suggest that Justice Cardozo’s famous phrase about keeping “the balance true,” Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 122 (1934), may be more than just a jurisprudential attitude: It may be a constitutionally enforceable right of the defense.

Although this notion is still embryonic, two obvious implications of Wardius deserve note. First of all, any criminal procedures that provide “nonreciprocal benefits to the State” in regard to the investigation, preservation, and presentation of its evidentiary case should be constitutionally assailable “when the lack of reciprocity interferes with the defendant’s ability to secure a fair trial.” Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. at 474 n.6. For example, if procedures are available by which the prosecution can detain witnesses or collect and secure other evidence, favorable to its case, then either the prosecution should be obliged equally to collect, secure, and make available witnesses and evidence favorable to the defense, or at least the defense should be given equal use of the procedures. Cf. People ex rel. Gallagher v. District Court, 656 P.2d 1287 (Colo. 1983) (defendant was denied due process when police refused to perform forensic testing requested by defense counsel before testing was rendered impossible by the preparation of the homicide victim’s body for burial); Snyder v. State, 930 P.2d 1274, 1277 (Alaska 1996).

Compare the cases holding that the unnecessary destruction of material evidence in the course of forensic testing by the prosecution, so as to preclude independent testing by defense experts, constitutes a violation of due process (State v. Vannoy, 177 Ariz. 206, 209-12, 866 P.2d 874, 878-80 (Ariz. App. 1993); People v. Gomez, 198 Colo. 105, 596 P.2d 1192 (1979); People v. Garries, 645 P.2d 1306 (Colo. 1982); State v. Blackwell, 245 Ga. App. 135, 137-42, 537 S.E.2d 457, 460-63 (2000); People v. Taylor, 54 Ill. App. 3d 454, 369 N.E.2d 573, 12 Ill. Dec. 76 (1977); People v. Dodsworth, 60 Ill. App. 3d 207, 376 N.E.2d 449, 17 Ill. Dec. 450 (1978); State v. Morales, 232 Conn. 707, 726-27, 657 A.2d 585, 594-95 (1995) (“Like our sister states, we conclude that the good or bad faith of the police in failing to preserve potentially useful evidence cannot be dispositive of whether a criminal defendant has been deprived of due process of law. Accordingly, we, too, reject the litmus test of bad faith on the part of the police, which the United States Supreme Court adopted under the federal constitution in Youngblood [infra]. Rather, in determining whether a defendant has been afforded due process of law under the state constitution, the trial court must employ the Asherman balancing test [referring to State v. Asherman, 193 Conn. 695, 724-26, 478 A.2d 227, 245-47 (1984)], weighing the reasons for the unavailability of the evidence against the degree of prejudice to the accused. More specifically, the trial court must balance the totality of the circumstances surrounding the missing evidence, including the following factors: ‘the materiality of the missing evidence, the likelihood of mistaken interpretation of it by witnesses or the jury, the reason for its nonavailability to the defense and the prejudice to the defendant caused by the unavailability of the evidence.’”); State v. Matafeo, 71 Haw. 183, 187, 787 P.2d 671, 673 (1990) (dictum) (“This court has held that ‘the duty of disclosure is operative as a duty of preservation,’ [and] that principle must be applied on a case-by-case basis,’ . . . ¶ In certain circumstances, regardless of good or bad faith, the State may lose or destroy material evidence which is ‘so critical to the defense as to make a criminal trial fundamentally unfair’ without it.”)) with California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984) (limiting the federal constitutional version of this doctrine to “evidence that both possess[es] an exculpatory value that was apparent before the evidence was destroyed, and [is] of such a nature that the defendant would be unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means,” id. at 489), and Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51, 57-58 (1988), limiting the doctrine to destruction in “bad faith”). If court orders or compulsory process can be issued to assist the prosecution in conducting lineups, fingerprint or handwriting or voice comparisons, or other scientific tests, the results of those investigations must be disclosed to the defense; and judicial process must be made available for the conduct of similar investigations at the instance of the defense, at least to search out “evidence that might be expected to play a significant role in the . . . defense,” California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. at 488. See Evans v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. 3d 617, 522 P.2d 681, 114 Cal. Rptr. 121 (1974); cf. United States v. Ash, 461 F.2d 92, 104 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (en banc) (dictum), rev’d on other grounds, 413 U.S. 300 (1973).
Second, Wardius raises the question to what extent “the State’s inherent information-gathering advantages suggest that if there is to be any imbalance in discovery rights, it should work in the defendant’s favor.” Wardius v. Orgeon, 412 U.S. at 475 n.9. In a case in which counsel can compile a strong record of his or her unsuccessful attempts to obtain important defensive information from the prosecution and his or her equally unsuccessful efforts to acquire the information through independent sources, it may be possible to persuade a court that the traditional plight of the impecunious respondent – going into trial blind in the face of a well-prepared adversary – itself requires the allowance of corrective discovery measures under Wardius.

§ 9.09(b)(8) The Obligation of the Equal Protection Clause That a State Not Permit an Indigent Respondent To Be Deprived of “The Basic Tools of an Adequate Defense” by Reason of Poverty

The equal protection doctrine guaranteeing an indigent respondent “the basic tools of an adequate defense,” Britt v. North Carolina, 404 U.S. 226, 227 (1971) (dictum), is discussed in § 4.31(d) supra and § 11.03(a) infra. One method of compensating for the investigative disadvantage suffered by impoverished respondents, compared to respondents who have money, is to give the defense full discovery of the products of the prosecution’s investigation.

§ 9.10 RESPONSES TO PROSECUTORIAL ASSERTIONS THAT THE INFORMATION THAT THE DEFENSE IS SEEKING IS PRIVILEGED

§ 9.10(a) The “Informer’s Privilege”

The courts have recognized an “informer’s privilege” that empowers the prosecution to conceal the name of a confidential source of information, upon a claim of the privilege by the prosecutor and a representation that disclosure would endanger the prosecution’s interests.

In Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957), the Supreme Court discussed the applicability of the privilege to block a criminal defendant’s request for the name of an informer who appeared, from the trial testimony, to have been a central figure in the narcotics transactions with which the defendant was charged. The Court there required disclosure of the name, concluding “that no fixed rule with respect to disclosure is justifiable. The problem is one that calls for balancing the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual’s right to prepare his defense. Whether a proper balance renders nondisclosure erroneous must depend on the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer’s testimony, and other relevant factors.” Id. at 62. See also United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 870-71 (1982) (dictum); State v. Jackson, 239 Conn. 629, 631-37, 687 A.2d 485, 486-89 (1997); Commonwealth v. Madigan, 449 Mass. 702, 705-11, 871 N.E.2d 478, 481-86 (2007); State v. Florez, 134 N.J. 570, 578-83, 636 A.2d 1040, 1044-46 (1994).
The Court cut back somewhat on the Roviaro doctrine in McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300 (1967), upholding a trial court’s refusal to order disclosure of the name of an informer at a hearing on a motion to suppress tangible evidence, even though the informer’s information was being relied upon to support a warrantless arrest and incidental seizure. However, the diffuseness of the McCray decision makes it difficult to ascertain exactly how much of Roviaro it retracts. Certainly, “McCray does not establish an absolute rule against disclosure,” even at a suppression hearing. State v. Casal, 103 Wash. 2d 812, 817, 699 P.2d 1234, 1237 (1985). “McCray . . . concluded only that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment did not require the State to expose an informant’s identity routinely, upon a defendant’s mere demand, when there was ample evidence in the probable-cause hearing to show that the informant was reliable and his information credible.” Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 170 (1978). Moreover, McCray’s limitations upon Roviaro arguably apply only to informers whose information bears exclusively upon a pretrial search-and-seizure issue and do not affect the Roviaro rules governing informers who have information pertinent to the central trial issue of guilt or innocence. So, for the present, defense counsel would be warranted in continuing to press for the disclosure of informers’ names, both before and at trial, as defensive needs dictate. See, e.g., Sheriff of Washoe County v. Vasile, 96 Nev. 5, 7-8, 604 P.2d 809, 810-11 (1980) (“During cross examination of Officer Douglas at the preliminary examination, defense counsel asked for the name of the person who introduced Officer Douglas to Vasile and who was seated in the car during the purported marijuana sale. The prosecutor’s objection, based on the confidential informant privilege, . . . was sustained. ¶ . . . The informant . . . was apparently the only independent witness who could hear and see the transaction in question. He was a material witness whose identity should have been disclosed. The magistrate’s refusal to require disclosure or dismiss the charges was error.”); Beville v. State, 71 N.E.3d 13, 17 (Ind. 2017) (the trial court erred in upholding a prosecutor’s invocation of the informer’s privilege to bar the defendant from joining defense counsel in viewing “a video recording of a controlled drug buy between . . . [the defendant] and a confidential informant”; even if the State had satisfied its threshold burden of “establish[ing] that the informer’s privilege applies in the first instance” (which the State failed to do “because it is unclear whether the video would actually reveal the informant’s identity”), the state supreme court “find[s] that Beville carried his burden of proving an exception to the privilege because his review of the video was relevant and helpful to his defense”); State v. Chapman, 209 Mont. 57, 679 P.2d 1210 (1984). Of course, the attempt should be made to assimilate the case as much to Roviaro, and to segregate it as much from McCray, as possible. If an informer’s identity is needed both to challenge a search and seizure, for example, and to defend on the guilt issue, a pretrial discovery motion should rest on the latter need.

Even when the informer’s privilege does bar disclosure of an informant’s identity, it does not protect “the contents of a communication [when these] will not tend to reveal the identity of an informer”; nor does it protect the informer at all “once . . . [his or her] identity . . . has been [otherwise] disclosed to those who would have cause to resent the communication.” Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. at 60 (dictum). Its purpose is to prevent the improvident unmasking of government undercover agents. Cf. Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 557-60 (1977). Nothing in the privilege, therefore, precludes inquiry into such matters as a confidential informant’s batting average (see § 23.32(b) infra), or the terms of the informant’s compensation by the government, or the informant’s own guilt of criminal offenses, or the promises of immunity made to the informant to induce him or her to inform. Nor, once an informant is known, does the privilege authorize the prosecution to shield that informant from being interviewed by the defense. When counsel ascertains an informant’s identity and finds that the informant is evading attempts to be contacted and interviewed or when it otherwise appears that s/he may vanish before trial, counsel should not hesitate to seek his or her arrest as a material witness. See § 10.02 infra. Police spies, “special agents,” and undercover informers often are criminals cooperating with the government in return for nonprosecution; they are exceedingly unstable and likely to disappear without a trace; and the prosecution cannot be relied upon to know of their whereabouts. If defense counsel wants to be assured that they will be around at the time of trial, counsel may have no option but to use material-witness procedures to have them jailed. Less aggressive procedures are available (see § 10.08(c) infra) but are not sure-fire.

§ 9.10(b) Work Product

In federal cases, the “work product” doctrine of Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495 (1947), and Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 397-402 (1981), appears to apply to criminal discovery, see United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 236 (1975) (dictum), protecting “the mental processes of the attorney,” 422 U.S. at 238, whether that attorney be the prosecutor or defense counsel, see id. at 238 & n.12; cf. United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 862 n.3 (1982). But see Goldberg v. United States, 425 U.S. 94, 101-08 (1976) (“work product” protection does not bar production at trial of prior statements of government witnesses that are “otherwise producible under the Jencks Act [see § 27.12(a)(1)]” (id. at 108)).

Whether such a limitation of defense discovery is recognized in state criminal cases is, of course, in the first instance a matter of local law. But local law cannot extend “work product” protection to any materials that are constitutionally required to be disclosed to the defense. Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974); cf. Chambers v Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973). Thus, for example, a “work product” privilege could not override the prosecutor’s due process obligation to disclose exculpatory materials and such impeaching information as the existence of promises made by the prosecutor to prosecution witnesses. See § 9.09(a) supra.

§ 9.10(c) Other Claims of Governmental Privilege

It is not uncommon for prosecutors to stonewall defense discovery requests by broad claims of some unspecified privilege to protect “governmental secrets” or “government operations” or the “confidential relations” of government employees. If any privilege of this sort is recognized beyond the scope of the informer’s privilege (§ 9.10(a) supra) and the attorney’s work product doctrine (§ 9.10(b) supra), it is extremely narrow, see, e.g., United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974); Kerr v. United States District Court, 426 U.S. 394 (1976); Schneider v. City of Jackson, 226 S.W.3d 332, 344 (Tenn. 2007) (“the law enforcement privilege has not previously been adopted as a common law privilege in Tennessee and should not be adopted
Part D. Discovery by the Prosecution Against the Defense

§ 9.11 THE PROSECUTION’S RIGHT TO DISCOVERY

Most States have enacted statutes requiring that respondents who intend to employ a defense of alibi or insanity must file a pretrial notice of their intention and inform the prosecution of certain particulars relating to the proposed defense, including the names of witnesses who will be called to prove it. In addition, in many States, statutes confer upon the prosecution a right to obtain discovery from the defense of certain other categories of information such as the names and sometimes statements of intended defense witnesses, reports of defense experts, and tangible evidence. The latter statutes are generally of one or the other of two types: those that give the prosecution affirmative independent discovery rights; and those that give the prosecution reciprocal discovery rights, allowing the prosecutor to obtain certain types of information from the defense if and after the defense has first sought similar information from the prosecution.

Even when discovery by the prosecutor is legislatively authorized, it is “limited . . . by . . . constitutional privileges.” Standefer v. United States, 447 U.S. 10, 22 (1980) (dictum). The limitations imposed by the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination are discussed in § 9.12 infra, and those established by the Sixth Amendment right to counsel in § 9.13 infra.

If counsel is practicing in a jurisdiction that has no statute authorizing prosecutorial discovery, counsel should oppose all discovery motions by the prosecution on the ground that such a radical change from traditional procedures is a matter for the Legislature and should not be ordered by a court without express legislative authority. It is one thing for the judiciary to institute discovery procedures in favor of the defense, inasmuch as these procedures tend to promote constitutional values that are particularly committed to the care of courts. See § 9.09 supra; and see Jencks v. United States, 353 U.S. 657 (1957). It is quite another thing to institute unprecedented procedures in favor of the prosecution – procedures that often raise close constitutional questions and that prosecutors (unlike juvenile respondents) surely have the power to obtain from the Legislature if the Legislature deems those procedures advisable. Cf. United States v. LaSalle National Bank, 437 U.S. 298, 312-13 (1978) (dictum).

§ 9.12 FIFTH AMENDMENT LIMITATIONS UPON PROSECUTORIAL DISCOVERY
When the Court in Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), sustained the constitutionality of an alibi-notice statute, the Court’s Fifth Amendment analysis started from the premise that the defendant intended to present the alibi information at trial. There could be no viable claim of compelled self-incrimination, the Court said, because the choice to adduce or withhold this information was left entirely to the defendant; all the statutory requirement of an alibi notice did was to advance the time of disclosure of material that the defendant had freely elected to spread upon the record at trial in any event. Id. at 83–86. The corollary of this reasoning is that court-ordered disclosure to the prosecution of any potentially incriminating matter that the defense does not intend to produce at trial violates the Fifth Amendment. See Prudhomme v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. 3d 320, 466 P.2d 673, 85 Cal. Rptr. 129 (1970). Indeed, the Supreme Court has impliedly so held several times since Williams. Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972); New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450 (1979); United States v. Doe, 465 U.S. 605 (1984); compare Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981), with Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402, 422–24 (1987), and Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. 596, 600–02 (2014).

No pretrial discovery sought by the prosecution may therefore be ordered that would require the respondent, personally or through counsel, to make any oral or written statement whose contents “would furnish a link in the chain of evidence needed to prosecute the [respondent] . . . for a crime,” Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 486 (1951); see Blau v. United States, 340 U.S. 159, 161 (1950); Maness v. Meyers, 419 U.S. 449, 461 (1975), or that would provide “‘an investigatory lead,’ [or produce] . . . evidence . . . by focusing investigation on [the respondent] . . . as a result of his compelled disclosures,” Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 460 (1972); see also United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27, 40–46 (2000), unless the information which is ordered to be disclosed is either information that the respondent intends to adduce at trial or information that the prosecutor could properly bring out on cross-examination of the respondent in the light of what the respondent does intend to adduce at trial – that is, material “reasonably related to those [subjects that will be] brought out in direct examination” of the respondent, United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 240 (1975), or material constituting proper rebuttal of other defense evidence, see Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. at 422–24; Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. at 600–02, 603.

Ordering the respondent to disclose tangible evidence, on the other hand, would not violate the Fifth Amendment Privilege because, under currently prevailing doctrine, the Privilege forbids only “testimonial self-incrimination” (Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391, 399 (1976)) and accordingly does not extend to the production of physical objects. See Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966) (extracting blood from a drunk-driving suspect for chemical analysis does not violate the Fifth Amendment); United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973) (requiring a suspect to produce handwriting exemplars does not violate the Fifth Amendment); United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973) (requiring a suspect to speak for voice identification does not violate the Fifth Amendment). The Supreme Court has also applied this doctrine to permit compelled production of preexisting writings, Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. at 414, including an incriminated person’s own business records, United States v. Doe, 465 U.S. 605 (1984). See also State v. Diamond, 905 N.W.2d 870 (Minn. 2018) (rejecting a Fifth Amendment challenge to a trial court’s order requiring a defendant to provide a fingerprint to unlock his cellphone, which had been seized pursuant to a warrant authorizing its seizure and the examination of its contents). The Mara-Doe line of cases severely limits but does not completely overrule Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886), insofar as Boyd construed the Fourth and Fifth Amendments as forbidding courts to compel the production of a person’s papers. Boyd is not now good law as to “business records,” United States v. Doe, 465 U.S. at 606; see also Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. at 414; Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463 (1976), but it may survive as a protection of nonbusiness papers (see Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. at 414 (distinguishing Boyd); United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 440 (1976) (same)), or at least of intimate private papers. In cases like Diamond, supra, in which clients are ordered to take physical actions that give authorities access to electronically locked cell phones, counsel should document and emphasize that “[c]ell phones . . . place vast quantities of personal information literally in the hands of individuals” (Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473, 2485 (2014), summarized with additional helpful quotations in § 25.8.2 infra) – a point ignored in the Minnesota Supreme Court’s mechanistic opinion. And there is reason to believe that the Fisher/Miller/Doe line of cases may be reconsidered in the near future. See United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. at 49-56 (Justice Thomas, dissenting, suggesting that the time may be ripe for reinvigoration of Boyd); cf. Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473, 2491 (2014), discussed in § 23.08(b) infra (holding that the Fourth Amendment forbids warrantless searches of cell phones incident to arrest, in large part because “a cell phone search would typically expose to the government far more than the most exhaustive search of a house: A phone not only contains in digital form many sensitive records previously found in the home; it also contains a broad array of private information never found in a home in any form – unless the phone is.”); Carpenter v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2206 (2018) (citing Boyd for the proposition that the Fourth “Amendment seeks to secure ‘the privacies of life’ against ‘arbitrary power’” (id. at 2214); noting that “the Court has drawn a line between what a person keeps to himself and what he shares with others” (id. at 2216); explaining that in United States v. Miller, “Miller had ‘take[n] the risk, in revealing his affairs to another, that the information [would] be conveyed by that person to the Government’” (Carpenter, 138 S. Ct. at 2216); insisting that “this Court has never held that the Government may subpoena third parties for records in which the suspect has a reasonable expectation of privacy” (id. at 2221); and rejecting the notion that “private letters, digital contents of a cell phone – any personal information reduced to document form, in fact – may be collected by subpoena” unconstrained by the Fourth Amendment’s requirement of a search warrant (id. at 2222); Byrd v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1518, 1526 (2018) (“Few protections are as essential to individual liberty as the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. . . . Ever mindful of the Fourth Amendment and its history, the Court has viewed with disfavor practices that permit ‘police officers unbridled discretion to rummage at will among a person’s private effects.’”). Given the uncertain state of the law, defense counsel is warranted in interposing Fourth and Fifth Amendment objections to any prosecutorial discovery request seeking nonbusiness documents whose contents incriminate a respondent.

The Fifth Amendment unquestionably forbids prosecutorial discovery of any document – business or nonbusiness, and whether written by the respondent or by anyone else – when the act of producing that document, as distinguished from the contents of the document, would be incriminating. This is the case whenever (a) the act of production would constitute an admission of the existence or possession of the document, in a context in which such an admission would be probative of the respondent’s guilt, United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. at 36 & n.19; United States v. Doe, 465 U.S. at 612-14; Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. at 410-12 (dictum), or (b) the act of production would constitute an implicit authentication of the document, when such an authentication could be used by the prosecution as part of its case against the respondent, id. at 412-13 & n.12 (dictum); Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. at 473 & n.7 (dictum), or (c) the act of production would open the door to the individual’s being “compelled to take the witness stand and answer questions designed to determine whether he has produced everything demanded by the subpoena,” the “answers [to which] . . ., as well as the act of production itself, may . . . communicate information about the existence, custody, and authenticity of the documents,” United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. at 38-40, 43-45. In these situations, notably, the prosecution cannot avoid the Fifth Amendment objection by foreswearing evidentiary use of the implications arising from the act of production, see United States v. Doe, 465 U.S. at 612-14; if the prosecution could use those implications in any way to make its case against the respondent, then the respondent cannot constitutionally be required to produce.

Similarly, the pretrial discovery of other tangible objects possessed by the respondent whose existence or possession is incriminating, or of information obtained by defense counsel from third parties whose identities or connections with the case could lead the prosecution to incriminating evidence should be forbidden because, whatever the original source of that information may have been, it is now being sought from the respondent through compulsory process addressed to the respondent (compare United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. at 440-45; Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. at 473-77; Couch v. United States, 409 U.S. 322 (1973)) for possible use by the prosecutor in prosecuting the respondent. See People v. Havrish, 8 N.Y.3d 389, 393-97, 866 N.E.2d 1009, 1012-16, 834 N.Y.S.2d 681, 684-88 (2007) (when the defendant in a domestic violence case was ordered by the court to “surrender any and all firearms owned or possessed,” the unlicensed handgun which he surrendered to the police should have been suppressed as a compelled communication in violation of the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination: “the surrender of evidence can be testimonial if, by doing so, defendant tacitly concedes that the item demanded exists or is in defendant’s possession or control when these facts are unknown to the authorities and would not have been discovered through independent means”). Admittedly, United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975), appears to hold that the Fifth Amendment privilege does not cover records of defense interviews with persons other than the accused, at least when those persons are independently available to the prosecution. But Nobles was a case involving the prosecution’s power to secure discovery of portions of a defense investigator’s report after (1) the prosecution had concluded its case-in-chief at trial and (2) the defense had called the investigator to testify concerning interviews with prosecution witnesses. See Corbitt v. New Jersey, 439 U.S. 212, 219 n.8 (1978). In this situation the defense has voluntarily presented evidence about a set of facts; its evidence indicates that the underlying facts are not only already known to the prosecution but also have already been the subject of testimony by prosecution witnesses; and its Fifth Amendment claim is therefore necessarily limited to a contention that a particular recorded version of those same facts is privileged merely because it was made by an agent of the defense other than the accused. Nobles’ rejection of that contention does not imply that a respondent can be compelled by court order to come forward with materials whose existence, possession, or authentication are incriminating unless and until s/he has voluntarily elected to adduce those materials at trial. This compulsion would obviously affront the basic policy of the Self-Incrimination Clause that requires the prosecution “to shoulder the entire load,” Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 460 (1966); compare Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. at 475-76 & n.8.

Counsel should therefore resist, on Fifth Amendment grounds, any and all prosecutorial discovery prior to the time when s/he has had an opportunity to investigate and prepare the defense case; and s/he should insist upon the right to defer decision concerning what s/he will present at trial until s/he has been given ample prior disclosure of the prosecutor’s case to enable counsel to make that decision intelligently. If prosecutorial discovery is ever to be ordered, the respondent has a due process right to reciprocal discovery under Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470 (1973); see also, e.g., Camp v. Neven, 606 Fed. Appx. 322 (9th Cir. 2015); see § 9.09(b)(7) supra; and the decision in Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972), demonstrates that no disclosure may be required of the defense unless (i) prior to the time when the respondent is asked to disclose, (ii) s/he is given a sufficient preview of the prosecutor’s case to make an advised and intelligent decision concerning what, if any, defensive evidence s/he will present at trial. Brooks invalidated a statute requiring that if a defendant was going to testify, s/he must testify before any other defense evidence was presented. That requirement was held to violate the Fifth Amendment on the ground that the constitutional Privilege Against Self-Incrimination forbids forcing the defense to decide whether or not to present the defendant’s testimony before “its value can be realistically assessed,” id. at 610. See also Portuondo v. Agard, 529 U.S. 61, 70 (2000) (discussing Brooks). But surely, if a criminal defendant or juvenile respondent cannot be compelled to decide whether to testify and to “subject himself to impeachment and cross-examination at a time when the strength of his other evidence is not yet clear,” id. at 612 (emphasis added), a defendant or respondent cannot be compelled to furnish the prosecution with information that may be used in any fashion to incriminate him or her – even merely by “focusing investigation on [the respondent] . . . as a result of his compelled disclosures,” Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 460 (1972) – prior to the time when the respondent has been sufficiently informed about the prosecutor’s evidence to decide what defensive evidence will be “necessary or even helpful to his case,” Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. 333, 339 n.9 (1978) (dictum). Under Brooks, such a requirement violates not merely the Fifth Amendment but also the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, “[b]y requiring the accused and his lawyer to make [an important tactical decision regarding the presentation of defensive evidence] . . . without an opportunity to evaluate the actual worth of their evidence.” Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. at 612. See also Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 344 (1980) (dictum).

It is a difficult question whether the Fifth Amendment forbids conditioning defense discovery upon reciprocal disclosures that, if ordered directly, would violate the privilege.
Certainly, when the respondent has a constitutional right to discovery under any of the doctrines identified in § 9.09 supra, the respondent’s enforcement of that right cannot be conditioned upon the waiver of another constitutional right, and in such instances, the reciprocal disclosure requirement would seem to be invalid. Cf. Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 389-94 (1968), reaffirmed in United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 89-90 (1980); Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801, 807-08 (1977); Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. at 607-12. In other cases, however, it is likely that a requirement of reciprocation can be imposed and the defense presented with the choice of both giving and getting or neither.

§ 9.13 “WORK PRODUCT” PROTECTIONS AGAINST PROSECUTORIAL DISCOVERY

When the “work product” doctrine was discussed in § 9.10(b) supra in connection with defense discovery of prosecutorial files, it was explained that the prosecution’s ability to use the “work product” privilege to insulate its files from defense discovery is initially a matter of state law. However, when the issue is one of whether defense files are “work product,” the issue assumes constitutional dimension. The function of the “work product” doctrine is to provide “a privileged area within which [the attorney] . . . can analyze and prepare his client’s case,” United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 238 (1975), in order to “assure the thorough preparation and presentation of . . . the case” (id.); and the Sixth Amendment countenances “no restrictions upon the function of counsel in defending a criminal prosecution in accord with the traditions of the adversary factfinding process,” Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 857 (1975). The Sixth Amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel (described and documented in § 9.09(b)(1) supra) therefore arguably requires “work product” protection of defense counsel’s trial preparation, in addition to whatever “work product” protection it is given by state law. The Nobles case holds nothing to the contrary, although it does permit limited prosecutorial discovery of a defense investigator’s report after the defense has presented the investigator’s testimony at trial and thereby waived both the “work product” and Sixth Amendment protections. See United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. at 240 n.15.

The “work product” doctrine is primarily designed to shield materials that reveal an attorney’s analyses and assessments of the case, including evaluations of potential witnesses. For this reason, it is particularly protective of counsel’s own summaries of oral statements of witnesses, as distinguished from written or transcribed statements of witnesses or even defense investigators’ reports reflecting the oral statements of witnesses. See Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 399-402 (1981). In the case of witnesses whose testimony will be favorable to the defense – as distinguished from potential prosecution witnesses (see §§ 8.11-8.12 supra) – counsel may wish to increase the likelihood of avoiding prosecutorial discovery by taking oral statements instead of written statements from witnesses and by including appropriate evaluative matter in his or her writeups of those statements. See § 8.10 supra. Counsel can obtain maximum protection by (a) refraining from taking written statements from these witnesses; (b) instructing defense investigators to take only oral statements from these witnesses and to report their contents orally to counsel; (c) personally interviewing witnesses whose information promises to be favorable; (d) summarizing counsel’s interviews of these witnesses in a way that melds the witnesses’ own words with counsel’s observations of the credibility and potential uses of the witnesses’ statements; (e) coding these summaries as suggested in the concluding paragraph of § 5.05 supra so as to enable counsel – but not a judge who may later inspect the summary in camera on a prosecution motion for discovery – to distinguish passages that are unmarked direct quotations of the witness from passages that are counsel’s commentaries; (f) collecting the summaries of information gotten from two or more witnesses in a single document (or in several documents, each of which contains information from more than a single witness) in which counsel connects the several witnesses’ statements and relates them to the defense theory of the case (see § 6.02 supra); and (g) captioning the document[s] “strategy memorandum.” Anything that discloses counsel’s “litigating strategies [is not] . . . the subject of permissible inquiry by his opponent . . .” (United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 862 n.3 (1982) (dictum)). Counsel can consult these memoranda while preparing defense witnesses to testify (see § 10.09 infra) but should not give them to the witness to read.
Chapter 10

Preparing for a Motions Hearing or Trial:
Selecting, Subpoenaing and Preparing Defense Witnesses; Preparing Real or Demonstrative Evidence

Part A. Selecting and Subpoenaing Witnesses

§ 10.01 SELECTION OF WITNESSES FOR A MOTIONS HEARING OR TRIAL

The principal criterion in selecting witnesses for an evidentiary motions hearing (such as a suppression hearing) or for trial is whether a witness has something to say that materially supports the theory of the defense. Although counsel’s search for sources of proof must be wide-ranging, counsel must be highly selective in what s/he actually puts on at the motions hearing or trial. It is vital that the evidence be tightly organized so that the defense theory will come across in a cohesive presentation.

A second, almost equally important criterion in selecting witnesses is whether the witness will improve or depreciate the atmosphere of the defense. To some extent a respondent is identified with his or her witnesses by the judge (and even more so by jurors, in those jurisdictions that permit jury trials in juvenile cases). This makes the demeanor of defense witnesses critical – their apparent honesty, sound judgment, equanimity, and likeableness. A personable witness might be called to testify cumulatively on a minor point, whereas a shifty or abrasive witness would not be similarly used.

An important consideration in selecting witnesses is whether the witness has prior convictions that are admissible under the impeachment doctrines described in § 30.07(d) infra. Disclosure that a defense witness has a criminal record can seriously damage not only the witness’s believability but the tone of the defense. Counsel should never put a witness on the stand without knowing whether the witness has a criminal record and without having evaluated the possible prejudice to the defense if it is used to impeach the witness. Every prospective witness must be asked whether s/he has ever been arrested or charged with any criminal offense and what was the disposition of the arrest or charge. To make the investigation complete and the inquiry as little embarrassing as possible, counsel should ask about “any sort of arrest or criminal charge, big or little, including traffic violations and juvenile court matters.” Counsel can reduce the witness’s embarrassment by explaining that s/he always asks this question “because lots of people have some sort of criminal charge made against them at some time.” After counsel has obtained the witness’s complete record, s/he can tell the witness (if this is the case under local practice) that juvenile convictions, traffic offenses, other minor convictions, and arrests that did not result in conviction cannot be brought out by either party in court.

§ 10.02 THE NEED TO SUBPOENA DEFENSE WITNESSES AND KEEP TRACK OF THEM UNTIL THE TRIAL DATE
Once counsel has selected whom to use as witnesses at the motions hearing or trial, counsel will then need to: (i) subpoena the witnesses to the hearing or trial; and (ii) keep in close touch with the witnesses until the hearing and trial have taken place.

Counsel should always subpoena defense witnesses rather than depend upon them to show up voluntarily at the hearing or trial. In the event that the witness fails to show up (either intentionally or inadvertently), counsel probably will be unable to obtain a continuance (see §§ 10.07, 15.02 infra) unless s/he can represent to the court that the witness is under subpoena. Similarly, in the very rare case in which counsel elects to respond to a no-show by requesting a bench warrant (see § 10.07 infra), that remedy will be unavailable unless the absent witness was under subpoena.

One of the most delicate aspects of subpoena practice is explaining to a witness who wants to be helpful why s/he is being subpoenaed when s/he has already told counsel that s/he is willing to come to court voluntarily. Counsel should treat the witness’s good faith and reliability as a given and should explain simply that if some unanticipated factor such as major illness prevents the witness from coming to court, counsel needs to be able to honestly tell the judge that the witness is under subpoena in order to obtain a continuance. In jurisdictions in which witnesses receive witness fees or mileage allowances from the court upon showing the subpoena that they received, counsel can also explain that the subpoena is necessary in order for the witness to be paid.

If a person who is expected to be called as a prosecution witness also has certain information that is necessary to the defense case, counsel should serve a defense subpoena upon the witness rather than relying on the prosecution to bring the witness to court. Otherwise, if the prosecutor decides that the witness is more helpful to the defense than to the prosecution, the prosecutor can excuse the witness from coming to court. Even if the witness appears to be an essential part of the prosecution’s case, the prosecutor may respond to the witness’s failure to appear by deciding to go forward with the other prosecution witnesses rather than risk a dismissal on speedy-trial grounds; if this occurs and the witness is not under defense subpoena, defense counsel will be forced to go to trial without the witness.

Even after a witness has been subpoenaed, counsel will need to keep in close touch with the witness until s/he has testified at the motions hearing or trial. A subpoena will be of little use if, by the time of the hearing or trial, the witness has moved to a new location and cannot be found. For this reason counsel (or his or her investigator) should always elicit from witnesses whom they interview the witness’s home and work addresses, telephone numbers, e-mail and e-text contact information, any plans to move or to be away from home base in the foreseeable future, and the names of persons through whom the witness can be contacted when s/he is not directly reachable. See § 8.08 supra. Once counsel has decided to use a witness at a hearing or at trial, the witness should be given counsel’s telephonic and electronic contact information and told to be in touch with counsel in the event of any change of residence or any trip out of town.
the witness is crucial and appears geographically unstable, it may be wise for counsel to call the witness at reasonable intervals during the pretrial period. This assures that the witness will not be gone long before s/he is missed by counsel, and that counsel can take up pursuit while the trail is fresh. Even after a witness has testified, counsel should keep the same tabs on him or her until the hearing or trial is completed. S/he may need to be recalled for unpredictable reasons.

If a witness is leaving the jurisdiction, if the witness’s health is bad, or if s/he may be unavailable at trial for any other reason, counsel should consider whether the risk of losing the testimony warrants taking the witness’s deposition, notwithstanding the creation of a transcript that can be used by the prosecutor in impeaching the witness if s/he ends up testifying. Local statutory procedures for the taking of depositions to preserve testimony must be consulted. (Frequently these will be codified only in codes of civil procedure, but an examination of their terminology will usually disclose that they are applicable in delinquency cases as well.) In the case of hostile witnesses whom counsel has reason to believe may flee, hide out, or avoid service of a subpoena, an application to the court for their arrest as material witnesses may be advised. Most jurisdictions have statutes that authorize the detention of material witnesses and that can be invoked by the defense as well as the prosecution. When material-witness procedures are limited by law or practice to the prosecutor’s use, defense counsel should invoke them anyway and argue that such a limitation is unconstitutional within the principles of § 9.09(b)(7) supra.

§ 10.03 TYPES OF SUBPOENAS; PERSONS SUBJECT TO SUBPOENA

A witness subpoena (technically known as a subpoena ad testificandum) can be issued to any person in the jurisdiction who has testimony relevant to the case. Under local practice an expert witness may be immune from subpoena to testify solely as an expert on matters of his or her professional expertise, but s/he is not immune from process when s/he has factual information that is pertinent to a proceeding. For this reason counsel may ordinarily subpoena government doctors and psychiatrists, for example, when they have examined the respondent in a detention facility or in a state hospital. Counsel may also subpoena police laboratory personnel, medical examiner’s personnel, the complainant’s physician (who will have to appear and claim the doctor-patient privilege if s/he seeks to be excused from answering specific questions on that account), and the like.

If counsel needs a witness who is involuntarily confined in a prison or hospital, counsel must apply to the court for a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum. The writ directs the custodian of the confining institution to produce the witness for trial. In some cases a judge will also issue the writ to bring a witness to a place at which counsel can conveniently interview him or her. Issuance of the writ is ordinarily discretionary, and courts require some showing of the materiality of the witness’s testimony. For discussion of the steps counsel can take to avoid disclosing defense facts and strategy when making the required showing, see § 10.05 infra.

The uses and occasions for subpoenas commanding the production of documents and records (technically known as subpoenas duces tecum) are summarized in § 8.17 supra.
§ 10.04 PROCEDURES FOR OBTAINING SUBPOENAS

Subpoenas are ordinarily obtained from the office of the clerk of the court. Although issued in the name of the judge or the court, they customarily are filled out – or handed out in blank for counsel’s completion – by the clerk or a deputy clerk, without action of the judge.

In some jurisdictions, forma pauperis subpoenas may be issued only by leave of court, granted upon motion. (A motion may be required even after the court has issued a general order designating the respondent as indigent and entitled to state-provided defense counsel.) The prosecution may appear and oppose the motion unless defense counsel submits it ex parte. (An indigent’s rights to cost-free compulsory process are discussed in the following section, § 10.05, together with the procedure for seeking in camera consideration of defense motions for the issuance of such process.) In the case of paid subpoenas, objections must ordinarily be raised ex post, by a motion to quash the subpoenas, made by the person subpoenaed or by the party adverse to the litigant who has procured issuance of the subpoena, after the subpoena has been served.

Subpoenas may be quashed on various grounds covered by local practice, including improper service, ignorance on the part of the subpoenaed person of any matter relevant to the proceedings, lack of jurisdiction or statutory authority of the court to issue the subpoena, and a few kinds of privilege, such as a legislator’s immunity from civil process during a legislative session (see, e.g., State v. Beno, 116 Wis. 2d 122, 138, 341 N.W.2d 668, 676 (1984)). (Most evidentiary privileges, however, do not immunize witnesses from being subpoenaed to appear or from being called to the stand; they operate only to prohibit specific questions that could produce privileged information.) In some jurisdictions, an alternative procedure for resisting a subpoena is to have the subpoenaed person appear and refuse to be sworn.

Prosecutors will sometimes move ex parte for the quashing of defense subpoenas directed to government informers, officers or employees, and courts have been known to grant the motion without notice, leaving defense counsel uninformed until the time of trial that it has been granted. If counsel suspects that the prosecutor may resist a subpoena directed to a witness allied in interest with the prosecution, counsel should inform the prosecutor a few days before trial that the witness has been subpoenaed (a fact which the prosecutor doubtless already knows) and that the witness’s presence at the trial is particularly wanted by defense counsel. In this fashion, if the witness does not appear by reason of some secret or last-minute maneuvering by the prosecutor, counsel is in a position to be rightfully indignant over the prosecution’s lack of candor when, at trial, the defense makes its motion for a bench warrant (§ 10.07 infra), continuance (§ 15.02 infra), or mistrial (§ 34.11 infra), as may seem appropriate.

§ 10.05 RIGHT TO PROCESS AT PUBLIC EXPENSE WHEN THE RESPONDENT IS INDIGENT

As the Supreme Court has observed, the Compulsory Process Clause of the Sixth Amendment “establish[es], at a minimum, that criminal defendants have the right to the Government’s assistance in compelling the attendance of favorable witnesses at trial.”
Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 56 (1987). When the respondent is an indigent, the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment doubtless requires the issuance of subpoenas for material defense witnesses at public expense. See § 4.31(d) supra; see also § 11.03(a) infra.

The procedure for obtaining subpoenas in forma pauperis is not problematic in most jurisdictions. Often the court clerk’s office routinely issues subpoenas at public expense in cases of indigents. In some jurisdictions, although local rules technically require an affidavit by counsel showing “good cause” or “materiality,” custom permits these affidavits to be filled out with boilerplate language tracking the statute or court rule.

In other jurisdictions, however, factually detailed documentation is demanded, and this requirement poses the very serious hazard of alerting the prosecution to the projected defense. In such jurisdictions counsel should prepare an affidavit making the requisitely detailed showing (see United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 867 n.7 (1982) (dictum)), seal the affidavit, and file it with a motion asking that the court receive it in sealed form and consider it in camera, without disclosure to the prosecutor, on the ground that it reveals an aspect of defense trial strategy. (This procedure should be followed even in jurisdictions that purportedly provide for ex parte submissions, if the reality of the practice is that prosecutors regularly obtain access to the supposedly confidential documents filed by the defense.) If the sealing motion is denied, counsel should move to dismiss all charges against the respondent because of its denial and then either refuse to make the required factual averments or make them under objection (depending on whether s/he can practicably afford to go to trial without the witness) on the ground that the respondent’s rights under the Compulsory Process Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the federal Constitution (see Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14(1967)), the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, and parallel state constitutional guarantees are infringed if an indigent is obliged to disclose his or her defensive case in a way that a respondent with money is not, as the precondition of obtaining compulsory process. See § 9.09(b)(4) supra and § 11.03(b) infra.

§ 10.06 MECHANICS OF SERVING SUBPOENAS

Counsel will need to check the local rules for service of process, which may be in the juvenile statute, the criminal procedure statutes, or the civil procedure statutes. In most jurisdictions the rules specify that service is valid only if the subpoena is served personally rather than by mail, and only if served within a certain geographic area. The rules often also establish a deadline, in terms of the number of days before trial when the subpoena must be served. In some jurisdictions the rules require that transportation fees be tendered to the witness at the time of service of the subpoena.

If possible, counsel should always arrange for service of the subpoena by a private process server rather than by the marshal, a sheriff, a police officer, or other law enforcement personnel. There are seldom any practicable means for preventing these government agents from informing the prosecutor about the identity and location of witnesses to whom defense subpoenas have been directed.

In many jurisdictions the rules specify that the process server must fill out an affidavit of service. Even if the rules contain no such requirement, it is good practice to obtain an affidavit of service from the process server and retain it in counsel’s file, in case any question arises about the date, exact time, and location of service.

§ 10.07 REMEDIES IF A SUBPOENAED WITNESS FAILS TO APPEAR

Technically, the remedy when a subpoenaed witness fails to appear is for counsel to request the issuance of a bench warrant (or attachment, or capias) to have the witness arrested and brought into court by the marshals.

In actuality, it will be the rare case when counsel requests a bench warrant for a defense witness. Quite obviously, a witness who is dragged into court in handcuffs will not be an eager or friendly witness. Although the witness can be compelled to testify under threat of contempt, the result may be that the witness will shape his or her testimony so as to cast the respondent in the most unfavorable and damaging light.

Accordingly, if a crucial witness fails to appear, counsel should seek a continuance. See § 15.02 infra; and see, e.g., Lee v. Kemna, 534 U.S. 362 (2002). Counsel should offer to make an ex parte proffer in support of the continuance motion, with the witness’s name and the substance of his or her testimony. (The reason for proceeding ex parte is to avoid providing the prosecutor with notice of defense strategy and with impeachment material in case the witness subsequently appears or is found.) This proffer is necessary for the appellate record in the event that the judge denies the request. In most jurisdictions counsel will need to represent to the court that the witness is under subpoena; in some jurisdictions it will be necessary to call the process server to testify that the witness was, in fact, subpoenaed.

The rare circumstances in which counsel might seek issuance of a bench warrant for a witness are when: (i) counsel’s best efforts to locate the witness or to persuade the witness to come to court have proved futile, and a bench warrant is the only alternative; or (ii) the witness is already as hostile as s/he can be, and counsel will be able to extract the desired testimony from the witness on the stand regardless of his or her belligerence.

A refusal by the court to direct the issuance of process or an attachment or to grant a defense continuance requested because of the failure of a properly subpoenaed witness to appear ordinarily is not appealable interlocutorily. If the refusal happens in the course of a protracted trial, it may be possible to ask an appellate court for a writ of mandamus to compel the trial judge to act. See Chapter 26. The ordinary method of review, however, is upon appeal from the final judgment of conviction. As previously explained, counsel should establish a record for that appeal by making a detailed ex parte proffer of what the nonappearing witness would have testified. If the judge refuses to permit an ex parte proffer, the substance of the witness’s testimony should be stated in very general terms. Counsel should then renew the request at the close of defense testimony, this time reciting in detail what the witness would have testified had s/he appeared. Counsel should also submit a written declaration or affidavit setting out this detail in support of a motion for a new trial. See §§ 37.02-37.02(a) infra. The affidavit should be made by the witness if s/he has become available to counsel before the deadline for a new-trial motion; otherwise, it can be made by counsel or counsel’s investigator.

§ 10.08 SPECIAL ASPECTS OF SUBPOENA PRACTICE NECESSITATED BY THE MISSING-WITNESS DOCTRINE

§ 10.08(a) The Missing-Witness Doctrine

The missing-witness doctrine allows the finder of fact (whether jury or judge) to treat a party’s failure to call a witness as giving rise to an inference that the witness’s testimony would have been unfavorable to that party if (1) the witness is peculiarly available to that party, and (2) the witness is shown to have knowledge of facts pertinent to the issues being tried, and (3) the witness’s information would not be merely cumulative or inconsequential. The trial judge must make a factual finding that these three predicate circumstances exist in order to bring the doctrine into play. See, e.g., Simmons v. United States, 444 A.2d 962 (D.C. 1982); Dansbury v. State, 193 Md. App. 718, 1 A.3d 507 (2010); Commonwealth v. Crawford, 46 Mass. App. Ct. 423, 706 N.E.2d 1141 (1999). In a jury trial, once the finding is made, the judge will instruct the jury on the inference, and counsel may refer to it in closing argument. See, e.g., People v. Fuqua, 122 A.D.3d 1249, 996 N.Y.S.2d 410 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2014). Cf. People v. Thomas, 21 N.Y.3d 226, 230-31, 991 N.E.2d 200, 203, 969 N.Y.S.2d 426, 429 (2013). In a bench trial either side can ask the judge to use this inference in his or her decision-making on the issue of guilt or innocence.

A missing-witness inference can be a powerful tool in closing argument. Local practice varies concerning whether, if an adequate basis for the missing-witness charge is not laid, counsel is permitted to argue from the failure of the other side to call a witness. See, e.g., People v. Thomas, 21 N.Y.3d at 230-31, 991 N.E.2d at 203, 969 N.Y.S.2d at 429 (“a lawyer who has not sought a missing witness instruction ‘may nonetheless try to persuade the jury to draw inferences from the People’s failure to call an available witness with material, noncumulative information about the case’”’; “a request for a missing witness instruction” is not “a prerequisite to a missing witness argument,” and “counsel ha[s] no obligation to make an offer of proof as a predicate for a missing witness argument.”).

Some jurisdictions have restricted the prosecutor’s ability to obtain a missing witness charge against the defense. See, e.g., Harris v. State, 458 Md. 370, 182 A.3d 821 (Md. App. 2018) (discussing the “growing number of jurisdictions [that] have limited the use of a missing witness instruction in criminal cases, at least to the extent that it would allow an adverse Inference based on the failure of a defendant to call a witness” (id. at 394-95, 182 A.3d at 836), and declaring that a trial court “should rarely – if ever” give “a missing instruction at the behest of the prosecution against the defendant” because such a judicial endorsement of “the particular inference that the prosecutor asks the jury to draw against the defendant . . . may be at odds with the constitutional principles that govern a criminal case.” (id. at 377, 182 A.3d at 825); State v. Hill, 199 N.J. 545, 566, 974 A.2d 403, 416 (2009) (holding that a missing witness charge “generally should not issue against criminal defendants” because such a “charge from the court risks improperly assisting the State in its obligation to prove each and every element of a charged crime beyond a reasonable doubt”). In such jurisdictions, the prosecution may still be able to comment in closing argument on the defense’s failure to call a witness. Compare Harris v. State, supra, 458 Md. at 377, 182 A.3d at 825 (“a prosecutor may legitimately urge the jury to draw an inference adverse to the defendant under the missing witness rule” as long as the judge does not “endorse that element of the prosecutor’s argument” by giving a missing witness charge) with Ross v. State, 106 Nev. 924, 927, 803 P.2d 1104, 1105 (1990) (per curiam) (“It is generally . . . outside the boundaries of proper argument [for a prosecutor] to comment on a defendant’s failure to call a witness. . . . This can be viewed as impermissibly shifting the burden of proof to the defense.”).

§ 10.08(b) Subpoenaing Defense Witnesses To Avoid a Missing-Witness Inference Against the Defense

Unless counsel is practicing in a jurisdiction that has foreclosed the prosecution from using a missing witness inference against the defense (see § 29.4.7.1 supra), counsel should take precautions to guard against the prosecution’s use of the inference. Counsel should review his or her evidence prior to trial, noting whether there are witnesses (i) whom s/he has been unable to locate or does not plan to call and (ii) who will appear from the trial testimony either (A) to have material evidence helpful to the defense if the defense version of the facts is true (for example, a person who, respondent will testify, was with the respondent at some other place at the time of the offense) or (B) to have witnessed events relating to the offense and to be allied in interest with the defense (for example, respondent’s brother who was with the respondent at the time of the episode giving rise to the charge). Counsel should subpoena these persons. If they are served and appear, s/he can tender them to the prosecutor. If they cannot be served or do not appear, s/he can inform the court and the prosecutor that s/he has served the witness or attempted to serve the witness, as the case may be. Counsel should have the process server prepared to testify that service was made or that diligent unsuccessful efforts to find the witness were made, and counsel should proffer the process server’s testimony to this effect. The defense has now achieved the maximum possible protection against a missing-witness instruction or inference. See, e.g., United States v. Burgos, 579 F.2d 747, 750 (2d Cir, 1974) (“The district court did not err in refusing to give a ‘missing witness’ instruction as to the informant . . . , who was made available to defense counsel both for interview and for testimony”). But see People v. Hall, 18 N.Y.3d 122, 130-31, 960 N.E.2d 399, 403-04, 936 N.Y.S.2d 630, 634-35 (2011) (under New York law, the proffering of a witness to the other side’s counsel does not rebut the basis for a missing witness inference because “the common-sense inference that a [party’s] failure to call a seemingly friendly witness suggests some weakness in a party’s case . . . is not rebutted when the opposing party chooses not to call the same witness – a witness who, by definition the opposing party would expect to be hostile”).

In some cases, when the prosecutor is denying the existence of a person whom the respondent claims was with the respondent at the time of the offense and when the process server has found verification of the existence of such a person in the course of unsuccessful efforts to locate him or her, defense counsel may want to call the process server to testify. In this situation the avowed purpose of the testimony is to show vigorous efforts to locate the missing person in order to rebut any negative inference from that person’s absence, and hearsay reports about the person that the process server attempted to follow up are admissible to prove the extent of the process server’s efforts. Incidentally, these reports tell the factfinder that the person does exist.

Of course, if bringing a particular witness into the case is going to give the prosecutor something s/he can use advantageously and does not already have, counsel may well prefer to risk a missing-witness inference rather than to issue a subpoena.

§ 10.08(c)  Laying a Foundation for a Missing-Witness Inference Against the Prosecution

The missing-witness instruction is often refused if the party requesting it appears to have had ample opportunity to subpoena the witness, since the witness is not then thought to be uniquely available to the opposing side. Therefore, if counsel’s investigation identifies an individual who would appear able to help the prosecution’s case but whom counsel cannot locate or whom counsel knows the prosecution is not going to call, counsel will often want to have that person subpoenaed and to be prepared to prove the unsuccessful diligent efforts of a process server to find the person. This will lay the basis for a defense request that the missing-witness charge be given against the prosecution. In connection with police spies, informers, “special agents,” and other similar marginal and transitory police characters, counsel should both issue subpoenas and write the prosecutor at an early stage of the investigation, asking the prosecutor to make certain that the police know the whereabouts of the witness, so that s/he can be available for trial. Frequently s/he will disappear, and counsel is then in a position to request a missing-

Part B. Preparing Defense Witnesses To Testify
§ 10.09 TECHNIQUES OF WITNESS PREPARATION

The work of preparing a witness to testify is different from that of interviewing a witness to discover facts. Whereas investigative interviews involve striking up a congenial relationship and encouraging expansiveness that produces free-roaming narration by the witness, trial preparation focuses on what specific pertinent testimony the witness has to offer and on how to present it most effectively.

§ 10.09(a) Reviewing the Facts and Trial Procedure with the Witness

Counsel should review the facts previously ascertained from this witness and others, point out any discrepancies or unclarities, and have the witness resolve them to the extent that they are truthfully resolvable. It is not necessary, or even desirable, that all defense witnesses come into trial with the same “pat” story. But no defense witness should be permitted to testify without awareness of the points at which his or her testimony diverges from that of other known witnesses or without a plausible explanation for the divergence.

Counsel should explain the general theory of the defense to each witness and demonstrate the witness’s role and exact place in this defense. Trial procedures, including the purposes and methods of direct, cross, and redirect examination, and objections, should also be explained. The atmosphere of court must be demystified as much as possible so that the witness will be at ease when s/he arrives for the trial. If a particularly important defense witness is showing signs of excessive nervousness, it may be wise for counsel to take him or her to court to observe the examinations of witnesses in another trial, a week or so before the client’s, choosing a case that is likely to proceed routinely, without explosive drama.

§ 10.09(b) Instructions to the Witness About Demeanor and Dress

The witness should be instructed (i) not to answer any question unless s/he understands it but simply to say that s/he does not understand the question if s/he does not (many witnesses do not realize that this is appropriate or even permissible behavior in court), and (ii) to give answers that are true to the best of the witness’s knowledge rather than trying to guess and say what would be a favorable answer from the defense standpoint.

The importance of the overall impression created by the witness’s conduct in the courtroom (both on the stand and off) should be mentioned, and counsel should discuss with the witness how the witness can make the best impression. (This may be different for different witnesses. In some cases it is desirable for the witness to appear serious and businesslike; in some cases, relaxed and easy-going; in some cases, nervous or upset. Counsel cannot ethically or practically teach a witness to act in ways that dissimulate but can and should assist the witness to perceive and control aspects of the witness’s demeanor that may convey undesired messages.)

It is ordinarily wise for counsel to suggest to the witness how s/he should dress for court and, if practicable, to ask the witness to come to a pretrial interview dressed as s/he will dress when s/he testifies. (Admonitions to some witnesses to “dress well” or “dress casually” may produce results that amaze – and horrify – counsel; it is best for counsel to see in advance what the witness thinks these admonitions mean.) For witnesses who are regular church-goers, an instruction to dress “as if they were going to church” will produce the effect that counsel wishes.

§ 10.09(c)  The Dry Run of the Witness’s Testimony

Counsel should ordinarily engage every witness in a thorough “dry run” of direct, cross, and redirect examination, asking every question that counsel intends to ask in court or foresees that the cross-examiner may ask.

If counsel’s questions are not bringing out the desired answers, they should be changed and that portion of the examination should be rerun until both counsel and the witness are satisfied with it. Counsel will often find it useful to ask for the witness’s help in framing questions best suited to elicit the witness’s story or particular details of it that counsel has noted in earlier investigative interviewing: “Last time we talked, you said ___. That seemed to me to be something that the court will want to hear. Now I am trying to get the right question to ask you, so that in your answer you will say it pretty much the same way you said it in our last interview. Would it be better if I asked ___ [suggesting one form of question] or if I asked ___ [suggesting another form of question]? Or maybe you can suggest a way to ask it that will be sure to bring out the information we want.”

In this process counsel may have to explain to the witness – without confusing technicalities and legal jargon – some of the constraints imposed upon counsel’s questioning by the rules of evidence. “I can’t just call you to the witness stand and say, ‘Okay, go ahead and tell your story.’ It’s got to be a back-and-forth thing, in which I ask you particular questions, and you give the answers. There are certain legal rules about the questions I can ask. I can’t do what courts call ‘leading a witness,’ which means putting words into a witness’s mouth by saying in my question what your answer is supposed to be. For example: you’ve told me that it was very dark out that evening. I can’t ask you in court, ‘Was it very dark out?’ and have you simply say ‘Yes.’ I’ve got to ask you something like, ‘Would you please describe the lighting conditions,’ and then you have to say, ‘It was very dark out,’ if it was. You see what I mean? My questions can direct you to the subject that I am asking about, but you have to be the one who fills in the details by your answer. So, if there are important details, you must be the one who remembers them and says them, and I must find the right questions. Also I have to ask the questions in a certain logical order. I can’t ask, ‘What time did Joe arrive at the drive-in?’ before you have first testified that Joe did come to the drive-in that evening. Lawyers would call that question ‘assuming a fact not in evidence,’ and the judge would not let it be asked until I had first asked some question that caused you to tell the court that Joe did come to the drive-in. Now, going back to the beginning of the evening, let me try out a line of questions. After you have answered them, we can go over the answers and see if everything has been brought out, and maybe we can improve the questions so as to be sure that they will bring everything out fully and accurately.” Optimal predictability in getting the answers that counsel wants in court is usually obtained by making the conditions in the “dry run” as similar as possible to those that will exist in the courtroom. The sequence of the questioning should be the same; and, once counsel has worked out questions that produce the desired result, s/he should stick closely to them in form and language. If alternative possible forms have been tried out, both counsel and the witness should be clear at the end of the “dry run” which questions will be asked in court and which will not. In important areas of the witness’s testimony, single questions should not be asked in isolation; sizeable blocks of questions and answers should be run – and rerun as often as necessary – so that each question will be asked in the “dry run” against the same background that will frame it when it is later asked in court. To avoid confusion and to maximize the similarity between the “dry run” and the courtroom examination, counsel will find it useful to conduct the “dry run” itself with counsel standing and facing the witness, or at least sitting face-to-face with the witness some distance apart. When breaks are made in the “dry run” to discuss the questions and answers, to work on reformulations of questions, or to conduct follow-up investigative questioning that will not be used in court, counsel should change his or her physical position – for example, by coming over and sitting down beside the witness – so that the demarcation between the questioning that will occur in court and all of the other conversation in the preparatory interview will be sharp and clear. (If the witness is left confused and thinks that counsel intends to ask in court certain questions that counsel actually meant to ask in the preparatory interview only for his or her information, or as try-outs that counsel then rejects as unsatisfactory, trouble is likely to follow. When the witness finds in court that the questions s/he expects are not being asked, s/he may begin to worry and think that s/he has done something wrong to cause counsel to deviate from the prepared line of questioning. Consequently, s/he may begin to look apprehensive or insecure or may blurt out the answer to the question that counsel “forgot” to ask, instead of responding to the question actually asked, or s/he may do both. Conversely, if questions that the witness does not expect to have asked in court are asked, the witness may feel that s/he has been misled or even betrayed by counsel; s/he is likely to lose his or her bearings and become visibly rattled. The key to effective witness preparation is a clear, common understanding by counsel and the witness concerning exactly what will happen in the courtroom.

§ 10.09(d) Preparing the Witness for Cross-Examination by the Prosecutor

A witness should be instructed that if s/he is asked on cross-examination whether s/he has previously discussed his or her testimony with defense counsel, s/he should reply that s/he has – and should do so in a manner that communicates a tone of “why, of course!” or “certainly! doesn’t everybody?” If s/he is asked whether s/he has rehearsed his or her testimony with counsel, s/he should answer something along the lines of “[Mr.] [Ms.] ______ asked me all of the questions that were asked in court today, and I told [him] [her] exactly what my answers are.” If asked whether defense counsel did not tell the witness how to answer the questions – or what answers were expected to the questions – the witness should reply in the vein of “No, first I told [Mr.] [Ms.] ______ exactly what I knew about the case, and then we went through all of these questions and answers because [Mr.] [Ms.] ______ told me that [he] [she] wanted to prepare the best questions to bring out in court the facts that I had told [him] [her].” (In a jury trial, if the prosecutor impugns the witness’s integrity by asking any of these questions in a derisive manner, counsel may find it advisable at trial, after letting the witness answer the question, to demand in the jury’s presence that the prosecutor produce the basis for the innuendo or discontinue that line of questioning.)

It is important for counsel to assure the witness that the “dry run” and other preparation of the witness’s testimony which they are doing is perfectly proper – “I wouldn’t ask you to do it if it weren’t” – so that the witness will not feel or appear guilty when s/he is asked about it on cross-examination. And, in order to permit counsel to prepare the witness to answer questions on cross-examination in the manner just described both truthfully and comfortably, it is good practice for counsel to tell the witness, before beginning the first rehearsal or “dry run,” something like: “Now, let’s try out a line of questions and answers for your testimony. We want to do this in order to make sure that my questions in court will be clear and understandable, so that your answers will tell [the jury] [the judge] the relevant facts that you and I have been going over, not only accurately and truthfully but also in a way that touches all of the bases and complies with the rules of evidence. The idea is to work out a series of questions I can ask you in court that will bring out all of the necessary details clearly and in the order easiest for [the jury] [the judge] to follow. If my questions aren’t doing that when we go through them now in question-and-answer form, we’ll revise them until they work for you. I also want to ask you the sorts of questions that the prosecutor might ask on cross-examination, so that we can predict whether any redirect examination is likely to be necessary and can prepare questions for the redirect examination.” If the witness is one whom counsel wishes to invite to assist counsel in the formulation of questions, this is also the time for an explanation of that process, as suggested in § 10.09(c) supra.

After the substantive portions of the witness’s testimony on direct, cross, and redirect have been sufficiently rehearsed, it is useful for counsel to remind the witness of the explanation that s/he gave the witness at the outset (along the lines of the immediately preceding passage in quotation marks) and to prepare a brief line of redirect examination for possible use if the prosecutor’s cross-examination implies that the witness has been improperly coached. The following exchange usually does the trick:

Q. You said on cross-examination that you and I had discussed your testimony before you took the stand and had gone over it in question-and-answer form. Do you recall what I said before we did that, regarding the reason for doing it?

A. Yes.

Q. Please tell the jury what I said, as best you can recall.

A. You said that you wanted to be sure that your questions would cover all of the bases and bring out all of the facts accurately, and that if the questions you were planning to ask did not do that, you would revise them to be clear and complete.

In rehearsing cross-examination, counsel should spare the witness nothing that the prosecutor may possibly use against the witness at trial. Counsel may want to introduce delicate or embarrassing subjects in a friendly way by interrupting the “dry run” to explain why the prosecutor will probably question the witness on such-and-such a subject and why it is important that the witness answer the questions satisfactorily. But eventually the questions must be put to the witness in the “dry run” in the toughest form in which the prosecutor could put them. Rehabilitation can follow. See § 8.09 supra. There is a natural human tendency for defense counsel to go easy on a witness who, after all, is doing the respondent the favor of testifying in support of the defense case. That tendency should be avoided like the plague, since it can prove equally deadly.

A witness who has prior convictions or prior acts of misconduct that can be used for impeachment (see § 30.07(d) infra) should be told the way in which s/he is likely to be questioned about them at trial. (The standard procedure is described in §§ 31.11, 33.06 infra. S/he should be instructed that when s/he is asked whether s/he is the person who was convicted of such-and-such a crime on such-and-such a date, s/he should listen carefully to the description of the crime and, if it is correct, s/he should answer the question by a simple “yes,” without attempting to explain the conviction away. Any explanatory matter allowed by local practice can best be developed on redirect examination, and this aspect of the redirect should be rehearsed with care. Poor explanations of prior convictions are worse than no explanation at all. Both cross-examination and redirect examination on prior convictions and prior “bad acts” should be rehearsed until the witness is as comfortable with them as s/he can be made.

§ 10.09(e) Refraining from Taking Notes or Written Statements from the Witness

As explained in §§ 27.12(b), 33.03 infra, state statutes or rules may give the prosecution a right to at-trial discovery of prior statements of defense witnesses for purposes of impeachment. This discovery may be limited to witnesses’ prior written or recorded statements or may extend to notes made by counsel or a defense investigator during witness interviews. Disclosure is usually required only after the completion of each witness’s testimony on direct examination, but in some jurisdictions it can be requested by the prosecutor at the beginning of the defense case or even earlier. (Constitutional and “work-product” grounds for defense objection to disclosure before a witness testifies on direct are discussed in §§ 9.12-9.13 supra but may not persuade the trial judge.) Even minor discrepancies between a witness’s trial testimony and his or her prior statements can be put to damaging use by a capable prosecutor. Defense counsel who practice in jurisdictions that authorize prosecutorial discovery of defense-witness statements should familiarize themselves with the local rules and should ordinarily refrain from taking pretrial witness statements in discoverable forms. If notes of a witness’s oral interview language are essential, they should be incorporated in a strategy memorandum that will be maximally insulated from discovery as the attorney’s “work product.” See §§ 5.05, 8.10, 9.13 supra.
§ 10.10 PREPARING THE RESPONDENT TO TESTIFY

Preparing the respondent to testify requires special care. The respondent’s testimony is more carefully scrutinized than that of any other witness. That an alleged delinquent is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty is a canard. In reality, most juvenile respondents must prove their innocence – and often their likeableness as well.

The respondent ordinarily testifies last so that s/he can have heard all the other testimony given in the case. (It has been held unconstitutional to require a criminal defendant to testify first in a case in which the defense intends to present the testimony of the defendant and other defense evidence. Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972); see also Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 344 (1980) (dictum); State v. Kido, 102 Hawai’i 369, 374-78, 76 P.3d 612, 617-21 (Hawai’i App. 2003).) Because the respondent has a right to be present throughout the trial (see § 27.01 infra), s/he cannot be excluded during the testimony of earlier witnesses by the prosecutor’s invocation of the rule on witnesses (see § 27.11 infra); and the court’s power to forbid consultation between the respondent and defense counsel during the course of the trial is significantly limited by the Sixth Amendment, see § 27.02 infra. Thus a respondent who is reasonably bright and articulate usually makes the best clean-up hitter. There are bound to be some inconsistencies in the most well-planned defense testimony, but if the respondent testifies last, s/he is given the opportunity to reconcile any contradictions that have been left by earlier defense witnesses. The downside of this strategy is that the prosecutor may be able to argue in closing that the respondent has tailored his or her testimony to the preceding evidence. See Portuondo v. Agard, 529 U.S. 61, 63 (2000) (prosecutor’s closing argument did not violate the Fifth or Sixth Amendments or the Due Process Clause by “call[ing] the jury’s attention to the fact that the defendant [who testified last] had the opportunity to hear all other witnesses testify and to tailor his testimony accordingly”); but see State v. Daniels, 182 N.J. 80, 97-100, 861 A.2d 808, 818-20 (2004) (rejecting the rule of Portuondo v. Agard on state constitutional grounds); State v. Swanson, 707 N.W.2d 645, 657-58 (Minn. 2006) (construing evidentiary rules so as to limit Portuondo v. Agard to cases in which there is “specific evidence” that the accused “has tailored his testimony to fit the state’s case”); Commonwealth v. Gaudette, 441 Mass. 762, 765-68, 808 N.E.2d 798, 801-03 (2004) (reserving the question of whether Portuondo v. Agard should be rejected on state constitutional grounds and limiting application of the rule to cases in which “there is evidence introduced at trial to support” a prosecutorial argument that the accused “shape[d] his testimony to conform to the trial evidence”). Where such comment is permitted, it is probably less likely to impress the judge in a bench trial than the jury in a jury trial, particularly in locales where the convention of reserving the respondent’s testimony until the end of defense evidence is so widely followed as to appear routine.

If counsel concludes that the respondent should serve as clean-up hitter at trial, counsel must fully explain to the client the nature and implications of that role. The theory of the defensive case must be thoroughly described to the respondent, and counsel should explain what s/he is attempting to show by each witness (including the respondent) and how it all hangs together. Also, in those jurisdictions that have not developed state-law rules which will preclude the prosecutor from comment or cross-examination implying “tailoring” of the respondent’s testimony (as in Portuondo v. Agard, supra), counsel should prepare the client for the possibility that the prosecutor may ask the client on cross whether s/he “did not sit here in court and listen to the testimony of all the other witnesses before testifying,” whether s/he “did not discuss the testimony of the other witnesses with counsel before testifying,” whether s/he and counsel “did not discuss your testifying in ways that would be consistent with the testimony of earlier witnesses,” and so forth, and/or that the prosecutor may claim in closing argument that the respondent took advantage of the order of witnesses to adjust his or her testimony to what the other witnesses said. (Respondents who are surprised and irritated by remarks made in the prosecutor’s closing may react by visible signs of anger or even audible denials. Counsel wants to forestall these potentially damaging displays.)

To the best of counsel’s ability, s/he should foresee and tell the respondent exactly what will happen at trial. It is important that the respondent be put at ease as much as possible, and the device of taking an inexperienced or particularly nervous respondent to observe earlier trials is often advised.

As with other witnesses (see § 10.09(c) supra), the respondent’s testimony should be subjected to “dry runs” to assure against omissions and inadvertent inconsistencies and to organize it in the most comprehensible and persuasive manner. See § 33.08 infra. Direct, cross, and redirect examination should be role-played; and in role-playing the cross-examination, counsel should press the respondent with the toughest questions that the prosecutor could conceivably ask at trial. See § 33.09(a) infra; see also §§ 5.12, 10.09(d) supra.

In particular, the respondent must have a plausible explanation for any confessions, admissions to police, or other prior inconsistent statements with which s/he will expectably be impeached. A serious problem in preparing the respondent’s testimony is that there may be some prior statements of which counsel is unaware. (These may not surface before the respondent testifies. When a respondent has made multiple statements to the police, a canny prosecutor will often withhold some of them in the prosecution’s case-in-chief, so as to leave fresh material for impeachment of the respondent or for rebuttal.) Discovery and investigation must be as complete as possible when the respondent’s testimony is prepared, to minimize this hazard.

Finally, counsel should help the respondent to see ways in which the respondent can best present himself or herself to the judge or jury – both in the respondent’s demeanor on the witness stand and in the respondent’s deportment at counsel table throughout the trial – as a likeable person. But counsel should not ordinarily attempt to have the respondent dress, behave, or talk in a manner to which s/he is substantially unaccustomed or use vocabulary that is out of keeping with his or her character or situation in life. This sort of acting is seldom convincing. Whether “street talk” should be laundered depends upon counsel’s appraisal of how it will go over with the judge or jury. Profanities usually should be edited out, although common profanities may not be punished by contempt, at least in the absence of prior warning by the judge that they are out of order. Eaton v. City of Tulsa, 415 U.S. 697 (1974) (per curiam).
§ 10.11 THE RESPONDENT’S DRESS FOR TRIAL

Clients not in custody should be advised to dress and groom neatly. The more “respectably” or “well” dressed they can appear without looking costumed for the occasion, the better. Counsel should ask the client to dress for one of their pretrial interviews as the client will dress at trial, so that counsel can look over the client’s outfit and suggest any necessary improvements. Cf. § 10.09(b) supra. If the case involves a misidentification defense, counsel should review the descriptions of the perpetrator given by prosecution witnesses (see § 8.19(a), and subdivisions (2) and (6) of § 9.07(c) supra) and be sure that the client does not dress for trial in clothing matching or approximating the clothing worn by the perpetrator.

If a respondent is in custody, counsel should arrange for the client to have civilian clothes to wear during the trial. See § 27.01 infra.

§ 10.12 CO-RESPONDENTS AND ACCOMPLICES

As explained in § 8.15 supra, counsel’s investigation will need to include interviews of co-respondents, adult co-perpetrators, and unarrested accomplices. The primary purpose of these interviews is to prepare to deal with these people if they flip and testify for the prosecution (or if they are tried jointly with counsel’s client and take the stand in their own defense), and to obtain a complete picture of relevant events for counsel’s litigation-planning purposes. Except in unusual cases, it is probably not wise to call any alleged accomplice or co-respondent who is being tried separately to testify for the defense. If s/he disagrees with the respondent, both will be viewed as liars; if s/he agrees, it will be presumed that they colluded on their stories.

If counsel has been retained by, or appointed to represent, corespondents, counsel will need to be alert to any potential conflicts of interest and, if one exists, secure relief from the conflicting appointments. Holloway v. Arkansas, 435 U.S. 475 (1978). See also Mickens v. Taylor, 535 U.S. 162, 166-74 (2002); Burger v. Kemp, 483 U.S. 776 (1987); Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335 (1980).

Part C. Preparing Real or Demonstrative Evidence for Use at a Suppression Hearing or Trial

§ 10.13 GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS IN PREPARING AND PRESENTING REAL AND DEMONSTRATIVE EVIDENCE

Although the terms “real evidence” and “demonstrative evidence” are often used loosely (and occasionally even interchangeably), it is useful for purposes of this discussion to distinguish between them. The term “real evidence” will be used here to refer to objects that were involved in the crime or other relevant events; records of relevant events or circumstances, such as documents, audio and visual recordings, and photographs; and electronic evidence such as e-mail messages, e-texts, and postings on social media like Facebook. Such objects can be admitted at trial as “substantive evidence” – that is, their probative capacity is not restricted to or by whatever any witnesses may testify about them; rather, the trier of facts may rely upon its ingredient observations of them to support factual conclusions deducible from the existence, contents and characteristics of such an item. The term “demonstrative evidence” will be used here to refer to objects that neither were involved in the events being litigated nor are direct records of those events but which are proffered to illustrate or elucidate the testimony of a witness. Thus, a witness who orally describes the scene of an event may also draw a map of it upon a piece of graph paper or a whiteboard in the courtroom; or a map drawn by the witness before trial may be identified by the witness on the stand and then shown to the jury in connection with the witness’s testimony. Such a map, if admitted into evidence, is not admitted “substantively” or “generally”; rather, the jury is instructed that the map can be considered only insofar as it clarifies or illustrates the oral testimony of the witness.

Both real and demonstrative evidence can have a dramatic impact upon the fact-finder, sometimes far exceeding the persuasive force of oral testimony. Tangible objects and concrete images can shape the fact-finder’s visualization of events in ways that strongly support the story line of the party introducing the evidence. See, e.g., NEAL FEIGENSON & CHRISTINA SPIESEL, LAW ON DISPLAY: THE DIGITAL TRANSFORMATION OF LEGAL PERSUASION AND JUDGMENT
(2009); Philip N. Meyer, “Desperate for Love”: Cinematic Influences upon a Defendant’s Closing Argument to a Jury, 18 VT. L. REV. 721 (1994). Moreover, because corporeal and virtual displays are often more gripping than witnesses’ oral narrations of what took place, evidence of this sort will often be more memorable to a jury (or even to a judge in a bench trial), especially in a lengthy trial that is filled with mostly oral testimony and lawyers’ arguments. Also, if an item is introduced into evidence and available to the jury in the jury room during its deliberations (as is usually the case), it serves as a graphic reminder of whatever propositions the proponent of the evidence sought to convey by introducing it.

To gain these benefits of real and demonstrative evidence, defense counsel will need to satisfy the often-complex conditions prerequisite for the admissibility of each item s/he proffers.
When it comes to real evidence, this will usually require planning, far in advance of trial, to (1) obtain the evidence in whatever form is needed for introduction at trial; (2) preserve it in the requisite form; and (3) line up and prepare the witnesses who can lay whatever foundation is needed for its introduction. For demonstrative evidence, advance planning also is essential to obtain or create illustrative objects or diagrams that will conform to local evidentiary requirements. The sections that follow will discuss the usual preconditions for the admissibility of real and demonstrative evidence. But, because evidentiary requirements vary considerably across jurisdictions, it is essential that counsel be thoroughly familiar with local rules and practices.

In addition to ensuring that the item is admissible, counsel will need to think about the most effective way to present it in court. If the requisite foundation can be laid by various possible witnesses rather than just one particular person, then counsel will need to select among them, taking into account how each of them would likely come across to the fact-finder. See § 10.01 supra. The way in which a witness handles an item while talking about it, or what s/he says about it, can play a crucial role in how the fact-finder perceives the item and what s/he thinks about it. Accordingly, counsel will need to give careful thought to all aspects of the presentation and rehearse the witness thoroughly for it. See § 10.09 supra.

§ 10.14 REAL EVIDENCE

§ 10.14(a) Preserving Physical Evidence for Use at Trial or a Pretrial Hearing

Section 8.18 supra describes the general practices counsel will need to follow to preserve physical evidence for trial. As that section explains, counsel will have to use procedures that are essentially equivalent to those used by sophisticated police investigators and examiners to preserve crime-scene evidence: bagging and tagging objects with the case name and number and the date and time of collection; inspecting and recording the current condition of the object; locking it down in a secure facility; and maintaining records to show chain-of-custody. That section also describes the additional procedures counsel will need to follow if the object is shown to anyone or tested in some way.

§ 10.14(b) Photographs of the Crime Scene or Other Relevant Sites or Objects

Whenever a description of the physical characteristics of a site or of an object not capable of being presented in court is important, counsel should arrange to have appropriate photographs taken. Photographs are ordinarily quite convincing, particularly if they are taken from several angles and at several distances, so that all spatial relations involved are fully depicted. Counsel should remember that photographs are not admissible until a foundation has been laid by a person who testifies that they are an accurate reproduction of the scene which s/he observed. A photographer should therefore be selected who will be available at the time of trial and who will make a good and personable witness. S/he should be informed that s/he will be asked at trial, as a basis for testifying that the photographs are accurate, whether s/he has a present recollection of the scene that s/he photographed.

§ 10.14(c) Authentication

When counsel seeks to introduce a physical object, paper document, or item of electronic information at trial or at a pretrial evidentiary hearing, counsel will need to lay a foundation to authenticate the evidence s/he is proffering. In this sense, “authentication” is a factual showing that the exhibit is the particular thing which its proponent asserts that it is. The usual criteria for authentication, as set forth in Federal Rule of Evidence 901 (which is a model for many state statutes and local rules on the subject), are:

“(a) In General. To satisfy the requirement of authenticating or identifying an item of evidence, the proponent must produce evidence sufficient to support a finding that the item is what the proponent claims it is.
“(b) Examples. The following are examples only – not a complete list – of evidence that satisfies the requirement:

“(1) Testimony of a Witness with Knowledge. Testimony that an item is what it is claimed to be.

“(2) Nonexpert Opinion About Handwriting. A nonexpert’s opinion that handwriting is genuine, based on a familiarity with it that was not acquired for the current litigation.

“(3) Comparison by an Expert Witness or the Trier of Fact. A comparison with an authenticated specimen by an expert witness or the trier of fact.

“(4) Distinctive Characteristics and the Like. The appearance, contents, substance, internal patterns, or other distinctive characteristics of the item, taken together with all the circumstances.

“(9) Evidence About a Process or System. Evidence describing a process or system and showing that it produces an accurate result.”

Counsel should check the specifics of whatever statute or rule applies in his or her jurisdiction.

If the prosecutor is at all likely to challenge the authenticity of the item, counsel should come to court armed with copies of both the rule and any caselaw that supports counsel’s position. Because the prosecutor may be willing to stipulate to authenticity, it is often worth raising the matter with the prosecutor in advance of trial if establishing authenticity will be burdensome to counsel in some way (e.g., if it will require that counsel subpoena a witness who would not otherwise be needed and whose presence may be difficult to arrange) and if having such a conversation with the prosecutor will not disclose information that counsel would prefer to withhold until the trial or hearing.

When it comes to traditional sorts of real evidence like physical objects and paper documents, authentication usually does not present much of a challenge. The criteria for admitting such objects are well established in most jurisdictions, and there is usually ample caselaw about the very type of object that counsel seeks to get admitted. More difficult, at least at present, is authenticating video recordings and electronic evidence like e-mail messages, e-texts, and postings on social media like Facebook. See, e.g., Hawes v. Perry, 633 Fed. Appx. 720 (11th Cir. 2015) (per curiam) (trial counsel’s failure to take the steps necessary to authenticate an email message for its admission into evidence at trial should have been raised by appellate counsel as a ground for challenging trial counsel’s effectiveness; appellate counsel’s failure to raise this claim on appeal was itself ineffectiveness of appellate counsel; the email, which was “sent from [complainant] K.P.’s known email account to Hawes’s account,” supported “his claim that the alleged second [sexual] encounter [with the minor complainant] never occurred” (id. at 723), and would have “show[n] that K.P. was not truthful in her testimony at trial” (id. at 725), but “she denied writing the email in front of the jury, the court granted the State’s objection to further questioning on authentication grounds,” and defense “counsel did not offer a foundation for the email, such as testimony from the internet service provider (as suggested by the State at trial.” Id. at 723.). In many jurisdictions, the evidentiary rules and practices have not kept pace with the technological developments that have made such items a central part of everyday life. As a result, there may not yet be rules on the subject in counsel’s jurisdiction (or they may be very limited or unclear) and the judge who presides over the case may be unfamiliar with whatever rules do exist. If that is the case, counsel can usually find helpful caselaw in other jurisdictions.

Concerning video recordings, courts usually apply the well-established rules for photographs and tape-recordings, holding that foundation testimony must establish that the recording is true, accurate, and authentic. See, e.g., United States v. Cejas, 761 F.3d 717, 723 (7th Cir. 2014) (“For video recordings, like tape recordings, the proponent should . . . show that the camera functioned properly, the operator was competent in operating the equipment, and the recording fairly and accurately represented the scene depicted”); People v. Patterson, 93 N.Y.2d 80, 84, 710 N.E.2d 665, 668, 688 N.Y.S.2d 101, 104 (1999) (“Similar to a photograph, a videotape may be authenticated by the testimony of a witness to the recorded evidence or of an operator or installer or maintainer of the equipment that the videotape accurately represents the subject matter depicted. . . . Testimony, expert or otherwise, may also establish that a videotape ‘truly and accurately represents what was before the camera’ . . . . Evidence establishing the chain of custody of the videotape may additionally buttress its authenticity and integrity, and even allow for acceptable inferences of reasonable accuracy and freedom from tampering . . . .”).

Concerning electronic evidence, courts typically require a showing (1) that the e-mail message, e-text, or social media posting was actually written by the individual who is claimed to be the author; and (2) that whatever copy of the electronic evidence counsel seeks to introduce (screen shot, photograph, printout, whatever) is a fair and accurate reproduction of what appears in the actual electronic source (the e-mail server, cellphone that produced the text, or social media website). See, e.g., United States v. Browne, 834 F.3d 403, 405, 408-16 (3d Cir. 2016) (rejecting the government’s assertion that “records of ‘chats’ [the defendant allegedly] exchanged over Facebook” could be introduced under Fed. R. Evid. 902(11) as “‘self-authenticating’ . . . business records accompanied by a certificate from the website’s records custodian” (id. at 405), but nonetheless affirming the prosecution’s introduction of the records because a “veritable mountain of [extrinsic] evidence linke[d] Browne . . . to the incriminating chats” (id. at 415) and the Government thus satisfied its “authentication burden under a conventional Rule 901 analysis” (id. at 405); United States v. Vayner, 769 F.3d 125, 127 (2d Cir. 2014) (the trial court erred in granting the prosecution’s request to admit “into evidence a printed copy of a web page, which [the government] . . . claimed was Zhyltsou’s profile page from a Russian social networking site akin to Facebook”: “the government presented insufficient evidence that the page was what the government claimed it to be – that is, Zhyltsou’s profile page, as opposed to a profile page on the Internet that Zhyltsou did not create or control.”); People v. Price, 29 N.Y.3d 472, 2017 WL (N.Y. Ct. App. June 27, 2017) (the prosecution failed to proffer “a sufficient foundation at trial to authenticate a photograph – purportedly of defendant holding a firearm and money – that was obtained from an internet profile page allegedly belonging to defendant”; the court explains that even if it were to follow some other jurisdictions by adopting a two-pronged “approach [that] allows for admission of the proffered evidence upon proof that the printout of the web page is an accurate depiction thereof, and that the website is attributable to and controlled by a certain person, often the defendant,” the “evidence presented here of defendant’s connection to the website or the particular profile was exceedingly sparse. . . . For example, notably absent was any evidence regarding whether defendant was known to use an account on the website in question, whether he had ever communicated with anyone through the account, or whether the account could be traced to electronic devices owned by him. Nor did the People proffer any evidence indicating whether the account was password protected or accessible by others, whether non-account holders could post pictures to the account, or whether the website permitted defendant to remove pictures from his account if he objected to what was depicted therein. . . . Thus, even if we were to accept that the photograph could be authenticated through proof that the website on which it was found was attributable to defendant, the People’s proffered authentication evidence failed to actually demonstrate that defendant was aware of – let alone exercised dominion or control over – the profile page in question.”). Cf. United States v. Recio, 884 F.3d 230, 236-37 (4th Cir. 2018) (the Government “properly authenticated the Facebook post” by presenting sufficient evidence “that the post in question was authored by Recio”: “the Government presented a certification by a Facebook records custodian, showing that the Facebook record containing the post was made ‘at or near the time the information was transmitted by the Facebook user.’ And the Government sufficiently tied that ‘Facebook user’ to Recio by showing that: (1) the user name associated with the account was ‘Larry Recio,’ (2) one of the four email addresses associated with the account was ‘larryrecio20@yahoo.com,’ (3) more than one hundred photos of Recio were posted to the account, and (4) one of the photos posted to the user’s timeline was accompanied by the text ‘Happy Birthday Larry Recio.’ ¶ Recio suggests that even if it was his Facebook account, someone else may have accessed it. But there was no evidence that another person accessed the Facebook account. Moreover, what matters is not whether a jury could find that Recio did not author the post in question, but rather whether the jury could reasonably find that he did. Given the strong evidence that the Facebook account was Recio’s, and without any evidence of unauthorized access, the jury could find that Recio was the true author of the post.”); United States v. Mebratu, 543 Fed. Appx. 137, 140-41 (3d Cir. 2013) (the government sufficiently authenticated “text messages found on the seized cellular phone” and adequately attributed them to Mebratu: “the device containing these messages was found on Mebratu’s person”; “the content of the text messages indicates that Mebratu was the user of the seized phone and hence the sender and receiver of the messages found on that phone”; and “the phone contained other text messages whose content, when considered in conjunction with . . . [a witness’s] testimony, supports a finding of authenticity.”); United States v. Gagliardi, 506 F.3d 140, 151 (2d Cir. 2007) (“the e-mails and transcripts of instant-message chats offered by the government were . . . properly authenticated” even though “the documents were largely cut from . . . [the defendant’s] electronic communications and then pasted into word processing files, [and thus] they were not originals and . . . [the defendant contended that they] could have been subject to editing by the government”: “We have stated that the standard for authentication is one of ‘reasonable likelihood’ . . . and is ‘minimal,’ . . . . The testimony of a witness with knowledge that a matter is what it is claimed to be is sufficient to satisfy this standard. See Fed. R. Evid. 901(b)(1). In this case, both the informant and Agent Berglas testified that the exhibits were in fact accurate records of Gagliardi’s conversations with Lorie and Julie. Based on their testimony, a reasonable juror could have found that the exhibits did represent those conversations, notwithstanding that the e-mails and online chats were editable.”); People v. Hughes, 114 A.D.3d 1021, 1023, 981 N.Y.S.2d 158, 161 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2014) (“Photographs of text messages sent from defendant’s cell phone to the victim were properly authenticated”: “the People produced testimony from a Verizon employee confirming that text messages had been sent between certain phone numbers, the victim identified the phone numbers as belonging to her and defendant, and she identified the photographs as depicting text messages she received from him. Defendant’s testimony that someone else could have sent the messages from his phone presented a factual issue for the jury, and we discern no basis for setting the jury’s determination aside.”).

§ 10.14(d) Other Potential Evidentiary Impediments

Of course, authentication is only one of several evidentiary hurdles that counsel may need to overcome in order to introduce an item into evidence. These may include questions of relevance (see § 30.03 infra) and hearsay (see § 30.04 infra), particularly when it comes to documentary evidence and electronic evidence.

§ 10.15 DEMONSTRATIVE EVIDENCE

Visual aids of all sorts are regularly used in criminal trials. The most common is probably the one mentioned in § 10.13: a map of a relevant location. It is also commonplace for expert witnesses to use a visual aid (e.g., a PowerPoint projection or a graphic poster on an easel) to enhance their presentation of complex information: e.g., a chart showing the features of a mental disease or defect that the testifying psychiatrist has diagnosed; or an anatomical diagram or plaster model that a testifying medical expert uses to explain the nature of an injury; or a chart that a ballistics examiner uses to show a bullet match (or a lack of a match).

With the computer technology now available, numerous things are possible. For example, a defense expert’s testimony about the trajectory of bullets, which traditionally might have been demonstrated with a life-sized mannikin with colored dowels in the locations where the bullets hit, can now be supported with a computerized animation (with as much or as little realism as counsel deems appropriate) showing the paths of the bullets.

Counsel should be wary, however, of becoming overly enamored of such sophisticated electronic presentations. For some jurors and even for some judges in a bench trial, computerized animations and the like may seem too “slick” and too subject to manipulation. Fact-finders of this sort may actually prefer the more homespun approach of the witness who draws a diagram.
on a whiteboard or a piece of graph paper. Another risk of the more sophisticated electronic aids is that they can overshadow the testifying witness, causing the witness’s important oral testimony to get lost.

Accordingly, as with all other aspects of trial preparation, counsel will need to give careful thought to what type of presentation is likely to play best with the particular audience. If the witness who will be using the visual aid is an expert witness, s/he will likely have experience in using such aids in other trials and will be able to provide counsel with essential guidance on how such aids usually are received.

Whatever form of visual aid counsel ultimately selects and uses at trial or at a pretrial hearing, s/he will need to make sure that it is adequately preserved in the record in the event of a conviction and later appeal. Thus, for example, if a witness were to draw a diagram with a marker on a whiteboard in the courtroom, and if it is important for that diagram to be preserved for appeal, counsel will need to have the diagram photographed and to ask the judge to put the photograph into the record.
Chapter 11

Retaining and Working with Expert Consultants and Potential Expert Witnesses

§ 11.01 DECIDING WHETHER TO RETAIN AN EXPERT

§ 11.01(a) The Wide Range of Possible Experts to Consider in a Juvenile Delinquency Case

There is a host of types of expert witnesses that may be useful in a delinquency case. Some of the most commonly used are:

1. Fingerprint examiners;
2. Ballistics experts;
3. Narcotics and drug experts;
4. A variety of mental health experts, including psychiatrists, psychologists, and neurologists (see §§ 12.08-12.10 infra);
5. Handwriting experts and questioned-document examiners;
6. Arson experts;
7. Shoeprint/tiretread experts;
8. Polygraph examiners;
9. Serologists;
10. Forensic pathologists;
11. Hair and fiber examiners;
12. DNA experts;
14. Experts on the factors that can produce a false confession (see, e.g., People v. Bedessie, 19 N.Y.3d 147, 149, 161, 970 N.E.2d 380, 381, 388-89, 947 N.Y.S.2d 357, 358, 365-66 (2012); State v. Perea, 322 P.3d 624, 638-44 (Utah 2013)).

The list of potential experts is limited only by the reach of counsel’s imagination. For example, counsel could end up using an automobile accident reconstruction expert (to explain the sequence of events in a vehicular homicide prosecution), an odontologist (to testify in an identification case that many youths other than the respondent possess gaps in their teeth that match those observed in the perpetrator), or even an arborist (to testify that the foliage on the tree at the scene and time of the crime would have been so full as to obstruct the purported...
§ 11.01(b) The Wide Range of Possible Functions for a Defense Expert in a Juvenile Delinquency Case

An expert can assist defense counsel in a variety of ways that go far beyond the traditional conception of an expert witness testifying at a pretrial hearing or trial. In any case in which the prosecution is relying on scientific evidence of any sort – a medical examiner’s or pathologist’s report; a fire marshal’s findings; testing of materials from the crime scene (DNA, blood typing, fingerprints, ballistics, hair, fibers, whatever); chemical analyses of narcotics and toxins; handwriting analyses; the testimony of accountants or other experts in business practices; reconstruction, amplification, and enhancement of surveillance recordings – an expert consultant can play a vital role in helping defense counsel develop a theory of the case; determine what portions of the prosecution’s case to attack; plan the defense investigation; decide what pretrial motions to file and what claims to raise in them; assess the viability of various strategies for the pretrial hearings and the trial; and prepare to cross-examine the prosecution expert(s) by teaching counsel what s/he needs to know about the field, providing names of foundational texts for counsel to consult and possibly use in cross-examination, and critically reviewing the opposing expert’s report so that counsel will know what should be attacked and what should not. The defense consultant can also sit with counsel in court during the prosecution expert’s testimony and provide counsel with on-the-spot assistance in handling any portions of the witness’s direct examination that were unexpected and any problematic responses by the prosecution expert to cross-examination questions. See, e.g., McWilliams v. Dunn, 137 S. Ct. 1790, 1800-01 (2017) (discussed in § 11.03(a) infra) (the federal constitutional view of the role of a defense mental health expert envisions assistance to defense counsel in “evaluation, . . . preparation, and . . . presentation of the defense”; “help[ing] the defense evaluate . . . [a pretrial report submitted to the court by a State Department of Mental Health neuropsychologist and the defendant’s] extensive medical records and translate these data into a legal strategy”; “help[ing] the defense prepare and present arguments that might, for example, have explained that . . . [the defendant’s] purported malingering was not necessarily inconsistent with mental illness”; and “help[ing] the defense prepare direct or cross-examination of . . . witnesses,” as well as testifying if appropriate.)

As the Supreme Court recognized in Hinton v. Alabama, 134 S. Ct. 1081, 1088 (2014), “Criminal cases will arise where the only reasonable and available defense strategy requires consultation with experts or introduction of expert evidence.” (Hinton “was such a case. As Hinton’s trial attorney recognized, the core of the prosecution’s case was the state experts’ conclusion that the six bullets had been fired from the Hinton revolver, and effectively rebutting that case required a competent expert on the defense side. Hinton’s attorney also recognized that Payne was not a good expert, at least with respect to toolmark evidence. Nonetheless, he felt he was ‘stuck’ with Payne because he could not find a better expert willing to work for $1,000 and he believed that he was unable to obtain more than $1,000 to cover expert fees. . . . ¶ The trial attorney’s failure to request additional funding in order to replace an expert he knew to be inadequate because he mistakenly believed that he had received all he could get under Alabama law constituted deficient performance.” Id.. See also, e.g., Dendel v. Washington, 647 Fed. Appx. 612, 615 (6th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) (“We have made clear that an attorney cannot hire an expert, give him whatever evidence he happens to have on hand (but not the evidence the client pointed to) and accept the report without further discussion. . . . A reliance on uncorroborated evidence dealing with a material issue, such as the cause of death in a murder trial, constitutes as [sic] deficient performance.”); trial counsel was ineffective because he “did not present any evidence of an independent investigation. . . .[H]e spoke to a friend, Dr. Burgess, and asked for a referral who could provide insight into the cause of Burley’s death . . . .[T]he referral, Dr. Halsey . . . was not given any of Burley’s medical records to review, yet he agreed with the prosecution’s medical expert’s opinion on the cause of death based on one phone conversation with trial counsel. Without attempting to corroborate Dr. Halsey’s opinion by later providing him with Burley’s medical records, trial counsel decided that investigating further into the cause of death was unnecessary.”); Thomas v. Clements, 789 F.3d 760, 769 (7th Cir. 2015) (“Counsel knew or should have known that the state was going to use . . . [Coroner and Medical Examiner] Mainland’s testimony to show Thomas acted intentionally based on Dr. Mainland’s pretrial testimony. . . .¶] Counsel also knew his client had said the death was unintentional and the result of what counsel later referred to as horseplay. Counsel knew there were no external marks on Oliver-Thomas’s neck and no signs of any fight or struggle between Thomas and Oliver-Thomas. Counsel should have known there was reason to question a finding of intentional homicide. Based on those facts, a reasonable counsel would have at least reached out to a pathologist to see if the medical findings could be reconciled with Thomas’s versions of the events. To not even contact an expert, however, was to accept Dr. Mainland’s finding of intentional death without challenge and basically doom defense’s theory of the case.”).

Indeed, given the extensively documented flaws in forensic-science evidence customarily used by prosecutors in criminal and juvenile delinquency trials (see § 31.09 infra), counsel should consider retaining an expert consultant in any case in which the prosecution is expected to rely on forensic evidence, even if the forensic reports appear unchallengeable to counsel’s untrained eye. Stephen A. Saltzburg, The Duty to Investigate and the Availability of Expert Witnesses, 86 Fordham L. Rev. 1709, 1719-26 (2018). See, e.g., Melendez-Díaz v. Massachusetts, 557 U.S. 305, 318 (2009) (“Nor is it evident that what respondent [the state] calls ‘neutral scientific testing’ is as neutral or as reliable as respondent suggests. Forensic evidence is not uniquely immune from the risk of manipulation. According to a recent study conducted under the auspices of the National Academy of Sciences, ‘[t]he majority of [laboratories producing forensic evidence] are administered by law enforcement agencies, such as police departments, where the laboratory administrator reports to the head of the agency.’ National Research Council of the National Academies, Strengthening Forensic Science in the United States: A Path Forward 6-1 (Prepublication Copy Feb. 2009) . . . . And ‘[b]ecause forensic scientists often are driven in their work by a need to answer a particular question related to the issues of a particular case, they sometimes face pressure to sacrifice appropriate methodology for the sake of expediency.’ Id., at S-17. A forensic analyst responding to a request from a law enforcement official may feel pressure – or have an incentive – to alter the evidence in a manner favorable to the prosecution.”)
... Serious deficiencies have been found in the forensic evidence used in criminal trials. One commentator asserts that ‘[t]he legal community now concedes, with varying degrees of urgency, that our system produces erroneous convictions based on discredited forensics.’ Metzger, Cheating the Constitution, 59 Vand. L.Rev. 475, 491 (2006). One study of cases in which exonerating evidence resulted in the overturning of criminal convictions concluded that invalid forensic testimony contributed to the convictions in 60% of the cases. Garrett & Neufeld, Invalid Forensic Science Testimony and Wrongful Convictions, 95 Va. L.Rev. 1, 14 (2009).”). Alex Kozinski, Criminal Law 2.0, 44 GEO. L.J. ANN. REV. CRIM. PROC. v, vi (2016) (“fields of forensic expertise, long accepted by the courts as largely infallible, such as bloodstain pattern identification, foot and tire print identification and ballistics have been the subject of considerable doubt”; “Some fields of forensic expertise are built on nothing but guesswork and false common sense. . . . Many defendants have been convicted and spent countless years in prison based on evidence by arson experts who were later shown to be little better than witch doctors.”; “As numerous scandals involving DNA testing labs have shown, . . . DNA evidence is only as good as the weakest link in the chain.”).

Counsel’s consideration of the need for an expert consultant and/or expert witness should not be limited to cases in which the prosecution is relying on scientific evidence. In many cases in which the prosecution will rely exclusively on lay evidence, the best defense strategy may be to bring in an expert consultant to help counsel prepare for trial and/or an expert witness to testify at trial. A common example of this is a run-of-the-mill eyewitness identification case in which the prosecution’s proof at trial will consist exclusively or primarily of the complainant’s account of the crime along with an in-court identification of the respondent by the complainant. A social scientist in the field of eyewitness identification can educate counsel about the many sorts of problems that may infect an identification (see generally NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMIES, IDENTIFYING THE CULPRIT: ASSESSING EYEWITNESS IDENTIFICATION (National Academies Press 2014), and the other sources listed in § 25.03 supra), and help counsel use this understanding to develop a theory of the case, plan the investigation, prepare to cross-examine the complainant, and sit by counsel’s side in court to assist counsel by identifying responses of the complainant on direct, cross, or redirect that suggest problems or opportunities which counsel might otherwise have overlooked. The consultant can also advise counsel whether the case is one that would benefit from presentation of an eyewitness identification expert witness at trial or a pretrial hearing. Whereas the courts were once reluctant to allow expert witness testimony in such cases, and that is still true in some States, the situation has changed considerably and there is now extensive caselaw and social scientific data that counsel can cite to persuade a recalcitrant judge to allow a defense expert to testify. See, e.g., People v. Lerma, 2016 IL 118496, at *6, 47 N.E.3d 985, 992-93, 400 Ill. Dec. 20, 27-28 (2016) (“The last time this court addressed the admission of . . . [expert] testimony on “the reliability of eyewitness identifications” . . . was in [People v.] Enis, which was decided more than 25 years ago when the relevant research was in its relative infancy. . . . The decades since Enis, however, have seen a dramatic shift in the legal landscape, as expert testimony concerning the reliability of eyewitness testimony has moved from novel and uncertain to settled and widely accepted. Indeed, as the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania recently noted, there is now ‘a clear trend among state and federal courts permitting the admission of eyewitness expert testimony, at the discretion of the trial court, for the purpose of aiding the trier of fact in understanding the characteristics of eyewitness identification.’ Commonwealth v. Walker, 625 Pa. 450, 92 A.3d 766, 782-83 (Pa.2014) (collecting demonstrative cases from 44 states, the District of Columbia, and 10 federal circuit courts). The reason for this trend is that, although findings of the sort described in Dr. Fulero’s and Dr. Loftus’s reports are now ‘widely accepted by scientists,’ those same findings ‘are largely unfamiliar to the average person, and, in fact, many of the findings are counterintuitive.’ State v. Guilbert, 306 Conn. 218, 49 A.3d 705, 723-24 (Conn.2012) (collecting cases and studies demonstrating this point). At the same time, advances in DNA testing have confirmed that ‘eyewitness misidentification is now the single greatest source of wrongful convictions in the United States, and responsible for more wrongful convictions than all other causes combined.’ State v. Dubose, 285 Wis. 2d 143, 699 N.W.2d 582, 591-92 (Wis.2005) (collecting relevant studies). In other words, in the 25 years since Enis, we not only have seen that eyewitness identifications are not always as reliable as they appear, but we also have learned, from a scientific standpoint, why this is often the case. Accordingly, whereas Enis allowed for but expressed caution toward the developing research concerning eyewitness identifications, today we are able to recognize that such research is well settled, well supported, and in appropriate cases a perfectly proper subject for expert testimony.”).

There are numerous other kinds of cases in which an expert consultant could assist counsel in preparing for and conducting a pretrial hearing and/or the trial, and/or in which it may be advisable to present an expert witness at a pretrial hearing or a trial. See, e.g., Williams v. Martin, 618 F.2d 1021 (4th Cir. 1980) (requiring the provision of a state-paid independent pathologist to an indigent defendant charged with homicide when the cause of death is debatable and medically complicated); Jones v. Sterling, 210 Ariz. 308, 314-15, 110 P.3d 1271, 1277-78 (2005) (requiring provision of an expert to assist in the development of a selective-prosecution defense when the defendant has presented a credible preliminary showing of discrimination); Jacobson v. Anderson, 203 Ariz. 543, 57 P.3d 733 (Ariz. App. 2002) (a defendant in a prosecution for vehicular manslaughter and reckless endangerment is entitled to necessary funding for an accident reconstructionist and a criminalist); and cognate cases collected in § 11.03(a) infra. See also, e.g., Weeden v. Johnson, 854 F.3d 1063, 1070-71 (9th Cir. 2017) (defense counsel deprived his 14-year-old client of effective assistance of counsel in a felony murder case by failing to seek a psychological evaluation of the client to examine whether her young age and cognitive deficits prevented her from forming the requisite mens rea); People v. Sotelo-Urena, 4 Cal. App. 5th 732, 736-37, 209 Cal. Rptr. 3d 259, 262 (2016) (the trial court’s “exclusion of the [defense] expert testimony was an abuse of discretion and deprived [the defendant] . . . of his constitutional right to present a complete defense”; the defendant, “who was homeless,” should have been permitted to support his claim of self-defense with expert testimony that “homeless individuals are the victims of crime at a significantly higher rate than housed individuals” and “that as a result of this higher rate of victimization, homeless individuals experience a heightened sensitivity to perceived threats of violence”). Once counsel opens his or her mind to the possibility of using an expert, and begins to think about what an expert might do in a particular case, counsel will often spot a broad array of possibilities. Judicial receptivity to defense expert testimony and judicial willingness to authorize funding for expert assistance in indigents’ cases can be expected to increase in the wake of the United States Supreme Court’s conspicuous declaration in Hinton v. Alabama, 134 S. Ct. 1081, 1088 (2014) (per curiam) that “‘Criminal cases will arise where the only reasonable and available defense strategy requires consultation with experts or introduction of expert evidence.’”

§ 11.02 SELECTING AN EXPERT

Most scientific fields have numerous sub-specialties. In selecting an expert, counsel first needs to become sufficiently familiar with the scientific issues presented by the case to know what type of specialist is needed. Counsel will usually want to consult defense experts and other authorities in the general field and ask them about sub-specialization. If the prosecution is relying on forensic experts, counsel should ordinarily interview them as well. Many experts, even those employed by the police and law enforcement agencies (like pathologists, toxicologists, fingerprint and ballistics examiners), view themselves as (or will be receptive to an approach by counsel that characterizes them as) neutral and concerned solely with the scientific facts. They will therefore often prove amenable to discussing their findings and the scientific theories underlying their findings with defense counsel. (Some will need to be informed or reminded that they are legally forbidden to obey any instructions they have received from the police or prosecutors not to talk with defense counsel (see § 8.13 supra; many will not.) In the course of these discussions, counsel can become moderately educated in the relevant scientific field. Such discussions with the opposing experts also will often provide information that counsel can use in justifying to the judge the need for court appointment or compensation of a defense expert (see § 11.03 infra) and in preparing to cross-examine the prosecution’s experts. Obtaining a prosecution expert’s c.v. may well assist counsel to identify the particular field of sub-specialization implicated by the prosecution’s case. (Or it may, conversely, provide information which defense counsel can use – after consultation with a defense expert – to show that the prosecution expert lacks training in the most germane sub-speciality.)

Once counsel knows enough to identify the specialty or sub-specialty relevant to the case, the next task is to gather a list of experts in that field and to develop a set of preferences. Local experts are preferable, as long as they have the requisite expertise and credentials, since they will be most readily available on a flexible schedule for pretrial consultations and – if they end up testifying – easiest to book for the dates of any relevant pretrial hearings and of trial. It is also a relevant consideration that, if counsel does decide to put the consulting expert on the stand at trial, juries (particularly in non-cosmopolitan areas) tend to favor local experts.

In gathering the names of potential experts and ranking them, counsel should consult: other defense attorneys who have used such experts (some public defender’s offices have compiled lists of local and national experts); experts in the field or related fields whom counsel has reason to trust on the basis of his or her own or other defense attorneys’ prior experience; and faculty members in the relevant departments of the state university, private universities, and community colleges. If the first expert whom counsel chooses to consult expresses an unfavorable or even incriminating opinion but there is reason to doubt it, counsel is free – and, under some circumstances, obliged – to obtain the advice of another expert. See State v. Roseborough, 2010 WL 1694531 (Ohio App. April 23, 2010). An expert’s advice to consult a specialist for additional testing should always be followed up. See e.g., Pruitt v. Neal, 788 F.3d 248, 252, 272 (7th Cir. 2015) ( “[T]he defense’s own expert [psychologist,] Dr. Olvera [“who had been retained by trial counsel to conduct IQ testing of Pruitt but had not testified at trial”] had recommended that counsel contact an expert ‘in dealing with psychosis, such as schizophrenia.’ But trial counsel did not contact such an expert to have Pruitt evaluated, and counsel offered no reason for failing to do so. ¶ . . . [A] reasonably competent attorney would have realized that investigating Pruitt’s mental health further was necessary to prove the defense. It was unreasonable for counsel to fail to contact an expert in psychosis . . . .”); Bemore v. Chappell, 788 F.3d 1151, 1171 (9th Cir. 2015).

Additional considerations involved in selecting a mental health expert, such as a psychiatrist, psychologist, or neurologist, are discussed in § 12.10 infra.

The qualities that counsel seeks in an expert may vary depending on whether counsel plans to use the expert as a consultant, a witness, or both. Obviously, a central consideration in selecting a potential expert witness is how s/he will come across in court to the jury and/or to a judge in a pretrial hearing or a bench trial. For an expert consultant, counsel will be primarily concerned with the expert’s capacity to handle the specific functions for which s/he will be needed, and probably also with how good a team player the expert is likely to be when working with counsel and other members of the defense team.

§ 11.03 Obtaining State Funding for the Expert When the Client Is Indigent

§ 11.03(a) Constitutional Rights to State-Paid Expert Assistance

In Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985), the Court held that the “Fourteenth Amendment’s due process guarantee of fundamental fairness” (id. at 76) requires that the State supply an indigent criminal defendant with the “‘basic tools of an adequate defense’” (id. at 77, quoting Britt v. North Carolina, 404 U.S. 226, 227 (1971)), including, in appropriate cases, state funds for expert witnesses. Accord, McWilliams v. Dunn, 137 S. Ct. 1790 (2017) (“Our decision in Ake v. Oklahoma . . . clearly established that, when certain threshold criteria are met, the State must provide an indigent defendant with access to a mental health expert who is sufficiently available to the defense and independent from the prosecution to effectively ‘assist in evaluation, preparation, and presentation of the defense.’” (id. at 1793); “Unless a defendant is ‘assure[d]’ the assistance of someone who can effectively perform these functions, he has not received the ‘minimum’ to which Ake entitles him.” (id. at 1794)).

The defendant in Ake had requested, and was denied, state funds to hire a private psychiatrist. The Court began by explaining that the question of whether an expert constitutes a “‘basic tool of an adequate defense’” (470 U.S. at 77), so as to activate a due process right to state-paid expert assistance, must be determined in accordance with the three-pronged balancing test of Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976), which considers: (i) the “private interest that will be affected by the action of the State”; (ii) “the governmental interest that will be affected if the safeguard is to be provided”; and (iii) “the probable value of the additional or substitute procedural safeguards that are sought, and the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the affected interest if those safeguards are not provided.” Ake, 470 U.S. at 77. See also §§ 13.06(a), 38.09 infra. The Court easily resolved the first two considerations in Ake’s favor, finding that a defendant’s “private interest in the accuracy of a criminal proceeding that places [his or her] . . . life or liberty at risk is almost uniquely compelling,” Ake, 470 U.S. at 78, and that the State’s financial interest in avoiding payment of a defense psychiatrist was “not substantial,” especially “in light of the compelling interest of both the State and the individual in accurate dispositions,” id. at 79. In applying the third consideration, the Court focused upon “the pivotal role that psychiatry has come to play in criminal proceedings,” id. at 79, and the value of psychiatric testimony in enhancing “the potential accuracy of the jury’s determination,” id. at 83, and concluded that:

when a defendant demonstrates to the trial judge that his sanity at the time of the offense is to be a significant factor at trial, the State must, at a minimum, assure the defendant access to a competent psychiatrist who will conduct an appropriate examination and assist in evaluation, preparation, and presentation of the defense.

Id. at 83. Since Ake had satisfied these criteria and had shown psychiatric testimony to be a significant factor both at trial and sentencing, the Court held that the denial of a state-supplied psychiatrist violated due process.

Ake was a capital case, and Chief Justice Burger, concurring in the judgment, would have limited its holding to capital cases. Id. at 87 (Burger, C.J., concurring); see also id. (Rehnquist, J., dissenting). But the majority opinion is worded broadly to encompass both capital and noncapital cases. Moreover, the Court identified the interest in state-paid expert assistance as being “compelling” whenever an individual’s “life or liberty” is at stake. Id. at 78. Accordingly, the lower courts in most States have applied Ake’s due process doctrine to noncapital cases. See, e.g., Cowley v. Stricklin, 929 F.2d 640 (11th Cir. 1991); Little v. Armontrout, 835 F.2d 1240 (8th Cir. 1987) (en banc); Jones v. Sterling, 210 Ariz. 308, 314-15, 110 P.3d 1271, 1277-78 (2005); In re Allen R., 127 N.H. 718, 721-22, 506 A.2d 329, 331-32 (1986) (respondent in delinquency case had federal and state constitutional right to state-paid psychologist to testify at confession suppression hearing). See generally Donna H. Lee, Note, In the Wake of Ake v. Oklahoma: An Indigent Criminal Defendant’s Lack of Ex Parte Access to Expert Services, 67 N.Y.U. L. REV. 154, 170-71 n.122 (1992).

Although Ake itself dealt only with psychiatric experts, the Court’s reasoning applies to other kinds of expert assistance as well. The Ake decision is grounded upon the State’s due process obligation to afford an indigent defendant “access to the raw material integral to the building of an effective defense," 470 U.S. at 77. The same obligation exists whether the necessary “raw material” is a psychiatrist or some other type of expert. “Criminal cases will arise where the only reasonable and available defense strategy requires consultation with experts or introduction of expert evidence.” Hinton v. Alabama, 134 S. Ct. 1081, 1088 (2014) (per curiam). In these cases, the state must furnish the necessary funds. See, e.g., Little v. Armontrout, 835 F.2d 1240, 1241, 1244-45 (8th Cir. 1987) (en banc) (trial court violated Due Process by denying the defense’s motion for appointment of an “expert in hypnosis” to assist the defense at a pretrial suppression hearing and at trial in challenging the hypnotically enhanced identification of the defendant by the complainant); Williams v. Martin, 618 F.2d 1021 (4th Cir. 1980) (requiring the provision of a state-paid independent pathologist to an indigent defendant charged with homicide when the cause of death is debatable and medically complicated); Cherry v. Estelle, 507 F.2d 242, 243 (5th Cir. 1975), subsequent history in 424 F. Supp. 548 (N.D. Tex. 1976) (impliedly recognizing the right to provision of a state-paid independent ballistics expert under certain circumstances, see Hoback v. Alabama, 607 F.2d 680, 682 n.1 (5th Cir. 1979)); Bowen v. Eyman, 324 F. Supp. 339 (D. Ariz. 1970) (requiring provision of a state-paid defense expert when the prosecution has failed to conduct potentially exonerating chemical tests); Jones v. Sterling, 210 Ariz. at 314-15, 110 P.3d at 1277-78 (requiring provision of an expert to assist in the development of a selective-prosecution defense when the defendant has presented a credible preliminary showing of discrimination); Jacobson v. Anderson, 203 Ariz. 543, 57 P.3d 733 (Ariz. App. 2002) (a defendant in a prosecution for vehicular manslaughter and reckless endangerment is entitled to necessary funding for an accident reconstructionist and a criminalist); People v. Lawson, 163 Ill. 2d 187, 206, 218-230, 644 N.E.2d 1172, 1181, 1187-92, 206 Ill. Dec. 119, 134-39 (1994) (the “trial court abused its discretion by denying defendant’s motion for expert assistance” of a shoeprint expert “to testify at trial and assist in the preparation of his defense”); People v. Watson, 36 Ill. 2d 228, 221 N.E.2d 645 (1966) (requiring provision of a state-paid examiner of questioned documents); State v. Moore, 321 N.C. 327, 328, 331, 343-46, 364 S.E.2d 648, 649-50, 656-58 (1988) (the trial judge erred in denying the defendant’s request for appointment of an independent psychiatrist to assist in challenging the voluntariness of his confession, and also erred in denying the defense’s request for a fingerprint expert to challenge the “state expert’s conclusion that defendant’s palm print was found at the scene of the attack”); Rev. v. State, 897 S.W.2d 333, 335, 346 (Tex. Crim. App. 1995) (the trial judge violated Due Process by denying the defense’s motion for the appointment of an independent forensic pathologist “to assist in the evaluation, preparation and presentation of his defense”), and cases collected in id. at 338 n.4; Stephen A. Saltzburg, The Duty to Investigate and the Availability of Expert Witnesses, 86 FORDHAM L. REV. 1709 (2018).

The key to showing that the circumstances of any particular case give rise to an entitlement to a particular type of expert is to satisfy the third prong of the Mathews v. Eldridge test employed in Ake by making an adequate factual demonstration of “the probable value of the additional or substitute procedural safeguards that are sought, and the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the affected interest if those safeguards are not provided.” Ake, 470 U.S. at 77. Counsel will need to show that the scientific test that the expert can perform “is likely to be a significant factor in [the respondent’s] . . . defense [and that] with such assistance, the [respondent] . . . might have a reasonable chance of success.” Id. at 82-83. Compare Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320, 323 n.1 (1985) (finding no violation of due process in the denial of funds for defense experts where an indigent defendant “offered little more than undeveloped assertions that the requested assistance would be beneficial”). The procedures for making such a showing in an individual case are discussed in § 11.03(b) infra.

Because the Court in Ake “conclude[d] that the Due Process Clause guaranteed to Ake the assistance he requested and was denied, [the Court had] . . . no occasion to consider the applicability of the Equal Protection Clause, or the Sixth Amendment” to the issue of state-paid expert assistance. 470 U.S. at 87 n.13. Counsel can, and should, couple an Ake due process claim with: (i) an argument that the Equal Protection Clause guarantees the respondent the same defensive resources that a nonindigent respondent could purchase and that are necessary “to assure . . . an adequate opportunity to present his [or her] claims fairly in the context of the State’s [delinquency] . . . process,” Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600, 616 (1974) (dictum); see, e.g., Williams v. Martin, 618 F.2d at 1025-27; cf. Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956); and (ii) an argument that the Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process of witnesses affords an indigent respondent the right to a state-paid expert witness, see, e.g., People v. Watson, 36 Ill. 2d at 232-34, 221 N.E.2d at 648-49. While these doctrines have not as yet been extensively developed, counsel may be able to argue that they support a broader right to state-paid assistance than the due process doctrine established in Ake and therefore afford a right to an expert even when the facts do not bring a case within the Ake doctrine.

McWilliams v. Dunn, supra, raised the question whether “a State must provide an indigent defendant with a qualified mental health expert retained specifically for the defense team, not a neutral expert available to both parties” (137 S. Ct. at 1799), but the Court left that question unresolved (id. at 1799-1800). It upheld McWilliams’ right to a state-paid mental health expert on the narrower ground that “Ake clearly established that a defendant must receive the assistance of a mental health expert who is sufficiently available to the defense and independent from the prosecution to effectively ‘assist in evaluation, preparation, and presentation of the defense’” (id. at 1793) and that the trial court’s order requiring “Dr. John Goff, a neuropsychologist employed by the State’s Department of Mental Health” to examine McWilliams “‘in order to have the test results available for his sentencing hearing’” (id. at 1795) did not provide the requisite assistance.

“We are willing to assume that Alabama met the examination portion of this requirement by providing for Dr. Goff’s examination of McWilliams. . . . But what about the other three parts? Neither Dr. Goff nor any other expert helped the defense evaluate Goff’s report or McWilliams’ extensive medical records and translate these data into a legal strategy. Neither Dr. Goff nor any other expert helped the defense prepare and present arguments that might, for example, have explained that McWilliams’ purported malingering was not necessarily inconsistent with mental illness (as an expert later testified in postconviction proceedings . . .). Neither Dr. Goff nor any other expert helped the defense prepare direct or cross-examination of any witnesses, or testified at the judicial sentencing hearing himself.” (Id. at 1800-01.)

Despite the Court’s “unwillingness to resolve the broader question whether Ake clearly established a right to an expert independent from the prosecution” (id. at 1800), defense counsel should feel comfortable in arguing that the answer to that question is, yes. Two aspects of McWilliams support this answer. First, the Court notes that McWilliams’ brief “points to language in Ake that seems to foresee that consequence. See, e.g., 470 U.S., at 81, 105 S. Ct. 1087 (‘By organizing a defendant’s mental history, examination results and behavior, and other information, interpreting it in light of their expertise, and then laying out their investigative and analytic process to the jury, the psychiatrists for each party enable the jury to make its most accurate determination of the truth on the issue before them’ (emphasis added))” (id. at 1799).

Second, McWilliams came to the Court in a federal habeas corpus posture, so the issue presented was not whether Ake requires the appointment of an independent defense expert but, rather, whether Ake so “clearly established” that requirement as to make it enforceable in collateral-attack proceedings governed by 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d) [see § 39.03(b) infra]. Under the Supreme Court’s § 2254(d) jurisprudence, a finding that a right is “clearly established” by any given precedent requires a significantly stronger showing than that the right flows logically from the precedent. See, e.g., Virginia v. LeBlanc, 137 S. Ct. 1726, 1728-29 (2017). So the defense answer to a prosecutor’s predictable argument that McWilliams leaves room for the denial of an independent defense expert under Ake is “not much room.” In any event, counsel should urge trial courts that the appointment of an independent defense expert is the only way in which the federal constitutional requirements of Ake and McWilliams can be safely or efficiently implemented. The McWilliams opinion itself observes that “As a practical matter, the simplest way for a State to meet this [Ake] standard may be to provide a qualified expert retained specifically for the defense team. This appears to be the approach that the overwhelming majority of jurisdictions have adopted. See Brief for National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers et al. as Amici Curiae 8-35 (describing practice in capital-active jurisdictions).” McWilliams, 137 S. Ct. at 1800. And “as a practical matter,” any trial court that seeks to satisfy Ake and McWilliams by appointing a neutral expert rather than a defense-team expert is engaging in a risky crapshoot. In the ordinary case, the first point in time at which the facts necessary to adjudicate a defense contention that a neutral expert provided less-than-adequate assistance under a post hoc record-specific audit of the expert’s performance will be the conclusion of the presentation of evidence. In many cases, as in McWilliams, such an adjudication will be impossible until after trial, appeals, and initial postconviction proceedings have become past history. (Note the McWilliams Court’s partial reliance on what “an expert later testified in postconviction proceedings” (id.).) At these late stages, the finding of an Ake–McWilliams violation will require that the trial be aborted (or the conviction set aside) and a retrial ordered. Trial judges should be responsive to the argument that jeopardizing the finality of the trial they are conducting by failing to take the “simplest,” safest step for implementing Ake — “to provide a qualified expert retained specifically for the defense team” (McWilliams, 137 S. Ct. at 1800) — would be altogether improvident.

§ 11.03(b)   Procedures for Obtaining State Funds for an Expert

313
Many jurisdictions have had procedures for state funding of experts for indigent criminal defendants and delinquency respondents since long before Ake. These procedures typically have suffered from either or both of two flaws: (i) they establish a ceiling, or maximum amount, of state funding in an individual case; or (ii) they require that defense counsel demonstrate the need for an expert by setting forth facts in a motion that is available to the prosecution and alerts the prosecutor to defense strategy. Counsel can challenge both of these defects under Ake. The due process right to state-paid expert assistance established in Ake cannot be restricted by financial considerations. The Court specifically held that “where the potential accuracy of the [factfinder’s] determination is . . . dramatically enhanced [by the expert’s testimony], and where the interests of the individual and the State in an accurate proceeding are substantial, the State’s interest in its fisc must yield.” 470 U.S. at 83. And the Ake decision explicitly assumes that the defense will be permitted to make showings in support of state-funded experts by ex parte proceedings. See id. at 82-83 (explaining that the due process right will be activated when the defense “make[s] an ex parte threshold showing to the trial court”). See, e.g., Andrews v. State, 2018 WL 2252180, at *2 (Fla. May 17, 2018) (“In making a showing of particularized need [for funding to retain a defense expert], a defendant may be required to expose privileged information or attorney work product, depending on the type of expert assistance requested. Requiring a defendant to reveal to the prosecutor the name of an expert witness whom the defendant may wish to consider calling, along with the reasons why this witness may be of value to the defense, is ‘contrary to the work-product doctrine because it would serve to highlight the thought processes and legal analysis of the attorneys involved.’ . . . Even if the defendant is only required to disclose the expert’s name and area of expertise, that is information that the State would otherwise not be entitled to know at that stage. In fact, the State’s presence at the hearing puts the defendant in the difficult situation of having to choose between fully supporting the motion for the appointment of an expert and not revealing information to the State that it would not otherwise be privy to. . . . ¶ Additionally, depending on the reason for the expert requested, it is possible that a defendant may be forced to disclose self-incriminating information, in violation of the defendant’s Fifth Amendment rights. . . . ¶ Accordingly, ex parte hearings are necessary in this context to protect indigent defendants’ rights. Federal law and other states also require ex parte hearings in this context.”); accord, Putnal v. State, 814 S.E.2d 307, 315-17 (Ga. 2018) (detailing in a useful exposition many of the ways in which a refusal to allow an indigent to proceed ex parte and under seal when applying for state funding can prejudice the defense); State v. Dahl, 874 N.W.2d 348, 353 (Iowa 2016) (“When a trial court deems an indigent defendant’s application for appointment of a private investigator may have some merit but does not contain adequate information for the court to determine whether it should grant the application, the court should hold an ex parte hearing before ruling on the merits of the application. At that hearing, the court should require the defendant to provide additional information that will allow it to rule on the merits. If the court holds an ex parte hearing, the court must report the ex parte hearing. The court must also seal any transcript or order that would disclose defense strategy or work product and file a separate order announcing its decision to grant or deny the application.”). Certainly, the respondent cannot be compelled to disclose the theory and strategy of the defense to the prosecutor as the precondition of state financial assistance. Cf. Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 384-94 (1968); Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605, 607-12 (1972). See generally Lee,
If local procedure allows ex parte motions for state-paid assistance and does not establish a ceiling that would conflict with counsel’s needs in any particular case, counsel should follow it in drafting and filing the motions. (If unfamiliar with the prevailing procedures, counsel should check local statutes and court rules and consult experienced defense attorneys practicing in the juvenile court.) In particular, counsel should take advantage of statutes, court rules, and local practice that support the provision of funds to the defense without the factually specific preliminary demonstration of need required to trigger the due process doctrine announced in Ake.

When practicing in jurisdictions whose standards or procedures for state funding of defense experts are more restrictive than those established by Ake and are too restrictive to satisfy counsel’s needs, counsel will have to file a motion requesting state funding and challenging those aspects of local practice that violate Ake. Cf. Hinton v. Alabama, 134 S. Ct. 1081, 1083, 1085, 1088 (2014) (per curiam) (“Hinton’s trial attorney rendered constitutionally deficient performance” by presenting a toolmark “expert he knew to be inadequate” when counsel “could not find a better expert willing to work for $1,000” and counsel mistakenly “believed that he was unable [under state law] to obtain more than $1,000 to cover expert fees”; the trial judge who granted counsel’s request for funding for an expert cited a $1,000 statutory maximum, but counsel should “have corrected the trial judge’s mistaken belief that a $1,000 limit applied” and sought additional funding); Yun Hseng Liao v. Junious, 817 F.3d 678, 682-83, 695 (9th Cir. 2016) (the defendant was deprived of effective assistance of counsel because his lawyer relied on a court clerk’s erroneous statement that a motion for funds for an additional expert evaluation of the defendant had been denied when in fact it had been granted; counsel’s “failure to verify what the court clerk” said, and counsel’s failure to conduct “any further inquiry into the status of his motion,” and his decision to instead proceed “to trial without the benefit of the [additional] medical examination” were prejudicial because they “eviscerated a viable defense”); People v. Kennedy, 2018 WL 3213033, at *9-*10 (Mich. June 29, 2018) (holding that Ake supersedes the state statutory provision regulating appointment of defense experts for an indigent, and adopting a “reasonable probability” standard for applying Ake: “Until an expert is consulted, a defendant might often be unaware of how, precisely, the expert would aid the defense. If, in such cases, the defendant were required to prove in detail with a high degree of certainty that an expert would benefit the defense, the defendant would essentially be tasked with the impossible: to get an expert, the defendant would need to already know what the expert would say. At the same time, the defendant’s bare assertion that an expert would be beneficial cannot, without more, entitle him or her to an expert; otherwise, every defendant would receive funds for experts upon request. ¶ A majority of states confronting this problem have adopted a reasonable probability standard.”).

The requisite showing for activating Ake rights is described in § 11.03(a) supra. As explained there, counsel should ordinarily ground the request for expert funding not only on Ake’s due process ground but also on equal-protection and Sixth Amendment compulsory-process grounds. If local practice does not provide for motions to be filed ex parte, counsel should couch the assertion of the need for expert assistance in very general terms, explaining that a more particularized description would reveal counsel’s “litigating strategies” (United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 862 n.3 (1982)) to the prosecution, and offering to make a more detailed factual showing ex parte – either in chambers or by a sealed affidavit – as contemplated by Ake, 470 U.S. at 82-83.

§ 11.04 WORKING WITH THE EXPERT DURING THE PRETRIAL STAGE

§ 11.04(a) Working with an Expert Consultant to Prepare the Case

It will often be the case that counsel does not know enough about the expert’s field to identify all of the functions an expert can usefully serve. So it is advisable, in any case involving a defense consultant, for counsel to enlist the expert’s advice at the outset in defining the expert’s role in the case. And because cases often take unexpected turns, counsel should check in with defense consultants periodically to discuss new developments in the case and to consider whether any of these call for expanding or modifying the scope of the services the experts are providing.

Still, counsel cannot afford to rely entirely on the expert when issues relating to his or her specialty arise in the case. Counsel himself or herself will need to acquire considerable familiarity with the field in order to be able to cross-examine prosecution experts effectively. See, e.g., John T. Philipsborn, Feature: When Fine Print Matters; Reviewing Mental Health Assessment and Testing-Related Literature and Test Manuals is a Key to Effectively Preparing and Examining Mental Health Experts, 37-FEB THE CHAMPION 40 (February 2013). A solid grasp of the field will also be crucial if counsel decides to call an expert witness for the defense at a pretrial hearing or at trial, so that counsel can plan how best to present the expert’s testimony and to deal with objections by the prosecutor. Here again, an expert consultant can play a vital role by identifying for counsel the specific matters s/he should seek to learn, steering counsel to background sources, explaining technical matters that counsel inevitably will find difficult, and addressing other questions counsel may have.

§ 11.04(b) Expert Witnesses

§ 11.04(b)(I) Obtaining a Written Report from the Expert for Use at a Pretrial Hearing or Trial

In any case in which an expert witness will testify at a pretrial hearing or at trial, counsel will probably want to have the expert prepare a written report for use at the hearing or trial. Such a report will be useful to the expert in reviewing the case prior to the hearing or trial; it will be useful to counsel in examining the expert at the hearing or trial; and it may be admissible in evidence to illuminate and clarify the witness’s testimony (see § 33.15 infra). So used, it provides an easy way of assuring that all points are presented and cohesively connected.

A report of this sort, however, may be subject to discovery by the prosecution after the expert has testified at trial, whether or not it has been used in direct examination or reviewed by the expert in preparing to testify (see § 27.12(b) infra); and it might even become discoverable before trial under the circumstances and within the limitations described in §§ 9.11-9.13 supra.
Counsel should therefore ask the expert not to make an initial report in writing. The risks are altogether too great that a legally untutored person – or even a person with considerable forensic experience who has not been thoroughly advised about the defense to be presented in a particular case – may expose himself or herself to impeachment by unconsidered or incautious phrasing.

After the expert has made an initial oral report (or more than one, in complex matters), counsel should decide whether s/he is going to use that expert in the respondent’s defense. If so, the expert’s testimony should be hammered out, with attention to details of phrasing, in a series of interviews and dry-run examinations in which counsel advises the expert completely of the needs and pitfalls of the case and of the expert’s role in it. Counsel should also inform the expert that his or her report will be available to the prosecutor for cross-examination and should instruct the expert, with specific examples, of the ways in which an adept cross-examiner can turn ambiguous language into inconsistencies. Then the expert should be asked to prepare a draft report, which can be finalized after it has been reviewed by counsel. See § 33.15 infra. Because any notes made by the expert in the course of his or her examinations, researches, or preparations may also be discoverable, counsel should tell the expert before the expert begins any work on the case that notes or memoranda must be made with extreme caution.

§ 11.04(b)(2) Preparing the Expert to Testify

An expert’s testimony should be keyed to the level of understanding of the fact-finder. Obviously, in a jury trial the expert’s testimony should be phrased more simply than it needs to be in a bench trial. Use of commonly intelligible, dramatic illustrations and examples is one of the best methods of clarifying expert testimony. Concepts of mathematical probability, for example, may be expressed in terms of the likelihood that a coin which is flipped fairly will come up heads 5,000 times in a row. Or the level of probability that the expert’s test results are not due to chance may be favorably compared with the level of probability used in testing new medical drugs before they can be marketed. For additional suggestions concerning expert testimony, see §§ 33.11-33.16 infra.
Chapter 12
Representing Clients Who Are Mentally Ill or Intellectually Disabled

Part A. Overview: Stages at Which the Respondent’s Mental Problems May Be Relevant

§ 12.01 THE INITIAL INTERVIEW AND SUBSEQUENT CLIENT COUNSELING

As explained in § 5.03 supra, the initial interview of the child should be conducted outside the presence of the child’s parents, siblings, or other relatives. There is far too great a chance that the child will shape his or her account of the events to please a parent or relative or that the family member will intrude his or her own personality and biases into the interview. The same is true of all subsequent meetings with the client for the purposes of explaining the case, preparing the client’s testimony, or counseling the client on fundamental issues such as whether to plead guilty or go to trial.

This general rule may need to be modified in the case of some severely mentally ill or intellectually disabled clients. If the client’s mental problems are causing problems in attorney-client communications (either because of the client’s language problems or comprehension difficulties), it may aid communication to bring in a relative or a friend who has had longtime dealings with the client. In these circumstances counsel will need to balance the potential benefits of such a procedure against the risks of biasing the results of the interview or client counseling session.

An alternative to a family member is a mental health professional of some sort – a psychiatrist, psychologist, neurologist, psychiatric social worker, and so forth. When the child has a previous relationship with such a professional, counsel should consult that professional and consider bringing the professional into some of the meetings between the client and counsel. In any event, counsel should seek the professional’s assistance in understanding the client and the professional’s advice concerning problems and the best techniques for communicating with the client. If the client has no previous relationship with a professional, counsel should consider retaining a professional specially to assist counsel in understanding and communicating with the client as well as for other purposes in the case. Difficulties and possible adverse consequences of the decision to bring a new mental health professional into a case are discussed in §§ 12.08-12.10 infra.

Whether or not a family member or a mental health professional is brought in to assist, counsel who is representing a client with mental problems will obviously need to take special pains and precautions in evaluating the client’s perceptions, recollections, and interpretations of pertinent facts, in eliciting those facts through interviewing, in preparing the client to testify or for other court proceedings and for interviews with court personnel, and in explaining and talking through with the client all of the matters that bear on decisions that the client must make (such as whether to plead guilty or contest guilt) and decisions in which the client and counsel both participate (such as whether certain witnesses should be called to testify). Mental illness and mental limitations potentially affect every aspect of the client’s comprehension and behavior, often in subtle and nonobvious ways, and so potentially affect every aspect of the client’s interaction with counsel. In the initial interview and subsequent meetings with a mentally ill or intellectually disabled client, counsel should be constantly attentive to the areas and dimensions of the client’s impairment. See Christopher Slobogin, The American Bar Association’s Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards: Revisions for the Twenty-First Century, 44 HASTINGS CONST. L. Q. 1, 4 (2016) (“Defense attorneys may fail to adjust their style of communication to take into account impairments of their clients, . . . or may focus solely on narrow legal issues when a more holistic approach might prove both more beneficial to their clients and less likely to miss key aspects of the relevant legal or psychological problems.”). If counsel decides at some point to apply for court funds for retention of a psychiatrist or psychologist (see § 12.09 infra), counsel’s previous observations may provide the facts necessary to support the application. See generally Slobogin, supra at 4, 8, 19-20, 21-22, 27-28, 33-34.

§ 12.02 THE INITIAL HEARING

In some jurisdictions judges can order a mental examination of the client at the Initial Hearing. See § 12.11 infra. As explained in § 12.12 infra, counsel should ordinarily oppose such examinations.

If an examination is held, counsel may find that the results are being used against the respondent at the detention hearing. The respondent’s psychiatric disorders may be cited by the prosecutor, probation officer, or judge as one of the bases for finding that pretrial detention is warranted by a danger to self or others. See § 4.17 supra. Conversely, a respondent’s mental problems may provide counsel with arguments against detention – or against detention in particular facilities – especially if those problems would make the respondent highly vulnerable to physical or emotional abuse in the facility or if detention would interrupt or adversely affect an ongoing course of therapy in a community-based program.

Counsel also must be cognizant of the fact that some clients will prefer a hospital setting to a juvenile detention facility or will benefit more from detention in the former than from detention in the latter. Thus in cases in which the court decides to order secure detention because of the nature of the offense or the respondent’s prior record, a client with mental problems may direct counsel to seek a court-ordered mental examination on an in-patient basis. Occasionally, counsel may want to give independent consideration to this possibility, although it will very seldom be a wise course of action except in the case of a client with a substantial history of prior hospitalizations or state mental examinations, because the cost of the examination in disclosure of potentially damaging information will usually outweigh its benefit in improving the conditions of the client’s detention. See § 12.12 infra.

§ 12.03 THE INVESTIGATIVE STAGE
As explained in §§ 12.08-12.09 infra, counsel should arrange a mental examination of the respondent by a defense psychiatrist or psychologist if it appears that the respondent is suffering from mental problems. This should be done early in the investigative stage. See § 12.08 infra.

Counsel should also begin immediately to gather any institutional or agency records concerning the mental health of the respondent. These include school records (particularly special education records); prior psychiatric or psychological reports contained in a court file or in probation or other agency files if the client was charged in any prior juvenile delinquency or PINS cases or if s/he was the subject of a child protective case; hospital records generated by emergency or out-patient treatment or periods of hospitalization; and records compiled by private psychiatrists or psychologists or community mental health centers where the respondent was evaluated or had therapy. In order to obtain these records, counsel will need release forms signed by the client and the client’s parent or guardian, authorizing the release of these confidential records to counsel or his or her investigator. See § 5.11 supra.

§ 12.04 PRETRIAL MOTIONS AND OTHER PRETRIAL PLEADINGS

There are a number of pretrial motions and other pleadings that may be required by the client’s mental problems. As already indicated, counsel may need to file a motion with the court seeking court funds for retention of a defense expert. See § 12.09 infra. Depending upon the results of the examination and the facts of the case, counsel also may be able to file the following defense motions:

(a) a motion for diversion on the grounds that the client’s primary social problem, the mental illness or intellectual disability, is already being dealt with by a community-based program that counsel has arranged (see Chapter 19);

(b) a motion to suppress a confession or other incriminating statement (i) on the due process ground that it was not “the product of a rational intellect and a free will” (Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 398 (1978); see § 24.05(b) infra) or (ii) on cognate state-law grounds (see § 24.16 infra), or (iii) on the ground that the respondent’s capacity to make a “knowing and intelligent” waiver of Miranda rights was critically impaired (see § 24.10(b) infra); or (iv) on the ground that the respondent’s waiver of Miranda rights was involuntary because interrogators overbore his or her limited powers of resistance (see § 24.10(a) infra). See generally William C. Follette, Richard A. Leo, & Deborah Davis, Mental Health and False Confessions, in Elizabeth Kelley (ed.), Representing People with Mental Disabilities (2017) [Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=3028918].

(c) A suppression motion challenging the seizure of tangible evidence through a purportedly consensual search, on the ground that the respondent’s mental problems were exploited in obtaining the consent (see § 23.18(a) infra).

In those rare cases in which counsel intends to pursue an insanity defense at trial (see § 12.23 infra), s/he will need to check local requirements for giving notice of such a defense. Many jurisdictions require that the defense be specially pleaded, or that written notification of intention to raise it be filed within a specified period (usually 30 days) after arraignment. On the equally rare occasions on which counsel decides to raise an incompetency claim (see § 12.19 infra), there will also be local rules governing the manner and timing of the claim.

§ 12.05 PLEA NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE PROSECUTOR

As explained in § 14.16 infra, some prosecutors are motivated by a desire to aid children to receive rehabilitative services for whatever problems led them to become involved in the juvenile justice system. In engaging in plea negotiations with these prosecutors, counsel may be able to persuade the prosecutor to agree to diversion (or, if the prosecutor is intent upon a conviction, to agree to a sentence of probation) by telling the prosecutor about the child’s mental problems and about the programs that counsel has arranged to deal with those mental problems.

§ 12.06 TRIAL

The insanity defense, although not advisable (see § 12.23 infra), is available as a defense at trial in most jurisdictions. See § 12.21 infra. Psychiatric evidence also may be relevant to a defense of infancy. See § 17.04(b) infra. Some jurisdictions recognize a defense of “diminished capacity,” which permits the respondent to use evidence of impaired mental capacity to show that s/he was incapable of forming the requisite mens rea for the charged offense(s). See § 33.21 infra. In a smaller number of jurisdictions, expert testimony is admissible to show that the respondent’s psychological proclivities make it unlikely that s/he would commit a crime of the kind charged. See id.

§ 12.07 DISPOSITION

Counsel can sometimes use the respondent’s mental problems as a mitigating factor at disposition. It is especially persuasive to be able to show that the respondent has been successfully attending a community-based program arranged by counsel to deal with the mental problems. This evidence may be the decisive factor in inducing the judge to grant probation. See § 38.14 infra. In cases in which the judge is intent upon ordering placement in a secure facility, the evidence of the respondent’s mental problems and successful adjustment to the community-based program may persuade the judge to place the respondent in a therapeutic facility with psychiatric services rather than a juvenile correctional facility. Potential uses of neuroscientific evidence at sentencing are discussed in Christopher Slobogin, Neuroscience Nuance: Dissecting the Relevance of Neuroscience in Adjudicating Criminal Culpability, 4 JOURNAL OF LAW & THE BIOSCIENCES 577 (December 2017); John H. Blume & Emily C. Paavola, Life, Death, and Neuroimaging: The Advantages and Disadvantages of the Defense’s Use of Neuroimages in Capital Cases – Lessons from the Front, 62 MERCER L. REV. 909 (2011).

Part B. Retention of a Defense Psychiatrist or Psychologist

321
§ 12.08 REASONS FOR RETAINING A MENTAL HEALTH EXPERT: THE MANY FUNCTIONS A DEFENSE EXPERT CAN PERFORM IN A DELINQUENCY CASE

§ 12.08(a) Using a Mental Health Expert as a Witness at a Pretrial Hearing or Trial

In any case in which counsel presents a mental defense at trial (see § 12.06 supra; §§ 12.21-23, 33.21 infra), counsel will probably need to call a mental health professional to testify as an expert witness. Counsel also may need to call a mental health expert as a witness at a suppression hearing in which the client’s mental problem bears upon a ground for suppressing a statement or tangible evidence (see § 12.04 supra).

In most cases in which a mental health expert serves as a testifying witness, s/he will be crucial in ways that go beyond presenting factual information based on his or her examination of the respondent and explaining its medical and psychological significance in light of his or her specialized knowledge of a scientific field. S/he can make the respondent’s mental life accessible to the fact-finder (whether that is a judge at a suppression hearing, a jury at trial, or a judge at a bench trial), organizing and presenting the respondent’s perceptions and actions as a comprehensible and coherent story and “pedigreeing” that story by showing that it has an extensive scientific foundation and wasn’t made up to order. S/he can provide concepts and contexts to frame information – ways of thinking about mental disorders, their manifestations, their predisposing and precipitating factors, and their prognosis. Where predictions are needed (for example, regarding the respondent’s likely response to treatment), s/he can make them; but s/he can also provide the basis for predictions without speaking to them explicitly (e.g., by testifying about the availability of treatment sources and inspiring confidence in them). She can present information obtained from third parties that would otherwise be inadmissible hearsay – and information from records that lack sufficient authentication for admission as independent exhibits – by testifying that s/he relied on these sources of information in forming his or her opinion, and then relating the information in detail. See § 33.13 infra.

§ 12.08(b) Potential Functions of a Mental Health Expert Other Than Testifying at a Pretrial Hearing or Trial

Beyond the functions that a mental health professional can perform as an expert witness, s/he can assist the defense in a wide range of ways to prepare a delinquency case for trial or disposition.

One such function has already been mentioned: If counsel is experiencing difficulties in communicating with the client, a mental health professional can serve as a facilitator. See § 12.01 supra. A mental health professional can help counsel understand what the client is saying, thinking, and feeling. S/he can help counsel to understand the client’s sensitivities, resistances, and motivations. If there are matters the client finds it difficult to hear or consider, a mental health professional will usually be better able than counsel to talk with the client about these matters. For example, in what is likely to be a flashpoint for some clients in cases involving mental defenses, a mental health professional can help the client get a fix on what terms like “mental defenses” and “being mentally ill” do and don’t imply, and to accept the implications of using a defense of this sort to seek a favorable outcome in the case. If there are subjects that the client is blocked against discussing – or simply too embarrassed to discuss – with counsel, a mental health professional is trained and experienced in cutting through precisely those barriers. Sometimes it is only with the professional’s assistance that – even after the client has been gotten to open up to counsel about closeted thoughts, feelings, experiences and events – the client can be persuaded to testify about these intensely disturbing matters in open court.

During the pretrial investigation of the case, a mental health expert can help counsel to identify what records might be available to document the client’s history of mental problems (e.g., hospital records, school records, other institutional records, see § 12.03 supra) and how to find them. Once those records have been obtained, the expert can help counsel to understand the records (see, e.g., McWilliams v. Dunn, 137 S. Ct. 1790, 1800 (2017)): – the abbreviations and partial illegibilities; what recorded observations and events mean; how commonplace or rare those observations and events are; the implications of those observations and events; the implications of material in the records as potential evidence or potential investigative leads; the presence of potential analytic pitfalls in relying on those implications; and – often most important – what the absence of particular events or information from the records may signify. (See Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Silver Blaze, in 1 Sherlock Holmes, The Complete Novels and Stories 455, 472 (Bantam Classic edition 1986):

[The inspector]: “Is there any point to which you would wish to draw my attention?”
[Sherlock Holmes]: “To the curious incident of the dog in the night-time.”
[The inspector]: “The dog did nothing in the night-time.”
[Sherlock Holmes]: “That was the curious incident. . . .”)

As counsel develops a theory of the case (see § 6.02 supra) and considers possible story lines to present in a pretrial suppression hearing or a trial or at sentencing (see § 6.06 supra), an expert can help to identify narratives that explain and connect events. S/he can provide a sounding board for trying out the plausibility of logical inferences and gauging whether a story line is plausible, given the information already known, the information that the expert predicts can be gathered, the realities of life for individuals with a mental condition like the client’s, and the practices and practical constraints of the mental health system. S/he can also provide a different angle of vision – a different interpretive perspective – on people, events, and other aspects of the case. Cf. United States v. Laureys, 866 F.3d 432, 438 (D.C. Cir. 2017) (defense counsel deprived his client of effective assistance of counsel by leading a potential mental health expert “to believe that counsel was interested in establishing only . . . [a] diminished capacity defense” – which “counsel had arrived at through his own online research” but which the expert did not support – and thereby causing the expert to “bow[ ] out of the proceeding altogether, leaving . . . [the defendant] without the benefit of the clinical testimony that . . . [the expert] could have offered, which . . . would have informed the jury’s assessment of . . . [a defense that the defendant “lacked the requisite intent” rather than that he was incapable of forming such an intent] and helped buttress . . . [the defendant’s] own testimony”; “[C]ounsel focused . . . [the expert] on an invalid diminished capacity defense to the exclusion of all other possible defenses.”

Even if the expert is not going to testify, s/he can help counsel to prepare a case for a suppression hearing or trial. S/he can recommend, identify, and enlist other professionals, including other potential testifying experts. S/he can help counsel anticipate and prepare to answer the prosecution’s case by predicting what experts (or what kinds of experts) the prosecutor might recruit and what they are likely to say on the witness stand. S/he can educate counsel about possible lines of attack on prosecution experts and their credentials, theories, analyses, and conclusions (including writings by the prosecution experts, and authoritative texts with which the experts or their writings might be impeached). At the hearing or trial, the expert can observe the testimony of prosecution experts and advise counsel on what subjects to cover in cross-examination and how to handle them. See, e.g., McWilliams v. Dunn, 137 S. Ct. at 1800-01; and see § 31.09 infra.

If the case is a high-profile one that is being covered by the media, the expert can help counsel to present or defend the case in any media forum that is expected or desired. If the media are not yet paying attention to the case and if counsel wishes them to, the expert can help counsel strategize about how to accomplish that goal. If, as is usually the case, counsel would like to deflect or defuse media attention, the expert can help counsel figure out how best to do so.

The expert can assist counsel’s plea bargaining efforts by providing information about the client or available programs that counsel can cite when trying to persuade the prosecutor to divert the case or to agree to a favorable plea and sentence. See § 12.05 supra. If the prosecutor seems open to these options but wants more reassurance, counsel might arrange for the expert to meet with the prosecutor.

Finally, the expert can help counsel to prepare for disposition by identifying appropriate community-based therapeutic programs for the client and perhaps arranging for the client’s admission to a particular program.

§ 12.09 RETAINING A MENTAL HEALTH EXPERT

Ordinarily, counsel should begin the task of finding a psychiatrist or psychologist as soon as counsel detects any indications that the client has significant mental problems. See, e.g., Hernandez v. Martel, 824 F. Supp. 2d 1025, 1066-67 (C.D. Cal. 2011), ruling on this issue endorsed on appeal, Hernandez v. Chappell, 878 F.3d 843, 850 (9th Cir. 2017); Sasser v. Kelley, 2018 WL 1147091 (W.D. Ark. March 2, 2018). As explained in §§ 12.01-12.05 and 12.08(b) supra, the expert may be able to play an invaluable role at even the earliest stages of the case. Also, psychiatrists and psychologists often have such crowded schedules that appointments for evaluations must be scheduled several weeks in advance.

Counsel cannot arrange a mental health evaluation without the client’s agreement. Unless the client is obviously incompetent, s/he should have the final say on whether s/he will be subjected to an evaluation. Counsel can attempt to be persuasive, however, and may be most effective if s/he can get the client to understand that psychiatrists work with “sane” people and not just with people who have “mental illnesses”; that psychiatrists are very useful in helping “well” people with adjustment problems; and that many people who are not at all “sick” see psychiatrists.

There are essentially four ways of obtaining a mental evaluation of the respondent: (i) retaining a private psychiatrist or psychologist at his or her regular rate of compensation (which is usually billed on an hourly basis); (ii) arranging for a private examination on an informal basis, either pro bono or for a sliding-scale fee adjusted to the income of the respondent’s parent or guardian (and/or any other family members who are willing to provide financial assistance); (iii) requesting that the court appoint a state-paid psychiatrist or psychologist for the defense; and (iv) invoking statutory provisions that authorize or trigger a respondent’s examination by a state psychiatrist or psychologist or other purportedly “neutral” expert, on either an in-patient or outpatient basis. Since the cost of a private examination at the usual rates charged by a psychiatrist or psychologist is prohibitive for most clients and their families, counsel usually will need to consider one of the other alternatives.

The major problem with requesting a court-ordered mental examination by a state-employed or “neutral” expert is that the resulting report will be provided not only to defense counsel but also to the judge and the prosecutor. If the report contains aggravating facts about the respondent’s psychic make-up or background, it may afford a basis for pretrial detention, refutation of the defense position on mental issues raised at motions hearings or at trial, and a harsher sentence than the respondent otherwise would have received. See § 12.12 infra. In addition, in some jurisdictions and depending upon subsequent developments in the case, the court may rule that the respondent’s statements about the offense, made during the defense-requested examination and recounted in the report, can be used by the prosecution as evidence of guilt at trial (see § 12.15 infra) or can be used to impeach the respondent’s inconsistent trial testimony (see § 33.09(a) infra).

A request for court funds to hire a defense expert may also be problematic, although less so. First of all, unless the judge permits counsel to make the request on an ex parte basis, the very act of seeking court funds for a mental health expert will tip off the prosecution to the fact that the respondent has mental problems and may lead to the prosecutor’s seeking a court-ordered examination, directing its own investigative efforts into troubling aspects of the respondent’s background, opposing pretrial release or community-based disposition because s/he does not want “a possible nut wandering around loose” or doing all of these things. Even when applications for state-paid expert assistance are received ex parte, it is difficult to keep the prosecutor from learning that the respondent is being attended by a mental-health expert: if the respondent is detained, the expert’s visits to the detention facility will be logged; discussions among counsel and the court about scheduling are likely to reveal that court dates are being set in ways that accommodate the client’s evaluation by a mental health expert; the local low-cost forensic-science community may well be small, close-knit, and loose-lipped. In addition, in some jurisdictions judges will not grant a defense motion for court funds until after a court-ordered examination has shown that the respondent does indeed have mental problems warranting the appointment or retainer of a defense expert. In such jurisdictions the request for the defense expert will activate an order for a mental examination by a state-employed or “neutral” expert, with all of the problems described in the preceding paragraph.

Thus when the respondent’s family is unable to afford the cost of a private examination, it is generally wise for counsel to investigate the resources available in the community for nonofficial, cost-free or pro bono examination. These include: hospital clinics (which often offer individual or group therapy as well as evaluation at nominal or no cost); hospitals with psychiatric residencies; community mental health centers; the county medical society; social welfare agencies; the psychiatry and psychology departments of private universities and of the local branches of the State University, as well as private universities; and private psychiatrists and psychologists who have been involved in the past with the juvenile justice system or whose specialization is child psychology and who might welcome the chance to render service or obtain experience in a delinquency case. ACLU chapters often have substantial numbers of mental-health professionals among their members; the chapter chairperson may be able to provide useful referrals or leads.

If counsel is unable to arrange for the informal examination of an indigent client by a private psychiatrist or psychologist, then counsel will have to apply for state funds to hire a defense expert. Counsel should move the court ex parte for funds to retain, or for court appointment of, a psychiatrist or psychologist as a defense consultant to examine the respondent and advise counsel regarding the respondent’s mental state for purposes of assisting counsel to prepare the defense (see § 11.03 supra). This form of retainer or appointment will assure that information revealed by the client to the expert and information conveyed between counsel and the expert is shielded by attorney-client privilege. See, e.g., People v. Lines, 13 Cal. 3d 500, 507-16, 531 P.2d 793, 797-804, 119 Cal. Rptr. 225, 229-36 (1975); United States v. Alvarez, 519 F.2d 1036, 1045-47 (3d Cir. 1975); Neuman v. State, 297 Ga. 501, 503-09, 773 S.E.2d 716, 719-23 (2015). See also Elijah W. v. Superior Court, 216 Cal. App. 4th 140, 146, 150-60, 156 Cal. Rptr. 3d 592, 595, 599-606 (2013). If the motion is denied, counsel should file whatever objections may be necessary to preserve a claim of error, including federal constitutional error (see § 11.03 supra), in its denial. See Stephen A. Saltzburg, The Duty to Investigate and the Availability of Expert Witnesses, 86 FORDHAM L. REV. 1709 (2018).

If all of the previously described methods for obtaining a defense mental health expert have failed, then counsel must weigh the potential benefits of a court-ordered examination against all of the risks that that process entails. If the benefits clearly outweigh the risks, then counsel should request the court-ordered examination, stating on the record that (1) s/he is making this request only because the court has denied the respondent’s application for state funds for a defense expert, and (2) the respondent is preserving his or her objections to that denial notwithstanding counsel’s subsequent motion for a court-ordered examination.

326

§ 12.10 SELECTING THE MENTAL HEALTH EXPERT: CHOOSING BETWEEN PSYCHIATRISTS AND PSYCHOLOGISTS; CHOOSING AMONG SPECIALTIES

This section sets forth some very rough generalizations about the suitability of various types of mental health experts for juvenile delinquency cases. In selecting an expert for a particular case, counsel is well advised to consult other defense lawyers who have retained a mental health expert in a similar type of case. If other lawyers are unable to make a recommendation, counsel should ask a faculty member of a university psychiatry or psychology department or a reputable local psychiatrist or psychologist to list experts with the specialized qualifications necessary to handle the case effectively.

In the rare case in which counsel raises an incompetency claim (see § 12.19 infra) or an insanity defense (see § 12.23 infra), it is advisable to retain a psychiatrist, preferably one who has a speciality in working with children.

If counsel’s primary goal is to obtain a report about the child’s mental or emotional problems for use in a motion for diversion or for use at disposition, counsel should usually turn to a psychologist, preferably one with experience in working with children. As a general rule, psychologists tend to go deeper into the child’s family history, social background, and emotional problems than many psychiatrists, and the objective tests employed by psychologists are particularly well suited to an assessment of the effects of the child’s mental and emotional problems upon his or her adjustment at school and home. There are two exceptions to this general rule, however. Counsel will need to retain a psychiatrist in any case in which the child is presently taking or appears to require psychotropic medication: psychiatrists have the medical training necessary to calculate and prescribe psychotropic drugs. A psychiatrist also should be retained in cases in which counsel’s dispositional proposal will recommend admission to a residential mental health facility: Most facilities of this sort will be more swayed by a psychiatrist’s recommendation than a psychologist’s.

In cases involving intellectually disabled children, counsel should almost invariably retain a psychologist. An assessment of the respondent’s comprehension and functioning levels will necessitate the I.Q. tests that psychologists administer. For this same reason, in any case in which counsel intends to challenge the respondent’s comprehension of Miranda rights, counsel should usually retain a psychologist, preferably one with some expertise in the specialized area of comprehension of Miranda rights.

In some cases counsel will need to obtain a neurological evaluation of the respondent, which can be conducted by either a neurologist or a psychiatrist with a speciality in neurology. (There are also some psychologists specializing in neurological matters who have the requisite qualifications but these are not common, and counsel should have a recommendation for the particular psychologist from a trusted source before choosing this alternative.) The neurological evaluation is necessary to ascertain whether a child’s disturbed behavior is due to brain damage caused by prenatal problems, birth trauma, or childhood head injuries. Such an explanation of the child’s behavior, especially when coupled with an assessment that the malady is treatable through medication (as it often is), can be highly persuasive in a motion for diversion or in a dispositional argument.

In cases involving sex offenses, counsel should seek out an expert in assessment and treatment of sex offenders. Frequently, behavioral psychologists are especially skilled in developing modes of treatment for sex offenders.

In cases involving children under the age of 12, counsel will need to find a mental health expert with experience in working with such young children. Some psychologists have developed expertise in “play therapy” for very young children and employ versions of the standard psychological tests that are specially modified for use with very young children.

Part C. Mental Health Examinations

§ 12.11 THE JUDICIAL POWER TO ORDER A MENTAL HEALTH EXAMINATION

In most jurisdictions a statute confers upon the juvenile court the power to order a mental health examination of a child who is brought before the court on a delinquency charge. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 16-2315 (2018); Neb. Rev. Stat. § 43-258 (2018); N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act §§ 322.1-322.2 (2018); Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 55.11(a) (2018). Although statutes of this sort often specify that the precise purpose of the examination is to determine the child’s competency to stand trial, see, e.g., D.C. Code § 16-2315(c)(1) & (2) (2018); N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 322.1(3) (2018), many judges order these examinations whenever there are indications of suicidal tendencies or other self-destructive behavior, in order to determine whether the court must take immediate action to prevent the child from harming himself or herself. Some judges employ an even looser practice of ordering mental examinations whenever the respondent is unusually young or there are indications of significant aberrations in the child’s behavior. Finally, as a practical matter, even when the examination is ordered for a narrow purpose, the examining psychiatrist or psychologist may uncover other mental problems in the course of the examination and will then report those problems to the court.

In a number of jurisdictions mental health examinations can be ordered at Initial Hearing. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 16-2315(a) (2018); Minn. Rule Juv. Delinquency Proc. 20.01 (2018). The issue usually arises as a result of a probation officer noticing, during his or her pre-hearing interview of the child, that the respondent is answering questions in a disjointed fashion suggestive of some type of mental problem. The probation officer reports that fact to the judge at Initial Hearing, and the judge then invites the prosecution and defense counsel to address the question whether a mental health examination should be ordered.
If an examination is not ordered at Initial Hearing, the authorizing statutes usually permit the judge to order an examination at any later stage of the case at which it becomes apparent that the child has mental problems. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 322.1(1) (2018) (“[a]t any proceeding . . . when [the court] is of the opinion that the respondent may be an incapacitated person”).

§ 12.12 WHY DEFENSE COUNSEL SHOULD ORDINARILY OPPOSE A MENTAL HEALTH EXAMINATION

As a general rule, it is advisable for counsel to oppose the ordering of a mental health examination. First of all, there are detrimental consequences if the examination reveals that the respondent is, in fact, incompetent or so mentally ill as to be dangerous to self or others. Such a finding can lead to civil commitment and result in the child’s institutionalization in a mental hospital for many years. For this reason a defense attorney in juvenile court should rarely, if ever, contemplate raising a claim of incompetency or interposing a defense of insanity. See §§ 12.19, 12.23 infra. Second, there are potential ancillary consequences of a mental health examination even when the respondent is not found to be mentally ill. During the course of the examination, the client may tell the examining psychiatrist or psychologist incriminating facts – either about the charged offense or about other uncharged crimes – that will be recounted in the examiner’s report. That report will be given not only to the judge and to defense counsel but also to the prosecutor. The prosecutor can usually use the incriminating information in securing an order of pretrial detention and, depending upon local statutes and caselaw, may be able to use it in securing a conviction at trial, a severe sentence, or both. See § 12.15 infra. In the rare case in which defense counsel decides to pursue a mental defense, the report may provide the prosecutor with information usable to refute that defense.

Of course, in cases in which counsel does consider employing a mental defense, s/he will need to have the child examined by a psychiatrist or psychologist. In addition, counsel should have the child evaluated in any case in which the child’s apparent mental problems could be affirmatively helpful to the defense in pretrial motions, plea negotiations, or disposition. See §§ 12.04-12.07 supra. However, counsel should attempt to arrange such an evaluation through a private examination or through retention of a defense expert rather than through a court-ordered mental examination. See § 12.09 supra.

The strategic reasons for opposing the examination must, of course, give way to a client’s express desire for an in-patient mental examination. In cases in which the judge has already ordered detention in a secure facility (or inevitably will do so because of the client’s prior record or history of failures to appear), a client whose mental problems qualify him or her for hospitalization may prefer to spend the pretrial detention period in a hospital setting rather than a detention facility. In this, as in all decisions involving “the objectives of representation” (American Bar Association, Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.2(a) (2018)), counsel must defer to the client’s wishes. Id.; American Bar Association, Code of Professional Responsibility EC 7-7 (1980); see generally § 2.03 supra. Even when the client is mentally ill or intellectually disabled (as will often be the situation in cases in which the judge is seriously considering a mental examination), the attorney’s ethical obligations dictate that s/he “shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client.” Model Rules, Rule 1.14(a); Code, supra, EC 7-12. It is only in those rare cases in which the mental impairment so severely “diminish[es]” the client’s “capacity to make adequately considered decisions in connection with the representation . . . [that] a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client” cannot be maintained and in which counsel “reasonably believes” that the client “is at risk of substantial physical, financial or other harm unless action is taken and [that the client] cannot adequately act in the client’s own interest,” that counsel may take “reasonably necessary protective action, including consulting with individuals or entities that have the ability to take action to protect the client and, in appropriate cases, seeking the appointment of a guardian ad litem, conservator or guardian.” Model Rules, Rule 1.14(b). See § 2.03 supra; § 12.19(b) infra.

§ 12.13 ARGUMENTS THAT CAN BE USED IN OPPOSING A MENTAL HEALTH EXAMINATION

The statutes authorizing mental health examinations usually are silent concerning the criteria that the judge should consider in assessing the appropriateness of an examination. The statutes commonly confer upon the judge the discretion to order an examination whenever s/he deems it appropriate. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 251(a) (2018) (“when such an examination will serve the purposes of this act”).

In default of any statutory standards that can be invoked, counsel will have to rely on commonsense arguments to persuade the judge that there simply is no need for a court-ordered examination. If counsel is able to arrange an examination through some other means (see § 12.09 supra), s/he can argue to the court that this is a better way of proceeding. If counsel is able to arrange a private mental health evaluation, she can point out that this will save the state the expense of a period of commitment and a state-conducted evaluation. In cases of this sort as well as those in which counsel seeks state funds to retain a defense mental health expert to evaluate the respondent, counsel can argue that providing for the respondent’s evaluation by a defense consultant before any court-ordered commitment or examination would spare the State potentially needless costs and complications. In any case in which the court is inclined to have the respondent evaluated at all, it will be because there is some indication of significant mental disorder. And “when the defendant’s mental condition is seriously in question,” Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68, 82 (1985), requires the appointment of a defense mental-health expert for defendants and juvenile respondents who cannot afford to retain one. Ake’s command cannot be satisfied through examination by a court-appointed neutral expert; what is required is that the accused be afforded “access to a competent psychiatrist who will conduct an appropriate examination and assist in evaluation, preparation, and presentation of the defense.” Id. at 83. See, e.g., United States v. Sloan, 776 F.2d 926 (10th Cir. 1985); Powell v. Collins, 332 F.3d 376, 392 (6th Cir. 2003) (“Today, we join with those circuits that have held that an indigent criminal defendant’s constitutional right to psychiatric assistance in preparing an insanity defense is not satisfied by court appointment of a ‘neutral’ psychiatrist – i.e., one whose report is available to both the defense and the prosecution.”); Moore v. State, 390 Md. 343, 379-83, 889 A.2d 325, 346-48 (2005); De Freece v. State, 848 S.W.2d 150 (Tex. Crim App. 1993). See also McWilliams v. Dunn, 137 S. Ct. 1790 (2017) (explaining that the Court “need not, and do[es] not” reach the question whether “Ake clearly established that a State must provide an indigent defendant with a qualified mental health expert retained specifically for the defense team, not a neutral expert available to both parties” (id. at 1799) because, even if “[w]e . . . assume that Alabama met the examination portion of . . . [Ake’s] requirement by providing for [State Department of Mental Health neuropsychologist] Dr. Goff’s examination of McWilliams” (id. at 1800), “[n]either Dr. Goff nor any other expert helped the defense evaluate Goff’s report or McWilliams’ extensive medical records and translate these data into a legal strategy. Neither Dr. Goff nor any other expert helped the defense prepare and present arguments that might, for example, have explained that McWilliams’ purported malingering was not necessarily inconsistent with mental illness (as an expert later testified in postconviction proceedings . . . ). Neither Dr. Goff nor any other expert helped the defense prepare direct or cross-examination of any witnesses, or testified at the judicial sentencing hearing himself.” (id. at 1800-01); the Court observes that “language in Ake . . . seems to foresee th[e] . . . consequence” that “a neutral expert available to both parties” would not suffice (see id. at 1799), and the Court notes that “[a]s a practical matter, the simplest way for a State to meet th[e] . . . [Ake] standard may be to provide a qualified expert retained specifically for the defense team,” which “appears to be the approach that the overwhelming majority of jurisdictions have adopted.” (id. at 1800)). For a fuller discussion of McWilliams, see § 11.03(a) supra. Thus, the court’s initiation of a court-ordered examination will almost certainly lead to the need for appointment of a defense expert as well. It would be more economical and orderly to have the defense expert examine the respondent initially, so that the whole process of a court-ordered examination can be avoided unless the defense decides to raise mental health issues in the first instance.

§ 12.14 ARGUMENTS THAT CAN BE USED IN OPPOSING AN ORDER THAT A MENTAL HEALTH EXAMINATION BE CONDUCTED ON AN IN-PATIENT BASIS

In the event that the judge orders a mental health examination over counsel’s objections, the judge then has to determine whether that examination shall be conducted on an in-patient or out-patient basis. In-patient examinations are conducted at a State Hospital, with the child committed to the institution for a statutorily designated period of time to allow for the examination. The length of time permitted by statute varies substantially among jurisdictions, with some jurisdictions permitting 10 days (N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 322.1(2) (2018)) and other jurisdictions allowing a somewhat longer period of time (D.C. CODE § 16-2315(b) (2018) (initial period of 21 days which can be extended up to 21 more days)). When the examination is ordered on an out-patient basis, the child lives at home and has to report on one (or possibly two or three) occasions to a community mental health center for the evaluation.

The statute or common-law rules usually permit in-patient status only upon medical affidavits, upon a prima facie showing of the respondent’s incompetency, or when “there is reason to believe” that the respondent is incompetent. Counsel should scrutinize the affidavits or other evidence mounted in favor of the preliminary determination of incompetency, pointing out any favorable evidence as well as any reasons for doubting the evidence (for example, when the affidavits contain multiple hearsay). In jurisdictions whose statutes or court rules expressly state a presumption in favor of out-patient examinations (see, e.g., D.C. CODE § 2315(b) (2018)), counsel should stress the legal effect of that presumption, arguing that the professed preliminary showing of incompetency is insufficient to rebut the presumption.

Even if the evidence satisfies the requisite initial showing of incompetency, the judge usually possesses discretion not to commit the respondent for an in-patient examination. Thus counsel can argue that it would be an inappropriate exercise of judicial discretion to commit a respondent involuntarily to a mental hospital because there are community mental health facilities available for the respondent’s diagnosis on an out-patient basis. Cf. State v. Page, 11 Ohio Misc. 31, 228 N.E.2d 686 (C.P., Cuyahoga Cty. 1967).

In those cases in which the court announces its intention to order an in-patient examination, counsel can insist upon a hearing that satisfies the requirements of procedural due process. Cf. Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 491-94 (1980); Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354, 361-62 (1983) (dictum). This would appear to include both a full adversary hearing on whatever issues of fact are decisive of the propriety of a commitment order under state law (Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. at 494-96) and a right to challenge the findings supporting such an order on the ground that there is “no basis” for them in fact (see Schware v. Board of Bar Examiners, 353 U.S. 232, 239 (1957)).

Judicial orders committing the respondent for an in-patient examination are commonly unappealable as interlocutory; but they may be challenged by prerogative writs such as prohibition or mandamus, as local appellate practice makes appropriate. See Chapter 26. The committing court should be requested to stay its commitment order pending review by the writs. If it refuses to do so, a stay should be sought from the appellate court in which the application for the writ is filed. When no other form of review of commitment orders is recognized by local practice, habeas corpus should be used, and the habeas court should be asked to stay the respondent’s commitment pendente lite.

§ 12.15 PROCEDURAL PROTECTIONS AT A MENTAL HEALTH EXAMINATION

§ 12.15(a) Fifth Amendment Protections Against Self-Incrimination

In Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981), the Court held that the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination is applicable to a criminal defendant’s “statements . . . uttered in the context of a psychiatric examination,” id. at 465. Specifically, Smith decided that a state defendant’s Fifth Amendment rights were violated by the admission of opinion testimony of a psychiatrist called by the prosecution to prove the defendant’s probable future dangerousness as the basis for a death sentence at the penalty stage of the defendant’s capital trial, when the psychiatrist’s opinion was based upon his questioning of the defendant during a pretrial competency examination ordered sua sponte by the trial court, without notice to the defendant and waiver by the defendant of his privilege against self-incrimination. See Penry v. Johnson, 532 U.S. 782, 793-94 (2001) (describing the ruling in Smith); Petrocelli v. Baker, 869 F.3d 710 (9th Cir. 2017).

Although the facts of the Smith case involved an adult defendant in a capital sentencing hearing, the rule established in Smith is fully applicable to noncapital cases, see, e.g., United States v. Chitty, 760 F.2d 425, 430-32 (2d Cir. 1985), including juvenile court proceedings, see, e.g., In the Matter of the Appeal in Pima County Juvenile Action No. J-77027-1, 139 Ariz. 446, 679 P.2d 92 (Ariz. App. 1984); In the Matter of J.J.S., 20 S.W.3d 837 (Tex. App. 2000); State v. Diaz-Cardona, 123 Wash. App. 477, 98 P.3d 136 (2004). Moreover, the rule is not limited to evidence used at sentencing: it also applies to prosecution evidence offered on the issue of guilt. See Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. at 462-63 (Court observes that it could “discern no basis to distinguish between the guilt and penalty phases of [a] . . . capital murder trial so far as the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege is concerned”). See, e.g., People v. Pokovich, 39 Cal. 4th 1240, 1246, 1253, 141 P.3d 267, 271, 276, 48 Cal. Rptr. 158, 163, 169 (2006). See also State v. I.T., 4 N.E.3d 1139, 1141 (Ind. 2014) (state statute which “facilitate[d] [juveniles’] participation” in “a pilot project to screen and treat” “mental health or substance abuse problems” by “barring a child’s statement to a mental health evaluator from being admitted into evidence to prove delinquency” had to be construed “to confer both use immunity and derivative use immunity, in order to avoid a likely violation of the constitutional privileges against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment and Article 1, Section 14 of the Indiana Constitution”). See generally Lourdes M. Rosado & Riya S. Shah, Protecting Youth from Self-Incrimination When Undergoing Screening, Assessment and Treatment Within the Juvenile Justice System (Juvenile Law Center 2007); Lourdes M. Rosado, Outside the Police Station: Dealing with the Potential for Self-Incrimination in Juvenile Court, 38 Wash. U. J. L. & Pol’y 177 (2012).

Smith therefore supports the respondent’s right to claim the Fifth Amendment and refuse to talk to a psychiatrist in any court-ordered mental examination unless the order for the examination explicitly provides that nothing disclosed by the respondent during the examination and no results of the examination may subsequently be used against the respondent for any purpose except to determine competency to stand trial, see 451 U.S. at 468, and that the same restriction applies to “any evidence derived directly and indirectly” from the respondent’s disclosures and examination results, see Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 453 (1972). Counsel should either insist upon the inclusion of such a provision in the judicial order for an examination or advise the respondent not to say a word to the examiner under any circumstances, whichever seems more appropriate to the needs of the particular situation.

A more difficult question is whether the respondent is entitled to such a restrictive order if the defense acquiesces in or affirmatively seeks the mental examination. For, although defense counsel will almost always oppose the ordering of such an examination (see § 12.12 supra), s/he may find it necessary to accept or even to request an examination in situations in which the court has denied a motion for appointment of a defense mental health expert (see § 12.09 supra) or in which the respondent wishes an in-patient examination as an alternative to detention in a secure facility (see § 12.12 supra). The defendant in Estelle v. Smith had “neither initiate[d] a psychiatric evaluation nor attempt[ed] to introduce any psychiatric evidence” (451 U.S. at 468), and Smith was distinguished on this ground in Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402 (1987), in which the Supreme Court held that when a defendant had both “joined in a motion for [a pretrial psychiatric] . . . examination” (id. at 423) and presented an expert witness at trial “to establish . . . a mental-status defense” (id. at 404), the prosecutor could constitutionally use the results of the examination to impeach this witness. See also Penry v. Johnson, 532 U.S. at 795 (discussing Buchanan); Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. 596, 600-02 (2014) (discussing Estelle v. Smith and Buchanan). Buchanan poses the thorny problems: (i) whether Smith’s prohibition of prosecutorial use of pretrial psychiatric examination results continues to govern cases in which the examination was unopposed or sought by the respondent or was ordered in response to the respondent’s raising of a claim of incompetency (in the very rare case in which s/he might do this, see § 12.19 infra) or some other psychiatric issue before trial but the respondent presents no evidence in support of any psychiatric issue at the trial or dispositional hearing, and (ii) whether the exception to the Smith prohibition recognized by Buchanan is limited to the use of pretrial examination results to rebut expert psychiatric evidence presented by the respondent at a trial or dispositional hearing, or whether the respondent’s raising of a psychiatric issue at the trial or hearing opens the door to the prosecutor’s use of the results generally.

Regarding problem (i), the argument appears substantial that, unless and until the respondent actually presents evidence in support of a psychiatric plea or defense, Smith prohibits the prosecutor’s incriminating use of any information produced by a pretrial psychiatric examination of the respondent, even one requested or invited by the defense. This is so because the logic of Smith was not that Smith’s Fifth Amendment rights were violated by the competency examination conducted in that case – to the contrary, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the competency examination had been “validly ordered” by the trial judge sua sponte, 451 U.S. at 468 – but rather that the Fifth Amendment came into play “[w]hen [the psychiatrist] . . . went beyond simply reporting to the court on the issue of competence and testified for the prosecution at the penalty phase on the crucial issue of . . . future dangerousness, [so that] his role changed and became essentially like that of an agent of the State recounting unwarned statements made in a postarrest custodial setting,” id. at 467; see id. at 465. See also Allen v. Illinois, 478 U.S. 364 (1986), upholding compulsory psychiatric examination of an individual subject to civil commitment proceedings so long as that individual “is protected from use of his [or her] compelled answers in any subsequent criminal case in which [s/]he is the defendant,” id. at 368. Under this logic it should make no difference that the respondent originally moves for the examination or triggers it by a pretrial plea of incompetency unless such a motion or plea can properly be treated as a waiver of the Fifth Amendment Privilege. But it cannot. Under Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375 (1966), and Droe v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162 (1975), every person accused of a crime has a federal constitutional right to an adequate psychiatric evaluation and judicial determination of competency to stand trial; and it would impermissibly place the respondent “‘between the rock and the whirlpool’” (Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493, 498 (1967)) to treat the respondent’s invocation of this right as a waiver of the Fifth Amendment Privilege. See Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 389-94 (1968), reaffirmed in United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 89-90 (1980); Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605, 607-12 (1972); Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801, 807-08 (1977); cf. Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S. 137, 153 n.21 (1977) (plurality opinion); United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 372 (1982) (dictum); Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447, 455 (1984) (dictum); and compare United States v. Jackson, 390 U.S. 570, 581-83 (1968), with Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25, 47-48 (1976), and Corbitt v. New Jersey, 439 U.S. 212, 218-20 & n.8 (1978); compare Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 554, 565 (1967), with Spencer v. Texas, 385 U.S. 554, 565 (1967), and Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231, 236-37 (1980). To treat the respondent’s request for a psychiatric examination as a waiver of the Privilege is the more impermissible because the very purpose of the examination is to obtain information that is necessary to an intelligent judgment regarding the merit of potential psychiatric defenses and regarding the respondent’s capability to participate in that judgment: A forced choice between forgoing such information and forgoing a constitutional right has none of the qualities of a valid waiver. Compare Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605, 607-12 (1972), with Town of Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386 (1987). In discussing Smith and Buchanan, the Supreme Court has suggested that the justification for finding a waiver of the Fifth Amendment “‘[w]hen a defendant asserts the insanity defense and introduces supporting psychiatric testimony’” is that in this situation “‘his silence may deprive the State of the only effective means it has of controverting his proof on an issue that he has interjected into the case.’” Powell v. Texas, 492 U.S. 680, 684 (1989) (per curiam), quoting Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. at 465. Accord, Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. at 601 (“The rule of Buchanan, which we reaffirm today, is that where a defense expert who has examined the defendant testifies that the defendant lacked the requisite mental state to commit an offense, the prosecution may present psychiatric evidence in rebuttal. . . . Any other rule would undermine the adversarial process, allowing a defendant to provide the jury, through an expert operating as proxy, with a one-sided and potentially inaccurate view of his mental state at the time of the alleged crime.”; “When a defendant presents evidence through a psychological expert who has examined him, the government likewise is permitted to use the only effective means of challenging that evidence: testimony from an expert who has also examined him.”). No similar justification exists for finding waiver when the defendant has merely sought a mental examination for the purpose of determining whether to interject psychiatric issues into the case and has then elected not to do so. Thus Smith’s ban upon the use of evidence obtained from a pretrial psychiatric examination of a defendant to prove guilt or enhance penalty should apply “whether the defendant or the prosecutor requested the examination and whether it was had for the purpose of determining competence to stand trial or sanity” (Gibson v. Zahradnick, 581 F.2d 75, 80 (4th Cir. 1978); State v. Berget, 826 N.W.2d 1, 28-37 (S.D. 2013)). See Battie v. Estelle, 655 F.2d 692, 700-03 (5th Cir. 1981); and see Collins v. Auger, 577 F.2d 1107, 1109-10 (8th Cir. 1978). It follows that orders for any of these sorts of examinations are required to contain a provision restricting the use of their products to the purposes for which the examination was ordered, and defense counsel should demand such a provision. See, e.g., People v. Diaz, 3 Misc.3d 686, 777 N.Y.S.2d 856 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., Kings Cty. 2004).
Regarding problem (ii), it is noteworthy that Buchanan describes the “narrow” issue it decides as “whether the admission of findings from a psychiatric examination . . . proffered solely to rebut other psychological evidence presented by . . . [the defendant] violated his . . . [constitutional] rights,” 483 U.S. at 404; see also id. at 424-25. It treats this issue as “one of the situations that we distinguished from the facts in Smith.” Id. at 423. See also Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. at 600-01 (discussing Buchanan). The Smith opinion itself, in noting that the prosecution might be permitted to use evidence obtained by a pretrial psychiatric examination of the defendant in rebuttal, appeared to limit this possibility to cases in which the defense (i) presents expert psychiatric evidence and (ii) addresses the evidence to the specific issue on which the prosecution offers its rebuttal evidence. Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. at 466 n.10; see also id. at 465-66; Powell v. Texas, 492 U.S. at 683-84, 685 n.3; Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. at 603; Gholson v. Estelle, 675 F.2d 734, 741 & n.6 (5th Cir. 1982); Battie v. Estelle, 655 F.2d at 701-02. There are pre-Smith cases allowing the prosecution greater latitude in rebuttal – for example, permitting the prosecution to use the defendant’s statements made during the psychiatric examination to impeach the defendant’s trial testimony, by analogy to Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971) (see § 24.23 infra). People v. Brown, 399 Mich. 350, 249 N.W.2d 693 (1976); People v. White, 401 Mich 482, 257 N.W.2d 912 (1977). But in the light of Smith these decisions are assailable under the settled principle that a defendant’s statements obtained in disregard of the Fifth Amendment may not be used even to impeach the defendant’s inconsistent testimony at trial (Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 397-98 (1978); New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450, 458-60 (1979); United States v. Leonard, 609 F.2d 1163 (5th Cir. 1980)). See, e.g., People v. Pokovich, 39 Cal. 4th at 1253, 141 P.3d at 276, 48 Cal. Rptr. at 169 (“the Fifth Amendment’s privilege against self-incrimination prohibits the prosecution from using at trial, for the purpose of impeachment, statements a defendant has made during a court-ordered mental competency examination”); Gibbs v. Frank, 387 F.3d 268 (3d Cir. 2004).

§ 12.15(b) State Law Prohibitions Against Using Statements Made During a Mental Health Examination as Proof of Guilt at Trial

Apart from the Fifth Amendment protections enunciated in Estelle v. Smith, there are state statutes, court rules, and common-law decisions providing that statements made during a competency evaluation cannot be used to prove the accused’s guilt at trial. See, e.g., FlA. RULE JUV. PROC. 8.095(d)(5) (2018); ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. ch. 725, § 5/104-14 (2018); ME. REV. STAT. ANN. tit. 15, § 3318-A(9) (2018); MINN. RULE JUV. DELINQUENCY PROC. 20.01(9) (2018); United States v. Alvarez, 519 F.2d 1036 (3d Cir. 1975); Lee v. County Court, 27 N.Y.2d 432, 267 N.E.2d 452, 318 N.Y.S.2d 705 (1971). The scope of this prohibition varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and may depend, within any given jurisdiction, on: the nature of the examination (that is, whether it was ordered to determine the respondent’s competence to stand trial or the respondent’s sanity at the time of the offense); whether the examination was ordered on defense motion or on motion of the prosecution or by the court sua sponte; whether it was ordered before or after the respondent tendered a claim of incompetency or a plea raising some psychiatric defense, such as not guilty by reason of insanity; whether the respondent raises some such defense at trial; and whether, if s/he does, s/he calls defense psychiatric experts to support it.
Compare the approaches taken in People v. Spencer, 60 Cal. 2d 64, 383 P.2d 134, 31 Cal. Rptr. 782 (1963); In re Spencer, 63 Cal. 2d 400, 406 P.2d 33, 46 Cal. Rptr. 753 (1965); People v. Arcega, 32 Cal. 3d 504, 651 P.2d 338, 186 Cal. Rptr. 94 (1982); Parkin v. State, 238 So. 2d 817, 820 (Fla. 1970); People v. Stevens, 386 Mich. 579, 194 N.W.2d 370 (1972); State v. Whitlow, 45 N.J. 3, 210 A.2d 763 (1965); State ex rel. LaFollette v. Raskin, 34 Wis. 2d 607, 150 N.W.2d 318 (1967).

Part D. Incompetency To Stand Trial

§ 12.16 APPLICABILITY OF THE DOCTRINE OF INCOMPETENCY IN JUVENILE DELINQUENCY PROCEEDINGS

The criminal procedure statutes of every State codify the common-law rule that a criminal defendant may not be tried for a crime while s/he is incompetent to stand trial. In many jurisdictions the juvenile statutes expressly adopt the same rule for delinquency proceedings. See, e.g., D.C. CODE § 16-2315(c)(1) (2018); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT §§ 322.1-322.2 (2018). See generally Kellie M. Johnson, Note, Juvenile Competency Statutes: A Model for State Legislation, 81 Ind. L.J. 1067, 1081-88 (2006) (surveying juvenile competency statutes). However, even if the juvenile statutes do not specifically provide for a claim of incompetency, there is little doubt that a state court would recognize the viability of the claim. The Supreme Court has “repeatedly and consistently recognized that ‘the criminal trial of an incompetent defendant violates due process.’” Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348, 354 (1996) (quoting Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437, 453 (1992)). See also Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162, 171-72 (1975); Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375, 385 (1966). Adhering to these decisions, the lower courts have consistently ruled on due process grounds that juvenile statutes must be construed so as to incorporate a prohibition against trial of a youth who is incompetent. See, e.g., State ex rel. Dandoy v. Superior Court, 127 Ariz. 184, 619 P.2d 12 (1980); Golden v. State, 341 Ark. 656, 660, 21 S.W.3d 801, 803 (2000); In the Matter of K.G., 808 N.E.2d 631, 635, 639 (Ind. 2004); Matter of S.W.T., 277 N.W.2d 507 (Minn. 1979); State in the Interest of Causey, 363 So. 2d 472 (La. 1978); In the Matter of Two Minor Children, 95 Nev. 225, 592 P.2d 166 (1979); People ex rel. Thorpe v. Clark, 62 A.D.2d 216, 403 N.Y.S.2d 910 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1978); In re Grimes, 147 Ohio. App. 3d 192, 195, 769 N.E.2d 420, 422-23 (2002); In the Interest of SWM, 299 P.3d 673, 678 (Wyo. 2013).

§ 12.17 STANDARD FOR DETERMINING COMPETENCY

The prevailing test of incompetency in most jurisdictions is the relatively simple one whether the respondent (a) by reason of mental disease or disorder is (b) unable at the time of plea or trial to (i) understand the nature and purpose of the proceedings or (ii) consult and cooperate with counsel in preparing and presenting the defense. E.g., Dusky v. United States, 362 U.S. 402 (1960); In the Matter of W.A.F., 573 A.2d 1264, 1265, 1267-68 (D.C. 1990); In the Matter of Erick B., 4 Misc.3d 202, 206, 777 N.Y.S.2d 253, 257 (N.Y. Fam. Ct., Brooklyn Cty 2004); ME. REV. STAT. ANN. tit. 15, § 3318-A(2) (2018). See generally Linda A. Szymanski, Juvenile Competency Procedures (National Center for Juvenile Justice Oct. 2013). This is probably the federal constitutional test as well. See Indiana v. Edwards, 554 U.S. 164, 170 (2008); Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348, 354 (1996); Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375 (1966); Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162, 171-72 (1975); see also, e.g., In the Matter of Lopez v. Evans, 25 N.Y.3d 199, 202, 206, 31 N.E.3d 1197, 1199, 1202, 9 N.Y.S.3d 601, 602, 605 (2015) (holding on state constitutional grounds that “when a parolee lacks mental competency to stand trial, it is a violation of his or her due process rights to conduct a parole revocation hearing” because “[a]n incompetent parolee is not in a position to exercise rights, such as the right to testify and the opportunity to confront adverse witnesses . . . that are directly related to ensuring the accuracy of fact-finding”). See also Christopher Slobogin, The American Bar Association’s Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards: Revisions for the Twenty-First Century, 44 Hastings Const. L. Q. 1, 20-21 (2016) (explaining that the ABA’s Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards concerning a defendant’s “competence to proceed” employ “the test set out in the Supreme Court’s decision in Dusky v. United States, [supra]”).

In those States in which the adult criminal code or caselaw sets forth specific standards for assessing competency to stand trial but the juvenile code does not, the courts have differed as to the applicability of the adult standards to juvenile delinquency cases. Compare In the Matter of K.G., 808 N.E.2d 631, 639 (Ind. 2004) (“juveniles alleged to be delinquent have the constitutional right to have their competency determined before they are subjected to delinquency proceedings” but “the adult competency statute is not applicable in making that determination”), with In the Matter of the Welfare of D.D.N., 582 N.W.2d 278, 281 (Minn. App. 1998) (adult competency standards apply: “the level of competence required to permit a child’s participation in juvenile court proceedings can be no less than the competence demanded for trial or sentencing of an adult”), and with In the Matter of Carey, 241 Mich. App. 222, 233-34, 615 N.W.2d 742, 748 (2000) (adult statutes apply but “competency evaluations should be made in light of juvenile, rather than adult, norms”), and In re J.M., 172 Vt. 61, 68, 769 A.2d 656, 662 (2001) (similar to Carey, supra), and In the Interest of SWM, 299 P.3d 673, 678 (Wyo. 2013) (similar to Carey, supra). See also In the Matter of W.A.F., 573 A.2d at 1265 & n.4, 1266, 1267-68 (D.C. juvenile statute establishing competency standard that differs from adult court rule failed to “adequately protect[ ]” juveniles’ due process “right not to be tried while incompetent”; due process requires that “procedure followed in adult criminal prosecutions . . . be applied to juvenile delinquency proceedings”); Timothy J. v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. App. 4th 847, 860-62, 58 Cal. Rptr. 3d 746, 754-55 (2007) (juvenile can seek a finding of incompetency to stand trial based on “developmental immaturity” that does not constitute “a mental disorder or developmental disability”). Neurological and psychological research supporting the recognition that “the risk of incompetence is substantially elevated in early and mid-adolescence” and that it is important to take account of this phenomenon of “developmental incompetence” is reviewed in Laurence Steinberg, Adolescent Development and Juvenile Justice, 5 Annual Rev. Clin. Psychol. 459, 477 (2009).

Under the typical formulation of the competency standard, courts usually will not find a respondent incompetent unless s/he is floridly psychotic. However, in cases in which a finding of incompetency would be in the client’s interest, counsel can argue that the second half of the incompetency standard – inability to confer and cooperate with counsel – should be extended to encompass: (a) respondents whose mental disorder affects their ability to recall the events of the period when the offense is alleged to have been committed, see Wilson v. United States, 391 F.2d 460 (D.C. Cir. 1968); (b) respondents whose mental disorder impairs their ability to testify intelligibly in their own defense; (c) respondents whose mental disorder precludes their participation in a rational fashion in certain crucial decisions, such as whether to plead guilty in return for a bargained disposition or whether to invoke the defense of insanity at the time of the crime (see § 12.24 infra); and (d) respondents whose physical disability prevents them from assisting in their own defense (see, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 709(a) (2018); HAW. REV. STAT. § 704-403 (2018); ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. ch. 725, § 5/104-16(b) (2018); OR. REV. STAT. § 419C.378(1) (2018)). See generally Marty Beyer, What’s Behind Behavior Matters: The Effects of Disabilities, Trauma and Immaturity on Juvenile Intent and Ability to Assist Counsel, 58 GUILD PRACTITIONER 112 (2001); Thomas Riffin, Competence to Stand Trial Evaluations with Juveniles, 32 NEW ENG. J. ON CRIM. & CIV. CONFINEMENT 15 (2006); Melinda G. Schmidt, N. Dickon Reppucci & Jennifer L. Woodard, Effectiveness of Participation as a Defendant: The Attorney-Client Relationship, 21 BEHAV. SCI. & L. 175 (2003); Elizabeth S. Scott & Thomas Grisso, Developmental Incompetence, Due Process, and Juvenile Justice Policy, 83 N.C. L. REV. 793 (2005).

As for the first half of the prevailing standard, Supreme Court decisions involving constitutional claims by condemned inmates that they are incompetent to be executed can be invoked to shed some analogical light on what is required in the way of mental ability to “understand the nature and purpose of the proceedings” at the pretrial and trial stages of a criminal or juvenile delinquency prosecution. In Panetti v. Quarterman, 551 U.S. 930 (2007), the Court was confronted with a claim that Panetti suffered from psychotic delusions that had “recast . . . [his] execution as ‘part of spiritual warfare . . . between the demons and the forces of the darkness and God and the angels and the forces of light . . .’ . . . [and that] although . . . [he] claims to understand ‘that the state is saying that [it wishes] to execute him for [his] murder[s],’ he believes in earnest that the stated reason is a ‘sham’ and the State in truth wants to execute him ‘to stop him from preaching.’” Id. at 954-55. The lower federal courts found these delusions irrelevant because the “‘test for competency to be executed requires the petitioner know no more than the fact of his impending execution and the factual predicate for the execution.’” Id. at 942. The Supreme Court held this test unconstitutionally narrow. Although the Court did “not attempt to set down a rule governing all competency determinations” (id. at 960-61), it did observe that in the seminal case of Ford v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 399 (1986), “[w]riting for four Justices, Justice Marshall . . . indicat[ed] that the Eighth Amendment prohibits execution of ‘one whose mental illness prevents him from comprehending the reasons for the penalty or its implications . . .’ [whereas] Justice Powell, in his separate opinion, asserted that the Eighth Amendment ‘forbids the execution only of those who are unaware of the punishment they are about to suffer and why they are to suffer it.’” Id. at 957. The Panetti Court concluded that “the principles set forth in [both of these] Ford [opinions] are put at risk by a rule that deems delusions relevant only with respect to the State’s announced reason for a punishment or the fact of an imminent execution . . .
. as opposed to the real interests the State seeks to vindicate.” Id. at 959. “A prisoner’s awareness of the State’s rationale for an execution is not the same as a rational understanding of it.” Id. The same conception of rational understanding plainly should apply at earlier stages of a criminal or juvenile delinquency case as well. A defendant or respondent who knows that s/he is being haled into court to be prosecuted on a criminal or delinquency charge but who delusionally believes that the charge is the work of a conspiracy between the State and the devil will not make the cut for competence.

§ 12.18 RESULT OF A FINDING OF INCOMPETENCY

If a child is found to be incompetent to stand trial, s/he will be confined in a mental health facility, probably a State Hospital and, in cases of violent offenses, a secure ward of that hospital. In Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972), the Court imposed the following due process restrictions upon the duration of the confinement:

>[A] person charged by a State with a criminal offense who is committed solely on account of his incapacity to proceed to trial cannot be held more than the reasonable period of time necessary to determine whether there is a substantial probability that he will attain that capacity in the foreseeable future. If it is determined that this is not the case, then the State must either institute the customary civil commitment proceeding that would be required to commit indefinitely any other citizen, or release the defendant. Furthermore, even if it is determined that the defendant probably soon will be able to stand trial, his continued commitment must be justified by progress toward that goal. (Id. at 738.)

Thus in cases in which the hospital concludes that restoration to competency is not probable and in which the State refrains from seeking civil commitment, the child will be released. Usually, the second of these conditions occurs only in cases of minor property offenses and minor offenses against the person, and even then only if the respondent has no significant prior record. If the gravity of the present offense or if the prior record causes the prosecutor to fear further crimes by the respondent, the prosecutor is likely to seek civil commitment as a way of getting the respondent off the streets. Moreover, in some jurisdictions the statute mandates the initiation of civil commitment proceedings if a juvenile is found to be incompetent to stand trial. See, e.g., Ark. Code Ann. § 9-27-502(b)(9)(A) (2018); D.C. Code § 16-2315(c)(1) (2018).

Of course, even when the State elects to seek civil commitment, it will not necessarily succeed in committing the child. Under typical civil commitment statutes, an individual is subject to commitment only if s/he is mentally ill or intellectually disabled and if these conditions render the individual dangerous to self or others. See, e.g., O’Connor v. Donaldson, 422 U.S. 563, 576 (1975) (“a State cannot constitutionally confine without more a nondangerous individual who is capable of surviving safely in freedom by himself or with the help of willing and responsible family members or friends”). And under Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 425-33 (1979), a State bears the burden proving illness and dangerousness by “clear and convincing” evidence or an equivalent standard. Id. at 433. Individuals whose incompetency is based on factors other than mental disease or defect – such as amnesia or physical disability – will probably be deemed ineligible for civil commitment. And there are many mentally ill and intellectually disabled people who, although incompetent to stand trial, are not dangerous to self or others. However, counsel should be aware of the risk that a far less demanding standard for commitment – one that asks only whether the child is mentally or emotionally ill and whether s/he can “benefit from treatment” – may be applied in cases of so-called voluntary commitment of a child by his or her parent or of a ward of the State by the public agency exercising guardianship. See Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. 584 (1979); Secretary of Public Welfare v. Institutionalized Juveniles, 442 U.S. 640 (1979).

If the State seeks and succeeds in obtaining an order of involuntary civil commitment, the commitment will, as a practical matter, continue until such time as (a) the institutional psychiatrists believe that the respondent has recovered from his or her mental illness or at least has ceased to be physically dangerous to self or others, or (b) the institution runs out of beds and is glutted with inmates sicker than the respondent. In theory, “even if . . . involuntary confinement was initially permissible, it could not constitutionally continue after that [initial] basis [– illness plus dangerousness –] no longer existed.” O'Connor v. Donaldson, 422 U.S. at 575; see, e.g., Van Orden v. Schafer, 129 F. Supp. 3d 839, 867-70 (E.D. Mo. 2015). But, unless counsel monitors the hospital’s continuing justification for confining a respondent, the child could end up spending his or her childhood and even much of his or her adult life civilly committed to a mental institution. Indeed, the statistical evidence shows that “[c]hildren, on the average, are confined for longer periods than are adults.” Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. at 628 (Brennan, J., concurring & dissenting).

§ 12.19 STRATEGIC CONSIDERATIONS IN DECIDING WHETHER TO RAISE A CLAIM OF INCOMPETENCY

§ 12.19(a) The General Inadvisability of Raising a Claim of Incompetency in a Juvenile Delinquency Case

Counsel should ordinarily be very hesitant to raise a claim of incompetency in a juvenile delinquency case. As explained in § 12.18 supra, the consequence of a finding of incompetency may be civil commitment to a mental hospital for much of the child’s lifetime. In adult criminal court, where a serious felony may carry a penalty of 20 years or more, it will occasionally be in the defendant’s interest to accept prolonged hospitalization to escape an even longer prison sentence. However, in juvenile court, a delinquency finding rarely exposes the respondent to more than one and a half years of placement. See § 38.03(c) infra. Quite clearly, it is not worth averting the risk of that one and a half years of placement at the cost of many years of institutionalization in a mental hospital.

There are also other adverse consequences that can flow from raising a claim of incompetency. See, e.g., United States v. Bergrin, 885 F.3d 416, 420 (6th Cir. 2018) (“The ‘collateral consequences of being adjudged mentally ill’ include potential limits on the right to vote, serve on a jury, obtain a driver’s license, and own a gun.”). In the event that the respondent is found to be only temporarily incompetent, with the prospect of regaining capacity to stand trial, s/he may be held for several months in the mental hospital and then returned to court to face the original charge; then, if s/he is convicted and sentenced to a term of incarceration, the length of the sentence will not be proportionately reduced to give “credit” for the months s/he spent in the mental hospital. And in the event that the respondent is not found incompetent at all, the incompetency proceedings – the mental examination and the incompetency hearing – may provide the prosecution with information about the respondent’s background and psychic makeup that the prosecutor can use: (i) at Initial Hearing, to secure an order of pretrial detention; (ii) to counter claims that defense counsel might make at a suppression hearing when challenging incriminating statements or tangible evidence seized by “consent” searches, on theories that rely in whole or part upon the respondent’s vulnerable mental condition; (iii) at trial, to impeach the respondent’s credibility as a witness, refute defenses of diminished capacity or insanity, and sometimes affirmatively prove guilt; and (iv) at sentencing, to argue for a harsher sentence on the ground that the respondent’s mental problems render him or her too dangerous to leave at large in the community. There are legal doctrines that the defense can invoke to ward off these consequences (see § 12.15(a) supra) but they are full of legal and practical wrinkles that may render their protection less than fully effective in any particular case.

Finally, counsel must be aware that competency proceedings can consume several months, since there will probably be at least two mental examinations (one by defense experts and one by prosecution experts), and the court proceedings will be repeatedly continued because the experts’ reports are not ready or the attorneys or experts have scheduling conflicts. This delay is yet another factor rendering an incompetency claim inadvisable in cases in which a client is detained pending trial or is likely to be committed for an in-patient evaluation.

§ 12.19(b) The Limited Circumstances in Which an Incompetency Claim May Be Advisable or Necessary

The one instance in which a claim of incompetency may be advisable is when counsel is confident that the child faces little or no risk of civil commitment if found incompetent. This circumstance would arise when: (i) the finding of incompetency would rest upon some physical condition or non-organic mental problem (such as amnesia) that could not serve as a “mental disease or defect” rendering the child eligible for civil commitment under state statutory standards (see § 12.18 supra); or (ii) even though the finding of incompetency is based on a mental disease or defect, the defense psychiatrist or psychologist is certain that there is no basis for a finding that the respondent is so “dangerous” to self or others as to require civil commitment, and there is no risk that the child will be subjected to the less exacting standards applicable to third-party “voluntary” commitments of children (see § 12.18 supra). In these very rare circumstances counsel can feel reasonably safe that a finding of incompetency would spare the respondent from facing trial on the charged offenses without exposing him or her to the peril of civil commitment. However, even in these situations, the incompetency claim should not be pursued unless the defense psychiatrist or psychologist is confident that the respondent will not be classified as likely to regain capacity and thereby subjected to a period of hospitalization followed by return to court to face trial on the charges.

There may be some cases in which the respondent is functioning so poorly that s/he cannot communicate with counsel at all. In these unusual circumstances the ethical directives contemplate that the attorney will look to the incompetent person’s “legal representative.” See AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, MODEL RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT, Rule 1.14, Comment (2018); AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, CODE OF PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY EC 7-12 (1980). Presumably, this would mean the child’s parent or the adult relative or foster parent who serves as guardian of the child. Cf. Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. 584, 602-04 (1979). However, in cases in which the parent’s or guardian’s interests are adverse to the child’s (see § 4.04 supra), counsel will be obliged to seek appointment of a guardian ad litem (see, e.g., MINN. RULE JUV. DELINQUENCY PROC. 24.01(A) (2018); see also R.L.R. v. State, 487 P.2d 27, 35 & n.46 (Alaska 1971)), even though the practical consequence will be that the judge and prosecutor are alerted to the respondent’s competency problems and may raise the incompetency issue that defense counsel would prefer to avoid (but see People v. Tortorici, 92 N.Y.2d 757, 767, 709 N.E.2d 87, 93, 686 N.Y.S.2d 346, 352 (1999) (trial court properly exercised its discretion in declining to order a pretrial competency hearing sua sponte, given the circumstances of the case including the “conscious choice of defendant’s lawyer not to request a hearing (or to request the court to order a hearing sua sponte) . . . [and that] a sua sponte competency hearing might well have been viewed by the defense as interfering with its strategy”).

§ 12.20 PROCEDURES FOR RAISING AND LITIGATING A CLAIM OF INCOMPETENCY

In the uncommon case in which counsel does believe that a claim of incompetency to be tried may be in the respondent’s interest, the first step that counsel must take is to retain a psychiatrist or psychologist to examine the respondent and determine whether: (i) s/he is arguably incompetent under the applicable standard (see § 12.17 supra); and (ii) there is little or no risk that raising the claim of incompetency will result in the respondent’s being civilly committed or deemed likely to regain capacity to stand trial (see §§ 12.18, 12.19 supra). Cf. Blakeney v. United States, 77 A.3d 328, 342-43, 345 (D.C. 2013) (“The test for determining when defense counsel is obligated to raise the issue of the defendant’s competency with the court cannot be stated with precision. . . . That a defendant suffers from a severe mental disorder does not necessarily mean he is incompetent; the latter is a ‘much narrower concept.’ . . . [W]e hold that criminal defense counsel must raise the issue of the defendant’s competency with the court if, considering all the circumstances, objectively reasonable counsel would have reason to doubt the defendant’s competency. Failure to do so is constitutionally deficient performance.”); Humphrey v. Walker, 294 Ga. 855, 874-75, 757 S.E.2d 68, 83 (2014). The procedures for obtaining a defense mental health expert are described in § 12.09 supra.

Assuming that the examination results in a report attesting to the respondent’s incompetency and assuming that counsel concludes that an incompetency claim is the proper strategy, counsel then will proffer the report to the court together with whatever written pleading, motion, or “suggestion” of present incompetency is required by local practice in order to raise the claim. In many jurisdictions the judge will, at this point, routinely grant a prosecutorial request that the respondent be ordered to submit to an examination by a prosecution psychiatrist or psychologist. But if the judge previously denied the defense request for a partisan expert and ordered a mental health examination by a “neutral” expert instead, counsel should now object to the court’s granting the prosecution an adversarial benefit that was denied to the defense. Cf. Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470, 474-75 & n.6 (1973). See § 9.09(b)(7) supra.

After all of the mental examinations are completed and the reports filed, the judge will convene an evidentiary hearing on the issue of competency. The defense has a due process right to an adversarial hearing unless the examinations have dispelled any significant doubt of incompetency. Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375 (1966); Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162 (1975). The jurisdictions differ as to who bears the burden of proof at the hearing, with some placing the burden upon the State once the issue has been raised, and others assigning the burden to the defense. See Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348, 360-62 & nn.16-18 (1996) (citing state statutes and caselaw). In the latter jurisdictions, the quantum of the burden imposed on the defense is a “preponderance of the evidence.” See id. at 361 n.17. The Supreme Court held in Cooper that imposing upon the accused the heavier burden of “clear and convincing evidence” would violate the Due Process Clause. See id. at 362-69. Although the Court has not yet addressed the distinct question of what burden must be placed upon the State when a finding of incompetency is sought against a respondent who opposes it and when the result is involuntary hospitalization, the reasoning of Cooper and the Court’s decision in the civil commitment context in Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418 (1979), strongly suggest that the burden must be placed upon the State to prove incompetency by “clear and convincing evidence.” See Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354 (1983) (distinguishing Addington in cases in which a defendant has been found not guilty by reason of insanity because, in such cases, commitment is warranted by “the proof . . . [adduced at trial that the defendant] committed a criminal act as a result of mental illness,” id. at 366-67 – a circumstance justifying “the widely and reasonably held view that insanity acquittees constitute a special class that should be treated differently from other candidates for commitment,” id. at 370); and see Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71, 80 (1992).

Part E. Insanity

§ 12.21 APPLICABILITY OF THE INSANITY DEFENSE TO JUVENILE DELINQUENCY PROCEEDINGS

In many States the insanity defense is just as applicable in juvenile court as it is in adult criminal court. See, e.g., In re Ramon M., 22 Cal. 3d 419, 584 P.2d 524, 149 Cal. Rptr. 387 (1978) (intellectual disability); State in the Interest of Causey, 363 So. 2d 472 (La. 1978); In the Matter of Stapelkemper, 172 Mont. 192, 562 P.2d 815 (1977); In the Matter of L.J., 26 Or. App. 461, 552 P.2d 1322 (1976); In the Interest of Winburn, 32 Wis. 2d 152, 145 N.W.2d 178 (1966); but see Golden v. State, 341 Ark. 656, 660-62, 21 S.W.3d 801, 803-04 (2000) (state legislature

§ 12.22 THE STANDARD FOR ACQUITTING ON GROUNDS OF INSANITY AT THE TIME OF THE OFFENSE

The traditional M’Naghten rule, which is still employed in a number of States, provides “that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that, at the time of the committing of the act, the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong.” M’Naghten’s Case, 8 Eng. Rep. 718, 722 (1843). See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 303.3 (2018) (incorporating the insanity standard of N.Y. Penal Law). See also Christopher Slobogin, The American Bar Association’s Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards: Revisions for the Twenty-First Century, 44 Hastings Const. L. Q. 1, 22-23 (2016) (explaining that the ABA’s Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards “opt for a ‘liberal’ version of the M’Naghten test”). Compare Clark v. Arizona, 548 U.S. 735, 747, 756 (2006) (rejecting a due process challenge to Arizona’s “fragment[ary]” M’Naghten rule which asks only the “moral incapacity” question of “whether a mental disease or defect leaves a defendant unable to understand that his action is wrong” and not the “alternative” “cognitive incapacity” question of “whether a mental defect leaves the defendant unable to understand what he is doing”). Several other States employ the American Law Institute (ALI) test, which provides that “[a] person is not responsible for criminal conduct if at the time of such conduct as a result of mental disease or defect he lacks substantial capacity either to appreciate the criminality [wrongfulness] of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law.” American Law Institute, Model Penal Code § 4.01 (1962), 10 U.L.A. 490-91 (1974). See generally Clark v. Arizona, 548 U.S. at 749-52 & nn.12-22 (surveying varying formulations of the insanity defense and citing federal and state statutes and caselaw); Delling v. Idaho, 568 U.S. 1038, 1039-41 (2012) (Breyer, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari, joined by Ginsburg and Sotomayor, JJ.) (expressing the view that the Court should grant certiorari to determine whether the Due Process Clause prohibits “Idaho’s modification of the insanity defense,” under which “insanity remains relevant to criminal liability, but only in respect to intent,” and which “permits the conviction of an individual who knew what he was doing, but had no capacity to understand that it was wrong”).
In all jurisdictions the defense bears the burden of introducing sufficient evidence to raise the issue of insanity. The requisite quantum of evidence varies among jurisdictions. Some States provide that the defense can raise the issue by merely presenting “some evidence,” or enough evidence to raise a reasonable doubt, whereupon the burden shifts to the prosecution to prove sanity beyond a reasonable doubt, just as it must prove every element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. In other States the defense bears the burden of persuasion and must prove insanity by a preponderance of the evidence. Constitutional challenges to placing the burden on the defense have been consistently rejected. Rivera v. Delaware, 429 U.S. 877 (1976) (per curiam); see Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 201-05 (1977) (dictum); Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354, 368 n.17 (1983) (dictum).

§ 12.23 INADVISABILITY OF RAISING THE INSANITY DEFENSE IN JUVENILE DELINQUENCY CASES

The primary consideration militating against the raising of incompetency claims in juvenile court (see § 12.19 supra) – the risk of institutionalization in a mental hospital for many years more than the respondent would serve if convicted at trial – also renders the insanity defense highly inadvisable. Indeed, the risks are even greater in the context of insanity defenses. A respondent who is found incompetent to stand trial and who is then subjected to involuntary civil commitment proceedings is entitled to a hearing at which the State must show by clear and convincing evidence both that the respondent is mentally ill and that s/he is dangerous to self or others. See §§ 12.18, 12.20 supra. In a number of States the statutes provide for civil commitment of an insanity acquittee as an automatic consequence of the finding of insanity made at trial, even though that finding is usually made under the far weaker “preponderance of the evidence” standard and does not involve an express finding of dangerousness. See, e.g., COLO. REV. STAT. § 16-8-105.5(4) (2018). But cf. People v. Daryl T., 161 A.D.3d 47, 74 N.Y.S.3d 190 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2018) (describing New York’s procedure, under which a verdict or plea that a defendant is “not responsible by reason of mental disease or defect” gives rise to a hearing at which the prosecution “bear[s] the burden of proving ‘to the satisfaction of the court,’ i.e., by a fair preponderance of the credible evidence, that the defendant has a dangerous mental disorder or is mentally ill” (id. at 56, 74 N.Y.S.3d at 196); the court holds that defense counsel “rendered ineffective assistance when he conceded at the plea proceeding that defendant was a danger to himself and society, and waived defendant’s right to an initial hearing [on the issue of dangerousness] before reviewing the psychiatric examination reports which had not yet been prepared for the court. Further, at the proceeding that followed the issuance of the reports, counsel simply relied on the psychiatrists’ reports and deferred to the court’s discretion. He did not call any witnesses or seek to cross-examine the psychiatrists who prepared the reports. Nor did counsel consult an expert on defendant’s behalf who might have offered a contrasting opinion.” (id., 74 N.Y.S.3d at 197).

In Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354 (1983), the Court sustained the constitutionality of a statute that provided that defendants who “successfully invoke[ ] the insanity defense” are automatically “committed to a mental hospital” (id. at 356). Under such a statutory scheme, an insanity acquittee is theoretically “entitled to release when he has recovered his sanity or is no longer dangerous.” Id. at 368. See, e.g., Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71 (1992) (holding Due Process violated by a state statute that permitted the continuing confinement of an insanity acquittee even after a hospital review committee had concluded that the acquittee’s mental illness was in remission); see also Kansas v. Crane, 534 U.S. 407, 412-13 (2002); Richard S. v. Carpinello, 589 F.3d 75, 82-85 (2d Cir. 2009). But once in an institution the acquittee is likely as a practical matter to be confined at the pleasure of the institution’s medical staff, since they will both create and evaluate the record on which any subsequent determination of recovery or dangerousness is going to be based, and their observations and findings are bound to be given great deference by the courts. See, e.g., State v. Klein, 156 Wash. 2d 103, 124 P.3d 644 (2005).

Even in the States that extend the usual procedural protections in civil commitment proceedings to insanity acquittees, an insanity acquittal still poses greater risks than a finding of incompetency to stand trial. A respondent who is found incompetent to stand trial cannot have the pending delinquency charge used against him or her in the determination of “dangerousness” for civil commitment purposes, since s/he has never been convicted of the charge and must be presumed innocent. In contrast, “[a] verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity establishes two facts: (i) the [respondent] . . . committed an act that constitutes a criminal offense, and (ii) he committed the act because of mental illness.” Jones, 463 U.S. at 363. And in Jones, the Court concluded that “[t]he fact that a person has been found, beyond a reasonable doubt, to have committed a criminal act certainly indicates dangerousness,” id. at 364, even when the criminal act is “a nonviolent crime against property.” Id. at 365. The Court’s conclusions on this point were made solely in the context of reviewing the reasonableness of a finding of legislative fact underlying a challenged statute, see id. at 364-65, and the Court’s deference to legislative judgment in Jones would not necessarily justify a finding of fact in an individual case that the evidence shows a particular respondent to be “dangerous.” Cf. id. at 365 n.14. However, notwithstanding this argument for distinguishing Jones, there is considerable risk that lower courts will follow the reasoning of Jones and find in individual cases that proof of delinquency satisfies the criterion of “dangerousness” for purposes of civil commitment.

Thus, the suggestion in § 12.19(b) supra that counsel could consider a claim of incompetency to stand trial with somewhat less trepidation in cases in which a defense psychiatrist is confident that the respondent will not qualify for civil commitment as “dangerous” to self or others, is inapplicable in the context of an insanity defense. Even in jurisdictions that do not provide for automatic commitment but require a finding of dangerousness to support confinement of an insanity acquittee, the risk that the respondent’s conviction alone will suffice to establish dangerousness is too great.

In assessing the advisability of an insanity defense, counsel also must consider whether a finding of “not guilty by reason of insanity” could result in any of the collateral consequences that may stem from a delinquency adjudication. See, e.g., Halvonik v. Maryland Department of Safety and Correctional Services, 2015 WL 7301702, at *1, *3 (Md. Ct. Special App. 2015), cert. denied, 446 Md. 705, 133 A.3d 1110 (Table) (2016) (the defendant, who pled guilty to sexual offenses but was deemed “not criminally responsible” and placed on probation for five years, nonetheless “was required [by state law] to register as a sex offender” and “the required registration was for life”). For discussion of the various types of collateral consequences that can result from a delinquency adjudication, see § 14.07 supra.

§ 12.24 DEFENDING AGAINST THE JUDICIAL INTERPOSITION OF AN INSANITY DEFENSE

In some jurisdictions the court can raise the issue of insanity sua sponte. See generally Justine A. Dunlap, What’s Competence Got to Do with It: The Right Not to Be Acquitted by Reason of Insanity, 50 OKLA. L. REV. 495, 508-10 (1997). In jurisdictions of this sort defense counsel may have to defend against the judge’s interposition of the insanity defense, in order to avoid an insanity acquittal with the probable consequence of prolonged institutionalization in a mental hospital. Counsel can take the position that “the trial judge may not force an insanity defense on a defendant found competent to stand trial if the individual intelligently and voluntarily decides to forego that defense.” Frendak v. United States, 408 A.2d 364, 367 (D.C. 1979) (emphasis in original); accord, State v. Brown, 179 Vt. 22, 32-36, 890 A.2d 79, 88-91 (2005) (citing caselaw from other States); State v. Jones, 99 Wash. 2d 735, 664 P.2d 1216 (1983). See also Christopher Slobogin, The American Bar Association’s Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards: Revisions for the Twenty-First Century, 44 HASTINGS CONST. L.Q. 1, 33 (2016) (noting that some jurisdictions treat “the decision about raising the insanity defense . . . as a tactical one to be made by the [defense] attorney,” and explaining that ABA CRIMINAL JUSTICE MENTAL HEALTH STANDARD 7-6.3 “instead provides that this decision is controlled by the defendant if he or she is competent to make it”). However, counsel should be prepared for an inquiry into the respondent’s competency to intelligently waive an insanity defense, which is not necessarily the same as competency to stand trial. See Frendak, 408 A.2d at 367; Phenis v. United States, 909 A.2d 138, 154-60 (D.C. 2006).

Even if a judge is permitted to foist an insanity defense on an unwilling respondent, it does not follow that the consequence of the defense once established should be automatic involuntary civil commitment in those jurisdictions where such commitment is the usual fate of insanity acquittees. The Jones case discussed in § 12.23 supra attached importance to the fact that “automatic commitment under [the challenged statute was provided] . . . only if the acquittee himself advances insanity as a defense . . . .” Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354, 367 (1983) (emphasis in original); see also id. at 367 n.16. Counsel in jurisdictions with statutes that are ambiguous on the subject can argue that they should be construed as imposing the same limitation, under the doctrine calling for statutory construction that avoids unnecessary constitutional issues (e.g., In re M.F., 298 Ga. 138, 780 S.E.2d 291 (2015); State v. Dahl, 874 N.W.2d 348 (Iowa 2016)); and, if the statute is not so construed, counsel can distinguish Jones in arguing that the statute is unconstitutional for all of the reasons advanced in the dissenting opinions in that case (463 U.S. at 371-87).
Chapter 13

Transfer or Waiver to Adult Court

§ 13.01 INTRODUCTION

Every State provides that persons under a certain age who are accused of violating the penal law are eligible for prosecution as juvenile delinquents in juvenile court. However, every State also retains the power to selectively prosecute otherwise eligible juveniles in adult criminal court. When prosecuted in adult criminal court, juveniles are not referred to as delinquents, though frequently another label different from “criminal,” such as “youthful offender” or “juvenile offender,” will be used.

The decision to prosecute in adult court a person otherwise eligible for prosecution as a delinquent affects many different aspects of the process. On the credit side, the young person will be entitled to all of the constitutional and statutory rights that adults accused of crime enjoy in the State, including such rights as the right to trial by jury (a major benefit in the many jurisdictions in which there is no such right for accused delinquents), open and public proceedings, bail, and prosecution only on indictment by a grand jury. In addition, because sentencing in adult court is governed by statutory maximum terms graduated according to the severity of offenses rather than following the juvenile court model, which looks exclusively at the rehabilitative needs of the particular offender, the juvenile who is convicted only of a misdemeanor or minor felony offense may be eligible for, or actually receive, a sentence less severe than s/he would have received if prosecuted as a juvenile delinquent. On the debit side, the maximum sentence that the young person prosecuted in adult court may receive for serious offenses frequently is considerably greater than s/he could have received if adjudicated a delinquent:

- The maximum length of sentence for severe crimes is greater, sometimes equaling the maximum available for an adult. There are, however, some adult criminal sentences that cannot constitutionally be imposed on a minor. If an offender was below the age of 18 at the time of the crime, the Eighth Amendment prohibits a sentence of death (Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005)) and also prohibits the imposition of the following types of non-capital sentences:

  (i) A sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole in a nonhomicide case. Graham v. Florida, 560 U.S. 48 (2010). See also Budder v. Addison, 851 F.3d 1047, 1049, 1055-56, 1059 (10th Cir. 2017) (Graham prohibited the sentencing of an offender who was 16 at the time of the crime to “three life sentences and an additional sentence of twenty years, all to run consecutively,” which had the effect that “[h]e will not be eligible for parole under Oklahoma law until he has served 131.75 years in prison”; “The Court in Graham considered all ‘sentences that deny convicts the possibility of parole.’ . . . The Court repeatedly referred to these sentences as ‘life without parole sentences,’ . . . but a sentencing court need not use that specific label for a sentence to fall within the category considered by the Court.”); People v. Caballero, 55 Cal. 4th 262, (2012) (“a 110-year-to-life sentence imposed on a juvenile convicted of nonhomicide offenses contravenes Graham’); Henry v. State, 175 So. 3d 675, 679-80 (Fla. 2015) (Graham prohibits a term-of-years sentence that has the effect of incarcerating a juvenile nonhomicide offender for his or her “natural life” without “a meaningful opportunity to obtain future early release . . . based on . . . demonstrated maturity and rehabilitation”);
State v. Moore, 149 Ohio St. 3d 557, at 557, 76 N.E.3d 1127, 1128-29 (2016) (“a term-of-years prison sentence that exceeds the offender’s life expectancy” violates Graham). But see Willbanks v. Missouri Department of Corrections, 522 S.W.3d 238, 242 (Mo. 2017) (because “Graham concerned ‘juvenile offenders sentenced to life without parole solely for a nonhomicide offense[.]’” Graham’s prohibition does not apply to “multiple fixed-term sentences, which total beyond a juvenile offender’s life expectancy” [emphasis in original]).

(ii) The mandatory imposition of a sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole for any offender for any offense, including homicide.
Louisiana*, 136 S. Ct. 718, 725-26 (2016). See also Sam v. State, 401 P.3d 834, 859, 860 (Wyo. 2017) (“consecutive sentences of a minimum of 52 years, with release possible when . . . [the juvenile] is 70 years old” are “the functional equivalent of life without parole and violate[ ] . . . Miller and its progeny”); United States v. Grant, 887 F.3d 131, 153 (3d Cir.
2018) (“we hold that: (1) a [term-of-years] sentence that either meets or exceeds a non-incorrigible juvenile offender’s life expectancy [and thus is essentially a de facto life sentence] violates the Eighth Amendment; (2) courts must hold evidentiary hearings to determine the non-incorrigible juvenile homicide offender’s life expectancy before sentencing him or her to a term-of-years that may meet or exceed his or her expected mortality; and (3) when sentencing the juvenile homicide offender, a court must consider as sentencing factors his or her life expectancy and the national age of retirement, in addition to the [18 U.S.C.] § 3553(a) factors, to properly structure a meaningful opportunity for release. A non-incorrigible juvenile offender should presumptively be sentenced below the national age of retirement, unless the remaining sentencing factors strongly mitigate against doing so. Sentencing judges therefore retain the discretion to sentence incorrigible juvenile offenders to LWOP and non-incorrigible ones to a term-of-years beyond the national age of retirement but below life expectancy, although we believe that either of these circumstances will be rare and exceptional.”); People v. Gutierrez, 58 Cal. 4th 1354, 1360-61, 324 P.3d 245, 249, 171 Cal. Rptr. 3d 421, 425 (2014) (the previous judicial construction of a state statute “as creating a presumption in favor of life without parole as the appropriate penalty for juveniles convicted of special circumstance murder” must be abandoned in order to avoid “violat[ing] the Eighth Amendment to the United States Constitution under the principles announced in Miller”; “Miller requires a trial court, in exercising its sentencing discretion, to consider the ‘distinctive attributes of youth’ and how those attributes ‘diminish the penological justifications for imposing the harshest sentences on juvenile offenders’ before imposing life without parole on a juvenile offender.”); State v. Null, 836 N.W.2d 41, 45, 70-75 (Iowa 2013) (“*Miller’s principles are fully applicable to a lengthy term-of-year sentence as was imposed in this case,” in which the defendant had to “serve at least 52.5 years of his seventy-five-year aggregate sentence”); State v. Zuber, 227 N.J. 422, 429-30, 152 A.3d 197, 201-02 (2017) (“before a judge imposes consecutive terms that would result in a lengthy overall term of imprisonment for a juvenile, the court must consider the Miller factors along with other traditional concerns”; “judges should exercise a heightened level of care before they impose multiple consecutive sentences on juveniles which would result in lengthy jail terms.”). Compare Windom v. State, 162 Idaho 417, 398 P.3d 150 (2017) (ordering resentencing where the trial court imposed a life-without-parole sentence for murder after stating “‘I have considered the nature of the offense. I have considered the mental health issues. I have considered mitigating and aggravating factors. I have considered in mitigation, for example, the relative youth. I have considered the fact that he does not have a long criminal record.’” (Id. at 424, 398 P.3d at 157). “*Miller . . . did more than require a sentencer to consider a juvenile offender’s youth before imposing life without parole; it established that the penological justifications for life without parole collapse in light of ‘the distinctive attributes of youth.’ Even if a court considers a child’s age before sentencing him or her to a lifetime in prison, that sentence still violates the Eighth Amendment for a child whose crime reflects ‘unfortunate yet transient immaturity.’’” (Id. at 423, 398 P.3d at 156). “[T]he sentencing hearing did not show that evidence was presented regarding the factors required by Miller. Those factors must be individualized for the juvenile being sentenced.” (Id. at 424, 398 P.3d at 157.) with Johnson v. State, 162 Idaho 213, 225, 395 P.3d 1246, 1258 (2017) (*Miller’s requirement is satisfied if the sentencing court hears evidence including expert testimony regarding the immaturity of juveniles; it needs “not specifically find that . . . [the juvenile] was ‘irreparably corrupt’”), and United States v. Briones, 890 F.3d 811 (9th Cir. 2018). The lower courts also have applied this Eighth Amendment principle to modify various types of sentencing and other procedures when the offender was below 18 at the time of the crime. See, e.g., People v. Holman, 2017 IL 120655, 91 N.E.3d 849, 861-62, 418 Ill. Dec. 889, 901-02 (2017) (rejecting the view that Miller v. Alabama, supra, applies “to only mandatory life sentences,” and holding that Miller [also] applies to discretionary sentences of life without parole for juvenile defendants); Commonwealth v. Batts, 163 A.3d 410, 415-16 (Pa. 2017) (“we . . . conclude that to effectuate the mandate of Miller and Montgomery, procedural safeguards are required to ensure that life-without-parole sentences are meted out only to ‘the rarest of juvenile offenders’ whose crimes reflect ‘permanent incorrigibility,’ ‘irreparable corruption’ and ‘irretrievable depravity,’ as required by Miller and Montgomery. Thus, . . . we recognize a presumption against the imposition of a sentence of life without parole for a juvenile offender. To rebut the presumption, the Commonwealth bears the burden of proving, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the juvenile offender is incapable of rehabilitation.”); Aiken v. Byars, 410 S.C. 534, 542, 545, 765 S.E.2d 572, 576, 578 (2014) (in “South Carolina whose sentencing scheme permits a life without parole sentence to be imposed on a juvenile offender but does not mandate it,” the rule of “Miller requires that before a life without parole sentence is imposed upon a juvenile offender, he must receive an individualized hearing where the mitigating hallmark features of youth are fully explored”); United States v. Under Seal, 819 F.3d 715 (4th Cir. 2016) (Miller barred the transfer, from juvenile to adult court, of a defendant who was below 18 at the time of the crime, for prosecution for an offense that carried a mandatory sentence of either death or life imprisonment); In the Matter of Hawkins v. New York State Dep’t of Corrections and Community Supervision, 140 A.D.3d 34, 40, 30 N.Y.S.3d 397, 400-01 (N.Y. App. Div. 3d Dep’t 2016) (annulling the Parole Board’s denial of parole and ordering “a de novo parole release hearing” because Miller and Montgomery give rise to “an analogous procedural requirement . . . at the parole release hearing stage” that, “[f]or those persons convicted of crimes committed as juveniles who, but for a favorable parole determination will be punished by life in prison, the Board must consider youth and its attendant characteristics in relationship to the commission of the crime at issue,” and “[h]ere, neither the hearing transcript nor the [Parole] Board’s written determination . . . reflects that the Board met its constitutional obligation to consider petitioner’s youth and its attendant characteristics in relationship to the commission of the crime.”). And some state courts have construed their state constitutions to expand the protections of Miller in various ways. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Perez, 477 Mass. 677, 679, 80 N.E.3d 967, 970 (2017) (“[W]here a juvenile is sentenced for a nonmurder offense or offenses and the aggregate time to be served prior to parole eligibility exceeds that applicable to a juvenile convicted of murder, the sentence cannot be reconciled with [Massachusetts Constitution] art. 26 unless, after a hearing on the factors articulated in Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460, 477-478 . . . (2012) (Miller hearing), the judge makes a finding that the circumstances warrant treating the juvenile more harshly for parole purposes than a juvenile convicted of murder.”); Diatchenko v. District Attorney, 466 Mass. 655, 658-59, 1 N.E.3d 270, 275-76 (2013) (the Massachusetts Constitution’s “cruel or unusual punishments” clause bars the “discretionary imposition” of a sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole “on offenders who were under the age of eighteen when they committed the crime of murder in the first degree” because such a sentence is “an unconstitutionally disproportionate punishment when viewed in the context of the unique characteristics of juvenile offenders”); State v. Sweet, 879 N.W.2d 811, 839 (Iowa 2016) (construing the state constitution to “adopt a categorical rule that juvenile offenders may not be sentenced to life without the possibility of parole”); State v. Lyle, 854 N.W.2d 378, 400 (Iowa 2014) (“[W]e conclude all mandatory minimum sentences of imprisonment for youthful offenders are unconstitutional under the cruel and unusual punishment clause in article I, section 17 of our constitution. Mandatory minimum sentences for juveniles are simply too punitive for what we know about juveniles.”).

• The place of confinement may be an adult correctional facility. Many jurisdictions do, however, provide that the part of the sentence that runs through the young person’s minority (usually 18) must be served in facilities maintained by the department that supervises the incarceration of delinquents, rather than by the adult correctional department. See generally Aaron Kupchik, Jeffrey Fagan & Akiva Liberman, Punishment, Proportionality, and Jurisdictional Transfer of Adolescent Offenders: A Test of the Leniency Gap Hypothesis, 14 STAN. L. & POL’Y REV. 57 (2003).

There are varied and numerous schemes for determining when and how the decision whether to prosecute as a juvenile or an adult is made. See generally Charles Puzzanchera & Sean Addie, Delinquency Cases Waived to Criminal Court, 2010 (U.S. Dep’t of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, Feb. 2014). See, e.g., State v. Mohi, 901 P.2d 991, 998, 1004 (Utah 1995) (striking down the “direct-file” provision of the Utah juvenile court act, which gave “prosecutors undirected discretion to choose where to file charges against juvenile offenders,” because the statute violated the Utah constitution’s “uniform operation of laws” provision by “permit[ting] two identically situated juveniles, even co-conspirators or co-participants in the same crime, to face radically different penalties and consequences without any statutory guidelines for distinguishing between them”). Several different schemes will be briefly described here. Although these schemes do not exhaust the variety employed by the fifty States, they provide a useful national overview.
In most States there is a minimum age below which a juvenile cannot be prosecuted in criminal court. In some jurisdictions all juveniles above a certain age may be prosecuted as adults. In some States, regardless of age, juveniles charged with specific serious offenses may be prosecuted in either juvenile or criminal court. In still other States juveniles charged with specific serious crimes must be tried in criminal court. In most jurisdictions juveniles charged with serious offenses who are above a certain age may be prosecuted either in juvenile or adult court.

Both the reasons for waiver and the process for making the determination vary widely from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. In those jurisdictions in which all juveniles charged with certain serious offenses, regardless of age, must be tried as adults, the prosecutor effectively decides where the child will be prosecuted, either by determining what degree of charge to lodge or by deciding in which court to file the charges. In the majority of jurisdictions there is discretion beyond that inherent in the charge selected, which must be exercised by a state official before the decision is made in which court the young person is to be prosecuted. In these jurisdictions typically the juvenile court judge is empowered to decide whether to transfer and must hold a hearing before making a transfer order, or, as it is sometimes called, an order “waiving” juvenile court jurisdiction. Compare State in the Interest of V.A., 212 N.J. 1, 8, 50 A.3d 610, 614 (2012) (prosecutor has discretionary authority to seek waiver to adult court of juveniles “aged sixteen and over, who are charged with certain serious offenses,” but the prosecutor must provide the court in each case with a motion seeking waiver and an accompanying statement of reasons, and the court reviews the waiver motion under an “abuse of discretion” standard that “involves a limited but nonetheless substantive review to ensure that the prosecutor’s individualized decision about the juvenile before the court, as set forth in the statement of reasons, is not arbitrary or abusive of the considerable discretion allowed to the prosecutor by statute”).

Needless to say, the decision to prosecute a person otherwise eligible for juvenile court jurisdiction in an adult criminal court is momentous. It should be no surprise that the first decision ever rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject of juvenile courts focused on the due process requirements that apply to this decision. In Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541, 556-57 (1966), the Court stated that waiver of jurisdiction is a “critically important” stage in the juvenile court process and must be attended by certain minimum safeguards of due process to satisfy the Constitution.

§ 13.02 FACTORS THAT AFFECT THE DECISION WHETHER TO OPPOSE TRANSFER TO ADULT COURT

Counsel can play an important role in defending a juvenile at this stage. What counsel does, however, depends on a number of factors. Initially, counsel must determine whether the client will be better off being prosecuted in juvenile court rather than in adult criminal court. Although this will usually be the case, counsel should not automatically assume that it is. Counsel must consider the following factors:

First, counsel should calculate the maximum sentence that the client could receive, the probable sentence that s/he would receive, and the potential places of confinement, if convicted in adult court and juvenile court respectively. Second, counsel should consider the respective probabilities of conviction by the two courts. It may be that on the facts of a particular case, as counsel foresees the case developing, the probability of acquittal by the judge who will sit as factfinder in juvenile court is close to zero. This may be, for example, because the case will turn on a question of credibility, and counsel knows from previous experience that the juvenile trial judge tends to resolve questions of credibility against the juvenile. Or the defense may turn on a contention – such as the reasonableness of the client’s response to certain provocation by an assault complainant – that, in counsel’s opinion, a jury is likely to accept but the judge very probably will not. Third, counsel should consider the probability, duration, and conditions of pretrial detention in the juvenile and the adult courts respectively. Fourth, counsel should consider the long-term effects of the process of prosecution in adult court. Will the client, once prosecuted in adult court, be forever ineligible for juvenile court prosecution in subsequent matters (as is the practice in most jurisdictions) and, if so, how likely is it (based on the age of the client and his or her prior record) that the client will be arrested on a new charge while still chronologically eligible for juvenile court? Counsel should also consider whether the client will be fingerprinted and photographed only if prosecuted in adult court or whether these records will be made and kept regardless of which court assumes trial jurisdiction.

Counsel’s investigation of these factors will frequently require speaking with experienced attorneys in both juvenile and criminal court. After s/he has investigated and considered them, s/he should meet with the client for a lengthy counseling session. It is the client’s right to decide what to do and to instruct the lawyer accordingly. See § 2.03 supra. But it is the lawyer’s responsibility to counsel the client and to share with the client information that the client cannot possibly have. This includes the lawyer’s best professional judgment on all of the subjects described in the preceding paragraph, however uncertain the lawyer may be about them. One of the most difficult – and common – tasks in which any lawyer must engage is making predictions or professional judgments about probable outcomes that are subject to uncertainty. To acknowledge that this cannot be done with scientific accuracy is not to conclude that it should not be attempted in the first place. Lawyers are compelled to predict.

§ 13.03 MEETING WITH THE PROSECUTOR

As indicated in § 13.01 supra, there are many different procedures for making the decision whether a juvenile will be prosecuted as an adult. In some jurisdictions the prosecutor does not have the power to choose the court, but unless the prosecutor requests transfer, the juvenile automatically will be prosecuted in juvenile court. In other jurisdictions the prosecutor’s recommendation is heavily relied upon by the court. Depending upon the jurisdiction and the stage at which counsel enters the case (see Chapter 3), it may be possible to meet with the prosecutor before formal charges have been lodged. Such a meeting can be enormously beneficial, especially in jurisdictions in which the prosecutor has the power to choose in which court to prosecute, either directly (by filing charges in juvenile or criminal court as the prosecutor sees fit) or indirectly (by deciding what degree of charge to lodge in juvenile court, thereby making the client eligible or ineligible for adult court jurisdiction). Counsel should prepare for this meeting with the prosecutor by obtaining information about the client, his or her past juvenile record, and social history, including family, school, and community circumstances.

In the event counsel has determined that the client’s interests are likely to be best served by prosecution in juvenile court, counsel will want to persuade the prosecutor to reduce the charges or otherwise assure or recommend that the case be kept in juvenile court. Often, however, it will not be possible to decide where the client’s interests lie without investigating the charges themselves and conducting the analysis described in § 13.02 supra. Thus, at this first meeting, counsel may request that the prosecutor furnish him or her with information about the charges and grant him or her a brief period, of perhaps one or two days, to conduct an investigation into the charges. This is especially important since prosecutors frequently are unwilling to consider charging less than the maximum charge for which they believe that probable cause can be sustained unless the client is willing to plead guilty to a specified charge and avoid the need for any formal or drawn-out proceeding. Prior to conducting an investigation, counsel is in no position to accede to this request or to advise the client about it. (The very real possibility that the prosecutor will seek a guilty plea early on may be a reason not to hold this meeting in the first place. But counsel’s choices are quite limited. If counsel does not intervene by seeking this meeting, the prosecutor will make his or her decision without any input from the defense. Thus, unless it appears that counsel’s intervention is likely to increase the probability that the prosecutor will choose to prosecute in criminal court, there is not much to lose from setting up the meeting.)

§ 13.04 THE RIGHT TO A HEARING AND OTHER HEARING-RELATED RIGHTS

Except when the prosecutor unilaterally makes the choice of court or when the gravity of the offense charged automatically determines the court in which it must be prosecuted, the decision is made by a judge – usually the juvenile court judge, more rarely the criminal court judge.

Most jurisdictions provide by statute that juveniles are entitled to a hearing before the final transfer decision. If there is no statutory right to a hearing, such a right may be conferred by the due process clause of the state or federal constitution. Determining whether a hearing is constitutionally required before a juvenile may be transferred involves careful study of the statutory scheme for transfer. When the scheme demands that certain facts be found before the juvenile may be transferred, the juvenile indisputably enjoys a constitutional right to a hearing preceding the decision to transfer. Because, under state law, the juvenile is entitled to be prosecuted in juvenile court unless certain facts are found that justify prosecution as an adult, this entitlement constitutes a “liberty” interest protected by due process.

The Supreme Court has held that “[a] liberty interest may arise from the Constitution itself, by reason of guarantees implicit in the word ‘liberty,’ . . . or it may arise from an expectation or interest created by state laws or policies.” Wilkinson v. Austin, 545 U.S. 209, 221

This is the rule even when the state laws that give rise to the liberty interest fail to provide for the procedural right to a hearing. “The categories of substance and procedure are distinct.” Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 353, 541 (1985). Whether or not a statute provides for a hearing, due process defines the minimum procedural protections that a State must afford before depriving an individual of a state-created liberty interest. E.g., Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565 (1975).

As previously indicated, in the majority of jurisdictions, judges decide in which court the juvenile is to be prosecuted. So long as this decision depends upon the determination of issues of fact or the application of a legal standard to particular cases, the judge may not make the decision without first holding a hearing; and this is so even if “the standards set by a statutory . . . scheme ‘cannot be applied mechanically’ . . . [and the judge has] discretion in this sense,” Board of Pardons v. Allen, 482 U.S. at 375-76. In 1966, the Supreme Court ruled in Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541 (1966), that four basic safeguards are required before a judge may decide to transfer jurisdiction:

1. A hearing must be held;
2. The juvenile is entitled to representation by counsel at such a hearing;
3. Counsel must be given access to the juvenile’s social records on request; and
4. The judge must state his/her reasons in support of a transfer order.

383 U.S. at 561-63. The Kent decision ultimately turned upon construction of the District of Columbia statute at issue in that case, but the opinion sounds strongly in due process; and today its constitutional dimension is recognized by most authorities. See, e.g., Juvenile Male v. Commonwealth, 255 F.3d 1069, 1072 (9th Cir. 2001); Green v. Reynolds, 57 F.3d 956, 960 (10th Cir. 1995); Crick v. Smith, 729 F.2d 1038 (6th Cir. 1984); Stokes v. Fair, 581 F.2d 287, 289 (1st Cir. 1978); Geboy v. Gray, 471 F.2d 575 (7th Cir. 1973); United States ex rel. Turner v. Rundle, 438 F.2d 839 (3d Cir. 1971); State v. R.G.D., 108 N.J. 1, 527 A.2d 834 (1987).

The only circumstances under which a judicial hearing may not be constitutionally required before the decision to transfer is effected are when that decision is made by the prosecutor as a matter of prosecutorial discretion (that is, when statutes expressly leave the decision up to the prosecutor, with no standards for making it) and when the decision is made by operation of law (that is, when statutes provide that persons charged with certain offenses are automatically prosecuted in a particular court). In the latter situation (for example, when a 17-year-old is charged with murder in a State in which all persons above 16 who are charged with murder must be prosecuted as adults), it cannot be said that the accused minor has any state law entitlement to prosecution as a juvenile. Because there is no protected “liberty” interest here, there is no constitutional requirement of a hearing.

A prosecutor may have the power to choose between the juvenile or adult court in either or both of two senses. First, by determining what charge to file, s/he may effectively be “choosing” the court in those jurisdictions in which certain charges automatically result in adult prosecution. It could conceivably be argued that the juvenile is entitled to some kind of review of the charging decision in these jurisdictions, despite the general immunity of prosecutorial charging decisions from due process constraints, see, e.g., Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831-this review will usually be provided by the ordinary forms of adult criminal procedure, which employ such institutions as the grand jury or a preliminary hearing to determine whether there is probable cause for the charge made.

Second, a prosecutor may be authorized to select the court in which to file the charges although the crime charged is one for which a juvenile is eligible to be prosecuted in either juvenile or adult court. In these circumstances it is strongly arguable that a hearing should be held before the transfer may be effected. Under the constitutional analysis previously summarized, it is not evident why a prosecutor should be permitted to make without a hearing the identical decision that, if delegated to a judge, would require a due process hearing. So long as under the statute in question the juvenile is entitled to be prosecuted in juvenile court unless reasons exist for prosecuting him or her in adult court, there is no functional difference between the two decisionmakers. Because of the significant impact it may have on the young person, the decision made by the prosecutor is “‘critically important.’” Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. at 556. Like the same kind of decision by a judge, it involves large elements of judgment, but “discretion in this sense is not incompatible with the existence of a liberty interest” deserving of due process protection. Board of Pardons v. Allen, 482 U.S. at 376. Due process requires an opportunity to be

Unfortunately, most jurisdictions that empower prosecutors to choose the court have statutory schemes that cannot easily be read as providing an entitlement to juvenile court prosecution. See, e.g., Johnson v. State, 314 So. 2d 573, 577 (Fla. 1975). Unless the statute can be viewed as doing this – by providing, for example, an initial presumption in favor of juvenile court prosecution in some or all juvenile cases – then the prosecutor’s decision to proceed in adult court does not deprive a juvenile of any “liberty,” and no federal right will be said to have been infringed. See, e.g., Cox v. United States, 473 F.2d 334 (4th Cir. 1973); United States v.
Bland, 472 F.2d 1329 (D.C. Cir. 1972); Manduley v. Superior Court, 27 Cal. 4th 537, 562-67, 41
P.3d 3, 19-23, 117 Cal. Rptr. 2d 168, 189-92 (2002). One of the few cases that provides support for the position that juvenile court jurisdiction cannot be abrogated under any circumstances unless the juvenile is given a hearing is Miller v. Quatsoe, 348 F Supp. 764 (E.D. Wis. 1972). In Miller, a juvenile who was in jail awaiting trial on another offense stabbed his jailer with a ballpoint pen. Rather than commence juvenile proceedings against him for this act, the juvenile authorities decided to defer prosecution for a few weeks until he turned 18 so that he could be charged as an adult without the necessity for a transfer hearing. Although the Wisconsin juvenile code recognized the accused’s age at the time he was charged with a criminal act as controlling for purposes of juvenile court jurisdiction, the court held that this juvenile’s criminal conviction was void. It first ruled expressly that a juvenile is constitutionally entitled to a hearing before a final determination is made to treat him as an adult; it then condemned the delayed filing of a complaint as a means of avoiding juvenile court jurisdiction without the requisite hearing, saying:

Administrators of a state juvenile system may not manipulate administrative procedures so as to avoid state and constitutional procedural rights meant to protect juveniles. To do so is to deny the juvenile involved both due process and equal protection.

Id. at 766.

The court’s decision was based upon the premise that, although the Constitution does not require a State to provide a dual criminal justice system with one set of procedures and penalties for juveniles and another for adults, once the State chooses to create such a system, it must observe due process and equal protection principles in deploying individual cases between the adult and juvenile jurisdictions. See also State v. Becker, 74 Wis. 2d 675, 677, 247 N.W.2d 495, 496 (1976) (requiring a due process hearing to determine whether delay in charging was for the purpose of manipulating the system to avoid juvenile court jurisdiction); State v. Avery, 80 Wis. 2d 305, 310-11, 259 N.W.2d 63, 65 (1977) (requiring a hearing to determine whether delay in charging was due to negligent failure of prosecutor to bring charge promptly); State v. Hodges, 28 Wash. App. 902, 904-05, 626 P.2d 1025, 1026 (1981) (following Miller v. Quatsoe, State v. Becker, and State v. Avery, in holding that “a criminal defendant is denied due process when the juvenile court loses jurisdiction through delays in arraignment which the state cannot justify in some manner as reasonable”). But see McBeth v. Rose, 111 Ariz. 399, 531 P.2d 156 (1975) (rejecting this same argument).

§ 13.05 THE RIGHTS TO CONDUCT A COMPLETE CROSS-EXAMINATION AND TO PRESENT A COMPLETE DEFENSE

Judges may wish to treat transfer hearings as less than plenary proceedings. They will rarely attempt to limit or control the type or amount of evidence that the prosecution intends to present. Rather, truncation is most likely to be imposed upon either the defense effort to cross-examine or the defense effort to present its own evidence, or both. These two areas are considered in the following subsections.

§ 13.05(a) Cross- Examination
Cross-examination is generally recognized as a basic safeguard for assuring reliable factual determinations. See, e.g., In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 56-57 (1967); Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 269 (1970) (“In almost every setting where important decisions turn on questions of fact, due process requires an opportunity to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses”); Jenkins v. McKeithen, 395 U.S. 411, 428-29 (1969) (plurality opinion); Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 489 (1972); Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 785-87 (1973); 5 John Henry Wigmore, Evidence § 1367 (James H. Chadbourn rev. 1974). Very often, the evidence that counsel will want to challenge by cross-examination concerns the current charges against the juvenile, the prior history of the juvenile, and/or expert testimony concerning the juvenile’s lack of amenability to treatment as a juvenile. Each of these issues requires full cross-examination to enhance the reliability of the findings and thereby assure the adequacy of the hearing and its comportment with due process. Undue restrictions upon cross-examination constitute an effective denial of the right to cross-examine and are constitutionally assailable. Smith v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 129, 131 (1968); Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 318 (1974); Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988) (per curiam); Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 678-79 (1986) (dictum).

§ 13.05(b) Presenting Defense Evidence

Although most state statutes do not explicitly give a juvenile the right to present evidence of his or her own at the transfer hearing, such a right is based in the Constitution. At least in those jurisdictions in which the hearing itself is constitutionally necessary, juveniles have a constitutional right to present relevant evidence that the prosecutor or probation department may have elected to withhold. “The fundamental requisite of due process of law is the opportunity to be heard.” Grannis v. Ordean, 234 U.S. 385, 394 (1914). The constitutional right to be heard entails not only the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses and evidence presented by others but also the right to present evidence deemed important to the defense. See, e.g., Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973); Vitek v. Jones, 445 U.S. 480, 495-96 (1980); Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 690-91 (1986); Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 49-53 & n.9 (1987).

Whenever counsel is contesting any fact made relevant by one or more of the criteria for transfer, this constitutional caselaw strongly supports the proposition that the juvenile has a due process right to present all material evidence bearing upon that fact. “Ordinarly, the right to present evidence is basic to a fair hearing.” Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 566 (1974); when an issue is disputed, the factfinder must listen to the facts on both sides. Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 785-87 (1973); see also Barefoot v. Estelle, 463 U.S. 880, 898-99 (1983). The “minimum assurance [that a factfinder’s determination is] . . . truly informed . . . requires respect for the basic ingredient of due process, namely, an opportunity to be allowed to substantiate a claim before it is rejected.” Ford v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 399, 414 (1986) (plurality opinion), quoting Solesbee v. Balkcom, 339 U.S. 9, 23 (1950) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting).

The Supreme Court has specifically held that when a sentencing judge can enhance the maximum sentence to which the defendant could otherwise have been subjected by making a posttrial finding that the defendant poses a “‘threat of bodily harm to members of the public, or is an habitual offender and mentally ill,’” the requisite findings must be preceded by a hearing at which the convicted individual has the rights to be present with counsel, to be heard, to be confronted with and to cross-examine the witnesses against him or her, and to offer evidence of his or her own. Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605, 607 (1967). These due process protections were imposed even though the defendant had already been convicted beyond a reasonable doubt of the underlying criminal charges; they attached because he was subject to a greater maximum sentence than he would have been if additional posttrial findings of fact had not been made. In transfer hearings, an adverse finding to the juvenile plainly subjects the juvenile to a greater maximum sentence than would be permissible if the juvenile were prosecuted in juvenile court. Therefore, all of the hearing rights enumerated in Specht are constitutionally required. Cf. State v. J.M., 182 N.J. 402, 416-18, 866 A.2d 178, 186-88 (2005) (exercising the court’s inherent authority over court rules to modify the rules governing transfer hearings “to permit a juvenile to testify and present evidence at the probable cause portion of the waiver hearing” because “considerations of fairness” require this result “[g]iven our conclusion that the probable cause portion of the waiver hearing . . . is such a meaningful and critical stage of the proceedings,” and concluding “[i]n light of our disposition of this matter” that there is “no need to reach the question whether due process requires providing juveniles the right to testify and present evidence at a probable cause hearing”).

§ 13.06 THE RIGHT TO COURT-APPOINTED EXPERTS

Juveniles have the rights both to obtain independent opinions from experts on germane issues such as amenability to treatment and to present this evidence at the transfer hearing. See In the Matter of the Appeal in Pima County Juvenile Action No. J-77027-1, 139 Ariz. 446, 679 P.2d 92 (Ariz. App. 1984). If the jurisdiction in which the case is being prosecuted already recognizes these rights and if the client is indigent, counsel should consider making a timely application to have the court authorize the payment of fees to retain an independent expert. If the jurisdiction does not already recognize the rights, counsel should consider making a timely application and supporting it with a memorandum of law developing the constitutional arguments that the client is entitled to such an expert. In either case, factual matters documenting the need for expert assistance should be submitted in a sealed affidavit accompanying the application, or the application should request leave to present them to the court ex parte. See § 11.03(b) supra.

Counsel should assert both due process and equal protection claims when urging the constitutional right to a court-appointed expert. See § 11.03(a) supra. The equal-protection framework is sketched in §§ 4.31(d), 11.03(a) supra. Due process analysis begins with Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985), discussed in § 11.03(a) supra. As noted there, Ake makes the due process right to state-paid expert assistance turn upon a three-factor approach derived from Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976). The three factors to be considered are: (1) the private interest that will be affected by a governmental action; (2) the governmental interest that will be affected if the proposed safeguard is provided; and (3) the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the affected interest if the safeguard is not provided. Id. at 335. See also §§ 11.03(a) supra, 14.29(a) infra. As the following discussion will show, in a case in which the state’s arguments for transfer rely in whole or in part on mental-health assessments, the three-factor Mathews analysis points strongly to the conclusion that the Constitution entitles an indigent accused to the provision of free expert assistance.

§ 13.06(a) The Private Interest of the Juvenile

The juvenile who is under consideration for transfer is subject to a major deprivation of liberty. S/he frequently will be exposed to a substantially greater maximum sentence if prosecuted as an adult than if prosecuted as a juvenile. In addition, many collateral consequences flow from the decision to prosecute as an adult that, singly or in combination, render the decision of substantial importance to the individual. These consequences include permanent maintenance of records of criminality and, if the juvenile is convicted of a felony offense, the formal status of a convicted felon with its accompanying disabilities: restrictions on occupational freedom, deprivation of voting rights and rights to hold public office, ineligibility for drivers’ and other licenses, and subsequent subjection to sentencing enhancement mechanisms if convicted again.

§ 13.06(b) The Governmental Interest

The State has three interests that bear on the question how much process is due in transfer hearings. The State has an interest in economy of resources. Immediate economies may be realized by limiting expenditures to employ experts. However, these economies come at the expense of the State’s separate interest in ensuring that decisions regarding transfer are accurate and reliable. The State would be ill-served by economizing on available steps that could increase the reliability of the transfer decision if the result of such cost-cutting is an increased risk of needlessly imprisoning juveniles for years that would have been avoided by a better informed decision not to transfer. In the long run the State frustrates its own economy interest when an inaccurate decision to transfer is made. The State also has an interest, invariably expressed in enabling or purpose clauses introducing the statutory juvenile justice scheme, in protecting its youth and in providing them with the least restrictive care and discipline consistent with the young person’s needs and best interests. This interest, too, is undermined when the State needlessly or erroneously transfers a juvenile out of the juvenile system.

§ 13.06(c) Risk of an Erroneous Decision

The key issue here is whether the addition of independent experts for juveniles will enhance the reliability of the decisionmaking process and reduce the risk of erroneous transfer decisions. When the transfer decision is based in part on mental health assessments, there is a powerful need for experts who are able to dispute the State’s claim. As Ake noted, mental health professionals “disagree widely and frequently on what constitutes mental illness.” Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. at 81. Particularly when the court’s final determination “turns on the meaning of the facts which must be interpreted by expert psychiatrists and psychologists,” Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 429 (1979), due process of law requires the opportunity to confront those experts and to present contrary evidence.

This consideration was decisive in Ake. Recognizing that independent mental health professionals are able to challenge the findings of state experts and enhance the decisionmaker’s capacity for reliable and informed determinations, the Court held that “the assistance of a psychiatrist may well be crucial to the defendant’s ability to marshal his defense.” 470 U.S. at 80. The same observation is true in the transfer hearing context.

§ 13.07 NOTICE AND OPPORTUNITY TO PREPARE ADEQUATELY

When a transfer hearing is scheduled, due process requires that sufficient notice of that fact be given. This requirement has been held to be met if the juvenile, his or her parent, or his or her lawyer has been timely apprised of the purpose of the transfer hearing. The petition requesting waiver is required to contain facts supporting the request in order to give the juvenile adequate notice of both the fact that transfer is sought and the specific reasons asserted for transfer. See In the Interest of J.V.R., 127 Wis. 2d 192, 378 N.W.2d 266 (1985). See also State v. J.M., 182 N.J. 402, 419, 866 A.2d 178, 188 (2005) (state’s motion for waiver must include a “statement of reasons for seeking waiver” so that the court can “determine that the reasons for seeking waiver are not arbitrary”). Adequate notice also requires the allowance of sufficient time to prepare a defense at the hearing. See, e.g., Kemplen v. Maryland, 428 F.2d 169 (4th Cir. 1970); Miller v. Quatsoe, 332 F. Supp. 1269 (E.D. Wis. 1971); James v. Cox, 323 F. Supp. 15 (E.D. Va. 1971); Reed v. State, 125 Ga. App. 568, 188 S.E.2d 392 (1972); State v. Halverson, 192 N.W.2d 765 (Iowa 1971); Commonwealth v. Nole, 448 Pa. 62, 292 A.2d 331 (1972). See also Gingerich v. State, 979 N.E.2d 694, 696, 712-13 (Ind. App. 2012) (juvenile court abused its discretion by denying defense counsel’s “request for a continuance of the waiver hearing” to afford sufficient time to prepare for the hearing).

Insufficiency of notice prior to the transfer hearing should constitute a defect that will deprive the criminal court of jurisdiction. See, e.g., James v. Cox, 323 F. Supp. 15 (E.D. Va. 1971) (holding that the lack of notice and a failure to appoint counsel mandated redetermination of a transfer decision made eight years earlier); State v. Grenz, 243 N.W.2d 375, 381 (N.D. 1976) (“Due to the failure of the juvenile court to provide adequate notice of the [waiver] hearing to the defendant and his parents and the failure of the court to ascertain whether the defendant knew of his right to counsel, the proceedings were statutorily insufficient to transfer jurisdiction from juvenile to district court . . . [and accordingly] [t]he subsequent conviction in district court upon a plea of guilty is void for lack of jurisdiction.”); Alaniz v. State, 2 S.W.3d 451, 451-53 (Tex. App. 1999) (reversing a conviction of murder in a jury trial in adult criminal court and an adult criminal sentence because the failure to comply with statutory requirements for notice of a waiver hearing “deprived the juvenile court of jurisdiction . . . [and] thus, the . . . [adult criminal] court never acquired jurisdiction”; accused’s “failure to object to the lack of personal service at the hearing on the waiver of jurisdiction did not constitute waiver” because “[a]s a juvenile, Alaniz did not have the capacity to waive service of process”); see also Adams v. State, 411
N.E.2d 160 (Ind. App. 1980) (failure to appoint counsel prior to waiver hearing was erroneous; thus juvenile court’s waiver was unlawful and conviction must be reversed).

§ 13.08 PREPARING FOR THE HEARING

In most transfer hearings the critical document is the probation report on the past history of the juvenile. Counsel should try to obtain this document before the hearing by enlisting the aid of the probation officer.

Probation officers as a rule have an inordinate influence on the outcome of cases in juvenile court. For this reason it is crucial that counsel develop a good working relationship with the juvenile probation officer. The most important ingredients in developing such a relationship will be: (1) showing the probation officer that counsel can be trusted and that s/he will honor all commitments made to the probation officer; (2) demonstrating that counsel is a well-meaning individual whose primary interest truly is the welfare of the child; and (3) refraining from radical rhetoric that will inevitably alienate the probation officer. Counsel should ordinarily accord probation officers the courtesy of asking them to show counsel their reports before counsel moves for a court order that the report be disclosed.

In any event, whether counsel is able to obtain access to the report informally through the probation officer or whether counsel needs to make a motion in court for leave to inspect the report, counsel should read the report in advance of the transfer hearing. In some jurisdictions juveniles are entitled to full discovery of social history reports (but not necessarily police reports) in preparing for the transfer hearing. See, e.g., In the Interest of T.M.J., 110 Wis. 2d 7, 327 N.W.2d 198 (Wis. App. 1982); see also In re D.M., 140 Ohio St. 3d 309, 309, 313, 18 N.E.3d 404, 406, 409 (2014) (in transfer (“bindover”) hearings, “a prosecuting attorney is under a duty imposed by the Due Process Clauses of the Ohio Constitution and the United States Constitution and by Juv.R. 24(A)(6) to disclose to a juvenile respondent all evidence in the state’s possession that is favorable to the juvenile and material either to guilt, innocence, or punishment”); D.C. Code § 16-2307(f) (2018) (requiring that the statutorily mandated report prepared by the Director of Social Services and all social records that are to be made available to the judge at the transfer hearing must be made available to the juvenile’s attorney at least three days prior to the hearing). Counsel is severely disadvantaged when s/he learns of information for the first time at the hearing because it often will be too late to investigate further and correct inaccurate or misleading information.

After reading the report, counsel should attempt to verify its contents. It is not sound to rely on the probation officer’s or prosecutor’s version of the client’s prior record. It takes little effort to go to the record room in the courthouse and read through the records personally. Often, charges, findings and dispositions will be misstated or exaggerated. Even more often, mitigating information will be omitted.

Frequently, reading the records will provide leads that should be followed up. If, for example, as a result of a previous charge the client was placed in a community-based program, counsel should speak to the person who supervised the client in that program. Counsel should try to obtain as many favorable facts about the client as possible. This can be accomplished by speaking to school personnel, including teachers, counselors, coaches, and deans, to find out what positive things each can say on the client’s behalf. Counsel should interview these people and prepare affidavits or letters (depending upon the local jurisdiction’s practices and rules of admissibility) and possibly subpoena these people to be available as witnesses at the hearing (depending upon the admissibility of their written submissions and upon the strategic benefits of live witness testimony).

Counsel should meet with his or her client to go over the contents of the report about him or her. Juvenile clients will not always be able to contradict erroneous record information about them, but counsel should not assume their incapacity. Often, clients, or their parents or other relatives, will be able to give the attorney information or leads to information that is critical. If counsel is permitted to photocopy the report, this should be done, and counsel should bring the report to interviews with the client and his or her relatives.

In some jurisdictions the prosecutor rather than the probation officer prepares the report and recommendation for the court’s consideration at the transfer hearing. In this situation counsel should meet with the prosecutor and attempt to find out as much as possible about the case and the reasons transfer is being sought. At the meeting it will be useful for counsel to divide the discussion into two parts. The first has to do with the nature of the charges being lodged and the facts underlying those charges. Counsel will want to obtain information regarding the circumstances of the offense, any aggravating or mitigating features, and the strength of the prosecutor’s case.

The second topic of discussion concerns the personal and criminal background of the client. Although at this stage of the process counsel will ordinarily have little information to share with the prosecutor concerning the charges themselves, counsel will have information regarding the client’s personal history (from the client interview, from court records reviewed by counsel, and often from the client’s parents) before meeting with the prosecutor. Counsel should begin discussion of this topic by asking what the prosecutor knows about the client’s record and background and should listen carefully for possible points of misinformation or ignorance. Sometimes, simply correcting these points will be enough to convince the prosecutor to change a recommendation of transfer to one of keeping the case in juvenile court.

When counsel has relevant information about the client’s personal history that varies from the prosecutor’s information, s/he must make a strategic decision about whether to share this information in an effort to correct the prosecutor’s version of the facts. If counsel concludes that the prosecutor will probably recommend transfer even with the corrected version of the facts, it would serve little purpose to disclose them at the meeting. Under these circumstances it is usually advantageous to wait to correct the prosecutor’s misinformation at the hearing itself, when the judge will learn the correct facts from the defense presentation and when the result will be to discredit the prosecution’s case. The “new” information presented by the defense at the hearing may be sufficient to sway the judge to rule in the juvenile’s favor, even if the information would not have proved dispositive had the prosecutor presented it correctly in the first place. This is so partly because the shading of the information coming from the defense will be more favorable to the juvenile than the shading that the prosecutor would have given the same information. In addition, transfer hearings, like all court proceedings, operate on subliminal as well as other levels. Thus defense counsel who is able to present himself or herself as more competent and thorough than the prosecutor will often win the contest even when the facts themselves would not produce that result.

The same general considerations affect counsel’s decision whether to share with the prosecutor, before the hearing, any information known to counsel that suggests that the prosecutor’s version of the facts relating to the current offense is erroneous. But here three qualifications come into play. First, at this early stage of the proceedings counsel’s own information about the facts surrounding the offense is particularly susceptible to error, and counsel must be very cautious in making the judgment that it is superior to the prosecutor’s. Second, the prosecutor will inevitably be particularly skeptical about defense counsel’s version of events connected with the current offense and less likely to accept it than to accept many sorts of background information about the client that counsel may have to offer. Third, the facts surrounding the offense will very possibly have to be tried on the issue of guilt or innocence eventually, whether in juvenile court or adult court; and any information about the defense version of those facts that counsel gives the prosecutor now may well improve the prosecutor’s preparation to rebut the defense version at trial.

Similar considerations, with appropriate modifications, should dictate counsel’s strategic decisions whether to attempt to correct misinformation in the hands of a probation officer before the transfer hearing. In theory and often in fact, the probation officer does not occupy the same adversarial relationship to counsel that the prosecutor does, and the importance of keeping on the good side of probation officers to the extent possible has already been noted. Showing up a probation officer in court will not impress a judge as favorably as showing up a prosecutor and may even be resented by the judge as well as by the officer. On the other hand, when a probation officer is manifestly determined to recommend transfer, it makes little sense for counsel to assist him or her to correct any factual errors that would otherwise appear in his or her report. Counsel would do better to establish these errors at the hearing – as tactfully as is appropriate, depending upon the degree to which the probation officer has assumed an adversarial stance – and to argue to the judge that the errors undermine the probation officer’s transfer recommendation.

§ 13.09 COUNSEL’S DECISION TO HOLD OR WAIVE A TRANSFER HEARING

The preceding section and most of the following sections of this chapter discuss strategies to maximize the chance of winning the hearing. The possibility of winning is only one good reason to hold a transfer hearing. Even when prosecution in adult court is the wisest course or when counsel concludes that there is no chance of avoiding transfer, in many jurisdictions the hearing presents an excellent opportunity to obtain discovery of the prosecution’s case, since its testimony at the hearing will necessarily focus in part on the charges and on an inquiry into whether there is probable cause to believe that the juvenile committed the crime. Even if counsel does not intend to continue to represent the client in criminal court after transfer, counsel should strive to obtain as much information as possible for the next attorney. By forcing the prosecution to its proof at the transfer hearing, counsel will obtain invaluable information for the ultimate trial, whether that trial is held in juvenile or criminal court.

For these reasons it is ordinarily unwise to waive the right to a transfer hearing. There may, however, at times be countervailing considerations. The major ones are akin to those set forth in § 4.30 supra as bearing on the decision whether to waive a probable-cause hearing. Strategic considerations regarding the decision whether to present or hold back defensive evidence at the transfer hearing are mentioned in § 13.14 infra.

§ 13.10 MAKING A RECORD

An important job of defense counsel is to make an adequate record for purposes of appeal. Often, the outcome of a transfer hearing can be correctly predicted as adverse to the client. This may be due to the publicity surrounding the case, the track record of the judge, or other factors. Counsel must, however, keep one eye on the appellate courts and the possibility of reversible error. In order to make the best record for appellate review, counsel should have all documents relied upon by either the court or the parties marked for identification. Too often, transfer hearings are conducted as informal proceedings, from which it is difficult or impossible to obtain a suitable, reviewable record.

It is important to specify with particularity the grounds on which counsel is opposing the transfer. Depending on the jurisdiction, counsel should argue and make a record supporting arguments that: (a) the crime committed was not of sufficient severity to warrant transfer; (b) the client’s previous record does not justify transfer; (c) the client is amenable to rehabilitation; (d) the prosecutor has failed to establish probable cause to believe that the client committed the offense; or (e) other local statutory criteria for transfer are not satisfied. In addition there are important, and often unsettled, legal issues that counsel should consider and research within the jurisdiction. Examples are discussed in the following two sections.

§ 13.11 STRUCTURING THE HEARING

Although the transfer hearing is unique, it is most akin to the dispositional hearing in juvenile court. Readers are advised to consult Chapter 38, dealing with dispositional hearings, for additional insight into how best to conduct the transfer hearing.

The ultimate question to be determined at a transfer hearing is simply put: whether or not the juvenile should be prosecuted in adult court. Answering that question is much more difficult because it embraces the whole subject of the purpose and appropriateness of juvenile court itself.
The substantive standard by which the decision is to be made is, in most jurisdictions, extremely vague. Commonly, the issue to be decided is whether the juvenile is amenable to the treatment and rehabilitation of the juvenile court. Without more specific criteria, judges are free to decide that issue in accordance with their own biases and intuition. To a large degree this is precisely the manner in which transfer decisions are made in many jurisdictions today. Studies reveal that judges weigh two factors above all else: the seriousness of the offense and the past history of the juvenile. See President’s Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice, Task Force Report: Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Crime, Appendix B, Table 5, at 78 (1967).

The Supreme Court in Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541 (1966), listed in an appendix to its decision eight criteria that the Court suggested for the District of Columbia. Although these criteria cannot be said to be of constitutional dimension in the way that the basic Kent holding has now come to be, see § 13.04 supra, they nevertheless serve as a useful guideline for counsel who wants to frame the transfer hearing to focus the evidence on specific factors. The Court’s suggested criteria were:

1. The seriousness of the alleged offense to the community and whether the protection of the community requires waiver.

2. Whether the alleged offense was committed in an aggressive, violent, premeditated or willful manner.

3. Whether the alleged offense was against persons or against property, greater weight being given to offenses against persons especially if personal injury resulted.

4. The prosecutive merit of the complaint, i.e., whether there is evidence upon which a Grand Jury may be expected to return an indictment. . . .

5. The desirability of trial and disposition of the entire offense in one court when the juvenile’s associates in the alleged offense are adults who will be charged with a crime. . . .

6. The sophistication and maturity of the juvenile as determined by consideration of his home, environmental situation, emotional attitude and pattern of living.

7. The record and previous history of the juvenile. . . .

8. The prospects for adequate protection of the public and the likelihood of reasonable rehabilitation of the juvenile (if he is found to have committed the alleged offense) by the use of procedures, services and facilities currently available to the Juvenile Court.”
By statute, court rule, or caselaw, most jurisdictions have developed some criteria that are to be considered in making the transfer determination. See, e.g., State v. Pittman, 373 S.C. 527, 558-59, 647 S.E.2d 144, 160 (2007) (adopting above-quoted Kent criteria as the “eight factors” the “family court must consider” in determining whether to transfer a juvenile to adult court). A number of States that prescribe criteria require a finding of probable cause to believe that the juvenile committed an offense for which transfer is possible (see, e.g., N.C. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 7B-2200 (2018); In the Interest of T.R.B., 109 Wis. 2d 179, 192, 325 N.W.2d 329, 335 (1982)) and many States require an inquiry into the amenability of the juvenile to treatment services provided by the juvenile court and its ancillary agencies (see, e.g., Or. REV. STAT. § 419C.349(4)(a) (2018)).

In addition to these considerations courts look at a variety of other factors, including the mental and physical condition of the child; the child’s sophistication, maturity, emotional attitude, and pattern of living; the child’s home or family environment; the child’s school record; and the extent and nature of the child’s prior delinquency record. See, e.g., Md. CTS. & JUD. PROC. CODE ANN. § 3-8A-06(e) (2018); In the Matter of J.C.N.-V., 359 Or. 559, 562, 597-99, 2016 WL 3030203, at *1, *19-*20 (2016) (“Under the relevant statutes, ORS 419C.352 and ORS 419C.349, a youth under the age of 15 who is alleged to have committed murder may be waived into adult court only if, at the time of the conduct, he or she ‘was of sufficient sophistication and maturity to appreciate the nature and quality of the conduct involved.’”; “[T]he requirement that ORS 419C.349(3) imposes is not equivalent to a requirement that a youth have criminal capacity. Rather, to authorize waiver of a youth who otherwise is eligible for waiver under ORS 419C.349 or ORS 419C.352, a juvenile court must find that the youth possesses sufficient adult-like intellectual, social and emotional capabilities to have an adult-like understanding of the significance of his or her conduct, including its wrongfulness and its consequences for the youth, the victim, and others. . . . ¶ . . . [T]he legislature intended that a juvenile court take measure of a youth and reach an overall determination as to whether the youth’s capacities are, on the whole, sufficiently adult-like to justify a conclusion that the youth was capable of appreciating, on an intellectual and emotional level, the significance and consequences of his conduct. ¶ In making that determination, a juvenile court will be called on to consider its own knowledge and assessment of the capabilities of typical adults and the capabilities of the particular youth who is subject to waiver and any evidence on that subject that the parties may offer, such as the evidence that the juvenile court in this case considered. With regard to the capabilities of typical adults, a court could, for instance, consider its own understanding and evidence that the parties might offer indicating that adults have an ability to ‘measure and foresee consequences,’ . . . and are significantly better than adolescents at accurately perceiving and weighing risks and benefits. . . . ¶ . . . [T]he court must then determine whether the particular youth’s capabilities are sufficiently similar to those of a typical adult that the court can conclude that the youth has the requisite appreciation of the nature and quality of the conduct involved. That determination will again require the court to consider its own assessment of the particular youth’s capabilities, including evidence, such as the court in this case considered, of the actions in which the youth engaged and the youth’s history. A court may reach a conclusion about a youth’s capabilities from inferences that the court draws from that evidence and from any expert testimony that the parties may offer. Such evidence will necessarily be multi-faceted; there is no one capability that a youth must have to demonstrate that the youth meets the requisite standard. Instead, a court may well have to compile and balance competing evidence relating to a youth’s capabilities”). Compare In the Matter of William M., 124 Nev. 95, 196 P.3d 456, 457, 464-65 (2008) (transfer statute that created a rebuttable presumption of prosecution in adult court in certain categories of cases, which juvenile could rebut by showing that the crime was “substantially influenced by substance abuse or emotional or behavioral problems,” violated the Privilege Against Self-Incrimination by “requiring the juvenile to either accede to the criminal court’s jurisdiction despite having a substance abuse or emotional or behavioral problem, or to admit guilt, even though that admission could later be used against him in juvenile or adult court proceedings”); State v. Dixon, 967 A.2d 1114, 1123-24 (Vt. 2008) (trial judge, who denied juvenile defendant’s motion to transfer murder prosecution to juvenile court, impermissibly relied on a non-Kent factor that open adult court proceedings would “protect ‘the ability of the public to follow the case’”; judge instead should have taken into account the legislatively-recognized state interest in “protect[ing] juveniles from the ‘taint of criminality’ that inevitably results from the publicity and permanence of [adult court] convictions”).

§ 13.12 BURDEN AND STANDARD OF PROOF

In virtually every jurisdiction in which the juvenile court is empowered to order the transfer of the case to criminal court, the prosecution must prove by at least a preponderance of the evidence that a statutory justification for the transfer exists. See, e.g., Md. CTS. & JUD. PROC. CODE ANN. § 3-8A-06(d)(1) (2018). In some jurisdictions the prosecution must meet the heavier burden of clear and convincing evidence. See, e.g., In the Interest of T.R.B., 109 Wis. 2d 179, 191, 325 N.W.2d 329, 334 (1982).

This does not necessarily mean that the prosecution bears the burden of proof on all issues. In some States the burden of proof is initially on the prosecution to prove that there is probable cause to believe that the juvenile committed an offense for which transfer is authorized. Once the prosecution has met this burden, the burden shifts to the juvenile to show that s/he is amenable to treatment. A particular statutory scheme may provide that in certain categories of cases a juvenile is to be prosecuted as an adult unless there are reasons that justify keeping the case in juvenile court. Under provisions of this sort, the burden of proving the requisite reasons is on the juvenile. See, e.g., State v. Coleman, 271 Kan. 733, 734-38, 26 P.3d 613, 615-18 (2001); State v. R.G.D., 108 N.J. 1, 11-12, 527 A.2d 834, 839 (1987); Commonwealth v. Moyer, 497 Pa. 643, 646-47, 444 A.2d 101, 102-03 (1982).

Thus, for example, there may be a statutory presumption of prosecution in adult court for all juveniles above the age of 16 when there is probable cause to believe that the juvenile committed the crime of murder. Here, the transfer hearing would begin with the prosecution bearing the burden of proving three things: that the juvenile is above 16; that there is probable cause to believe that a murder was committed; and that there is probable cause to believe that the juvenile committed the murder. The defense will be free to challenge any or all of these factual propositions before it is obliged to present any evidence bearing upon any other transfer issues. Once the court finds that all three statutory preconditions have been satisfied by the requisite standard of proof, then the burden would shift to the juvenile to show that there are reasons to overcome the presumption of adult court prosecution. This burden is usually satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence.

§ 13.13 STRATEGY FOR THE HEARING

Once counsel has decided to oppose the transfer, see § 13.02 supra, the most important strategic decision to make is what issues to contest at the transfer hearing. As noted in the preceding three sections, there may be many specific issues to litigate at the hearing, depending on the quirks of law in the particular jurisdiction; but, reduced to the two principal ones, the issues are: (1) the seriousness of the crime charged and (2) the juvenile’s amenability to care and treatment.

Contesting both of these issues, though possible and at times desirable, may result in losing both of them. Focusing on only one issue, by contrast, will frequently maximize the client’s chances for a favorable outcome. For example, if the client is charged with a particularly serious offense and if counsel concludes that the prosecutor can establish probable cause to believe the client committed the offense, it may be best to concede the issue and focus exclusively on the client’s amenability to treatment. Thus, if the client’s previous juvenile court record is not particularly egregious or extensive and if the client has no skeletons in his or her social history closet, the chances of winning the transfer hearing may be best if one begins the hearing by stating that the defense does not contest the existence of probable cause but contests only one issue: whether the client is amenable to treatment and therefore eligible to remain within the jurisdiction of the juvenile court. Counsel can suggest that the court proceed immediately to consideration of that issue, with no need to take its time hearing evidence of probable cause.

This approach may be met by a response from the prosecution or the court that the concession of probable cause does not obviate the need to demonstrate with particularity the type of crime involved because, in the particular jurisdiction, transfer requires a showing, for example, that the offense was committed in an aggressive, premeditated, or willful manner, or that it was committed against persons, or the like. In such a jurisdiction counsel can make a concession, which is best offered as a stipulation of facts, to these precise jurisdictional preconditions to transfer. Thus the hearing might begin with counsel stating to the court:

Your Honor, the respondent wishes at this time to enter into the record the following stipulation: If the petitioner presented evidence on the subject, the record would authorize the court to enter a finding [or findings] of fact[s], based on [a preponderance of the evidence, or clear and convincing evidence, as appropriate] that there is probable cause to believe [whatever the jurisdictional preconditions are]. Because respondent concedes these points, the interests of judicial economy would best be served by moving directly to the prosecution’s [or probation’s] evidence on the only remaining issue in dispute: the respondent’s amenability to treatment as a juvenile [or whatever the additional preconditions to transfer are that counsel has chosen to litigate].

This strategy is not available in all jurisdictions because, in some, the seriousness of the offense alone will be a lawful basis for transfer. Unless the highest court of the jurisdiction has expressly upheld this basis, counsel should be prepared to argue that more must be shown than that the client committed a particular offense or committed a particular offense in a particular way. See, e.g., In the Interest of E.M., 198 Ga. App. 729, 731-32, 402 S.E.2d 751, 752-53 (1991) (reversing a ruling of transfer to adult court because, although the State proved that “there are reasonable grounds to believe that the child committed the acts alleged” and other jurisdictional predicates for transfer, the statutory criterion that the transfer be in “[t]he interests of the child” “subsume[s]” a requirement of non-amenability to treatment and “the State did not meet its burden to prove appellant’s non-amenability to juvenile treatment”); In the Matter of the Welfare of Dahl, 278 N.W.2d 316 (Minn. 1979) (unless statute so provides, the age of the juvenile and the seriousness of his or her alleged crime alone are insufficient to justify transfer) (superseded by statute, see In the Matter of the Welfare of S.R.L., 400 N.W.2d 382 (Minn. App. 1987)); A Juvenile v. Commonwealth, 380 Mass. 552, 405 N.E.2d 143 (1980) (transfer held improper when findings dealt only with seriousness of crime and inadequacy of existing facilities); In the Interest of Patterson, 210 Kan. 245, 499 P.2d 1131 (1972) (court must find that youths are incorrigible or uncorrectable); but see In the Matter of the Welfare of Givens, 307 N.W.2d 489 (Minn. 1981). Of course, even in jurisdictions in which age and severity of offense are sufficient preconditions for transfer, counsel is free to present evidence on amenability to treatment. But, in such a case, the strategy of stipulating age and severity of the crime would ordinarily not be the wisest course.

The strategy is best used in situations in which some showing of unamenability is an established element of the prosecution’s case for transfer. Many jurisdictions, for example, indulge a presumption in favor of retaining certain juvenile matters in juvenile court (usually, cases of juveniles under a certain age) and make transfer to adult court a last resort to be used only when the juvenile court determines that the range of dispositions available within the juvenile system is inadequate in the particular case to meet the young person’s needs. See, e.g., Shepard v. State, 273 Ind. 295, 404 N.E.2d 1 (1980) (there is a presumption that it is in the best interest of the child to remain in the juvenile system and the state has the burden of overcoming the presumption). See also In the Interest of D.T., 335 N.W.2d 638 (Iowa App. 1983); M.L.S. v. State, 805 P.2d 665, 671 (Okla. Crim. App. 1991). In these jurisdictions counsel should argue that the commission of a serious or even heinous crime is not enough to justify a transfer. See, e.g., State v. Jump, 160 Ind. App. 1, 309 N.E.2d 148 (1974); State ex rel. Benton County Juvenile Dep’t v. Cardiel, 18 Or. App. 49, 523 P.2d 1057 (1974). Particularly when the juvenile does not have a history of criminal or delinquent behavior, this argument can be made forcefully. See, e.g., W.F. v. State, 144 Ga. App. 523, 241 S.E.2d 631 (1978) (when sole basis offered for juvenile’s nonamenability to treatment was that he was 19 years old, appellate court held there was no evidence to sustain a transfer); State ex rel. T.J.H. v. Bills, 504 S.W.2d 76 (Mo. 1974).

Conversely, in cases in which the client’s previous record is such that counsel concludes that the court will find that the client is an appropriate candidate for transfer based on that factor, counsel may wish to stipulate to this finding in order to obviate the need for the client’s record being exhaustively developed before the judge. (Of course, as with the stipulation regarding probable cause, counsel should consider, in addition to the question whether the trial court would make a particular finding, whether that finding would probably be affirmed on appeal.) Unlike the stipulation as to probable cause, this stipulation needs not be made at the beginning of the hearing. Since it is likely that the first part of the case presented by the prosecution (or probation department) will be concerned with the crime itself, it would not be necessary to stipulate to non-crime-related facts until such facts are sought to be adduced in the hearing.

Limiting the focus of the hearing by stipulating certain issues out of controversy serves two valuable purposes. First, it eliminates potentially harmful and prejudicial evidence from lengthy exposure to the hearing judge. Second, it sharply focuses the hearing, and the judge’s and the appellate court’s attention, on the issue that counsel believes is most vulnerable to attack by the defense or most favorable to the defense.

§ 13.14 PUTTING ON A DEFENSE CASE

Defense counsel should consider presenting affirmative evidence about the charges against the client. In many jurisdictions juveniles may testify at transfer hearings about the circumstances underlying the pending charges without fear that such testimony can be used to establish their guilt in the prosecution’s case-in-chief at trial on the merits, whether the trial is ultimately held in adult or juvenile court. See, e.g., Iowa Code Ann. § 232.45(11)(b) (2018) (statement made by juvenile at waiver hearing not admissible as evidence in chief against juvenile in subsequent criminal proceedings). For this reason it may be possible for a juvenile who will not testify at trial to put on a defense at the transfer hearing, seeking to demonstrate by his or her testimony that no probable cause exists to believe s/he committed any offense, or the type of offense necessary for transfer. Such testimony may also be presented to mitigate the harshness of the offense or to alert the court to extenuating circumstances that may warrant leniency even though there is probable cause to believe the client committed a serious offense.

On the other hand, if the juvenile does later testify at trial on the merits, it is highly likely that any inconsistent testimony that s/he gave at the transfer hearing will be admissible for impeachment; cross-examination of the juvenile at the hearing may give the prosecutor some useful batting practice for cross-examination at trial; and the disclosure of the defense version of the facts may alert the prosecutor to the need – and possibly to leads – for further prosecutorial investigation aimed at disproving that version. With these points in mind, it would seldom be wise to present the juvenile’s testimony at the transfer hearing if s/he is a probable defense witness at trial unless either (1) counsel is confident, at this early stage of the case, that the client’s testimony is relatively stable, equally favorable to the defense on transfer issues and on issues of guilt or innocence, and probably not disprovable by the additional prosecutorial investigation that it may stimulate, or (2) winning the transfer hearing is more important than winning the trial (which it may well be if the evidence of guilt is compelling and the crime is a serious felony).

In addition to a defense focused on the charges themselves, counsel may wish to present evidence at the transfer hearing tending to prove that the client needs treatment, would benefit from the treatment programs available in juvenile court, or has resources in the family or community that would render especially appropriate a community-based treatment plan as a final order of disposition in juvenile court. These kinds of evidence may be presented even in jurisdictions in which transfer can be based solely on a showing of probable cause to believe that the juvenile committed a particular offense, as long as, under local law, amenability to treatment remains a relevant issue following proof of an offense that is a sufficient precondition to transfer. See § 13.12 supra. This defense is a bit risky, however. Often counsel will be going very far toward proving that the client needs placement. In jurisdictions in which the transfer judge is the only juvenile court judge and, accordingly, will sit as trier of fact in any subsequent juvenile court proceedings, there is an inordinate risk that the judge may adjudicate the client a delinquent in order to assure that s/he receives the treatment s/he so obviously needs. In any event, such a defense should not be pursued without the client’s permission.

Counsel may wish to consider retaining an expert, such as a psychiatrist or psychologist to testify at the transfer hearing on the client’s behalf. The expert may be a person who has previously evaluated the client or has previously treated or is currently treating the client. Alternatively, counsel may retain the expert just for the purpose of making an evaluation at the transfer hearing. See §§ 12.08-12.10 supra. Here again, however, it is necessary to consider whether the expert might be more useful to the defense at later stages of the case (including suppression motions, trial, and sentencing); whether disclosure of the expert and his or her materials and theories to the prosecutor at the transfer hearing will enable the prosecutor to damage the expert significantly in later appearances; and, if this is a serious possibility, which stages of the case it is most important and possible for the defense to win. In addition to – or instead of – an expert, counsel should consider calling character witnesses, including teachers, community workers, or anyone else whom counsel concludes will make a favorable impression on the transfer judge, an appellate court, or both.

Counsel should also consider using social workers or doctors who are familiar with the treatment programs available to the juvenile court as experts to relate those programs to the specific needs of the client, in order to strengthen the record on the points that the client is amenable to rehabilitation or is otherwise an appropriate candidate for handling by the juvenile court.

An expert who has interviewed a juvenile without counsel’s knowledge and assent may not testify against the juvenile over his or her objection unless the expert gave the juvenile Miranda warnings before the interview. See Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981). See generally
Since the purpose of the transfer hearing, like the purpose of the penalty trial in Smith, is to determine the juvenile’s susceptibility to harsher sentencing, the rule of Smith (see § 12.15(a) supra, § 38.07 infra) should be fully applicable in this setting. See, e.g., R.H. v. State, 777 P.2d 204, 211-12 (Alaska App. 1989) (trial court violated Estelle v. Smith by “compelling R.H. to submit to a psychiatric evaluation for the purpose of determining his amenability to treatment as a child” but “the same conclusion would not be warranted had R.H. sought to present psychiatric evidence in his own behalf at the waiver hearing or had he otherwise affirmatively placed his mental condition in issue”); People in the Interest of A.D.G., 895 P.2d 1067, 1073 (Colo. App. 1995) (relying on Estelle v. Smith and other Fifth Amendment caselaw to hold that “if a juvenile refuses to participate in a psychological evaluation ordered by the court as part of its investigation in a transfer hearing, such refusal cannot be used against him to prove that he is not amenable to treatment as a juvenile”); Commonwealth v. Wayne W., 414 Mass. 218, 228-32, 606 N.E.2d 1323, 1330-32 (1993) (protections of Estelle v. Smith apply fully to juvenile transfer hearings and “foreclose a compelled psychiatric examination, where the juvenile does not seek to introduce his own psychiatric evidence,” but “a juvenile defendant, who voluntarily chooses at a Part B hearing [on amenability to rehabilitation, held after a finding of probable cause] to present expert psychiatric evidence which includes the juvenile’s own statements, is not denied his constitutional privileges against self-incrimination if he is ordered to submit to an examination by a psychiatrist retained by the Commonwealth”); Christopher P. v. State, 112 N.M. 416, 420, 816 P.2d 1323, 1330-32 (1993) (the “fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination extends to transfer proceedings” and was “violated in the proceedings below by the court’s order compelling [the juvenile] to discuss the alleged offenses with the psychologist without the advice of counsel”). But see People v. Hana, 443 Mich. 202, 225-26, 504 N.W.2d 166, 177 (1993) (distinguishing between the two phases of the statutorily-bifurcated waiver hearing and holding that the “full panoply of constitutional rights” applies only to “the phase I adjudicative phase of the waiver hearing” and not “the phase II dispositional hearing” and therefore that the doctrine of Estelle v. Smith did not bar use of the accused’s statements to a court psychologist). If defense counsel has the client examined by a psychiatrist or psychologist in preparation for the transfer hearing and the prosecution seeks to obtain discovery of the expert’s evaluation before the hearing, counsel should object and argue that the report is covered by both the attorney-client privilege (see § 12.09 supra) and the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination and is not discoverable consistently with the Fifth Amendment or the Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel until the client chooses to rely upon the report or the expert in court. See § 12.15(a) supra; In the Matter of Norman K., 62 A.D.2d 1038, 404 N.Y.S.2d 39 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1978).

§ 13.15 SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS BEARING ON AMENABILITY TO TREATMENT
Counsel should be aware that in certain jurisdictions it may be possible to argue that the juvenile’s amenability to treatment in a particular program that is either private or located out-of-state generates an obligation on the part of the State to contract for those services before it undertakes to transfer the child to the adult system. (See § 39.07 for an explanation of the right-to-treatment doctrine.) It may even be possible to argue that the State has an obligation to make available programs that will meet the needs of the juvenile in circumstances in which those programs do not currently exist but where it is shown that the juvenile would benefit from a placement with the particular program. See, e.g., In re Welfare of J.E.C., 302 Minn. 387, 225 N.W.2d 245 (1975); In re Welfare of I.Q.S., 309 Minn. 78, 91, 244 N.W.2d 30, 40 (1976) (the “absence of adequate security programs will not support a finding that the juvenile is not amenable to treatment”). See also People v. Dunbar, 423 Mich. 380, 396-97, 377 N.W.2d 262, 269 (1985) (overturning a waiver finding that was based on the availability of better vocational training programs in the adult correctional system). But see State v. Toomey, 38 Wash. App. 831, 690 P.2d 1175 (1984), review denied, 103 Wash. 2d 1012 (1985) (transfer of pregnant juvenile who, because of her pregnancy, could not be treated in existing facilities for delinquents upheld as valid).

§ 13.16 EVIDENTIARY RULES AT THE TRANSFER HEARING

Transfer hearings generally are viewed as dispositional in nature and, accordingly, the rules of evidence used at dispositional hearings are invoked. For the most part this means that hearsay is admissible at the hearing. But not all jurisdictions follow that rule, and counsel should become familiar with the evidentiary rules for dispositional hearings. Even in jurisdictions that allow hearsay, hearsay may not be admissible on all issues. The most common rule is that hearsay is admissible to prove nonamenability to treatment; in many jurisdictions, hearsay may not be used to provide the requisite probable cause to believe the juvenile committed a crime for which transfer is authorized. See, e.g., In the Interest of P.W.N., 301 N.W.2d 636, 640 (N.D. 1981); In the Interest of S.M.P., 168 W. Va. 626, 629-30, 285 S.E.2d 408, 410 (1981) (per curiam).

Many jurisdictions also provide that evidence against the juvenile, including statements of the juvenile or property seized from him or her, that would be suppressible at trial because it was obtained in violation of the state or federal constitution is admissible at a transfer hearing. See, e.g., In the Interest of J.G., 119 Wis. 2d 748, 350 N.W.2d 668 (1984). This position has never been endorsed by the Supreme Court of the United States as a matter of federal constitutional law, and counsel should not hesitate to challenge it in an appropriate case, under both the federal and state constitutions.

§ 13.17 DOUBLE JEOPARDY

In Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519 (1975), the Supreme Court extended the protection of the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment to juveniles. Jones had been the subject of a juvenile Petition alleging the commission of an armed robbery, and, after a trial in juvenile court, was adjudicated a delinquent. In a subsequent proceeding, the court declared that Jones was not amenable to treatment and ordered that he be prosecuted as an adult. Over his double jeopardy objections, he was found guilty of robbery in the first degree by the adult criminal court and committed to the California Youth Authority.

The Supreme Court of the United States invalidated this conviction. It found that Jones had been placed in jeopardy “when the Juvenile Court, as the trier of the facts, began to hear evidence.” 421 U.S. at 531. He could therefore not be prosecuted again for the same offense in adult court. The Supreme Court rejected the contention that there had been only one continuous jeopardy commencing with the juvenile court proceedings and not ending until the completion of the trial in criminal court.

Several important concepts concerning transfer stem from Breed:

1. In order to avoid placing a transferred juvenile in jeopardy for the second time in a criminal trial, a transfer hearing must be held prior to the commencement of any adjudicatory hearing in juvenile court, See Sims v. Engle, 619 F.2d 598, 601-05 (6th Cir. 1980) (once adjudicatory hearing began, juvenile could not be transferred to adult court since jeopardy had already attached in juvenile court); People in the Interest of A.D.G., 895 P.2d 1067, 1072 (Colo. App. 1994) (although the State is correct in asserting that the trial court’s ruling denying transfer was based on an erroneous legal standard, “the juvenile has been adjudicated a delinquent” already and “[a]s a result, we cannot remand for reconsideration of the decision not to transfer” since the juvenile “may not be once again placed in jeopardy” (citing Breed v. Jones, supra)).

2. A finding at a transfer hearing that probable cause exists to believe the juvenile committed the act or acts alleged does not convert the proceeding into an adjudicatory hearing. Because the “Double Jeopardy Clause . . . is written in terms of potential or risk of trial and conviction, not punishment,” 421 U.S. at 532, jeopardy does not attach at a proceeding in which guilt or innocence is not at issue.

3. Since transfer hearings must precede juvenile court trials and can consider evidence of probable cause, it may be necessary to “require that, if transfer is rejected, a different judge preside” at the trial. 421 U.S. at 536-37.

§ 13.18 STATEMENT OF REASONS

One of the essential elements of due process is that a decisionmaker must set forth the reasons for its decisions. See, e.g., Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 489 (1972); Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 564-65 (1974). In Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541 (1966), the Supreme Court held that “as a condition to a valid waiver order, [the juvenile is] . . . entitled to . . .
. a statement of reasons for the Juvenile Court’s decision.” Id. at 557. Since transfer is a “critically important” proceeding that requires careful consideration by the juvenile court and since a reviewing court “should not be remitted to assumptions[, the juvenile court must set forth] . . . a statement of the reasons motivating the waiver including, of course, a statement of the relevant facts.” Id. at 561.

Counsel should argue that it is insufficient for the judge merely to recite the language of the transfer statute in support of a transfer decision. Such a recitation is nothing but a conclusion that transfer is appropriate. Due process requires that the facts and reasons supporting this conclusion be set forth in the record. See, e.g., Strosnider v. State, 422 N.E.2d 1325 (Ind. App. 1981); Summers v. State, 248 Ind. 551, 230 N.E.2d 320 (1967). Without a clear statement of the reasons for a transfer, appellate courts cannot adequately review the transfer order. See White v. Sowders, 644 F.2d 1177 (6th Cir. 1980); Franklin v. State, 855 A.2d 274, 278 (Del. 2004). And if the transfer statute calls for certain findings, enumeration of these findings is a prerequisite to a valid transfer. See, e.g., Franklin v. State, 855 A.2d at 278; State v. Pinney, 235 Neb. 486, 493-94, 455 N.W.2d 795, 800 (1990).

The final transfer order should also show affirmatively that a hearing was held and that the juvenile was represented by counsel, or that there was an effective waiver of the right to counsel. See, e.g., Bingham v. Commonwealth, 550 S.W.2d 535 (Ky. 1977).

§ 13.19 APPEALABILITY; TIMELINESS OF AN APPEAL

There is no uniform rule about whether an appeal may or must be taken immediately after a decision to transfer, or whether claims of error in the transfer proceeding may or must be raised only after trial, in an appeal from conviction. Some States, following the well-known rule that jurisdictional errors are not waivable, allow a juvenile to challenge an erroneous transfer decision on appeal from the ensuing adult criminal court conviction. See, e.g., State v. Grenz, 243 N.W.2d 375, 381 (N.D. 1976); Alaniz v. State, 2 S.W.3d 451, 451-53 (Tex. App. 1999); State v. Kells, 134 Wash. 2d 309, 313, 949 P.2d 818, 820 (1998). Other States require that a timely appeal be taken directly from the juvenile court order and hold that a failure to take such an appeal forfeits the right to review of that order, see, e.g., State v. Harwood, 98 Idaho 793, 795, 572 P.2d 1228, 1230 (1977). In jurisdictions other than the latter States (which necessarily deem a transfer ruling to be an appealable “final order,” see id. at 795, 572 P.2d at 1230), the States vary as to whether a transfer order is deemed an appealable “final order” or an interlocutory order, and, if the latter, whether it is appealable. Compare, e.g., In the Interest of Clay, 246 N.W.2d 263, 264 (Iowa 1976) (transfer order is “not a final judgment from which appeal could be had as a matter of right”), with In re Welfare of I.Q.S., 309 Minn. 78, 82, 244 N.W.2d 30, 35 (1976) (“referral decision is a final order and therefore appealable by either the state or the subject juvenile”), and with People v. Martin, 67 Ill. 2d 462, 465-66, 367 N.E.2d 1329, 1331, 10 Ill. Dec. 563, 565 (1977) (order of removal cannot be appealed interlocutorily by juvenile and is “reviewable on appeal by the juvenile from the criminal conviction if a conviction occurs,” but an “order denying the removal motion” can be appealed immediately by the State and is “not reviewable by the People at the conclusion of the juvenile proceedings”), and with In re J.L.W., 136 N.C. App. 596, 599, 602, 525 S.E.2d 500, 502, 504 (2000) (transfer order is a “final order” and appealable under State v. T.D.R., 347 N.C. 489, 496, 495 S.E.2d 700, 703 (1998), but a finding of “probable cause, on the State’s motion to transfer jurisdiction” is not appealable immediately), and with United States v. A.W.J., 804 F.2d 492, 492-93 (8th Cir. 1986) (“orders transferring juveniles for adult prosecution,” although “reviewable after trial,” are also immediately appealable by accused “under the collateral order exception of Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541 (1949)”).

Often the law in a jurisdiction is unsettled in one or more of these areas simply because no one has bothered making an adequate record and appealing to a higher court. Juvenile court lawyers may succeed at the appellate level on issues that meet with no success at the trial level. In all events, the decision whether or not to appeal must be the client’s. See Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 187 (2004); Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751 (1983). Counsel is not free to forgo an appeal of a transfer order that the client wishes to appeal, see Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 477 (2000); and counsel’s failure to consult with the client about the decision whether to appeal constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel whenever there are nonfrivolous grounds for appeal or the client has indicated any interest in taking an appeal, id. at 478-81; see also, e.g., Ex Parte Cruse, 474 So. 2d 109, 111-12 (Ala. 1985).
Chapter 14

Guilty Pleas

Part A. Introduction

§ 14.01 GUILTY PLEAS IN JUVENILE COURT

In all jurisdictions a juvenile respondent can enter a guilty plea in a delinquency case, just as an adult defendant can in a criminal case. Many of the standards and procedures for entry of a guilty plea in juvenile court are identical to those followed in adult criminal court. But there are some significant differences, which will be highlighted in this introductory section and then discussed in greater detail in the sections that follow.

The major difference between guilty pleas in adult court and guilty pleas in juvenile court is that one primary form of adult court plea bargaining – pleading to a lesser offense in order to reduce the maximum possible sentence to which the adult defendant is exposed – is inapplicable in the juvenile courts of most jurisdictions. The most common juvenile court statutory scheme empowers a judge at sentencing (or “disposition”) to impose the same indeterminate sentence regardless of the nature or severity of the offense for which the respondent has been convicted (or to which the respondent has pled guilty). See § 38.03(c) infra. With what is perhaps the greatest single incentive for guilty pleas in adult court withdrawn, defense attorneys in juvenile court must consider and evaluate other potential advantages of guilty pleas. These include, for example, prosecutorial commitments to support a particular sentence. See § 14.06 infra.

Another significant difference between guilty pleas in adult and juvenile courts stems from the involvement of the parent in juvenile court pleas. It is clear in juvenile court, as it is in adult court, that the ultimate decision whether to plead guilty must be left to the client and that a defense attorney cannot plead a client guilty, or not guilty, against the client’s will. Cooke v. State, 977 A.2d 803 (Del. 2009). See McCoy v. Louisiana, 138 S. Ct. 1500 (2018); Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751, 753 n.6 (1983) (dictum); Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 187 (2004); Burt v. Titlow, 134 S. Ct. 10, 17 (2013). Under this same logic the juvenile client’s right to decide whether to plead guilty cannot be abrogated in favor of the client’s parent. Cf. Smith v. State, 484 So. 2d 560, 561 (Ala. Crim. App. 1986) (in Miranda context, court explains that just as attorney cannot waive client’s rights against self-incrimination, parent cannot waive rights of his or her child); In re S.W.T., 277 N.W.2d 507, 512-13 (Minn. 1979) (parent cannot waive Miranda rights of child); In the Matter of Butts, 157 N.C. App. 609, 614, 582 S.E.2d 279, 283 (2003) (a statute establishing procedures for police interrogation of juveniles “protects the rights of the juvenile, which his parent cannot waive on his behalf”). Indeed, the parent’s interests or goals may often be antagonistic to those of the child (see § 4.04 supra), and thus the parent would be a highly suspect guardian of the child’s right to choose between pleading guilty and contesting the case at trial. In some jurisdictions, however, a judge who accepts a plea from a juvenile must ensure that the child’s parent is aware of the plea and acquiesces in the child’s decision to forgo the constitutional right to trial. See §§ 14.24, 14.26(a) infra.

§ 14.02 ORGANIZATION OF THE CHAPTER; TERMINOLOGY

This chapter will begin by examining the factors affecting the choice to plead guilty (§§ 14.03-14.12 infra) and will then discuss plea negotiations with the prosecutor (§§ 14.13-14.18 infra), counseling the client (and parent) on the decision whether to plead guilty (§§ 14.19-14.24 infra), procedures at the plea hearing (§§ 14.25-14.28), and procedures for subsequently withdrawing or challenging the validity of a guilty plea (§§ 14.29-14.31). Under a strictly chronological organization the topic of plea negotiations, of course, would precede a discussion of the criteria for assessing the plea offer that has been extracted through the negotiations. But since a cost-benefit analysis of the value of a plea must inform each step of counsel’s work in this area, including preparation for the plea negotiation session, the cost-benefit analysis will be taken up first.

In many jurisdictions the term “admission” is employed in juvenile court as a euphemism for the term “guilty plea.” This terminology reflects the notion that a juvenile cannot be found “guilty” of a “crime,” and therefore can merely “admit” to the status of being a “juvenile delinquent.” The term “guilty plea” nevertheless will be used in this chapter and throughout this book, since it provides the most accurate description of the actual process and consequences involved in a juvenile’s entry of an “admission.” The term “guilty plea” also avoids the confusion engendered by the use of the term “admission” for both confessions to the police and guilty pleas.

In several jurisdictions the term “disposition” is often used in both juvenile court and adult court as a substitute for the term “guilty plea.” In order to avoid confusion with the “disposition” (sentencing) phase of a juvenile case, the term “disposition” will not be used in connection with guilty pleas and will be used solely to refer to a juvenile sentence.

Part B. The Decision Whether To Plead Guilty or Go to Trial: Factors To Consider in Developing and Evaluating a Potential Plea Bargain

§ 14.03 OVERVIEW OF THE COST-BENEFIT ANALYSIS INVOLVED IN DECIDING WHETHER TO PLEAD GUILTY OR GO TO TRIAL

The determination of the advisability of a guilty plea usually requires a complex cost-benefit analysis that takes into account: (i) the likelihood of winning the case at trial; (ii) the chances that the judge, in the event of conviction, would penalize the respondent at sentencing for going to trial and – in the judge’s opinion – wasting the court’s time and (if the respondent testifies) perjuring himself or herself on the witness stand; and (iii) a number of specific advantages that, in any particular case, could be gained through a guilty plea. For example, even a very likely victory at trial might be bartered away for the invaluable sentencing advantage, available in many jurisdictions, of probation without verdict (with the eventual outcome of dismissal of the case and expungement of arrest records). On the other hand, a juvenile respondent could reasonably opt for trial even in the face of overwhelming prosecution evidence when a guilty plea is unlikely to produce any sentencing advantages or other benefits.

§ 14.04 ASSESSING THE LIKELIHOOD OF WINNING AT TRIAL

The threshold determination of the chances of acquittal at trial will require far more than a simple weighing of the relative strengths of the prosecution’s and defense’s theories of the case and supporting evidence. Counsel’s calculus will have to incorporate a host of variables that are difficult to predict, such as the probable resolution of debatable issues of admissibility of specific evidentiary items, the odds of a prosecution or defense witness being unavailable at the time of trial, and the effect of the judge’s application of a variety of presumptions and other legal doctrines.

§ 14.04(a) The Strength of the Case for the Prosecution

The first step is to analyze the strength of the prosecution’s case from a dual perspective:

(a) How likely is the prosecution to establish a prima facie case (that is, to survive a defense motion to dismiss at the conclusion of the prosecutor’s case-in-chief (see § 32.01 infra))?

and

(b) How likely is the prosecution to persuade the trier of fact to return a guilty verdict at the conclusion of the trial?

These two questions need independent consideration because the first is usually easier to answer than the second (judges being more predictable in their assessment of the sufficiency of evidence than in their assessment of its weight, and juries being less predictable than judges) and because, if the prosecution is unlikely to establish a prima facie case, all potential problems and uncertainties relating to defense evidence fall out of the calculus.

Counsel should begin by examining the Petition and listing all of the elements that the prosecution will need to prove in order to sustain each of the counts. Then, on the basis of the information that counsel has learned through discovery and investigation, counsel should analyze the prosecutor’s ability to prove each of these factual elements with the witnesses, documents, and exhibits believed to be available to the prosecutor.

If counsel has learned through investigation that a prosecution witness will be out of town or otherwise unavailable on the trial date, counsel will need to predict whether the prosecutor will be able to obtain a continuance in order to secure the witness’s presence, or whether the judge is likely to grant a defense motion to dismiss the case for want of prosecution. See § 15.03 infra. If counsel has learned through investigation that a prosecution witness is reluctant to come to court, counsel will need to predict whether the prosecutor will be able to compel the witness’s attendance by successfully serving and enforcing a subpoena. Similarly, if counsel can predict that certain documents the prosecution needs will go missing – for example, in some jurisdictions, tape recordings of 911 calls, which the prosecution must turn over to the defense, are routinely erased before the time when the prosecutor gets around to requesting them from the police – counsel will have to evaluate whether the loss or destruction of those documents will cause the judge to grant a defense motion for sanctions such as dismissal of the case or preclusion of the testimony of prosecution witnesses about matters that would have been reflected in the lost document. See § 27.12(a) infra.

In analyzing the strength of the prosecution’s case, counsel will need to consider both doctrinal rules relating to presumptions and permissive inferences, and the realistic likelihood that a trier of fact will find them persuasive. For example, on a charge of criminal possession of stolen property, the prosecutor may be able to survive a motion for a directed verdict by relying on the formal doctrine that a person who is in possession of recently stolen goods is presumed to know that the goods were stolen; but triers of fact are often unwilling to convict if nothing more than that is proven. See § 35.06(d) infra.

Analysis of the strength of the prosecution’s case must also take account of factors that could discredit its witnesses or evidence. For example, when a prosecution witness has made statements to the police (recorded in police reports) or in pretrial hearings (the preliminary examination or a suppression hearing) or to the defense investigator (either an oral statement or, preferably, a written, signed statement), counsel will be able to use these statements to impeach the witness’s inconsistent testimony at trial. See § 31.10 infra. If a prosecution witness has prior convictions, counsel may be able to impeach the witness’s credibility with those. See § 31.11 infra. Or counsel may be able to undercut a prosecution based on forensic-science evidence by criticizing the methodology or competence of the prosecution’s experts or debunking their purported field of specialization as fundamentally unreliable. See § 31.09 infra.

In addition to measuring the prosecution’s probable case against the applicable burdens of proof – the prima-facie-evidence standard for surviving a motion to dismiss (see § 32.01 infra) and the beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard for conviction (see §§ 35.03, 36.04 infra) – counsel needs to consider other evidentiary doctrines that can undercut that case. These include the missing-witness doctrine (see § 10.08 infra) and the rules relating to accomplice testimony (see §§ 35.04, 36.04 infra), and uncorroborated confessions (see §§ 35.04, 36.06 infra).

Counsel will not be in a position to conduct this kind of thorough evaluation of the prosecution’s case until s/he has completed all or most of the defense investigation (see Chapter 8 supra) and the formal discovery process (see Chapter 9 supra). Counsel’s analysis of the prosecution’s theory of the case and of the persuasiveness of the evidence available to the prosecutor will be heavily dependent on counsel’s study of police reports and witness statements.
These documents usually set the upper boundary of what the prosecutor will be able to prove convincingly at trial, because they can be used to impeach prosecution testimony that goes beyond them. They may also contain inconsistent statements that could turn the tide in favor of the defense at trial. Also, information about prior convictions of prosecution witnesses has to be obtained through defense investigation and discovery before counsel can make a sufficiently confident assessment of the prosecution’s trial evidence to support the serious consideration of a guilty plea.

§ 14.04(b) The Strength of the Case for the Defense

In much the same way that counsel evaluates the prosecution’s case, counsel will need to assess the strengths and weaknesses of the respondent’s. After identifying all viable defense theories of the case (see Chapter 6), counsel should itemize the facts that must be proven to sustain each theory, the witnesses and exhibits available to prove each of these facts, their persuasiveness, and their vulnerabilities.

In analyzing the prosecution’s charges, counsel will have already drawn up a list of the elements that the prosecution has to prove in order to make out a prima facie case. If counsel can successfully attack the prosecutor’s proof on one or more of these elements, a motion for a directed verdict of acquittal at the close of the prosecution’s evidence will be a central feature of the defense. Assuming contingently that the judge denies the defense motion, counsel will need to consider whether any of the loopholes in the prosecution’s case can be widened to the point of acquittal through the presentation of defense witnesses. For example, a tenuous prosecution case on mens rea might be successfully undermined by the respondent’s testimony that s/he did not possess the requisite mental state. Conversely, counsel’s assessment of the odds of acquittal will need to weigh the danger that the presentation of defense evidence could strengthen an otherwise weak prosecution case. If the prosecution’s case was doubtful in regard to both the identity and criminal mens of the perpetrator, the respondent’s testimony disputing only the mens will foreclose a mistaken-identity defense in the endgame. See § 33.01 infra.

In addition to potential attacks on the prosecution’s proof of the elements of the offenses it has charged (and their lesser included offenses, see § 36.05 infra), counsel will need to consider the availability of defenses such as alibi and self-defense. (For discussion of the differing burdens of proof that apply to defense theories, depending upon whether they are labeled “affirmative defenses,” see § 35.05 infra.) In some cases, counsel will also need to consider mental defenses such as incompetency, insanity, and infancy. See §§ 12.19, 12.23 supra and § 17.04(b) infra. Assessing each possible theory of defense requires an analysis that is essentially a mirror-image of the one used to evaluate the prosecution’s case: Counsel must itemize the elements of the defense, enumerate the facts necessary to establish each of these elements, identify the witnesses and exhibits necessary to prove each of the facts, and then assess their persuasiveness.

Here, too, counsel will have to take account of practical contingencies, such as the likelihood that defense witnesses will fail to show up for court. If counsel anticipates that a defense witness may be out of town on the trial date or may be reluctant to testify, counsel will need to gauge the likelihood that the problem can be alleviated by securing a continuance or judicial enforcement of a subpoena.

Counsel also must consider whether any defense witnesses can be impeached with prior inconsistent statements or a prior record or other discrediting material. In this regard, counsel will need to be particularly concerned about the question of how the defense case will look if the respondent has priors and does – or, alternatively, does not – testify. If s/he takes the stand, state law usually allows the prosecutor to impeach him or her with prior convictions, prior bad acts, or both. See § 30.07(b) infra. If s/he does not take the stand, the trier of fact is supposed to obey the legal rule that no adverse inferences can be drawn from the respondent’s failure to testify. The reality, however, is that fact-finders – not only juries but even judges in a bench trial – may well believe that the respondent’s refusal to testify indicates guilt or at least the existence of detrimental information that the respondent is trying to conceal. In a bench trial, counsel must also consider the possibility that the judge may already know about, or will learn about, the respondent’s prior record even if s/he does not take the stand, as a result of: (1) the judge’s having presided over a prior hearing in the case or a prior case of the respondent’s; (2) sloppy administrative procedures that counsel will not be able to correct (such as court jackets that indicate the docket numbers of the respondent’s other cases); or (3) courthouse leaks (such as a bailiff mentioning the repeated court appearances of the respondent).

§ 14.04(c) Circumstances That Will May Prejudice the Trier of Fact Against the Respondent

In comparing the strengths of the competing cases for the prosecution and for the defense, counsel will need to factor in numerous variables that may undermine the objectivity of the trier of fact.

The most significant of these factors is the risk that jurors or the judge conducting a bench trial may feel distaste for, or outrage over, a particularly violent or repugnant crime. Hard drug offenses, violent sex crimes, and crimes involving gruesome injuries to the victim are likely to be viewed by fact-finders as peculiarly abhorrent. While many fact-finders have the capacity to appraise a respondent’s case objectively even in the face of graphic, grisly evidence, there are others whose objectivity and ability to apply a reasonable-doubt standard will be overwhelmed by sheer disgust or by the fear of setting free a probable perpetrator of atrocities s/he may repeat.

The fact-finder’s objectivity will frequently also be compromised in cases involving a particularly vulnerable victim, such as a young child or a senior citizen. The courtroom demeanor, behavior, and physical characteristics of the victim, the respondent, and potential prosecution and defense witnesses may well sway the fact-finder’s judgment. And counsel’s calculus must include the additional biases that may arise in cases involving interracial crimes.

The problem of the prejudice that is likely to attach to a respondent with a prior record was mentioned in the preceding subsection. It is sufficiently important to require further discussion here. Local evidence rules may limit the impeachment of a testifying respondent to admission of a documentary record setting out the name[s] of the previous crime[s] of which s/he has been convicted, or they may authorize more or less detailed factual information about the prior[s]. Counsel must consider the probable impact of the name[s] or admissible facts of the crime[s] not only upon the trier’s assessment of the respondent’s credibility but upon the trier’s impression of the respondent as a criminal type deserving less than the benefit of the doubt.
(Sometimes the name of the crime is worse than the facts. When unscrupulous medical clinics staged automobile accidents to set up exaggerated insurance claims, the individuals to whom they paid a few dollars for crowding into the back seats of rear-ended vehicles were subsequently convicted of the crime of federal “health care fraud.”)

In a bench trial, counsel also must consider whether the judge has prior knowledge of inadmissible evidence as a result of having presided over a pretrial suppression hearing or other pretrial proceeding. If, for example, a judge has suppressed a confession or tangible evidence in a pretrial hearing but then refuses to recuse himself or herself (see §§ 20.04-20.07 infra), s/he may be unable to put the illegal but incriminating evidence wholly out of mind.

The potential prejudicial impact of media reports of a crime is an additional factor for consideration. Newspaper, television and social-media accounts may have informed the fact-finder of damaging information that would be inadmissible in evidence at the trial on a not-guilty plea. Counsel cannot rely on theoretical rights to exclude biased jurors (see §§ 20.03(b), 21.03(a), 28.03(a) infra) and to recuse biased judges as fully effective protection against these dangers. In a bench trial, counsel also must bear in mind that many judges are highly sensitive to criticism in the media and are more likely to convict when an acquittal could expose them to adverse publicity.

Another danger that present legal rules signally fail to avert is that complainants and their supporters may pack the courtroom with manifestly grieving or outraged countenances. See, e.g., Carey v. Musladin, 549 U.S. 70 (2006). Pervasive enactment of “victim’s rights” legislation (see, e.g., Douglas E. Beloof & Paul G. Cassell, The Crime Victim’s Right to Attend the Trial: The Reascendant National Consensus, 9 LEWIS & CLARK L. REV. 481 (2005)) has intensified this problem.

To inform an assessment of the probable effects of these factors, counsel should gather as much information as is practicable about the views and biases of local judges and juries. If the respondent’s case is not eligible for jury trial or if counsel is considering advising the respondent to elect a bench trial (see § 21.02(b) infra), counsel should try to get a sense of individual judges’ proclivities and attitudes by talking with attorneys who have previously appeared before those judges. (How early in the pretrial process the identity of the trial judge will be ascertainable depends on local court structures and practices. In some circumstances, counsel may be able to steer the trial to a favorable judge or away from an unfavorable one. See § 20.07 infra; see also § 14.09 infra.) When jury trial is an option, counsel should not only search media sources for whatever coverage they may have given to counsel’s individual case but for what they may reveal about local attitudes toward similar crimes and respondents; and counsel should talk with experienced defense attorneys about what to expect from the relevant jury pool.

§ 14.04(d) Superior (or Inferior) Ability, Experience, or Personableness on the Part of the Prosecutor Who Will Try the Case

Counsel’s assessment of the fact-finder’s likely reactions to the evidence at trial also has to take into account the relative abilities, experience, and personableness of the prosecutor and counsel himself or herself. Factors such as these may have a considerable effect on whether counsel will be able to exclude prejudicial prosecution evidence or persuade the judge to admit favorable defense evidence; how the jurors will react to the lawyers’ opening statements and closing arguments; and how the jurors perceive and evaluate each side’s witnesses and the case as a whole.

§ 14.04(e) The Presence or Absence of Debatable or Dubious Legal Points Relating to Substantive or Evidentiary Matters on Which the Judge Might Commit Reversible Error in a Pretrial Ruling or in the Course of a Trial

The prospect of appellate reversal for trial-court errors plays a much smaller role in juvenile court practice than it does in adult criminal practice. Since the typical term of incarceration for a juvenile in most jurisdictions is no longer than 18 months, a juvenile who is sentenced to incarceration usually will have completed the period of imprisonment prior to issuance of an appellate opinion reversing the conviction. However, a trial judge’s fear of error and appellate reversal may nevertheless work to the benefit of a juvenile respondent at trial. In the vast majority of jurisdictions the judge sits as both finder of fact and arbiter of legal issues. When a juvenile court judge is forced to rule on a novel question of law and resolves that question against the respondent, the judge’s fear of appellate reversal may subtly affect the judge’s determination on the ultimate issue of guilt or innocence.

§ 14.04(f) The Possibility of a Divided Jury

In jurisdictions that afford jury trials in juvenile delinquency cases, counsel will need to consider whether the nature of the evidence or the law or the character of the parties to the alleged offense is sufficiently controversial to set a jury at loggerheads, with the result that the jury may deadlock or bring in a compromise verdict of guilty on a lesser included charge. A hung jury is ordinarily a defense victory: Even if the prosecutor is disposed to invest resources in a retrial, the defense bargaining position becomes considerably stronger after a first jury has failed to find the prosecution’s case persuasive.

§ 14.05 ASSESSING THE LIKELIHOOD THAT THE JUDGE WILL PENALIZE THE RESPONDENT AT SENTENCING BECAUSE THE RESPONDENT OPTED IN FAVOR OF A TRIAL IN stead OF A GUILTY PLEA
There are various factors that may cause a judge at sentencing consciously or unconsciously to penalize a respondent for having opted in favor of a trial instead of a guilty plea.

The judge may be irritated that the respondent has (in the judge’s opinion) wasted the court’s time by demanding a trial. This is especially true when the prosecution’s evidence of guilt is overwhelming and/or the respondent lacks a viable theory of the defense. Conversely, if the respondent does present a viable albeit ultimately unsuccessful defense, many (although not all) judges will be tolerant of the respondent’s insistence on a trial.

The judge is particularly likely covertly to punish the respondent for insisting on a trial if the respondent takes the witness stand at trial and tells a story that the judge believes is perjurious. (In most situations in which the respondent testifies to an exonerating version of the events relating to the offense charged, the jury (or the judge in a bench trial) will have to find the respondent’s testimony incredible in order to convict. So, in such cases, there is always at least some risk that the judge will conclude at sentencing that an enhanced penalty is appropriate. Even when the respondent does not take the stand, the defense presentation of testimony by friends or relatives of the respondent may cause the judge covertly to penalize the respondent at sentencing for having committed what the judge views as subornation of perjury.

Most judges make it a practice to encourage the attorneys to conduct a final round of plea negotiations immediately before trial. Some judges go even further, inquiring about the precise terms of the plea bargains that have been offered or asking in a general way whether the lawyers for each side have made a plea offer that they regard as reasonable. If the judge believes that the prosecutor’s plea offer was reasonable, s/he is likely to feel even more strongly that the respondent has wasted the court’s time by insisting on a trial. Conversely, when prosecutor’s best plea offer seems unreasonable, the judge is likely to direct his or her irritation at the prosecutor rather than the respondent. In these cases, defense counsel should consider bringing the prosecutor’s obstinacy to the attention of a judge who has prompted negotiations but not has not explicitly inquired why they are stalling. However, this strategy can backfire and should ordinarily not be used unless the respondent is prepared to accept an offer that the judge is likely to believe is reasonable. For if the judge pressures the prosecutor into offering a more favorable plea which the respondent then refuses to accept, the judge will be doubly irritated at the respondent’s apparent disingenuousness and lack of gratitude for the judge’s intervention on his or her behalf.

(a) particular presiding judges’ attitudes toward brokering negotiations, and

(b) each available judge’s predilections regarding what constitutes an appropriate disposition in cases like the respondent’s, before deciding whether, when, and how to engage a judge in counsel’s dealings with the prosecutor.

A number of juvenile court judges believe that “the first step to rehabilitation” is the admission of one’s misdeeds and the demonstration of remorse. Judges who subscribe to this view may consciously or unconsciously penalize the respondent for contesting the charges rather than admitting his or her sins and immediately expressing remorse.

If a respondent opts for trial and is convicted, and if it appears at or before disposition that the judge is inclined to penalize the respondent for exercising his or her constitutional right to go to trial rather than plead guilty – and especially if the judge has made any statements on the record that manifest such a mindset – counsel should consider whether to raise the issue and seek recusal or some other sort of relief. See, e.g., People v. Hodge, 154 A.D.3d 963, 965-66, 63 N.Y.S.3d 448, 450-51 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017) (even though the “defendant failed to preserve for appellate review his contention that the sentencing court penalized him for exercising his right to a jury trial,” the appellate court reaches the issue “in the interest of justice,” rules for the defendant, and reduces the sentence; in concluding that the sentence imposed by the trial court “raises the inference that the defendant was penalized for exercising his right to a jury trial,” the appellate court cites the lower sentence offered the defendant as part of a plea agreement, the disparity between the defendant’s sentence and that of a co-defendant who pled guilty, and the “sentencing court[‘s] [having] admonished the defendant for putting the elderly complaining witness through the ‘ordeal’ of a trial even though the defendant was caught ‘red-handed’”); State v. Nakamitsu, 140 Hawai’i 157, 166-67, 398 P.3d 746, 755-56 (2017) (dictum) (comments that the judge made at sentencing to “Nakamitsu and his counsel regarding Nakamitsu’s decision to proceed with trial” indicate that “the sentence was ‘likely to have been improperly influenced by the defendant’s persistence in his innocence’”; “[i]f the district court erroneously relied on Nakamitsu’s refusal to admit guilt in imposing its sentence, that reliance would have violated Nakamitsu’s constitutional right to due process and his right against self-incrimination”). See also People v. Wesley, 428 Mich. 708, 711, 411 N.W.2d 159, 161 (1987) (affirming the general principle that “a sentencing court cannot, in whole or in part, base its sentence on a defendant’s refusal to admit guilt,” but finding that “[h]ere, the trial court made clear when stating its reasons for exceeding the sentencing guidelines that defendant’s assertion of innocence was not the reason for imposing the harsh sentence”). In considering such a strategy, counsel needs to carefully assess whether raising the issue could backfire by angering the judge and causing him or her to impose a severe sentence while saying things on the record to justify the sentence’s severity and to ostensibly refute any improper motivation on the judge’s part. See § 20.07 infra (discussing tactical considerations in deciding whether to seek recusal of the judge and in framing a recusal request).

§ 14.06 ASSESSING WHETHER A GUILTY PLEA WOULD PRODUCE ANY SIGNIFICANT ADVANTAGES AT SENTENCING

§ 14.06(a) Introduction: The Analytical Process Involved in Gauging Potential Sentencing Advantages of a Guilty Plea

In assessing whether a guilty plea is likely to lead to significant advantages at sentencing, counsel must consider what are essentially four separate questions: (i) What is the maximum sentence the respondent could receive if s/he went to trial and were convicted of all of the offenses charged? (ii) What sentence, short of the maximum, is the judge likely to impose if the respondent were convicted at trial of the charges that the prosecutor will probably prove beyond a reasonable doubt? (iii) If the respondent were to plead guilty to the charging document, without any additional concessions from the prosecutor, what sentence would the judge be likely to impose? and (iv) Factoring in whatever additional concessions can be extracted (or have been extracted) from the prosecutor as a part of a plea bargain, what sentence is the judge likely to impose? If counsel can answer these questions to his or her satisfaction, s/he can construct the baselines for gauging the precise extent to which a guilty plea could aid the respondent at sentencing.

In developing the answers to these four questions, counsel’s first step naturally must be to research the local law establishing the periods of incarceration and fines that can be imposed upon a juvenile for the commission of the offense(s) charged. This research will need to examine: (1) the maximum length of incarceration and maximum extent of fines that could be imposed for each of the charges; (2) whether the juvenile court statutes of the jurisdiction permit consecutive sentences for conviction of multiple offenses; (3) whether the length of the sentence can be enhanced as a result of statutes that provide for higher sentences for recidivists or for certain types of offenders (such as individuals who committed an enumerated serious felony or committed a crime while armed with an operable firearm); and (4) whether local statutes establish any potentially applicable mandatory minimum penalties for the offense charged.

As explained in § 14.01 supra, the classic form of sentencing advantage available as a result of a guilty plea in adult court is inapplicable to juvenile court sentencings in most jurisdictions. This form of plea in adult court is one in which the defendant pleads guilty to a lesser offense included within the present charge and thereby obtains a guaranteed reduction of the statutory maximum sentence to the lesser sentence attached to the lesser charge. By contrast, in the vast majority of jurisdictions, the juvenile court statutes permit the imposition of the same indeterminate sentence without regard for the nature or severity of the offense. See § 38.03(c) infra.

Another common form of sentencing advantage of guilty pleas in adult court – the dismissal of several counts of a multi-count indictment in exchange for a plea, thereby precluding cumulative terms of incarceration for each of the counts that were dismissed – also is usually unavailable in juvenile court. In virtually all jurisdictions, sentences in juvenile court cannot be cumulative. Accordingly, regardless of whether the respondent has been convicted of a single crime or a number of crimes, the harshest possible sentence that can be meted out is a single indeterminate period of incarceration.

Since bargained guilty pleas in juvenile court cannot automatically curtail the length of incarceration as they can in adult court, the value of a guilty plea in juvenile court depends upon its producing other types of sentencing advantages. Section 14.06(b) infra examines the various alternative sentencing advantages that may be available and then looks also at the sentencing advantages available in the handful of jurisdictions whose juvenile court statutes do provide for some degree of differential sentencing based on the nature of the offense. Section 14.06(c) describes the variety of mechanisms for using a guilty plea to obtain one or more of these sentencing advantages. Obviously, any meaningful consideration of the value of a plea must take into account not only the theoretical availability of a sentencing advantage but also the practical feasibility of using one of these mechanisms to obtain the desired sentence.

§ 14.06(b) The Concrete Sentencing Advantages Available in Juvenile Court

An understanding of the sentencing advantages that may attend a guilty plea in juvenile court naturally requires familiarity with the unique indeterminate sentencing structure of juvenile court. That structure is described in detail in § 38.03(c) infra. For present purposes it is sufficient to conceptualize the range of juvenile court sentences as divided into three tiers, which are, in order of increasing severity: diversion, probation, and incarceration. As the following discussion will explain, the sentencing value of a guilty plea depends upon whether it will move a respondent down the three-tiered sentencing ladder to a sentencing option that is more lenient than the sentence that the respondent otherwise would be likely to receive.

“Diversion” (sometimes called by other names such as “adjournment in contemplation of dismissal,” “setting,” or deferred entry of judgment”) diverts the juvenile out of the court system by expunging the conviction and arrest records upon the juvenile’s completion of a set period of time without being rearrested. See § 19.01 infra. See also § 38.93(c) infra. Diversion is usually reserved for first or second offenders and can typically be obtained only in cases involving relatively minor offenses. The characteristics of the diversion vary among jurisdictions. Usually the juvenile is required, as conditions of the diversion, to remain crime-free and attend school regularly during the period of diversion. In many jurisdictions, it is commonplace for additional conditions to be imposed, including participation in a community-based treatment program (which, depending on the respondent’s needs, might be a program for counseling or substance abuse treatment), periodic meetings with a probation officer or other agency official, community service, and/or restitution. In some jurisdictions, diversion is available in a delinquency case not only prior to trial but also after a respondent has been convicted (either at trial or by means of a guilty plea). See § 19.01 infra. Depending on the jurisdiction, post-conviction diversion may require a guilty plea, either because the applicable statute or rule makes this a precondition (see, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE §§ 790 - 794 (2018)) or because, as a practical matter, the prosecutor’s support is required and the only way to secure such support is as part of a plea bargain (see § 14.06(c) infra).

For more serious offenders and recidivists, who will be deemed ineligible for diversion, the central question in gauging the value of a guilty plea is whether the respondent faces a risk of incarceration in the event that he or she is convicted. If there is a substantial risk of incarceration, then the respondent may benefit greatly from a plea agreement in which the prosecutor (or ideally the judge) agrees to a sentence of probation.

If the nature of the offense or the respondent’s prior record is so egregious that even probation is out of the question, and the inevitable effect of conviction (whether as a result of a trial or a guilty plea) is a sentence of incarceration, then a guilty plea usually offers no sentencing advantages. This is so because in most jurisdictions the sentencing judge cannot control the length of the period of incarceration. In virtually all jurisdictions a sentence of incarceration (called “commitment” in some jurisdictions and “placement” in others) is an indeterminate sentence that, in theory, can extend to the minor’s age of majority. (In some jurisdictions the sentence imposed upon the child is an indeterminate sentence that extends to the child’s age of majority; in other jurisdictions it is an indeterminate sentence of up to 18 or 24 months, which in theory can be extended annually until the child’s age of majority.) Once the court has imposed the indeterminate sentence, custody of the child is transferred to the state agency that administers the juvenile placement facilities. The agency thereafter determines the release date on the basis of the child’s behavior within the institution. Thus the judge has no power over the length of sentence that the child actually will serve and cannot reward a guilty plea by imposing a shorter period of incarceration than would be imposed after trial. (As a practical matter almost all incarcerated juveniles are released by the incarcerating agency within 12 to 18 months.)

A few jurisdictions deviate from the usual indeterminate sentencing pattern and either provide for the automatic imposition of heavier sentences for more severe offenses or give the judge the authority to vary the sentence depending upon the nature of the offense. For example, in some jurisdictions, the indeterminate sentence imposed for a felony is greater than the indeterminate sentence imposed for a misdemeanor. In other jurisdictions the judge can impose indeterminate sentences of varying lengths depending upon the seriousness of the offense and upon the respondent’s character and prior record. And, in still other jurisdictions, a juvenile sentencing judge can override the typical indeterminate sentencing pattern by specifying a fixed term of incarceration or by reserving a veto power over the agency’s decision to release a particular respondent prior to the expiration of his or her indeterminate sentence. In jurisdictions of these types a juvenile respondent who is facing a strong likelihood of incarceration in the event of conviction may wish to consider a guilty plea if the plea can be used to limit the length of that incarceration.

In some jurisdictions the sentencing judge can exercise some control over the facility in which the respondent is incarcerated. Usually, the range of juvenile detention facilities includes a maximum security facility, one or more medium security facilities that are oriented towards treatment rather than security, and one or more community-based group homes. In jurisdictions that permit the sentencing judge to select the place of incarceration, the respondent may wish to consider a guilty plea that will maximize the respondent’s chances for the least secure facility or the facility that provides the most meaningful rehabilitative services.

§ 14.06(c) Mechanisms for Using a Guilty Plea To Obtain One of the Sentencing Advantages Available in Juvenile Court

The most common mechanism for using a plea to engineer a reduction in sentence is to trade the plea for an agreement by the prosecutor that s/he will support (or not object to) a specific sentence desired by the defense. This option, and its various permutations and ramifications, is discussed in § 14.06(c)(1) infra. Section 14.06(c)(2) then examines the primary defect of this kind of prosecutorial agreement – the lack of any binding effect upon the sentencing judge – and describes the methods available in some jurisdictions for obtaining a judicial commitment to impose a specific sentence. Finally, § 14.06(c)(3) looks at other forms of prosecutorial aid that may be obtainable at the sentencing stage to affect the nature of the sentence.

§ 14.06(c)(1) Prosecutorial Commitments To Support (or Not Object to) a Specific Sentence

There are essentially three ways in which a prosecutor can commit himself or herself, as part of a plea agreement, to aid the defense in obtaining a particular desirable sentence. The most advantageous from the defense perspective is a commitment by the prosecutor to tell the judge at sentencing that s/he supports the sentence that is being requested by the defense and joins the defense in seeking that sentence. Some prosecutors may not be willing to affirmatively recommend a specific sentence in this manner, either because they feel that the concession is unwarranted on the facts of the case or because their view of the prosecutorial role does not encompass such active support of the defense at sentencing. Such prosecutors may be willing to adopt the less active stance of announcing that they have no objection to the defense’s sentencing request. Many judges view declarations of non-objection as virtually tantamount to an expression of outright support. Finally, prosecutors who are unwilling to express or even imply support may be willing to agree, as part of a plea bargain, to remain mute at sentencing. This commitment, although far less advantageous to the defense, nevertheless can prove helpful. By silencing the prosecutor, it increases the likelihood that the judge will be swayed by the unrebutted arguments of the defense. Moreover, many judges perceive a prosecutor’s silence as an indication that there are no unduly aggravating facts in the case or in the respondent’s prior record.

Clearly, these three types of prosecutorial commitments differ in the degree to which they benefit the respondent. However, the actual effect of such commitments cannot be gauged without a full understanding of the nature and effect of the pre-sentence report. As the following discussion will explain, all three forms of prosecutorial support may decisively shape the sentencing determination if the prosecutor agrees in addition to waive a pre-sentence report. Conversely, when a pre-sentence report is ordered by the judge and turns out to be unfavorable to the respondent, none of the forms of prosecutorial support may suffice to produce the sentence desired by the defense.

The pre-sentence report, which is discussed further in § 38.04(a) infra, is a report on the background of the respondent prepared by the probation department. Typically, such reports include descriptions of the facts of the present offense, the respondent’s prior record, the respondent’s attendance and behavior at school, the respondent’s conduct at home as described by the parent, the respondent’s use of alcohol or drugs, the probation officer’s assessment of whether the respondent is remorseful about committing the crime, and the probation officer’s diagnosis of the appropriate sentence for the respondent. As one might expect, the pre-sentence report plays a major role in shaping the judge’s view of what sentence should be imposed.

In many jurisdictions the judge will be willing to dispense with the preparation of the pre-sentence report and instead proceed immediately to sentencing if the prosecution and defense jointly request such a procedure. (This practice is often followed even in jurisdictions whose statutes mandate the preparation of a pre-sentence report.) If the defense has succeeded in obtaining a prosecutorial commitment to support (or not object to) a specific disposition, it is strongly in the respondent’s interest to waive the preparation of a pre-sentence report and to seek a similar waiver by the prosecution as part of the plea agreement. Since the judge’s only sources of information about a respondent are the parties and the pre-sentence report, the elimination of the pre-sentence report deprives the judge of any factual basis for overriding the parties’ unanimous request for a specific sentence. Accordingly, as a general matter, if the defense can procure a prosecutorial commitment to waive the pre-sentence report and if the judge presiding over the case tends to follow the parties’ wishes to waive a pre-sentence investigation, counsel can usually feel confident that a prosecutorial commitment to support (or not object to) a specific sentence will prove adequate to produce the desired sentence. This is also true, albeit to a somewhat lesser extent, of prosecutorial commitments to remain mute at sentencing. With the pre-sentence report waived and the prosecution remaining mute, the judge will have little reason to reject defense counsel’s argument concerning the appropriate sentence.

Frequently, prosecutors are unwilling to ask for immediate sentencing and will insist upon the preparation of a pre-sentence report. These prosecutors may be perfectly willing to adopt one of the forms of support for a defense recommendation – express support for the specific sentence, declaration of the lack of any objection to the sentence, or remaining mute – but they insist that the judge should be given the pre-sentence information necessary to make an independent judgment concerning the appropriate sentence. Any plea agreements of this sort, permitting the preparation of a pre-sentence report, are risky propositions. An unfavorable pre-sentence report may lead a judge to reject even a defense sentencing request affirmatively supported by the prosecution. In gauging the value of prosecutorial support of this type, defense counsel will need to gather information bearing on two questions:

(A) How likely is it that the pre-sentence report will turn out to be favorable to the respondent? The evaluation of this factor will require investigation into the respondent’s prior record, attendance and behavior at school, and conduct at home. Counsel cannot stop with the information furnished by the respondent and his or her parent about these matters; they will naturally be prone to exaggerate the positives and minimize the negatives. Defense counsel will need to verify the information independently by checking court records and obtaining the respondent’s school records. Counsel must also obtain and evaluate the police version of the offense and the attitudes of the investigating officers about the offense and the respondent that will probably be conveyed to the probation officer who writes the pre-sentence report. In addition, counsel will need to familiarize himself or herself with local probation department policies and practices, in order to predict the likely recommendations of the report writer.

(B) How likely is it that prosecutorial support at sentencing will cause the judge to adopt the desired sentence even in the face of an unfavorable pre-sentence report? Counsel will need to speak to other juvenile defense attorneys who have conducted sentencings before the particular judge, in order to ascertain the degree of deference the judge pays to sentencing agreements between the defense and prosecution and also the kinds of aggravating facts that are most likely to sway the judge.

If defense counsel can feel confident that the pre-sentence report will be favorable (or, at least, not extremely detrimental) or that the judge is likely to defer to the parties’ agreed-upon sentence even in the face of an unfavorable pre-sentence report, then the respondent may be well advised to accept a guilty plea that promises prosecutorial support at sentencing even in the absence of a prosecutorial commitment to waive the pre-sentence report.

Occasionally, prosecutors who insist upon the preparation of a pre-sentence report are also adamant in refusing to make any commitments regarding the sentence until after they have viewed the pre-sentence report. In such instances most prosecutors will be amenable to entering into a contingent agreement that conditions their actions at sentencing (support for a specific sentence, declaration of the absence of any objection, or remaining mute) upon the pre-sentence report turning out to be favorable to the respondent. Such contingent agreements may be worthwhile from the defense perspective, as long as:
(A) Defense counsel has already checked on the respondent’s prior record and conduct at school and at home and therefore knows that the pre-sentence report will, in fact, be favorable to the respondent.

(B) Defense counsel succeeds in securing a concrete agreement about the precise criteria that the respondent must satisfy in order to earn the agreed-upon sentence. A concrete identification of criteria is essential to ensure that the prosecutor (or judge) cannot later declare that an apparently favorable pre-sentence report is not commendatory enough to trigger the prosecutor’s (or judge’s) corresponding obligations. Concrete criteria might include: a pattern of regular attendance at school (perhaps specifying the number of absences that will be tolerated); no suspensions or expulsions from school since the initiation of the court case; no prior convictions; no serious misbehavior at home; and no evidence of use of alcohol or drugs.

§ 14.06(c)(2) Obtaining Judicial Ratification of the Parties’ Agreement to a Specific Sentence

As earlier explained, all of the prosecutorial commitments that have been described are somewhat risky because a prosecutorial recommendation cannot tie the judge’s hands. Some judges invariably go along with the recommendation; some never do; some do or do not, depending on the case. Negotiating for a sentencing recommendation is effective only if defense counsel has sufficient information about the judge who will be – or about all of the judges who may be – the sentencing judge. In some cases it may be possible to meet with the judge in chambers, in a formal or informal pretrial conference, to sound out his or her reaction to a proposed sentencing recommendation by the prosecutor. Defense counsel may wish to suggest such a conference when the judge’s attitude toward sentencing recommendations is uncertain. See, e.g., State v. Warner, 762 So. 2d 507 (Fla. 2000).

In some localities a formal or informal practice of “conditional” plea bargaining has developed. Under this practice the prosecution and defense negotiate (i) the terms of the sentence that the respondent will receive if s/he pleads guilty (for example, diversion, probation, or a specific short period of incarceration) or (ii) the rules that will be followed in sentencing the respondent if s/he pleads guilty (for example, that there will or will not be a pre-sentence report; that the sentence will be probation in the event that the pre-sentence report shows that the respondent has no prior convictions and is regularly attending school (or, in appropriate cases, in the event that the prosecution informs the court that the respondent is cooperating with the authorities by giving information or testifying against co-perpetrators)). The parties’ agreement is then submitted to the sentencing judge for approval. If the judge agrees (i) to impose the bargained sentence or (ii) to observe the bargained sentencing rules, the respondent pleads guilty and the judge performs as agreed. If the judge does not agree, then the deal is off, and the case goes to trial (or to renegotiation). See, e.g., People v. Clancy, 56 Cal. 4th 562, 570, 572-77, 299 P.3d 131, 135, 137-40, 155 Cal. Rptr. 3d 485, 490, 492-95 (2013). If this procedure is customary in counsel’s jurisdiction, counsel should ordinarily follow it. If it is not, counsel should consider suggesting it to the prosecutor and the judge for use on an ad hoc basis.

§ 14.06(c)(3) Prosecutorial Commitments To Aid the Defense at Sentencing in Ways Other than Supporting (or Not Objecting to) a Specific Sentence

In addition to the previously described forms of prosecutorial aid at sentencing, there are a variety of ways in which the prosecutor can indirectly aid the defense with respect to sentencing. Depending upon the facts of the case and the inclinations of the prosecutor handling the case, it may be possible to obtain these indirect advantages either alone or in addition to prosecutorial commitments to support (or not object to) a specific sentence.

In some jurisdictions the timing of a guilty plea can be used to steer cases before a particular judge for sentencing, and the prosecution’s assistance may be instrumental in controlling the timing of the plea. See § 14.09 infra. Since the sentencing practices of the judge will often determine whether the defense succeeds in obtaining a favorable sentence, a prosecutor’s willingness to commit himself or herself, as part of a plea agreement, to aid the defense in steering the case before a particularly desirable judge may render the plea worthwhile. Obviously, in assessing the value of such a plea, the defense will need to investigate the sentencing practices and attitudes of all of the judges to whom the case could be shifted through the use of procedures that the prosecutor and defense counsel can implement and to compare them to the practices and attitudes of the judge who is currently presiding over the case.

Sometimes, prosecutors are willing to include, in a plea agreement, commitments regarding their description of the facts of the offense at sentencing. Obviously the prosecutor has great leeway in shaping his or her sentencing allocation, and s/he can choose to describe the facts of the offense in a brief and colorless manner or in an extensive and graphic manner. Frequently, prosecutors are willing to negotiate a commitment to refrain from mentioning (or at least, from belaboring) damaging facts, such as the extent of victim’s injury or terror. This is especially true when the respondent has pled to a lesser count that is not based on the aggravating evidence. For example, when the respondent has pled guilty to possession of a gun, it may be possible to secure a prosecutorial commitment not to mention at sentencing that the respondent also allegedly fired that gun. Limitations upon the aggravating facts heard by the judge can prove instrumental in securing a desired sentence. However, defense counsel must be cautious in using negotiated limitations of the facts in any cases in which the judge has ordered a pre-sentence report. Since pre-sentence report writers usually check the documents in the court file (and, in some jurisdictions, even speak with the victim in order to prepare a “victim impact statement”), the probation officer may learn of the excluded aggravating facts and may decide to include them in the pre-sentence report. When defense counsel predicts that there is a realistic possibility of the probation officer’s learning of the excluded information (such as, for example, in a case in which the documents in the court file contain the information, or in a jurisdiction in which probation officers routinely speak with the complainant), defense counsel will need to raise the issue with the probation officer and attempt to convince him or her to respect the terms of counsel’s arrangement with the prosecutor.

Another type of prosecutorial concession that can indirectly affect the outcome of the sentencing is a prosecutorial agreement to support the release, pending sentencing, of a respondent who was detained before trial. Many judges are willing to release a detained respondent, upon his or her entry of a guilty plea, if the prosecutor supports such a measure. (The rationale for this apparently paradoxical practice of detaining the respondent during the pretrial period of presumed innocence and then releasing him or her when s/he concedes guilt is somewhat murky. The explanation often given is that the respondent’s acknowledgment of guilt constitutes his or her first step toward rehabilitation, and the release has been ordered to facilitate further progress toward that goal. More realistically, the process can be viewed as a systemic accommodation to plea bargaining: If judges fail to give effect to any of the terms of a plea bargain, the system of plea bargaining will soon fall apart and the courts will be overloaded with trials; and, on the spectrum of possible plea bargain conditions, the condition of pre-sentencing release is an easy one for a judge to accept, since a respondent’s violation of the terms of the release will very shortly thereafter result in a sentence of incarceration.) In any event, whatever the rationale, pre-sentencing release of the respondent can prove instrumental to securing a favorable sentence. If the respondent can remain crime-free and demonstrate good behavior at school and at home during the weeks pending sentencing, defense counsel can use that record of good behavior to argue forcefully at sentencing that the respondent does not need to be incarcerated.

§ 14.06(c)(4) The Additional Intangible Effects of a Guilty Plea in Securing the “Good Will” of the Sentencing Judge

The foregoing analysis has been predicated upon the assumption that counsel can, at the time of the entry of the plea, obtain some type of commitment from either the prosecutor or judge concerning the sentence that will be imposed. In many cases it will be impossible to extract a commitment concerning sentencing from either prosecutor or judge. However, the mere entry of a guilty plea, without reciprocal commitments, may enable the respondent to reap one of the sentencing advantages described in § 14.06(b) supra. Judges tend generally to give lighter sentences to juvenile respondents who plead guilty, either because the judge regards the plea as a sign of contrition and a first step toward rehabilitation or because the judge wants, consciously or unconsciously, to express appreciation for the respondent’s contribution to alleviating the problem of docket congestion. In determining the likelihood that the judge will “give consideration” for a plea, even in the absence of a commitment, it is of course essential for counsel to check with other attorneys about the particular judge’s sentencing policies as evidenced in prior cases.

§ 14.07 ASSESSING WHETHER THE RESPONDENT WILL SUFFER ANY COLLATERAL CONSEQUENCES AS A RESULT OF EITHER A GUILTY PLEA OR A CONVICTION AT TRIAL

398
In analyzing the advisability of a guilty plea, it is necessary to consider not only potential sentencing consequences but also certain collateral consequences that may attach to a conviction. These may sometimes be so devastating that a plea is not a viable option, even if the direct sentencing consequences of conviction can be brought within acceptable limits by negotiation. The most common and most important of these collateral consequences is the potential for revocation of the respondent’s probation or parole (called “aftercare” in many jurisdictions). It frequently happens that a juvenile is arrested for a crime at a time when s/he is already on probation or parole for a prior conviction. In virtually all jurisdictions, if the respondent is convicted of the new crime, that conviction can serve as a basis for revoking the respondent’s probation or parole and imposing a period of incarceration. (For discussion of the standards for revocation and the length of the term of incarceration that can be imposed upon revocation, see §§ 39.04-39.05 infra.) Accordingly, when a respondent is already on probation or parole, the entry of a guilty plea may be tantamount to acquiescing in a period of incarceration. This prospect may be sufficiently unattractive to the respondent that s/he will reasonably decide s/he has nothing to lose by going to trial, even with a weak defense that offers nothing more than the faintest hope of an acquittal. On the other hand, if defense counsel can persuade the prosecutor to include in the plea agreement a commitment to support an extension of the period of probation or parole instead of revocation, then a guilty plea may become a very attractive option.

Another potential collateral consequence of conviction is the risk that the conviction can serve as a basis for exposing the respondent to enhanced penalties for future offenses. There are various ways in which such a risk can arise. Under the laws of some jurisdictions, a juvenile adjudication can result in a respondent’s facing a higher sentence as a recidivist if s/he is charged with and convicted of a new offense in juvenile court in the future. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 301.2(8)(v)-(vi), 353.5 (2018). In some States, a youth who has been convicted in juvenile court and is thereafter arrested for a new offense faces an enhanced risk of transfer to adult court on the new charge as a result of the prior adjudication. See, e.g., Or. REV. STAT. § 419C.349(4)(e) (2018). In some States, the adult criminal court sentencing laws permit the use of a prior juvenile adjudication as a predicate for a more serious criminal charge and/or as a basis for aggravated sentencing (see, e.g., United States v. Woodard, 694 F.3d 950, 952-55 (8th Cir. 2012); State v. McFee, 721 N.W.2d 607 (Minn. 2006); but cf. United States v. McGhee, 651 F.3d 153, 157-58 (1st Cir. 2011) (district court erred in classifying the defendant’s prior Massachusetts youthful offender adjudication as a predicate for “career offender status” under the federal sentencing guidelines: the guidelines require that the court consider “whether the conviction is ‘classified’ as an adult offense ‘under the laws of the jurisdiction’ of conviction, . . . undermining any presumption in favor of a federal standard that disregards state labels,” and “Massachusetts’ nomenclature clearly distinguishes between youthful offenders and adults”); United States v. Sellers, 784 F.3d 876, 879 (2d Cir. 2015) (“a drug conviction under New York law that was replaced by a YO [Youthful Offender] adjudication is not a qualifying predicate conviction under the ACCA because it has been ‘set aside’ within the meaning of 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)(20) and New York law”); United States v. Howard, 773 F.3d 519, 531-32 (4th Cir. 2014) (“district court abused its discretion [when sentencing an adult defendant] by focusing too heavily on Howard’s juvenile criminal history in its evaluation of whether it was appropriate to treat Howard as a career offender”: “The Supreme Court has recognized, in the sentencing context, the diminished culpability of juvenile offenders, given their lack of maturity, vulnerability to social pressures, and malleable identities.”), and therefore a youth who is convicted in juvenile court faces the risk of harsher penalties in adult criminal court if s/he is arrested for a new offense while still a juvenile and is transferred for prosecution to adult court or if s/he is arrested for a new crime after reaching the age at which individuals are automatically prosecuted in adult court. In any case in which a juvenile court adjudication can give rise to collateral consequences of this sort and in which there is at least some risk that the client may be rearrested for a new offense in the future, these risks must be factored into the assessment of whether to accept a guilty plea or instead to go to trial in the hope of averting a conviction and thereby avoiding any such collateral consequences. Accordingly, in evaluating the wisdom of a guilty plea and in working out the terms of any plea bargain with the prosecutor, counsel must always thoroughly research the jurisdiction’s statutes, rules, and practices governing transfer and recidivist sentencing in juvenile and adult court, realistically assess the client’s prognosis for staying out of trouble in the future, and discuss these subjects bluntly with the client.

In any jurisdiction in which juveniles are subject to sex offender registration requirements, counsel must be very wary of advising a client to plead to an offense that requires registration as a sex offender. The same is true if there is any risk that the client may move to a State that requires registration for such an offense even if the client’s current State of residence does not. Cf. A.W. by and through Doe v. State, 2017 WL 3224190 (8th Cir. July 31, 2017) (differences between sex offender registration requirements in Minnesota and Nebraska worked to the child’s benefit when he moved from Minnesota, which requires sex offender registration for adjudicated juvenile delinquents, to Nebraska, which does not). In a State that requires sex offender registration for juveniles, pleading to even a minor offense like urinating in public may result in the youth’s placement on a sex offender registry, with devastating – often lifelong – consequences for numerous aspects of the young person’s life, including access to education, employment, and housing. Editorial, Punishment that Doesn’t Fit the Crime, N.Y. TIMES, July 31, 2016, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2016/07/31/opinion/sunday/punishment-that-doesnt-fit-the-crime.html?ref=todayspaper. See generally Department of Justice, Office of Sex Offender Sentencing, Monitoring, Apprehending, Registering, and Tracking, Juvenile Sex Offender Registration and SORNA (September 2016), available at https://www.smart.gov/pdfs/ juvenile-dispatch-final-2016.pdf. Cf. State in the Interest of C.K., 233 N.J. 44, 47-48, 182 A.3d 917, 918-19 (2018) (applying the state constitution’s due process clause to strike down the portion of New Jersey’s Megan’s Law that provided that “[j]uveniles adjudicated delinquent of certain sex offenses are barred for life from seeking relief from the registration and community notification provisions of Megan’s Law,” and that this “categorical lifetime bar cannot be lifted, even when the juvenile becomes an adult and poses no public safety risk, is fully rehabilitated, and is a fully productive member of society”; but, even with this judicial relief from the most onerous portion of the statute, youths who were previously subject to the provision nonetheless are prohibited for fifteen years from seeking “release[ ] from . . . registration and notification requirements” and, even at that point, must show they have been “offense-free” for the “fifteen-year look-back period” and are “not likely [to] pose a societal risk.”). Even in those States that exempt juvenile delinquency adjudications from sex offender registration requirements, counsel must take into account the risk that a juvenile’s guilty plea to a sex offense may later harm the client if s/he is convicted of a sex offense in adult court and the juvenile adjudication can be considered in determining whether to classify the adult conviction as a registration-eligible crime. See, e.g., People v. Shaffer, 129 A.D.3d 54, 7 N.Y.S.3d 708 (N.Y. App. Div. 3d Dep’t 2015). Before advising a juvenile client to plead guilty to an offense that could result – either at the present time or later in life – in the client’s being placed on a sex offender registry, counsel should scrupulously explore all possible alternatives. For example, if counsel helps the prosecutor to acquire a better understanding of the data about juveniles and sex offender registration, the prosecutor may be willing to agree to a guilty plea to an offense that carries no risk of sex offender registration. See, e.g., N.Y. Times editorial, supra (citing a “senior lawyer in the juvenile division of the Kent County district attorney’s office in Michigan” who has responded to the data about juvenile sex offender registration by “push[ing] for pleas that keep youths off registries,” and reporting that “[o]ther prosecutors are following suit”). In discussing this subject with prosecutors, it will often be useful to point out that empirical research shows that “[o]nly 1 percent to 7 percent of children who commit sexual offenses will do it again – much lower than the 13 percent recidivism for adult sexual offenders.” Id. See also In re J.B., 107 A.3d 1, 17, 19-20 (Pa. 2014) (“application of Pennsylvania SORNA’s [Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act’s] current lifetime [sex offender] registration requirements upon adjudication of specified offenses violates juvenile offenders’ due process rights by utilizing an irrevocable presumption” that “sexual offenders pose a high risk of recidivating, [which] is not universally true when applied to juvenile offenders . . . , the vast majority of [whom] . . . are unlikely to recidivate”). If counsel ultimately determines, however, that there is just no alternative to pleading to a registration-eligible offense, and if the risks of going to trial would be significantly worse, then counsel must make sure, when counseling the client about the plea offer, that the client fully comprehends the long-term impact that registration could have on his or her life.

Another factor to consider in the case of a respondent who is not a citizen of the United States is whether a guilty plea – or a conviction at trial – could have detrimental consequences for the respondent’s immigration status. A noncitizen who is convicted of a crime in adult court may be subject to an order of removal (a euphemism for deportation) if the conviction is for any one of a range of types of crimes, including those classified by the Immigration and Nationality Act as “aggravated felonies”; “crimes involving moral turpitude”; certain types of controlled substance offenses; certain types of firearm offenses; and certain crimes of domestic violence, stalking crimes against children, or violations of protection orders. See generally MANUEL D. VARGAS, REPRESENTING IMMIGRANT CRIMINAL DEFENDANTS IN NEW YORK STATE (5th ed. 2011); Manuel D. Vargas, Immigration Consequences of Guilty Pleas or Convictions, 30 N.Y.U. REV. L. & SOC. CHANGE 701 (2006). See also, e.g., Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 11(b)(1)(o) (2018) (amended, effective Dec. 1, 2013, to require that the plea colloquy in federal criminal cases include a judicial warning to defendants who are “not a United States citizen” that a conviction may result in the defendant’s being “removed from the United States, denied citizenship, and denied admission to the United States in the future”); People v. Peque, 22 N.Y.3d 168, 176, 3 N.E.3d 617, 621, 980 N.Y.S.2d 280, 284 (2013) (“deportation is a plea consequence of such tremendous importance, grave impact and frequent occurrence that . . . due process compels a trial court to apprise a defendant that, if the defendant is not an American citizen, he or she may be deported as a consequence of a guilty plea to a felony”). The Board of Immigration Appeals thus far has consistently ruled that a juvenile court adjudication of delinquency does not qualify as a conviction of a “crime” and therefore cannot result in immigration consequences (see, e.g., Matter of Devison-Charles, 22 I&N Dec. 1362 (BIA 2000, INS motion for reconsideration denied 2001); Matter of Ramirez-Rivero, 18 I&N Dec. 135, 137 (BIA 1981); In the Matter of F-, 2 I&N Dec. 517, 518 (Central Office 1946; adopted by BIA 1946 (see id. at 524)), but “an act of juvenile delinquency could be considered an adverse factor in any application for a discretionary benefit under the immigration laws, and could trigger automatic ineligibility . . . under the Family Unity program.” VARGAS, supra, § 4.1.A, at 66. Immigration laws are in a state of flux and there is always the risk that statutory amendments, regulation changes, or agency interpretations or policies could result in greater consequences flowing from a delinquency adjudication. Accordingly, if counsel’s client is a noncitizen, it is essential that counsel research the possible immigration consequences of a delinquency adjudication and consider whether a guilty plea might entail, increase, avoid or reduce the risk of any such consequences. See Padilla v. Kentucky, 559 U.S. 356, 364 (2010) (“The[ ] changes to our immigration law have dramatically raised the stakes of a noncitizen’s criminal conviction. The importance of accurate legal advice for noncitizens accused of crimes has never been more important.”); Lee v. United States, 137 U.S. 1958 (2017) (“Everyone agrees that Lee received objectively unreasonable representation” from his defense attorney, who “assured . . . [Lee that] the Government would not deport him if he pleaded guilty [to a “count of possessing ecstasy with intent to distribute”] when in fact “[t]he conviction meant that Lee [who is “a lawful permanent resident” and “not a United States citizen”] was subject to mandatory deportation from this country.” (id. at 1962); the Court concludes that counsel’s erroneous advice, which led to Lee’s pleading guilty, was prejudicial even though Lee “had no real defense to the charge,” and thus conviction and deportation were likely if Lee opted for trial, and even though the guilty plea “carried a lesser prison sentence than he would have faced at trial” (id.); the Court explains that “common sense (not to mention our precedent) recognizes that there is more to consider than simply the likelihood of success at trial. The decision whether to plead guilty also involves assessing the respective consequences of a conviction after trial and by plea. . . . When those consequences are, from the defendant’s perspective, similarly dire, even the smallest chance of success at trial may look attractive.” (id. at 1966); “But for his attorney’s incompetence, Lee would have known that accepting the plea agreement would certainly lead to deportation. Going to trial? Almost certainly. If deportation were the ‘determinative issue’ for an individual in plea discussions, as it was for Lee; if that individual had strong connections to this country and no other, as did Lee; and if the consequences of taking a chance at trial were not markedly harsher than pleading [guilty], as in this case, that ‘almost’ could make all the difference. Balanced against holding on to some chance of avoiding deportation was a year or two more of prison time. . . . Not everyone in Lee’s position would make the choice to reject the plea. But we cannot say it would be irrational to do so.” (id. at 1968-69)). See also, e.g., United States v. Rodriguez-Vega, 797 F.3d 781, 786-88 (9th Cir. 2015) (counsel inadequately advised the defendant about the plea offer, thereby denying her of effective assistance of counsel, by informing her that she faced the “potential” of removal rather than advising her “that her conviction rendered her removal virtually certain, or words to that effect”; although the defendant “received notice that she might be removed [i.e., deported] from a provision in the plea agreement and the court’s plea colloquy under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 11[,] . . . [t]he government’s performance in including provisions in the plea agreement, and the court’s performance at the plea colloquy, are simply irrelevant to the question whether counsel’s performance fell below an objective standard of reasonableness”); Kovacs v. United States, 744 F.3d 44, 48, 50 (2d Cir. 2014) (counsel “rendered ineffective assistance by giving erroneous advice concerning the deportation consequences of pleading guilty . . . , with the result that [Kovacs] is at risk of detention and deportation if he reenters the United States”); United States v. Akinsade, 686 F.3d 248, 251, 255-56 (4th Cir. 2012) (counsel committed ineffective assistance by misinforming the client that the charge to which the client was pleading was not a deportable offense); Hernandez v. State, 124 So. 3d 757, 762-63 (Fla. 2013) (even if the accused was warned by the judge during the plea colloquy of the risk of deportation and the accused explicitly affirmed his understanding, defense counsel nonetheless can be found to be ineffective under Padilla v. Kentucky for “failing to warn [the accused] . . . of the clear immigration consequences of his plea”: “an equivocal warning from the trial court is less than what is required from counsel and therefore cannot, by itself, remove prejudice resulting from counsel’s deficiency”); Commonwealth v. DeJesus, 468 Mass. 174, 174-75, 9 N.E.3d 789, 791 (2014) (counsel committed ineffective assistance by advising his noncitizen client that a guilty plea to possession with intent to distribute cocaine would make him “eligible for deportation” when in fact “applicable immigration law . . . makes deportation or removal [for this crime] . . . automatic or ‘presumptively mandatory’”). Cf. United States v. Juarez, 672 F.3d 381, 384, 385-90 (5th Cir. 2012) (counsel, who advised the client to plead guilty to lying about United States citizenship and illegal re-entry after deportation following a conviction of an aggravated felony, committed ineffective assistance because counsel “failed to independently research and investigate the derivative citizenship defense” which “is a defense to the alienage element of both crimes to which Juarez pled guilty”).

There are a number of other civil disabilities that may flow from the respondent’s acquisition of a criminal record, even if that record is a juvenile record. See, e.g., United States v. Juvenile Male, 564 U.S. 932, 934, 936 (2011) (per curiam) (15-year-old who pleaded “true” to a sexual offense in a federal delinquency prosecution was subject to a state law requirement to register as a sex offender). See generally Michael Pinard, The Logistical and Ethical Difficulties of Informing Juveniles About the Collateral Consequences of Adjudications, 6 Rev. L.J. 1111 (2006). See also Kristin Henning, Eroding Confidentiality in Delinquency Proceedings: Should Schools and Public Housing Authorities Be Notified?, 79 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 520 (2004). But cf. In re M.A., 2014 IL App. 132540, 12 N.E.3d 805, 808, 822-23, 382 Ill. Dec. 526, 529, 543-44 (2014) (“Illinois Murderer and Violent Offender Against Youth Registration Act,” which “automatically requires juveniles adjudicated delinquent for certain offenses to register as violent offenders against youth for a minimum of 10 years following adjudication” violates due process by failing “to provide any means by which a juvenile offender can petition to be taken off the registry,” and also violates equal protection by treating “juvenile violent offenders against youth differently and much more harshly than similarly situated juvenile sex offenders” who are “relieved of the obligation to register as adults on turning 17” and can “petition to be taken off the registry after five years”). Although all jurisdictions supposedly guarantee confidentiality of juvenile records and most provide for some form of “sealing” of the records upon the juvenile’s attainment of adulthood, the reality is that juvenile convictions are often discovered by the ex-offender’s prospective employers, as well as by state and federal licensing agencies. Depending upon the effectiveness of the local jurisdiction’s sealing laws and procedures, a juvenile conviction may interfere with the juvenile’s later attempts to: (i) enter an educational institution or obtain a professional license (such as a license to practice law or medicine); (ii) enter the military (including National Guard service, which is, in turn, the precondition for certain employments); (iii) obtain an occupational license (hack license, license to operate a bar, license to carry a firearm as a security guard, and so forth); (iv) obtain public office or employment (particularly in law enforcement or corrections careers); and (v) in cases in which the juvenile’s conviction was for a traffic offense, obtain a driver’s license or acquire car insurance at affordable rates.

Finally, a conviction may have the collateral consequence of enabling the State to permanently retain any property that was seized from the respondent at the time of arrest. Such property could include, for example, sums of money that the respondent was carrying (seized as proceeds of the crime) or the family automobile that the respondent was driving (seized as an implement of the crime). In many jurisdictions forfeiture statutes provide for the State’s retention of such property whenever the respondent has been convicted at trial or has pled guilty. When the personal property that will be forfeited is very valuable to the respondent and when a trial could result in acquittal and the return of the property but would not pose the risk of incarceration in the event of conviction, a respondent could reasonably opt for the chance of winning the trial and regaining his or her property. It may be obvious to counsel that such a venture would not be worthwhile when going to trial could enhance the chance of incarceration, but counsel will often need to discuss this situation and explain its risks thoroughly to a juvenile client because many young children are more concerned with the concrete loss of the property than with the intangible possibility of future incarceration.

In each of these situations of potential collateral consequences, counsel must research fully both the legal basis for any collateral criminal or civil liability and the practical likelihood that the collateral consequence will actually take place.

§ 14.08 ASSESSING WHETHER A TRIAL WOULD BE DETRIMENTAL IN THAT IT WOULD EXPOSE THE JUDGE TO PARTICULARLY EGREGIOUS FACTS OR A HIGHLY SYMPATHETIC COMPLAINANT AND THEREBY CAUSE THE JUDGE TO IMPOSE A HARSHER SENTENCE IN THE EVENT OF CONVICTION

Our earlier discussion of factors to consider in analyzing the likelihood of winning at trial mentioned that particularly egregious facts or an especially sympathetic victim may cause a judge to lean unconsciously toward conviction. See § 14.04(c) supra. In the event that the respondent is convicted, egregious facts or a highly sympathetic victim may also cause the judge to impose a particularly harsh sentence. In this respect, the respondent may be significantly prejudiced by opting for a trial instead of a guilty plea. Although the judge in a plea colloquy does hear the egregious facts, see § 14.26(c) infra, the summary and dispassionate rendition of the facts that are characteristic of plea colloquies usually will not make an overwhelming impression on the judge. In sharp contrast, when a judge observes a vulnerable victim (such as a young child or senior citizen) testify at trial or hears any victim testify about the horrid physical injury or psychological trauma that s/he suffered, the judge inevitably will sympathize with the victim and, in the event of conviction, may increase the punishment meted out to the respondent. Of course, this is not to say that a plea offer should be accepted in every case in which the facts are egregious or the victim is sympathetic. However, these factors must be taken into consideration in the cost-benefit analysis of whether to plead guilty or go to trial.

In assessing whether the egregious nature of the offense should tip the balance in favor of a plea, the first factor to consider is whether the facts of the offense are substantially more egregious than those in other cases heard by the judge. Counsel will have to find out the range of cases heard by the particular judge and assess where this specific crime falls on the spectrum. (For example, a judge who regularly presides over homicides and other major felonies will view an armed robbery in a very different light than would a judge who deals primarily with minor felonies and misdemeanors.) Counsel should additionally inquire of attorneys who have frequently appeared before the judge whether his or her previous sentencings reflect a particular sympathy for the type of victim involved in this respondent’s case. In analyzing the judge’s prior sentences in cases involving sympathetic victims or particularly egregious facts, counsel should also compare the length of sentences in cases in which the respondent went to trial with those in which the respondent pled guilty.

Another major factor to consider is the degree to which the judge has leeway to increase the sentence even if s/he wishes to do so. In § 14.06(a) supra, it was noted that the range of sentences that can be imposed in juvenile court is quite limited. Usually, the sole choice is between probation and a uniform indeterminate sentence. If that is the case and if the respondent’s prior record is such that any new conviction will inevitably result in incarceration, then there is nothing the judge can do to further penalize the respondent even if the judge should be so inclined as a result of hearing the trial testimony. As a result, egregious facts or a sympathetic victim should militate for a guilty plea only when: (i) by pleading guilty and minimizing the impact of those facts, the respondent might realistically be able to avoid incarceration and obtain a sentence of probation; or (ii) even assuming that incarceration is virtually certain in the event of a guilty plea, the judge has the power to give the respondent the benefit of incarceration in a particularly desirable facility; or (iii) the jurisdiction is one that does provide a range of sentences for juveniles, so that the judge could aggravate the sentence as a result of hearing prejudicial trial testimony.

The third and final factor to consider in assessing the significance of egregious facts is whether the impact of those facts will actually be lessened by pleading guilty rather than going to trial. Although it is true that the brief, second-hand description of the offense that is given during a guilty plea (and is usually repeated in the pre-sentence report) will usually not be as devastating as live testimony at trial, there are some crimes (such as murder, rape, kidnapping) that are so egregious that the mere mention of the crime will be sufficient to predispose the judge in favor of a sentence of incarceration. In cases of this type, a guilty plea usually will not make a difference, and the respondent has nothing to lose by going to trial.

In determining whether a guilty plea will serve to avoid or blunt the influence of devastating facts upon the judge, defense counsel should also consider the availability of strategies, such as those described in § 14.06(c)(1) and (3) supra, for limiting the factual information that will be put before the sentencing judge in the event of a plea. Clearly, in a case in which the respondent has a chance for probation, a plea agreement that ensures that the judge will never hear certain aggravating facts can spell the difference between probation and incarceration.

Having assessed the degree of damage that could be caused by the judge’s hearing the live testimony at trial and the extent to which that damage could be limited by the mechanism of a guilty plea, counsel is finally ready to include these considerations in the general cost-benefit analysis of the advisability of a plea. If the respondent has a strong chance of prevailing at trial, that prospect should not ordinarily be traded away even for the benefits that might accrue from limiting the facts. On the other hand, if the respondent is likely to be convicted and a limitation upon the facts could give the respondent a good chance for probation instead of incarceration, then the respondent may be well advised to accept a plea offer.

Thus far, the discussion has considered only cases in which the facts that would emerge at trial are detrimental to the respondent. Counsel will also occasionally encounter situations in which a trial – even a trial that the respondent would surely lose – could be beneficial because the judge would hear and later remember powerful mitigating evidence in the form of extenuating or sympathetic circumstances surrounding the commission of the offense. For example, in a homicide case, the respondent may have only a slim chance of winning on a self-defense claim, but a trial may provide the opportunity for presenting the judge with persuasive evidence of provocation by the victim, which can be cited later at sentencing as a basis for mitigation of the sentence. In such cases, even the promise of prosecutorial support at sentencing may be insufficient to outweigh the benefits of going to trial and presenting the mitigating facts in the most forceful manner.

§ 14.09 ASSESSING WHETHER THE DECISION TO PLEAD GUILTY CAN BE USED TO STEER THE CASE BEFORE A FAVORABLE SENTENCING JUDGE

Despite systemic attempts to achieve some uniformity in sentencing, individual judges continue to differ enormously in their sentencing patterns and attitudes. As this section will explain, if counsel is practicing in an urban jurisdiction with several juvenile court judges, counsel can significantly affect the client’s sentence by ensuring that the sentence is imposed by the right judge or is not imposed by the wrong judge. Of course, these considerations will be inapplicable in the smaller or rural jurisdictions, where there is only one juvenile court judge.

If practicing in a multijudge jurisdiction, counsel should investigate the sentencing practices of all of the judges before whom the case could be steered. Such information can be gleaned by discussing the topic with other juvenile court lawyers and with the prosecutor (assuming s/he is cooperative and trustworthy).

If the juvenile court judges in the jurisdiction periodically rotate assignments, counsel can control the identity of the judge by accelerating or delaying the case. If counsel is aware of an upcoming rotation and concludes that the present judge is more desirable than the incoming judge, counsel obviously wants to advance the case and hold the plea hearing before the current judge. Conversely, if counsel determines that the incoming judge will be a more favorable sentencer, the plea should be delayed until after the rotation has taken place. In some cases the prosecutor’s assistance may be crucial in advancing or delaying the plea hearing, and it may be necessary to secure the prosecutor’s assistance as an express or implicit condition of a plea agreement. See § 14.06(c)(3).

In a rare case the respondent may enter a guilty plea at arraignment in order to assure the assignment of the case to a particularly lenient judge who happens to be conducting arraignments that day. Such an occurrence should be extremely rare because defense counsel at arraignment usually will not yet have conducted enough discovery and investigation to be able to gauge the advisability of a guilty plea.

In some jurisdictions judges only retain jurisdiction over sentencing in cases in which a trial was held, and all guilty plea cases are sent to a single judge for sentencing regardless of which judge accepted the plea. In such jurisdictions if the judge who conducts sentencings in plea cases is a more lenient sentencer than the judge who would conduct the trial, then this disparity will be a powerful argument in favor of a guilty plea (assuming that there is a significant chance that the respondent would be found guilty at trial). On the other hand, if the judge to whom the case is assigned for trial is a more lenient sentencer than the judge who conducts sentencings in plea cases, then it may be in the respondent’s interest to go to trial even in a case in which conviction is inevitable, solely for the purpose of guaranteeing that the lenient trial judge will retain the case for purposes of sentencing.

§ 14.10 ASSESSING WHETHER A GUILTY PLEA WOULD PREJUDICE THE RESPONDENT BY PRECLUDING APPELLATE REVIEW OF AN ADVERSE TRIAL COURT RULING ON A SUPPRESSION ISSUE OR OTHER ISSUE LITIGATED BEFORE TRIAL

In many jurisdictions the entry of a guilty plea waives all rights to appellate review of errors committed in judicial proceedings prior to the plea. Accordingly, in jurisdictions of this sort, if the defense litigates and loses a viable motion to suppress a confession, tangible evidence, or identification evidence, and the respondent thereafter enters a guilty plea, the defense forfeits the right to appeal the adverse suppression rulings. In cases in which the suppression arguments are strong, counsel must weigh the loss of the opportunities for their appellate vindication against the benefits of the plea. Similarly, a guilty plea waives – and counsel who is advising a respondent concerning the advantages and disadvantages of a plea must factor in the loss of – appellate review of other pretrial rulings, such as rulings on motions for a change of venue, for recusal of the judge, and so forth.

In an increasing number of jurisdictions, state legislatures have eliminated this dilemma, at least when suppression issues are concerned, by authorizing appellate review of pretrial suppression rulings even after the entry of a guilty plea. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 330.2(6) (2018). But counsel should make very sure that postplea appellate review is expressly authorized by statute or an authoritative judicial decision in the particular jurisdiction before advising a guilty plea with the expectation of obtaining appellate review of the preplea judicial rulings.

In jurisdictions that prohibit appellate review of preplea rulings, it may be possible to preserve appellate remedies by securing prosecutorial and judicial agreement to a “stipulated trial” procedure. Under this procedure the respondent consents to the submission of the case to the court for adjudication upon a stipulated statement by the parties of the evidence that would have been presented at a trial, and it is understood beforehand that the judge will thereupon convict and proceed to sentencing as though the respondent had pleaded guilty. Because this process conserves the prosecutor’s time, the prosecutor may be willing to grant the same types of concessions that are normally granted in plea agreements. And, since there would be a trial in form, appellate review of pretrial rulings would be preserved. However, defense counsel must be fully confident of the viability of this procedure in the jurisdiction in which counsel is practicing before urging a client to use it.

§ 14.11 ASSESSING THE IMPACT OF THE ADDITIONAL CONSIDERATIONS THAT ARISE IN CASES IN WHICH THE RESPONDENT IS DETAINED BEFORE TRIAL

When the respondent is detained pending trial, it may be possible to include in the plea agreement a prosecutorial commitment to support post-plea release of the respondent pending sentencing. Such an arrangement not only speeds up the client’s release from galling pretrial confinement but gives him or her the chance to demonstrate good behavior in the community during the presentencing period and thereby “earn” a sentence of probation. See § 14.06(c)(3) supra.

Even when a guilty plea will not serve to secure the respondent’s liberty pending sentencing, a respondent who is detained before trial may nevertheless have an interest in pleading guilty in order to cut down on the period of detention prior to sentencing. This will obviously be the case when a sentence of probation is expected; and it may also be the case even when an incarcerative sentence is likely because, in many jurisdictions, pretrial detention in juvenile cases is not credited against the length of sentences. Accordingly, when the respondent will probably be detained for a few months prior to trial, s/he may wish to plead guilty in order to accelerate the commencement of the service of sentence.

Although reducing the duration of incarceration in this way is a valid consideration, counsel who discusses it with the client will want to be sure that the discomfort of being in detention does not overwhelm the client’s judgment and push him or her into a hasty decision to forgo a trial in which s/he may have a winning defense.

§ 14.12 ASSESSING THE IMPACT OF OTHER FACTORS THAT MILITATE IN FAVOR OF EITHER A GUILTY PLEA OR A TRIAL

In addition to the factors previously listed, there are several other factors that may, in particular cases, affect the determination of the advisability of a guilty plea. Although the list of fact-specific variables is too lengthy to cover in its entirety, some of the most typical considerations are highlighted next.

§ 14.12(a) The Potential Advantages of a Guilty Plea in a Case in which the Prosecutor Has Under-Charged the Respondent

Occasionally, counsel will encounter a case in which the charges filed by the prosecution are significantly less serious than those that counsel’s independent interviewing and investigation reveal could be proved at a trial. If the client pleads not guilty and thereby puts the case on the prosecution’s trial-preparation agenda, s/he could end up facing graver charges. Under these circumstances, a quick plea of guilty may be advisable in order to bar the subsequent filing of aggravated charges. The constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy (see § 17.08 infra) bars a respondent’s prosecution upon greater charges following his or her conviction of a lesser included offense, e.g., United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688 (1993); Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82, 87-88 (1985) (dictum), except (a) “where the State is unable to proceed on the more serious charge at the outset because the additional facts necessary to sustain that charge have not occurred or have not been discovered despite the exercise of due diligence,” Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161, 169 n.7 (1977); Illinois v. Vitale, 447 U.S. 410, 419-21 & n.8 (1980); compare Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. 773, 789-92 (1985); or (b) the State files the more serious charge at the outset, but the respondent elects to seek adjudication of the lesser charge first and succeeds in obtaining such an adjudication over the prosecutor’s objection, see Ohio v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 493 (1984); cf. Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S. 137, 151-54 (1977) (plurality opinion); or (c) the adjudication of the lesser charges is effected pursuant to a plea bargain that the respondent later breaches, see Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987).

§ 14.12(b) Cases in Which a Client Manifests Strong Discomfort With One or the Other of the Options of Entering a Guilty Plea or Going to Trial

Another factor to consider is whether the respondent does not “feel” guilty and is agreeing to a guilty plea only with considerable reluctance. Given the fact that the decision is the client’s to make and that it is the client who will have to live with the sentencing consequences of that decision, the comfort of the client should be a major factor. Moreover, if the client is unhappy with the plea, his or her unhappiness may be sufficiently apparent to the judge during the plea colloquy that the judge will not accept the plea. As indicated in § 14.26(c) infra, the judge may interrogate the respondent extensively in the course of accepting the guilty plea. (Problems of the latter sort may be avoided or ameliorated in jurisdictions that allow an “Alford plea.” See § 14.22(a) infra.)

Conversely, the client may have concerns that make him or her uncomfortable with the prospect of undergoing a trial, regardless of its outcome. Some respondents may have psychological or emotional problems that render them unable to cope with the nervous stress that attends a trial, particularly a lengthy trial. Some respondents may fear their parents’ reactions to hearing the testimony at trial, particularly when the offense is a sex offense or involves extreme violence. In jurisdictions that permit the media to attend the trial, counsel will also need to consider the respondent’s reactions to the bad publicity that a trial may generate. In all such situations, counsel will need to play the role of a dispassionate but not uncompassionate adviser, helping the client to examine his or her feelings with a measure of objectivity but not underrating their importance.

Part C. Plea Negotiations

§ 14.13 DEFENSE COUNSEL’S OBLIGATIONS IN PLEA NEGOTIATIONS

“Plea bargaining” and “bargain justice” conjure up shabby images in many minds, ranging from a sluggardly or exploitative defense practice to politicking and graft. Undoubtedly, there are some corruptions of plea bargaining. But the negotiated resolution of criminal matters is no more to be scorned for that reason than are all contracts because some contracts are fraudulent. There is absolutely nothing wrong with defense counsel’s settling a criminal or juvenile delinquency case with authorization from the client and after fair dealings with the prosecutor.

What is involved in settlement, and in the antecedent negotiation, is an attempt to come to agreement on a disposition that serves and reconciles, as far as possible, the legitimate interests of the prosecution and the defendant or juvenile respondent, without the wasted effort and needless vagaries of trial. In criminal and juvenile matters, as in civil matters, negotiation is the essence of lawyering. Experienced criminal lawyers know that one of defense counsel’s most important functions, perhaps the most important, is working out with the prosecutor the best possible disposition of a client’s case in situations in which there is no realistic prospect of acquittal. Not only may the lawyer properly do this, but s/he violates the obligation of competent representation if s/he fails to pursue plea-bargaining opportunities that could produce a better outcome for the client than a trial. See Missouri v. Frye, 566 U.S. 133, 143-46 (2012); Williams v. Jones 571 F.3d 1086, 1090-91 (10th Cir. 2009); Johnson v. Uribe, 682 F.3d 1238 (9th Cir.
§ 14.14 OPENING DISCUSSIONS WITH THE PROSECUTOR

From the outset of proceedings, counsel will have been discussing the case with the prosecutor. See §§ 4.11, 9.06 supra. Initial discussions should have focused principally on learning what the prosecutor was willing to disclose about the prosecution’s case. But counsel should also have learned something about the prosecutor’s attitude; counsel should have tried to affect that attitude in favor of the client; and in the course of urging a favorable exercise of the prosecutor’s broad charging discretion, counsel should have asked specifically and ascertained what the prosecutor regards as a satisfactory disposition of the case. Counsel can ordinarily do this much without making any offer to plead the client guilty or even intimating that the client might be receptive to a plea agreement. Counsel can, therefore, proceed this far without explicit authorization by the client.

§ 14.15 WHEN NEGOTIATION SHOULD BEGIN

Exactly when negotiation in a stricter sense should begin – that is, when defense counsel should begin to raise the possibility of a guilty plea if some mutually satisfactory terms of settlement can be agreed upon – depends on a variety of circumstances.

Obviously, the paramount consideration is whether the respondent will derive any specific benefits as a result of pleading early in the process. One common example of a situation in which an early plea is often essential is when the crime was committed by a group of perpetrators. If all of the perpetrators have been arrested, the one who first cooperates to “break” the case and implicate the others will very likely receive the most consideration from the prosecution. (This is true both in cases involving a group of juvenile perpetrators and in cases involving a mixed group of juvenile and adult perpetrators (when the respondent’s testimony may be used by either or both of the prosecutors of the juvenile and adult court cases)). If some members of the group have not yet been identified, or have not yet been apprehended, the respondent who seeks to win governmental consideration by disclosing their names and/or whereabouts also will need to move quickly in order to provide that information before the police acquire it through independent investigation.

The defense may also gain collateral advantages from prompt commencement of plea negotiations with the prosecutor. Plea negotiation is one of the most profitable methods of informal discovery. Most prosecutors will disclose their case to some extent in order to persuade defense counsel that a guilty plea is advised. Indeed, some prosecutors will disclose facts about their case only if a guilty plea is being discussed. And counsel wants to begin discovery as early as possible. See Chapters 6 and 9.

Conversely, there may be reasons for delaying plea negotiations. One of the most important reasons for delay exists when counsel knows that the respondent is being sought for other crimes for which s/he has not yet been arrested. If counsel delays the negotiation and the respondent does end up being arrested for the other crimes, then counsel can negotiate for a plea that covers both the current case and the new cases. If counsel had gone ahead and worked out a plea bargain to cover only the current case, the prosecutor might insist on a second plea agreement (and often a far less favorable overall deal) when the new cases enter the system.

Moreover, even in cases in which an early plea might be beneficial, counsel is frequently in no position to negotiate at the outset of the case. Adequate factual investigation and legal research are the necessary preconditions for intelligent negotiation. And negotiation involves offering something, even if the something is only a possibility. Offering something does require authorization from the client. Counsel frequently will have nothing to offer at an early stage.

The client’s attitude should play a major part in determining whether counsel initiates plea negotiations early in the process. Some clients will expect their attorney to begin promptly to discuss a plea with the prosecutor. The police, in their immediate post-arrest interrogation of a respondent, often stress the value of cooperation, in order to obtain a confession of the offense for which the arrest was made, to encourage the respondent to confess to – and hence to “clear” – other unsolved crimes, and to persuade the respondent to finger any accomplices or help “break” other crimes. These suggestions by the police set a tone that may make the respondent quite anxious to clinch a quick deal; and, particularly if s/he is system-savvy, s/he will expect counsel to jump into bargaining with both feet.

On the other hand, many clients persist long after arrest in vigorously protesting innocence and expounding plausible tales (some true, some not), which, if true, render the suggestion of a guilty plea inconceivable. Counsel cannot broach the subject of a possible guilty plea to such clients, for the purpose of obtaining their authority to negotiate, without appearing to call the client a liar. At this early stage in the process, counsel has not yet established the rapport needed to probe the client’s position tactfully yet skeptically to see whether the client will stick to it in the face of all of the hard questions and hard facts that counsel will eventually have to put to the client. See §§ 5.06, 5.12 supra.

Accordingly, the best approach in gauging how early to initiate plea negotiation is ordinarily to be guided by the client’s outlook in the initial interview. If the client admits guilt and feels that s/he has been caught red-handed, counsel may raise the question of a possible guilty plea and suggest that – if the client wishes – counsel will explore the prosecutor’s attitude toward some sort of a plea bargain at the same time that counsel looks further into the facts of the case. Counsel should explain that:

1. Of course, counsel will make no commitments and will not indicate to the prosecutor that the client has any interest in pleading guilty.

2. Counsel does not as yet have any idea of the prosecutor’s position. But counsel will undertake to find out what the prosecutor might be willing to accept in the way of a reduced sentence.

3. After counsel learns what the prosecutor is offering, counsel will relay that offer to the client so that the client can evaluate whether the offer is even worth considering. Counsel will at that point give the client his or her advice, but the final decision will be the client’s.

4. Even if the client authorizes counsel to initiate discussions with the prosecutor, counsel intends to investigate the facts thoroughly in order to determine whether the prosecution’s case is strong or weak. Counsel will not even consider a plea, or advise the client to consider a plea, unless counsel’s investigation shows that the prosecutor’s case is strong and likely to result in conviction at trial.

5. Counsel is starting out with the attitude that “if this case can be fought, we are going to fight it.” Counsel’s only reason for bringing up the possibility of a plea is that s/he does not want to overlook any opportunity for getting the most favorable deal for the client if the client later decides that s/he would do better with a plea than with a trial.

Even with a client who acknowledges guilt, counsel is wise not to seem too attracted by a possible plea disposition at the outset, lest the client get the impression that counsel is anxious to sell out the client in order to save counsel work. But if counsel’s mention of talking to the prosecutor elicits a positive reaction from the client, counsel might as well start talking early.

On the other hand, if the client denies involvement in the offense or speaks of contesting guilt and if there appear no pressing reasons to begin negotiation, counsel can let the matter go until defense investigation and research have given counsel a thorough, detailed grasp of the case. After counsel has investigated the facts and had a chance to study and make some tentative evaluation of the matters discussed in §§ 14.03-14.12 supra, s/he should raise with the client the question of a possible guilty plea. At this stage counsel is not yet prepared to tell the client with any certainty what the advantages of a guilty plea will be, but s/he is in a position to suggest that there may be some advantages, depending on the prosecutor’s attitude toward negotiation. Even though counsel may have come to the unilateral conclusion that the case is plainly one for a not-guilty plea and trial, s/he owes it to the client to give the client the option of having negotiation with the prosecutor explored as an alternative. Of course, if counsel and the client are agreed at this stage that the case should be fought out on the guilt issue, no matter what sort of disposition the prosecutor might agree to – or if the client is adamant against any thought of a guilty plea notwithstanding counsel’s belief that negotiations looking to a plea might profitably be considered – the matter is ended. There remains nothing for counsel to do but prepare for trial and perhaps raise the issue with the client again later in light of subsequent developments.

§ 14.16 THE CONDITIONS PRECEDENT OF EFFECTIVE DEFENSE NEGOTIATION – THINGS TO KNOW ABOUT THE LAW, THE CASE, AND THE MOTIVATIONS OF THE PROSECUTOR

Thorough investigation must precede any serious negotiation. Counsel must know enough about the prosecutive and defensive cases – that is, about the facts, their likely provability in court, and the likely responses of a judge (or, in some jurisdictions, a jury) – to make, at least provisionally, the sort of evaluation suggested in § 14.04 supra.

Counsel also must be thoroughly familiar with the statutory scheme for sentencing of juveniles, the general sentencing practices of the juvenile court in which counsel is appearing, and the sentencing practices of the individual judge who is presiding over the case. In particular, counsel will need to know whether there are any specific sentencing advantages that can be gained by pleading guilty or whether the unique sentencing structure applicable to juvenile court will cause the sentence to be identical regardless of whether the respondent pleads guilty or goes to trial. See § 14.06(b) supra. In addition, counsel must thoroughly familiarize himself or herself with the possible mechanisms for using a guilty plea to obtain one of the sentencing advantages available under a juvenile sentencing scheme. See § 14.06(c) supra.

Defense counsel also will need to be thoroughly familiar with the facts of the case and the respondent’s background, in order to make effective arguments in favor of the client and overcome the prosecutor’s reluctance to offer a favorable plea agreement. For example, having thoroughly investigated the case, defense counsel can, if appropriate, mention flaws in the prosecution’s case that might lead the prosecutor to be more amenable to the plea agreement sought by the defense. (Such a strategy must, of course, be employed with caution so as to avoid tipping the prosecutor off to flaws that the prosecutor can remedy prior to a trial.) Similarly, having thoroughly investigated the respondent’s social history, defense counsel can affirmatively use favorable aspects of: the respondent’s prior record of convictions and arrests; school records showing the respondent’s attendance and performance at school; the parent’s descriptions of the respondent’s conduct at home; reports by employers of the respondent in present or prior part-time jobs or summer jobs; reports of psychiatrists, psychologists, or social workers who have examined the respondent; and reports by coaches at school or counselors who have worked with the respondent in community centers or other types of programs. Thorough investigation of the respondent’s prior court records, school records, and conduct at home is also essential, of course, so that counsel can meaningfully assess contingent plea offers in which prosecutorial support for a certain sentence is conditioned upon the pre-sentence report showing that the respondent is well-behaved at school and at home. See § 14.06(c)(1) supra.

It is also crucial for counsel to familiarize himself or herself with any formal or informal policies of the prosecutor’s office bearing on the sort of case involved. Frequently, prosecutors hide behind “office policies” that allegedly prevent the prosecutor’s acquiescence in the type of plea agreement that defense counsel is proposing. Defense counsel can rebut this claim if s/he is prepared to cite previous similar cases in which the present prosecutor or other prosecutors in the office accepted the result presently sought by defense counsel.
Just as it is important to be familiar with office policies, it is equally important to familiarize oneself with the specific practices and motivations of the prosecutor handling the case. The prosecutor’s calculus may be affected by a host of considerations, including: (i) considerations of justice; (ii) concern for the rehabilitative needs of the juvenile respondent; (iii) the obligation to satisfy superiors in the prosecutor’s office and the wish to avoid their viewing the prosecutor as unduly lenient; (iv) the desire to avoid antagonizing the investigating police officers, whose cooperation and good will may be needed by the prosecutor in future cases, and who may feel chagrin at the prospect of the prosecutor dismissing or compromising a case which they did a good job of investigating; (v) the desire to make the complainant feel like his or her interests have been vindicated; (vi) in jurisdictions that permit media access to juvenile proceedings, the need to be able to justify to the public any “deal” that is made; and (vii) the desire to rid himself or herself of a case, and thereby reduce his or her caseload. If counsel learns the precise motivations of the prosecutor in the particular case, then counsel can highlight the considerations most likely to sway the prosecutor. If the prosecutor is most concerned with imposing some type of punishment upon the respondent in order to satisfy his or her superiors, the complainant, and the police officers, then s/he may be amenable to probation or even diversion as long as defense counsel can come up with a plan for restitution or community service by the respondent. If, on the other hand, the prosecutor is truly committed to the rehabilitative ideal of the juvenile justice system, s/he will usually be receptive to arguments that a certain community-based program can serve the respondent’s educational or psychological needs better than incarceration would. And prosecutors who are overwhelmed with caseload pressures will be particularly susceptible to defense proposals that will simultaneously resolve several cases of the respondent or several co-respondents’ cases, or both.

When dealing with prosecutors who are concerned with the feelings of the investigating police officers or the complainant, counsel can, in an appropriate case, attempt to lobby these individuals in advance, possibly mentioning facts such as the minimal prior record of the respondent and the likelihood that the rehabilitative programs that will be ordered as a result of the plea will “straighten out” the respondent. However, counsel must be extremely cautious in deciding whether to lobby police officers or complainants and in selecting the arguments to use in lobbying them. All too often, such lobbying efforts can backfire, inciting the officer or complainant to call the prosecutor and voice their desire for a harsh sentence, or causing the prosecutor to feel resentful about defense counsel’s attempt to “line up” individuals whom the prosecutor may erroneously view as witnesses that “belong” to the prosecution, or both.

After investigating the law, facts, and prosecutorial motivations, counsel should draft a blueprint for plea negotiations that encompasses:

A. What defense counsel can offer to the prosecutor, including:

1. A plea of guilty to one or another offense.

2. Voluntary submission to treatment programs, changes of residence (for example, moving out of a certain neighborhood or moving out of the jurisdiction), and other matters that could not be compelled by law.

3. Voluntary financial restitution or submission to community service.

4. Cooperation to incriminate or convict other persons.

5. Cooperation to clear uncleared crimes.

B. What relatively favorable dispositions can be extracted from the prosecutor, including one or more of the following:

1. The respondent’s plea of guilty to a lesser offense included within the present charge.

2. The respondent’s plea of guilty to less than all of the offenses charged, with dismissal of the others on a nolle prosequi.

3. The respondent’s plea of guilty to the offense charged or to a lesser offense, on the prosecutor’s promise to support (or not object to) a specific sentence, or to remain mute at sentencing, or to provide one of the other forms of aid at sentencing that are described in § 14.06(c) supra.

4. The respondent’s plea of guilty to the offense charged or to a lesser offense, on the prosecutor’s agreement to secure the dropping of other charges against the respondent in other jurisdictions, federal or state. The prosecutor may or may not be able to deliver on this agreement. Counsel should ordinarily get personal assurances from the other prosecutors involved. S/he should also be familiar with prosecutorial policies, or s/he may be making a bad deal. The federal government very infrequently prosecutes for a federal offense following state conviction on a charge based upon the same incident; the agreement to have federal charges dropped is therefore often worth little.

5. Interim benefits such as release pending disposition or acceleration of the date when the case will be brought on for disposition (a matter of significance to a respondent who has been detained before trial).

§ 14.17 TECHNIQUES OF PLEA NEGOTIATION

Like any negotiation, plea negotiation involves the art of agreeing with the other side’s position on all points that are not essential to counsel as a means of getting the other side to agree with counsel’s position on essential points. This means, analytically, that counsel must figure out what the prosecutor really wants and how to give the prosecutor what s/he wants without sacrificing what counsel wants. For example, a prosecutor who says that s/he thinks “this juvenile respondent ought to be taken off the streets” does not necessarily want incarceration; s/he may be saying that s/he wants the respondent out of the community so as not to give the complainant, the police, and this prosecutor any further trouble. S/he may be quite satisfied with a suspended sentence and probation if the respondent will live with relatives in a different neighborhood or county and probationary supervision can be shifted to that jurisdiction.

The multitude of possible offenses that could be charged in any factual situation (including offenses of which the respondent is not technically guilty) and the large range of kinds of assistance that the prosecutor can lend at sentencing (see § 14.06 supra) ordinarily give counsel plenty of possibilities for effective compromise if s/he reviews them thoroughly and uses imagination. Similarly, the range of informal accommodations must be viewed with imagination. A prosecutor who adamantly refuses to make a formal sentencing recommendation to the court, for instance, may be willing to make an informal recommendation to the probation officer who is writing up the pre-sentence report on the case – and the latter recommendation may be just as valuable to the defense as the former.

At the personal level, it is important to minimize the extent of counsel’s disagreements with the prosecutor without giving in to the prosecutor on substantive matters. It is particularly important for counsel to appear not to be standing in personal opposition to the prosecutor, even when counsel’s position is opposed to the prosecutor’s position. (Bruce Green has suggested in a provocative article that every criminal defendant should have two lawyers – a trial lawyer and a settlement lawyer – with the aim, inter alia, of reducing the adversarial animosity that impedes effective plea negotiation. Bruce Green, The Right to Two Criminal Defense Lawyers, 69 MERCER L. REV. 675, 687-688 (2018). Because this isn’t about to happen soon for any but the wealthiest of defendants, an attorney representing those less affluent has to work hard at being both of those two lawyers.) One way for defense counsel to avoid a clash of personalities with the prosecutor is for counsel to establish a personal posture that is not completely identified with counsel’s bargaining position, by associating the bargaining position with the client and appearing to play the role of an honest broker between the client’s interests and the prosecutor’s. Thus, the “I-really-see-the-case-the-way-you-do-because-any-sensible-lawyer-would-know-that-what-you-say-makes-sense-but-you’ve-got-to-help-me-to-sell-it-to-my-client-by-giving-me-something-more-to-take-to-the-client-that-s/he-can-live-with” approach is frequently productive. This use of the absent client as a third force in negotiation allows defense counsel to hold firm to his or her position while establishing a broad base of personal and professional agreement with the prosecutor. It also avoids arousing any instincts that the prosecutor may have toward combative gamesmanship – that is, the game of “beating” defense counsel in flea-market haggling. However, when possible, counsel should never say that the client does not or will not accept the prosecutor’s position, since this may simply redirect the prosecutor’s combativeness toward the client. The better formulation is a “What-worries-my-client-is- . . .” or an “I-just-don’t-think-I-can-sell-that-to-my-client-unless-. . .” approach or their equivalents.
Keeping on the prosecutor’s good side and avoiding clashes that may arouse the prosecutor’s ire at either the respondent or defense counsel is indispensable because, as a practical matter, the prosecutor ordinarily has the upper hand in the bargaining process. Although defense counsel may be able to appeal to some judges to lean on a prosecutor who stands adamant on an outrageous bargaining position (see § 14.05 supra), the prosecutor can usually get away with either stonewalling or playing very rough at the bargaining table. See, e.g., Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 561 (1977) (“there is no constitutional right to plea bargain; the prosecutor need not do so if he prefers to go to trial”); Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1, 9 n.5 (1987), citing Mabry v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 504 (1984) (same); Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978) (finding no constitutional objection to a prosecutor’s filing a recidivist charge, carrying a mandatory life sentence, for the admitted purpose of inducing the defendant to accept the prosecutor’s offer of a plea bargain involving a five-year sentencing recommendation); United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 377-80 (1982) (reaffirming Bordenkircher); Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794, 802 (1989) (same). The prosecutor is under heavy pressure to settle most cases in order to reduce the prosecution’s trial docket to manageable proportions, and that pressure is defense counsel’s greatest asset as long as counsel does nothing to give the prosecutor the impression that this case deserves “special treatment.” But if the prosecutor gets riled, s/he usually has sufficient resources to make any particular case unpleasantly “special” for the respondent.

§ 14.18 THE PLEA AGREEMENT WITH THE PROSECUTOR

In many jurisdictions, agreements between defense counsel and the prosecutor are not reduced to writing. The reputation and integrity of each attorney are the only guarantees that each will keep his or her word. In theory, of course, a guilty plea entered in consideration of an oral prosecutorial promise that is not fulfilled must be set aside. E.g., Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971); Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63 (1977). But proof of the facts necessary to bring the theory into play is not easy; postconviction litigation over broken plea bargains can consume years; and the relief, if any, that the client ultimately gets may be nothing more than the right to stand trial. Therefore, if counsel does not know the particular prosecutor, s/he should check out the prosecutor’s reputation by inquiry among knowledgeable members of the bar before a plea is entered.

Some States and localities have developed a practice under which the terms of plea bargains are set out in writing and filed with the court. See, e.g., People v. West, 3 Cal. 3d 595, 477 P.2d 409, 91 Cal. Rptr. 385 (1970). (This practice is often but not always incidental to the “conditional” plea bargaining procedure described in § 14.06(c)(2) supra.) Such a procedure for memorializing the plea agreement should ordinarily be followed if the prosecutor and the court can be persuaded to accept it. Defense counsel should always offer to draft the written instrument for the prosecutor’s review rather than vice versa, since the drafter of a document has the advantages of initiative, inertia, and a working familiarity with the draft during any negotiations that may be required to secure its approval or arrange for its revision into final form.
A plea agreement contemplating that the respondent will serve as an informer or a witness against accomplices or will otherwise assist the prosecution in any way other than the mere entry of a plea of guilty should be detailed and unambiguous regarding (1) the specific actions that the respondent is to take, (2) the investigations or cases in which (or the persons against whom) s/he is to take those actions, (3) the circumstances under which s/he is to take the actions, and (4) the duration of the respondent’s obligations to act. If s/he is to testify against accomplices, the agreement should specify precisely the proceedings in which s/he is required to testify, and should not leave unclear the scope of the respondent’s duties in the event that proceedings against an accomplice later take varying twists (for example, prosecution of the accomplice on multiple charges involving separate trials; reprosecution of the accomplice following a mistrial or the appellate reversal of an initial conviction). Unclarity about the respondent’s responsibilities in these eventualities must be avoided, since a respondent who subsequently disagrees with the prosecutor’s interpretation of his or her responsibilities does so at the risk that the entire plea bargain will be set aside and s/he will then be prosecuted for the most serious offenses originally charged, if the courts should happen to prefer the prosecutor’s interpretation to the respondent’s. Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987).

When writing up a plea agreement, counsel will also need to take particular care regarding another aspect of any commitment made by the respondent to divulge factual information that could incriminate him or her in either the present offense or other offenses. Almost invariably, in cases in which the respondent has agreed to divulge information or to testify against accomplices, the prosecution will want to delay the respondent’s sentencing until after the information has been provided or the testimony has been given. By holding the sentencing over the respondent’s head, the prosecutor guarantees compliance on the part of the respondent. See § 14.25 infra. Defense counsel must be concerned, however, with ensuring that the information or testimony will not be used against the respondent subsequently if, for any reason, the plea agreement falls apart. In theory, in many jurisdictions incriminating statements made by the accused or defense counsel to the prosecutor during plea negotiations are inadmissible as prosecution evidence if the negotiation fails. See, e.g., Fed. Rule Evid. 410; Minn. Rule Evid. 410; § 21.6 infra. But slip-ups can occur that remove some statements from the protection of this rule, so counsel should include explicit inadmissibility provisions in any plea agreement. And counsel should be careful to advise the client not to communicate personally with the prosecutor or the court during the course of the negotiations. See United States v. Bauzo-Santiago, 867 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2017).

Language such as the following should be included in the written agreement:

The parties hereby agree that any statements, testimony, evidence, information, or leads of any sort that:

(a) are capable of incriminating the respondent in the present offense or any other offense; and that

419
(b) have been or are now or hereafter given by the respondent or the respondent’s attorney to any of the following entities or individuals during the negotiation of this plea agreement or following its negotiation but before the agreement is fully executed by the respondent’s sentencing:

(i) the prosecutor or any other prosecuting authority of any jurisdiction;
(ii) any police or criminal investigating authority of any jurisdiction;
(iii) any law enforcement authority of any jurisdiction;
(iv) any court of any jurisdiction;
(v) any probation department or other agency of any such court;
(vi) any agent or successor of any entity designated in items (i) through (v), are expressly understood to have been given in consideration of this agreement and shall not be used against the respondent in any way, directly or derivatively, by or before any entity or individual designated in items (i) through (vi), except:

(1) with the respondent’s express consent, in the course of proceedings undertaken to secure the respondent’s conviction and sentencing pursuant to this plea agreement; or

(2) for the sole purpose of upholding and enforcing that conviction and sentencing after they have been obtained according to the terms of this plea agreement and so long as neither of them has been vacated.

In no event shall any such statements, testimony, evidence, information, or leads be used against the respondent in connection with any delinquency or criminal charge other than the charge[s] to which the respondent is presently agreeing to plead guilty.

Unless an agreement of this sort has been made with the prosecutor, counsel ordinarily should not divulge, or permit the respondent to divulge, any incriminating information to anyone during, or after, plea bargaining. See Hutto v. Ross, 429 U.S. 28 (1976) (per curiam).

If counsel is unable to obtain such an agreement but counsel and the client conclude that a guilty plea with a cooperation condition is nonetheless necessary or advisable, and if counsel is worried that the prosecutor may not live up to his or her end of the bargain after the respondent’s testimony against accomplices has been given, then counsel should try to talk the prosecutor into going ahead with sentencing promptly after the guilty plea rather than delaying the sentencing until the respondent has testified. Counsel may urge that the respondent has no love for the accomplices and can be counted on to testify against them without the coercion applied by keeping the respondent’s own sentencing pending. Counsel may point out that the respondent will be more impeachable as a prosecution witness if those charges are still pending than if they have already been disposed of; and that even after sentencing, the sentence and the plea bargain are subject to rescission at the prosecutor’s option if the respondent reneges on his or her promise to testify. See Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. at 8-12. If the prosecutor is adamant about delaying the sentencing, counsel should suggest alternative means of ameliorating the prejudice to the respondent. For example, if the respondent is in custody, counsel can suggest that the prosecutor join in a motion to release the respondent pending the delayed sentencing.

If a memorandum reciting the terms of the plea agreement is not filed with the court, counsel should make such a memorandum for his or her own files. A contemporaneous, detailed memo will enhance counsel’s credibility if it ever becomes necessary for counsel to establish what was and was not agreed upon as the basis for the plea.

Part D. Counseling the Client

§ 14.19 ADVISING THE CLIENT WHETHER TO PLEAD GUILTY

In advising a client whether to accept or reject a plea bargain, counsel should ordinarily begin by explaining that the final decision is entirely the client’s and that counsel’s job is merely to give the client advice on the basis of counsel’s legal knowledge and experience in delinquency practice [and/or with the local juvenile court – and the particular judge who is handling the case – if counsel has such experience]. See §§ 2.03, 14.01 supra. (The narrower and more specific the basis upon which counsel can claim specialized insight the better. Clients may resent claims which make it sound as though what counsel is saying is simply that his or her judgment or analytic capability is superior to the client’s.) Counsel should note that although the client may wish to discuss the decision with his or her parents, the ultimate decision is up to the client to make on the basis of his or her own independent judgment. Since children, especially those who are incarcerated, tend to seek advice from peers, it is probably wise to add that no one other than the client himself or herself can assess his or her best interests, and that the client should be wary about taking advice from others who do not have the same interests that the client does and will not have to live with the client’s decision.

Counsel should then explain to the client all of the factors that militate for and against a plea, covering each of the considerations listed in §§ 14.04-14.12 supra that is relevant. Essentially, counsel will need to explain to the client:

1. The realistic probability of winning a favorable outcome at trial, with a full explanation of the comparative strengths of the cases for the prosecution and the defense, as well as extraneous factors that might influence the result. (See § 14.04 supra.)

2. Any realistic probability that the judge might penalize the respondent at sentencing because the respondent opted in favor of a trial instead of a guilty plea. (See § 14.05 supra.)
3. The sentencing advantages that counsel expects or predicts the respondent will obtain through a guilty plea, including the specific terms of any agreement that counsel has reached with the prosecutor. Counsel should inform the client of the maximum sentence that s/he can receive (a) if s/he pleads guilty and if, alternatively, (b) s/he is convicted after a trial, and should give the client counsel’s best estimate of the sentence that the client will actually receive on each hypothesis, making clear the limits of counsel’s ability to predict what the judge will do. (See § 14.06 supra.)

4. The risks of collateral consequences that might flow from a guilty plea and, alternatively, from conviction after a trial. (See § 14.07 supra.)

5. If the case involves particularly egregious facts or a highly sympathetic complainant, the risk that the judge’s hearing those facts or seeing that complainant at trial would prejudice the judge against the respondent at sentencing. (See § 14.08 supra.)

6. In jurisdictions that have more than one juvenile court judge, the prospects of using a guilty plea to steer the case before a favorable judge for sentencing. (See § 14.09 supra.)

7. Any other special aspects of the case or the respondent that might cause a guilty plea to be particularly advantageous or detrimental. (See §§ 14.10-14.12 supra.)

In discussing all of these complex matters, counsel must take pains to phrase the explanations in language that will be comprehensible to the client. Counsel should periodically check with the client to make sure that the client is, in fact, understanding counsel’s explanations.

One of the most difficult decisions for a defense attorney to make is whether to employ the lawyer’s considerable persuasive powers to influence the client’s choice between a guilty plea and a trial. This is a particularly sensitive issue in handling juvenile cases, since juveniles are unlikely to have either the knowledge about the legal system or the strength of will to resist the lawyer’s persuasion. Counsel also should take into account that social scientific studies suggest that adolescents are more likely than adults to agree to plead guilty in cases in which the accused is actually innocent. See Rebecca K. Helm, Valerie F. Reyna, Allison A. Franz & Rachel Z. Novick, Too Young to Plead? Risk, Rationality, and Plea Bargaining’s Innocence Problem in Adolescents, 24:2 PSYCHOLOGY, PUBLIC POLICY, AND LAW 180 (2018). The best rule of thumb is to use persuasion only when the cost-benefit analysis clearly and unequivocally points to a certain result, and otherwise to restrict one’s role to furnishing the client with the information (including counsel’s objective predictions of alternative outcomes) necessary for the client to make a fully informed, independent decision.

The client should be given adequate time to think about the decision. For this reason it is often advisable to meet with the client to discuss the plea several days before the decision must be conveyed to the prosecutor.

§ 14.20 DISCUSSING THE GUILTY PLEA WITH THE CLIENT’S PARENT

It is almost always advisable for counsel to discuss the guilty plea with the client’s parent as well as with the client. In some jurisdictions such a discussion with the parent is required if the child is going to plead guilty, because the statutes call for a judicial colloquy with the parent to ensure that the parent approves of the child’s entry of a guilty plea. Even in jurisdictions that do not have a statutory requirement of parental involvement, consultation with the parent is advisable because parents usually will exert some influence over the child’s decision.

It is crucial that counsel first meet with the client alone, to ensure that the client can make a tentative initial decision apart from his or her parent. Conversely, it is extremely important that counsel’s session with the parent be attended by the client, so that the attorney’s rapport with the client is not undermined by the client’s fears that the attorney has relayed secret information to the parent. Maintenance of rapport with the client also calls for an explanation to the client, prior to the meeting with the parent, of why it is necessary to explain the plea to the parent, as well as an assurance that anything the client told counsel in confidence will not be repeated to the parent.

In explaining the guilty plea option to the parent, counsel should repeat the analysis of considerations that counsel covered in the discussion with the client. See § 14.19 supra. Counsel should stress to the parent that the criminal justice system demands that the ultimate decision be made by the client and not by the parent.

§ 14.21 MAKING A RECORD OF THE ADVICE GIVEN TO THE CLIENT AND THE PARENT

It is one of the unhappy realities of criminal practice that defense attorneys need to take certain precautions to guard against later accusations of ineffectiveness or misconduct. Adult criminal defendants, faced with lengthy prison sentences occasionally resort to unwarranted accusations of ineffectiveness or misconduct on the part of their lawyers as a last-ditch effort to overturn their convictions. These problems arise far less frequently in juvenile court than in adult court, in part because juvenile sentences are much shorter than adult sentences and in part because juveniles usually lack the sophistication to dream up such ploys.

Among the most common claims of ineffectiveness or misconduct of defense counsel are allegations that counsel coerced the client to plead guilty or gave the client inadequate advice concerning the significance and consequences of the plea or concerning the client’s rights. If counsel wishes to guard against the risk of these attacks, counsel should make file notes of all conversations with the client and the client’s parent leading up to the client’s decision to plead guilty. This record should reflect that counsel gave the client and the parent all of the explanations and advice described in §§ 14.19-14.20 supra. The file record should also reflect when it was that the client communicated his or her decision to counsel, what that decision was, and that counsel immediately inquired whether the client clearly understood that the decision had to be the client’s own and not the lawyer’s or the parent’s.

§ 14.22 SPECIAL PROBLEMS IN COUNSELING THE CLIENT WHETHER TO PLEAD GUILTY

§ 14.22(a) The Guilty Plea and the “Innocent” Client

Views differ on whether a lawyer may properly advise (or even permit) a guilty plea by a client who protests his or her innocence. Fortunately, the moral problem arises infrequently. If the case is such that a guilty plea is advised, the client probably (although not invariably) is guilty; and if counsel discusses the evidence critically with the client and subjects the client to the sort of cross-examination that in every case will be necessary to prepare adequately for trial (see §§ 5.12, 10.09(c)-(d), 10.10 supra), the client will usually admit guilt.

Should the client continue to assert innocence, counsel should consider the feasibility and desirability of a plea entered in accordance with North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970), known in many jurisdictions as an “Alford plea.” In Alford, the Court held that “an express admission of guilt . . . is not a constitutional requisite to the imposition of criminal penalty [sic]” id. at 37, and therefore that a plea of guilty may constitutionally be accepted from a defendant who protests his or her innocence, as long as (i) the “defendant intelligently concludes that his interests require entry of a guilty plea” and (ii) “the record before the judge contains strong evidence of actual guilt.” Id. In the wake of Alford, several jurisdictions have adopted procedures permitting adult defendants and juvenile respondents to plead guilty without an admission of guilt, provided that the defendant/respondent concedes on the record that the prosecution’s evidence is sufficient to support a guilty verdict and that the defendant/respondent is therefore entering a plea of guilty as a tactical choice. See, e.g., In re Alonzo J., 58 Cal. 4th 924, 927, 931-34, 939, 320 P.3d 1127, 1128, 1131-33, 1136, 169 Cal. Rptr. 3d 661, 662, 665-68, 672 (2014) (“no contest” plea can be entered in a delinquency proceeding “subject to the approval of the court,” and will “establish[ ] the truth of the petition’s allegations” and “thereby dispense[e] with the need for a contested jurisdictional hearing,” just as would an admission; a “no contest” plea, like an admission, requires “the consent of the child’s attorney”). However, Alford pleas are not accepted in all jurisdictions, and, even in jurisdictions that permit such pleas, some judges will not accept a guilty plea without an admission of guilt. But cf. State v. Beasley, 152 Ohio St. 3d 470, 472-73, 97 N.E.3d 474, 476-77 (2018) (although local rules give trial judges the “discretion to accept or reject a no-contest plea,” the trial court in this case abused its discretion by employing “a blanket policy of not accepting no-contest pleas”). See generally Peg Schultz, Note, The Alford Plea in Juvenile Court, 32 OHIO N. U. L. REV. 187 (2006).

If Alford pleas are permitted in counsel’s jurisdiction and are accepted by the judge presiding over the case, then counsel will need to make two final decisions before advising the client to enter an Alford plea. The first of these is a tactical decision whether the nature or tone of an Alford plea would vitiate whatever benefits counsel hopes to gain for the client through the entry of a guilty plea. Judges who view a full confession of guilt as “the first step toward rehabilitation” are unlikely to give substantial credit for an Alford plea. Moreover, whatever sentence-related benefits the client would receive from the plea may ultimately be diminished or even lost altogether if admission of the crime and an expression of remorse are necessary in order to qualify for a community treatment program that is a condition of probation (e.g., a sex offender treatment program that requires an admission of guilt as a prerequisite for participation) or in order to eventually qualify for release from placement in a juvenile correctional facility. See Carroll v. Commonwealth, 54 Va. App. 730, 733, 742-49, 682 S.E.2d 92, 93, 98-101 (2009) (upholding the trial court’s finding that the defendant, who had pled guilty with an Alford plea, “violated the conditions of his probation by refusing to admit that he committed the crime charged during court-ordered sex offender treatment”); In the Matter of Silmon v. Travis, 95 N.Y.2d 470, 474, 477, 741 N.E.2d 501, 503, 505, 718 N.Y.S.2d 704, 706, 708 (2000) (rejecting a challenge to the Parole Board’s denial of parole to a defendant, whose conviction was by means of an Alford plea, on the ground that he has never “accept[ed] responsibility for the crime”). See also McKune v. Lile, 536 U.S. 24, 29, 31, 43-45 (2002) (holding that the adverse consequences that a state prisoner suffered – denial of visitation rights and other privileges, and transfer to a maximum-security unit – as a result of refusing to participate in a sex offender treatment program, which required that he “admit having committed the crime for which he is being treated,” were not so severe as to violate the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination); People v. Garcia, 2 Cal. 5th 792, 798-99, 391 P.3d 1153, 1156, 216 Cal. Rptr. 3d 75, 78-79 (2017) (rejecting the defendant’s Fifth Amendment challenge to a state statute that “requires a convicted sex offender, as a condition of probation, to waive ‘any privilege against self-incrimination’ and to participate ‘in polygraph examinations, which shall be part of the sex offender management program’”; the court states that “neither the fact that . . . [the defendant] was compelled to respond nor the fact that his responses were being monitored by a polygraph offends the Fifth Amendment” because “we deem his responses compelled within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment” and therefore “they cannot lawfully be used against him in a criminal proceeding” and “pose no risk of incrimination”). See also §§ 19.06, 38.05(a), 38.16(b), 38.26 infra.

The second decision facing counsel is a question of conscience: whether to take advantage of the Alford procedure and urge the client to enter a guilty plea notwithstanding the client’s emphatic protestations of innocence. The fact that the Alford procedure is not unconstitutional does not mean that counsel is morally free to press it on a client. A defense attorney can reasonably adopt the position that s/he should urge a client to follow the Alford procedure only if the client’s guilt is clear – that is, if counsel concludes that the client’s denials, however fervid, are face-saving or self-deluded – and if the tactical advantages of the plea are equally clear.

§ 14.22(b) Clients Who Are Unrealistic About the Chances of Winning at Trial

Counsel will sometimes encounter a client who unrealistically believes that s/he will win at trial notwithstanding counsel’s best explanation of the reasons why conviction is a virtual certainty. The first step in convincing the client of the realities of the situation should be to review with the client all of the written statements that counsel or counsel’s investigator has taken from prosecution witnesses (see § 8.12 supra) and all of the other prosecution evidence known to counsel, in its most convincing form (graphic photos, highlighted lab reports, and so forth). If this fails to convince the client, then counsel should consider conducting a moot court version of the trial, including the respondent’s direct and cross-examination, to show the respondent the precise manner in which the evidence would emerge at trial. See §§ 5.12, 10.09, 10.10 supra.

§ 14.23 PREPARING THE CLIENT FOR THE PLEA COLLOQUY

The client who is pleading guilty must be informed in advance, and in considerable detail, what to expect in court at the hearing in which the client will enter the plea. (Hereafter, this proceeding will be referred to as the “plea hearing,” and the interchange between the judge and parties at the hearing will be referred to as the “plea colloquy.”) This preparation has three functions. First, it helps to set the client at ease, so that s/he will be less traumatized by the experience and will make a better impression in court. Second, it helps to reduce the likelihood that the client will say something that precludes the judge from finding that all of the criteria for a “knowing, intelligent, and voluntary” plea have been satisfied. Finally, it guards against the client’s mentioning aggravating facts about the offense that need not be stated.

The jurisdictions vary substantially in regard to the formality of the plea colloquy and the extent to which judges insist upon documenting that the constitutional requirements for a voluntary plea (set forth in § 14.26(c) infra) are satisfied. As juvenile court becomes increasingly formalized, the judges are more commonly adhering to the ritual used in taking guilty pleas in adult criminal court. The following sections on preparing the client and his or her parent for the colloquy are predicated on the assumption that the judge will follow this ritual. If, however, counsel is practicing in a jurisdiction that still follows informal plea procedures, counsel will need to familiarize himself or herself with those procedures and prepare the client and his or her parent accordingly.

§ 14.23(a) Preparing the Client for the Colloquy on Waivers of Rights and Comprehension of Potential Sentences

In conducting the colloquy in which the respondent is questioned about his or her waiver of the right to trial and ancillary rights, judges almost invariably employ legal terminology that is far too complex to be understood by young, poorly educated juvenile respondents. For this reason, it is crucial that counsel, in a preparatory session with the client, both recite the questions in the form in which they will be asked in court and explain the meaning of each of the terms that will be used by the judge.

Although the language used in accepting guilty pleas varies among jurisdictions and among judges within the same jurisdiction, some or all of the following explanations may prove useful in preparing clients for the entry of a guilty plea:

The first thing that’s going to happen in the hearing is that I will explain to the judge what exactly you’re pleading guilty to, and what deals the prosecutor has agreed to.
It’s important that you listen carefully to what I say in court, because the judge will ask you if you heard what I said and if you agree that what I said is correct. The judge may also ask you to repeat to him/her what the charge is that you’re pleading guilty to. If s/he does, what will you say?

Then, the judge is going to turn to you and ask you many questions to make sure that you understand what a trial is and what a plea of guilty is. What the judge is trying to make sure of is that you understand what a trial is and that you understand that by pleading guilty, you’re giving up your chance to have a trial.

Do you know what a trial is? [If the client says yes, ask the client to describe a trial, so that counsel can ensure that the client is not merely acquiescing in order to avoid seeming ignorant or uncooperative; if the client says no, ask the client if s/he has ever seen a trial on television or in the movies, referring to specific court-related programs, and then use the programs to explain the nature of trials.]

The judge is going to ask you if you understand that by pleading guilty, you’re waiving your right to a trial. The word “waive” means to “give up.” So what the judge is asking is whether you understand that you have a choice of either having a trial or pleading guilty; if you want to plead guilty, you give up your chance to have a trial. Are you sure that’s what you want to do? So, what will you say when the judge asks you “Do you understand that by pleading guilty, you are waiving your right to a trial?”

The next thing the judge is going to do is to make sure that you know all the things that are part of a trial. That’s again to make sure that you understand what it is that you’re giving up when you give up a trial and plead guilty instead.

So, the judge will ask you first if you understand that in a trial, the prosecutor has the burden of proving you guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. What that means is that in a trial, the prosecutor would have to put on very strong evidence in order to prove that you’re guilty of the crime they have charged you with. The prosecutor would have to put on enough convincing evidence to show the judge that there is no reason for doubting that you’re guilty of the crime. If the prosecutor did not put on enough evidence to convince the judge that you committed the crime, then the judge would find you “not guilty.”

Then the judge will ask you whether you understand that in a trial, the prosecutor would present witnesses to prove your guilt, and that your lawyer would have an opportunity to cross-examine those witnesses. What this means is that in a trial, the prosecutor would bring in witnesses to tell their side of the story. [Use the actual witnesses’ names and facts of the case to illustrate.] I, as your lawyer, could ask the witnesses questions and quiz the witnesses in order to show that you did not do what they are saying you did. I could try to show, for example, that the witness was confused about what happened or that the witness is not telling the truth.

The judge will ask you if you understand that in a trial, you can present witnesses on your behalf as well. That means that in a trial, we could bring in witnesses for your side to tell what happened.

Then the judge will ask you whether you understand that in a trial, you would have the opportunity to take the witness stand but that no adverse inferences could be drawn from your failure to testify. What all of this means is that in a trial, you could get on the witness stand, just like any other witness, and tell what happened, but that nobody could force you to get up on the stand and talk about what happened. If you decided not to take the stand, a judge could not hold that against you. A judge would not be allowed to decide that because you kept quiet, you must be guilty.

The judge will also ask you if you understand that by pleading guilty, you are waiving the right to appeal the decision of the trial court, except in the event of an illegal disposition. When people have trials, if the judge makes a mistake during the trial, then the lawyer who’s defending the juvenile can go to a more powerful court and ask those judges to correct the mistake. If the judges in that higher court decide that the judge in the trial did make a mistake, then they can arrange for a new trial. But by giving up the right to trial and pleading guilty instead, you’re also giving up your right to appeal any mistakes that might have happened in the trial. Of course, you can still appeal if the judge makes a mistake in the way s/he takes the plea or in the way s/he sentences you.

Now, all of those things that I just explained to you are the things that are part of a trial. By pleading guilty, you’re saying that you don’t want a trial and so you don’t want any of those things that go along with a trial. Do you understand that?

The judge is also going to ask you whether you understand the maximum sentence you could receive for the charge that you’re pleading guilty to. “Maximum sentence” means the most you could get as the punishment for this crime that you’re pleading guilty to. The maximum sentence is __________. That doesn’t mean that that’s the sentence that you will get. It’s just that the judge has to make sure that you know the most you could get. Now, if the judge asks you to tell him/her what the maximum sentence you could get is, what will you tell him/her?

After the judge has explained all that to you, s/he will ask you if anyone has promised you anything to get you to plead guilty. Now, as you know, the prosecutor has promised that s/he will __________, and I’m going to tell the judge that. The judge will then ask you whether “any other promises” have been made. What the judge is really asking is whether anyone promised you that the judge would give you a light sentence. You might have noticed that I’ve never promised you what sentence the judge will give you. That’s because I’m not allowed to make any promises about what the judge will do. [If the prosecutor agreed, as part of the plea, to support a certain sentence: “The prosecutor has said that s/he would help us try to get the judge to give you a sentence of __________; but the prosecutor also isn’t allowed to make any promises about what the judge will do.”] So, when the judge asks you if “any promises have been made,” the judge is trying to make sure that neither I nor the prosecutor nor anyone else made any promises about what the judge is going to do. What will you say when the judge asks you if any promises have been made to get you to plead guilty?

Then, the judge will ask you whether any threats have been made to get you to plead guilty. What the judge is asking is whether I or anybody else threatened you in order to force you to plead guilty. What will you say when the judge asks you about that?

The judge also will ask you whether you talked with your lawyer, me, about what you’re doing today. What the judge is asking is whether we talked about the guilty plea, and whether I explained the things that I’m explaining to you right now. The judge is just trying to make sure that I did explain all these things to you. So, if the judge asks you if you talked with your lawyer about the guilty plea, what will you say?

[In jurisdictions that require the judge to engage in a colloquy with the parent of the respondent, or in cases in which the judge presiding over the plea has a practice of consulting the parent: “The judge also may ask you if you talked with your parent(s) about the plea. The judge always asks a juvenile’s parent(s) whether she/he/they think that this guilty plea is a good idea. For that reason, I’m going to have to talk to your parent(s) about it. When I do talk to them about it, I’d like you to be there so that you can hear everything I tell them, unless you don’t feel comfortable being there when I talk to them. Also, if you would rather talk to her/him/them about it first, that’s fine. Do you want to talk to your parent(s) about it alone before I do?”]

If there is any significant possibility that the parent may not be present at the plea hearing, additional preparation of the respondent for that contingency may be required. See § 14.26(a) infra.

§ 14.23(b) Preparing the Client for the Admission of Guilt

There are some clients who will admit guilt to their lawyers and will agree to a plea of guilty when speaking with their lawyers but who never really accept the notion of their guilt as anything but a highly private affair – a secret between themselves and counsel – not for public announcement. Thus when the judge questions them about their version of the offense, they deny guilt. This, of course, will prove embarrassing to all concerned, and it may well cause the judge to refuse to take the guilty plea. Avoidance of the situation is possible if counsel advises the client before the plea hearing that a public admission of guilt in court will be required.

Judges vary substantially in the language that they use in asking the client to admit or deny guilt. It is extremely useful to learn the formulations used by the specific judge who will be presiding at the plea colloquy, so that the client can be prepped with the right code-words.

Some judges turn to the client and ask a question like: “Tell me what it is that you did on [date of the crime].” Quite obviously, a client who has not been adequately prepared would be at a loss to know what to say in response to this request. Counsel should explain to the client that the judge is seeking a brief recitation of facts that contains each of the specific details that the prosecutor would have to prove in order to convict the client of the charge to which the respondent is pleading guilty. Counsel should then listen to the client’s recitation to ensure that it does, in fact, cover each of the requisite elements of the crime.

Some clients believe that their answers must be restricted to the precise questions asked by the judge and that they are therefore precluded from making any additional statements about their remorse for committing the crime. It is important to correct that misconception, since, in fact, judges seem to be particularly interested in hearing children who admit guilt also express their contrition. Accordingly, counsel should inform the respondent that if s/he wishes to say that s/he is sorry or that s/he has learned a lesson, it is entirely appropriate to do so.

Some judges, rather than eliciting the facts from the respondent, ask the prosecutor to state the facts for the record, and then turn to the respondent and ask him or her whether those facts are correct. The respondent should be prepped to listen carefully to the prosecutor’s recitation. In addition, counsel should advise the respondent that if the prosecutor goes beyond the facts essential for the elements of the charge to which the respondent is pleading and states additional aggravating circumstances of the offense, counsel will inform the judge that those acts are not acts which the respondent will be admitting.

§ 14.23(c) Advising the Client of the Risk of Detention Pending Sentencing

Upon the entry of a guilty plea, the judge typically has the option of either conducting the disposition hearing immediately or continuing the hearing to another date and ordering the probation department to prepare a pre-sentence report to aid the judge at disposition. See § 38.04(a) infra for discussion of the pre-sentence report. In most jurisdictions, if the judge decides to continue the hearing, the judge has the prerogative of reconsidering the respondent’s detention status pending disposition. The respondent’s pretrial detention status was, after all, set at arraignment, at a time when the judge had to presume the respondent’s innocence. After the plea, however, the judge is free to consider the respondent’s conceded guilt as a factor affecting his or her detention status pending disposition. In most jurisdictions the usual practice in cases in which the client has been released before trial is simply to maintain that release status pending disposition. However, in jurisdictions in which judges do give serious consideration to remanding a respondent following the entry of a plea, defense counsel will have to prepare the client for that possibility. Counseling the client on this issue requires that the attorney tread a fine line. It is necessary to warn the client of the hazard (in part because the law dictates that the client must be informed of all of the possible consequences of a guilty plea and in part as a courtesy so that the client will not be taken unawares), but counsel also wants to avoid frightening the client unnecessarily and causing him or her undue anxiety. In warning the client of the risk, counsel should accurately describe the probability of detention, based on counsel’s knowledge of the judge and the facts of the case. Counsel ought to inform the client of the maximum duration of the detention period, should detention be ordered. (In most jurisdictions the juvenile court statute or local practice establishes a limit, such as two weeks, for detention pending disposition. See §37.01 infra.) Counsel should also indicate the actual length of time that the respondent is likely to spend in detention prior to the disposition hearing, if that is less than the maximum and is reasonably predictable.

§ 14.23(d) Counseling the Client About Appearance and Demeanor at a Plea Hearing

One of the most important aspects of the process of preparing a client for the plea hearing is counseling the client about appearance and demeanor at the hearing. The judge’s sentencing determination and also the intermediate decision whether to detain the respondent pending disposition will turn in large part on the judge’s assessment of the respondent’s character, and that assessment can be significantly affected by the respondent’s appearance and demeanor. The respondent should be advised to dress well. When giving this advice, counsel should avoid seeming unduly fastidious (an inevitable risk when an adult advises an adolescent to dress nicely) by explaining precisely why appearance is important and drawing on counsel’s experiences to describe the impact that the respondent’s appearance can have on the judge.

With respect to demeanor, counsel should explain to the client that it is important to speak loudly and clearly and to seem forthright. In addition, assuming that the client is remorseful, s/he should be advised to appear apologetic and not truculent.

If the prosecutor has not agreed to waive the preparation of a pre-sentence report or if the judge may order one despite the prosecutor’s waiver (see § 14.06(c)(1) supra), counsel must also prepare the client for interviewing by the probation officer who will write the report. This important preparation is discussed in § 38.05(a) infra. It had best be postponed until after the plea hearing if that is practicable in the light of the practices of the probation office with regard to the time when it begins its pre-sentence workups and in the light of the respondent’s detention status and counsel’s own calendar. Before the plea hearing there will be too much for the client to absorb and remember in preparation for the hearing itself. But if there is any real prospect that the client’s pre-sentence interviewing by the probation office will begin too soon after the plea hearing for counsel to prepare the client thoroughly for the interviewing in the wake of the hearing, then it must be done before the hearing.

§ 14.24 PREPARING THE PARENT FOR THE PLEA HEARING
In jurisdictions in which the judge must obtain the parent’s consent to the entry of the plea (or where, despite the absence of any statutory requirement, judges make it a practice to obtain parental consent), counsel must of course prepare the parent for the questions that will be asked of him or her in the plea colloquy. The parent may be asked some or all of the following questions:

1. Did you have an opportunity to consult with your child concerning his/her decision to enter the plea of guilty?

2. Did you have an opportunity to consult with your child’s attorney concerning the decision to enter the plea of guilty?

3. Did you hear me explain to your child the rights that s/he is waiving as a result of this guilty plea? Do you understand that s/he is waiving those rights?

4. Did you hear me explain to your child the maximum sentence that s/he could receive as a result of this plea? Do you understand that s/he could receive that sentence?

5. Do you agree with your child’s decision to enter the guilty plea?

In addition to reviewing these questions and appropriate answers with the parent, counsel should verify that the parent is willing to have the child remain in the home pending sentencing. Some judges will ask, at the conclusion of the hearing, whether the parent is willing to keep the child at home.

Finally, since some judges question the parent about the child’s conduct at home, counsel will need to discuss the child’s behavior with the parent. Counsel needs to be forewarned of any problems that might lead the judge to consider detaining the child pending sentencing.

Part E. The Plea Hearing

§ 14.25 SCHEDULING THE PLEA HEARING

As explained in § 14.09 supra, in jurisdictions with more than one juvenile court judge, it may be possible to use the scheduling of the plea hearing to steer the case before a judge who will be lenient at sentencing. Quite obviously, counsel should take advantage of such opportunities since the identity of the sentencing judge frequently will control the severity of the sentence.

Even in cases in which the timing of the plea hearing will not affect the identity of the sentencing judge, counsel may need to give careful consideration to the scheduling of the hearing. In cases in which the respondent was released at arraignment, counsel will usually wish to delay the plea as long as possible in order to give the respondent more time to amass a record of doing well in the community. Delay is also advisable whenever counsel knows that an arrest for another charge is imminent, so that counsel can dispose of the upcoming charge in the same plea hearing. See § 14.15 supra. On the other hand, if the respondent has been detained pending trial, counsel will want to expedite the plea hearing (and possibly also the sentencing): in the event of post-plea diversion, dismissal, release pending disposition, or a disposition of probation, this effectuates the respondent’s release from detention as quickly as possible; and in many jurisdictions where pre-adjudication or pre-sentence detention is not credited toward the service of a sentence, this enables a respondent who receives a sentence of incarceration to begin serving that sentence as soon as possible. See § 14.11 supra. Finally, there may be other reasons that the respondent may want an expedited plea hearing: For example, the respondent may be suffering considerable anxiety about the charge hanging over his or her head and may wish to get it over with; or the respondent’s entry into a certain desirable program or into the military may be awaiting the resolution of the pending charge.

Finally, there will be scheduling issues whenever the plea agreement includes a commitment by the respondent to testify as a prosecution witness against a juvenile co-respondent or adult co-perpetrator. As mentioned in § 14.18 supra, prosecutors typically will wish to schedule the plea in such a case prior to the respondent’s testifying for the State and will wish to delay sentencing until after the testimony has been completed. If this procedure does not prejudice the respondent, there is no reason to oppose its use. Depending upon the facts of the case, however, delay of this sort could conceivably prejudice the respondent. If, for example, the respondent is detained and his or her release cannot be effected until the sentencing, then obviously a delay of the sentencing is very prejudicial. Similarly, if the end product of the plea and sentencing will be an outright dismissal of the charges, the respondent has a definite interest in advancing the sentencing date. Delay can also be detrimental in cases in which defense counsel fears that the prosecutor will not live up to his or her end of the bargain after the respondent’s testimony against accomplices has been given; written plea agreements such as the one described in § 14.18 supra will provide some security against this risk but are not always obtainable. In situations such as these, defense counsel is sometimes able to persuade the prosecutor that the respondent has no love for the accomplices and can be counted on to testify against them without the coercion applied by keeping the respondent’s own sentencing pending. Counsel can point out that the respondent will be more impeachable as a prosecution witness if those charges are still pending than if they have already been disposed of; and that even after sentencing, the sentence and the plea bargain are subject to rescission at the prosecutor’s option if the respondent reneges on his or her promise to testify. See Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987). If the prosecutor is adamant about delaying the disposition, counsel should suggest alternative means of ameliorating the prejudice to the respondent. For example, if the respondent is in detention, counsel can suggest that the prosecutor join in a motion to release the respondent pending the delayed disposition. Or if the respondent is awaiting dismissal of the charge in order to enter a program such as the Job Corps that requires resolution of all pending charges prior to entry, counsel can suggest a dismissal in the interests of justice (see Chapter 19) with a stipulation that the defense will not oppose reinstatement of the charge in the event that the respondent fails to fulfill the requirement of testifying for the prosecution.

§ 14.26 PROCEDURE AT THE PLEA HEARING

§ 14.26(a) Essential Parties

Obviously, the respondent and defense counsel must be present for the plea. In most jurisdictions the prosecutor also must be present to confirm the accuracy of defense counsel’s recitation of the terms of the plea agreement and to represent the State’s interests at the plea hearing. In some jurisdictions, however, judges have adopted a practice of accepting pleas even in the absence of the prosecutor, in cases in which the respondent will clearly be released pending sentencing or in which the prosecution has waived argument on the respondent’s detention status pending sentencing.

An important issue is whether the parent must be present in order for the guilty plea to be valid. In some jurisdictions the courts have held that the respondent has an absolute right to have a parent present, and absent the respondent’s knowing and intelligent waiver of that right, the plea may be invalid. See, e.g., In re Kim F., 109 A.D.2d 706, 487 N.Y.S.2d 31 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1985) (vacating a juvenile’s guilty plea in part because court failed to make reasonable efforts to arrange for the parent’s presence at the plea hearing and accordingly failed to comply with the obligation of advising the parent of the rights waived as a result of the guilty plea). In jurisdictions of this sort, defense counsel will need to deal with a parent’s failure to appear by preparing the respondent to engage in a colloquy waiving the parent’s presence on the record. In some jurisdictions – or in cases of very young children (9- or 10-year-olds) in other jurisdictions – the judge may be unwilling to accept the child’s waiver and inclined to continue the case to another date in order to secure the presence of the parent. In this situation if the defense has a need to move expeditiously (for example, if the respondent is detained, or if the respondent’s entry into a certain program is contingent upon the resolution of the charges), defense counsel should consider requesting that the court appoint a guardian ad litem to substitute for the parent at the plea hearing.

§ 14.26(b) Defense Counsel’s Preliminary Recitation; Putting the Plea Agreement on the Record

The judge will usually begin the plea hearing by asking defense counsel to declare whether or not the respondent intends to enter a guilty plea. This request is merely for the record in most instances; by now, the judge ordinarily will have been informed by the courtroom clerk that the case is being called for the purpose of entry of a guilty plea. The formulation used by judges to initiate the plea hearing varies among jurisdictions. In many jurisdictions, the standard formulation is a question, directed at defense counsel, asking whether the respondent has a “motion” or “application” s/he wishes to make. Defense counsel then is expected to reply: “The respondent wishes to withdraw his/her earlier denial of the Petition and enter an admission to
It is ordinarily advisable for defense counsel, at this juncture, to state on the record the precise terms of the plea agreement with the prosecutor. In the event that the prosecutor later fails to fulfill one of the conditions of the agreement, a motion to vacate the plea will be greatly facilitated if the record reflects the complete terms of the agreement. (It is sufficient for purposes of the record if the prosecutor merely acquiesces silently in defense counsel’s recitation of the terms of the agreement. However, in many jurisdictions, judges take the precautionary measure of asking the prosecutor on the record whether defense counsel has accurately recited the terms of the agreement.)

In deciding whether to put the agreement on the record, it is once again essential to know the practices of the individual judge presiding at the hearing. Some judges, particularly older judges, adhere to the once-dominant view that plea bargaining should be “a sub rosa process shrouded in secrecy and deliberately concealed by participating defendants, defense lawyers, prosecutors, and even judges.” Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63, 76 (1977). These judges will be loth to hear the terms of the plea agreement, and an attorney’s decision to forge ahead with a recitation of its terms runs the risk of incurring the judge’s anger against both counsel and the client. When appearing before such judges, counsel is well advised to obtain a written plea agreement from the prosecutor (see § 14.18 supra) but to retain it in counsel’s records rather than filing it with the court. Counsel can then rely on that document, in lieu of a recitation on the record, in the event that a disagreement about the terms of the plea bargain develops subsequently.

Similarly, in cases in which counsel has negotiated terms with the prosecutor that cannot be placed on the record, counsel should rely on a written plea agreement. For example, if counsel and the prosecutor have agreed to limit the facts of the offense that will be presented to the judge (see § 14.06(c)(3) supra), this agreement should be embodied in a written document signed by the prosecutor and preserved in counsel’s files.

In some jurisdictions a respondent cannot enter a plea of guilty to any offense that is not expressly charged in the Petition. Thus the respondent cannot plead guilty to a lesser included offense subsumed within one of the charges in the Petition unless the Petition is amended to include the lesser offense. In these jurisdictions counsel merely needs to arrange with the prosecutor to amend the Petition: One of the preliminary matters in the plea hearing will then be a motion by the prosecutor for leave to amend the Petition to include the count to which the respondent will plead guilty.

In many jurisdictions defense counsel will be expected to include in his or her preliminary recitation a declaration that s/he has advised the respondent of his or her rights. Depending on local practice, counsel may also be required to enumerate all of the rights s/he described to the respondent. Thereafter, even if counsel has fully related his or her discussions with the respondent and the respondent’s statements of willingness to waive each right, the judge must engage in a colloquy with the respondent and elicit waivers from the respondent on the record.

§ 14.26(c) The Plea Colloquy

Under Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969), and Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742 (1970), the acceptance of a guilty plea in a criminal or delinquency case requires a preliminary judicial inquiry into whether the defendant/respondent is knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waiving the right to trial, entering the guilty plea, and accepting the possible consequences that could stem from conviction on the plea. The judge must question the respondent in order to determine that the plea is voluntary and not the result of force or threats or of promises apart from the plea agreement. “The plea must be voluntary and knowing and if it was induced by promises, the essence of those promises must . . . in some way be made known.” Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257, 261-62 (1971).

In a number of jurisdictions the precise factors that must be covered in such a judicial inquiry are specified in the controlling statute, court rules, or caselaw. Generally, these factors include: the respondent’s comprehension of, and voluntary waiver of, the right to trial and all attendant rights, such as the presumption of innocence, the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses, the right to present a defense, the right to testify in one’s own behalf, and the right to appeal erroneous rulings at trial; the respondent’s comprehension of the possible sentencing consequences, including the maximum sentence that could be imposed, and any collateral consequences, such as revocation of the respondent’s current probation or parole; the existence of any promises or threats that might affect the voluntariness of the respondent’s decision to enter the guilty plea; and the adequacy of the respondent’s consultations with defense counsel regarding the plea. In some jurisdictions, the applicable statute, court rule, or caselaw requires that judges exercise particular caution to ensure that a juvenile comprehends the nature and possible consequences of a guilty plea. See, e.g., In the Matter of T.E.F., 359 N.C. 570, 575-76, 614 S.E.2d 296, 299 (2005) (“increased care must be taken to ensure complete understanding by juveniles regarding the consequences of admitting their guilt”: “Our courts have consistently recognized that ‘[t]he [S]tate has a greater duty to protect the rights of a respondent in a juvenile proceeding than in a criminal prosecution.’”).

In some jurisdictions the statute, court rule, or caselaw mandates that the judge must also inquire of the parent. Inquiries of the parent are usually directed at: whether the parent has consulted with his or her child concerning the plea that the child is entering; whether the parent has adequately consulted with defense counsel concerning the plea; whether the parent understands the rights that the child is waiving as a result of the plea and the possible consequences of the plea; and whether the parent believes that the plea is in the child’s best interest. In jurisdictions that call for such an inquiry of the parent, judges will usually add to the colloquy with the child a question about whether the child has adequately consulted with his or her parent.

Once the judge has established the requisite record of the respondent’s comprehension of his or her rights and voluntary waiver of those rights, the judge then will seek the respondent’s admission on the record that s/he committed the criminal acts to which s/he is pleading. In some jurisdictions the judge will ask the respondent to state the facts documenting all of the elements of the charge. See § 14.23(b) supra. Many judges will ask the prosecutor, and some judges will also ask defense counsel, at the conclusion of the respondent’s factual recitation, whether the attorney views the respondent’s factual recitation as demonstrating every element of the offense. Some judges use the somewhat different practice of asking the prosecutor to recite the facts and then inquiring of the respondent whether those facts are correct.

In cases involving “Alford pleas,” the judge will seek a statement from the respondent conceding that the prosecution’s evidence is sufficient to produce a guilty verdict. See § 14.22(a) supra. Judges taking an Alford plea will often ask the prosecutor and defense counsel whether they believe that the requirements for a valid Alford plea have been satisfied.

As explained in § 14.23 supra, juvenile court judges in several jurisdictions still follow the informal procedures tolerated prior to Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969). Notwithstanding the host of constitutional and statutory requirements of careful questioning of the respondent, these judges direct only a few perfunctory questions at the respondent and rely almost exclusively on defense counsel’s representations. In jurisdictions of this sort counsel must familiarize himself or herself with the idiosyncratic practices of the particular judge presiding over the case. In the event that the client subsequently wishes to mount appellate or collateral attacks on the validity of the plea (see §§ 14.30-14.31 infra), the Boykin violations usually will suffice to void it.

§ 14.26(d) Judicial Determination Whether To Proceed Directly to Disposition; Determination of the Respondent’s Detention Status Pending a Delayed Disposition

Upon the completion of the plea colloquy and the judge’s acceptance of the plea, the judge can either proceed directly to disposition or continue the disposition for a period of time to enable the probation department to prepare a pre-sentence report. In cases in which defense counsel has secured, as part of the plea agreement, a prosecutorial commitment to support a particular sentence, it is, of course, in the client’s interest to proceed directly to disposition. See § 14.06(c)(1) supra.

In cases in which the judge elects to continue the disposition for the purpose of obtaining a pre-sentence report, the judge must determine the detention status of the respondent pending disposition. As explained earlier, in most jurisdictions the judge will routinely allow a respondent already on release status to remain free pending disposition. See § 14.23(c) supra. However, the judge does have the power to detain a previously released respondent for the period of time pending disposition. See id. In addition, a judge can release a previously detained respondent upon the respondent’s entry of a guilty plea. See §§ 14.06(c)(3), 14.11 supra.

If the case is one in which the respondent was granted release status at arraignment and the jurisdiction is one in which judges give serious consideration to detaining previously released respondents pending disposition after a plea, the judge will usually turn to the prosecutor and ask whether s/he is seeking detention pending disposition. In cases of this sort it is obviously crucial for defense counsel to secure, as part of the plea agreement, a prosecutorial commitment to support continued release pending disposition or at least to remain mute on the issue of detention pending disposition. See § 14.06(c)(3) supra.

If the case is one in which the respondent was detained at arraignment, defense counsel should be prepared to argue for the respondent’s release pending disposition. The likelihood of prevailing on this argument will be improved immeasurably if counsel has secured prosecutorial support of pre-disposition release as part of the plea agreement. In addition, counsel’s position will be greatly strengthened if, prior to the plea hearing, counsel has managed to arrange for the respondent’s admission to an appropriate community-based program, so that counsel can argue that: (i) the respondent would be adequately supervised if released; and (ii) release for the period pending disposition would provide a good test of the respondent’s ability to do well with the aid of the community-based program and would thereby inform the court whether a community-based alternative is an appropriate disposition.

§ 14.27 COPING WITH A PLEA THAT BREAKS DOWN

In criminal and juvenile court parlance a plea that “breaks down” is a plea in which the answers of the adult defendant or juvenile respondent fail to satisfy the judge, and, as a result, the judge rejects the plea and sets the case down for trial. A plea can break down either because the respondent does not correctly answer the questions concerning his or her waivers of rights (for example, because the respondent manifests an inability to understand certain rights or says that s/he is unaware of the maximum sentence) or because the respondent’s recitation of facts fails to satisfy all of the elements of the offense (for example, because the respondent admits stabbing the complainant but asserts that the stabbing was in self-defense).

Most judges are tolerant of a juvenile respondent’s failure to understand a question in the plea colloquy and will give defense counsel every reasonable opportunity to correct a misunderstanding. For example, if defense counsel requests a moment to confer briefly with the respondent in court, or even a brief recess to confer with the respondent outside the courtroom, the request will ordinarily be granted. Usually, in a consultation of this sort, counsel will succeed in clearing up the client’s misunderstanding, and the plea colloquy can then continue. If, on the other hand, counsel is unable to clear up the misunderstanding and the respondent is adamant about the answer which s/he has given, then defense counsel has no choice but to terminate the plea hearing and set a trial date. In the event that the respondent subsequently changes his or her mind and wishes to plead guilty after all, counsel may be able to re-negotiate the original plea.
agreement with the prosecutor.

If a plea does break down irrevocably, counsel must take pains to ensure that the judge does not blame the respondent for wasting the court’s time on a plea hearing that turned out to be a fruitless endeavor. In most cases in which a plea breaks down, it is the result of defense counsel’s failure to prepare the client adequately by rehearsing every stage of the plea colloquy. If the problems can truthfully be attributed to defense counsel, counsel should let the judge know that it is counsel’s fault and not the client’s.

§ 14.28 PROCEDURE IN CASES IN WHICH THE PLEA WAS ACCEPTED AND THE CASE WAS ADJOURNED FOR A PRE-SENTENCE REPORT: PREPARING THE CLIENT AND THE PARENT FOR THE PROBATION INTERVIEW

If the judge adjourns the case to a new date for disposition and orders a pre-sentence report, then counsel will need to prepare the client and his or her parent for their meetings with the probation officer. The probation interview process and the steps counsel should take in preparing the client and parent for the interviews are discussed in § 38.05 infra.

Part F. Post-Conviction, Appellate, and Collateral Challenges to the Validity of the Guilty Plea

§ 14.29 MOTIONS TO WITHDRAW OR VACATE THE GUILTY PLEA

§ 14.29(a) Motion for Leave To Withdraw a Valid Guilty Plea

If the plea colloquy satisfied constitutional and state law standards and the guilty plea was valid, it may subsequently be withdrawn only by leave of court, in the court’s discretion, usually for good cause shown. For obvious reasons, leave is granted more freely prior to sentencing than after sentencing, whether or not the applicable rules explicitly so provide.

Judges differ considerably in their willingness to permit guilty pleas to be withdrawn. In multi-judge courts in which the judges rotate assignments from time to time, defense counsel should inquire of experienced lawyers concerning the respective judges’ attitudes, obtain the assignment schedule, and time the motion accordingly. (Of course, the motion should not, for this purpose, be delayed beyond any deadline set by local rules for a motion to withdraw, nor should it be delayed until sentencing if the respondent’s change of heart occurs before sentencing.)

The argument that an accused should be routinely permitted to withdraw a guilty plea before sentence, at least when neither the prosecutor nor the court has relied upon it to their disadvantage, has so far failed to command a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States (see Neely v. Pennsylvania, 411 U.S. 954 (1973) (opinion of Justice Douglas, dissenting from denial of certiorari); Dukes v. Warden, 406 U.S. 250 (1972)), and has been rejected by a substantial number of state high courts. See, e.g., Osborn v. State, 672 P.2d 777, 788 (Wyo. 1983) (“There is a general consensus that the withdrawal of a plea of guilty is not an absolute right and the right to do so is within the sound discretion of the trial court. . . . A presentencing withdrawal motion is measured by whether it would be fair and just to allow it. . . . The burden is on the defendant to establish good grounds for withdrawing his plea. . . . Most of the foregoing cited authority also set out the policy to be that withdrawal of a plea of guilty before sentencing should be freely allowed but, as also indicated, that policy is frequently qualified. It has been considered an abuse of discretion to not hold a hearing whereby a defendant may develop support of his reasons for wanting to change his guilty plea.”). Nevertheless, the argument is worth making as a matter of state and federal constitutional due process. “Identification of the specific dictates of due process generally requires consideration of three distinct factors: First, the private interest that will be affected by the official action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and finally, the Government’s interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail.” Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 335 (1976). See also §§ 11.03(a), 13.06(a) supra. “Several federal constitutional rights are involved in a waiver that takes place when a plea of guilty is entered in a state criminal trial. First, is the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment and applicable to the States by reason of the Fourteenth. . . . Second, is the right to trial by jury. . . . Third, is the right to confront one’s accusers.” Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238, 243 (1969). Unless some state interest is served by holding a respondent to a waiver of these basic rights, due process should forbid a State to insist on doing so.

In any event, a trial court’s refusal to permit a respondent to withdraw a guilty plea on timely motion before sentencing is assailable on appeal for abuse of discretion. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. McCall, 320 Pa. Super. 473, 467 A.2d 631 (1983). And if a respondent can demonstrate that trial judges have been exercising their discretion in an inexplicable pattern, denying leave to withdraw in some cases while granting it in others that present indistinguishable circumstances, the argument for finding an abuse of discretion will be a strong one. See Williams v. Georgia, 349 U.S. 375, 388-90 (1955).

A factor often considered by courts in determining whether to exercise their discretion in favor of permitting withdrawal of the plea is whether the respondent puts forth a credible assertion of innocence. Such an assertion of innocence will be treated as particularly compelling in cases in which the plea was an Alford plea (see § 14.22(a) supra), and the respondent therefore has never admitted guilt.

§ 14.29(b) Motion To Vacate an Invalid Guilty Plea

The preceding subsection assumed the validity of the plea. If the plea was arguably invalid, counsel can file a motion to vacate it. The motion can be filed either prior to or following sentencing. In some jurisdictions appellate review of defects in a guilty plea cannot be obtained.
without prior exhaustion of trial-level remedies, such as a motion to vacate the plea.

The grounds for vacating a guilty plea as invalid include:

2. The plea was not effective as a knowing and intelligent waiver of the right to trial because the respondent lacked a full understanding of the charge, e.g., Bradshaw v. Stumpf, 545 U.S. 175, 182-83 (2005) (dictum); United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622, 629 (2002) (dictum); Marshall v. Lonberger, 459 U.S. 422, 436 (1983) (dictum); Smith v. United States, 309 F.2d 165 (9th Cir. 1962), including all of the critical elements of the offense, see Henderson v. Morgan, 426 U.S. 637, 647 n.18 (1976); State in the Interests of K.M., 173 P.3d 1279, 1285 (Utah 2007) (“Without an adequate communication of the nature and elements of the offense that is the subject of the admission, the admission is presumptively not knowing and voluntary.”), and the possible penalty, Marvel v. United States, 380 U.S. 262 (1965); United States v. Johnson, 850 F.3d 515, 518, 522-23 (2d Cir. 2017); Chapin v. United States, 341 F.2d 900 (10th Cir. 1965); In the Matter of Melvin A., 216 A.D.2d 227, 227-28, 628 N.Y.S.2d 698, 699 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1995) (guilty plea colloquy was defective because, inter alia, the judge failed to advise the respondent of the possibility that a period of placement can be extended); cf. Lane v. Williams, 455 U.S. 624, 630 & n.9 (1982) (reserving the question whether and under what circumstances a failure to inform a defendant of a mandatory parole term will invalidate a guilty plea); Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52 (1985) (stating in dictum that a failure to inform a defendant that his eligibility for parole is restricted because of a prior conviction would not invalidate a guilty plea); United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. at 630 (“this Court has found that the Constitution, in respect to a defendant’s awareness of relevant circumstances, does not require complete knowledge of the relevant circumstances, but permits a court to accept a guilty plea, with its accompanying waiver of various constitutional rights, despite various forms of misapprehension under which a defendant might labor”); Libretti v. United States, 516 U.S. 29 (1995); United States v. Fisher, 711 F.3d 460, 462, 469-70 (4th Cir. 2013) (granting the defendant’s motion to vacate his guilty plea on the ground that “the law enforcement officer responsible for the investigation . . . [subsequently] admitted to having lied in his sworn affidavit that underpinned the search warrant for the defendant’s residence and vehicle, where evidence forming the basis of the charge to which the defendant pled guilty was found”: “the officer’s affirmative misrepresentation, which informed the defendant’s decision to plead guilty and tinged the entire proceeding, rendered the defendant’s plea involuntary and violated his due process rights”).
3. The judge who presided over the entry of the plea did not conduct an adequate inquiry into voluntariness and understanding on the record prior to accepting the plea. See McCarthy v. United States, 394 U.S. 459 (1969); Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969); United States v. Tien, 720 F.3d 464, 470 (2d Cir. 2013); Lejeune v. McLaughlin, 99 Ga. 546, 546-47, 789 S.E.2d 191, 192-93 (2016) (“This Court has, for many years now, held that for a plea to be constitutionally valid, a pleading defendant must be informed of his three ‘Boykin rights.’ . . . And, in . . . [2014] this Court [further] held that for a plea to be knowingly and voluntarily entered, a pleading defendant was required to know of his ‘essential constitutional protections,’ including his right against self-incrimination.”); People v. Johnson, 160 A.D.3d 516, 518, 76 N.Y.S.3d 18 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2018) (vacating the defendant’s guilty plea because the judge advised the defendant that “she faced an adult sentencing range of 5 to 25 years in State prison when, as a 15-year-old juvenile offender, she in fact faced a minimum sentence of one to three years and a maximum sentence of 3½ to 10 years in the custody of the Office of Children and Family Services”; “Defendant’s belief that she was avoiding a much greater risk than she actually was casts doubt on a finding that she had a clear understanding of her guilty plea.”).

4. The plea hearing was inadequate in some other respect, such as, for example, in jurisdictions in which the child has an absolute right to have a parent present at the plea, the parent was not present at the hearing, and the respondent did not effectively waive the parent’s presence. See § 14.26(a) supra.

5. The prosecutor failed to comply with promises made to the respondent as part of the plea agreement – or, in cases in which the judge participated in “conditional plea bargaining,” see § 14.06(c)(2) supra, the judge failed to comply with terms of the agreement. See Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971); Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63 (1977); United States v. King-Gore, 875 F.3d 1141 (D.C. Cir. 2017).

6. The respondent lacked the requisite mental competency to enter a plea of guilty. See, e.g., Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 400-01 (1993) (dictum); Taylor v. United States, 282 F.2d 16 (8th Cir. 1960). See also In re Matthew N., 216 Cal. App. 4th 1412, 1414-15, 1420-22, 157 Cal. Rptr. 3d 233, 235, 239-40 (2013) (granting the juvenile’s motion to withdraw his guilty plea on grounds of “developmental [in]competence” because of “the minor’s unusual immaturity for his age (as his mother and both psychologists attested) and his inability to comprehend the legal concepts involved in the trial process . . . (as both trial counsel and the competency report attested)”).

7. Defense counsel failed to provide the respondent with effective assistance of counsel in connection with the plea, see Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258
8. The court did not have jurisdiction over the offense.

9. The statute proscribing the offense to which the respondent pleaded guilty is (1973); Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52 (1985) (dictum); Brock-Miller v. United States, 887 F.3d 298, 308 (7th Cir. 2018) (“In the plea bargaining context, a reasonably competent lawyer must attempt to learn all of the relevant facts of the case, make an estimate of the likely sentence, and communicate the results of that analysis to the client before allowing the client to plead guilty”); Mahrt v. Beard, 849 F.3d 1164, 1170-71 (9th Cir. 2017) (dictum) (the rule of Tollett v. Henderson, supra, which allows a defendant to “‘attack the voluntary and intelligent character of the guilty plea’ based on pre-plea ineffective assistance of counsel,” applies not only to “ineffective assistance rendered [by a lawyer] when providing incompetent advice concerning the guilty plea itself” but also to “pre-plea ineffective assistance of counsel . . . [that] prevent[ed] . . . [the defendant] from making an informed choice whether to plead,” including “pre-plea ineffective assistance by failing to file a motion to suppress”); Johnson v. Uribe, 682 F.3d 1238 (9th Cir. 2012), as amended on denial of rehearing in 700 F.3d 413 (9th Cir. 2012); see also People v. Dodson, 30 N.Y.3d 1041, 1042, 89 N.E.3d 1254, 1254-55, 67 N.Y.S.3d 574, 574 (2017) (when the defendant, “[a]t a sentencing hearing following his guilty plea, . . . asked for a new attorney to advise him on whether to move to withdraw his plea before sentence was imposed” and supported the request with “specific allegations regarding counsel’s [inadequate] performance[,] . . . the [trial] court had a duty to inquire into defendant’s request for new counsel before it proceeded to sentence defendant”; because the trial court failed to do so, the Court of Appeals reverses and remands the case so that the defendant can be “afforded the opportunity to decide whether to make a motion to withdraw his guilty plea upon the advice of counsel”); Davis v. Commissioner of Correction, 319 Conn. 548, 549, 568, 126 A.3d 538, 540, 550 (2015) (defense counsel deprived his client of effective assistance at sentencing, and prejudice must be presumed, because “defense counsel agreed with the prosecutor’s [sentencing] recommendation that the trial court should impose the maximum sentence allowed under a plea agreement even though that agreement contained a provision entitling defense counsel to advocate for a lesser sentence”), or, in cases in which the respondent waived counsel, the waiver of counsel was not effective, see Williams v. Kaiser, 323 U.S. 471 (1945); United States ex rel. Durocher v. LaVallee, 330 F.2d 303 (2d Cir. 1964); compare Iowa v. Tovar, 541 U.S. 77 (2004). See People v. Mitchell, 21 N.Y.3d 964, 967, 993 N.E.2d 405, 407, 970 N.Y.S.2d 919, 921 (2013) (if a motion to withdraw a guilty plea is based on an allegation of ineffectiveness of counsel and if the defense attorney whose conduct has been challenged takes “a position contrary to the one taken by his client on the motion,” “a conflict of interest arises, and the court must assign a new attorney to represent the defendant on the motion”).

10. Some basic procedural precondition for the entry of a guilty plea, such as the respondent’s appearance in court in person, was disregarded. See, e.g., United States v. Bethea, 888 F.3d 864 (7th Cir. 2018) (granting the defendant’s request to vacate a guilty plea which he made “via videoconference” due to “his health issues and limited mobility,” because “the plain language of [Federal] Rule [of Criminal Procedure] 43 requires all parties to be present for a defendant’s plea and . . . [therefore] a defendant cannot consent to a plea via videoconference. ¶ Our decision is supported by the unique benefits of physical presence. . . . ¶ . . . ‘Without th[e] personal interaction between the judge and the defendant – which videoconferencing cannot fully replicate – the force of the other rights guaranteed’ by Rule 43 is diminished.”).

11. Some constitutional right precluded the respondent’s prosecution for the offense to which s/he pleaded guilty (as distinguished from the procedures used in the prosecution or in the investigation of the offense underlying it). See Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974); Menna v. New York, 423 U.S. 61 (1975) (per curiam); Haring v. Prosise, 462 U.S. 306, 320 (1983) (dictum).

12. There are issues relating to the sentence imposed pursuant to the plea, such as that the sentence exceeds the statutory maximum or the sentencing procedure failed to comport with constitutional, statutory, or common-law requirements.

§ 14.29(c) The Prohibition Against Evidentiary Use of a Withdrawn or Vacated Guilty Plea in a Subsequent Trial

In the event that a guilty plea is vacated or withdrawn by leave of the court, it may not be used against the respondent as evidence of guilt at a subsequent trial on the charge to which the respondent initially pleaded guilty. This proposition was settled in federal practice by Kercheval v. United States, 274 U.S. 220 (1927); see also Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 11(f) (2018); Fed. Rule Evid. 410 (2018); but cf. United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196 (1995); and the Kercheval rule appears to have been constitutionalized by a dictum in Hutto v. Ross, 429 U.S. 28, 30 n.3 (1976) (per curiam).

§ 14.30 APPELLATE REVIEW IN GUILTY PLEA CASES

A guilty plea ordinarily forecloses appellate review of any claim that error was committed in judicial proceedings prior to the entry of the plea. As discussed in § 14.10 supra, some jurisdictions make special provision, by statute, court rule, or caselaw, for appellate review of pretrial suppression rulings even after the entry of a guilty plea.

Appellate remedies are, of course, available to review the invalidity of the plea itself. Thus any of the claims described in § 14.29(b) could be raised on appeal. It bears repeating, however, that appellate courts in some jurisdictions will not entertain attacks on a guilty plea unless trial-level remedies, such as a motion to withdraw or vacate the plea, have first been exhausted.

Finally, appeal is always available to challenge a sentence imposed pursuant to a guilty plea on the grounds that the sentence exceeds the statutory maximum or that the sentencing procedure violated constitutional, statutory, or common-law commands.

§ 14.31 COLLATERAL REVIEW IN GUILTY PLEA CASES

In the majority of jurisdictions state court collateral review is available for constitutional claims or claims that could not have been raised on direct review. See § 39.03(a) infra. Federal constitutional claims can be raised in federal habeas corpus proceedings. See § 39.03(b) infra. Accordingly, constitutional defects in the validity of the plea or in the conduct of the plea hearing or sentencing proceedings can be challenged in state and federal collateral proceedings.

As a practical matter juvenile sentences usually are of such limited duration that a juvenile will have served his or her entire sentence prior to the time when direct appellate review is completed, and thus there may appear to be no reason to pursue collateral remedies. However, even after the sentence has been served, a conviction may have ancillary consequences. For example, it might preclude the youth from ever entering the military, or it might serve as a predicate for enhanced juvenile sentencing or harsher adult court sentencing. Accordingly, there will be many situations in which counsel should pursue collateral remedies for an invalid guilty plea, even after the juvenile has completed serving his or her sentence. In most circumstances, federal habeas corpus remains available after a respondent’s release from confinement as a forum for invalidating unconstitutional convictions that have damaging collateral consequences, see, e.g., Jones v. Cunningham, 371 U.S. 236 (1963); Carafas v. LaVallee, 391 U.S. 234 (1968); Hensley v. Municipal Court, 411 U.S. 345 (1973); and some state courts similarly extend their habeas remedy to reach such cases. Alternative state-court procedures may include coram nobis; proceedings under “PCRA” (postconviction relief act) statutes or rules; or a motion to vacate the judgment of conviction.
Chapter 15

Defense Motions To Advance or for a Continuance; Motions To Dismiss for Want of Prosecution; Speedy Trial Motions

§ 15.01 DEFENSE MOTIONS TO ADVANCE THE DATE OF A PRETRIAL HEARING OR THE TRIAL

If the respondent is not detained pending trial, counsel will ordinarily not want to advance the date of pretrial hearings or the trial. It is usually in the respondent’s interest to delay proceedings as much as possible because that will give the respondent a longer period of time in which to amass a record of good behavior and favorable community adjustment that can be cited at disposition to avoid a sentence of incarceration.

If the respondent is detained pending trial, counsel will have attempted at arraignment to set the trial for the earliest possible date that affords sufficient time for pretrial preparation. See § 4.14 supra. Thus counsel will rarely have reason to seek advancement of a case that is going to trial. However, if a detained client has decided to plead guilty, there is no reason to wait for a trial date that is weeks away in order to enter the plea. Counsel should advance the case so that the plea can be entered immediately. This procedure avoids needless preadjudication detention time, which, in most jurisdictions, is not credited to the sentence if the respondent is sentenced to incarceration. And in cases in which the plea may result in the client’s being released pending disposition, an advancement of the plea date can bring about the respondent’s early release.

In order to advance a case, counsel should secure the prosecutor’s agreement to an advancement and to a particular date. Counsel then should contact the clerk of the court (or, as appropriate, the clerk of the judge who is presiding over the case), inform the clerk that the defense wishes to advance the date and that the prosecutor has consented, and request that the clerk calendar the case on the agreed-upon date.

§ 15.02 DEFENSE CONTINUANCES

Practice varies with regard to whether applications for continuances of pretrial hearings and of trial are required to be made in writing, on notice, in advance of the proceeding sought to be continued or whether they may be made orally on the date when the matter is listed. If local practice is receptive to continuance requests on the day of the hearing or trial, this course of action is ordinarily advised so that, in the event that the prosecutor also is not ready on the day of the hearing or trial, counsel can take advantage of the prosecutor’s lack of readiness to seek dismissal for want of prosecution (see § 15.03 infra) or dismissal on speedy trial grounds (see § 15.04 infra).

If, on the other hand, there is any risk that a day-of-trial continuance request may be denied, counsel is ordinarily advised either to move in writing in advance or to inform the prosecutor in advance of counsel’s intention to move for a continuance. The prosecutor should be asked to join in, or to consent to, the defense motion. Joint continuance motions and motions noted “no opposition” are granted routinely in many courts, although this is less likely if the juvenile court statute or local court rules establish a strict time-line for trials (see § 15.04(a) infra). Even if the prosecutor is unwilling to agree, defense counsel is at least in the posture of having informed the prosecutor and having given him or her the opportunity to call off prosecution witnesses; a defense motion for continuance made in court without advance notice to the prosecutor may be regarded with suspicion and irritation by the judge, who will undoubtedly know that last-minute pleas of “not prepared” can be used as a tactic to discourage prosecution witnesses, once dragged needlessly into court, from appearing the next time that the case is called.

The trial judge ordinarily has exceedingly broad discretion to grant or to deny continuances. See, e.g., Morris v. Slappy, 461 U.S. 1, 11-12 (1983); United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 659-62 (1984). However, the discretion is not absolute, see, e.g., Lee v. Kemna, 534 U.S. 362 (2002), and defense counsel seeking a continuance over the opposition of the prosecutor should protect the record by a detailed statement of reasons (by affidavit, unless local practice permits oral representations in open court): for instance, recent appointment and lack of opportunity to prepare; unavailability of a witness; or need to appear in another court.

If counsel is being rushed so quickly at any stage that s/he has inadequate opportunity to prepare, s/he should set out the circumstances with particularity in an application for a continuance invoking not only the general equities of the situation but also the respondent’s federal and state constitutional rights to effective assistance of counsel and to a fair trial. Denials of ample time for defense preparation have been held to violate these guarantees. See, e.g., Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932); Hawk v. Olson, 326 U.S. 271 (1945); Megantz v. Ash, 412 F.2d 804 (1st Cir. 1969); Rastrom v. Robbins, 440 F.2d 1251 (1st Cir. 1971); Moore v. United States, 432 F.2d 730, 735 (3d Cir. 1970) (en banc); Twiford v. Peyton, 372 F.2d 670 (4th Cir. 1967); Garland v. Cox, 472 F.2d 875 (4th Cir. 1973); MacKenna v. Ellis, 263 F.2d 35, 41-44 (5th Cir. 1959); Davis v. Johnson, 354 F.2d 689 (6th Cir. 1966), aff’d after remand, 376 F.2d 840 (6th Cir. 1967); Wolfs v. Britton, 509 F.2d 304 (8th Cir. 1975); United States v. King, 664 F.2d 1171 (10th Cir. 1981). “[T]he denial of opportunity for appointed counsel to confer, to consult with the accused and to prepare his defense, could convert the appointment of counsel into a sham and nothing more than a formal compliance with the Constitution’s requirement that an accused be given the assistance of counsel. The Constitution’s guaranty of assistance of counsel cannot be satisfied by mere formal appointment.” Avery v. Alabama, 308 U.S. 444, 446 (1940) (dictum). See also In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 33 (1967) (respondent in a delinquency case must receive notice “of the specific charge or factual allegations . . . sufficiently in advance of the hearing to permit preparation”); In the Matter of John JJ., 298 A.D.2d 634, 636, 748 N.Y.S.2d 188, 189-90 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2002) (the respondent in a delinquency case was denied effective assistance of counsel because his lawyer interviewed him for the first time immediately before trial and failed to seek an adjournment to interview witnesses identified by the respondent and his mother).
In jurisdictions that afford jury trials in delinquency cases, prejudicial publicity or public hostility that threatens to impair a respondent’s constitutional right to trial by an impartial jury may also be urged in support of a motion for “postponement of the trial to allow public attention to subside.” Nebraska Press Ass’n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 563-64 (1976). “That time soothes and erases . . . [public prejudice] is a perfectly natural phenomenon, familiar to all.” Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025, 1034 (1984). See §§ 20.03(a); 28.03(a).

§ 15.03 MOVING FOR DISMISSAL FOR WANT OF PROSECUTION OR OTHER APPROPRIATE RELIEF WHEN THE PROSECUTOR IS NOT READY TO PROCEED AT TRIAL OR A PRETRIAL HEARING

All courts have power to control their dockets and the calendaring of pending cases. This power may be expressly recognized in a state statute or court rule. See, e.g., State v. Grover, 112 R.I. 649, 314 A.2d 138 (1974). But, even in jurisdictions having no such statute or rule, the power is an inherent attribute of every court. State v. Candelaria, 144 N.M. 797, 192 P.3d 792 (N.M. App. 2008); State, Village of Eden Prairie v. Housman, 288 Minn. 546, 180 N.W.2d 251 (1970); Culliver v. State, 247 Ga. App. 877, 877-79, 545 S.E.2d 392, 394-95 (2001).

A court’s control over its own docket includes the prerogative of granting a defense motion to dismiss a case “for want of prosecution” if the prosecutor is not ready to proceed. See, e.g., State v. Grover, supra. Such dismissals are grounded upon the court’s discretion, reviewable for abuse, and are treated in most jurisdictions as involving little legal analysis or technical complexity. The question presented is simply whether, considering all of the circumstances of the case – including the extent to which the prosecutor is at fault for being unready; the extent to which the respondent has been harmed or will be harmed if trial is delayed; and the general policies of speedy trial (a policy that has a constitutional base, see § 15.04(b) infra) – dismissal is preferable to granting a prosecutorial request for a continuance. “The longer the delay, the greater the presumptive or actual prejudice to the [respondent] . . ., in terms of his [or her] ability to prepare for trial or the restrictions on his [or her] liberty.” United States v. Taylor, 487 U.S. 326, 339 (1988).

Dismissal for want of prosecution may be with or without prejudice, depending on the sort of harm to the respondent that appears (see § 15.04(b) infra) and on the general equities of the situation. Obviously, counsel should always seek dismissal with prejudice if such a request is viable. And, if a case is dismissed with prejudice, counsel should ensure that the court file is marked accordingly.

If the prosecution moves for a continuance in the case of a respondent who is detained and if the court denies the respondent’s resulting motion to dismiss for want of prosecution, counsel should then make a fall-back request for release of the respondent pending the adjourned trial date. Such a request for modification of the conditions of pretrial detention may ordinarily be entertained by the court at any time. Many judges are inclined to grant such requests, either because they are unwilling to penalize the respondent for the prosecutor’s inefficiency or because they reason that the prosecutor’s inability to bring in his or her witnesses signals some weakness in the prosecutor’s case and portends the eventual dismissal of the case on its merits or for want of prosecution.

If the prosecutor is not ready to go forward at a pretrial evidentiary hearing on a motion, such as a suppression hearing, the appropriate remedy is a judicial order treating the motion as conceded or forfeited. See, e.g., People v. Goggans, 123 A.D.2d 643, 506 N.Y.S.2d 908 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1986), appeal dismissed, 69 N.Y.2d 1000, 511 N.E.2d 91 (1987) (affirming trial judge’s summary granting of a motion to suppress on the ground that the prosecution’s witnesses failed to appear and the prosecutor therefore was not ready to proceed).

§ 15.04 MOTIONS TO DISMISS ON SPEEDY TRIAL GROUNDS

In addition to requesting the court to exercise its inherent power to dismiss a case for want of prosecution (see § 15.03 supra), counsel should respond to a prosecutorial request for a continuance or to other undue delay in the proceedings (such as a continuance ordered by the court as a result of its crowded docket and inability to reach the case on the scheduled trial date) by moving to dismiss the Petition on the ground that the respondent’s rights to a speedy trial have been violated.

The following sections describe the various statutory and constitutional doctrines that can be cited in support of a motion for dismissal on speedy trial grounds.

§ 15.04(a) Statutory Rights to a Speedy Trial

In many jurisdictions the juvenile court statutes specify a timetable for delinquency trials and establish an accelerated schedule for cases in which the respondent is detained pending trial. See, e.g., Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code § 657(a)(1) (2018) (trial within 30 days of filing of Petition; trial of a detained child within 15 days of order of detention); Ind. Code Ann. § 31-37-11-2 (2018) (trial within 60 days of filing of Petition; trial of a detained child within 20 days of filing of Petition); N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 340.1 (2018) (trial within 60 days generally; if child is detained, trial must be held within 3 days if the charge is a misdemeanor, within 14 days if the charge is a felony, and within “a reasonable length of time” if the charge is a homicide or a crime that resulted in the victim being incapacitated and unable to attend court).

Statutes of this sort provide a basis for dismissal of a case when pretrial delay has exceeded the statutory time limits as a result of either the prosecution’s actions or the judge’s crowded docket. See, e.g., In the Matter of Frank C., 70 N.Y.2d 408, 410, 516 N.E.2d 1203, 1203, 522 N.Y.S.2d 89, 89 (1987) (“dismissal of the presentment agency’s Petition is mandatory when the statutorily required fact-finding is delayed beyond the time limits delineated in Family Court Act § 340.1”); In re Russell C., 120 N.H. 260, 414 A.2d 934 (1980). See also, e.g., Zedner v. United States, 547 U.S. 489, 500-03 (2006) (violation of federal Speedy Trial Act required dismissal notwithstanding the defendant’s prospective waiver of his statutory speedy trial rights because the Act “has no provision excluding periods of delay during which a defendant waives the application of the Act” and because the Act was designed to safeguard not only the defendant’s right to a speedy trial but also the public’s interest in a speedy trial).

If local caselaw interpreting the speedy trial statute governing adult criminal cases is favorable, counsel can argue that juveniles should be afforded protections at least as stringent.
Counsel should be alert, however, to possibilities for arguing that the juvenile speedy trial act manifests a legislative intention to establish more rigorous protections for juveniles. For example, in In the Matter of Frank C., the New York Court of Appeals rejected the prosecution’s attempt to incorporate into the juvenile statute the adult law’s exclusion of delay caused by court congestion. Ruling that the juvenile statute was to be construed strictly to outlaw delay caused by either prosecutorial action or court congestion, the court in Frank C. explained that “the ‘speedy hearing’ provision . . . reflect[s] the significant changes in the legal rights of juveniles that have occurred since the late 1960’s . . . [and must be interpreted consistently with the legislatively] stated purpose . . . to assure swift and certain adjudication at all phases of the delinquency proceeding.” 70 N.Y.2d at 413, 516 N.E.2d at 1205-06, 522 N.Y.S.2d at 91-92.

§ 15.04(b) Federal and State Constitutional Guarantees of Speedy Trial

Backstopping the common-law and statutory protections against undue trial delay are the constitutional Speedy Trial Clauses, state and federal. These apply to juveniles in delinquency proceedings, see, e.g., P.V. v. District Court in and for the Tenth Judicial District, 199 Colo.
357, 609 P.2d 110 (1980); In the Interest of C.T.F., 316 N.W.2d 865 (Iowa 1982); In re D.H., 666 A.2d 462 (D.C. 1995); In re Thomas J., 372 Md. 50, 811 A.2d 310 (2002); Piland v. Clark County Juvenile Court, 85 Nev. 489, 457 P.2d 523 (1969); In the Matter of Benjamin L., 92
Super. 101, 729 A.2d 1218 (1999); State v. Jones, 521 N.W.2d 662 (S.D. 1994), and, indeed, some courts have concluded that the nature of adolescence and the underlying rehabilitative goals of the Family Court call for applying speedy trial guarantees even more rigorously in juvenile court than in the adult criminal context, see, e.g., P.V. v. District Court in and for the Tenth Judicial District, 199 Colo. at 360, 609 P.2d at 112 (“It is our view that the speedy resolution of juvenile proceedings brings about more significant benefits to a child and to society than are accrued through application of speedy trial rules in adult proceedings. Certainly the average juvenile is far more vulnerable to psychological harm during the pretrial period than the average adult would be.”); In the Matter of Benjamin L., 92 N.Y.2d at 667, 708 N.E.2d at 160, 685 N.Y.S.2d 404 (reasons for speedy adjudication “are even more compelling in the juvenile context [than in the adult criminal context]” because “a delay in the proceedings may undermine a court’s ability to act in its adjudicative and rehabilitative capacities” and because the “nature of adolescence” may render a delay acutely prejudicial for the juvenile and his or her defense); Commonwealth v. Dallenbach, 729 A.2d at 1220 (“As the juvenile years are marked with significant changes and rapid development, children experience an acceleration in the passage of time so that, to a juvenile, one year may seem to be five. To ensure successful rehabilitation, the reformation program (including punishment) must commence within a reasonable time of the child's delinquent act so that the child can comprehend the consequences of his act and the need for reform."). The constitutional guarantees are significant not only in their own right (in that they may provide a more expansive basis for relief than that which is afforded by statutes and common law) but also as expressions of a policy in light of which the speedy trial statutes must be read and the common-law judicial discretion exercised.

The Speedy Trial Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the federal Constitution, which is incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment and hence made binding on the States by Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213 (1967), guards against three separate injuries that can be suffered by an accused as a result of undue trial delay: (i) prolonged pretrial incarceration; (ii) inconvenience, indignity, and anxiety resulting from the pendency of unresolved charges for a protracted period; and (iii) prejudice to the respondent’s ability to present persuasive defensive evidence at trial when the trial is not held promptly in relation to the events at issue. See, e.g., United States v. Ewell, 383 U.S. 116, 120 (1966) (Speedy Trial Clause is “an important safeguard to prevent undue and oppressive incarceration prior to trial, to minimize anxiety and concern accompanying public accusation and to limit the possibilities that long delay will impair the ability of an accused to defend himself”). Accord, Betterman v. Montana, 136 S. Ct. 1609, 1614 (2016) (dictum). See also Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647, 654 (1992); Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 532 (1972); Dillingham v. United States, 423 U.S. 64, 65 (1975) (per curiam); United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 7-9 (1982); United States v. Handa, 892 F.3d 95, 101, 105 (1st Cir. 2018). See generally Anthony G. Amsterdam, Speedy Criminal Trial: Rights and Remedies, 27 STAN. L. REV. 525 (1975). The Speedy Trial Clause may thus be invoked to support a demand for trial or for release from confinement or for dismissal of pending charges without prejudice or for outright dismissal of the prosecution with prejudice, as the circumstances make appropriate. See Klopfer v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213 (1967) (demand for trial); Braden v. 30th Judicial Circuit Court, 410 U.S. 484 (1973) (demand for trial); Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374 (1969) (demand for trial or dismissal); Dickey v. Florida, 398 U.S. 30 (1970) (dismissal); Strunk v. United States, 412 U.S. 434 (1973) (dismissal). State caselaw must be consulted to determine whether the applicable state constitutional provision is also construed as protecting the full range of “speedy trial” concerns that justify these several forms of relief.

The standards that must be met in order to justify the differing forms of relief are obviously different. Each considers, however, both the duration of the delay and its “oppressive” quality, in terms of willful vexatiousness or avoidable negligence of the prosecution on the one hand and harm to the relevant interests of the defense on the other. See, e.g., United States v. Velazquez, 749 F.3d 161, 167, 174-86 (3d Cir. 2014); Petition of Provoo, 17 F.R.D. 183 (D. Md. 1955), aff’d per curiam, 350 U.S. 857 (1955). Compare Dickey v. Florida, 398 U.S. 30 (1970), with Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219, 221-22 n.4 (1968).

The major factors to be considered in determining whether pretrial delay violates the Sixth Amendment have been described as the “[l]ength of delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant’s assertion of his right, and prejudice to the defendant.” Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. at 530. See also Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. at 651; United States v. MacDonald, 435 U.S.
850, 858 (1978); United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 313-14 (1986); United States v. Eight Thousand Eight Hundred and Fifty Dollars, 461 U.S. 555, 564-69 (1983); United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 868-70 (1982) (dictum). “[N]one of the four factors [is] . . . either a necessary or sufficient condition to the finding of a deprivation of the right of speedy trial. Rather, they are related factors and must be considered together with such other circumstances as may be relevant.” Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. at 533; see Moore v. Arizona, 414 U.S. 25, 26 (1973) (per curiam); Hartfield v. State, 516 S.W.3d 57, 68 (Tex. App. 2017) (“tolerance of . . . official negligence ‘varies inversely with its protractedness’”). Thus “an affirmative demonstration of prejudice” is not always necessary to sustain a speedy trial claim. Id. Accord, Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. at 655 (“consideration of prejudice is not limited to the specifically demonstrable[;] . . . affirmative proof of particularized prejudice is not essential to every speedy trial claim”). See also People v. Wiggins, 31 N.Y.3d 1, 7, 17-18, 95 N.E.3d 303, 306, 314, 72 N.Y.S.3d 1, 7, 17-18 (2018) (a “lengthy delay [of a little more than six years] between defendant’s arrest and his eventual guilty plea violated his [state] constitutional right to a speedy trial” even though the defendant did not “demonstrate[ ] any specific impairment to his defense as a result of the extraordinary delay”; “[t]he Supreme Court has stated that ‘impairment of one’s defense is the most difficult form of speedy trial prejudice to prove because time’s erosion of exculpatory evidence and testimony “can rarely be shown,”’” and “[t]he courts therefore ‘generally have to recognize that excessive delay presumptively compromises the reliability of a trial in ways that neither party can prove or, for that matter, identify’”). Nor is it necessary that the delay be purposeful or oppressive. “Unintentional delays caused by overcrowded court dockets or understaffed prosecutors are among the factors to be weighed less heavily than intentional delay, calculated to hamper the defense, in determining whether the Sixth Amendment has been violated but, as we noted in Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 531 (1972), they must ‘nevertheless . . . be considered since the ultimate responsibility for such circumstances must rest with the government rather than with the defendant.’” Strunk v. United States, 412 U.S. at 436. Compare Vermont v. Brillon, 556 U.S. 81, 85, 94 (2009) (dictum) (“delays sought by [defense] counsel are ordinarily attributable [for speedy trial purposes] to the defendants they represent” but this “general rule . . . is not absolute”: “Delay resulting from a systemic ‘breakdown in the public defender system’ . . . could be charged to the State.”); Boyer v. Louisiana, 569 U.S. 238, 241, 246 (2013) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Ginsburg, Breyer and Kagan, JJ., dissenting from the dismissal of a writ of certiorari as improvidently granted) (in adjudicating a 6th Amendment speedy trial claim, a “delay caused by a State’s failure to provide funding for an indigent’s defense must count against the State, and not the accused”: “Where a State has failed to provide funding for the defense and that lack of funding causes a delay, the defendant cannot reasonably be faulted.”); State v. Stock, 140 N.M. 676, 683, 147 P.3d 885, 892 (N.M. App. 2006) (affirming a trial court order dismissing charges against a defendant incarcerated for more than three years without trial: “the district court blamed the delay on the fact that the public defenders’ office was severely overburdened. As we have noted, the district court was of the view that it was ‘humanly impossible for lawyers to practice law under the conditions that we’re asking them to practice law.’ To the extent that delays can be blamed on the overburdened system, that also cannot be held against Defendant.”); State v. Hunsberger, 418 S.C. 335, 348, 794 S.E.2d 368, 375 (2016) (“The State’s desire to have Alex testify against Barnes [the shooter in a murder in which Alex Hunsberger was an accomplice] . . . did not, under the circumstances present here, justify the delay in Alex’s trial. Further, that the State placed a higher priority on strengthening its case against Barnes than on bringing Alex’s case to trial cannot, alone, justify the delay of Alex’s trial. The purpose of the right to a speedy trial is to vindicate a defendant’s and society’s interest in a speedy resolution of cases. . . . This purpose is not served when the constitutional right of a low priority defendant is sacrificed in hopes that defendant will help the State in a higher priority trial.”); United States v. Tigano, 880 F.3d 602, 606 (2d Cir. 2018) (delays of almost seven years resulting from “poor trial management and general indifference at every level toward this low-priority defendant in a straightforward case” produced an “extreme instance of a Sixth Amendment violation,” although the protraction “was the result of countless small choices and neglects, none of which was individually responsible for the injustice suffered by Tigano”).

A major limitation upon the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial is that the right attaches only at the time of “indictment, information, or other formal charge” or of “arrest,” United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307, 321 (1971), whichever comes first (see Dillingham v. United States, 423 U.S. 64 (1975) (per curiam)). See, e.g., United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 6–7 (1982); Baker v. McCollan, 443 U.S. 137, 144 (1979) (dictum); Betterman v. Montana, 136 S. Ct. at 1613 (dictum); United States v. Handa, supra, 892 F.3d at 106–07 (holding that “the bringing of . . . [an] additional charge does not reset the Sixth Amendment speedy trial clock to the date of a superseding indictment where (1) the additional charge and the charge for which the defendant was previously accused are based on the same act or transaction, or are connected with or constitute parts of the common scheme or plan previously charged, and (2) the government could have, with diligence, brought the additional charge at the time of the prior accusation”). Therefore, pre-arrest, pre-charge delay alone will not violate the Sixth Amendment, even though it can be cited as compounding the harms suffered through postcharge delay. In cases in which the precharge delay is substantial and in which it can be shown to have adversely affected the respondent’s ability to prepare, preserve, or present defensive evidence, counsel may be able to secure dismissal on the alternative constitutional ground that the respondent’s due process right to a fair trial has been violated. E.g., United States v. Chase, 135 F. Supp. 230 (N.D. Ill. 1955).

The due process protections of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the federal Constitution and the parallel provisions of state constitutions forbid delay at any stage of a criminal or delinquency proceeding – including prearrest, precharge delay – that unfairly hampers the accused’s ability to make a defense. See United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. at 324–26 (dictum); United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783, 789, 795–97 & n.17 (1977) (dictum); United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1982) (dictum); Betterman v. Montana, 136 S. Ct. at 1613 (dictum); cf. Fontaine v. California, 390 U.S. 593, 595–96 (1968). “The due process inquiry must consider the reasons for the delay as well as the prejudice to the accused,” United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. at 790; and although “investigative delay” will not support a due process contention, at least in the absence of very substantial and well-documented prejudice to the accused’s trial defenses, id. at 795–96, any sort of “delay undertaken by the [prosecution] . . . solely ‘to gain tactical advantage over the accused,’” id. at 795, or perhaps “‘prosecutorial delay incurred in reckless disregard of circumstances, known to the prosecution, suggesting that there existed an appreciable risk that delay would impair the ability to mount an effective defense,’” id. at 795 n.17, would present a case for dismissal on due process grounds. See United States v. Gouveia, 467 U.S. 180, 192 (1984) (dictum).

§ 15.04(c) Procedures for Litigating Speedy Trial Issues

Speedy trial motions naturally are not subject to the filing deadlines that govern other types of motions (see § 7.05 supra), since the violation at issue in a speedy trial motion usually will not take place until after the typical motions deadline has expired. Depending upon local rules, speedy trial motions may or may not have to be in writing.

In some jurisdictions the state constitutional speedy trial clause, the applicable statute or court rule, or both may be construed as embodying a “demand rule.” The demand rule holds that a respondent waives the benefit of speedy trial guarantees unless s/he expressly invokes them and demands a trial. Its effect ordinarily is that the time limits formally expressed as running from the time of arraignment or Initial Hearing actually begin to run only at the time of a defense demand for a speedy trial. The Supreme Court rejected the “demand rule” in this form as an element of a Sixth Amendment speedy trial claim in Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 528 (1972), but Barker warns that the accused’s failure to make “an assertion of his right” to a speedy trial is one factor to be considered in adjudicating the merits of such a claim, id. at 530; see § 15.04(b) supra, and the States remain free to insist upon compliance with a demand rule as a condition precedent to invoking state constitutional or statutory rights to a speedy trial. Accordingly, except when there are tactical reasons not to do so, counsel should make a demand for a speedy trial at the earliest possible opportunity and renew that demand whenever the case is continued or delayed, coupling it with a motion for dismissal for violation of the respondent’s speedy trial rights.
Chapter 16

Motions Hearings; Motions Arguments

Part A. Motions Hearings Generally

§ 16.01 EVIDENTIARY AND NON-EVIDENTIARY MOTIONS HEARINGS

Section 7.01 supra discusses the various aims that defense motions can serve. Section 7.02 provides a roster of motions counsel should consider. Section 7.03 examines the strategic question whether counsel should raise issues by pretrial motion or at trial when local practice allows both options. It concludes with a discussion of tactics and procedures relating to motions in limine. Sections 7.04-7.06 deal with other procedural aspects of motions. Sections 7.08-7.09 discuss the drafting of written motions and the advisability of invoking state constitutional law as well as federal constitutional law in both written and oral motions that raise constitutional claims. Section 7.07 canvasses considerations bearing on the decision whether to present claims in the form of an evidentiary motion or a non-evidentiary motion. That section is the prelude to this one.

Depending upon the type of motion involved and the specific facts at issue on the motion, a motions hearing can be either a non-evidentiary legal argument by the attorneys or a trial-like evidentiary hearing.

Motions that raise purely legal issues, such as motions challenging the sufficiency of the Petition or the jurisdiction of the court (see Chapter 17) and motions for a bill of particulars (see § 9.07(a)) are presented at non-evidentiary hearings, since they involve no factual disputes that need to be resolved through the presentation of testimony. The same is true of motions that turn upon facts already known to the court, such as most motions for recusal of the judge (§§ 20.04-20.07 infra), or facts fully ascertainable through a review of court records, such as most motions to dismiss the Petition on double jeopardy grounds (§ 17.08 infra) or for a violation of speedy trial guarantees (§ 15.04 supra).

The quintessential type of motion that turns upon factual issues and therefore requires an evidentiary hearing is a motion to suppress evidence. Motions to suppress tangible evidence (Chapter 23), incriminating statements (Chapter 24), and identification testimony (Chapter 25) all typically result in an evidentiary hearing followed by legal arguments on the law and facts. In some jurisdictions the defense must demonstrate the right to an evidentiary hearing by arguing, in a non-evidentiary legal argument, the sufficiency of the facts alleged in the suppression motion to state a claim under the applicable law. See §§ 7.06-7.08 supra. The prosecutor can, of course, obviate the need for an evidentiary hearing on a motion to suppress by stipulating to the facts alleged by the defense, thereby reducing the hearing to a legal argument on whether the stipulated facts satisfy the legal rules governing suppression.
Local practice may require that a motion for an evidentiary hearing be supported by affidavits setting out the facts that the respondent intends to establish through testimony at the hearing. See § 7.06 supra. This requirement for a preliminary demonstration of the factual merits of the respondent’s claim to a motions remedy is distinct from the procedure of submitting the motion for final adjudication of the merits on affidavits instead of live testimony. These procedures are discussed in §§ 7.07-7.09 supra, together with the relevant tactical considerations in handling them.

Motions for severance (Chapter 18), motions for discovery (§ 9.07 supra), and motions to dismiss for prosecutorial misconduct can be either evidentiary or non-evidentiary, depending upon the specific issues and facts that they raise. Thus, for example, a motion to sever co-respondents based upon a co-respondent’s statement implicating the respondent (see § 18.10(a) infra) would ordinarily go to a non-evidentiary hearing in which the judge reviews the statement and hears arguments on its legal implications, but a motion to sever based upon the defense’s intention to present the testimony of the co-respondent in the defense case might necessitate an evidentiary hearing on the contents of the testimony. See § 18.10(b) infra. Most motions for discovery turn upon undisputed facts about the general nature of the materials that the prosecution is unwilling to turn over to the defense; but a particular discovery motion could involve an evidentiary hearing on the question, for example, whether witnesses were unconstitutionally instructed by the prosecutor or police officers to refuse to speak with defense counsel and his or her investigator. See § 8.13 supra. Motions to dismiss for prosecutorial misconduct might turn upon facts already known to the judge – such as acts of misconduct that occurred in proceedings at which the judge was presiding, or acts reflected in the transcript of a prior proceeding – or they might, in certain cases, require direct and cross-examination of the prosecutor and witnesses to the prosecutor’s behavior outside the courtroom.

Motions for a change of venue (§§ 20.01-20.03 infra) and motions challenging jury selection procedures (§ 21.03 infra) may turn upon case-specific facts (such as the nature and extent of prejudicial pretrial publicity in the case) or upon more general, less disputable facts (such as the county’s standard procedure for selecting the venire). Some jurisdictions require that the facts supporting such motions be established through affidavits; other jurisdictions require that the facts be presented at an evidentiary hearing; still others permit the defense to choose between these two options. The factors that counsel should consider in making the choice are summarized in § 7.07 supra.

§ 16.02 SCOPE OF THE CHAPTER

The following sections deal solely with non-evidentiary motions hearings, describing the procedures followed in such hearings and suggesting approaches to take in arguing motions. Techniques for conducting evidentiary hearings on motions to suppress are covered in Chapter 22; and much of the tactical advice offered in that chapter applies to other evidentiary motions hearings as well. See, e.g., §§ 22.02, 22.04-22.06 infra.
Part B. Non-Evidentiary Motions Arguments

§ 16.03 PROCEDURE

Usually, defense counsel, as the proponent of the motion, argues first, and the prosecutor responds thereafter. Depending upon local practice and the preferences of the judge presiding over the motions hearing, defense counsel may or may not be offered the opportunity to reply to the prosecutor’s arguments. Counsel should always request leave to reply if s/he has something useful to say, whether or not rebuttal argument is standard operating procedure in this court. When practicing in courts that are less formal, where the question of who argues first is decided by which lawyer starts talking first, defense counsel should usually seize the initiative and speak first. The attorney who argues first has the invaluable opportunity to acquaint the judge with the facts and issues in the light most favorable to the presenter – a matter of particular importance inasmuch as the judge may very well not have read the motion. To some extent the first speaker can also control the order in which issues are taken up, addressing first the issues on which s/he is strongest.

Most judges conduct motions arguments like appellate arguments, feeling free to interrupt and pepper attorneys with factual and legal questions. Techniques for responding to judges’ questions are described in § 16.07 infra.

Although counsel has the right to object to statements made by the prosecutor, many judges insist that counsel refrain from interrupting his or her opponent and instead make all objections at the conclusion of the prosecutor’s argument. If this is the local custom, counsel should conform to it unless: (i) appellate caselaw suggests that “contemporaneous objection” rules require counsel to object at the moment when the prosecutor makes the improper statement; or (ii) the prosecutor is reciting information that is both very likely to be ruled inadmissible and strongly prejudicial to the respondent, in which case defense counsel should object and insist that the judge prohibit the prosecutor from continuing to relate the prejudicial information.

§ 16.04 GUARDING AGAINST UNDUE DISCLOSURES OF DEFENSE TRIAL EVIDENCE AND TRIAL STRATEGY

Whenever s/he is arguing pretrial motions or conducting any type of pretrial hearing, counsel must carefully guard against revealing to the prosecutor aspects of the defense trial evidence or strategy. This is particularly important with respect to matters that involve weaknesses of prosecution witnesses (such as their inconsistent statements to defense counsel’s investigator) when the prosecutor does not already know about these matters, since their disclosure could lead to the prosecutor’s coaching the witness to avoid defense traps.

Usually, the objective of avoiding revelation of defense secrets will not conflict with the objective of winning a motions argument. Most non-evidentiary motions focus upon aspects of the legal history of the case (such as the length of delays, as pertinent to speedy trial issues; the existence and nature of prior proceedings, as pertinent to double jeopardy issues; and so forth) that do not implicate the facts of the offense and accordingly do not call for any discussion of defense evidence or the defense theory of the case. However, some motions may be problematic. For example, when counsel is litigating a motion for severance of respondents on the ground of conflicting defenses, see § 18.10(c) infra, the judge may well reject counsel’s attempt to describe his or her projected defense in broad, ambiguous terms and may demand of counsel a detailed description of the defense that counsel will offer at trial as a predicate for the judge’s assessment of whether that defense so severely conflicts with the co-respondent’s as to require a severance. Or a motion for diversion (see Chapter 19) might well be strengthened by a disclosure of facts that show the respondent to be innocent or, at worst, a passive follower in a crime committed by an older and more aggressive youth or adult.

Whenever confronted with the dilemma of whether to reveal defense secrets whose disclosure might win the motion for the defense, counsel must calculate the relative prospects of winning the motion with and without the revelation; whether winning the motion will terminate the case, and, if not, the degree to which winning the motion would improve the defense’s chances of winning the trial; and the degree to which revealing the defense evidence or trial strategy would impair the defense’s chances of winning the trial. In unusual cases in which the revelation is extremely important to winning the motion, extremely damaging to the defense’s chances of winning the trial, and arguably protected by the respondent’s Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination (see § 9.12 supra), counsel should consider asking leave to present certain facts or arguments to the court ex parte, either in a sealed affidavit or in chambers. Judges will be resistant to this suggestion because it is untraditional and deprives the prosecutor, to some extent, of the right of reply. But proceedings conducted partly in the open and partly ex parte are becoming customary in a number of contexts (such as defense motions for state-paid expert assistance (see § 11.03(b) supra); prosecution submission of prior statements of prosecution witnesses to the court for screening before their production to the defense at trial (see § 27.12(a) infra); and prosecution submission of electronic surveillance logs to the court for screening and redaction before their production to the defense), and it is therefore possible that the judge will consider a similar procedure in the present context. In theory, the same request could be made in all cases in which the information that counsel seeks to withhold from the prosecutor is defense “work product” (see § 9.13 supra). But this is a very dangerous position for the defense to urge in most jurisdictions, because “work product” protection is usually extended to the prosecutor as well as defense counsel, and the defense has much to lose from any general legitimation of ex parte proceedings as a means of limiting pretrial disclosure in a system in which the prosecutor has every investigative advantage over the defense. See Chapter 9.

§ 16.05 THE EXTENT TO WHICH COUNSEL SHOULD ORALLY RECITE FACTS AND LAW ALREADY SET FORTH IN THE MOTION

In arguing a motion, counsel cannot assume that the judge has read the motions papers or any other pleadings in the case. Many trial judges are so overloaded (or lazy) that they are unable to find the time to read motions papers. Or they are prevented from reading particular motions papers because the administrative processes of the court have caused the motion to sit unread in the clerk’s office, awaiting filing in the court file. Nor can counsel assume that the judge will supplement what s/he hears in the oral argument by reading the motion and other pleadings after the argument. Many trial judges rule on motions from the bench at the conclusion of the attorneys’ arguments.

Accordingly, unless counsel knows for certain that the judge has read the motion (as, for example, when the judge’s opening remarks or question refers to a particular passage in the motion), counsel will need to recite in the oral argument any facts and law that are essential to the defense position. On the other hand, counsel cannot take the risk of offending the judge by stating or even implying counsel’s assumption that the judge has not read the motion. For this reason counsel should avoid giving the impression that s/he is reiterating information and legal analysis contained in the motion. Also, as explained in § 16.06 infra, counsel typically wants to avoid engaging in detailed legal documentation in the oral argument.

Usually, the best way of reconciling all of these concerns is to touch upon each of the essential facts and legal points, while mentioning the pages of the motion on which important legal points are more extensively developed and supported with citations. As long as counsel couches the references to the body of the motion as if they were shorthand substitutes for lengthier argument rather than directions to the judge to read a motion s/he has never looked at, this approach will be inoffensive. It may also have the salutary effect of inducing the judge to read at least those portions of the motion prior to ruling, if s/he has not done so already.

§ 16.06 THE INADVISABILITY OF STRING-CITING CASES OR ANALYZING COURT DECISIONS AT LENGTH

Counsel should almost never recite strings of citations to court decisions or engage in complex legal analysis in oral argument. Such matters are extremely tedious, and counsel’s dwelling on them may lead the judge either to tune out or to cut counsel’s argument short. Moreover, because these are not matters that the judge is going to remember (and few judges take notes during attorneys’ arguments), spending time on these matters is unproductive and wastes the opportunity to use the argument to make more memorable and persuasive points.

As a general rule of thumb, counsel should treat the law bearing on the motion merely as a legal framework for organizing the key points to be made about the case at hand. S/he should state the legal framework simply and briefly and then devote most of the argument to fitting facts into that framework. Counsel should focus particularly on things that: (i) are dramatic (speaking to the heart of the case and making the judge want to rule in the respondent’s favor); (ii) are factually persuasive; and (iii) give the judge some overall feeling about the case, enabling him or her to see the forest rather than the trees.

In those cases in which it is necessary to depend upon detailed analysis of prior caselaw, counsel should ordinarily set forth the analysis in the written motion and then direct the judge’s attention to the relevant pages of the motion instead of orally reiterating the analysis. See § 16.05 supra; see also § 22.06 infra. If counsel refrained from setting forth a detailed legal analysis in the written motion for strategic reasons (see § 7.08 supra), s/he can sometimes offer to brief the issues in a supplementary memorandum of points and authorities. But this is more commonly done in argument at the close of an evidentiary motions hearing, particularly one in which extensive testimony has been taken. It is often impracticable in a non-evidentiary hearing, either because the judge intends to rule from the bench or because counsel simply has no good reason for failing to brief the issues fully beforehand. When, in these or other situations, counsel’s only option is to analyze the caselaw orally, s/he should bring to the argument copies of any court decisions that were not amply covered in the written motion, and, upon reaching the points in the argument that depend on those decisions, offer to hand copies of the decisions to the judge and prosecutor rather than citing and quoting at length. Counsel can then alleviate much of the tedium and confusion of oral legal analysis by directing the judge’s attention to relevant passages of the opinion (which should be highlighted, if they are short), essentially using the opinion as a prop in counsel’s argument.

§ 16.07 THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING RESPONSIVE TO THE JUDGE’S QUESTIONS

The key to arguing motions is to be responsive to the judge’s questions and address his or her concerns as thoroughly as possible. Since most judges rule on motions from the bench, they depend upon counsel’s answers to their questions to resolve the issues that the judge finds most troublesome. The judge’s questions will usually pinpoint the areas in which the judge most sorely needs to be persuaded in order to rule in the respondent’s favor.

Counsel cannot afford to give short shrift even to questions that seem irrelevant or uninformed. Anything that is troubling the decision-maker is, by definition, relevant. And questions that betray the judge’s unfamiliarity with the issues or caselaw show a need to educate the judge through the answer to the question.

In preparing for oral argument, counsel should attempt to anticipate the questions that the judge is likely to ask and should develop persuasive answers. Since trial judges are generally concerned with staying well within established rules of law, counsel should be prepared to demonstrate that the rule counsel is advocating is wholly consistent with the controlling caselaw, and s/he should bring copies of the cases to the hearing to use as props in the argument if necessary See § 16.06 supra. Since trial judges are usually disinclined to adopt rules of great breadth and scope (either because they are cautious about binding themselves in the future or because they fear that the adoption of sweeping new rules invites appellate reversal), counsel should be prepared to show the limits of the rule s/he is advocating, preferably by distinctions that limit the rule to the unique facts of counsel’s own case.

When the judge asks questions of counsel’s opponent, counsel should listen to the questions as carefully as if they were directed to counsel himself or herself. As previously noted, the judge’s questions usually identify the concerns that are of paramount importance to the judge.
Accordingly, counsel cannot afford to allow the prosecutor to be the only party to address these matters. During counsel’s reply to the prosecutor, counsel should say that s/he would like to state the respondent’s position on the question that the judge addressed to the prosecutor, and then do so. If local practice does not normally afford counsel the opportunity to reply to the prosecutor, but counsel has a very persuasive answer to a question directed at the prosecutor, counsel should – at the close of the prosecutor’s argument – ask leave to state the position of the defense in regard to the prosecutor’s answer to the judge’s question.
Chapter 17

Motions To Dismiss the Charging Paper

§ 17.01 TYPES OF CHALLENGES TO THE CHARGING PAPER; THE STAGES AT WHICH THESE CHALLENGES CAN AND SHOULD BE RAISED

There are numerous grounds for challenging the sufficiency of a charging paper or some of its counts by a motion to dismiss the Petition or those counts. They include:

1. Failure of the Petition to allege facts constituting an offense. (See § 17.03 infra.)

2. Lack of jurisdiction to bring the case in the juvenile court, in that the respondent is too old to be prosecuted as a juvenile or too young to be prosecuted at all. (See § 17.04 infra.)

3. Failure to allege facts establishing venue. (See § 17.05 infra.)

4. Technical defects. (See § 17.06 infra.)

5. Expiration of the statute of limitations for the offense. (See § 17.07 infra.)

6. Double jeopardy. (See § 17.08 infra.)

7. Misjoinder of counts or of respondents. (See Chapter 18.)

9. Selective prosecution or selective enforcement based on invidious discrimination. Litigation of selective prosecution claims – including issues of discovery necessary to prove such claims – is governed by a body of caselaw rooted in United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456 (1996). Armstrong declares in dictum that “the decision whether to prosecute may not be based on ‘an unjustifiable standard such as race, religion, or other arbitrary classification’” (id. at 464). See also Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 813 (1996) (dictum) (“the Constitution prohibits selective enforcement of the law based on considerations such as race”); Murguia v. Municipal Court, 15 Cal. 3d 286, 300, 540 P.2d 44, 53, 124 Cal. Rptr. 204, 213 (1975) (“a criminal defendant may object, in the course of a criminal proceeding to the maintenance of the prosecution on the ground of deliberate invidious discrimination in the enforcement of the law”) (discovery standard superseded by statute in 1990). However, a “‘presumption of regularity supports’.
. . prosecute decisions and, “in the absence of clear evidence to the contrary, courts presume that they have properly discharged their official duties”” (United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. at 464). “In order to dispel the presumption that a prosecutor has not violated equal protection, a criminal defendant must present ‘clear evidence to the contrary.’” Id. at 465. This standard makes selective prosecution claims difficult to prove, but “not . . . impossible” (id. at 466). Armstrong also sets a demanding standard for defense discovery of prosecutorial records in support of a selective prosecution claim: it endorses a rule “‘requir[ing] some evidence tending to show the existence of the essential elements of the defense,’ discriminatory effect and discriminatory intent”; and it holds that “‘some evidence tending to show the existence’ of the discriminatory effect element” must include “‘some evidence that similarly situated defendants of other races could have been prosecuted, but were not’” (id. at 468-469). Cf. State v. Ballard, 190 N.J. 270, 920 A.2d 80 (2005), approved in State v. Lee, 190 N.J. 270, 920 A.2d 80 (2007). Some lower courts apply the same exacting requirements to claims of selective enforcement – that is, discrimination on the part of the police and other law-enforcement agencies, as distinguished from prosecutors – while others have adopted more defendant-friendly rules for cases in which Armstrong’s concern against exercising too much “‘judicial power over [prosecutorial judgment –] a ’special province’ of the Executive’” – is inapplicable. See the discussions of the standards for discovery and proof of selective enforcement claims in, e.g., United States v. Davis, 793 F.3d 712 (7th Cir. 2015) (en banc); United States v. Washington, 869 F.3d 193 (3d Cir. 2015); United States v. Jackson, 2018 WL 748372 (D. N.M. February 7, 2018).

In most jurisdictions, statutes or court rules require that motions challenging the sufficiency of the charging paper be made in writing, within a specified period of time (usually 15 or 30 days after arraignment). See § 7.05 supra. If the challenge is to the jurisdiction of the court, that challenge may be made at any time.

Even when local procedures require that motions be in writing, a challenge to the sufficiency of the charging paper can be made orally at a detention hearing to prevent detention on an invalid Petition. See § 4.23 supra.

§ 17.02 TERMINOLOGY

Under the specialized vocabulary employed in juvenile courts in most jurisdictions, juveniles cannot be “charged” with “crimes” but can merely be “alleged” to have “committed acts, which if committed by an adult, would constitute crimes” and which render the child “delinquent.” Because this terminology is extremely unwieldy, the present chapter will use the words “charges” and “crimes” in discussing the pleading requirements governing Petitions and the sufficiency of their allegations. When practicing in jurisdictions that adhere rigidly to juvenile court parlance, counsel should, of course, substitute the appropriate juvenile court terms.

§ 17.03 FAILURE OF THE CHARGING PAPER TO ALLEGE FACTS CONSTITUTING A CRIME

A Petition (or counts thereof) can be fatally defective by reason of several types of insufficiency of allegations. These insufficiencies are often confusingly grouped under the single rubric “failure to charge a public offense.”

§ 17.03(a) Failure To Charge Acts That Are Criminal in Nature

The allegations may state fully and clearly what specific acts the respondent is charged with doing, but these acts may be no crime (or, as juvenile parlance would have it, may not be acts “which, if committed by an adult, would constitute a crime”). See, e.g., State v. Kline, 717 S.W.2d 849 (Mo. App. 1986); State v. Miller, 159 N.C. App. 608, 583 S.E.2d 620 (2003), aff’d per curiam, 358 N.C. 133, 591 S.E.2d 520 (2004) (mem.); State v. Harrison, 805 S.W.2d 241 (Mo. App. 1991). For example, a respondent may be charged under a statute penalizing one who “resists an officer in the execution of his [or her] duty,” and the Petition may allege that the respondent did “run away and refuse to stop when called upon to stop by” the officer. A motion to dismiss here tests the prosecution’s legal theory. Specifically, it raises the issue of law whether one who runs away from a police officer thereby “resists” the officer within the meaning of the statute.

Ordinarily, the sole focus of this species of motion to dismiss is the text of the charging paper: Do the actions and circumstances which the charging paper sets forth constitute a crime or do they not? However, if there is no dispute between the parties that the factual scenario on which the charge is based includes additional circumstances relevant to the criminality of the actions charged, those circumstances can be considered by the court in ruling on the motion. See, e.g., State v. Hankins, 155 So. 3d 1043, 1045-46 (Ala. Crim. App. 2011); State v. Pagano, 104 Md. App. 113, 122, 655 A.2d 55, 59-60 (1995), aff’d, 341 Md. 129, 669 A.2d 1339 (1996); State v. Fernow, 328 S.W.3d 429, 431 (Mo. App. 2010) (the indictment alleged that the defendant “while being held in custody after arrest for burglary, a felony, knowingly escaped from custody” but the facts underlying this allegation, as represented by the parties to the court on the motion to dismiss, were that the defendant “was not in custody after arrest for burglary. At the time . . . [he] absconded, he was being held in custody pursuant to a capias warrant issued for his failure to appear at his probation revocation hearing, where burglary was the underlying offense.”).

Prosecutors will ordinarily take the position that consideration of any factual information outside the four corners of the charging paper is improper on a motion to dismiss. But where there is no genuine factual debate about what happened when and where, and under what circumstances – so that the only real contest between the prosecution and defense is whether a set of agreed-upon events comes within the terms of a criminal statute – defense counsel can sometimes persuade the prosecutor to stipulate to the specifics of those events as the basis for a ruling on the motion, in order to save the State the cost and trouble of a trial.

Counsel should always check the caselaw to determine whether the courts have previously dealt with the kinds of acts with which the respondent is charged or equivalent acts. Frequently, prosecutors will charge respondents with acts that have previously been deemed insufficient to constitute a crime because the prosecutor is not aware of the prior decision or because the prior decision, while persuasive, is not controlling.

If there is no prior caselaw on the issue, then counsel’s motion should be devoted primarily to a construction of the statute. In addition to parsing the statutory language, counsel should examine the statute’s overall structure, context, relationship to other criminal provisions, and any relevant legislative history of the applicable statute for indications that the legislature (1) considered various factual situations to which the statute was intended to apply and did not mean it to reach facts like those in the respondent’s case or (2) enacted the statute to achieve certain goals of policy that do not call for an application of the statute to acts such as those committed by the respondent. See, e.g., State v. Lopez, 907 N.W.2d 112 (Iowa 2018).

§ 17.03(b) Failure To Allege Facts That Make Out Every Element of the Charged Offense

A charging paper may quite simply have something missing. The conduct with which it charges the respondent is perfectly consistent with criminality, but some ingredient of the crime is omitted. Thus, for example, a Petition alleging that the respondent committed burglary by unlawfully entering the complainant’s dwelling is legally insufficient because it omits one element of burglary: “intent to commit a crime therein.” The allegation of unlawful entry might support a charge of criminal trespass, but it is insufficient to support the charged offense of burglary. See, e.g., State ex rel. Day v. Silver, 210 W.Va. 175, 180, 556 S.E.2d 820, 825 (2001) (“We . . . hold that in order for an indictment for larceny to be sufficient in law, it must identify with specificity the particular items of property which are the subject of the charge by specifically describing said property, unless the property is incapable of identification as in cases involving fungible goods, United States currency, or comparable articles. Likewise, in order for an indictment for destruction of property to be sufficient in law, it must identify with specificity the particular items of property which are the subject of the charge by specifically describing said property, unless the property is incapable of identification as in cases involving fungible goods, United States currency, or comparable articles.”).

Local practice varies enormously with regard to the significance that an omission must have in order to be fatal. Most jurisdictions require allegations of: (1) the name of the respondent, (2) a description or characterization of the respondent’s conduct that asserts (in factual or conclusory terms) every legal element of the offense charged (including acts done, any circumstances surrounding them that are necessary to make them unlawful, and the requisite mental state or mens rea), (3) the place of the crime (disclosing venue in the court, see § 17.05 infra), and (4) the approximate date of the crime (within the statute of limitations, see § 17.07 infra). Beyond these rudiments, the States differ (and often differ from offense to offense) regarding what must be charged. Some jurisdictions require the name of the victim and great particularization of the means or instrumentalities of the offense. Others disregard these matters. Some disregard even the rudiments just described. Conspicuous among the latter are States that provide statutory "short forms," declaring that a charging paper shall be sufficient for the crime of x if it alleges: “On [date], respondent A committed the crime of x against complainant B within the jurisdiction of this Court.” Local practice must be consulted in the matter.

§ 17.03(c) Lack of Specificity

A charging paper may be wholly unspecific and conclusory. It may duplicate the language of the criminal statute (A “did commit a lewd act”) without giving the slightest idea what the respondent did. Again, the States vary considerably in the factual specificity required. Many permit allegations in conclusory statutory language under all but the vaguest statutes. Cf. Michigan v. Doran, 439 U.S. 282, 290 (1978) (dictum). However, there are limits. A formulation of the rule found in the caselaw of numerous jurisdictions is that: “It is generally sufficient that [a charging paper] . . . set forth the offense in the words of the statute itself, as long as ‘those words of themselves fully, directly, and expressly, without any uncertainty or ambiguity, set forth all the elements necessary to constitute the offence intended to be punished.’ . . . ‘Undoubtedly the language of the statute may be used in the general description of an offence, but it must be accompanied with such a statement of the facts and circumstances as will inform the accused of the specific offence, coming under the general description, with which he is charged.’ . . .” Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 117-18 (1974); see also United States v. Resendiz-Ponce, 549 U.S. 102, 108-10 (2007); United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 414 (1980).

Conclusory pleading has several recognized vices. First, it impairs the respondent’s rights to be “‘fairly inform[ed] . . . of the charge against which he must defend’” (United States v. Resendiz-Ponce, 549 U.S. at 108, quoting Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. at 117; and see § 9.09(b)(2) supra). Second, it frustrates the respondent’s interest in having “‘the record . . . sho[w] with accuracy to what extent he may plead a former acquittal or conviction [that is, double jeopardy, see § 17.08 infra]’” in the event of a subsequent prosecution (Sanabria v. United States, 437 U.S. 54, 66 (1978)). Third, it deprives the respondent of any opportunity to test the prosecution’s legal theory without contesting its facts – an opportunity traditionally provided by the motion to dismiss and by its progenitor, the common-law demurrer (see, e.g., Russell v. United States, 369 U.S. 749 (1962); see § 17.03(a) supra). Although some judges seem to think that a vague charging paper can be cured by a bill of particulars (see § 9.07(a) supra), the bill actually remedies only the first two of these three vices. It does not touch the third because of the general rule that a demurrer or motion to dismiss will not lie to a bill of particulars. Therefore, attacks upon even venerable forms of conclusory charging papers can be forcefully argued on the ground that these preclude the court from performing its important function of testing the legal
§ 17.04 JURISDICTIONAL DEFECTS: MAXIMUM AGE AND MINIMUM AGE REQUIREMENTS FOR JUVENILE COURT PROSECUTIONS

§ 17.04(a) Maximum Age

In every State the juvenile code defines the jurisdiction of the juvenile court by establishing a maximum age that marks the limit of eligibility for prosecution as a delinquent. The vast majority of States define 18 as the maximum age, although some jurisdictions have opted for 17 or 16. Many States provide that children within a certain age range (for example, ages 16 to 18) who commit certain crimes are eligible for prosecution in either the juvenile or adult court, thereby giving the two sets of courts concurrent jurisdiction over these children. See Chapter 13.

A key issue is whether juvenile court jurisdiction hinges on the respondent’s age at the time of the filing of the Petition or at the time of the crime. Most States treat the respondent’s age at the time of the crime as decisive, permitting juvenile court prosecution of a child who is older than the statutory maximum as long as s/he was under the maximum at the time of the crime. See, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE §§ 602, 604(a) (2018); COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 19-1-103(8)(a) (2018); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 302.1(2) (2018). A few States turn eligibility for juvenile court prosecution on the child’s age at the time the proceedings commence, see, e.g., OR. REV. STAT. § 419C.005(1) (2018); State v. Salavea, 151 Wash. 2d 133, 141-42, 86 P.3d 125, 129 (2004) (under applicable statute, juvenile court jurisdiction turns on the “age of the defendant at the time of the proceedings, regardless of age at commission of the crime”), and another handful of States extend jurisdiction to children on the basis of their age at the time of the commission of the crime, provided that the child does not exceed another designated maximum age by the time the proceedings commence. See, e.g., N.H. REV. STAT. ANN. § 169-B:4(I) (2018) (under 18 at the time of the crime, and under 19 at the time the petition is filed); PA. CONS. STAT. ANN. tit. 42, § 6302 (2018) (under 18 at the time of the crime and under 21 at the time the petition is filed); TEX. FAM. CODE ANN. § 51.02(2)(B) (2018) (under 17 at the time of the crime and under 18 at the time the petition is filed). In States that determine juvenile court jurisdiction by reference to the child’s age at the time the proceedings commence, the courts have ruled that the juvenile court retains jurisdiction (or that the adult court lacks jurisdiction) when the prosecutor’s or police officers’ delay in commencing proceedings was motivated by the purpose of preventing the child from being eligible for juvenile court treatment. See Miller v. Quatsoe, 348 F. Supp. 764 (E.D. Wis. 1972), discussed in § 13.04 supra; State v. Scurlock, 286 Or. 277, 593 P.2d 1159 (1979); State v. Hodges, 28 Wash. App. 902, 904-05, 626 P.2d 1025, 1026 (1981); State v. Becker, 74 Wis. 2d 675, 247 N.W.2d 495 (1976).

Counsel must weigh considerations carefully and must consult with the client before challenging the jurisdiction of the juvenile court on the ground that the respondent is above the maximum age for juvenile court prosecution. By definition, if s/he is above this age, s/he is subject to prosecution as an adult. Accordingly, the net result of counsel’s successful litigation of the motion to dismiss on jurisdictional grounds will usually be the dismissal of the juvenile court Petition and the subsequent filing of a charging paper in adult criminal court. (While some offenses may be too minor for the adult court prosecutor to bother with, and some cases may fall between the cracks, counsel cannot accurately predict either of these contingencies.) Section 13.02 supra describes the factors that counsel should consider and about which counsel should advise the client in deciding whether to opt for prosecution in juvenile court or adult court.

§ 17.04(b) Minimum Age and the Infancy Defense

In a handful of States the statute defining the jurisdiction of the juvenile court establishes a minimum age, below which children are not subject to juvenile court prosecution and thus (2018) (age 10). See also In the Matter of the Welfare of S.A.C., 529 N.W.2d 517, 519 (Minn.
App. 1995) (although the Juvenile Court Act’s delinquency provisions do not establish a minimum age, the court concludes that the CHIPS (“child in need of protection or services”) statute, which excludes children below the age of 10 from CHIPS jurisdiction, evidences a legislative “intent to take these children out of the delinquency definition” as well).

In some other States, in which the juvenile court statute is silent on the issue of minimum age, the courts recognize the common-law doctrine of infancy as applying to delinquency prosecutions. At common law, children under the age of seven were irrebuttably presumed to be incapable of forming criminal intent and therefore could not be culpable of an offense; children between the ages of seven and fourteen were subject to a rebuttable presumption of incapacity, which precluded prosecution unless the state proved that the child knew the wrongfulness of his or her act. See 4 William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Law of England 23-24 (1769). See also Andrew M. Carter, Age Matters: The Case for a Constitutionalized Infancy court statutes in accordance with this common-law doctrine to deem children below a certain age exempt from prosecution as juveniles and to establish a rebuttable presumption that minors above that age and within a specified age range are incapable of committing a crime. See, e.g., In defense of infancy” – “‘under which an individual below the age of seven years cannot be found guilty of committing a crime’” and under which “‘there is a rebuttable presumption’” that children “‘between the ages of seven and fourteen . . . are] incapable of committing a crime’” – “applies in juvenile delinquency adjudicatory hearings” because “[t]he defense is a firmly established principle of our common law; the General Assembly is undoubtedly cognizant of it, but the Legislature has never repealed it, nor modified it, nor stated that it is inapplicable to juvenile delinquency proceedings,” and “[r]epeals by implication are, of course, disfavored”); State
v. Q.D., 102 Wash. 2d 19, 22-24, 685 P.2d 557, 559-60 (1984) (construing the juvenile court statute in light of the common-law doctrine and the adult Penal Code to bar prosecution of children below the age of eight and to establish a rebuttable presumption that children between 8 and 12 years of age are incapable of committing a crime); State v. K.R.L., 67 Wash. App. 721, 724, 726, 840 P.2d 210, 212-13 (1992) (8-year-old was exempt from prosecution as a delinquent because the state failed to satisfy its “significant burden” of presenting “clear and convincing” evidence to rebut the presumption of incapacity to commit a crime). Other courts have relied upon the common-law doctrine in construing their statutes to bar prosecution of young children who lack the capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of their actions or to form the mental element of the offense charged. See, e.g., In re Gladys R., 1 Cal. 3d 855, 862-67, 464 P.2d 127, 132-36, 83 Cal. Rptr. 671, 676-80 (1970) (construing the juvenile statute to prohibit prosecution of children below the age of 14 who are unable to understand the wrongfulness of their conduct); State in the Interest of C.P., 212 N.J. Super. 222, 229, 514 A.2d 850, 854 (1986) (construing the juvenile code to prohibit prosecution of children who are incapable of forming the mens rea of the offense charged or who are incapable of understanding the significance of the trial or aiding in their own defense); In the Matter of Robert M., 110 Misc. 2d 113, 116, 441 N.Y.S.2d 860, 863 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1981) (construing the juvenile statute in light of the common-law and the social scientific literature to prohibit prosecution of children whose “immaturity . . . negates the requisite specific intent” to constitute the offense charged). However, some courts wholly reject the infancy doctrine as a defense in juvenile court, reasoning that the doctrine was intended solely as a safeguard against exposure of children to the harshness of the criminal system and therefore is inapplicable to delinquency proceedings because these supposedly focus on rehabilitation rather than punishment. See, e.g., In re Tyvonne, 211 Conn. 151, 161, 558 A.2d 661, 666 (1989); State v. D.H., 340 So. 2d 1163 ( Fla. 1976); In the Interest of G.T., 409 Pa. Super. 15, 25, 597 A.2d 638, 643 (1991); In re Michael, 423 A.2d 1180 (R.I. 1981).

As explained in § 17.04(a) supra, most jurisdictions look to the age of the child at the time of the crime for jurisdictional purposes, but some jurisdictions look to the age of the child at the time of the filing of the Petition. Counsel can argue persuasively that, at least with respect to minimum age requirements, the only permissible consideration is age at the time of the crime, and that children who were ineligible for prosecution at the time of the crime cannot be prosecuted later. This follows from the nature of the common-law infancy doctrine: Its presumption of incapacity to form the requisite mental state for criminality was concerned with whether or not the child’s age – and mental state as shaped by chronological age – at the time of the crime rendered him or her culpable for his or her actions.

In States that have a statutory or common-law minimum age requirement, counsel for an under-age respondent can raise the jurisdictional issue either by a pretrial motion to dismiss or at trial. If the statute or caselaw establish an absolute bar to prosecution of the child, there is no risk involved in raising the issue by pretrial motion, and that procedure is in the child’s interest because it terminates the case quickly. But if the applicable statutory or common-law standard permits the prosecutor to prove eligibility for prosecution by showing that the respondent is capable of forming a particular mental state (the mens rea of the crime, an appreciation of the wrongfulness of the act, an understanding of the proceedings, an ability to assist in his or her own defense), counsel is well advised to raise the jurisdictional defense for the first time at trial, so that a prosecutor who has not spotted the issue will fail to gather the psychiatric and other evidence s/he needs to satisfy the prosecution’s burden.

§ 17.05 DISMISSAL OF THE CHARGING PAPER FOR FAILURE TO ESTABLISH VENUE

A charging paper is generally held fatally defective if it does not allege facts establishing venue in the court where it is filed. Allegations in terms of “X street” or “Y township” are ordinarily sufficient; the court will judicially notice that X street or Y township is within the geographical jurisdiction of the court, if it is.

Criminal venue (and its analogue in juvenile delinquency cases) is governed by statute within constitutional limitations. The prevalent state constitutional provision guaranteeing trial by a jury of the vicinage may or may not comport a venue restriction (see WAYNE R. LAFAVE, JEROLD H. ISRAEL, NANCY J. KING & ORIN S. KERR, 4 CRIMINAL PROCEDURE §§ 16.1-16.2 (4th ed. & Supp.); Lisa E. Alexander, Vicinage, Venue, and Community Cross-Section: Obstacles to a State Defendant’s Right to Trial by a Representative Jury, 19 HASTINGS CONST. L. Q. 261 (1991); Drew Kershen, Vicinage, 29 OKLA. L. REV. 801 (1976); 30 OKLA. L. REV. 1 (1977)); and even those forms of state jury-trial guarantees that omit explicit reference to “vicinage” may be read as restricting the place of trial or the area from which the trial jury pool can be drawn (see Alvarado v. State, 486 P.2d 891 (Alaska 1971)). The Sixth Amendment to the federal Constitution requires trial “by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law.” See United States v. Johnson, 323 U.S. 273, 275 (1944); Platt v. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 376 U.S. 240, 245-46 (1964); cf. U.S. CONST. art. III § 2, cl. 3. The incorporation of the Sixth Amendment into the Fourteenth by Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968) may, therefore, entail some measure of federal constitutional restraint upon state legislative power to manipulate criminal venue. See Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 92-97 (1970); Mareska v. State, 534 N.E.2d 246 (Ind. App. 1989); but see Price v. Superior Court, 25 Cal. 4th 104, 625 P.3d 618, 108 Cal. Rptr. 2d 409 (2001); State v. Bowman, 588 A.2d 728 (Maine 1991).

The general constitutional and statutory rule is that offenses are triable only in the county (or circuit or other judicial unit) comprising the place where the offense was committed. The “crime-committed” formula depends principally on the statutory elements of the offense: If a defendant or juvenile respondent mails a false application to a state agency in another county, for example, venue may turn on whether the statute punishes “making” a false statement or “filing” one. Crimes, the operative elements of which occur in more than one county, are generally triable in either. Conspiracies are triable wherever the conspiracy was maintained (a mystic notion meaning, in practice, wherever any one of the conspirators spent any considerable amount of time during the conspiracy) or wherever any act in furtherance of the conspiracy was done. When the substantive law of conspiracy requires an overt act, venue demands at least one overt act within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. (At the trial stage, this latter rule may become quite significant. In the course of forum-shopping, prosecutors frequently pick a jurisdiction having only very attenuated contacts with a conspiracy and allege only one or two overt acts within it. If they fail to prove these specific overt acts at trial, an acquittal is compelled, even though the conspiracy is otherwise abundantly proved.)

Local practice should be consulted for the intricacies of venue lore.

§ 17.06 TECHNICAL DEFECTS IN THE CHARGING PAPER

Charging papers may be assailed by motion on a host of technical grounds, some relating to the nature of the charging language (“duplicity,” vagueness, noncompliance with prescribed statutory forms), others relating to strictly formal matters (failure of the Petition to carry the signature of the prosecutor as required by law, failure of the Petition to list the names of the witnesses it intends to present at trial (see § 9.07(b) supra), untimeliness of a motion by the prosecutor to amend the Petition, and so forth. See, e.g., Shaw v. Wilson, 721 F.3d 908 (7th Cir. 2013). Some of these defects are remediable and will be ordered remedied without the dismissal, re-drawing, and re-filing of the Petition. Others are grounds for dismissal. Local practice must be consulted.

§ 17.07 STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

Statutes of limitations of prosecutions prescribe the permissible period of time within which a charging paper may be filed after an event, asserting liability based on that event.

In many jurisdictions a charging paper is subject to a motion to dismiss if it either (a) does not allege the date of the offense charged with reasonable specificity (“on or about” will do) or (b) alleges a date that is beyond the period of limitations. Such a motion may, and usually must, be made before trial, within the deadline for pretrial motions (see § 7.05 supra). In other jurisdictions the respondent must go to trial and raise the defense of the statute of limitations by a demurrer to the evidence or a motion for acquittal at the close of the prosecution’s case.

To find the statute of limitations that applies to a delinquency offense, counsel must check both the criminal statute establishing the period of limitations for the particular offense and the juvenile code, which may set an earlier period of limitation based upon the child’s attainment of the age of majority. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 302.2 (2018) (“juvenile delinquency proceeding must be commenced within the period of limitation prescribed in . . . the criminal procedure law or, unless the alleged act is a designated felony . . ., commenced before the respondent’s eighteenth birthday, whichever occurs earlier”); In re Luis R., 2013 IL App. 2d 120393, 992 N.E.2d 591, 592, 372 Ill. Dec. 749, 750 (2013) (juvenile court lacked jurisdiction even though the respondent “was under the age of 17 when he allegedly committed the offenses” because “he was over the age of 21 when the petition was filed”).

§ 17.08 DOUBLE JEOPARDY
Guarantees against being “twice put in jeopardy” may be found in the Fifth Amendment to the federal Constitution and in most state constitutions. In \textit{Benton v. Maryland}, 395 U.S. 784 (1969), the Supreme Court incorporated the Fifth Amendment guarantee into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and thereby made it binding in state criminal prosecutions. In \textit{Breed v. Jones}, 421 U.S. 519 (1975), the Court ruled that double jeopardy guarantees are fully applicable to juvenile delinquency proceedings. See also, e.g., \textit{In re A.G.}, 148 Ohio St. 3d 118, 121, 69 N.E.3d 646, 650 (2016) (“the federal and Ohio Constitutions protect juveniles subject to delinquency proceedings from double jeopardy in the same fashion as they do adults”).

Federal and state constitutional double jeopardy guarantees establish the general rule that a respondent may not be reprosecuted for the “same offense” if the first trial ended in acquittal or conviction, or if the first trial passed the stage at which jeopardy “attaches” and then ended in a mistrial declared without some “manifest necessity” or the respondent’s assent. Each element of this general rule, however, has been qualified by complex definitions and exceptions. Section 17.08(b) \textit{infra} defines the concepts of “attachment of jeopardy” and “same offense.” Sections 17.08(c), (d), and (e) examine, respectively, the double jeopardy doctrines governing reprosecution when there has been an acquittal, conviction, or mistrial.

Sections 17.08(f), (g), and (h) then discuss other double jeopardy doctrines. Section 17.08(f) describes the collateral estoppel doctrine that applies to retrials. Section 17.08(g) explains the “dual sovereignty” exception to double jeopardy guarantees. Section 17.08(h) examines the double jeopardy implications of a juvenile court scheme in which evidence is heard first by a referee and the referee’s findings are thereafter reviewed by a juvenile court judge.

\section*{§ 17.08(b) Definitions}

\subsection*{§ 17.08(b)(1) “Attachment of Jeopardy”}

\subsection*{§ 17.08(b)(2) “Same Offense”}

The guarantee against double jeopardy forbids a respondent’s “be[ing] subject for the \textit{same offence} to be[ing] twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.” U.S. \textsc{Const}, amend. V (emphasis added). Thus a threshold issue in double jeopardy analysis is whether the offense for which the respondent is being prosecuted is the “same offense” for which s/he was previously tried. This issue is obviously clear-cut when the second charge leveled against the respondent is a violation of the same criminal code provision that bottomed the first. Another easy call is that all lesser-included-offenses are treated as “the same” as the greater offense which subsumes all of their elements. “Historically, courts have treated greater and lesser-included offenses as the same offense for double jeopardy purposes, so a conviction on one normally precludes a later trial on the other.” Currier v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 2144, 2150 (2018) (dictum). See, e.g., Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323 (1970); De Mino v. New York, 404 U.S. 1035 (1972) (per curiam); Harris v. Oklahoma, 433 U.S. 682 (1977) (per curiam); United States v. Gries, 872 F.3d 471 (7th Cir. 2017), quoted in the following paragraph. More difficult issues emerge, however, when the respondent’s conduct violates two separate statutory provisions, and s/he is prosecuted first for one statutory violation and then the other.

“Where the same conduct violates two statutory provisions, the first step in the double jeopardy analysis is to determine whether the legislature . . . intended that each violation be a separate offense. If [the legislature] . . . intended that there be only one offense – that is, a [respondent] . . . could be convicted under either statutory provision for a single act, but not under both – there would be no statutory authorization for a subsequent prosecution after conviction [or acquittal] of one of the two provisions, and that would end the double jeopardy analysis.” Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. 773, 778 (1985).

Techniques for divining legislative intent in the common situation in which it is unclear differ considerably among the jurisdictions. In construing federal legislation, the Supreme Court has employed the so-called Blockburger test, deriving from Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932), which “emphasizes the elements of the two crimes . . . [and asks whether] ‘each requires proof of a fact that the other does not’” (Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161, 166 (1977)). See, e.g., Rutledge v. United States, 517 U.S. 292, 297 (1996); United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 696 (1993); Ball v. United States, 470 U.S. 856, 861 (1985); United States v. Gries, 872 F.3d 471, 474 (7th Cir. 2017) (“Under the familiar Blockburger test, if ‘the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions,’ the double-jeopardy inquiry asks ‘whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not.’ . . . A lesser-included offense nests within the greater offense and therefore flunks the Blockburger test.”). The Court has cautioned that the “Blockburger rule[.] . . . [although] a useful canon of statutory construction,” is not “a conclusive determinant of legislative intent” and “the Blockburger presumption must . . . yield to a plainly expressed contrary view on the part of [the legislature].” Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. at 779. See also Missouri v. Hunter, 459 U.S. 359, 368 (1983); Wood v. Milyard, 721 F.3d 1190, 1195 (10th Cir. 2013). But, at least in the context of successive prosecutions – as distinguished from multiple charges joined for simultaneous adjudication in a single trial – it is arguable that the Blockburger test should prevail and preclude subjecting a respondent to two trials for offenses having identical elements unless the legislature intended specifically to authorize not merely cumulative punishments but multiple trials. And it would be a rare statute that could reasonably be found to manifest the latter intent. See Ex Parte Chaddock, 369 S.W.3d 880, 883, 886 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012) (even if “the Legislature manifested its intention that an accused be punished for both offenses,” the Double Jeopardy Clause nonetheless bars “successive prosecutions” for both offenses; “Multiple punishments that result from a single prosecution do not subject a defendant to the evils attendant upon successive prosecutions, namely the ‘embarrassment, expense and ordeal’ of repetitive trials, ‘compelling [the accused] to live in a continuing state of anxiety and insecurity,’ and creating ‘a risk of conviction through sheer governmental perseverance.’” (footnotes omitted)).

§ 17.08(c) Reprosecution After An Acquittal

Double jeopardy guarantees clearly and unequivocally bar reprosecution for the same offense after an individual has been acquitted. United States v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 430 U.S. 564 (1977); see, e.g., Ball v. United States, 163 U.S. 662, 671 (1896); United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 91 (1978); Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430, 437-38, 445 (1981), and cases cited; Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. 110, 117-20, 122-23 (2009); McDaniels v. Warden Cambridge Springs SCI, 700 Fed. Appx. 119, 121 (3d Cir. 2017). Cf. Blueford v. Arkansas, 566 U.S. 599, 605-08 (2012); Bravo-Fernandez v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 352, 357-58 (2016). “A trial court’s actions constitute an acquittal on the merits when “the ruling of the judge . . . represents a resolution [in defendant’s favor] . . . of some or all of the factual elements of the offenses charged.” . . . In determining whether a trial court’s ruling represents a resolution in the defendant’s favor of some or all of the factual elements of the offense charged, we consider both the form and the substance of the trial court’s ruling. . . . A finding of insufficient evidence to convict amounts to an acquittal on the merits because such a finding involves a factual determination about the defendant’s guilt or innocence.” State v. Sahr, 812 N.W.2d 83, 90 (Minn. 2012) (reviewing relevant decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court and applying them to bar reprosecution after a trial judge has dismissed a charging paper on the basis of the prosecution’s “concession that it lacked sufficient evidence to prove an essential element” of the offense initially charged (id.) and has denied the prosecution leave to amend that charge by adding a count alleging a lesser-included crime (id. at 87)). See also, e.g., Martinez v. Illinois, 134 S. Ct. 2070, 2071, 2076 (2014) (per curiam) (the trial judge’s grant of defense counsel’s motion for “a directed not-guilty verdict” when the State “declined to present any evidence” and instead moved for a continuance after the jury had been empaneled and sworn, “was an acquittal because the court ‘acted on its view that the prosecution had failed to prove its case.’ . . . And because Martinez was acquitted, the State cannot retry him.”). And see Evans v. Michigan, 568 U.S. 313, 315-16, 318 (2013) (the trial judge’s midtrial entry of a “directed verdict of acquittal” in a jury trial, based upon the judge’s “view that the State had not provided sufficient evidence of a particular element of the offense” which “turn[ed] out” not to be “a required element at all,” constituted “an acquittal for double jeopardy purposes” and barred a retrial notwithstanding the judge’s error: “[A]n acquittal precludes retrial even if it is premised upon an erroneous decision to exclude evidence, . . .; a mistaken understanding of what evidence would suffice to sustain a conviction, . . .; or a ‘misconstruction of the statute’ defining the requirements to convict, . . . . In all these circumstances, ‘the fact that the acquittal may result from erroneous evidentiary rulings or erroneous interpretations of governing legal principles affects the accuracy of that determination, but it does not alter its essential character.’ . . . [O]ur cases have defined an acquittal to encompass any ruling that the prosecution’s proof is insufficient to establish criminal liability for an offense.”).

Unlike jury trials, in which a verdict of “not guilty” obviously is an “acquittal” for purposes of double jeopardy, Fong Foo v. United States, 369 U.S. 141 (1962) (per curiam), there may be questions whether a dismissal in a bench trial constituted an acquittal so as to bar reprosecution. See, e.g., Smalis v. Pennsylvania, 476 U.S. 140 (1986). The rule (which also applies to ambiguous rulings terminating a jury trial) is that “‘the trial judge’s characterization of his own action cannot control the classification of the action.’” United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. at 96 (quoting United States v. Jorn, 400 U.S. 470, 478 n.7 (1971) (plurality opinion)). Instead, the test is whether “‘the ruling of the judge, whatever its label, actually represents a resolution [in the respondent’s . . . favor], correct or not, of some or all of the factual elements of the offense charged.’” United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. at 97. See, e.g., Sanabria v. United States, 437 U.S. 54 (1978); Martinez v. Illinois, 134 S. Ct. at 2076. See also In the Interest of M.H.P., 830 N.W.2d 216, 218-20 (N.D. 2013) (juvenile court judge’s dismissal of a delinquency petition at disposition on the ground that M.H.P. was “not in need of treatment or rehabilitation” despite a finding at trial that he committed the charged act, functioned as an acquittal for double jeopardy purposes and “bars the State from appealing” because Nebraska’s statutory definition of delinquency requires both a finding at trial that the child committed the charged act and a finding that the child is “in need of treatment or rehabilitation”).

Although double jeopardy issues ordinarily arise when the government seeks to prosecute an individual after a first trial has concluded (either in a verdict or a mistrial), double jeopardy protections also may come into play if a trial judge grants a midtrial judgment of acquittal on one or more counts of the charging paper and is inclined to reconsider that ruling after the defense case has already commenced and the defense has begun presenting evidence. If the judge’s ruling qualifies as a “judgment of acquittal” for double jeopardy purposes (under the test described in the preceding paragraph) and if state law does not expressly authorize judicial reconsideration of such a ruling (and – arguably – if, in addition, the judge does not reserve the right to reconsider or indicate that the ruling is not final), double jeopardy protections bar the trial judge from reconsidering the ruling. Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462, 473-74 (2005). Compare Price v. Vincent, 538 U.S. 634 (2003); Schiro v. Farley, 510 U.S. 222 (1994).

§ 17.08(d) Reprosecution After Conviction in the First Trial

Once convicted, a respondent may not be reprosecuted for the same offense. E.g., Brown

475
v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161 (1977); Harris v. Oklahoma, 433 U.S. 682 (1977) (per curiam). This rule is said not to preclude a second prosecution in certain “special circumstances.” Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1, 8 (1987). Three such circumstances recognized by the caselaw are: (i) when “the State is unable to proceed on the [second] . . . charge at the outset because the . . . facts necessary to sustain that charge have not occurred or have not been discovered despite the exercise of due diligence,” Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. at 169 n.7 (dictum); see Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. at 789-92; (ii) when the prosecution makes multiple charges in the alternative at the outset and the respondent elects to obtain a disposition of some of them prior to the others, Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S. 137, 151-54 (1977); Ohio v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 493 (1984); and (iii) when the conviction on the earlier charges was the result of a plea agreement that the respondent later violates, Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. at 8-12.

Double jeopardy guarantees also do not bar reprosecution of a previously convicted respondent if the respondent succeeded in getting the first conviction set aside by a posttrial motion, an appeal, or postconviction proceedings. See, e.g., United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463, 465-68 (1964); United States v. Serrano, 856 F.3d 210 (2d Cir. 2017). However, retrial will be barred even after a conviction has been set aside if the basis for that action was a finding by either the trial court or an appellate court that the evidence was insufficient to support the conviction. Hudson v. Louisiana, 450 U.S. 40 (1981); Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978); Monge v. California, 524 U.S. 721, 729 (1998) (dictum). But see Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31 (1982) (reprosecution permissible when the basis for reversal was not insufficiency of the evidence, but rather that the appellate court, sitting as a “thirteenth juror” found the conviction to be “against the weight of the evidence”).

§ 17.08(e) Reprosecution After the First Trial Ends in a Mistrial

Double jeopardy guarantees will not bar reprosecution if the first trial ended in a mistrial, at the request of, or with the acquiescence of, the respondent, United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600 (1976), except when the respondent’s request for the mistrial was occasioned by prosecutorial misconduct “intended to ‘goad’ the [respondent] into moving for a mistrial” (Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667, 676 (1982) (dictum); see, e.g., State v. Parker, 391 S.C. 606, 707 S.E.2d 799 (2011)).

“manifest necessity,” and retrial therefore was barred by double jeopardy, because the judge possessed this knowledge before jeopardy attached and, “rather than proceeding to try the petitioner, knowing what she did of his criminal history, the trial judge should have recused herself”); In re Morris v. Livote, 105 A.D.3d 43, 47, 962 N.Y.S.2d 59, 62 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dept. 2013) (double jeopardy barred a retrial after the first trial ended with the judge’s granting the prosecution’s motion for a mistrial based on “defense counsel’s improper questioning” of a prosecution witness: “Although defense counsel’s disregard of the court’s instructions was blameworthy and understandably angered the court, the [defense] cross-examination did not rise to the level of the gross misconduct displayed in cases in which retrial was permitted”).

§ 17.08(f) Collateral Estoppel

The Supreme Court has held that the federal Fifth Amendment embodies a “rule of collateral estoppel” (often called “issue preclusion”) in criminal cases, Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. 110, 119-20 & n.4 (2009); Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 444 (1970), so that, following acquittal at a first trial, a criminal defendant or juvenile respondent may not be retried for any offense – whether or not it is the “same offense” within the definition of § 17.08(b)(2) supra – if conviction of the offense requires proof of facts that are inconsistent with the facts established in the accused’s favor by his or her prior acquittal. E.g., Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. at 119-20; Simpson v. Florida, 403 U.S. 384 (1971) (per curiam); Harris v. Washington, 404 U.S. 55 (1971) (per curiam); Turner v. Arkansas, 407 U.S. 366 (1972) (per curiam); Wilkinson v. Gingrich, 806 F.3d 511, 516-20 (9th Cir. 2015). Cf. Schiro v. Farley, 510 U.S. 222, 232-36 (1994); and compare Dowling v. United States, 493 US 342, 350-52 (1990). Conviction of a lesser included offense or degree of the offense almost certainly constitutes an implicit acquittal of the greater offense or degree for this purpose (Currier v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 2144, 2150 (2018) (dictum)), just as it does for the purpose of the rule barring reprosecution for the “same offense” following an acquittal, Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323 (1970); De Mino v New York, 404 U.S. 1035 (1972) (per curiam). Compare Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. at 121-23 (when a jury acquits a defendant on some counts of a multi-count indictment and hangs on others that require a finding of the same “critical issue of ultimate fact” as “an essential element,” the prosecution is barred from retrying the defendant on the counts on which the jury hung; “collateral estoppel” or “issue-preclusion analysis” cannot ascribe significance to a jury’s inability to reach a verdict on the latter counts “[b]ecause a jury speaks only through its verdict” and thus “there is no way to decipher what a hung count represents”; “To identify what a jury necessarily determined at trial, courts should scrutinize a jury’s decisions, not its failures to decide.”) and Roesser v. State, 294 Ga. 295, 295, 298, 300, 751 S.E.2d 297, 297, 299, 301 (2013) (applying Yeager v. United States to hold that collateral estoppel barred retrial of the defendant for voluntary manslaughter, following a trial in which the jury acquitted the defendant of “malice murder, felony murder, and aggravated assault but was unable to reach a verdict on the lesser included offense of voluntary manslaughter”; “the jury in acquitting Roesser of [the higher counts] . . . necessarily determined that Roesser acted in self-defense and . . . this issue of ultimate fact constitutes a critical element of voluntary manslaughter”), and In re Mof, 184 Wash. 2d 575, 577, 580, 360 P.3d 811, 812, 813 (2015) (the doctrine of collateral estoppel barred retrial of the defendant for murder after the jury in the first trial “was unable to reach a verdict on the murder charge” and “[b]ased on the same evidence, Moi was acquitted [in a concurrent bench trial] of unlawful possession of the gun” that was used to commit the murder, and “the State’s theory of the case [in the murder retrial] was that he shot the victim with . . . [the] gun he was [previously] acquitted of possessing”), with Bravo-Fernandez v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 352, 356-58 (2016) (if “a jury returns inconsistent verdicts, convicting on one count and acquitting on another count, where both counts turn on the very same issue of ultimate fact,” then the doctrine of “issue preclusion does not apply” because of the rule of United States v. Powell, 469 U.S. 57 (1984), and this rule bars issue preclusion even if “the guilty verdicts were vacated on appeal because of error in the judge’s instructions unrelated to the verdicts’ inconsistency”; unlike the scenario in Yeager v. United States, supra – where “issue preclusion attend[s] a jury’s acquittal verdict if the same jury in the same proceeding fails to reach a verdict on a different count turning on the same critical issue,” because “there is no way to decipher what a hung count represents’” and “a jury’s failure to decide ‘has no place in the issue-preclusion analysis’” – “actual inconsistency in a jury’s verdicts is a reality,” which ordinarily bars issue preclusion under Powell, and “vacatur of a conviction for unrelated legal error does not reconcile the jury’s inconsistent returns”), and Bobby v. Bies, 556 U.S. 825, 835 (2009) (collateral estoppel does not apply to “a subsidiary finding that, standing alone, is not outcome determinative” but does apply to “a determination necessary to the bottom-line judgment”).

In Currier v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 2144 (2018), a fractured Supreme Court revisited Ashe. Five Justices subscribed to an opinion which said that the Ashe “test is a demanding one. Ashe forbids a second trial only if to secure a conviction the prosecution must prevail on an issue the jury necessarily resolved in the defendant’s favor in the first trial. . . . A second trial ‘is not precluded simply because it is unlikely – or even very unlikely – that the original jury acquitted without finding the fact in question.’ . . . To say that the second trial is tantamount to a trial of the same offense as the first and thus forbidden by the Double Jeopardy Clause, we must be able to say that ‘it would have been irrational for the jury’ in the first trial to acquit without finding in the defendant’s favor on a fact essential to a conviction in the second.” (Currier, 138 S. Ct. at 2150). Technically, this is dictum because Currier’s double-jeopardy claim was rejected on the ground that by joining the prosecution in a request for severance of two charges, he had waived any double-jeopardy claim he might have had against a second prosecution following acquittal in the first. (“[C]onsenting to two trials when one would have avoided a double jeopardy problem precludes any constitutional violation associated with holding a second trial.” Id. at 2151.) But it is dictum in command mode. A four-Justice plurality then proceeded to write an extended critique of the principle of issue preclusion in criminal cases, suggesting that Ashe would be in trouble if the plurality could gain a fifth vote. Justice Kennedy, the potential fifth vote, abstained from joining this critique; and four dissenting Justices disagreed with both the critique and the majority’s holding that Currier had waived his double-jeopardy rights. Counsel will need to be on the qui vive for ensuing chapters in the Ashe saga.

A prosecutor’s attempt to invoke collateral estoppel against the accused is a quite different matter and should always be objected to. See United States v. Pelullo, 14 F.3d 881 (3d Cir. 1994); United States v. Gallardo-Mendez, 150 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 1998); People v. Morrison, 156 A.D.3d 126, 130, 66 N.Y.S.3d 682, 685-86 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2017) (rejecting the prosecution’s argument that it could invoke collateral estoppel to instruct a Grand Jury that an element of the crime had already been determined by a jury in the defendant’s prior trial on a related charge for the same crime; “Applying collateral estoppel in the strategic, prosecutorial manner attempted here – in an effort to dispense with proof of the elements of a class A–1 felony that carries a potential life sentence . . . – undermines, if not violates, fundamental principles of due process and the presumption of innocence, among others . . . . These countervailing constitutional protections ‘“outweigh the otherwise sound reasons for preventing repetitive litigation’” in this manner . . . . ¶ While the People argue that their offensive use of collateral estoppel is fair play, in that had defendant been acquitted of attempted murder, he would defensively rely on collateral estoppel principles to argue against a subsequent murder trial, this analysis overlooks the obvious and critical difference between an accused’s defensive use of this doctrine and a prosecutor’s strategic use of it against an accused. An accused’s defensive invocation of this doctrine implicates and protects constitutional rights – to a jury trial, to present a defense, to due process and to not be placed twice in jeopardy, among others – whereas the People’s affirmative use is for matters of expediency and economy and lacks a constitutional imperative . . . .”); see also id. at 130 n.*, 66 N.Y.S.3d at 686 n.1 (citing decisions by “other states’ high courts” that support the “conclusion that the People’s use of collateral estoppel is rarely, if ever, permitted”).

§ 17.08(g) Reprosecution by a Different Sovereign

The double jeopardy clause does not bar successive prosecutions by different sovereigns. So, for example, a respondent convicted of bank robbery in a state court may subsequently be prosecuted for federal bank robbery of the same bank. See, e.g., Abbate v. United States, 359 U.S. 187 (1959); United States v. Wheeler, 435 U.S. 313 (1978); Puerto Rico v. Sanchez Valle, 136 S. Ct. 1863, 1870-71 (2016) (dictum); but see id. at 1877 (concurring opinion of Justice Ginsburg, joined by Justice Thomas, questioning the future of the doctrine). Similarly, when two different States are in a position to prosecute a respondent for the same or closely related conduct, the separate prosecutions do not violate the Fifth Amendment. Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82 (1985). The “two sovereignties” principle does not, however, permit successive prosecutions by a State and its political subdivisions (for example, municipalities); these are barred by double jeopardy whenever successive prosecutions by the same prosecuting agency would be. Waller v. Florida, 397 U.S. 387 (1970); United States v. Wheeler, 435 U.S. at 318-22 (dictum); Puerto Rico v. Sanchez Valle, 136 S. Ct. at 1872 (dictum).

As a matter of executive policy, the federal Government seldom prosecutes persons previously convicted or acquitted of state crimes based on the same conduct. See Thompson v. United States, 444 U.S. 248 (1980): “The Department of Justice has a firmly established policy, known as the ‘Petite’ policy, under which United States Attorneys are forbidden to prosecute any person for allegedly criminal behavior if the alleged criminality was an ingredient of a previous state prosecution against that person. An exception is made only if the federal prosecution is specifically authorized in advance by the Department itself, upon a finding that the prosecution will serve ‘compelling interests of federal law enforcement.’” Id. at 248.

479

§ 17.08(h) Double Jeopardy Doctrines Governing a Juvenile Court Judge’s Review of the Findings of a Referee or Hearing Officer

In some States delinquency Petitions are tried first to a hearing officer (sometimes called a “referee” or “master”), who makes factual and legal findings and submits recommendations to the juvenile court judge. The judge then either ratifies or rejects the findings and recommendations of the hearing officer.

In Swisher v. Brady, 438 U.S. 204 (1978), the Court considered the double jeopardy implications of a trial judge’s overturning of a master’s order of dismissal. Under the Maryland statutory scheme at issue in Swisher, the juvenile court judge could not hear evidence but could only review the master’s findings on the basis of the evidence presented to the master. The Court in Swisher sustained the statutory scheme on the narrow ground that the scheme did not subject juveniles to more than one trial or evidentiary hearing. The Court emphasized that the judge’s review was merely a continuation of the original hearing and not a de novo hearing.

The Swisher decision leaves open the question whether a de novo hearing would constitute double jeopardy. The lower courts have split on this issue, with some courts holding that a de novo hearing would constitute double jeopardy, see, e.g., Jesse W. v. Superior Court of San Mateo County, 26 Cal. 3d 41, 603 P.2d 1296, 160 Cal. Rptr. 700 (1979); R.G.S. v. District Court, 636 P.2d 340 (Okla. Crim. App. 1981); State v. Mershon, 43 Wash. App. 132, 715 P.2d 1156 (1986), and other courts reaching the opposite conclusion, see, e.g., In the Interest of Stephens, 501 Pa. 411, 461 A.2d 1223 (1983), appeal dism’d, 466 U.S. 954 (1984) (holding that jeopardy does not attach at a master’s hearing, because the master’s findings are merely advisory).
Chapter 18

Motions for Severance (or Consolidation) of Counts or Respondents

Part A. Motions Challenging the Joinder of Counts or Seeking Consolidation of Counts

§ 18.01 INTRODUCTION: THE PROBLEM OF JOINED COUNTS; OVERVIEW OF THE POSSIBLE REMEDIES

State statutes, rules of court, and caselaw typically permit the prosecution to include in a single charging paper all charges arising from the same event or episode (for example, housebreaking, larceny, and receiving stolen property). Most jurisdictions further authorize the prosecutor to include in the Petition charges arising out of separate events or episodes that are (depending upon variances in local rules) (a) part of the same transaction or series of transactions, (b) part of a “common plan” or “common scheme” by the respondent, or (c) legally the same or similar (for example, housebreaking on May 5 and housebreaking on June 12).

In cases in which all the charges against the respondent arise from the same event or episode (such as the ordinary set of housebreaking-larceny-receiving charges based on a single break-in), the joinder results in little prejudice to the respondent, and thus there is little reason to seek severance. In any event, most courts will compel a joint trial in this situation, whether the respondent wants one or not.

However, in cases in which the prosecution has joined charges arising from different episodes or transactions (on the basis of the factual connection between the transactions or the legal similarity of the charges), the respondent faces a significant risk that the trier of fact, whether jury or judge, will view the aggregation of charges as increasing the likelihood that the respondent is guilty of each one. Thus, in cases that are going to trial, counsel will usually wish to challenge the joinder of the counts or seek severance. See, e.g., People v. Hall, 120 A.D.3d 588, 589, 991 N.Y.S.3d 114, 116 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2014) (“the defendant was deprived of the effective assistance of counsel, based on defense counsel’s failure to make a proper pretrial motion to sever the charges of robbery from the drug charges”). In rare cases, however, there may be countervailing benefits to having the counts joined for trial, and counsel may want to leave joinder unchallenged; or when the prosecutor has filed separate Petitions, counsel may want to seek consolidation of the Petitions for a single trial. In addition, if the respondent wishes to enter pleas of guilty to separate Petitions or wishes to enter a plea of guilty to one Petition upon the basis of an agreement with the prosecutor that other Petitions will be dismissed (see §§ 14.06, 14.16 supra), consolidation may facilitate the implementation of a favorable plea agreement and may also enable the respondent to steer the case before the most favorable sentencing judge.

Section 18.02 describes the strategic variables that counsel should consider in deciding whether to challenge joinder of counts. Sections 18.03-18.05 then examine the motions that counsel can file to obtain dismissal or a severance on grounds of misjoinder and to obtain a severance on the grounds that the joinder, although technically valid, is prejudicial to the respondent. Section 18.06 discusses motions for consolidation.

Counsel must check local statutes, court rules, and caselaw to determine not only the precise terms of the joinder rules used in the jurisdiction but also the procedural requirements for raising joinder issues. In many jurisdictions, objections to misjoinder and/or motions for severance must be made at arraignment or within a specified period of time after arraignment. See § 7.05 supra.

§ 18.02 DECIDING WHETHER TO OPPOSE A TRIAL ON MULTIPLE CHARGES

As explained in § 18.01 supra, usually the only joinder of charges that the defense might want to challenge is a joinder of charges arising from different events or episodes. In deciding whether to make such a challenge, counsel should consider:

(a) What will be the effect of the trier’s knowing that the respondent is charged with several offenses, quite apart from any proof of his or her guilt of those offenses?

Generally the more a respondent is charged with, the worse s/he looks. Jurors and even many judges tend to operate on the principle that where there’s smoke, there’s fire. At the outset of the trial, when they are forming critical first impressions of the case that may affect their perceptions of much of the proof that follows, they know little about the respondent except what s/he is charged with. If the charges are several, the respondent starts with several sins.

In some cases, however, there may be countervailing considerations. If the respondent is obviously overcharged – if, for example, s/he breaks a few coin boxes in public telephone booths and is charged, for each booth, with burglary, theft, and malicious destruction – the cumulative weight of the overcharging may make out a case of persecution that will sway a jury or judge in the respondent’s favor.

(b) What will be the effect on the trier of the cumulation of evidence?

Again, generally the more evidence there is against a respondent, the worse. But this may depend on whether the evidence comes from several sources or from one. If two package store proprietors give the same trier of fact “pretty sure” identifications of the respondent as the person who robbed them, conviction is more likely than if separate triers of fact heard the identifying witnesses. On the other hand, if a single complainant relates that the respondent committed an offense against him or her on several successive occasions, proof of an airtight alibi for one or more of those occasions may convince the trier of fact that the whole story is a fabrication, particularly if the defense can point to some motive for fabricating.

(c) Will one defense depreciate another?
If a respondent has a weak or unconvincing defense to one charge and a more substantial defense to another, the incredibility of the former is likely to attaint the latter. Or both defenses may be believable separately but unbelievable together, as when a respondent charged with two rapes pleads alibi to the first and consent to the second.

(d) Is it desirable to put the respondent on the stand in one case but not in the other?

If so, separate trials are essential. Apart from problems of cross-examination, a respondent cannot practicably take the stand and leave part of the charges against him or her unanswered.

(e) Is there a “clinching” piece of evidence in one case that would not be admissible in the other if it were tried separately?

If so, the item may “clinch” both cases, as when a respondent charged with two holdups left a fingerprint at the scene of one.

(f) Are there items of evidence that the prosecution would probably be forbidden to present in a separate trial of one case because they are irrelevant or unduly prejudicial but that the prosecution would probably be permitted to present in a joint trial of the two cases?

For example, a defendant may be charged with armed robbery and also with being a felon in possession of a firearm. If the robbery count were tried separately, the evidence of the defendant’s prior felony conviction would ordinarily be inadmissible. In a joint trial of the two counts, the evidence would be admissible and would be likely to sway a jury against the defendant on the more serious robbery charge as well. Under these circumstances, “[s]ome jurisdictions routinely refuse [severance] requests . . . . Instead, they seek to address the risk of prejudice with an instruction directing the jury to consider the defendant’s prior convictions only when assessing the felon-in-possession charge. . . . Other jurisdictions allow parties to stipulate to the defendant’s past convictions so the particulars of those crimes don’t reach the jury’s ears. . . . Others take a more protective approach yet and view severance requests with favor.” (Currier v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 2144, 2148 (2018)). The tactical problem here is less acute (or at least less solvable) in bench trials than in jury trials because the trial judge (whether or not s/he shares the ordinary juryperson’s once-a-criminal-always-a-criminal presumption) will probably be exposed to pretrial proceedings or court records revealing the prior conviction even in a separate trial. See § 40.5 infra and §§ 15.4.3, 22.5, subdivision (2) supra regarding the limited means available for dealing with the latter problem.

(g) To what extent will a unitary wrap-up of all charges against the respondent expedite the task of gathering the requisite defense witnesses?

Although, in an ideal world, defense witnesses would be willing to come to court again and again, the reality is that defense witnesses other than the respondent’s family will soon lose patience and stop coming to court. Even when local practice makes it possible to put these witnesses “on call,” they may be unwilling to be available for more than one trial date. If this is the case, then counsel might consider reducing the risk of losing witnesses by trying all charges in a joint trial.

(h) To what extent will the process of successive prosecution cause the prosecutor to offer favorable plea bargains?

Most prosecutors are so overburdened that they are hard pressed to find the time to try cases. Frequently, a prosecutor who is unwilling to make a good plea offer to resolve joint charges slated for a single trial will be far more amenable to offering whatever it takes to avoid the daunting prospect of a series of trials. If the various charges involve the same complainant or other witnesses, the prosecutor also may be eager to avoid repeated trials because the likelihood of prosecution witnesses losing patience and failing to appear increases with each successive court date.

(i) To what extent will a unitary wrap-up affect disposition?

As explained in §§ 14.03, 14.05 supra, the judge may penalize a respondent at disposition for taking a case to trial when the evidence of guilt was obviously strong. If the respondent is facing several different charges, all of which are strong prosecution cases, and the respondent is unwilling to plead guilty to any of the charges, counsel may be well advised to try all of the cases in a single trial. If the cases are separated, and the respondent insists on going through with each trial, the massive time loss is sure to redound to the respondent’s detriment at disposition.

As noted in § 18.01 supra, consolidation of charges for purposes of a plea or pleas covering all of the charges also can be used to work out the details of a satisfactory plea bargain and to bring the case before the judge who is known to be the most favorable sentencer. See § 18.06 infra.

(j) To what extent will a unitary wrap-up affect the respondent’s detention status?

If the respondent is detained on all of the offenses presently pending trial, counsel should consider the potential benefits of a unitary wrap-up as a way of shortening the respondent’s pretrial detention. If the respondent is likely to be acquitted of all charges or if s/he is likely to receive probation upon conviction, the resolution of all cases at once means that the respondent will be immediately released; to resolve them piecemeal probably means that the respondent will stay detained until all of the pending charges have been disposed of.

§ 18.03 MOTIONS TO DISMISS THE CHARGING PAPER FOR FAILURE TO ALLEGE FACTS JUSTIFYING THE JOINDER OF COUNTS
In some jurisdictions the applicable statutes, court rules, or caselaw provide a basis for a motion to dismiss a Petition (or to sever the counts joined in the Petition) if the Petition fails to allege expressly the facts upon which the permissibility of joinder depends. For example, when the statute authorizes joinder of charges arising out of acts that are part of a “common scheme,” a multi-count Petition may be defective for failing to allege facts supporting the inference that there was indeed a common scheme incorporating all of the acts charged in the several counts.

§ 18.04 MOTIONS CHALLENGING MISJOINDER OF CHARGES

When a Petition joins charges that cannot properly be joined under the applicable joinder rules, it is subject to a motion to dismiss or, in some jurisdictions, a motion to sever counts or charges. These motions, which address the “misjoinder” of the counts or charges, are distinct from motions for a severance on the ground of prejudicial joinder. The latter motions, described in § 18.05 infra, assume the technical validity of the joinder and request relief from its prejudicial consequences.

In challenging the technical validity of joinder, counsel must consult the local statutes, court rules, and caselaw spelling out the requirements for joinder of offenses. In most jurisdictions there is extensive caselaw (usually in the context of adult criminal cases) elaborating the precise circumstances in which counts or charges can be joined on the ground that the offenses charged were parts of a “common scheme,” or arose from the same or related transactions, or are legally the same or similar.

Counsel should particularly be alert to the issue of whether things joinable to joinable things are thereby joinable to each other: that is, whether, under a statute that allows joinder of (a) different offenses arising out of one transaction and (b) the same or similar offenses arising out of different transactions, a Petition may charge: (1) housebreaking and (2) larceny, both on May 5, plus (3) housebreaking and (4) arson, both on June 12.

§ 18.05 MOTIONS FOR A SEVERANCE OF CHARGES ON THE GROUND OF PREJUDICIAL JOINDER

Unlike motions challenging misjoinder, see § 18.04 supra, motions for a severance by reason of prejudicial joinder ask the court to order separate trials of properly joined counts on the ground that trying them together would unfairly disadvantage the respondent.

In seeking to persuade the court that the respondent would be prejudiced by a joint trial of two or more charges, counsel can point to the types of potential harm described in paragraphs (a) through (f) of § 18.02 supra. Often, there is local caselaw that can be cited in support of a severance to avoid the particular form of prejudice urged by counsel. See, e.g., In the Matter of William S., 70 Misc. 2d 320, 333 N.Y.S.2d 466 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1972) (the joint trial of three separate acts of sodomy on different victims might prejudice the respondent by aggregating unrelated evidence); United States v. Sampson, 385 F.3d 183, 190-93 (2d Cir. 2004) (the joint trial of drug offenses occurring in 1998 with drug offenses occurring in 2000 “caused Sampson substantial prejudice with regard to the 1998 counts” because “he would have taken the stand in his defense on the 1998 counts” and he had “reasons for wanting to remain silent on the 2000 counts”); Cross v. United States, 335 F.2d 987 (D.C. Cir. 1964) (the joint trial of charges of robbing a church rectory and robbing a tourist home on different dates was prejudicial because Cross “wished to testify on Count II [the tourist home robbery] and remain silent on Count I [the church rectory robbery]”); State v. Lozada, 357 N.J. Super. 468, 471, 815 A.2d 1002, 1003-04 (2003) (applying and extending the holding of State v. Chenique-Puey, 145 N.J. 334, 343, 678
A.2d 694, 698 (1996), that “in order to avoid the prejudice to defendant resulting from the jury’s knowledge of the restraining order when it tries the underlying crimes, . . . trial courts should sever and try sequentially charges of contempt of a domestic-violence restraining order and of an underlying criminal offense when the charges arise from the same episode”).

In many localities counsel will find that the judges are obdurate in favor of joint trials to the fullest extent allowed by law and that they are reluctant to grant a severance whenever joinder is technically permissible because of the supposed saving of court time. In these localities particularly, the inquiry into “prejudice” is likely to turn into a balancing of the economies and other considerations favoring or disfavoring joint trial. See, e.g., State v. Freshment, 309 Mont.
154, 164-71, 43 P.3d 968, 976-80 (2002). Accordingly, counsel is wise to point to the lack of evidentiary overlap between the counts that s/he is asking to have severed – demonstrating (to the extent that the facts allow) that the prosecution’s witnesses on one count will be completely (or substantially) different from those on the other count(s), and representing (when this is true) that the defense witnesses on the different counts will be completely (or substantially) different as well. Under these circumstances a judge might well conclude that a joint trial would not save much time and, therefore, that it is not worth the judge’s while to suffer the unwieldiness of numerous sets of witnesses and a lengthy proceeding, particularly in the face of the respondent’s tenable (and preserved) claims of potential prejudice to his or her defense.

§ 18.06 CONSOLIDATION OF COUNTS

For reasons made apparent in §§ 18.01-18.02 supra, it will be the rare case in which the defense should seek consolidation for trial of charges that the prosecutor has filed in separate Petitions.

However, as § 18.01 also notes, a very different calculus applies to cases in which the respondent intends to enter a guilty plea covering charges in various Petitions. If the various Petitions are before different judges, counsel may be able to consolidate all of them, for purposes of a plea, before the judge who would be the most favorable sentencer. On the other hand, if local procedure makes it impossible to predict which judge would receive the consolidated plea, then it is usually preferable to leave the cases before the different judges and to try to schedule the disposition by the most favorable judge first, counting on the other judges to defer to the sentence entered by the first judge rather than overriding it with a more punitive sentence (as, for example, by ordering a period of incarceration when the first judge ordered probation). In order to make the argument to the successor judges that they should go along with the disposition ordered by the first judge, however, it is important for counsel to be able to tell them that the first judge was fully advised about, and considered, all of the respondent’s pending, unadjudicated charges.

486

When consolidation is desired, it may be ordered on stipulation, or on joint motion of the parties, or on motion of one of them, or it may be effected informally by the prosecutor’s listing the cases for trial or plea together, with the acquiescence of the defense. Consolidation can be ordered in any case in which the rules governing joinder would have permitted the joinder of counts initially. If the prosecution and defense are agreed that consolidation will serve their mutual interests, the court will probably accept a stipulation consolidating even those charges that could not technically have been joined.

Part B. Motions Challenging the Misjoinder of Respondents or Seeking Severance of Respondents

§ 18.07 INTRODUCTION: THE PROBLEM OF JOINED RESPONDENTS; OVERVIEW OF THE POSSIBLE REMEDIES

Prosecutors almost always take advantage of local rules permitting the joinder for trial of co-respondents who are charged with participating in the same offense or offenses. Joinder of respondents is ordinarily in the prosecutor’s interest for several reasons: (i) It saves the prosecutor from the burden of conducting successive trials, each with the same evidence. (ii) It minimizes the risk that prosecution witnesses will lose patience and stop coming to court. (iii) It enables the prosecutor to gain the impermissible benefit of aggregating the evidence against each respondent individually to mount a persuasive cumulative case against both.

The considerations that might lead defense counsel to favor or oppose a joint trial are listed in § 18.08 infra. As the discussion there indicates, it will usually be in the respondent’s interest to seek a severance from joined co-respondents.

Challenges to the misjoinder of respondents are described in § 18.09 infra. Section 18.10 takes up the constitutional, statutory, and common law grounds for severance by reason of prejudicial (although technically permissible) joinder. Section 18.11 concludes by examining defense motions for consolidation of respondents.

As explained in § 18.01 supra, objections to joinder and motions for severance must be made at arraignment or within a specified time after arraignment. Local statutes and court rules must be consulted.

§ 18.08 DECIDING WHETHER TO OPPOSE A JOINT TRIAL OF RESPONDENTS

The considerations favoring and disfavoring joint trial of respondents are exceedingly complex. The most significant are:
(a) Will evidence be admitted at a joint trial that could not be admitted at the respondent’s trial if s/he were tried separately?

A principal item of concern in joint trials, and one that has generated considerable constitutional caselaw, is the admission at a joint trial of a co-respondent’s confession that implicates not only the co-respondent but also the respondent. Section 18.10(a) infra examines the constitutional rules relating to this issue and the special modifications that some jurisdictions have adopted when applying the constitutional doctrines to bench trials in juvenile court. For the present purpose of summarizing the considerations militating for and against a joint trial, it is sufficient to observe that the existence of a confession by the co-respondent significantly impairs the respondent’s chances of prevailing at a joint trial. Although the confession may not legally be considered as evidence of the respondent’s guilt (see § 18.10(a)), the judge or jury will hear it and will almost surely consider it in fact, whether consciously or unconsciously, insofar as it implicates the respondent. Even co-respondents’ confessions that do not explicitly implicate the respondent (or that have been redacted to remove references to the respondent, see § 18.10(a)) can be extremely damaging to the defense, particularly when they factually contradict the respondent’s theory of the defense or when the facts are such that both respondents are probably guilty if either one is.

Certain nonconfessional evidence that would be inadmissible against the respondent at a severed trial may also be admissible and hurtful at a joint trial. For example, in a robbery trial, if the respondent admits to being with the co-respondent at the time the crime was committed, evidence that the co-respondent was found in possession of stolen items a short while later will probably be the undoing of the respondent as well as the co-respondent.

(b) Conversely, will evidence be excluded at a joint trial that would be admitted against the respondent at a separate trial?

Products of an illegal search and seizure of a co-respondent may be admissible against the respondent because the respondent lacks standing to complain of the illegality. See § 23.15 infra. At a joint trial, they might have to be excluded, although this point is not clear. See McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451 (1948).

(c) What are the relative strengths of the defensive cases of the respondent and co-respondent(s)?

Respondents with weak defenses tend to look particularly bad in comparison to those who have stronger defenses. If the co-respondent is likely to take the stand, this may cast a bad light on the respondent’s failure to take the stand. (On the other hand, in a case in which the respondent should not testify because s/he could be impeached with a damaging prior record, it may be possible to present the respondent’s defense through the co-respondent’s testimony.)

(d) What is the apparent relative blameworthiness of the respondent and the co-respondent(s)?

Joint trial invites the trier of fact, whether judge or jury, to assess degrees of culpability. In a bench trial this is particularly significant because the judge is likely to mete out sentences according to these degrees of culpability. This suggests that the least culpable respondent has the most to gain from joint trial. But counsel cannot count on his or her client appearing the least culpable unless the stories of prosecution witnesses or irrefutable physical circumstances – for example, relative size and age – make the favorable comparison strongly evident. Otherwise, the co-respondents and their attorneys will also be vying to look the best of the bunch. In this and other situations of antagonistic defenses, separate trial should be sought.

(e) Is there something particularly attractive or unattractive about the co-respondent(s)?

The judge’s or jury’s positive or negative reactions to a co-respondent may rub off on the respondent at a joint trial.

(f) Can counsel cooperate and work well with counsel for the co-respondent(s)?

Do their defensive theories or trial strategies conflict?

(g) What are the local rules, and what is the local practice, regarding limitation of the procedural rights of joined respondents?

For example, will counsel’s cross-examination of prosecution witnesses be cut off as “cumulative” of that of counsel for a co-respondent? In jurisdictions that permit jury trials for juveniles, will each joined respondent be permitted the full number of peremptory challenges to which s/he would be entitled at a separate trial, or will the respondents be required to apportion peremptories?

(h) If trial is severed, who is likely to be tried first?

Prior trial of the co-respondents may allow defense counsel full discovery of the prosecution’s case in advance of his or her own trial. On the other hand, if they are convicted, they may turn state’s evidence in an attempt to win sentencing consideration.

§ 18.09 MOTIONS CHALLENGING MISJOINDER OF RESPONDENTS

Statutes, court rules, and caselaw must be reviewed to determine the local rules governing joinder of respondents and also to determine whether the remedy for misjoinder is a motion to dismiss the Petition or a motion to sever the respondent’s trial from that of the co-respondent(s). In some jurisdictions counsel will also be able to frame a motion for dismissal or severance on the technical ground that the Petition does not expressly allege the facts required to support a joinder of respondents. See § 18.03 supra.
The generally prevailing rule is that respondents may be joined in a single Petition, or their Petitions may be joined for trial, if the respondents are alleged to have participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses. A respondent can challenge the Petition for misjoinder if, in addition to charging offenses in which both of two respondents allegedly participated, the Petition charges offenses that only the co-respondent is accused of committing. See, e.g., Davis v. United States, 367 A.2d 1254, 1260-64 (D.C. 1976).

§ 18.10 MOTIONS FOR A SEVERANCE OF RESPONDENTS ON THE GROUND OF PREJUDICIAL JOINDER

Motions for severance may request a separate trial for the respondent notwithstanding the technically proper joinder of co-respondents in the Petition. A severance may be granted if, for any reason, the respondent will suffer prejudice as a result of being tried jointly with the co-respondent(s). See, e.g., Chartier v. State, 124 Nev. 760, 191 P.3d 1182 (2008); Rollerson v. United States, 127 A.3d 1220 (D.C. 2015).

A cardinal problem here, as with the required showing of prejudice generally, is that at the time of the hearing on a pretrial motion for severance, most of what will occur at trial remains largely speculative. After trial has begun and if prejudice develops, a motion for mistrial and severance may be made; but by this time the judge has an interest in not having wasted the court hours already invested, and s/he will be particularly loth to grant the motion. Counsel can sometimes turn these several related problems to advantage, however. If, on a pretrial motion, counsel can convince the court that the case is one in which trial problems may arise depending on the nature of the prosecutor’s proof, the court will frequently ask the prosecutor what the proof is going to be – for example, whether a co-respondent’s confession will be used and whether it will incriminate the respondent. Motions for severance, therefore, have considerable discovery potential and may result in the disclosure of advance information about the prosecution evidence that counsel could not obtain by regular discovery procedures.

The most common bases for seeking severance are the following:

§ 18.10(a) Severance on the Basis of a Co-Respondent’s Confession Implicating the Respondent

In Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968), the Court held that the admission at a joint trial of a co-defendant’s confession which incriminated the defendant violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right of confrontation despite clear instructions to the jury limiting the use of the confession to its maker. Even in the situation known as “interlocking confessions,” in which the defendant and co-defendant both confessed and their incriminating statements support each other, the Bruton rule prohibits the introduction at a joint trial of a co-defendant’s statement that incriminates the defendant. Cruz v. New York, 481 U.S. 186 (1987) (rejecting the

The Bruton rule is limited to co-defendants’ statements incriminating the defendant, and therefore a co-defendant’s confession can be introduced at a joint trial “with a proper limiting instruction when . . . the confession is redacted to eliminate not only the defendant’s name, but any reference to her existence.” Richardson v. Marsh, 481 U.S. 200, 211 (1987). See also Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185, 192-93 (1998) (addressing “a question that Richardson left open” and holding that “Bruton’s protective rule” fully applies when the ostensible “redaction [of the co-defendant’s confession] . . . replaces a defendant’s name with an obvious indication of deletion, such as a blank space, the word ‘deleted,’ or a similar symbol,” with the result that “the jury will often realize that the confession refers specifically to the defendant”); Washington v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Dep’t of Corrections, 801 F.3d 160, 162, 163, 167 (3d Cir. 2015) (“admission into evidence of a confession by a non-testifying codfendant that redacted James Washington’s name and replaced it with . . . generic terms describing Washington and his role in the charged crimes” violated the Confrontation Clause because “there were two obvious alterations that notified the jury that Washington’s name was deleted”); Colon v. Rozum, 649 Fed. Appx. 259, 263-64 (3d Cir. 2016) (“Although the reference to ‘another person’ in this case is less specific than the more direct reference to ‘the driver’ in Washington, this distinction is not very meaningful in this case. This is so because the jury knew that: there were only three people in the car at the time of the crime; the statement was coming from Gonzales; Gonzales referred to the second person in the car (Betancourt) by name; and, finally, the jury knew from the prosecutor that Colon was the third person in the car. By a process of elimination, it was easy for the jury to infer that Colon was the person referenced when Gonzales was asked if the ‘other person’ heard Betancourt say that ‘he was gonna rob somebody’s purse and stuff like that.’”); United States v. Taylor, 745 F.3d 15, 29-30 (2d Cir. 2014) (redaction of the co-defendants’ names from Taylor’s statement failed to overcome the Confrontation Clause problem because the resulting “stilted circumlocutions” and the retention of the name of the co-perpetrator who testified for the prosecution would have made it “obvious [to the jury] that names have been pruned from the text” and “the choice of implied identity is narrow” since “[t]he unnamed persons correspond by number (two) and by role to the pair of co-defendants” on trial with Taylor); Eley v. Erickson, 712 F.3d 837, 854-62 (3d Cir. 2013) (the trial court violated the Confrontation Clause by denying severance and allowing the admission of a jailhouse informant’s account that a non-testifying co-defendant confessed to committing the charged crime with “‘other two’” individuals, which the jury doubtless would have understood to refer to Eley and another co-defendant); Brown v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 834 F.3d 506 (3d Cir. 2016) (the co-defendant’s statement was redacted to eliminate the defendant’s name by using terms such as “the other guy,” “one of the guys,” or “the guy with the gun” to replace it, but the prosecutor in closing argument referred to the defendant by name in a way that revealed he was “the other guy”; this constituted a Bruton violation whether the prosecutor’s action was deliberate or an inadvertent slip, and although “[t]here are some circumstances when the prosecution can commit what otherwise would be a constitutional violation but nonetheless escape a mistrial through limiting instructions[,] . . . in cases falling within the ambit of Bruton and its progeny, limiting instructions cannot cure the error.” Id. at 519.); People v. Cedeno, 27 N.Y.3d 110, 120-21, 50 N.E.3d 901, 907-08, 31 N.Y.S.3d 434, 440-41 (2016) (the admission of the co-defendant’s statement violated Bruton even though the “statement, as read out loud at trial, did not appear to have been obviously redacted” to remove any reference to the defendant (and “simply referred to a generic ‘Latin King,’ of which there were many involved in the fight”), because the “manner in which the physical, written statement itself – which was provided to the jury – was redacted [with a replacement of an “identifying description of defendant . . . with a large blank space”] made it obvious that Villanueva expressly implicated a specific Latin King” and, “[g]iven that defendant was one of three co-defendants sitting at the table with . . . [the co-defendant who made the statement], the statement powerfully implicated” the defendant). The Bruton rule also is limited to cases in which the co-defendant does not testify at trial in a manner that exposes him or her to cross-examination on the confession by the defendant’s attorney. Nelson v. O’Neil, 402 U.S. 622 (1971).

In jury trials in adult criminal cases, the Bruton rule provides a powerful argument in support of a defense motion for a severance in virtually every case in which the prosecution intends to introduce a co-defendant’s statement that incriminates the defendant. The same is true in jury trials in juvenile court in those jurisdictions that recognize a right to a jury trial in delinquency proceedings (see § 21.01 infra). Some States apply the Bruton rule to bench trials (see, e.g., State v. M.M., 133 Wash. App. 1031, 2006 WL 1731316 (2006) (per curiam)), but in other States there are decisions saying that Bruton is inapplicable to bench trials in juvenile court because a judge is better able than a jury to perform the mental gymnastics necessary to avoid considering a co-respondent’s confession in determining a respondent’s guilt. See, e.g., In re L.J.W., 370 A.2d 1333, 1336–37 (D.C. 1977); State in the Interest of R.B., 200 N.J. Super. 573, 577, 491 A.2d 1311, 1313 (1985); see also United States v. Cardenas, 9 F.3d 1139, 1154-56 (5th Cir. 1993) (holding Bruton inapplicable to bench trials in adult criminal cases). This ground for denying Bruton’s protections to respondents in delinquency bench trials is arguably at odds with the reasoning of Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530 (1986), an adult criminal bench-trial case. In Lee, which involved a bench trial, the Court held that the judge’s consideration of a non-testifying co-defendant’s confession incriminating the defendant violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right of confrontation. See id. at 539-46. See also Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 58 (2004) (replacing the analytic rubric used in Lee and other pre-Crawford cases to assess Confrontation Clause claims but explaining that Lee’s result was “faithful to the Framers’ understanding” of the requirements of the Confrontation Clause). The Lee case is distinguishable from the usual Bruton situation because the judge in Lee not only admitted the co-defendant’s confession into evidence but considered it as substantive evidence against the defendant (see § 30.06 infra), whereas typically a judge in a bench trial would profess to compartmentalize his or her mind and not consider a co-respondent’s statement against the respondent. The Lee decision is instructive, however, because the majority’s opinion contains an extended discussion of the presumptive unreliability and harmfulness of co-defendants’ confessions even in the context of a bench trial. See Lee, 476 U.S. at 541-46 (the “truthfinding function of the Confrontation Clause is uniquely threatened when an accomplice’s confession is sought to be introduced against a criminal defendant without the benefit of cross-examination,” id. at 541). See also Crawford v.
Washington, 541 U.S. at 64-65 (explaining, in the context of a jury trial, that cross-examination is essential to test the reliability of a “potential suspect[‘s]” statement that inculpates the accused); Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 131 (1999) (plurality opinion) (“we have over the years ‘spoken with one voice in declaring presumptively unreliable accomplices’ confessions that incriminate defendants”’ (quoting Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. at 541)); Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594, 601 (1994). The Lee Court’s reasoning provides support for the conclusion that judicial self-control is not an adequate substitute for the Bruton rule in bench trials; and Crawford adds (albeit in connection with a different aspect of judicial self-control) a strong admonition that it would violate the Constitution’s “intended constraint on judicial discretion” (Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. at 76) to rely upon individual judges’ subjective willingness and ability to protect accused persons as a substitute for “the constitutionally prescribed method of assessing reliability” (id. at 62) through confrontation and cross-examination. See id.: (“The Framers . . . knew that judges, like other government officers, could not always be trusted to safeguard the rights of the people; the likes of the dread Lord Jeffreys were not yet too distant a memory. They were loath to leave too much discretion in judicial hands.”) Caselaw supporting the general proposition that judges should avoid engaging in mental gymnastics in lieu of objective procedural precautions is discussed in § 20.05 infra. In any event, in the present state of the law – with no authoritative ruling or even hint by the Supreme Court of the United States that the Bruton rule does not apply to bench trials – counsel can and should argue that a joint trial in which a co-respondent’s confession may be offered into evidence presents a significant risk of running into reversible constitutional error, and that that risk alone is a sufficient reason for granting a severance of respondents.

§ 18.10(b) Severance on the Basis of the Respondent’s Need To Call the Co-Respondent as a Witness

In some jurisdictions, state law provides a basis for severance in those cases in which the defense can show that a co-respondent’s testimony would be favorable to the respondent. See, e.g., United States v. Cobb, 185 F.3d 1193, 1195 (11th Cir. 1999) (“the district court should have granted Stephen Cobb’s motion to sever the trial so his brother and co-defendant, Jerry Cobb, could provide exculpatory testimony”); Rollerson v. United States, 127 A.3d 1220, 1226-30 (D.C. 2015). The theory underlying this doctrine is that in a joint trial, the co-respondent could elect to invoke his or her Fifth Amendment Privilege not to take the witness stand, and therefore the joint trial would prejudice the respondent by depriving him or her of a witness with exculpatory testimony. If the cases are severed and the co-respondent’s case is tried before the respondent’s, then the co-respondent is free to testify at the respondent’s trial. (If the co-respondent is acquitted at his or her own trial, s/he can also be subpoenaed and compelled to testify; if s/he is convicted, his or her Fifth Amendment Privilege certainly continues until s/he is sentenced and probably also continues throughout the pendency of his or her appeal, but s/he may elect to waive it in order to testify on the respondent’s behalf.) Severance is similarly required when a co-respondent has made an out-of-court statement which critically supports the respondent’s theory of the case and which would be admissible within a hearsay exception if the respondent were tried alone but inadmissible upon the co-respondent’s objection at a joint trial.
Typically, state law requires that the defense show both that the co-respondent has exculpatory testimony to offer on the respondent’s behalf and that s/he is willing to testify for the respondent if the cases are severed. This showing is ordinarily made through an affidavit by counsel or the defense investigator affirming that s/he has spoken with the co-respondent, recounting the substance of the co-respondent’s exculpatory testimony (in as little detail as possible, to avoid giving discovery to the prosecution), and relating the co-respondent’s willingness to testify if the cases are severed and his or her trial is held first.

Although decisions recognizing this ground for severance are usually based on a statute, rule of court, or state court’s supervisory powers, counsel can argue that the right to call the co-respondent as a witness – and whatever procedures such as severance are necessary to bring that about – are grounded in the Sixth Amendment rights to compulsory process and to present defensive evidence (see § 9.09(b)(4) supra; § 33.04 infra; Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)), the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process right to a fair trial (see Holmes v. South Carolina, 547 U.S. 319, 324 (2006); see also § 13.05(b) supra), and cognate state constitutional guarantees. And because, in most jurisdictions, the prosecution could secure the testimony of the co-respondent against the respondent, if it were incriminating, by granting the co-respondent immunity from prosecution, the principle of Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470 (1973), discussed in § 9.09(b)(7) supra, strongly suggests that a severance sought by the respondent in order to obtain the same co-respondent’s exculpatory testimony is constitutionally required in order to maintain “the balance of forces between the accused and his accuser” (412 U.S. at 474).

§ 18.10(c) Severance on the Basis of the Respondents’ Conflicting and Irreconcilable Defenses

State law frequently affords a basis for severance on the ground that the defense that the co-respondent intends to offer irreconcilably conflicts with the defense that the respondent intends to offer. The theory underlying this ground for severance is that the benefits of judicial economy which justify a joint trial do not outweigh the concrete prejudice that the respondent suffers when a co-respondent essentially proves the case for the prosecution by rebutting the respondent’s witnesses with a conflicting version of the events.

Typically, state caselaw imposes a stringent standard that a respondent must meet in order to obtain severance on this ground. The cases may require, for example, that counsel show that the defenses of the respondent and the co-respondent are directly conflicting and not merely inconsistent or that the conflicts are such that a trier-of-fact could conclude, solely on the basis of the conflicts, that the respondent is guilty. Compare United States v. Mayfield, 189 F.3d 895, 897, 900 (9th Cir. 1999) (“Mayfield argues that the district court abused its discretion by refusing to sever the trials despite Gilbert’s mutually exclusive defense and prejudicial evidence that was improperly elicited by Gilbert’s counsel. Although the district court’s initial denial of Mayfield’s severance motion was understandable, based on pretrial representations made by the government about the evidence that would be admitted, the district court abused its discretion when at trial it gave Gilbert’s counsel free rein to introduce evidence against Mayfield and act as a second prosecutor. Gilbert’s counsel’s trial tactics necessitated severance or some alternative means of mitigating the substantial risk of prejudice.”; “Gilbert’s counsel used every opportunity to introduce impermissible evidence against Mayfield, and her closing argument barely even addressed the government’s evidence against her client and instead focused on convincing the jury that Mayfield was the guilty party, not her client. . . . It is beyond dispute that, if the jury accepted Gilbert’s defense, which was that Mayfield was the drug ringleader who had control over the drugs, it necessarily had to convict Mayfield.”), and People v. McGuire, 148 A.D.3d 1578, 1579, 51 N.Y.S.3d 726, 727-28 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2017) (the trial court should have severed the defendant’s trial from that of his co-defendants based on irreconcilable trial strategies because “both codefendants denied possessing the gun and testified it was in defendant’s possession,” and “the codefendants’ respective attorneys ‘took an aggressive adversarial stance against [defendant at trial], in effect becoming a second [and a third] Div., 2d Dep’t 2016) (the trial court should have granted the defendant’s motion to sever his trial from his co-defendant’s based on antagonistic defenses; the defendant asserted that his written and videotaped confessions were false and extracted by the interrogating officers’ promises of leniency, while “[c]odefendant Steele’s defense . . . was almost entirely based on accepting as true the defendant’s statements, in which the defendant named three other individuals as perpetrators and omitted any mention of Steele”), with Zafiro v. United States, 506 U.S. 534, 538-41 (1993) (“the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying petitioners’ motion to sever” under Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 14 based on a claim of “mutually antagonistic defenses”; “Rule 14 leaves the determination of risk of prejudice and any remedy that may be necessary to the sound discretion of the district courts” and “petitioners have not shown that their joint trial subjected them to any legally cognizable prejudice”). See also People v. Davydov, 144 A.D.3d 1170, 1172, 43 N.Y.S.3d 74, 78 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2016) (the defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel due to his lawyer’s errors, which included “fail[ing] to request a severance of the defendant’s trial from that of the codefendant . . . as soon as it became clear that their defenses were antagonistic”).

§ 18.10(d) Severance on the Basis of the Disparity or Dissimilarity of the Evidence Against the Respondents

State law may also provide a basis for severance when the evidence against the co-respondent is much stronger than the evidence against the respondent, and the spectre is thereby raised that the respondent will be found guilty by association. “It is difficult for the individual to make his own case stand on its own merits in the minds of jurors who are ready to believe that birds of a feather are flocked together.” Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440, 454 (1949) (concurring opinion of Justice Jackson). Usually, state law requires that the disparity of the evidence be substantial.

Although this doctrine affords a basis for severance in jury trials, it would probably be rejected as a ground for severance in a bench trial. Most judges would deny the notion that they are susceptible to being swayed by guilt-by-association. However, even in a bench trial, counsel may be able to secure severance when the evidence is not only disparate but includes items inadmissible against the respondent, admissible against the co-respondent, and incriminating as to the respondent. Although the Bruton rule described in § 18.10(a) supra deals exclusively with co-respondents’ confessions that incriminate the respondent, the logic underlying that rule calls for severance also in this situation. See, e.g., Zafiro v. United States, 506 U.S. 534, 539 (1993) (dictum) (explaining that one of the types of prejudice that can justify severance under Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 8(b) is when there is “[e]vidence that is probative of a defendant’s guilt but technically admissible only against a codefendant,” and citing Bruton as support). And § 18.10(a) makes the argument for the applicability of the Bruton principle to bench trials.

§ 18.11 DEFENSE MOTIONS FOR CONSOLIDATION OF RESPONDENTS

Although rare, there are some cases in which the respondent would benefit by being tried with co-respondents. See § 18.08 supra. The procedures for consolidation of respondents are the same as those for consolidation of offenses, described in § 18.06 supra. Usually, if the prosecutor has decided for strategic reasons to try the co-respondents separately, s/he will resist the respondent’s motion for consolidation. In arguing the motion to the court, defense counsel should both point to whatever specific prejudice the respondent is suffering as a result of being tried separately and also advert to any economies that would be effected by a joint trial (compare § 18.05 supra), noting previous cases in which the prosecutor has elected to conduct a single trial of multiple respondents in similar circumstances, apparently in recognition of the force of those economies.
Chapter 19
Motions for Diversion, ACD, Stetting

§ 19.01 THE NATURE OF THE MOTION; DEFENSE COUNSEL’S RESPONSIBILITIES

Many localities have more or less formal procedures for “diverting” criminal and juvenile delinquency cases out of the system. Such diversion procedures go by different names in different jurisdictions (including “adjournment in contemplation of dismissal” (“ACD”) and “stetting”). See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 315.3 (2018) (“adjournment in contemplation of dismissal”: authorizing adjournment of a delinquency case “for a period not to exceed six months, with a view to ultimate dismissal of the petition in furtherance of justice”); WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.080 (2018) (“diversion agreement”: “a contract between a juvenile accused of an offense and a diversion unit whereby the juvenile agrees to fulfill certain conditions in lieu of prosecution”; a “diversion agreement may not exceed a period of six months”).

Unlike criminal cases, where diversion usually is available only at the pretrial stage, diversion in a delinquency case is available in some jurisdictions both prior to trial and after a respondent has been convicted (at trial or by means of a guilty plea). See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 315.3(1) (authorizing an ACD in a delinquency case “at any time prior to the entering of a finding under section 352.1,” which is a determination at “the conclusion of the [sentencing] . . . hearing” that “the respondent requires supervision, treatment or confinement,” N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 352.1 (2018)). Compare CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 654.2(a) (2018) (authorizing pretrial diversion of a delinquency case for a period of six months, with possible extensions “to enable the minor to complete the program”; “If the minor successfully completes the program of supervision, the court shall order the petition be dismissed.”), with CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE §§ 790 - 794 (2018) (providing for a “deferred entry of judgment” and possible dismissal of the case after a guilty plea: upon a minor’s admission of “each allegation contained in the petition and waive[r] [of the] time for the pronouncement of judgment,” the case is deferred for a period of 12 to 36 months and the youth is placed on probation with specified conditions; if the respondent successfully completes the program, “the court shall dismiss the charge or charges against the minor”); compare N.J. STAT. ANN. § 2A:4A-73(a) (2018) (providing for pretrial diversion of a delinquency complaint to an “intake conference” or a “juvenile conference committee”), with N.J. STAT. ANN. § 2A:4A-43(b)(1) (2018) (providing for a post-conviction “deferred disposition” with possible dismissal: upon a finding of delinquency, the court may “[a]djourn formal entry of disposition of the case for a period not to exceed 12 months for the purpose of determining whether the juvenile makes a satisfactory adjustment, and if during the period of continuance the juvenile makes such an adjustment, [the court may] dismiss the complaint”). See also N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 315.2 (2018) (authorizing an even broader remedy of immediate dismissal of a delinquency petition “in the furtherance of justice,” “at any time subsequent to the filing of the petition,” upon the court’s finding that “dismissal is required as a matter of judicial discretion” in light of “the circumstances of the crime,” “the history, character and condition of the respondent,” other statutorily enumerated factors, and any “other relevant fact[s] indicating that a finding would serve no useful purpose”); State ex rel. Juvenile Department of Multnomah County v. Dreyer, 328 Or. 332, 334, 338, 341, 976 P.2d 1123, 1125-26, 1128 (1999) (a delinquency petition can be dismissed in the furtherance of justice after adjudication even though the applicable statute “does not itself grant juvenile courts the authority to dismiss a delinquency petition after adjudication, [because] the statute establishes that the legislature contemplated that petitions might be dismissed at that stage”).

The usual features of diversion, at both the pretrial and postconviction stages, are that the delinquency case is held in abeyance for a designated period of time and one or more conditions are set that the respondent must satisfy in order to obtain its ultimate dismissal. Such conditions usually include that the respondent must remain arrest-free for a specified period of time and must attend school regularly. In addition, a respondent may be required to successfully complete a community-based program of some sort (e.g., alcohol or drug treatment; counseling of some sort (such as individual or family counseling, or anger management)); perform a certain number of hours of community service; provide restitution to the complainant; comply with a curfew; and/or meet periodically with a probation officer or other agency official. See, e.g., WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.080(2) (2018) (the conditions of a diversion agreement may include “[r]estitution limited to the amount of actual loss incurred by any victim”; “[a]ttendance at up to ten hours of counseling and/or up to twenty hours of educational or informational sessions at a community agency”; and “[r]equirements to remain during specified hours at home, school, or work, and restrictions on leaving or entering specified geographical areas”). In some jurisdictions, certain types of restrictive conditions can be imposed in connection with post-conviction diversion, not pretrial diversion. Compare Derick B. v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. App. 4th 295, 298, 306, 102 Cal. Rptr.3d 634, 635, 642 (2010) (“the juvenile court does not have the authority to impose a Fourth Amendment waiver as a condition of informal supervision” when a delinquency case is diverted prior to trial; “a Fourth Amendment waiver condition” is not specifically authorized by the applicable statutes and is “essentially inconsistent with the stated philosophy and purpose of the informal supervision under [these statutes] . . . to divert the minor away from formal juvenile probation”), with CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 794 (“When a minor is permitted to participate in a deferred entry of judgment procedure [upon the minor’s admission of the charges], the judge shall impose, as a condition of probation, the requirement that the minor be subject to warrantless searches of his or her person, residence, or property under his or her control, upon the request of a probation officer or peace officer.”). Upon the respondent’s satisfaction of whatever conditions were set, the charges are dismissed. If the respondent fails to complete the program or violates some other condition of the diversion arrangement, the case is usually restored to the court calendar to resume the customary progression of a delinquency case (which, depending upon the stage of the case when diversion took place, may mean that the case is restored to the trial calendar or is set for sentencing).

In many of the jurisdictions that have such a diversion option, the prosecutor has complete discretion whether to employ this option in a particular case. See, e.g., COLO. REV. STAT. § 19-2-704 (2018) (“As an alternative to a petition filed pursuant to section 19-2-512, an adjudicatory trial pursuant to part 8 of this article, or disposition of a juvenile delinquent pursuant to section 19-2-907, the district attorney may agree to allow a juvenile to participate in a diversion program established in accordance with section 19-2-303.”). Although judicial approval may be needed if the case has progressed beyond a certain stage (usually arraignment), judges commonly sign off on any diversion arrangement supported by the prosecutor.

In some jurisdictions, a statute or rule or local practice authorizes the court to grant a defense request for diversion notwithstanding a prosecutor’s objection. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT.
Act § 315.3 (authorizing a judicial grant of an ACD “upon motion of . . . the respondent,” and omitting any requirement of prosecutorial consent even though the statute’s adult court analogue, N.Y. CRIM. PROC. L. § 170.55(1) (2018), expressly requires the prosecutor’s consent for a judicial grant of a defense motion for an ACD in a criminal case); In re Lee, 282 Mich. App. 90, 96, 761 N.W.2d 432, 436 (2009) (in cases involving charges governed by the Crime Victim’s Rights Act, the family court’s customary power to divert juvenile delinquency cases is modified to the extent that “the court must afford both the prosecuting attorney and the victim of the alleged offense the opportunity to address the court regarding the court’s intent to remove the case from the adjudicative process”).

In jurisdictions that authorize the court to grant diversion over a prosecutor’s objection, counsel should consider making a motion supported by a proposed diversion plan in any promising case in which the prosecutor has rejected defense counsel’s request for the favorable exercise of the prosecutor’s discretion to divert the case out of the system. Even in jurisdictions in which court-ordered diversion requires prosecutorial consent, such a motion may nonetheless be a valuable tool because a prosecutor who initially rejected a defense attorney’s appeal to his or her discretion may thereafter acquiesce in diversion if a judge – who has been persuaded by the motion that diversion is the right outcome – leans on the prosecutor to cooperate. See § 19.04 infra.

Counsel’s responsibilities to a client in a criminal or delinquency case include the obligation to explore the possibility of diversion in appropriate cases. See AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, Standard 14-3.2 (4th ed. 2015) (“At the outset of a case, and whenever the law, nature and circumstances of the case permit, defense counsel should explore the possibility of a diversion of the case from the criminal process.”).

The following sections of this chapter address steps that counsel can take to seek diversion in a delinquency case at either the pretrial or postconviction stages. Post-conviction diversion is discussed further in § 14.06(b) and (c) supra and § 38.03(c) infra. Section 37.02(e) infra addresses the separate remedy of a motion for immediate dismissal of the Petition for “social reasons” or in “the furtherance of justice.”

§ 19.02 INVOKING THE PROSECUTOR’S DISCRETION IN THE FIRST INSTANCE

Generally, in any case in which the circumstances of the crime and/or the respondent’s background or other aspects of the case make it realistic to seek diversion, counsel should begin by attempting to persuade the prosecutor to divert the case (or, if judicial approval is required, to join with defense counsel in requesting this relief from the judge). If the prosecutor’s agreement can be secured, this is always the easiest way to obtain diversion.

Section 14.16 supra identifies the types of considerations that are likely to affect a prosecutor’s views about possible resolutions of a juvenile delinquency case. When seeking prosecutorial agreement to pretrial diversion, it will often be effective to appeal to a prosecutor’s sense of justice by citing evidence of the respondent’s innocence. Even if the prosecutor is unwilling to drop the charges altogether, s/he may agree to diversion. See also § 9.06 supra. Additionally or alternatively, counsel might point out flaws in the validity or sufficiency of the prosecution’s evidence or reasons to question the availability of evidence the prosecution will need at trial. (In making such pitches to a prosecutor, however, counsel needs to be wary of alerting the prosecutor to holes in the state’s case that the prosecutor could plug if the case goes to trial after all. See § 19.03(a) infra.) For both pretrial and postconviction diversion, a juvenile court prosecutor who subscribes to the rehabilitative ideal of juvenile court may be swayed by defense arguments that diversion offers the best hope for redressing whatever problems the respondent may be experiencing at school or home or in the community. In any case involving allegations of a serious crime and/or a respondent with a prior record, a prosecutor is likely to be concerned about community safety. If an available diversion program offers means for keeping tabs on the respondent, or resources for dealing with problems that appear to have been factors in the respondent’s delinquent behavior (like school problems, alcohol or drug abuse, or problems at home), the prosecutor may regard diversion as a satisfactory alternative to continued prosecution. Docket congestion and his or her own workload also tell with a prosecutor. Particularly if a case is relatively unimportant (in terms of the egregiousness of the crime and the probable future dangerousness of the accused) and if preparing and presenting it in court are going to involve much time and work, the prosecutor will tend to favor a non-court disposition. This is particularly so if s/he is confident that the disposition will leave pertinent parties – principally the police and the complainant (and, where relevant, the news media) – satisfied.

The following two sections discuss what counsel can do if the prosecutor rejects defense counsel’s request for diversion. Section 19.03 focuses on jurisdictions in which the applicable statute or rule authorizes a judge to grant diversion upon defense request even though the prosecutor objects. Section 19.04 addresses the types of arguments that counsel can make to a judge when the statute or rule requires prosecutorial consent to diversion.

§ 19.03 SEEKING A JUDICIAL ORDER OF DIVERSION IN JURISDICTIONS IN WHICH PROSECUTORIAL CONSENT TO DIVERSION IS NOT REQUIRED

In some jurisdictions, a statute or court rule or case law identifies specific criteria for a court to consider when assessing whether to grant diversion. See, e.g., In the Matter of Jonathan M., 107 A.D.3d 805, 806-07, 966 N.Y.S.2d 522, 524-25 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013) (“The Family Court has broad discretion in determining whether to adjourn a proceeding in contemplation of dismissal . . . . Although, as it is often stated, a respondent is not entitled to an adjournment in contemplation of dismissal merely because this was his or her ‘first brush with the law’ . . . , a respondent’s criminal and disciplinary history is nevertheless relevant to a court’s discretionary determination of whether to adjourn a proceeding in contemplation of dismissal . . . .
Other relevant factors include, but are not necessarily limited to, a respondent’s history of drug or alcohol use . . . , a respondent’s association with gang activity . . . , a respondent’s academic and school attendance record . . . , the nature of the underlying incident . . . , a respondent’s decision to accept responsibility for his or her actions . . . , any recommendations made in a probation or mental health report . . . , the degree to which the respondent’s parent or guardian is involved in the respondent’s home and academic life . . . , and the ability of the respondent’s parent or guardian to provide adequate supervision”). See also, e.g., State v. Washington, 866 S.W.2d 950, 951 (Tenn. 1993) (“Tennessee case law directs that ‘the following factors and circumstances should be considered in determining [whether] diversion is warranted [in an adult criminal case]:
circumstances of the offense; the criminal record, social history and present condition of the defendant, including his mental and physical conditions where appropriate; the deterrent effect of punishment upon other criminal activity; defendant’s amenability to correction; the likelihood that pretrial diversion will serve the ends of justice and the best interests of both the public and defendant; and the applicant’s attitude, behavior since arrest, prior record, home environment, current drug usage, emotional stability, past employment, general reputation, marital stability, family responsibility and attitude of law enforcement.’”); “while the circumstances of the case and the need for deterrence may be considered as two of many factors, they cannot be given controlling weight unless they are ‘of such overwhelming significance that they [necessarily] outweigh all other factors’”). Cf. N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 315.2(a)-(g) (2018) (directing a Family Court judge to consider the following specific factors “individually and collectively,” when determining whether to dismiss a juvenile delinquency Petition outright in the “furtherance of justice”: “the seriousness and circumstances of the crime”; “the extent of harm caused by the crime”; “any exceptionally serious misconduct of law enforcement personnel in the investigation and arrest of the respondent or in the presentment of the petition”; “the history, character and condition of the respondent”; “the needs and best interest of the respondent”; “the need for protection of the community”; and “any other relevant fact indicating that a finding would serve no useful purpose”).

In jurisdictions that lack such an inventory of relevant criteria, counsel may find it useful to cite statutes, rules or caselaw from other jurisdictions as illustrations of the types of factors that legislatures and courts have deemed to be appropriate determinants of the suitability of diversion.

As a general matter, whether the judge is bound by or chooses to consider an itemized list of factors, it is usually safe to assume that the judge will focus particularly on the circumstances of the alleged crime and the circumstances of the respondent’s life. Although the arguments that counsel will make about these subjects naturally will turn upon the particulars of the case, the following two subsections offer some general suggestions.
§ 19.03(a)  Addressing the Circumstances of the Crime

When seeking either pretrial or postconviction diversion, counsel presumably will want to emphasize any mitigating aspects of the crime. See, e.g., In re Israel M., 57 A.D.2d 274, 274-76, 871 N.Y.S.2d 2, 2-4 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2008) (vacating a disposition of probation and “remand[ing] with the direction to order an adjournment in contemplation of dismissal” in a felony assault case in which the respondent and another youth held their classmate on the ground while another youth “slashed [the victim] in the right shoulder with a pocket knife”; the appellate court emphasizes, inter alia, the respondent’s “relatively minor involvement in the victim’s injuries,” that the respondent “had no knowledge that his classmate intended to use a pocket knife during their concerted efforts to ‘scare’ the victim for preventing them from working during their computer class,” and that the respondent’s “involvement can be fairly characterized as ‘an act of thoughtlessness committed by an adolescent fooling around with some friends’”); In the Matter of Juli P., 62 A.D.3d 588, 588-89, 879 N.Y.S.2d 134, 135 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2009) (vacating a 12-month conditional discharge and remanding for the less restrictive disposition of an ACD in an assault case because, inter alia, the respondent “injured his friend . . . recklessly rather than intentionally,” and “this incident was an isolated outburst”); In the Matter of Tyvan B., 84 A.D.3d 462, 462-63, 923 N.Y.S.2d 60, 61 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2011) (vacating a conditional discharge and remanding for an ACD on convictions of possession of graffiti instruments and possession of marijuana because, inter alia, “[t]he underlying offenses were minor and were appellant’s first offenses,” and “[t]hey occurred over a short period of time when, through no fault of his own, appellant was not receiving his psychiatric medication”). See also, e.g., State v. Tucker, 219 Conn. 752, 761, 595 A.2d 832, 837 (1991) (affirming the trial judge’s grant of “accelerated rehabilitation” in a drug sale case in adult criminal court, despite the prosecutor’s objection, and also affirming the trial judge’s early termination of the probationary period and dismissal of the charge because, inter alia, “[t]he defendant was a first time offender, and no evidence before the court suggested that his alleged sale of narcotics had been accompanied by violence or had resulted in harm to another”); State v. Gutierrez, 2008 WL 190989, at *1, *4 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. Jan. 24, 2008) (per curiam) (affirming the trial judge’s grant of pretrial diversion in a DWI case in adult criminal court, “over the objection of the Cape May County Prosecutor,” because, inter alia, “no one was injured, defendant did not strike another vehicle or a pedestrian, defendant was not charged with any crimes other than possession of CDS [a controlled dangerous substance], and he did not leave the scene.”).

When arguing in favor of pretrial diversion, counsel should scrupulously avoid disclosing to the prosecution the projected trial testimony of defense witnesses, or even revealing the respondent’s version of the events. Since counsel cannot count on winning a motion for diversion, particularly if the prosecutor is opposing it, counsel cannot afford to reveal facts that, although supportive of the motion, would give discovery to the prosecutor and thereby undermine the respondent’s chances of winning the trial in the event diversion is denied. Generally, counsel should focus upon mitigating aspects of the prosecution’s version of the crime, beginning statements with such phrasing as: “even under the prosecution’s version of the events . . . .” For example, counsel might say: “Even under the prosecution’s theory of what happened, no one was injured and the complainant recovered her property.”

Statements taken by counsel or a defense investigator from potential prosecution witnesses should seldom be submitted on a motion for pretrial diversion. These are too valuable for impeachment at trial, and too vulnerable to prosecutorial undercutting (by coaching the witness to explain away any impeaching material; by procuring additional witnesses to bolster an impeachable witness’s weak points; etc.) to jeopardize. Counsel should ordinarily refrain from any use or even mention of such statements that can tip off their existence to the prosecutor. However, in cases where a statement will clearly be of no worth in cross-examining the witness at trial but contains assertions that would be persuasive in a motion for pretrial diversion (such as the assertions that a complainant wishes to drop the charges, or that s/he was not injured, or that s/he and the respondent have resolved their differences since the antagonistic events giving rise to the charges), counsel might consider attaching the statement to the motion.

In rare cases, counsel might also consider arranging for the respondent to take a private polygraph test and, if the respondent passes it, attaching the polygraph results to a motion for pretrial diversion. Although most jurisdictions exclude polygraph evidence at trial, the less formal rules of evidence applicable to pretrial motions would likely allow the submission of polygraphic vindication on a diversion motion. Judges who tend to assume that all respondents are guilty may be more inclined to offer diversion over a prosecutor’s objection if a polygraph test confirms a respondent’s claim of innocence. Recourse to polygraph testing is most useful in cases in which counsel believes a client’s exonerating story but can develop little or no evidence to support it other than the respondent’s own assertions. Even in this situation, however, the dangers and uncertainties that attend polygraph procedures – including the risk of false positives – call for extreme caution: Counsel who are considering going the polygraph route should (1) first commission a confidential polygraph examination by a reputable examiner and (2) submit the results only if (a) the examiner reaches a firm conclusion of the truthfulness of the client’s declarations of innocence and of all significant aspects of the client’s story relating to his or her activities or whereabouts at the time of the crime; and (b) the recorded dialogue between the examiner and the respondent will not give the prosecutor a preview of unobvious aspects of the defense case at trial or provide the prosecutor with material for impeaching the respondent’s trial testimony.

In describing the mitigating aspects of the crime, counsel should not play into rejoinders by the prosecutor or the judge that counsel is inappropriately minimizing the gravity of the offense or the trauma to the victim. It is often an effective tactic to state explicitly that counsel does not wish to minimize the gravity of the offense and then to go on to make the point that nonetheless the offense is less serious than many of the serious crimes prosecuted in juvenile court.

§ 19.03(b) Addressing the Circumstances of the Respondent’s Life

In some jurisdictions, diversion is limited to respondents who have no prior convictions.
Even in jurisdictions where diversion is not so limited, a respondent’s lack of prior convictions will usually be an important factor to emphasize. In all jurisdictions, it is always worthwhile to stress the lack of prior arrests in any case in which the respondent has never been arrested before. See, e.g., In the Matter of Nigel H., 136 A.D.3d 1033, 1033-34, 26 N.Y.S.3d 301, 302-04 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2016) (the Family Court “improvidently exercised its discretion” in denying an ACD and instead “imposing a period of probation” in an arson case; the appellate court emphasizes that “Nigel H. had no prior criminal history and no problems in his foster home or at school, notwithstanding prior physical abuse and neglect by his biological parents,” and that “[t]here is no indication that Nigel H. ever used drugs or alcohol, or was affiliated with a gang”); In re Narvanda S., 109 A.D.3d 710, 711-14, 972 N.Y.S.2d 1, 2-5 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2013) (reversing a disposition of probation and remanding for an ACD in a case in which the respondent was convicted at trial of sexual abuse and forcible touching and had a record of absences from school, and in which a mental health expert recommended probation; the appellate court emphasizes, inter alia, that “[t]his was appellant’s first and only contact with the juvenile justice system both before and after the incident,” he “had no reported history of illegal drug or alcohol use, he was not involved with a gang,” and “his academic performance . . . improved”). Of course, before making any such assertions about the respondent’s prior record, it is essential that counsel not only question the client and his or her parent(s) thoroughly but also check court records, probation records, and, if possible, police records.

Because many juvenile court judges consider a child’s conduct at school to be an important consideration in assessing the child’s character and predicting the likelihood of his or her commission of offenses in the future (see §§ 4.17, 4.21(b)(2) supra), counsel should cite any favorable aspects of the respondent’s attendance record and academic performance as well as any participation in school activities. Counsel should provide the court with concrete evidence of the child’s good school performance such as, e.g., copies of the respondent’s attendance records, showing that s/he regularly attends school; the respondent’s report card(s), showing that s/he is receiving good grades; copies of any awards that the respondent has won at school; copies of exam papers on which the respondent received exceptionally good grades; copies of papers written for school that express constructive self-critical insights, unselfish attitudes, and touching feelings; and letters from teachers, deans, principals, and/or guidance counselors, attesting to the respondent’s regular school attendance, good behavior, and good academic performance. See, e.g., In re Narvanda S., 109 A.D.3d at 713, 972 N.Y.S.2d at 4 (explaining that the court’s decision to order an ACD is supported by, inter alia, “[l]etters from appellant’s school social worker and two of his teachers [which] confirmed his progress in school (80 average) and his regular attendance”). If the respondent plays on any school teams, after-school teams, or community-center teams, counsel should obtain and append letters from coaches attesting to the respondent’s reliability and good sportsmanship, along with photographs of any awards the respondent has won, particularly for good sportsmanship. If the respondent is involved in any activities such as orchestra, drama, art classes, or vocational training at school or after school, counsel should obtain and append letters from the teachers or supervisors, along with exhibits demonstrating the respondent’s skill, such as pictures the respondent has drawn or pottery the respondent has made (which can have the effect not only of humanizing the respondent but also demonstrating that the respondent has talents that, if fostered and guided, will help keep the respondent out of trouble in the future).

The guiding philosophy of diversion in most jurisdictions is that the use of community-based rehabilitative services can obviate the need for expending the resources of the criminal and juvenile justice systems. Thus, it will usually be productive to present a judge with any information counsel can offer to show that the respondent is likely to benefit from rehabilitative services. As §§ 6.05 and 12.07 supra and § 38.09 infra suggest, counsel should identify a client’s educational problems and any other sorts of problems (e.g., substance abuse problems; psychological problems) as early in the case as possible and take steps to remedy them, including arranging for the client’s participation in appropriate community-based programs so that s/he has a successful track record of participation in the program that can be cited at sentencing in the event of conviction. If the client is already participating in such a program at the time when pretrial diversion can be requested, evidence of the client’s successful performance in the program may be very persuasive to a judge in deciding whether to grant diversion. See, e.g., In re Juan P., 114 A.D.3d 460, 460, 462-63, 464, 980 N.Y.S.2d 397, 398, 400-01, 402 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2014) (vacating a disposition of probation and remanding for an ACD because this was the respondent’s “first offense,” he had a solid record of academic achievement, and he “participated in a sexual behavior program”); In the Matter of Tyvan B., 84 A.D.3d 462, 462-63, 923 N.Y.S.2d 60, 61 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2011) (explaining that an ACD should have been granted at disposition because, inter alia, the respondent’s mother “addressed her son’s need for psychiatric treatment prior to any intervention from the court,” and, “[a]t [the] time of the dispositional hearing [he] was receiving appropriate medication and therapy”). See also, e.g., State v. Gutierrez, 2008 WL 190989, at *1 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. Jan. 24, 2008) (per curiam) (affirming the trial judge’s grant of pretrial diversion in an adult criminal case, “over the objection of the . . . Prosecutor,” because, inter alia, “the probation officer pointed to defendant’s enrollment in an outpatient drug and alcohol treatment program, and his ‘amenability to treatment, [which] bode well for the likelihood of success with PTI [Pretrial Intervention] services’”). In such cases, counsel should obtain a letter from the program (and, ideally, from the respondent’s own counselor), attesting to the client’s faithful attendance and the progress s/he has already made.

In any case in which the respondent’s behavior – at school or at home or both – has improved significantly since the time of arrest, this is a fact that a judge may view as particularly compelling. See, e.g., In re Narvanda S., 109 A.D.3d at 712-14, 972 N.Y.S.2d at 4-5 (explaining that the appropriateness of an ACD is shown by, inter alia, the respondent’s “great strides in school performance in the almost 14-month period since the underlying offense”: “Although appellant had 24 absences during the 2010-2011 school year, by the fall of 2011, when the hearing took place, his academic performance had improved and he only had four absences, two of which were attributable to court appearances in connection with the underlying petition. The November 2011 probation report indicates that prior to the incident, appellant had also been associating with some ‘negative peers’ at school, but after the petition was brought, he stopped contact with them.”); In re Besjon B., 99 A.D.3d 526, 526, 951 N.Y.S.2d 868, 868 (N.Y. App.
Div., 1st Dep’t 2012) (vacating a disposition of probation and remanding for an ACD in a case in which the respondent was convicted at trial of assault and menacing; the court explains that an ACD is appropriate because the offense was the 11-year-old respondent’s “only conflict with the law,” “[t]he circumstances of the assault were not particularly egregious,” and “[a]lthough appellant’s school record had been unsatisfactory, it had greatly improved by the time of the disposition”); In re Jonnevin B., 93 A.D.3d 572, 572, 942 N.Y.S.2d 43, 44 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2012) (explaining that the trial court should have granted an ACD because of, inter alia, “the progress [the respondent had] made”: “it appeared that appellant was living in an unstable home at the time of the offense and had subsequently been placed in a stable foster home, where he posed no behavioral problems and had been attending school without any absences or further disciplinary issues”); In re Joel J., 33 A.D.3d 344, 345, 823 N.Y.S.2d 7, 9 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2006) (the appropriateness of an ACD was demonstrated by, inter alia, the respondent’s “significant progress in the period of time between his arrest and the date of disposition”: “He was subjected to random drug testing on three separate occasions, with negative results. Appellant appeared at each court session and was responsive to the services provided by SCAN (Supportive Children’s Advocacy Network).”). Cf. § 4.21(d)(1) supra.

It will often be effective to have the client’s parent(s) and/or other relatives inform the court – either in a letter or by addressing the judge orally in court – about the client’s good behavior at home. Although a judge may discount such statements on grounds of bias, counsel should not underestimate the potential benefits. See, e.g., In re Narvanda S., 109 A.D.3d at 713, 972 N.Y.S.2d at 4 (explaining that the appropriateness of an ACD in this sexual abuse case was shown by, inter alia, the mother of the respondent “describing him as being nice and respectful towards the people in his community which he enjoys,” and her report that “although he sometimes failed to do his chores, he adhered to his curfew”).

If counsel is able to obtain a statement from the complainant that s/he supports the handling of the case through a means other than a criminal prosecution, this will often be highly persuasive to a judge. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Pyles, 423 Mass. 717, 718, 724, 672 N.E.2d 96, 97, 100 (1996) (diversion in an adult criminal case was appropriate, notwithstanding the seriousness of the charge – assault with a dangerous weapon based on allegations that “the defendant, during an argument, cocked and pointed a handgun at his twelve year old nephew, in the presence of the boy’s mother (defendant’s sister)” – because, inter alia, “the victim’s mother (defendant’s sister) stated that it was unnecessary to incarcerate her brother to deal with the problem that had occurred”). (There is nothing wrong with defense counsel’s talking to a complainant about dropping the charges, so long as counsel is honest and not overbearing. See, e.g., N.Y. County Lawyers’ Ethics Opinion 711, N.Y. Law J., Aug. 21, 1996, at 2, col. 3 (available at https://www.nycla.org/siteFiles/Publications/Publications486_0.pdf) (a defense attorney may “ask[ ] the complaining witness to request the prosecution to drop the charges,” as long as counsel does not “bully” or lie to the witness or “seek to advise the complaining witness as to whether the benefits of dropping the charges outweigh the benefits of going forward”). It is usually a good idea to have a reliable witness present during the discussion, or unfounded charges against counsel may later be made.)
§ 19.04 SEEKING JUDICIAL RELIEF DESPITE A STATUTE OR RULE REQUIRING PROSECUTORIAL CONSENT TO DIVERSION

Even in a jurisdiction in which a statute or rule expressly conditions a grant of diversion on prosecutorial consent, it may nonetheless be worthwhile to file a motion for diversion with the court. Notwithstanding the apparently unequivocal language of the applicable statute or rule, it may be possible to persuade a judge that an exception is possible. See, e.g., People v. Siragusa, 81 Misc.2d 368, 371-73, 366 N.Y.S.2d 336, 341-43 (Dist. Ct., Nassau Cty. 1975) (although “[t]he statute makes the District Attorney’s consent mandatory before the Court can grant a defendant an A.C.O.D. [adjournment in contemplation of dismissal],” the court nonetheless grants the ACOD over the prosecutor’s objection because “[t]he Court finds that the prosecutor had originally given his consent” and subsequently “withdr[e]w that consent solely because the defendant refused to agree to release the County and the police from any civil liability,” which “[t]he Court finds . . . to be an unreasonable condition amounting to undue pressure and an act of coercion and duress”).

When filing a motion under these circumstances, defense counsel can (and ordinarily will) make the types of arguments described in § 19.03 supra. But it is always advisable – and often essential – also to present the judge with a reason to view the prosecutor’s objection to diversion as unreasonable. This might be done by “‘show[ing] that a prosecutorial veto (a) was not premised upon a consideration of all relevant factors, (b) was based upon a consideration of irrelevant or inappropriate factors, or (c) amounted to a clear error in judgment,’” especially if “‘the prosecutorial error complained of will clearly subvert the goals underlying [the pretrial diversion program].’” State v. Gutierrez, 2008 WL 190989, at *1, *3, *5 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. Jan. 24, 2008) (per curiam) (quoting this standard for a judicial override of a prosecutor’s objection to diversion, and then applying the standard to hold that the prosecutor’s “reject[ion] [of the] defendant from PTI [Pretrial Intervention Program] solely because of his immigration status” was “a patent and gross abuse of discretion that a reviewing court is obliged to overturn”). Cases holding that a prosecutor’s discretion to withhold consent to diversion is judicially reviewable and was abused can be cited. See, e.g., State v. Maguire, 168 N.J. Super. 109, 116-18, 401 A.2d 1106, 1110-11 (1979) (overriding the prosecutor’s objection to diversion of three defendants as “arbitrary and capricious, and a patent and gross abuse of discretion” because the prosecutor’s use of “exactly the same wording” in the “three separate letters” of denial, issued “seven months . . . [after] the [timely] applications,” show that the prosecutor “failed to deal with defendants on a prompt and individual basis.”; “The fact that defendants were involved in a single night of wrongful conduct does not justify grouping them as he did. We are dealing with young persons whose futures hang in the balance, and whose applications for diversion mandate prompt individualized study and consideration. This was not afforded to them here. Rather, it would appear that the prosecutor may have personal reservations about the philosophical underpinnings of PTI and the court’s role in connection therewith. Such an attitude, however, should not deter him from acting on the individual merits of each case.”); People v. Siragusa, 81 Misc.2d at 372, 366 N.Y.S.2d at 342 (“The practice of a prosecutor demanding releases of defendant’s claims against the government and police officers in exchange for his consent to an
A.C.O.D. [adjournment in contemplation of dismissal] must be discouraged”); Commonwealth v. Benn, 544 Pa. 144, 147, 149, 675 A.2d 261, 262, 264 (1996) (although “[i]t is well established that admission to ARD [accelerated rehabilitative disposition program] rests with the discretion of the district attorney,” “the district attorney committed an abuse of discretion” by denying the application for ARD based on appellant’s previous “probation without verdict and expunged record”; “The abuse was compounded by [the district attorney’s] weighing negatively the fact that appellant denied having a prior record. The only way that the district attorney could have known of appellant’s record was to have had access to information that, by statute, should have been unavailable. . . . Further, the intent of the probation without verdict and expungement statutes would be obviated if the district attorney could use the ARD questionnaire to force disclosure of matters that the legislature has made private.”); State v. Curry, 988 S.W.2d 153, 159-60 (Tenn. 1999) (“We agree with the trial court that the prosecutor failed to consider all of the relevant factors and, therefore, abused his discretion in denying the defendant's application for pretrial diversion.”); “[T]he prosecutor’s denial letter concentrated solely upon the circumstances of the offense and, arguably, a veiled consideration of deterrence. There was no apparent consideration given to the defendant’s lack of a criminal record, favorable social history, and obvious amenability to correction. Moreover, the prosecutor did not articulate or state why those factors that were considered, i.e., seriousness of the offense and deterrence, necessarily outweighed the other relevant factors. The evidence presented a close case on the diversion question; however, the failure by the prosecutor to consider and articulate all of the relevant factors constitutes an abuse of discretion.”); State v. Markham, 755 S.W.2d 850, 852-53 (Tenn. Ct. Crim. App. 1988) (the district attorney general’s denial of the applications for pretrial diversion was an abuse of discretion because “Appellees do not have criminal records, . . . they are persons of good character and are amenable to correction,” “[t]here is no showing that the facts of this case are particularly flagrant in comparison with other criminal conspiracies designed to defraud the State,” “[t]here is no evidence in the record which suggests that in this case deterrence is an overriding consideration,” and “the district attorney general denied the application for diversion prior to completion of the pretrial investigation authorized by statute, [and thus] his decision was made without the benefit of the report, which found Appellees to be good candidates for diversion”). See also State v. W.S., 40 Wash. App. 835, 836-838, 700 P.2d 1192, 1193-95 (1985) (reversing a juvenile court conviction and remanding for consideration of diversion because the juvenile court’s diversionary unit declined diversion based on the agency’s policy of denying diversion in all prostitution cases and a statement from the prosecutor’s office recommending rejection because of “the prosecutor’s policy that all juvenile prostitution cases were inappropriate for diversion”; “a denial based on the crime itself is arbitrary” and “a usurpation of legislative authority” when “it is clear that the Legislature intended such crimes as appropriate for diversion”); In the Matter of Register, 84 N.C. App. 336, 343-44, 346-47, 352 S.E.2d 889, 893, 894-95 (1987) (finding that the juvenile prosecutor’s office improperly “injected” itself into the court intake counselor’s assessments of whether delinquency petitions should be filed and improperly “preempted any action upon the part of the juvenile court counselor” by stating that the prosecutor’s office “‘will consent to the diversion of any [of the 17] case[s] involving damage to the property of [the complainant] . . . upon the condition that pro-rata restitution in the amount of $1,000.00 has been paid by or on behalf of the juvenile whose case is diverted’”; the appellate court vacates the convictions and sentences of the respondents who “were prosecuted simply because they were unwilling or unable to pay $1,000 each for damage done to . . . [the complainant’s] home”; the court holds that these prosecutions amounted to “selective prosecution”).

Even if a judge is unable or unwilling to grant diversion over the prosecutor’s objection, bringing the matter to a judge may cause the judge to put some pressure on the prosecutor to acquiesce. It is usually the case that prosecutors are far more willing to accede to a judge’s strongly expressed wishes than to a request from a defense attorney.

§ 19.05 DEVELOPING AND IMPLEMENTING A PROPOSED DIVERSION PLAN

The key to securing diversion is ordinarily to convince the judge – or the prosecutor and the judge – that the respondent will be “crime-free” (which usually means no further trouble to the authorities) and well-behaved (according to the judge’s/prosecutor’s vision of appropriate social behavior) in the future. Thus, whatever counsel can do to develop and to set in motion a specific, detailed regimen for the future correction of the problematic aspects of the client’s life will ordinarily be indispensable. See § 19.03(b) supra. See also §§ 6.05, 12.07 supra; § 38.09 infra. Any movement on those fronts that counsel can effectuate before the diversion motion comes on for hearing will be especially valuable. But if none can be made by that time, counsel should try to demonstrate that the specificity and practicality of his or her proposed diversion program make it a sound bet for success in the future.

§ 19.06 GUILT, PENITENCE AND FUTURE PROMISE

In motions for diversion following a guilty plea, it is always useful to include a respondent’s statement taking responsibility for his or her actions and expressing remorse. A visibly genuine display of contrition can sway a reluctant prosecutor or judge. See, e.g., In re Tyttus D., 107 A.D.3d 404, 404, 965 N.Y.S.2d 725, 726 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2013) (explaining that the appropriateness of an ACD is demonstrated by, inter alia, the respondent’s having “accepted full responsibility for his actions and demonstrated sincere remorse and insight into his misconduct”); In re Hakeem F., 92 A.D.3d 403, 404, 937 N.Y.S.2d 584, 585 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2012) (the factors showing the suitability of an ACD included that “[a]ppellant accepted full responsibility for his offense and demonstrated sincere remorse and insight into his misconduct”). Equally important, a prosecutor or judge may hold it against a respondent if s/he fails to express remorse. See § 38.26 infra. See also §§ 14.22(a) supra, 38.05(a), 38.16(b) infra.

The situation is more complicated in cases in which counsel is seeking a postconviction ACD after a conviction at trial and in which the client denies any wrongdoing. In such cases, an expression of remorse often is not feasible. If it is not, counsel should consider the alternative of obtaining a statement from the client admitting some degree of error or indiscretion in relation to the episode and expressing regret about the consequences. See § 38.26 infra.
There is an even more acute dilemma when counsel is seeking diversion at the pretrial stage. In some jurisdictions, there is a risk that a respondent’s incriminating statement in connection with a diversion motion could be used against him or her at trial if diversion is denied. Although guilty pleas and incriminating statements made in guilty-plea colloquies or during plea negotiations are commonly inadmissible at trial if the plea is vacated or if the negotiations fall through (see § 14.29(c) supra), the applicable rules and precedents may not be broad enough to encompass incriminating statements made in connection with diversion motions. There is a strong argument that such statements are constitutionally inadmissible: Confessions made to police and prosecutors are held involuntary and inadmissible if “obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight, [or] by the exertion of any improper influence” (Hutto v. Ross, 429 U.S. 28, 30 (1976) (per curiam); see the cases collected in § 24.04 infra); and an admission of guilt which is made in order to obtain the leniency of diversion is no different than an interrogating officer’s promise of “leniency – no jail” (Sharp v. Rohling, 793 F.3d 1216, 1219 (10th Cir. 2015)). Nevertheless, counsel should check to see whether there is any law in his or her jurisdiction strengthening or weakening the case for inadmissibility if diversion is denied after a respondent has admitted guilt in an effort to obtain it.

If counsel believes that a statement of remorse is likely to improve the odds of obtaining pretrial diversion from the prosecutor or the judge and if the applicable statutes, rules, or caselaw do not insulate such a statement from being used against the respondent at trial, counsel and the client will have to determine whether the defense strategy on the diversion motion should be (1) to concede guilt (a) of the charged offense or (b) of some lesser offense, and to make the respondent’s penitence an element of their argument for diversion; or (2) to urge that this is the rare case in which diversion is being sought by an accused person who is genuinely innocent; or (3) to try to keep the prosecutor or the court from getting into the issue of guilt-or-innocence at all, by couching the issue of diversion as wholly future-oriented – not backward-looking – and, if this attempt fails, whether (a) to fall back to position (1); or (b) to fall back to position (2); or (c) to persist in refusing to discuss the respondent’s guilt or innocence. Choosing among these strategies and implementing one’s chosen strategy involve considerations and techniques much like those discussed in Chapter 14 supra, relating to guilty pleas. If counsel believes that an admission of guilt will be important in obtaining diversion but the client resists it, counsel will need to work to persuade the client – without overbearing the client’s will – to make the necessary admission. See §§ 14.01, 14.03-14.05, 14.12(b), 14.19-14.21 supra. If counsel is unsuccessful in this persuasion, counsel will have to work out with the client a game plan for the hearing on the diversion motion which implements strategy (3) with minimal damage. In any event, whether the defense strategy is (1) or (2) or (3), counsel will have to prepare for the hearing by explaining to the client exactly what will happen in court and by rehearsing the client to play his or her part in it. See § 14.22 supra.
Chapter 20

Motions for a Change of Venue; Motions for Recusal of the Judge

Part A. Motions for a Change of Venue

§ 20.01 STATUTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL RULES GOVERNING VENUE IN A DELINQUENCY CASE

§ 20.01(a) The Statutory Provisions

In most jurisdictions the juvenile statutes specify the venue of delinquency cases. Some States follow the typical adult criminal court rule that offenses are triable only in the county (or circuit, or other judicial unit) comprising the place in which the offense was committed. See, e.g., Col. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 19-2-105 (2018); Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. tit. 4, § 155(1) (2018); N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 302.3(1) (2018).

Other States broaden the traditional criminal rule, granting discretion to the juvenile court to set venue either in the county in which the offense was committed or in the county in which the child resides. See, e.g., Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 46b-142(a) (2018); Or. Rev. Stat. § 419C.013(1) (2018); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 13.40.060(1) (2018) (for “cases in which diversion is provided by statute”).

Still other States give the judge discretion to choose among the location of the crime, the county in which the child resides, and the locale in which the child was apprehended. See, e.g., Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code § 651 (2018).

Finally, in some States, if the trial is held in the county in which the crime was committed, the case can thereafter be transferred for disposition to the child’s county of residence. See, e.g., Col. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 19-2-105(1)(a) (2018); N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 302.3(4) (2018); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 13.40.060(2)(b) (2018). The theory underlying such postconviction changes of venue is that the issues to be decided at disposition – the respondent’s need for treatment or confinement; the types of community-based services available in the child’s community – are likely to depend upon witnesses and evidence located in the child’s home county.

§ 20.01(b) The Constitutional Provisions

At least arguably, the state legislature’s power to regulate venue in delinquency cases is constricted by the guarantees of the Sixth Amendment, as applied to the States through incorporation in the Fourteenth Amendment (see Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968)). The Sixth Amendment provides that “[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a . . . trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law . . . ” U.S. CONST. amend. VI (emphasis added). Although its terms refer to “criminal prosecutions,” and delinquency proceedings are not technically “criminal,” “[l]ittle . . . is to be gained by any attempt simplistically to call the juvenile court proceeding either ‘civil’ or ‘criminal.’” McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528, 541 (1971) (plurality opinion). As a matter of due process, an alleged delinquent is entitled to whatever Sixth Amendment protections are “necessary component[s] of accurate factfinding.” Id. at 543. Cf. In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 49-50 (1967) (despite the explicit language of the Fifth Amendment Self-Incrimination Clause referring to “criminal case[s],” the Court holds the Privilege applicable to juvenile delinquency proceedings: “[t]o hold otherwise would be to disregard substance because of the feeble enticement of the ‘civil’ label-of-convenience which has been attached to juvenile proceedings”).

Although the Court concluded in McKeiver that the right to jury trial embodied in the Sixth Amendment is not essential to accurate factfinding, see 403 U.S. at 543, 547 (plurality opinion); id. at 554-55 (concurring and dissenting opinion of Justice Brennan), the venue requirement of the Sixth Amendment is an entirely different matter. By demanding that a trial be held within “the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed,” the Amendment ensures that the accused will have access to the witnesses and evidence essential to “accurate factfinding.” See, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 323 U.S. 273, 278 (1944) (recognizing that the “large policy back of the constitutional safeguards” established in the venue clause is to protect the accused from “the serious hardship of defending prosecutions in places . . . [whose “remote[ness]” would cause] difficulties, financial and otherwise, . . . of marshalling . . . witnesses”); see also Platt v. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 376 U.S. 240, 245-46 (1964). This is true whether the State is one that affords jury trials or only bench trials in juvenile cases, since the venue clause of the Sixth Amendment “strengthen[s] . . . the factfinding function” (McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. at 547) – regardless of the nature of the finder of fact – by enabling the accused to gather the evidence to be presented to the factfinder.

§ 20.02 MOTIONS CHALLENGING THE CHARGING PAPER ON VENUE GROUNDS

The initial venue selected by the prosecutor must comply with the statutory and constitutional requirements described in § 20.01 supra. A Petition filed in the wrong venue is generally subject to a motion to quash or to dismiss, but in some jurisdictions the respondent’s remedy may be merely a motion for transfer to the court of proper venue.

As explained in § 17.05 supra, a Petition also may be subject to dismissal for the technical defect of failing to allege facts establishing venue in the court in which it is filed.

§ 20.03 DEFENSE MOTIONS FOR A CHANGE OF VENUE

When the applicable venue doctrine would allow prosecution of a particular offense in more than one court (as, for example, in States in which the statute permits prosecution either in the county where the crime was committed or in the county where the respondent resides (see § 20.01(a) supra), the prosecutor has the initial choice of venue. After the filing of the Petition, however, the defense can move for a change of venue. Unlike the motions described in § 20.02 supra, which attack the Petition on the ground that venue has been improperly selected or pleaded, motions for a change of venue assume the technical propriety of venue in the court in which the Petition has been filed and request that the case be transferred to some other court for trial or plea, on the ground that the initial venue is prejudicial to the respondent. The forms of prejudice ordinarily recognized by local statutes and caselaw as justifying a change of venue are: (a) inconvenience to the respondent, defense witnesses, or both; and (b) inability to obtain a fair trial in the court in which the charge is pending. A motion for a change of venue on these grounds may also be predicated on state and federal constitutional guarantees under some circumstances.

§ 20.03(a) Motions for a Change of Venue in Order To Secure Defense Access to Witnesses

As explained in § 20.01(b) supra, a respondent who is being prosecuted in a county other than the one in which the crime was committed has an arguable claim of right, under the Sixth Amendment and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, to change the venue of the trial to the “district wherein the crime shall have been committed,” U.S. CONST. amend. VI, in order to protect the respondent’s ability to seek out and produce defense witnesses at trial. However, because this constitutional theory is not yet established in the caselaw, counsel when invoking it should make a strong factual showing by affidavits or testimony that the defense is seriously handicapped in investigating and preparing for trial as a result of the venue chosen by the prosecutor. Counsel should also rest his or her request for a change of venue on the alternative non-constitutional basis described in the following paragraph.

In most jurisdictions, statutes, court rules, or common-law doctrines allow the respondent to request a discretionary transfer of venue in the interests of justice, on the ground that the respondent or his or her witnesses are inconvenienced by the prosecution’s selection of venue. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 302.3(2) & Commentary (2018). Changes of venue on this ground are most commonly made for the purpose of moving a trial to the locale of the crime, to secure the respondent’s access to witnesses. The defense can also invoke the doctrine in seeking to change venue to the child’s county of residence, in order to prevent hardship to the respondent in attending court proceedings or to arrange “the presence of character witnesses [who are likely to reside] . . . in the district of [the respondent’s] . . . residence.” United States v. Johnson, 323 U.S. 273, 279 (1944) (Murphy, J., concurring).

§ 20.03(b) Motions for a Change of Venue on the Ground That a Fair Trial Cannot Be Had in the Court in Which the Charge Is Pending

This section discusses the right to a venue change in order to escape trial in a locality in which it will be impossible to empanel a fair and impartial jury by reason of community attitudes, inflammatory publicity, and so forth. It is pertinent only to jurisdictions that provide for jury trials in delinquency cases. Motions for recusal or disqualification of a judge on grounds of bias, denominated “motions for a change of venue” in some jurisdictions, are discussed in §§ 20.04-20.07 infra. These may be made in connection with either bench trials or jury trials.

If the jurisdiction is one that affords jury trials in juvenile cases, the defense can invoke the extensive caselaw guaranteeing an accused’s right to a fair trial by an impartial jury. See, e.g., Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717 (1961); Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966); Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794 (1975); Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025 (1984); Coleman v. Kemp, 778 F.2d 1487 (11th Cir. 1985), rehearing en banc denied, 782 F.2d 896 (11th Cir. 1986). The constitutional due process right to a fair trial does not guarantee a venue change as its inevitable safeguard; but a venue change is one of the primary means for assuring a fair trial, see Nebraska Press Ass’n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 563-64 (1976) and may be required if other methods are insufficient, Groppi v. Wisconsin, 400 U.S. 505 (1971); Ruiz v. State, 265 Ark. 875, 582 S.W.2d 915 (1979); People v. Boss, 261 A.D.2d 1, 701 N.Y.S.2d 342 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1999) (per curiam); cf. Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358, 377-85 (2010). Under the federal due process cases, the defense can seek a change of venue on the basis of public hostility against the respondent, public belief that the respondent is guilty, public outrage over the offense, or prejudicial news reporting or editorializing that vilifies the respondent or discloses inadmissible evidence against the respondent. See Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 433 U.S. 368, 378 (1979) (“This Court has long recognized that adverse publicity can endanger the ability of a defendant to receive a fair trial . . . . To safeguard the due process rights of the accused, a trial judge has an affirmative constitutional duty to minimize the effects of prejudicial pretrial publicity.”); Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560, 574 (1981) (dictum) (“Trial courts must be especially vigilant to guard against any impairment of the defendant’s right to a verdict based solely upon the evidence and the relevant law.”). A motion seeking a change of venue on these grounds is ordinarily required to be supported by affidavits, and the defense is given an evidentiary hearing if the motion and affidavits are facially sufficient. Evidentiary support for the proposition that a fair trial cannot be held in the locality may be found in: newspaper clippings, videotapes, audiotapes, and TV or radio scripts; testimony of persons knowledgeable about public opinion; opinion polls; evidence of petitions, resolutions, speeches, and so forth; and evidence of news conferences, press releases, and media interviews by the police and the prosecutor. In some jurisdictions a motion for venue change from a court in which the respondent asserts that s/he cannot be fairly tried must await the conclusion of voir dire examination of prospective jurors (see §§ 28.03-28.05 infra); only after an attempt to empanel a fair jury has been made and, in the opinion of the presiding judge, has failed, may venue be shifted. In other jurisdictions a motion for change of venue may be made prior to trial.

Before seeking a change of venue on the grounds sketched in the preceding paragraph, counsel should ascertain from knowledgeable local attorneys or court personnel where, in granting such motions, the court (or the judge presiding over the case) has been sending cases. Unlike the motions described in § 20.03(a) supra, which seek transfer of the case to a particular locale, a motion requesting a venue change on the ground of local juror bias cannot control what county the case will be sent to. After investigating the localities to which the case is likely to be sent in the event that a defense motion for a change of venue is granted, counsel should thoroughly review the risks and costs of being transferred to those locales and weigh them against the liabilities of remaining in the current forum.

Part B. Motions for Recusal or Disqualification of the Judge

§ 20.04 THE RIGHT TO AN IMPARTIAL JUDGE

In some jurisdictions the juvenile code explicitly provides for defense motions for recusal or disqualification of a judge who is biased or prejudiced. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 340.2(3)(b) (2018); WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.060(2)(a) (2018). Recusal may be automatic upon defense request in certain circumstances. See, e.g., D.C. CODE §§ 16-2307(g), 16-2312(j) (2018) (upon defense request, judge who presided over detention hearing or transfer hearing must disqualify himself or herself from serving as the factfinder in a bench trial).

Even in jurisdictions whose codes do not explicitly provide for defense motions for recusal, the courts have consistently recognized a juvenile respondent’s right to seek recusal, reaching this result either through the application of statutes or rules governing recusal in civil cases, see, e.g., Anonymous v. Superior Court in and for the County of Pima, 14 Ariz. App. 502, 484 P.2d 655 (1971); State ex rel. R.L.W. v. Billings, 451 S.W.2d 125 (Mo. 1970), or through the enforcement of the inherent common-law right to an impartial judge, see, e.g., In the Matter of G.K., 497 P.2d 914, 915 (Alaska 1972) (“fundamental tenet of our system of justice that every litigant shall have his rights adjudicated by a judge who is disinterested, impartial, and unbiased”).

decisionmaker is too high to be constitutionally tolerable” (Rippo v. Baker, 137 S. Ct. 905, 907 (2017) (per curiam)).

In Williams v. Pennsylvania, supra, the Supreme Court sketched the contours of the federal constitutional command of recusal of a judge for bias. ‘Due process guarantees ‘an absence of actual bias’ on the part of a judge. . . . Bias is easy to attribute to others and difficult to discern in oneself. To establish an enforceable and workable framework, the Court’s precedents apply an objective standard that, in the usual case, avoids having to determine whether actual bias is present. The Court asks not whether a judge harbors an actual, subjective bias, but instead whether, as an objective matter, ‘the average judge in his position is “likely” to be neutral, or whether there is an unconstitutional “potential for bias.”’ . . . Of particular relevance, the Court has determined that an unconstitutional potential for bias exists when the same person serves as both accuser and adjudicator in a case” (136 S. Ct. at 1905). Refining this standard for application to the sub-set of cases in which a judge has played a role as a prosecuting attorney in the defendant’s case before being appointed or elected to the bench, the Court held that “under the Due Process Clause there is an impermissible risk of actual bias when a judge earlier had significant, personal involvement as a prosecutor in a critical decision regarding the defendant’s case” (id.). Hence, Williams found that Due Process obliged a state supreme court chief justice to recuse himself in a postconviction proceeding brought by a death-sentenced inmate when that justice had been the district attorney at the time of the inmate’s prosecution and had personally approved the decision of his subordinates to seek the death sentence in the case. And this result was required even though the D.A.’s position was as the head of an office employing more than two hundred assistants, where the practice was that the initial decision to paper a case as capital was made by a line prosecutor and passed up the chain of command for the D.A.’s final review, and where the D.A. acted to approve dozens of capital prosecutions a year. “A prosecutor may bear responsibility for any number of critical decisions, including what charges to bring, whether to extend a plea bargain, and which witnesses to call. Even if decades intervene before the former prosecutor revisits the matter as a jurist, the case may implicate the effects and continuing force of his or her original decision. In these circumstances, there remains a serious risk that a judge would be influenced by an improper, if inadvertent, motive to validate and preserve the result obtained through the adversary process.” Id. at 1907.

§ 20.05 GROUNDS FOR RECUSAL OR DISQUALIFICATION OF THE JUDGE

In some jurisdictions the mere filing of a motion for recusal bars the judge from presiding and requires transfer of the matter to another judge. See, e.g., Anonymous v. Superior Court in and for the County of Pima, 14 Ariz. App. 502, 484 P.2d 655 (1971); Daniel V. v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. App. 4th 28, 39-40, 49, 42 Cal. Rptr. 3d 471, 477-78, 485 (2006); FlA. RULE JUD. ADMIN. 2.330(f) (2018); State v. Espinoza, 112 Wash. 2d 819, 823, 774 P.2d 1177, 1179 (1989); State ex rel. Mateo D.O. v. Circuit Court for Winnebago County, 280 Wis. 2d 575, 584, 696 N.W.2d 275, 280 (Wis. App. 2005). The brake against improvident use of these “judicial peremptory strike” procedures is that the lawyer who resorts to them too frequently ends up in serious disfavor with the entire local judiciary – not only the judges s/he strikes but those s/he seeks to draw.

In most jurisdictions, the defense must demonstrate specific grounds for recusal. Recusal statutes and caselaw uniformly require that a judge recuse himself or herself when s/he has a personal interest in the outcome of the case, a relationship to a party, or some actual bias or prejudice.

The recusal issue that arises most frequently in delinquency cases is whether a judge must recuse himself or herself as the trier of fact in a bench trial when s/he has learned information about the respondent or the case prior to trial. Several courts have held that prior knowledge of the case or the respondent does not necessarily bar a judge from serving as the factfinder in a bench trial, since judges are presumed to be capable of ignoring inadmissible information and reaching a verdict solely on the facts elicited at trial. See, e.g., In re Kean, 520 A.2d 1271, 1277 (R.I. 1987); In the Matter of Michael W., 122 Misc. 2d 243, 470 N.Y.S.2d 319 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1983). However, recusal is required if the information known to the judge is highly prejudicial, such as:

1. When the information known to the judge strongly suggests that the respondent is guilty of the charges, see, e.g., Butler v. United States, 414 A.2d 844 (D.C. 1980) (en banc) (the adult criminal defendant deprived of due process when judge presided over bench trial after having been informed by defense counsel that the prosecution could prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt and that the defendant intended to commit perjury); In re George G., 64 Md. App. 70, 494 A.2d 247 (1985) (the judge should have recused himself as trier of fact in delinquency bench trial because he had previously convicted three co-perpetrators of the same crime, rejecting the same defense that the respondent intended to offer); Brent v. State, 63 Md. App. 197, 492 A.2d 637 (1985) (the judge should have recused himself from presiding over adult criminal defendant’s bench trial after learning of defendant’s willingness to plead guilty and after having presided over the guilty plea proceedings of the co-defendants, at which statements were made implicating the defendant); People v. Zappacosta, 77 A.D.2d 928, 431 N.Y.S.2d 96 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1980) (the judge should have recused himself from presiding over the bench trial of adult criminal defendant because the judge had presided over the guilty plea proceeding of defendant’s wife, who was his co-perpetrator, and judge thereby heard statements incriminating the defendant). Cf. Watson v. State, 934 A.2d 901, 906-08 (Del. 2007) (the Family Court judge who had convicted the juvenile in a bench trial based in part on the judge’s rejection of the credibility of the juvenile’s testimony, should have recused herself from a trial of the same juvenile immediately thereafter on an unrelated charge in which the juvenile’s credibility would again be at issue).

2. When the judge is aware of inadmissible evidence about the respondent’s other criminal activity, prior record, or prejudicial aspects of the respondent’s character or history, see, e.g., Commonwealth v. Goodman, 454 Pa. 358, 362 & n.4, 311 A.2d 652, 654 & n.4 (1973) (the judge who presided over suppression hearing should have recused himself from bench trial in marijuana possession case because, at the suppression hearing, “an impression was left from hearsay testimony as to probable cause that the appellants were trafficking in narcotics,” and this evidence was both “highly inflammatory” and “inadmissible during the trial of the cause”); In the Matter of James H., 41 A.D.2d 667, 341 N.Y.S.2d 92 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1973), appeal withheld and case remanded on other grounds, 34 N.Y.2d 814, 316 N.E.2d 334, 359 N.Y.S.2d 48 (1974), appeal dism’d, 36 N.Y.2d 794, 330 N.E.2d 649, 369 N.Y.S.2d 701 (1975) (when probation officer stated during delinquency trial that case was “a ‘Training School’ case,” judge should have granted defense motion for disqualification to avoid appearance of prejudice); cf. In re Gladys R., 1 Cal. 3d 855, 861-62, 464 P.2d 127, 132, 83 Cal. Rptr. 671, 676 (1970) (judge in delinquency trial committed reversible error by reviewing social study with “negative indications about [the child’s] . . . home environment”).

Even when the judge does not view himself or herself as actually biased, s/he must consent to recusal whenever his or her knowledge of prejudicial information would cause the proceedings to have an “appearance of partiality.” See, e.g., Perotti v. State, 806 P.2d 325 (Alaska App. 1991) (the “appearance of partiality . . . [arising] ‘in light of the objective facts’” (id. at 328) required that the trial judge recuse himself from serving as the sentencing judge in an adult criminal case in which he had presided over the proceeding to transfer the case from juvenile to adult court and had made a finding of non-amenability to rehabilitative treatment based on improperly-obtained psychiatric evidence); In re Ruth H., 26 Cal. App. 3d 77, 86, 102 Cal. Rptr. 534, 539 (1972) (“persons appearing before the referee should have no basis to suspect him of partiality; appearances are important”); People v. Zappacosta, 77 A.D.2d at 930, 431 N.Y.S.2d at 99 (courts must be “[s]ensitive to the imperative that we avoid any situation which allows even a suspicion of partiality”); In the Matter of James H., 41 A.D.2d at 667, 341 N.Y.S.2d at 93 (“[e]ven though the court may not be in fact influenced by what it hears, it is the appearance of prejudice against which the policy is directed”); Commonwealth v. Goodman, 454 Pa. at 361, 311 A.2d at 654 (“[w]e have every confidence that the trial judges of this Commonwealth are sincere in their efforts to avoid consideration of incompetent inflammatory evidence in reaching these judgments but we also are acutely aware that the appearance of bias or prejudice can be as damaging to public confidence in the administration of justice as would be the actual presence of either of these elements”). See also Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 556 U.S. 868, 888 (2009) (“[T]he States have implemented . . . [“judicial reforms”] to eliminate even the appearance of partiality. Almost every State . . . has adopted the American Bar Association’s objective standard: ‘A judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety.’ ABA Annotated Model Code of Judicial Conduct, Canon 2 (2004) . . . . The ABA Model Code’s test for appearance of impropriety is ‘whether the conduct would create in reasonable minds a perception that the judge’s ability to carry out judicial responsibilities with integrity, impartiality and competence is impaired.’ Canon 2A, Commentary’); Williams v. Pennsylvania, 136 S. Ct.
1899, 1908 (2016); American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice, Standard 6-1.9(a) (3d ed. 2000) (“[t]he trial judge should recuse himself or herself whenever the judge has any doubt as to his or her ability to preside impartially or whenever his or her impartiality reasonably might be questioned”); Ripпо v. Baker, 137 S. Ct. 905, 907 (2017) (per curiam) (summarily vacating the Nevada Supreme Court’s denial of relief on a judicial bias claim and remanding the case for further proceedings because the lower court focused exclusively on the existence of actual bias rather than “ask[ing] the question our precedents require: whether, considering all the circumstances alleged, the risk of bias was too high to be constitutionally tolerable”; “Under our precedents, the Due Process Clause may sometimes demand recusal even when a judge ‘ha[s] no actual bias.’” . . . Recusal is required when, objectively speaking, ‘the probability of actual bias on the part of the judge or decisionmaker is too high to be constitutionally tolerable.’”). And the recognition by the Supreme Court of the United States in Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519, 536-37 (1975), that when a juvenile judge has presided over a pretrial transfer hearing, “the nature of the evidence considered at [that] . . . hearing may in some States require that, if transfer is rejected, a different judge preside at the [trial]” (see § 13.17 supra) can be cited as reflecting an assumption by the Court that propriety – if not constitutional due process – would be offended if a judge who has once been exposed to the prosecutor’s adversary presentation of incriminating evidence against a respondent on a specific charge were to sit as factfinder on the trial of that very charge.

Moreover, even if recusal is not required, counsel can urge the judge to exercise his or her discretion in favor of recusal as a prophylactic measure to guard against any possible unconscious influences of the judge’s prior knowledge on his or her factfinding function, or any possible appearance of impropriety. Counsel can point to decisions recognizing that even when the judge intends to faithfully ignore inadmissible information, it may still have an effect upon his or her mind. See, e.g., United States v. Walker, 473 F.2d 136, 138 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (although a “[j]udge is presumed to have a trained and disciplined judicial intellect, . . . [this] disciplined judicial mind should not be subjected to any unnecessary strain; even the most austere intellect has a subconscious”); People v. Zappacosta, 77 A.D.2d at 930, 431 N.Y.S.2d at 99 (“[e]ven the most learned [j]udge would have difficulty in excluding such information from his subconscious deliberations”); In re George G., 64 Md. App. 70, 80, 494 A.2d 247, 252 (1985) (although “the sincerity [and] . . . the integrity of the trial judge” could not be doubted, “[s]ubconsciously, . . .
the impermissible information] apparently lingered on in the deep recesses of his mind”).
Counsel then can suggest that, at least when recusal and substitution of another judge will impose no significant burden or inconvenience upon the judiciary, they are appropriate to avoid even the possibility of unconscious influences upon the judge. See, e.g., United States v. Walker, 473 F.2d at 138-39 (rejecting the argument that a judge must recuse himself or herself after learning that one of the defendants had offered a guilty plea, but observing that “it would be better if [the judge] . . . exercised his prerogative to recuse himself [in such a situation since this rule] . . .
should be easy to observe and put no burden on the administration of justice”); People v. Smith, 264 Cal. App. 2d 718, 722, 70 Cal. Rptr. 591, 594 (1968) (indicating that “where a motion is properly made before trial, a pretrial [suppression] hearing before another judge is . . . preferable to a determination by the trial judge”); Banks v. United States, 516 A.2d 524, 529 (D.C. 1986)
(although the trial judge did not commit an abuse of discretion by conducting a bench trial of a defendant whose guilty plea broke down because the defendant asserted his innocence and the prosecution refused to offer an Alford plea, “the preferable procedure would have been for the trial judge to certify the case to another judge for trial after he rejected the plea”). The same reasoning, calling for recusal when it is not burdensome to the judicial system, would also apply to cases in which there is a potential for the appearance of impropriety. See, e.g., State v. Lawrence, 344 N.W.2d 227, 231 (Iowa 1984), partially overruled on other grounds, State v. Liddell, 672 N.W.2d 805 (Iowa 2003) (upholding trial judge’s exercise of discretion in favor of recusal because judge “felt his trial rulings might be questioned in the mistaken belief that he was reacting in some way to the fact that he had been asked to step aside”).

In addition to these situations in which information known to the judge may render it difficult for the judge to be an objective finder of fact at a bench trial – or would give rise to an unacceptable appearance of impropriety – the manner in which a judge conducts a bench trial may manifest such an apparent bias in favor of the prosecution that recusal is required or at least highly desirable to avoid an appearance of impropriety. See, e.g., In the Matter of Jacqulin M., 83 A.D.3d 844, 845, 922 N.Y.S.2d 111, 112-13 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2011) (the “Family Court Judge [in a juvenile delinquency bench trial] took on the function and appearance of an advocate by extensively participating in both the direct and cross-examination of the two . . . [prosecution] witnesses and eliciting testimony which strengthened the . . . [prosecution’s] case” and by summoning the accused’s probation officer to court to refute the accused’s direct examination testimony that she gave “a certain document which would support her defense” to the probation officer, and by informing defense counsel that “unless he agreed to stipulate as to what . . . [the] Probation Department records would reflect, those records would be admitted into evidence through the Probation Officer’s testimony”); People v. Arnold, 98 N.Y.2d 63, 64, 67-68, 772 N.E.2d 1140, 1142, 1144-45, 745 N.Y.S.2d 782, 784, 786-87 (2002) (the trial court abused its discretion in a bench trial by calling a police officer as a court witness to clarify an ambiguity in the prosecution’s case after both sides had rested; “Although the law will allow a certain degree of judicial intervention in the presentation of evidence, the line is crossed when the judge takes on either the function or appearance of an advocate at trial”; the judge in this case “assumed the parties’ traditional role of deciding what evidence to present, and introduced evidence that had the effect of corroborating the prosecution’s witnesses and discrediting defendant on a key issue”); People v. Zamorano, 301 A.D.2d 544, 546-47, 754 N.Y.S.2d 645, 648 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2003) (the trial court in a bench trial abused its discretion in various ways, including taking “on the function and appearance of an advocate when, after the People’s cross-examination, [the judge] asked the defendant numerous questions about the attack and tried to point out the inconsistencies and unbelievablity of his theory of defense”).

In jurisdictions that afford jury trials in juvenile delinquency cases, a judge’s lack of objectivity – or even just an appearance of partisanship – can be problematic in a jury trial as well. “Although the judge in a criminal jury trial does not find facts, he or she still must make many rulings that affect the defendant’s ability to obtain a fair trial. Some of these rulings rise and fall on the judge’s discretion alone, and they can have dramatic impact on the evidence the jury hears as well as both parties’ ability to present their arguments. . . . It nearly goes without saying that a criminal trial judge also is inevitably vested with considerable discretion at sentencing.” State v. Sawyer, 297 Kan. 902, 911, 305 P.3d 608, 614 (2013) (rejecting the trial judge’s and lower appellate court’s reasoning that recusal was not necessary because “this case was tried to a jury rather than to the bench”). Accordingly, in jury trials just as in bench trials, counsel should consider seeking recusal or disqualification if a judge has made statements evidencing a bias against the respondent or in favor of the prosecution or has manifested such a bias in the way that s/he conducted pretrial proceedings or is conducting the trial. See id. at 908, 911-12, 305 P.3d at 613, 614-15 (although defense counsel’s motion for recusal did not specify bias sufficient to require recusal under the applicable state statute, the Due Process Clause required recusal because “Judge McNally had previously chosen to recuse in Sawyer’s assault and battery bench trial; the judge’s intemperate demeanor in Sawyer’s intervening jury trial for lewd and lascivious behavior drew a stern admonition from the Court of Appeals; and Judge McNally’s mere observation that this case involved a jury trial rather than a bench trial did nothing to ameliorate any earlier need for recusal”). See also, e.g., People v. Stevens, 498 Mich. 162, 869 N.W.2d 233 (2015) ("Judicial misconduct may come in myriad forms, including belittling of counsel, inappropriate questioning of witnesses, providing improper strategic advice to a particular side, biased commentary in front of the jury, or a variety of other inappropriate actions." Id. at 172-73, 869 N.W.2d at 243. “A trial judge’s conduct deprives a party of a fair trial if the conduct pierces the veil of judicial impartiality. A judge's conduct pierces this veil and violates the constitutional guarantee of a fair trial when, considering the totality of the circumstances, it is reasonably likely that the judge’s conduct improperly influenced the jury by creating the appearance of advocacy or partiality against a party. . . . When the issue is preserved and a reviewing court determines that the trial judge’s conduct pierced the veil of judicial impartiality, the court may not apply harmless-error review. Rather, the judgment must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.” Id. at 164, 869 N.W.2d at 238-39.); People v. Estevez, 155 A.D.3d 650, 651, 64 N.Y.S.3d 236, 237 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017) (reversing a conviction due to the trial judge’s excessive intervention in witness examinations, even though defense counsel did not preserve the claim by “object[ing] to the court’s questioning of the witnesses”; the judge “effectively took over the direct examination of one of the complaining witnesses at key moments in her testimony where she was describing how the defendant shot the victim . . . . Moreover, in its extensive questioning of the defendant, the court repeatedly highlighted apparent inconsistencies in the defendant’s testimony.”); People v. Kocsis, 137 A.D.3d 1476, 1481-82, 28 N.Y.S.3d 466, 471-72 (N.Y. App. Div. 3d Dep’t 2016) (the judge in a jury trial “deprived [the defendant] of a fair trial” by providing “guidance and instructions” to the prosecutor regarding “the rules of evidence”: “During the course of the trial, the ADA [Assistant District Attorney] in question demonstrated difficulty in laying the proper foundation for the admission into evidence of certain photographs and bank records and in utilizing a particular document to refresh a witness’s recollection. In response, County Court conducted various sidebars, during the course of which the court, among other things, explained the nature of defense counsel’s objections, outlined the questions that the ADA needed to ask of the testifying witnesses, referred the ADA to a certain evidentiary treatise and afforded him a recess in order to consult and review the appropriate section thereof.”; the “County Court’s assistance in this regard – although well-intentioned – arguably created the perception that the People were receiving an unfair tactical advantage”); People v. Retamozzo, 25 A.D.3d 73, 74, 86-87, 802 N.Y.S.2d 426, 427, 434-35 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2005) (the trial judge in a jury trial “deprived defendant of his constitutional right to a fair trial by excessive interference in the examination of witnesses,” including asking questions and making comments during counsel’s cross-examinations of prosecution witnesses that undermined the cross-examinations, and asking questions during the defendant’s testimony that conveyed “considerable skepticism”; the record does not contain “a single instance of a question asked by the trial judge that plausibly could be viewed as helpful to the defense”); People v. Chatman, 14 A.D.3d 620, 620-21, 789 N.Y.S.2d 208, 210 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2005) (the trial judge in a jury trial “assumed the appearance of an advocate at the trial” by “improperly elicit[ing] from the investigating detective testimony that the defendant did not mention his alleged alibi at the time of his arrest, and refused to answer any questions” and by “extensive[ly] questioning . . . the defendant’s alibi witness”); People v. Raosto, 50 A.D.3d 508, 509, 856 N.Y.S.2d 86, 88 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dept. 2008) (the trial judge in a jury trial “unduly injected himself into the proceeding to such an extent as to deny defendant a fair and impartial trial” by “conduct[ing] lengthy and inappropriate cross-examinations of defendant and defense witnesses, which were neither neutral nor aimed at clarification, but disrupted the flow of testimony and plainly conveyed to the jury the court’s disbelief of these witnesses”).

§ 20.06 PROCEDURES FOR SEEKING RECUSAL OR DISQUALIFICATION

Local practice must be consulted with regard to the appropriate form of challenge to a judge (motion for recusal or disqualification or substitution; affidavit of bias; whatever) and the time when it must be made.

As noted in § 20.05 supra, in some jurisdictions, the filing of a facially sufficient affidavit or motion requires that the judge recuse himself or herself, without inquiry into the truth of the matters of fact averred. Under other procedures the underlying factual questions are heard before the judge who is challenged or another judge.

The defense is entitled to put allegations of bias into the record in any manner necessary to present them to the court and save them for review. See Holt v. Virginia, 381 U.S. 131 (1965); In re Little, 404 U.S. 553 (1972). Ordinarily, a written motion with supporting affidavits is desirable to protect the record.

In some jurisdictions there is a procedure – sometimes called a motion for change of venue, sometimes called an affidavit of bias – that is actually used (by law or custom) as a form of peremptory challenge to the judge. It may not require any assertion of bias, or it may require simply an allegation of bias in conclusory form that the judges do not take seriously or resent. Ordinarily, motions or affidavits for removal of a judge under these peremptory-challenge procedures are timely only if filed before the judge has taken any action in the case; sometimes they are required to be filed within a specific time after the assignment of the case to the judge.
§ 20.07 TACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS IN DECIDING WHETHER TO SEEK RECUSAL AND IN FRAMING THE RECUSAL REQUEST

In deciding whether to seek recusal or disqualification of the judge, counsel must balance the liabilities of keeping the present judge (that is, the likely effects of biasing factors upon the judge’s verdict and sentence) against the risk of incurring judicial wrath. If the motion is denied and the judge retains the case, whatever latent biasing factors originally existed may well be exacerbated by the judge’s anger over being accused of bias. Even if the motion is granted, there may be repercussions: The judge to whom the case is transferred may resent counsel and the client for what the judge perceives as an attack upon a colleague or the judiciary in general.

In deciding whether to seek recusal, counsel also will need to compare the present judge with the other judges to whom the case might be assigned if the recusal motion is granted. Even if the current judge knows prejudicial information about the respondent or the case, s/he still might be a fairer factfinder than the other judges who could receive the case. And even if the present judge is so biased that s/he is likely to convict, it still might be preferable to keep the judge if the respondent’s chances of winning at trial are slim no matter who the judge is and if the present judge is a relatively lenient sentencer.

Counsel can both maximize the chances of gaining recusal and minimize the risks of incurring judicial wrath by the way in which the recusal request is framed. Recusal motions should not ordinarily state or even imply that the judge is incapable of keeping an open mind. When the impact of prior exposures upon the judge must be identified, it should be described in terms of the potential unconscious effects of these exposures upon any human being in the judge’s situation. See § 20.05 fourth paragraph supra. Alternatively, when possible, counsel should rely upon the “appearance of impropriety” as the primary basis for recusal. See id.

Depending upon the temperament of the judge and counsel’s relationship with the judge, counsel may want to consider making an informal recusal request before filing a motion or invoking statutory recusal procedures. The initial soft-sell approach permits a graceful way out that will be accepted by some judges who would feel obliged to resist a formal motion making specific allegations of bias against them. However, some judges may resent such informal requests, viewing them as an attempt to use a back-door approach to obtain recusal for reasons that are so insubstantial that the attorney is not even willing to put them on the record.

In making the difficult decisions whether to seek recusal and how to frame recusal requests, counsel should always investigate both the general local attitudes toward these procedures and the known past reactions of the individual judge in question. In some jurisdictions, and with some judges, recusal motions are accepted as a routine forum-shopping device, which may ordinarily be safely used, without incurring judicial ire. Conversely, what is accepted as stock pleading in one locality – or to one judge – may be taken as a deadly insult in another locality or by another judge in the same locality.
Chapter 21

Election or Waiver of Jury Trial; Motions Relating to the Jury

§ 21.01 THE RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL IN JUVENILE DELINQUENCY CASES

In McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528 (1971), a majority of the Court held that juvenile respondents in delinquency proceedings do not possess a federal constitutional right, under either the Sixth Amendment or the Due Process Clause, to trial by jury. The plurality opinion by Justice Blackmun, joined by three other Justices, concluded that the “applicable due process standard” of “fundamental fairness” (id. at 543) does not require juries because “one cannot say that in our legal system the jury is a necessary component of accurate factfinding” (id. at 543); therefore “[t]he imposition of the jury trial on the juvenile court system would not strengthen greatly, if at all, the factfinding function, and would, contrarily, provide an attrition of the juvenile court’s assumed ability to function in a unique manner” (id. at 547), converting “intimate, informal protective proceeding[s]” into “a fully adversary process,” id. at 545. Justice Harlan concurred in the holding on the basis of his view that “criminal jury trials are not constitutionally required of the States, either as a matter of Sixth Amendment law or due process.” Id. at 557. Justice Brennan, in a concurring and dissenting opinion, concluded that “the States are not bound to provide jury trials on demand so long as some other aspect of the process adequately protects the interests that Sixth Amendment jury trials are intended to serve” – “to ‘protect the [juvenile] from oppression by the Government,’ . . . and to protect him against ‘the compliant, biased, or eccentric judge’ . . . [by] allow[ing] . . . what is in essence an appeal to the community conscience.” Id. at 554. See generally Martin Guggenheim & Randy Hertz, Reflections on Judges, Juries and Justice: Ensuring the Fairness of Juvenile Delinquency Trials, in Symposium on Juvenile Justice Reform, 33 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 553 (1998).

The States are, of course, free to enact statutes granting a jury trial right to respondents in delinquency proceedings. See McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. at 547; id. at 553 (White, J., concurring). Approximately one quarter of the States have enacted statutes providing for jury trials in juvenile cases. See COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 19-2-107 (2018) (establishing “a right to a jury trial for juveniles charged as aggravated offenders, and for juveniles charged with having committed a crime of violence,” and “permit[ting] the court to order a jury trial in other kinds of juvenile cases, excepting only misdemeanor, petit offense or municipal ordinance violations,” violent juvenile offenders”). The Alaska Supreme Court has construed its state constitution as conferring a right to a jury trial upon juveniles in delinquency cases. R.L.R. v. State, 487 P.2d 27, 32-33 (Alaska 1971). The Kansas Supreme Court, which had initially followed McKeiver in holding in 1984 that juveniles do not have a right to a jury trial, reached the opposite result in 2008 on both federal and state constitutional grounds because “the Kansas juvenile justice system has become more akin to an adult criminal prosecution” as “the focus has shifted to protecting the public, holding juveniles accountable for their behavior and choices, and making juveniles more productive and responsible members of society,” all of which has “eroded the benevolent parens patriae character that distinguished . . . [the juvenile justice system] from the adult criminal system.” In the Matter of L.M., 286 Kan. 460, 466, 469-70, 473, 186 P.3d 164, 168, 170, 172 (2008). The courts in other States have thus far declined to find a right to a jury trial in juvenile court on either federal or state constitutional grounds, see, e.g., In the Matter of Reynolds, 317 Or. 560, 857 P.2d 842 (1993); State v. Lawley, 91 Wash. 2d 654, 591 P.2d 772 (1979), although some courts have held on federal or state constitutional grounds that the state’s denial of a jury trial right for juveniles has systemic ramifications such as precluding placement of juveniles in adult correctional facilities (see In re C.B., 708 So. 2d 391 (La. 1998); In re Jeffrey C., 146 N.H. 722, 725, 781 A.2d 4, 7 (2001); In the Interest of Hezzie R., 219 Wis. 2d 848, 580 N.W.2d 660 (1998)) or precluding the use of a delinquency adjudication as a predicate conviction for enhancing an adult criminal sentence (see State v. Brown, 879 So. 2d 1276 (La. 2004); State v. Hand, 149 Ohio St. 3d 94, 73 N.E.3d 448 (2016)), or requiring more intensive appellate review of the sufficiency of the evidence underlying a delinquency finding in a bench trial (see In the Interest of A.K., 825 N.W.2d 46, 51 (Iowa 2013) (“juvenile proceedings differ from criminal proceedings in . . . [the] important respect . . . [that] [n]either statutory nor constitutional provisions guarantee juveniles the right to a jury trial,” and “[t]his important distinction between adult and juvenile proceedings favors a more in-depth appellate review of the facts supporting and opposing an adjudication)). See also Barry C. Feld, The Constitutional Tension Between Apprendi and McKeiver: Sentence Enhancements Based on Delinquency Convictions and the Quality of Justice in Juvenile Courts, 38 Wake Forest L. Rev. 1111 (2003).

The plurality also observed in McKeiver v. Pennsylvania that “[t]here is, of course, nothing to prevent a juvenile court judge, in a particular case where he feels the need, or when the need is demonstrated, from using an advisory jury.” 403 U.S. at 548. The California Supreme Court in People v. Superior Court of Santa Clara County, 15 Cal. 3d 271, 539 P.2d 807, 124 Cal. Rptr. 47 (1975), construed the California juvenile code as authorizing judges in delinquency cases to appoint advisory panels to assist in the factfinding process, while the Illinois Supreme Court in People ex rel. Carey v. White, 65 Ill. 2d 193, 357 N.E.2d 512, 2 Ill. Dec. 345 (1976), interpreted the Illinois statute in precisely the opposite manner.

Even though the federal Constitution does not impose the requirement that a State provide jury trials to juveniles, the Constitution does regulate the manner in which jury trials are conducted in those jurisdictions that have opted for them in delinquency cases. The due process mandate of “fundamental fairness” demands that procedures in delinquency cases be conducive to “accurate factfinding.” McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. at 543 (plurality opinion); see id. at 534-55 (Brennan, J., concurring). See also In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 30-31 (1967); In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970). Accordingly, jury trial procedures in delinquency cases must comport with any aspects of adult jury procedure that are necessary for accurate and impartial factfinding. This certainly includes the requirement that the jury be impartial. “[D]ue process alone has long demanded that, if a jury is to be provided the defendant, regardless of whether the Sixth Amendment requires it, the jury must stand impartial and indifferent to the extent commanded by the Sixth Amendment.” Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719, 727 (1992). See, e.g., People in the Interest of R.A.D., 196 Colo. 430, 586 P.2d 46 (1978) (juries in juvenile cases must comply with the due process requirement of an impartial jury, and therefore juveniles can exercise the traditional adult criminal right to challenge for cause venirepersons who are employed by a law enforcement agency). See § 21.03(a) infra (further discussing the requirement of impartiality).

The federal constitutional restraints against discriminatory jury selection (see § 21.03(b) infra) also control juvenile court juries just as they do adult criminal juries; the recognition of those restraints predated the incorporation of the Sixth Amendment into the Fourteenth and does not depend upon an underlying federal constitutional right to jury trial at all.

It is presently unclear to what extent the federal constitutional mandate of “accurate factfinding” implies restrictions upon the form of jury trial. In Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), the Court held that the Sixth Amendment did not require a common-law jury of twelve persons but was satisfied by a jury of six. Five, however, is too few. Ballew v. Georgia, 435 U.S. 223, 244-45 (1978). In Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356 (1972), and Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972), the Court sustained provisions allowing nine-to-three and ten-to-two nonunanimous criminal verdicts, although Justice Blackmun (whose vote was necessary to make up a majority for these results) indicated that he might have trouble sustaining a provision authorizing anything much less than nine-to-three, 406 U.S. at 366; and Justice Powell (whose vote was also necessary) indicated that he would not sustain a nonunanimous jury verdict in a federal criminal case, id. at 371. “[C]onviction by a nonunanimous six-member jury in a state criminal trial for a nonpetty offense” was subsequently held unconstitutional. Burch v. Louisiana, 441 U.S. 130, 134 (1979); see also Brown v. Louisiana, 447 U.S. 323 (1980). The upshot seems to be that if reductions of the size of the jury or of the number of jurors required to concur in a guilty verdict or both sorts of reductions together sufficiently impair the capacities of the jury to (1) reflect a representative cross-section of the community, or (2) bring multiple viewpoints to bear in deliberating upon factual issues determinative of guilt, or (3) stand as a truly independent body with the strength to resist domination by the judge or prosecutor, the Sixth Amendment will be held to be violated. See Ballew v. Georgia, 435 U.S. at 229-45; Burch v. Louisiana, 441 U.S. at 134-39. But just how much impairment is sufficient for this purpose and whether any given combination of numbers and other circumstances will produce this impairment are questions for judicial hunch. Counsel challenging undersized juries and jury majorities will find extraordinarily useful discussions of jury functioning in the classic work, Harry Kalven, Jr. & Hans Zeisel, The American Jury (1966), and in Professor Hans Zeisel’s several periodical publications concerning the jury.

§ 21.02 ELECTION OR WAIVER OF JURY TRIAL

§ 21.02(a) Procedure

The right to trial by jury may be waived by a respondent. The respondent technically has no right to insist upon a bench trial rather than a jury trial, see Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24 (1965); Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 383 (1979) (dictum), and in most jurisdictions a respondent’s waiver of the state-created right to jury trial is conditioned on approval by the prosecutor and the judge. However, prosecutors and judges are almost invariably willing to approve a jury waiver without second thought because bench trials are generally quicker and less cumbersome than jury trials. As a consequence, the choice between jury trial and bench trial is, as a practical matter, the respondent’s in most cases. Prosecutors and judges are ordinarily only too happy to sign off on a respondent’s waiver. See § 21.02(b) infra.

In many jurisdictions the respondent’s waiver must be in writing. See also State v. Liddell, 672 N.W.2d 805, 813-14 (Iowa 2003) (construing a state rule of criminal procedure to require that when a defendant waives the right to a jury trial, the judge must engage in “some in-court colloquy with the defendant . . . in order to ensure the defendant’s waiver is knowing, voluntary, and intelligent,” and listing matters for the judge to cover in the “in-court colloquy” to “ascertain whether the defendant understands the difference between jury and non-jury trials”). Local practice often requires that the written waiver be signed not only by the respondent, but also by his or her parent, the defense attorney, the prosecutor, and the judge.

Procedures vary regarding when the respondent is required to make an election between jury trial and bench trial. In some States s/he must demand or waive a jury at arraignment; in other States, within a specified period before trial. If the respondent demands a jury at arraignment, s/he is ordinarily given leave, rather freely, to withdraw that demand later and ask for a bench trial. If s/he waives at arraignment, subsequent requests for jury trial may be entertained in the court’s discretion; some judges grant them liberally, but many are grudging. Of course, the initial waiver may also be attacked as invalid. See, e.g., In re R.A.B., 197 Ill. 2d 358, 368, 757 N.E.2d 887, 894, 259 Ill. Dec. 24, 31 (2001). If made without a lawyer at arraignment, it is pretty clearly invalid by force of the federal constitutional right to counsel. See Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52 (1961); Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1 (1970).

§ 21.02(b) Factors That Should Be Considered in Deciding Whether To Elect or Waive a Jury Trial

Because bench trials are generally quicker and less cumbersome than jury trials, prosecutors and judges are ordinarily willing to approve a jury waiver without second thought. As a consequence, the choice between jury trial and bench trial is, in most cases, the respondent’s. The factors to be considered in making this choice are manifold. See §§ 27.04-
1. What judge will try the case if a jury is waived, and how appealing to that judge is this type of case, or this respondent’s defense, or this respondent as a person? Particular judges may be known to be “easy” or “hard” on respondents of certain ethnic or religious groups or social backgrounds, and this inclination should be evaluated. Similarly, particular judges are “hard” or “easy” on drug cases, or sex cases, or consent defenses in sex cases, and so forth. If there is a strong likelihood of a guilty verdict, how stiff a sentencer is the judge?

2. What judge will try the case if a jury is not waived? The trial judge is ordinarily the sentencing judge. Therefore, the sentencing predilections of the two judges who will try the case with and without a jury respectively must be compared.

3. What evidence that the judge will hear can be excluded from a jury’s consideration? Judges at a bench trial invariably hear some things that a jury would not because (a) some exclusionary rules of evidence are more lax in nonjury trials; (b) the judge at a bench trial both rules on the admissibility of evidence and receives the evidence as the trier of fact; and (c) it is virtually impossible to convince an appellate court that the receipt of inadmissible evidence in a bench trial was prejudicial. Although trial judges are given great credit by appellate courts for having reasoning powers that allow them to compartmentalize their minds and segregate admissible from inadmissible evidence in arriving at a verdict (see Harris v. Rivera, 454 U.S. 339, 346 (1981) (per curiam); see § 20.05 supra), as a practical matter trial judges are no less human than jurors. Thus a judge may be unwilling to acquit a person of a serious crime after the judge has heard and excluded an inadmissible confession, even though the admissible evidence of guilt is weak; whereas a jury hearing the same admissible evidence but unaware of the confession might well acquit.

4. Is there an angle in the case that may win over a jury but that would be disregarded by a judge? Juries may react with aversion to police brutality, an overzealous prosecutor, or other circumstances that would not affect a judge.

5. Conversely, on the evidence admissible at a jury trial, is the case one in which jurors would be more likely than a judge to be swayed by emotional factors prejudicial to a respondent? Several points are involved here. Experienced trial judges are more accustomed than jurors to seeing the physical injuries of victims of crimes of violence and may be less shocked by them. Even if the judge is incensed by the atrocity of a crime, s/he is usually more able than jurors to apply certain technical rules for weighing evidence on the question of the respondent’s identity as its perpetrator – for example, the rules requiring corroboration of the testimony of a rape complainant or accomplice. Similarly, judges, more than juries, are concerned about the specific legal elements of a crime and may be able to keep attention focused on them even in a gruesome case. In general the concept that the prosecution bears the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt has more meaning to a judge than to jurors; and the closer is the question of guilt, the more likely is a judge than a jury to acquit.
6. Is there a good legal defense that a jury will not be able to comprehend? Generally, apart from individual judges’ idiosyncrasies and predilections, it is advisable to submit legally complicated defenses to a judge. For example, questions of “breaking” in a burglary case, of “asportation” in a larceny case, and of property valuation, when the value of property may spell the difference between a misdemeanor and a felony, are more likely to be understood by a judge than by a jury.

7. Are there controversial factual questions not resolvable from the evidence except by “hunches” with regard to credibility or by inferences that may be drawn differently by persons with different backgrounds? Generally, a jury must be unanimous to convict, and it is harder to secure the agreement of the hunches or intuitions of 12 persons than of 1 person.

8. Will some sort of evidence be presented that a judge is more likely to credit than a jury or vice versa? Judges (and particularly some judges) are notorious for their inability to discredit police testimony. This is understandable enough; the judge has probably heard the same officer testify against a dozen or a hundred guilty respondents. On the other hand, judges are frequently far more skeptical than jurors with regard to the testimony of child sex complainants.

9. Is it a general practice in the locality, or has the judge who will try the respondent on a waiver made it a practice, to reward jury waivers by more lenient sentencing? In theory, a respondent cannot be punished by a harsher sentence for exercising his or her right to jury trial. See, e.g., United States v. Whitten, 610 F.3d 168, 194-96 (2d Cir. 2010). But when trial judges who have imposed a range of more and less severe sentences upon respondents convicted of the same offense impose a severe sentence upon any individual respondent following a jury trial – and do not state explicitly that they are doing so as a penalty for the respondent’s failure to waive a jury – it will be the rare case in which an appellate court can be convinced that the sentence should be set aside as a forbidden penalty for the respondent’s election of a jury trial. Consequently, trial judges – particularly in courts with a docket-congestion problem – frequently do reward jury-trial waivers by favorable sentencing consideration and get away with it despite the notorious character of the practice.

10. Is the evidence of guilt overwhelming, and is the defense essentially specious? Quite apart from any general practice of rewarding jury waivers with sentencing leniency, a judge will often punish a respondent harshly for taking a jury trial in a frivolous case.

11. Is the case likely to raise difficult or unsettled questions of legal doctrine, either with regard to the admissibility of evidence or with regard to the substantive elements of the offense? There are more ways in a jury trial than in a bench trial for a judge to err and for the judge’s errors to be made visible and reversible. In a bench trial, a judge can conceal beneath a general finding of guilt the resolution of points of law that in a jury trial s/he would have to state explicitly in the jury charge. The more unsettled those questions are, the more likely the judge is to err; hence the more desirable it is to have the judge rule explicitly as s/he must in a jury-tried case. Similarly, in a bench case, some judges make it a practice to take defense objections to the admissibility of evidence under advisement, and then, when it is clear that the prosecution has a sufficient case apart from the contested evidence, to insulate themselves from reversal by announcing that they are not going to consider the contested evidence but find the respondent guilty without it. This sort of evasion of tricky evidentiary issues cannot be worked in a jury trial.

12. Will a jury waiver speed up the disposition of the case, and is speedy disposition in the respondent’s interest?

§ 21.02(c) Counseling the Client

The many complex and interrelated tactical factors that affect the choice of jury trial or bench trial are better appraised by counsel than by the respondent. Counsel therefore should make the choice in the first instance and explain to the client thoroughly and persuasively his or her reasons for that choice. Counsel may properly urge upon the client that counsel’s choice is the only safe one and that the alternative is foolhardy, if this is true. The right to jury trial is, however, the sort of highly personal and emotionally charged right that should ultimately be left the client’s wishes. If the respondent insists on a jury trial against the advice of counsel, a jury trial would seem to be advised. See Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751, 753 n.6 (1983) (dictum); Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 187 (2004) (dictum); McCoy v. Louisiana, 138 S. Ct. 1500, 1508 (2018) (dictum).

§ 21.03 MOTIONS CHALLENGING JURY SELECTION AND HANDLING

§ 21.03(a) State Law and Federal Constitutional Grounds for Challenging the Composition or Handling of the Jury

The processes by which jurors are selected vary enormously from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Violations of the applicable statutes or court rules – such as, for example, a jury commissioner’s lack of the requisite qualifications, the failure to follow required procedures for composing the jury roll, or the improper service of jury notices or summons – may provide a state law basis for challenging a venire that has been selected through the flawed process.

Federal constitutional challenges to jury selection procedures or to the composition or the handling of jury rolls, jury lists, venires, or panels also may be available. The principal constitutional claims of this sort are:

1. Systematic exclusion of a racial or other “distinct class” of citizens (discussed in § 21.03(b) infra);

2. Deprivation of a fair trial by an impartial jury because of prejudicial publicity, community hostility, and the like (see § 20.03(b) supra); and

3. Deprivation of a fair trial by an impartial jury because of the jurors’ exposure to extrajudicial proof of guilt, Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723 (1963), their subjection to unfair domination of court officers, Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S.
466 (1965), their subjection to prejudicial remarks by such officers, Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363 (1966), or their exposure to such officers in the dual role of prosecution witness and bailiff, Gonzales v. Beto, 405 U.S. 1052 (1972) (per curiam), or other prejudicing circumstances..

Objections to jury panels and to particular jurors are ordinarily made immediately prior to and during voir dire examination respectively. See §§ 28.02-28.05 infra. However, attacks upon the standards or manner of selection or upon the composition of the jury rolls or the venire, based on defects in any anterior stage of the process, are frequently required to be raised at some specified time before trial by a motion to quash the venire, by an objection to the rolls or the array, or by a similar procedure.

§ 21.03(b)
Motions Challenging the Jury Selection Process on the Ground of Systematic Exclusion of a Racial or Other “Distinct Class” of Citizens

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution forbids the systematic exclusion of racial, ethnic, religious, or economic groups from jury service. Coleman v. Alabama, 389 U.S. 22 (1967), and cases cited (African Americans); *Turner (Mexican-Americans); Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977) (same); Schowgurow v. State, 240 Md. 121, 213 A.2d 475 (1965) (atheists); Labat v. Bennett, 365 F.2d 698 (5th Cir. 1966) (wage earners). This principle condemns the systematic exclusion of any “distinct class” of citizens shown to be viewed or treated differently from other classes in the local community.
419 U.S. 522 (1975), the Supreme Court held that the systematic exclusion of women from juries in criminal cases is forbidden by the Sixth Amendment as incorporated into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth; and in subsequent cases the Court has treated Taylor as overruling its antiquated holding in Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57 (1961), that exclusion of women from criminal juries did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. See J.E.B. v. Alabama the reasoning of Hoyt,” and observing, that although “Taylor distinguished Hoyt . . ., [t]he Court now . . . has stated that Taylor ‘in effect’ overruled Hoyt” (quoting Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S.
808, 828 n.1 (1991))). Given the Court’s application of the Equal Protection Clause in J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B. to prohibit a state actor’s intentional discrimination on the basis of gender in using peremptory strikes in jury selection, and given the Court’s record in other contexts of barring gender discrimination on equal protection grounds, see, e.g., United States v. Virginia, it is evident that women would now be held to be a “distinct class” whose exclusion from any jury selection process would render the resulting juries unconstitutional. See also Machetti v. Linahan, 679 F.2d 236 (11th Cir. 1982); White v. Crook, 251 F. Supp. 401 (M.D. Ala. 1966)
(three-judge court). Whether the systematic exclusion of particular age groups – for example, young people or the elderly—would also be condemned is a more difficult question, which the Supreme Court has reserved. Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 137 (1974). See Donald H. Zeigler, Young Adults as a Cognizable Group in Jury Selection, 76 Mich. L. Rev. 1045 (1978).

A jury whose composition is affected by systematic exclusion may be challenged even by a respondent who is not a member of the excluded class. Campbell v. Louisiana, 523 U.S. 392 (1998) (dealing with a racial-exclusion challenge to the selection of grand jurors but explicitly assimilating the rule for grand-jury challenges and petit-jury challenges); Peters v. Kiff, 407 U.S. 493 (1972).

The accepted method of proving claims of systematic exclusion has been described as follows:

“The first step is to establish that the group [claimed to be excluded] is one that is a recognizable, distinct class, singled out for different treatment under the laws, as written or as applied. . . . Next, the degree of underrepresentation must be proved, by comparing the proportion of the group in the total population to the proportion called to serve [as jurors] . . . , over a significant period of time. . . . This method of proof, sometimes called the ‘rule of exclusion,’ has been held to be available as a method of proving discrimination in jury selection against a delineated class. . . . Finally . . . a selection procedure that is susceptible of abuse or is not racially neutral supports the presumption of discrimination raised by the statistical showing.”

Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545, 565 (1979), quoting Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. at 494. The opinion in Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357 (1979), implies that underrepresentation alone is not sufficient; it must also be shown that “this underrepresentation is due to systematic exclusion of the group in the jury-selection process,” id. at 364, as the result of “discriminatory purpose,” id. at 368 n.26. See also Berghuis v. Smith, 559 U.S. 314, 327 (2010); State v. Plain, 898 N.W.2d 801, 822, 826-27 (Iowa 2017). However, Duren also recognizes that both systematic exclusion and discriminatory purpose may be inferred from a “significant discrepancy shown by the statistics” comparing a group’s numbers in the general population with its numbers in jury pools and panels, and on juries. Duren, 439 U.S. at 368 n.26. See also Berghuis v. Smith, 559 U.S. at 327-33; Woodfox v. Cain, 772 F.3d 358, 372-76 (5th Cir. 2014). Counsel will therefore want to investigate jury lists, going back ten years or so, in order to demonstrate a pattern of discrimination. These are public records, available from the jury clerk or commissioners. If the clerk’s or commissioners’ records contain racial designations, the jury is probably challengeable upon the showing of even a relatively small discrepancy between the percentages of the racial minority group in the general population and on jury panels. Avery v. Georgia, 345 U.S. 559 (1953); Whitus v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 545 (1967); Alexander v. Louisiana, 405 U.S. 625 (1972); cf. Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. at 493-95. When racial designations or indications of a selection process that “is not racially neutral” (Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. at 565) do not appear in the records, it is important to seek out other aspects of the procedure that are “susceptible of abuse” (id.). Any nonrandom method of culling or cutting prospective jurors would seem to be “susceptible of abuse” in this sense (see id. at 548 n.2, 566; and see Castaneda v. Partida, 430
U.S. at 497, describing the key-man system as “highly subjective”); but, in the absence of some form of identification of prospective jurors by nonneutral characteristics in the records available to jury-selection officials, a stronger statistical showing of underrepresentation is apparently required.

§ 21.04 INVESTIGATION OF PROSPECTIVE TRIAL JURORS

Local practice may require that the jury list (containing the names of all venirepersons for the term of court at which a respondent is scheduled to be tried) be served upon the respondent. Elsewhere, the jury list may be published or may be available for inspection in the office of the clerk of court; or counsel may be entitled to demand a copy from the clerk or to obtain a copy from the jury commission. This jury list, which ordinarily contains the names, addresses, and occupations of the venirepersons, is an indispensable document. Once counsel has it, counsel can begin to make such investigation of the prospective jurors at the forthcoming trial as s/he wishes and can practicably manage. Counsel is going to have some opportunity to pick and choose among jurors when the case comes to trial, and the effective use of this opportunity may make the difference between conviction and acquittal for the client. See Chapter 28 infra. The more counsel knows about the prospective jurors, the more sagacious use s/he will be able to make of the opportunity.

Since there will be little time for background investigation after the jury panel enters the courtroom, counsel needs all the advance information s/he can get. Methods of getting it range from systematic, very extensive (and expensive) investigation of the venirepersons – or the employment of the juror investigating services that are found in many large cities – to casual inquiries of other attorneys or of counsel’s acquaintances who may happen to be neighbors or associates of a listed venireperson. How much investigation counsel can undertake will be determined by the resources at counsel’s disposal, in light of the nature and seriousness of the case. But, at least in any serious criminal prosecution, counsel should get the list if at all possible and make what inquiries s/he practicably can about the character and attitudes of the men and women on it. Prosecutors frequently maintain records of jurors who have served on past venires, with notes on their performances and demonstrated attitudes. A motion for discovery of these records on the theory advanced in § § 9.09(b)(7) supra may be worth a try.
Chapter 22

Suppression Hearings

§ 22.01 THE TIMING OF THE SUPPRESSION HEARING

As explained in Chapter 7, motions practice varies considerably among jurisdictions. Some States require motions to suppress to be made in writing and filed by a specified pretrial deadline; other States allow the motions to be made in writing or orally at trial.

In jurisdictions that require pretrial motions, the hearing on the motion may, depending upon the jurisdiction, be conducted in advance of trial or in the midst of trial. In some jurisdictions, evidentiary hearings on motions to suppress are routinely held days or even weeks before the trial. (Such an early scheduling of suppression hearings is particularly advantageous to the defense, since it enhances the usefulness of the hearings for discovery. See §§ 22.02, 22.04 infra.) In other jurisdictions the suppression hearing is commonly held immediately before trial and, depending upon local practice, defense counsel may or may not find it easy to obtain a continuance of the trial for the purpose of getting a transcript of the suppression hearing. In still other jurisdictions the suppression hearing (frequently called a voir dire) takes place in the course of trial, at the time when the first witness is asked about the challenged evidence.

The trial-objection procedure, which has fallen into disfavor in most jurisdictions as pretrial motions practice has developed, permits the respondent to object to suppressible evidence for the first time at trial. A voir dire hearing is then held on the objection. In jury trials, the jury is removed while the hearing proceeds, with the judge sitting as the trier of whatever issues of fact are dispositive of the respondent’s suppression claims. To be sure, even in jurisdictions that require pretrial motions, the defense can request the suppression of evidence for the first time at trial in exceptional circumstances – for example, when defense counsel could not reasonably have known of the challenged evidence or the factual or legal grounds for challenging it prior to trial. See § 22.07 infra. Similarly, in these pretrial-motion jurisdictions the defense can renew a previously denied suppression motion at trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence. See § 22.07 infra. What distinguishes the trial-objection jurisdictions is that objections to suppressible evidence are routinely entertained, with no need to show special circumstances, at the time when the evidence is presented by the prosecution in its case-in-chief at trial. But the objection must be made when the first prosecution witness begins to testify about the suppressible evidence; an objection made later in the trial will be held untimely.

§ 22.02 DEFENSE GOALS AND STRATEGIES AT A SUPPRESSION HEARING

Suppression hearings may be used by the defense for several different purposes. To put a hearing to the most effective use, defense counsel needs to make a preliminary determination of which purposes s/he should be pursuing in this particular case. Often, a clear-cut choice between one purpose and another will be necessary, because the purposes or important means for achieving them are inconsistent. This is ordinarily not a choice that can be put off until the time of the evidentiary hearing: Both the content of the suppression motion and the nature of counsel’s pre-hearing preparation will vary considerably depending upon counsel’s choice of goals and consequent strategies for the hearing.

The first and most obvious potential goal is to win the hearing and secure suppression of whatever evidence is challenged. Victory in a suppression hearing will frequently result in the prosecutor’s having to dismiss the entire case against the respondent. For example, suppression of the drugs and all police testimony relating to their seizure in a drug possession case usually leaves the prosecutor without any evidence of the respondent’s alleged wrongdoing. In many cases suppression of eyewitness identification testimony or of a confession deprives the prosecution of the only available evidence of the respondent’s identity as the perpetrator of the offense. Even when a defense victory at the suppression hearing does not terminate the prosecution, the suppression ruling may create major gaps in the prosecutor’s proof and thereby substantially improve the chances for an acquittal at trial.

An alternative defense goal at the suppression hearing is to obtain discovery of the prosecution’s theory of the case and supporting evidence on the issue of guilt. Depending upon which claims are litigated and the way in which defense counsel shapes the hearing, the prosecutor’s evidence at the suppression hearing may provide a full preview of the prosecution’s case-in-chief at trial. For example, if the suppression motion challenges the legality of the respondent’s arrest on the ground that the arresting officers lacked probable cause, the prosecutor may be obliged to present extensive testimony regarding the facts of the crime known to the police and the facts that led the police to believe that the respondent was the perpetrator. In addition to obtaining this disclosure of the prosecution’s evidence, counsel may also be able to obtain discovery of documents that would not otherwise be available until mid-trial: In some jurisdictions the prosecution’s presentation of a witness in a suppression hearing activates a prosecutorial duty to turn over to the defense any prior written statements of that witness or documents prepared by that witness. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 331.4(3)(a) (2018). Beyond this discovery of the content of the prosecution’s case, defense counsel also gains a valuable opportunity to watch prosecution witnesses on the stand and acquire insights into their vulnerability to particular approaches on cross-examination. Indeed, it is often possible to use a suppression hearing to test risky lines of cross-examination in order to determine what questions can be safely used at trial. In jurisdictions where delinquency cases are tried to a jury or where liberal recusal rules permit the defense to obtain a different judge for the trial (see § 22.07 infra), the ultimate trier of fact will never hear the results of defense counsel’s experimentation. And even when the judge presiding at the motion hearing does sit at the respondent’s bench trial, counsel can use experimentation in the motion hearing to decide what evidence should be put into the trial record. Naturally, these discovery benefits will be enhanced in jurisdictions where the suppression hearing is held in advance of trial. However, even discovery procured in a mid-trial hearing can prove immensely useful in determining what additional cross-examination would be fruitful or dangerous and in deciding other questions of trial tactics, such as whether to put the respondent on the stand or to present other defense witnesses.
A third potential goal of the suppression hearing is to extract concessions from prosecution witnesses on the record, for defense counsel’s use in examining and impeaching those witnesses at trial. Often prosecutors fail to coach their witnesses prior to the suppression hearing with the same care that they employ in preparing for trial, and it will be possible to lure an unwary prosecution witness into conceding affirmatively helpful points. At the very least, counsel can circumscribe the damage that any witness will be able to do at trial, by locking him or her into a version of the facts that s/he cannot alter without being exposed to impeachment by the inconsistent testimony that s/he gave at the hearing. See §§ 22.04(c), 31.10 infra. Finally, the mere fact that the witness is telling his or her version of the facts twice – once at the suppression hearing and again at trial – often proves beneficial: Particularly when the suppression hearing takes place some time before trial, witnesses will change details in their stories and can then be discredited by confronting them with the discrepancies. All of these means of controlling or undercutting prosecution witnesses’ trial testimony will be greatly enhanced by obtaining a transcript of the suppression hearing to use for impeachment at trial. See § 22.07 infra.

There are several other benefits that the defense may gain from litigating suppression motions. The most important ones are catalogued in § 7.03(a) supra. But while these benefits should be considered as factors in counsel’s initial decision whether or not to file a suppression motion and bring it on for evidentiary hearing – together with the countervailing considerations of cost and risk that such a motion may entail (see § 7.07 supra) – they will seldom play more than a minor role in shaping counsel’s tactics and techniques for conducting the hearing. Counsel’s primary determinants in preparing for and handling an evidentiary suppression hearing will almost always be strategies for pursuing one or more of the three key goals of getting prosecution evidence suppressed, obtaining discovery, and/or creating impeachment material for use at trial. When these three goals prove inconsistent, counsel will have to choose among them. See § 22.04 infra.

§ 22.03 PROCEDURAL ASPECTS OF THE SUPPRESSION HEARING

§ 22.03(a) The Defense Response When a Prosecution or Defense Witness Fails To Appear

Frequently, the prosecutor will announce that an essential prosecution witness has failed to appear and that the prosecution is therefore seeking a continuance of the suppression hearing. Police witnesses are particularly common no-shows. If the hearing is scheduled for the day of trial and the prosecutor is requesting a continuance of the trial as well, counsel should invoke any applicable speedy-trial sanctions, such as dismissal of the case or release of a respondent who is detained. See Chapter 15. Even if the suppression hearing is scheduled days or weeks before trial, counsel should ask for sanctions as a result of the prosecutor’s unwillingness to proceed: If the prosecutor or the judge remarks that the hearing can be re-scheduled without delaying the trial, counsel should respond that sanctions are nonetheless appropriate to deter prosecutors from cavalierly ignoring suppression hearing dates, to the detriment of the court’s calendar and discouragement of defense witnesses. The apt sanction, counsel should insist, is a judicial ruling that the motion has been conceded (in essence, forfeited) by the prosecution. See, e.g., People v. Goggans, 123 A.D.2d 643, 506 N.Y.S.2d 908 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1986). If the judge seems dubious about the appropriateness of this remedy, counsel should point out that it is the closest possible analogue to the trial-date sanction of dismissal when the prosecutor is declines to proceed and also that it is the only effective deterrent of prosecutorial neglect. For discussion of Goggans and of remedies for prosecutorial unreadiness, see § 15.03 supra.

Occasionally, prosecutors will attempt to get around a witness’s failure to appear by going forward with hearsay testimony to cover the matters that the missing witness would have recounted. Although hearsay testimony usually is admissible in suppression hearings, counsel should point out the inherent unreliability of second-hand information that is insulated from testing by cross-examination and should argue accordingly that the hearsay testimony is not sufficient to satisfy the prosecutor’s burden of persuasion at the hearing. See §§ 22.03(d), 22.03(e) infra.

A trickier problem for defense counsel arises when a missing prosecution witness is crucial for the respondent’s case at the hearing and the prosecutor elects to go forward by presenting other witnesses who participated in the same events or observed them. Defense counsel is well advised to forestall this situation by subpoenaing all prosecution witnesses whom s/he may need, including police and other law enforcement personnel. See § 10.02 supra. If counsel has failed to subpoena a prosecution witness who is crucial for the defense case, counsel will need to seek a continuance, and that continuance will probably be charged to the defense for speedy-trial purposes. See § 15.04 supra. If counsel did subpoena the prosecution witness, then counsel should explain that the witness is essential to the defense presentation and, in requesting a continuance, should ask that the continuance be charged to the prosecution – or, as a fall-back position, that the continuance be charged jointly to defense and prosecution. The prosecutor will undoubtedly argue that, because the prosecution is willing to go forward, the continuance should be charged solely to the defense; but counsel’s surrebuttal is that any delay resulting from the failure of a witness to obey a court subpoena should be charged to the party with whom the witness is allied and which is best able to control the witness. If the witness is a law enforcement agent, counsel should point out that delays resulting from the dilatoriness or negligence of such personnel are ordinarily counted against the prosecution in the speedy-trial calculus, even when the prosecutors themselves have not been derelict. See Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647, 652-53 (1992); United States v. Velazquez, 749 F.3d 167, 175-77, 180-81 (3d Cir. 2014).

If the missing witness is needed by the defense solely to impeach another prosecution witness in the event that the latter witness denies a prior inconsistent statement, defense counsel does not necessarily have to request a continuance. Counsel has the option of alerting the judge to the possible need for the witness and then offering to proceed without the witness, on the understanding that counsel will be given the opportunity to complete the hearing by calling the missing witness at a later date if necessary. As counsel can point out to the judge, it may never be necessary to present the missing witness, because the testifying witness may admit to making the impeaching statement. See § 31.10 infra. In any such colloquies with the judge, defense counsel must carefully guard against alerting the prosecutor to the nature of the anticipated impeachment; if the court wishes a detailed proffer, counsel should insist that that proffer be made ex parte to avoid disclosure of defense strategies to the prosecution.

If the missing witness is solely a foundational witness (for example, a police communications division officer whose testimony will establish the standard police procedures for recording radio communications), defense counsel should consider offering to go forward if the prosecutor will stipulate to the foundational facts that counsel wishes to adduce. The stipulation should, in most cases, suffice to fill counsel’s needs. It is usually advisable to make the stipulation offer in open court. Then, if the prosecutor refuses to stipulate and defense counsel is forced to ask for a continuance to obtain the missing foundational witness, the judge will know to attribute the disruption of the court’s calendar to the prosecutor’s obstructionism and will be more disposed to grant the continuance. Or the judge may intervene and put pressure on the prosecutor to agree to the stipulation.

Whenever defense counsel does need to seek a continuance of a suppression hearing, counsel should be ready to argue both the factual basis for the request and the respondent’s legal right to obtain a continuance in order to prepare adequately for the hearing. See § 15.02 supra. In requesting the continuance, however, counsel should again be alert to the danger of revealing defense strategies to the prosecution. If the continuance is necessitated by a defense witness’s failure to appear and if revelation of the witness’s name might lead the police to interview the witness before the next hearing, counsel should simply omit the witness’s name or offer to reveal it to the judge ex parte.

§ 22.03(b) Waiving the Respondent’s Presence in Suppression Hearings That Involve an Identification Suppression Claim

Counsel litigating an identification suppression claim should consider waiving the client’s presence during the testimony of all witnesses whose eyewitness identifications s/he is challenging. This waiver is strongly desirable from the defense perspective for two reasons.

First, the eyewitness’s observation of the respondent during the suppression hearing will aggravate the effect of prior suggestive police procedures and may ensure the witness’s identification of the respondent at trial. Not only will the witness have seen the respondent for an additional, prolonged period of time, so that s/he will be more likely to feel and testify persuasively at trial that the respondent “looks familiar” but also the witness will have seen the respondent in a highly suggestive setting. (Unlike a lineup, the setting of the suppression hearing makes it quite obvious which person in the courtroom has been charged as the culprit.) Second, the presence of the respondent at the suppression hearing frustrates any hope of obtaining from the witness an unvarnished description of the perpetrator for use in arguing the suppression motion: The witness will simply describe the youth s/he is observing at counsel table.

In several jurisdictions the courts have recognized the accused’s right to waive his or her presence at an identification suppression hearing, relying on either or both of two rationales: (i) that the constitutional protections against suggestive pretrial identification procedures entitle the defense to avoid an additional unnecessary and suggestive encounter between the accused and the eyewitness, and (ii) that the accused’s right to be present during all court hearings is a personal, waivable right because it exists solely for the accused’s protection and not for the protection of any governmental interests. See, e.g., People v. Huggler, 50 A.D.2d 471, 473-74, 378 N.Y.S.2d 493, 496-97 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 1976); Singletary v. United States, 383 A.2d 1064, 1070 (D.C. 1978).

The court will usually insist that counsel demonstrate on the record that the respondent’s waiver is a knowing and voluntary relinquishment of the right to be present at the hearing. Counsel can make the requisite showing either: (i) by presenting a written waiver signed by the respondent (and, if the respondent is very young, also signed by the respondent’s parent), which sets forth the respondent’s understanding of his or her right to be present, the reasons for waiving the right to be present, and the respondent’s desire to waive the right; or (ii) by bringing the respondent to the hearing solely for the purpose of responding to the court’s inquiry into the voluntariness of the waiver and then sending the respondent out of the courtroom before the eyewitness enters.

Whether the respondent’s presence should be waived for all or only part of the hearing depends upon the roster of witnesses who will testify at the hearing. If most of the witnesses are eyewitnesses to the crime, then the respondent’s presence should be waived during the entire hearing and the respondent should be kept away from any parts of the courthouse where s/he might encounter or be observed by any of the eyewitnesses. On the other hand, if there is a significant portion of the hearing that the respondent can safely attend – and naturally also if the respondent will take the stand at the hearing – then counsel should waive the respondent’s presence only during the portions of the hearing when eyewitnesses will be in or around the courtroom. Counsel should make arrangements for the respondent to sit during those portions of the hearing in a location where s/he is not likely to be observed by any of the eyewitnesses and to enter and leave the courtroom by a route that will not lead to any encounters with the eyewitnesses.

§ 22.03(c) Enforcing the “Rule on Witnesses” in a Suppression Hearing

Throughout a trial both parties have the right to insist that the opposing witnesses be excluded from the courtroom, in order to prevent them from hearing information that might affect their testimony. See § 27.11 infra. This “rule on witnesses” should similarly be invoked by the defense at a suppression hearing. At the beginning of the hearing, defense counsel should request that the courtroom be cleared of any prosecution witnesses who might testify either at the suppression hearing or at the trial. Counsel also must be alert throughout the hearing to the possibility of a prosecution witness entering and remaining in the courtroom. If, notwithstanding counsel’s precautions, a prosecution witness does overhear another witness’s testimony, counsel should request that the court impose the only sanction that will both remedy the violation and deter future misconduct by prosecution witnesses: exclusion of the witness’s testimony at the suppression hearing and trial.

As at trial the operation of the rule on witnesses does not bar the respondent from the courtroom. S/he has a right to be present while all testimony in the case is taken. See § 27.01 infra. For discussion of the circumstances under which the respondent should waive his or her right to be present at a suppression hearing, see § 22.03(b) supra.

§ 22.03(d) Who Proceeds First in the Suppression Hearing: The Burdens of Production and Persuasion

Even though the suppression motion is a defense motion, it is customary in many jurisdictions for the prosecution to proceed first and to present the testimony of all police officers and other witnesses whom the prosecution intends to call. As a result, the defense has the distinct advantage of being able to cross-examine (and thereby lead and control) the officers and other prosecution witnesses. In some jurisdictions, however, the defense is expected to proceed first, at least on some suppression issues. In these jurisdictions, defense counsel will usually want to invoke the constitutional caselaw dealing with burdens of production and persuasion, described in this section, to argue that the prosecutor should be required to proceed first. On rare occasions, the defense may reap some benefit from proceeding first and calling the police officers as defense witnesses – for example, when: (i) the officers are known to be unprepared and the prosecutor is an experienced and able examiner who can effectively shape their testimony on direct; or (ii) the rules of evidence in the particular jurisdiction permit parties to lead and impeach their own witnesses; or (iii) the judge will permit the officers and other prosecution witnesses to be called as hostile witnesses (see § 33.25 infra). But in most jurisdictions the greater latitude allowed for leading and impeaching witnesses on cross-examination makes it wise for defense counsel to force the prosecutor to proceed first whenever possible.

The allocation of the burden of production (also known as the burden of going forward) and of the burden of persuasion (also known as the burden of proof) varies with the constitutional issue being litigated:

(i) Search and seizure issues. Federal constitutional law permits the burden of going forward on the defense, see Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 104-05 (1980), although, of course, state statutes, court rules, or state constitutional caselaw can elect to impose that burden on the prosecution instead. See, e.g., State v. Boyd, 275 Kan. 271, 273, 64 P.3d 419, 422 (2003); State v. Carrawell, 481 S.W.3d 833, 837 (Mo. 2016) (dictum); People v. Dodt, 61 N.Y.2d 408, 415, 474 N.Y.S.2d 441, 445, 462 N.E.2d 1159, 1163 (1984). In jurisdictions where the defense does bear the burden of going forward on Fourth Amendment issues, that burden is easily satisfied whenever the search or seizure was made without a warrant. Once the defense has shown that a search or seizure was conducted and that the police lacked a warrant authorizing it, the Fourth Amendment shifts the burden of persuasion to the prosecution to prove that the warrantless search or seizure falls within one of the established exceptions to the warrant

(ii) Challenges to the admissibility of a confession. When the issue is the voluntariness of a confession or other incriminating statement by the respondent, the prosecution bears the burden of persuasion. Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. at 489 (dictum); see also United States v. Raddatz, 447 U.S. 667, 678 (1980); Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600, 608 n.1 (2004) (plurality opinion). The quantum of proof required as a matter of federal constitutional law is “a preponderance of the evidence,” Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. at 489; accord, Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. at 608 n.1 (plurality opinion), although several States have, “pursuant to their own law, . . . adopt[ed] [the] . . . higher standard” (Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. at 489) of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. See, e.g., People v. Jiminez, 21 Cal. 3d 595, 580 P.2d 672, 147 Cal. Rptr. 172 (1978), partially overruled on other grounds, People v. Cahill, 5 Cal. 4th 478, 853 P.2d 1037, 20 Cal. Rptr.2d 582 (1993); State v. Carter, 412 A.2d 56, 60 (Me. 1980); Lowe v. State, 800 So. 2d 552, 554-55 (Miss. App. 2001); In the Matter of Jimmy D., 15 N.Y.3d 417, 423, 938 N.E.2d 970, 973, 912 N.Y.S.2d 537, 540 (2010). Although the jurisdictions vary with respect to which party bears the burden of production in a confession suppression hearing, the Supreme Court’s imposition of the burden of persuasion on the prosecution and the fact that it is the prosecutor who is proffering the evidence support the argument that the proper procedure is to place the burden of production on the prosecution. When the issue is a waiver of Miranda rights, the prosecution again bears the burden of persuasion, Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 475-76, 479 (1966); see also Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 402-04 (1977); Tague v. Louisiana, 444 U.S. 469 (1980) (per curiam); Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. at 608 n.1 (plurality opinion); J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261, 269-70 (2011), by a preponderance of the evidence, Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 167-69; Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. at 608 n.1 (plurality opinion). Although the Connelly opinion states unequivocally that “[w]henever the State bears the burden of proof in a motion to suppress a statement that the defendant claims was obtained in violation of our Miranda doctrine, the State need prove waiver only by a preponderance of the evidence” (479 U.S. at 168), it is possible that a heavier burden of proof exists on the separate issue raised by Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981), in Miranda cases in which “an accused has [once] invoked his right to have counsel present during custodial interrogation,” id. at 484. Edwards held that an accused person in custody who has “expressed his desire to deal with the police only through counsel, is not subject to further interrogation by the authorities until counsel has been made available to him, unless the accused himself initiates further communication, exchanges, or conversations with the police.” Id. at 484-85. See also Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. 91, 95 (1984) (per curiam); Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146, 150-56 (1990); Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 458 (1994) (dictum); Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778, 794-95 (2009) (dictum); § 24.11(c). “The [Edwards] rule ensures that any statement made in subsequent interrogation is not the result of coercive pressures. Edwards conserves judicial resources which would otherwise be expended in making difficult determinations of voluntariness, and implements the protections of Miranda in practical and straightforward terms.” Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. at 151. The Supreme Court has repeatedly said that “[t]he merit of the Edwards decision lies in the clarity of its command and the certainty of its application” – its capacity to provide “‘clear and unequivocal’ guidelines to the law enforcement profession.” Id., quoting Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675, 682 (1988). Arguably, to preserve the clarity and firmness of “[t]his ‘rigid’ prophylactic rule,” id., embodying an unprecedented “per se approach,” Solem v. Stumes, 465 U.S. 638, 647 (1984), the prosecution should be required to show by clear and convincing evidence “once a suspect has invoked the right to counsel, [that] any subsequent conversation . . . was initiated by him,” id. at 641. See Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. at 95 n.2; and see, e.g., State v. Tidwell, 775 S.W.2d 379, 386 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1989). But the question remains an open one. But see Moore v. Berghuis, 700 F.3d 882, 888 (6th Cir. 2012), discussed in § 24.11(c) infra, reasoning that “[t]he government did not show by a preponderance of the evidence, and the [state] . . . trial court did not clearly find, that Moore, and not the officer, initiated further conversation” after Moore had invoked his right to counsel under Edwards. The Sixth Circuit opinion does not explicitly consider its choice of this quantum of proof or address possible alternatives; and because its “review [of] the district court’s denial of Moore’s petition for a writ of habeas corpus [was restricted by] . . . the standards of review as set forth in the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996” (id. at 886; see § 39.03(b) infra), its phrasing of the quantum cannot be taken as addressing the applicable burden in non-AEDPA cases.

(iii) Identification suppression issues. When the issue is whether the respondent’s right to counsel at a post-arraignment lineup was violated, the prosecution bears the burdens of production and persuasion and must show either that counsel was actually present or that there was a valid waiver of the right to counsel. See, e.g., United States v. Garner, 439 F.2d 525, 526-27 (D.C. Cir. 1970). If a violation of the right to counsel is established, then the prosecution cannot elicit an in-court identification unless it shows by clear and convincing evidence that the in-court identification has an independent source. See United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 240 n.31 (1967); United States ex rel. Whitmore v. Malcolm, 476 F.2d 363, 365 n.2 (2d Cir. 1973). If the suppression motion challenges eyewitness identification procedures on due process grounds, most jurisdictions require that the defense satisfy an initial burden of showing suggestivity, with the burden then shifting to the State to show by clear and convincing evidence that the identification was nevertheless reliable. See, e.g., People v. Monroe, 925 P.2d 767, 774 (Colo. 1996); People v. McTush, 81 Ill. 2d 513, 520, 410 N.E.2d 861, 865, 43 III. Dec. 727 (1980); State v. Howe, 129 N.H. 120, 123, 523 A.2d 94, 96 (1987); People v. Rahming, 26 N.Y.2d 411, 417, 259 N.E.2d 727, 731, 311 N.Y.S.2d 292, 297 (1970).

In jurisdictions where the defense is ordinarily expected to proceed first at suppression hearings, defense counsel can insist that the order of procedure be reversed for any issues on which federal constitutional caselaw requires the prosecution to bear the burden of production. (Where the allocation of the burden of production has not yet been resolved by the Supreme Court but has been imposed upon the prosecution by state courts in other jurisdictions, counsel should use the logic of that caselaw to urge the local court to alter its practice.) If defense counsel once succeeds in convincing the court that the Constitution places the burden of production upon the prosecutor on at least one issue, counsel can then argue that the hearing will be too unwieldy if the defense is left to carry the burden of production on other issues. Counsel should point out that the alternation of burdens of production would result in both parties calling the same witnesses to the witness stand and alternating styles of examination depending upon the issue to which each particular question is relevant – a procedure calculated to result in numerous time-consuming objections and rulings.

If the judge is not persuaded and insists that the defense must carry the burden of production on some issues, counsel should request leave to call police officers and any other persons who are allied in interest with the prosecution as hostile witnesses, with the right to ask leading questions on direct examination. See § 33.25 infra. (In support of this request, counsel should point out that police personnel not only have reasons of professional pride and self-advancement for seeking to uphold the legality of arrests, searches, seizures, confessions, and identification procedures in which they have participated but are also subject to potential civil and criminal liability if their conduct in these connections is found to have violated constitutional rights. See, e.g., Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961) (civil liability under the federal Civil Rights Acts); Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91 (1945) (criminal liability under the federal Civil Rights Acts); and see United States v. Price, 383 U.S. 787, 794 (1966) (criminal liability of private individuals who are “willful participant[s] in joint activity with the State or its agents”).) When the respondent’s burden of production can be satisfied by proving an easily-established threshold fact – for example, that the search was warrantless – counsel should seek a stipulation from the prosecutor conceding the threshold fact and, once the stipulation is made, insist that the prosecutor proceed with his or her witnesses, allowing subsequent opportunity for rebuttal testimony by the defense. As a rule, such requests should be made in open court at the beginning of the hearing so that, if the prosecutor refuses to stipulate, the judge will understand that the prosecution is the party responsible for wasting the court’s time by disputing the indisputable. Counsel should then announce that s/he will present evidence only to the extent necessary to prove the threshold fact, reserving further testimony for rebuttal.

§ 22.03(e) The Admissibility of Hearsay Testimony in Suppression Hearings

As a general matter, hearsay is admissible in suppression hearings. United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 172-77 (1974); United States v. Raddatz, 447 U.S. 667, 679 (1980) (dictum). However, there are certain limitations upon the prosecution’s use of hearsay. The defense has a right to confront and cross-examine the prosecution’s witnesses at a suppression hearing, see, e.g., United States v. Hodge, 19 F.3d 51, 53 (D.C. Cir. 1994); United States v. Salsedo, 447 F. Supp. 1235, 1241 (E.D. Cal. 1979), vacated on other grounds, United States v. Torres, 622 F.2d 465 (9th Cir. 1980) (per curiam) (summarized in § 22.03(f) second paragraph infra); People v. Edwards, 95 N.Y.2d 486, 491, 719 N.Y.S.2d 202, 204-05, 741 N.E.2d 876, 878-79 (2000); State v. Ehtesham, 309 S.E.2d 82, 84 (W. Va. 1983), and a prosecutor cannot use hearsay evidence in such a way as to deprive the defense of meaningful cross-examination of a prosecution witness. See, e.g., State v. Terrell, 283 N.W.2d 529, 531 (Minn. 1979) (the prosecution cannot make its case at a suppression hearing merely by submitting a transcript of grand jury testimony to show the lawfulness of a search); People v. Kaufman, 457 Mich. 266, 577 N.W.2d 466 (1998) (per curiam) (explaining the Michigan rule that precludes the prosecution from “relying exclusively on preliminary examination transcripts in the conduct of suppression hearings” (id. at 273, 577 N.W.2d at 469), and adopting a limited exception for cases in which “the lawyers . . . cho[o]se to have the motion decided on the basis of the preliminary examination transcript” (id. at 276, 577 N.W.2d at 471); the court observes that “[c]ertainly, there are cases in which further testimony would be harmful to the defendant’s interests, and that determination is normally reserved for defense counsel” (id.)).

A second limitation upon the general rule of admissibility of hearsay is that the prosecutor’s hearsay evidence is subject to exclusion if particularized reasons appear for doubting its reliability. Thus if defense counsel has a good-faith basis for asserting that the out-of-court declarant lacked personal knowledge of the matters s/he reportedly stated or had some bias against the respondent, the prosecutor should be required to produce the declarant for cross-examination by the defense. See United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. at 175-77 (in holding that hearsay evidence was admissible at a suppression hearing, the Court stresses that the witness “harbored no hostility or bias against respondent that might call her statements into question” and that the hearsay statements “were also corroborated by other evidence received at the suppression hearing” and bore “indicia of reliability”). Multiple hearsay can be challenged as particularly unreliable because of the inherent potential for errors and inaccuracies when a statement is relayed between several individuals.
Finally, even if the proffered hearsay evidence is admissible, it may be insufficiently persuasive to meet the prosecutor’s burden of proof (see § 22.03(d) supra) on a particular suppression issue. See, e.g., People v. Moses, 32 A.D.3d 866, 868, 823 N.Y.S.2d 409, 411 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2006) (the prosecution’s burden of production at a hearing on a motion to suppress identification testimony as the fruit of an unlawful Terry stop was not satisfied by the testimony of a police officer who transported the complainant to the location of the show-up but was not involved in the stop of the defendant, could not testify to the circumstances of the stop, and offered nothing more than a “vague and equivocal hearsay” account of a statement made by the arresting officer which “was inadequate to demonstrate” the validity of the arresting officer’s actions in stopping and detaining the defendant and transporting him to the location of the show-up).

§ 22.03(f) The Defense Right to Disclosure of Prior Statements of Prosecution Witnesses

In some jurisdictions, statutes or court rules give the respondent the right to obtain from the prosecutor all prior statements of witnesses who testify for the prosecution at the suppression hearing. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 331.4(3)(a) (2018); United States v. Dockery, 294 A.2d 158 (1972). The prosecutor typically is obligated to disclose all written or oral statements in his or her possession or the possession of the police or other governmental agencies. The statutes and rules usually provide that this disclosure must be made after each witness has finished his or her direct examination. As a practical matter, however, counsel can often obtain the prior statements of all prosecution witnesses from the prosecutor at the beginning of the suppression hearing by requesting them at that time in the interest of efficiency. If the prosecutor refuses counsel’s request and insists upon the prerogative of turning over the statements only at the technically obligatory time, counsel should inform the judge of this and explain that there may be delays during the hearing while counsel pauses to read the statements turned over by the prosecutor. Mentioning the issue before the hearing commences may lead the judge to lean on the prosecutor to turn over the statements immediately; at the least, it will improve the judge’s patience when defense counsel does indeed take time to read the statements during the course of the hearing.

In jurisdictions that do not provide for disclosure by statute or court rule, counsel should nevertheless request all prior statements of each prosecution witness and should assert that the denial of access to these materials is an unconstitutional infringement upon the respondent’s right to cross-examine. Cf. United States v. Salsedo, 477 F. Supp. 1235 (E.D. Cal. 1979), vacated, United States v. Torres, 622 F.2d 465 (9th Cir. 1980) (per curiam) (the district court relied on a federal statute to order the government to “deliver to the defendants all documents in its possession relating to the issue of probable cause for the stop, seizure pursuant to the stop, and the fruits of the stop and seizure” (477 F. Supp. at 1244); the district court explained that “[d]epriving the defendants of the government’s records as to what the agents knew at the time of the stop makes meaningful cross-examination almost impossible,” and the “‘den[i]all [of] the right of effective cross-examination . . . is . . . constitutional error of the first magnitude’” (id. at 1241, quoting Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 318 (1974)); on appeal by the government, the court of appeals vacates the district court’s order because “[a]fter the filing of the district court opinion, the government delivered to the defendants the notes requested at the suppression hearing,” withholding only “the surveillance logs,” and then, “[a]t oral argument, the government stated: (1) it would deliver the surveillance logs to the district court for in camera inspection; and (2) in the event that the district court determined that the surveillance logs were relevant to the subject matter of the government agent’s testimony, the logs would be released to the defendants” (622 F.2d at 465). In the event that the judge refuses to order the production of the documents, defense counsel should request their disclosure again at trial (see § 27.12(a)(1) infra) and then consider whether they reveal any basis for a motion to reopen the suppression hearing on the ground of newly discovered information contained in the documents.

In those jurisdictions where the respondent is expected to proceed first at the suppression hearing and is obligated to conduct direct examinations of police officers, defense counsel should nevertheless request all prior statements of the officers in the possession or control of the prosecution. To support the logic of this request, counsel can point to the disclosure provision in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which declares that, for purposes of the rules on “Producing Statements at a Suppression Hearing,” “a law enforcement officer is considered a government witness.” Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 12(h) (2018). As the commentary to the federal rule explains, this provision reflects the practical consideration that a police officer’s loyalty invariably belongs to the government regardless of who has called the officer as a witness; the systemic interest in testing the credibility of the officer can be effectuated only by permitting defense counsel to have access to prior statements of the witness. If the court denies access, counsel will again have to be alert to the possibility of moving to reopen the suppression hearing after obtaining the documents at trial.

§ 22.04 TECHNIQUES FOR CROSS-EXAMINING PROSECUTION WITNESSES AT A SUPPRESSION HEARING

Defense counsel must tailor his or her cross-examination style and the form of cross-examination questions to fit the goal that s/he is pursuing in litigating the suppression hearing. See § 22.02 supra. The nature of the cross-examination will vary considerably depending on whether counsel is trying to win the hearing, obtain discovery, or create impeachment material for use at trial.

§ 22.04(a) Examination Techniques When Counsel’s Primary Goal Is To Win the Suppression Hearing

If counsel has decided that winning the suppression hearing takes precedence over any other potential goals, s/he will often have to pass up tempting opportunities for discovery on cross-examination in order to avoid the risk of eliciting material that would bolster the prosecution’s case on suppression issues. For example, if the defense is seeking suppression of objects seized from a respondent incident to arrest and is urging that the arrest was invalid for lack of probable cause, counsel would not cross-examine an arresting officer whose direct examination by the prosecutor established that the officer acted upon incriminating information from an informant but neglected to address the subject of the informant’s veracity. See § 23.32(b) infra.

When the goal of winning the hearing overrides that of discovery, counsel will ordinarily proceed in the following ways:

(i) As suggested by the preceding illustration, counsel will forgo cross-examination of a prosecution witness altogether when the prosecutor’s direct examination has left holes in the showing which the relevant doctrinal rules require the prosecution to make in order to sustain the legality of the law-enforcement activity which counsel is challenging. The temptation to cross-examine for discovery may be intense in this situation, precisely because counsel would like to know the omitted information and whether it could be put to defense use at trial on the issue of guilt or innocence. But that temptation has to be resisted because the witness’s answers on cross or on redirect examination by the prosecutor may serve to cure the defects in the prosecution’s justification for the law-enforcement agent’s actions.

(ii) When counsel does choose to cross-examine a prosecution witness, s/he will tailor his or her questions to elicit only material that undermines the credibility of statements made by the witness on direct without broadening the subjects of the witness’s testimony. That is, counsel will ask only questions that disparage the witness’s direct testimony by eliciting some retraction or concession which limits what the witness has said explicitly on direct, and will avoid asking any questions that inject new material into the examination. The trick is to be sure to stay out of areas that could open the door to redirect questioning which adds anything to what the witness said on direct, even though those areas would be ideal for discovery. (As indicated in § 31.01(c) infra, redirect examination is ordinarily not permitted to go into matters that are beyond the scope of the cross.)

(iii) Counsel’s cross-examination questions will be tightly framed and closed-ended – seeking yes-or-no answers or their equivalent, rather than the kind of open-ended questions suitable for discovery purposes. For example, in litigating a claim that the police did not have probable cause to arrest the respondent on the basis of the complainant’s description, counsel might ask: “Officer, the description you received from Ms. [X] did not include any mention of a blue coat, did it?” Counsel would not ask: “What exactly did the complainant say when she was describing her assailant?” Although the latter question would provide excellent discovery, it also gives the officer the chance to bring up portions of the description that match the respondent.

(iv) During the prosecutor’s direct examination of witnesses, counsel will object to all potentially inadmissible evidence that could impair the chances of winning the suppression hearing, even though counsel might like to know the inadmissible information for discovery purposes.

In addition to passing up opportunities to obtain discovery of the prosecution’s case, counsel may also allow a strong prospect of winning the hearing to dictate the otherwise inadvisable course of revealing facets of the defense case (including, for example, statements taken from prosecution witnesses by defense investigators) that ordinarily would be saved until trial. And suppression hearings that have a realistic chance of winning are the only suppression hearings in which counsel should seriously consider presenting the testimony of defense witnesses and the respondent. See § 22.05 infra.

§ 22.04(b) Examination Techniques When Counsel's Primary Goal in Litigating the Suppression Motion Is To Obtain Discovery

When counsel is contemplating using a suppression hearing for the purpose of discovery, s/he will have to engage in a cost-benefit analysis, weighing the value to the defense of each particular item of discovery in preparing for trial against the likelihood and value of winning the suppression motion and the extent to which that likelihood might be impaired by any particular discovery tactic. As implied in § 22.04(a) supra, defense counsel would usually be ill-advised to pursue discovery when the chances of winning the suppression of crucial prosecution evidence are very strong, since the cross-examination questions necessary for discovery often will fill gaps in the prosecutor’s case at the hearing. If, however, the chances of winning the hearing are remote or if the damage that questioning for discovery could cause to those chances is minimal, then counsel can take advantage of the excellent discovery opportunities afforded by a suppression hearing.

Defense strategies and techniques in a hearing conducted primarily for discovery purposes are the converse of those just described for handling a suppression hearing aimed to produce a defense victory:

(i) Counsel should ordinarily cross-examine every prosecution witness to the maximum extent permitted by the court, covering every area that could conceivably arise at trial. But counsel should not refer to any prior statements of the witness or other documents of which the prosecutor might be unaware that could give the defense an edge at trial.

(ii) Counsel should use predominantly open-ended cross-examination questions, for example: “What was the description of the perpetrator?” “What else did the complainant say?” “What did you do next?” Follow-up questions should be used to assure that subjects are canvassed from every angle: e.g., “Think back and tell us everything s/he said in describing the perpetrator.” “Tell us her exact words as best you can recall them.” “Anything else she said about the perpetrator’s clothing?” “Anything at all about the perpetrator’s facial characteristics?” Closed-ended questions should be used only to bottom out each subject of inquiry before moving to the next: “Have you now told us everything said between you and the complainant that provided you with any information which could be used to identify the perpetrator?” [Followed – unless the answer is a categorical “no” – by: “What else? We want the court to hear everything that was said.”] By definition, questions calling for yes-or-no answers cannot unearth any new subjects of information or alert counsel to the possible existence of subjects s/he does not already know about. What’s wanted are forms of questioning that invite the witness to tell everything s/he knows about the case. Counsel should use questions like, “Is there anything else you haven’t mentioned about [X topic] [X episode] [X time period]?” and “What more can you remember about [X topic] [X episode] [X time period]?” to get at material that counsel may not have previously contemplated.

(iii) Counsel should not put the respondent or any other defense witnesses on the stand at the suppression hearing. Since the hearing is not being conducted to win, there is no reason to give the prosecutor discovery of the defense case at trial or to risk producing material that the prosecutor can use for impeachment of defense witnesses at trial.

In preparing to use a suppression hearing for discovery, counsel’s major task will be to construct reasonable arguments to justify every cross-examination question as relevant to some issue being litigated at the hearing. The problem here is similar to the one discussed in § 4.33 supra relating to probable-cause hearings. The prosecutor will predictably object to defense cross-examination questions that appear to be aimed at obtaining discovery of the prosecution’s trial evidence. (The technically correct prosecutorial objection here is irrelevancy, although many prosecutors cite the nonexistent objection that a question should be disallowed simply because it is “discovery.”) When the prosecutor does object, most judges will be inclined to curb defense questioning in order to speed up the hearing, and even judges who are sympathetic to the defense effort to obtain some discovery will need to protect the record by demanding that defense counsel explain how the challenged question can produce information bearing on the suppression claim that is being adjudicated. Accordingly, for every discovery-oriented cross-examination question that counsel intends to ask, s/he will need to be prepared to demonstrate that the question is relevant to the issues at the suppression hearing. For this purpose, it is useful to keep in mind that a cross-examination question is technically relevant whenever (i) any possible answer to it would make any fact that supports the respondent’s legal theory or theories on the suppression motion more probable, or would make any fact that supports the prosecution’s theory or theories less probable, than it would be without the answer; or (ii) any possible answer would reflect adversely upon the general credibility of the witness or upon the accuracy of any fact supporting the prosecution’s theory or theories which the witness’s direct-examination testimony bolsters; or (iii) any possible answer would decrease the force of any inference that might be drawn from any piece of testimony given by the witness on direct examination in support of the prosecution’s theory or theories; or (iv) any possible answer might begin a process of undermining the worst’s confidence in any piece of testimony given on direct examination that supports the prosecution’s theory or theories, so that the witness might be led eventually to retract it.

In preparing for a suppression hearing at which the primary goal is discovery, counsel will also need to plan out thoroughly the sequence of cross-examination questions for each prosecution witness. Even if counsel is able to justify the questions against the prosecutor’s objections of irrelevancy, the judge may increasingly lose patience with an attorney who appears to be primarily engaged in seeking discovery and may, at some point, rule out further cross-examination. Thus counsel will want to structure the cross-examination of every witness in such a way that the key questions covering the matters in which counsel is most interested are asked early in the examination, before questioning is likely to be cut off. In order to decrease judicial impatience, it is useful to intersperse questions that bear clearly and directly on the issues being litigated among counsel’s more suspiciously discovery-oriented questions: Judges are far less likely to cut off cross-examination when they feel that discovery is a secondary goal rather than counsel’s primary purpose. Counsel should also strive to keep the cross-examination questions flowing at a rapid-fire rate; judges with crowded calendars will not tolerate slow examination styles or delays while the attorney thinks of new questions or consults documents.

To the inexperienced practitioner it may seem that suppression hearings conducted for the purpose of discovery require little preparation. As the foregoing discussion has suggested, however, counsel will need to devote substantial time to planning before the hearing in order to be able to take full advantage of the opportunities for discovery.

§ 22.04(c) Examination Techniques When Counsel’s Primary Goal Is To Lay a Foundation for Impeachment at Trial

In suppression hearings conducted primarily for the purpose of creating transcript material that can be used to impeach prosecution witnesses at trial, counsel will usually be pursuing one or more of the following objectives:

(i) To lure the witness into making statements that are affirmatively helpful because:

(a) They tend to negate some element of the offense (thereby preventing conviction altogether or limiting conviction to a lesser included charge);

(b) They tend to establish some fact that supports an affirmative defense (for example, self-defense);

(c) They tend to establish some fact that mitigates the gravity of the offense and will thereby help at sentencing (for example, the fact that the respondent was the look-out and was not directly involved in the beating of the complainant).

(ii) To circumscribe unfavorable testimony so that the witness cannot make even more damaging statements at trial (for example, by pinning an eyewitness down to the statement that s/he could not have observed the face of the perpetrator for more than a minute, in order to prevent the witness from lengthening the time when s/he testifies at trial and thus enhancing the persuasiveness of his or her identification of the respondent).

Generally, in pursuing any of these objectives, counsel should make heavy use of “closed” questions – that is, forms of questioning which demand specific answers and leave the witness with the smallest possible range of choice about what to say or what words to say it in. (“At the moment when you first saw the two people standing in the doorway, how many feet were you from the closer of those two people?” “Well, when you say ‘a couple of feet,’ do you mean that it was closer to two feet or closer to ten feet?” “Closer to six feet or closer to ten feet?”) Questions calling for yes-or-no answers will often constitute a substantial part of this sort of cross-examination. (“You told the police officers at the scene that those two people came running at you, didn’t you?” “‘Running’ was the word you used to describe how they came toward you, isn’t that right?”) An effective way to lock a witness in to unambiguous answers is to take full advantage of the cross-examiner’s right to use leading questions, stating the exact factual proposition that counsel wants to extract from the witness and asking the witness only whether or not that proposition is correct. (“It is true, is it not, that as soon as you saw the two persons start running toward you, you began to run away from them?” “And when you were grabbed, you were grabbed around the neck from behind, isn’t that correct?” “You had turned your face away from them by that time, right?” “As soon as you started running, you turned to look where you were running, didn’t you?”) Particularly when the objective of the cross-examination is to circumscribe damaging testimony, it is important to “bottom out” the witness’s story by establishing that what s/he has described as the things s/he saw or heard or did that fall within any significant category of information constitute all s/he heard or saw or did within that category. This is best achieved by “nothing else” questions. (“So, the period between the first moment when you saw two people standing in the doorway and the moment when you turned to run away was the only time before the lineup when you were able to observe the features of either of those two people, was it not?” “There was no other time when you were facing them, right?” “Apart from what you told the police at the scene, you didn’t observe anything else about the facial features of either of the two persons, did you?” “Except for the one word ‘Hey!’ that was shouted at you, you heard nothing else said by either of the two persons prior to the lineup, did you?”)

Counsel should be prepared to adjust the order of subjects covered to fit the demeanor of the witness. Frequently, civilian witnesses will be fairly pliant at the beginning of a cross-examination (either because the witness is nervous and cowed or because the witness does not have any reason yet to distrust or dislike the defense attorney) and will become progressively more difficult to handle (as the nervousness wears off or as the witness comes to realize that the defense attorney is succeeding in extracting statements that are helpful to the defense). Thus it often will prove useful to lead off the cross-examination with the factual propositions that counsel is most concerned with proving or anticipates having the most difficulty extracting from the witness. On the other hand, if there are a few points that can be tied down without pushing the witness hard and without the witness perceiving that s/he is conceding anything significant or embarrassing, these points should usually be taken up before the first point on which counsel expects to have to dominate the witness perceptibly, since that will mark the end of the honeymoon period with most witnesses.

In attempting to extract concessions from hostile witnesses who are trying to out-maneuver counsel by saying the opposite of whatever counsel is seeking, it will often be productive to use false leads. This technique consists of getting the witness to believe that counsel wants the converse of what s/he really wants or of getting the witness so concerned to avoid falling into an apparent trap that s/he will back away from it and thereby fall into counsel’s real trap. For example, in an identification suppression hearing at which counsel is trying to show that an eyewitness’s fingering of the respondent in a lineup resulted from the witness’s having selected the respondent’s picture from a photo array the week before (rather than from having seen the respondent commit the crime), counsel might ask questions which appear to be aimed at disparaging the witness’s perceptual abilities by showing that the photo is not a good likeness of the respondent in person. In response, the witness is likely to deny any significant dissimilarities between the respondent’s picture and the respondent’s appearance at the lineup, and to exaggerate the degree of confidence with which s/he recognized the respondent when s/he saw the respondent’s photo in the array.

False leads can be used in four different ways in a suppression hearing:

(i) To establish propositions that will be useful solely in attempting to win the suppression hearing (for example, that the respondent did not give consent to the search of his room that led to the recovery of the contraband);

(ii) To establish propositions that will be useful both in the suppression hearing and at trial (for example, in an identification suppression hearing: that it was dark at the time of the incident – a fact tending to establish the unreliability of the identification as a basis for suppression and also bolstering the defense of misidentification that counsel intends to present at trial);

(iii) To establish propositions that will be neither useful nor harmful at the suppression hearing but will be useful at trial (for example, at a confession suppression hearing: that the respondent was arrested less than fifteen minutes after the robbery complainant emerged from a dark alley at midnight and borrowed a cell phone to call the police – a fact irrelevant to the respondent’s claim of coercion but one that bolsters the misidentification defense at trial); and

(iv) To establish propositions that will be harmful to the respondent at the suppression hearing but useful to his or her defense at trial.

Statements in the last of these categories can often be drawn out of an unfriendly witness, such as a police officer, precisely because of their evident harmfulness to the respondent’s claim for suppression. Consider the following two illustrations:

(A) Assume that the charge is possession of drugs and that the police claim they obtained consent to search the respondent’s bedroom and bureau from his brother, who shared the bedroom and the bureau. If defense counsel contests the brother’s authority to consent (see § 23.18(b) infra) and behaves during cross-examination as if s/he is trying to get the police officer to say that the bureau was used exclusively by the respondent, the officer will probably react by strengthening his or her testimony that the brother had equal, if not greater, access to the bureau. By the end of the cross-examination, counsel will probably have gotten the officer to say that most, if not all, of the clothing in the bureau at the time of the search belonged to the brother; that most of the clothing in the drawer with the drugs belonged to the brother; that the bureau was closer to the brother’s bed; and that the brother acted as if he had free and constant access to the bureau. Counsel will thereupon have lost the battle by helping the prosecution to justify the search on consent grounds. However, counsel will have won the war by acquiring material to use in impeaching the officer at trial if the officer tries to change stories when counsel springs the respondent’s true defense: that the drugs belonged to the brother and were placed by the brother in his drawer of his bureau.

(B) Suppose that the charge is assault with a firearm and that the respondent has made a statement to the police admitting the commission of the shooting but explaining it on self-defense grounds. Counsel has a good-faith basis for challenging the voluntariness of the statement and proceeds to do so. Inevitably, when counsel begins to cross-examine police officers on the subject of voluntariness and tries to get them to agree that the respondent resisted the coercive efforts of the police, the officers will insist that the respondent willingly came forward and was absolutely cooperative. Once again, the defense will have lost the suppression hearing. But, at trial, defense counsel will be able to force the officers to admit that the respondent’s actions were not those of a guilty person who has something to hide.

§ 22.04(d) Examination Techniques When Counsel Has a Mixture of Goals at the Suppression Hearing

The foregoing three sections focused on cases in which counsel had a single overriding objective at the suppression hearing. In many cases, however, counsel might wish to pursue more than one goal. For example, there may be a realistic chance of winning the suppression hearing, yet counsel may be insufficiently sanguine about the probability of victory to be wholly comfortable about forgoing opportunities for discovery and creation of impeachment material. As the previous sections have suggested, pursuing multiple goals may jeopardize them all. For example, cross-examining for discovery or to create impeachment material may unavoidably elicit facts that will destroy any chance of winning the hearing. In many cases counsel is realistically required to choose one strategy and follow it single-mindedly – unless, of course, during the hearing that strategy is proving unworkable.

There are other cases, however, in which counsel can, with careful advance planning, pursue a range of goals. For example, if counsel is litigating several different suppression claims or theories, it may be possible to seek victory on one claim or theory, while using others to obtain discovery and create impeachment material. For example, in an identification suppression hearing, counsel might seek discovery through a claim that the police lacked probable cause to arrest the respondent (see §§ 23.07 and 25.07 infra), might seek to pin down impeachment material by cross-examination predicated on the claim that a show-up on the scene was impossibly suggestive (see § 25.03(a) infra), and might seek to win yet a third claim – that a subsequent lineup was unconstitutionally held without the presence of counsel (see § 25.06 infra).

In deciding whether to mix strategies, counsel will need to be completely familiar with the facts of the case and all possible legal issues that could be litigated at the suppression hearing, and s/he will need to conduct a cost-benefit analysis that considers (i) the likelihood and value of succeeding on each strategy if pursued alone, (ii) the extent to which potentially winning strategies will be impaired by mixing them with other strategies, and (iii) whether the predictable impairment is outweighed by the probable gains to be achieved from pursuing a mixture of strategies.

§ 22.04(e) Using Diagrams in Cross-Examination

In litigating Fourth Amendment claims, counsel will often find it helpful to ask each officer to draw a diagram of the scene of the arrest, search, or seizure in issue, describing the events in detail in relation to the diagram. Diagrams drawn by each officer should be removed from view before the entry of the next police witness, and counsel should ask the court not only for leave to remove the diagram after the testimony of the first witness but also for a ruling precluding the use of that diagram by the prosecutor in examining subsequent prosecution witnesses. The policy underlying the rule on witnesses (see § 27.11 infra) supports such a request, and by keeping from each police witness the diagrams drawn by the others, visibly inconsistent versions of the affair can sometimes be elicited that will persuade the judge or an appellate court to discredit the officers.

To make the best record for an appellate court, counsel should have the officers draw their diagrams with a marker on graph paper rather than use a blackboard.

§ 22.05 Determining Whether to Present the Testimony of the Respondent and Other Defense Witnesses

Frequently, the defense will need to subpoena and present testimony from defense witnesses in order to win a suppression hearing. For example, if the respondent’s claim is that the police unlawfully coerced the respondent’s mother into agreeing to a police search of the respondent’s bedroom, the mother probably will need to testify about the nature and effects of the coercion. If a confession suppression claim is that the respondent did not understand the Miranda warnings, it will probably be necessary to present testimony both by the respondent (about his or her lack of comprehension) and by a psychologist who tested the respondent’s reading and comprehension levels (see § 24.10(b) infra).
There are several strategic factors that must be considered in deciding whether to present the respondent or other defense witnesses in a suppression hearing. The decisions will have to be made at least tentatively at an early stage of counsel’s preparation, in order to leave sufficient time to rehearse the respondent’s testimony and to subpoena the other witnesses and prepare them to testify. See §§ 10.09-10.10 supra. (Even when a witness is loyal to the respondent, a subpoena is advisable, to make the necessary record for a continuance in the event of the witness’s failure to appear. See § 10.02 supra.) On the other hand, counsel should not allow himself or herself to feel locked in to the tentatively chosen strategy; s/he must constantly re-evaluate goals and strategies and adapt them to unanticipated developments at the hearing.

§ 22.05(a) Testimony by the Respondent

In deciding whether to put the respondent on the witness stand in a suppression hearing, counsel should consider that whatever testimony the respondent gives at the hearing can probably be used to impeach the respondent if s/he testifies at trial. See §§ 33.06(G), 33.09(a) infra. Although a respondent’s testimony in a suppression hearing cannot be used against him or her in the prosecutor’s case-in-chief at trial on the issue of guilt, Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968); Brown v. United States, 411 U.S. 223, 228 (1973) (dictum); United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 89-90 (1980) (dictum), the prosecution is usually free to use it for impeachment of the respondent’s trial testimony to the extent that the two are inconsistent. See §§ 33.06(G), 33.09(a) infra; and cf. Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971) (a confession suppressed on Miranda grounds can be used as a prior inconsistent statement to impeach the accused at trial). (Counsel can, however, argue that this kind of impeachment should be barred by New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450 (1979), which holds that an accused cannot be impeached with prior testimony which s/he was compelled to give in violation of the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination. Arguably a respondent’s testimony in a suppression hearing is “compelled” and involuntary in the sense that the respondent is confronted with the “Hobson’s choice” (Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. at 391) “either to give up what he believed, with advice of counsel, to be a valid . . . [constitutional] claim [to have evidence suppressed] or, in legal effect, to waive his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.” Id. at 394. Cf. Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968); McDaniel v. North Carolina, 392 U.S. 665 (1968) (per curiam).) Counsel may be able to limit cross-examination at the suppression hearing so as to avoid incriminating admissions, see, e.g., People v. Lacy, 25 A.D.2d 788, 788, 270 N.Y.S.2d 1014, 1015-16 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 1966) (at a hearing on a motion to suppress incriminating statements, “the defendant . . . may take the stand and testify as to his request for counsel at the time of the arrest and as to all facts relevant to the proceedings . . . leading to and including the signing of the alleged confession and waiver and by so testifying, the defendant does not subject himself ‘to cross-examination upon the [circumstances of the crime]’”), but often this will not be easy to do if the cross-examining prosecutor is at all capable.

If the respondent’s testimony would probably be instrumental in winning the suppression hearing and if a victory at the hearing would probably necessitate the prosecutor’s dismissal of the case, these prospects usually justify accepting the risks of impeachment. Even if the chances of victory at the suppression hearing are not overwhelming, testimony by the respondent at the hearing may be justified if there is little chance that the respondent will testify at trial or if the respondent’s testimony at the hearing will be limited to matters such as the respondent’s comprehension of Miranda warnings, which do not overlap any of the subjects about which the respondent may testify at trial. See, e.g., People v. Lacy, 25 A.D.2d at 788, 270 N.Y.S.2d at 1015-16.

Apart from the risk of impeachment at trial, there may be tactical reasons to forgo presenting the respondent’s testimony at a suppression hearing. It is often possible to establish a marginal case of unconstitutional police conduct on the basis of police testimony alone, whereas the respondent’s version of the relevant events portrays the officers’ behavior as considerably more egregious and blatantly unlawful. The question whether to put the respondent on the stand in this situation is particularly difficult. Many judges believe that respondents are prone to exaggerate police misconduct; these judges are slow to credit any respondent’s testimony, particularly when it consists of horror stories. Therefore, calling the respondent to testify entails the risk of irritating the judge to such an extent that s/he will strain the facts and the law to uphold the police.

On the other hand, if the respondent’s description of atrocious police conduct is strongly credible, and particularly if it is corroborated by independent witnesses or evidence, proof of flagrant police abuse can spell the difference between victory and defeat in a suppression hearing. The Supreme Court has held – in a decision of uncertain breadth – that the scope of taint attending an unconstitutional search and seizure may depend in part on the flagrancy of the unconstitutionality. Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 603-05 (1975); cf. United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 911 (1984); see § 23.39 infra. And, as a practical matter, trial and appellate judges who can be persuaded that the police have behaved abominably are more likely to rule in the respondent’s favor on any close questions in the case.

Several collateral dangers bear upon the decision whether to put the respondent on the stand in a suppression hearing. The respondent’s testimony may give the prosecutor discovery of the defenses planned for trial and thereby improve the prosecutor’s presentation on the issue of guilt. In cross-examining the respondent at the suppression hearing, the prosecutor can develop a sense of the respondent’s personality and susceptibility to certain cross-examination tactics and may consequently do a better job of cross-examination at trial. Finally, if the judge at the suppression hearing is the same judge who will preside at a bench trial and at sentencing, unpersuasive testimony by the respondent at the hearing could prove detrimental in later stages of the case: The judge’s discrediting of this testimony could lead the judge also to discredit the respondent’s testimony at trial, and the judge’s belief that the respondent has perjured himself or herself could lead to a harsher sentence.

Notwithstanding all these risks, there will be many cases in which the chances of victory at the suppression hearing are sufficiently strong, and the contribution that the respondent’s testimony can make is sufficiently important, that defense counsel will opt in favor of having the respondent testify. The final decision must be made by the respondent personally (see § 33.07 infra); counsel should explain the potential benefits and risks and advise the respondent about the best course.

When the respondent does testify at the suppression hearing, it is usually best that s/he testify last. Having heard all of the prior evidence, s/he will be in a position to rebut police testimony effectively and to explain any apparent inconsistencies in the accounts of defense witnesses. See § 33.02(a) infra.

§ 22.05(b) Testimony by Defense Witnesses Other Than the Respondent

Calling defense witnesses other than the respondent to testify at a suppression hearing involves significant dangers and complications. The bottom line is that defense counsel should not do so unless (1) counsel’s purpose in conducting the hearing is to win suppression (see §§ 22.02, 22.04(a) supra); and (2) the evidence that counsel is seeking to suppress is likely to make the difference between conviction and acquittal at trial; and (3) counsel’s chances of winning the suppression of this evidence are strong if counsel calls the defense witnesses and considerably weaker if s/he does not; and (4) the hearing judge insists that the defense lead off the hearing by presenting evidence sufficient to meet an applicable burden of production; and (5) defense counsel cannot get around the judge’s sequence-of-proof requirement in one of the ways suggested in § 22.03(d) supra; and (6) counsel cannot meet the production burden with documentary evidence (like police reports and records). In this situation, counsel obviously has no choice but call at least some witnesses. But s/he should (a) call as few witnesses as possible, and limit the examination of each witness to material that is indispensable for satisfying the defense’s production burden; (b) announce at the outset that s/he is presenting the testimony of these witnesses only under the compulsion of the judge’s sequence-of-testimony ruling; (c) announce that s/he is limiting his or her examination of the witnesses to matters that bear directly on the issues of law-enforcement illegality that are the basis of the motion to suppress; and (d) scrupulously observe that limitation.

The problems – in order of complexity – are these:

(A) When counsel introduces the testimony of any witnesses, s/he risks perpetuating testimony that the prosecution can introduce in its case-in-chief at trial, within the prior-recorded-testimony exception to the hearsay rule, if the witnesses become unavailable at the time of trial. The law on this subject is vexed.

(1) Many jurisdictions have codified the prior-testimony exception in the form in which it appears in Fed. Rule Evid. 804(b)(1) (2018), allowing the admission of the former testimony of a presently unavailable witness “if the party against whom the testimony is now offered . . . had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination.” Defense counsel’s obvious objection to the application of this exception is that s/he did not have a “similar motive” for questioning the witness at the suppression hearing as s/he would have for cross-examining the witness at trial, inasmuch as the sole focus of the suppression hearing was the legality of the manner in which the prosecution obtained its evidence, not the reliability and probative force of the evidence in proving the respondent’s guilt. But this distinction is less than clear in the case of some defense theories for suppression, like a Due Process challenge to identification testimony as unreliable (see §§ 25.02-25.04 infra) or a Due Process challenge to incriminating statements as involuntary when the defense claim of involuntariness relies in part on the idea that an impressionable respondent was coached to make the statements by police questioning that was “leading or suggestive” (Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191, 195 (1957); see, e.g., Jurek v. Estelle, 623 F.2d 929, 941 (5th Cir. 1980)). And some judges might well be persuaded to find a “similar motive” in any case in which defense counsel at the suppression hearing uses some of the techniques advised in §§ 22.04(b)-22.04(c) as means for developing discovery and impeachment material.

(2) Federal constitutional Confrontation-Clause analysis would proceed along much the same track to an equally uncertain conclusion. See § 30.04 infra. The principal pertinent cases are Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), and Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530, 546 n.6 (1986). Crawford permits a prosecutor’s use at trial of the pretrial testimony of a witness “where the . . . [witness] is unavailable [at the time of trial], and . . . where the defendant has had a prior opportunity to cross-examine” (541 U.S. at 59). Lee holds that the kind of “opportunity to cross-examine” contemplated by Crawford would not be satisfied by a respondent’s cross-examination of a prosecution witness at a suppression hearing (see 476 U.S. at 546 U.S. at 546 n.6). Logically, the rationale of Lee – that defense counsel at a suppression hearing has no reason to go beyond matters bearing on the lawfulness of the prosecution’s evidence-gathering methods and to cross-examine on subjects relating to the respondent’s guilt or innocence – seems as applicable to defense suppression-hearing witnesses as to those for the prosecution. But because, as a practical matter, defense counsel takes the initiative in developing the scope of examination of a witness whom s/he calls to the stand and questions on direct, some judges might distinguish Lee and find Crawford’s “prior opportunity” test satisfied in the case of a defense suppression-hearing witness.

(3) As a back-up argument for precluding the prosecutor’s use at trial of the testimony of such a witness who has become unavailable since the suppression hearing, counsel could invoke the rationale of Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968). This would require extending Simmons’s holding – that a respondent’s testimony admitting a possessory interest in property for the purpose of acquiring standing to challenge the legality of its warrantless seizure may not be used in the prosecution’s case-in-chief at trial to show the respondent’s possession of the instruments and proceeds of a crime because “[t]he need to choose between waiving the Fifth Amendment privilege and asserting an incriminating interest in evidence sought to be suppressed, or invoking the privilege but thereby forsaking the claim for exclusion, creates what the [Simmons] Court characterized as an ‘intolerable’ need to surrender one constitutional right in order to assert another” (United States v. Kahan, 415 U.S. 239, 242 (1974) (per curiam)) – to encompass any sort of evidence that the defense is compelled to present in court (cf. Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968)) in order to assert the respondent’s rights against the

(4) The upshot, then, is that the risk of perpetuating potential prosecution trial evidence by calling defense witnesses at a suppression hearing is considerable in some circumstances and difficult to calculate in others.

(B) Even if the prosecution were forbidden to use a defense witness’s suppression-hearing testimony in its case-in-chief at trial, it could almost certainly use that testimony to impeach the witness if his or her trial testimony deviates at all from what s/he said at the hearing. See § 7.07 supra; § 27.12(b) infra. The defense might argue that the logic of New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450 (1979), § 22.05(a) supra, prohibits this use of the prior testimony because the respondent was “compelled” to present it in order to vindicate the constitutional rights at issue in the suppression hearing; but the argument requires extensions of both Portash and Simmons in the teeth of United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. at 233-34 (see §§ 9.12-9.13 supra), and Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. 596, 600-02 (2014) (see § 12.15(a) supra); and the chances of winning all of these uphill battles under current constitutional doctrine are slim.

(C) Finally, apart from the dangers of prosecutorial use of the testimony at trial, counsel who calls defense witnesses at a suppression hearing may give the prosecutor discovery of the version of the facts that the defense intends to present at trial, together with “batting practice” in cross-examining potential defense trial witnesses.

So defense counsel’s wisest practice is to present defense testimony only under the circumstances described in the first paragraph of this section and, even when those circumstances exist, to take the precautions advised there. Any witness whom counsel is obliged to call should be painstakingly prepared to testify, by rehearsals that teach the witness to give the shortest practicable responsive answers to all questions asked on either direct or cross-examination. See §§ 10.09-10.10 supra. Direct examination questions should be tightly framed to avoid opening the door to wide-ranging cross-examination by the prosecutor. And when defense counsel later prepares the same witness to testify at trial, counsel will need to take the witness through a detailed review of the transcript of his or her suppression-hearing testimony, to minimize the likelihood that the witness will inadvertently diverge from it and expose himself or herself to avoidable impeachment.

§ 22.06 ARGUING THE MOTION AND OBTAINING THE FORMAL JUDICIAL FINDINGS NECESSARY FOR EFFECTIVE APPELLATE REVIEW

§ 22.06(a) Timing of the Argument; Reasons for Seeking a Continuance

560
After the conclusion of the evidence-taking at a suppression hearing, counsel for both parties will ordinarily be expected to proceed immediately to make their legal arguments for and against the motion. Defense counsel needs to be ready to present his or her position succinctly, integrating the applicable legal principles with the facts adduced at the hearing. For this purpose, counsel will find it useful to have taken notes, during the testimony of the principal witnesses, of key points made by each of them. Motions judges are often impatient with extended argument, and counsel will want to zero in promptly on crucial details.

In rare cases counsel may have to request a continuance of oral argument because the evidence has generated new legal issues that counsel had not anticipated and now needs to research or because counsel’s notes and memory of the evidence are not sufficient and counsel wants to review a transcript of the hearing in preparation for argument. Since judges will usually be resistant to continuing the arguments (particularly when trial is scheduled to begin shortly after the suppression hearing), counsel may be required to explain precisely why the additional research or transcript is essential to his or her ability to represent the respondent competently in arguing the motion. If the court nevertheless denies the request for a continuance, counsel will have to proceed with the oral argument. In this situation counsel should consider requesting leave to submit a supplementary written memorandum based upon counsel’s additional research and review of the transcript. If the court denies even that request and immediately rules on the motion, counsel should thereafter conduct the contemplated legal research, acquire the transcript, or both, and should incorporate any favorable new legal authorities or transcript references in a motion for reconsideration of the ruling.

If trial begins immediately on the heels of the suppression hearing and if it is a jury trial, counsel should inform the judge of his or her intention to submit a memorandum in support of reconsideration and should ask the judge to instruct the prosecutor not to mention during jury-selection voir dire or in an opening statement the evidence which counsel is continuing to contend should be suppressed. Counsel will have to promise the court to produce the memorandum promptly, so that the judge can consider it before the trial progresses to a point at which the prosecution’s presentation of the challenged evidence cannot practicably be further delayed.

§ 22.06(b) Order of the Parties’ Arguments

In oral arguments on suppression motions, it is customary in most jurisdictions for the defense to proceed first because the respondent is the moving party. On issues on which the prosecution bears the burden of persuasion (see § 22.03(d) supra), defense counsel could perhaps insist that the prosecutor argue first. However, it is usually in defense counsel’s interest to argue first, so as to gain the advantage of framing the issues and also – in jurisdictions where rebuttal argument is conventional – to get the last word.

§ 22.06(c) Using Burdens of Production and Persuasion
When arguing the motion, defense counsel should make aggressive use of the applicable burdens of production and persuasion. (See § 22.03(d) supra.) If the evidentiary record is bare or insufficient on an issue on which the prosecution bears the burden of production or persuasion, it will usually reward counsel’s effort to remind the judge that the prosecutor had an obligation to establish the missing facts and that, therefore, any deficiency of evidence on the issue is fatal to the prosecution.

§ 22.06(d) Factors to Consider in Constructing Legal and Factual Arguments

The essence of a good suppression argument is to highlight the facts adduced at the evidentiary hearing that bring the case within the legal principles on which counsel is relying. Those principles – established by precedent, by constitutional or statutory text, or by logical extrapolation from the extant caselaw – are background. Facts are foreground. Having just heard the evidence, the judge wants to know what to make of it. Ordinarily, having just heard at least as much unimportant evidence as important evidence, the judge wants to be told exactly what counsel is asserting is important. Zeroing in on key details is the way to persuade the judge to rule in counsel’s favor. It is also the way to obtain specific findings of fact that will insulate a favorable ruling from appellate reversal in jurisdictions where the prosecutor can appeal from a suppression order or get the order reviewed by prerogative writ proceedings.

Because form optimally mirrors function, it will usually be most effective for counsel to shape his or her argument by presenting the applicable legal principles not in the manner of a doctrinal primer but rather as a framework for identifying and emphasizing critical, favorable facts. Thus, for example, in a case in which a police officer stopped the respondent on the street and then frisked him or her (as a result of which the officer found a gun), counsel might structure the argument in the following manner:

(i) Begin the argument by explaining that the respondent is moving for suppression on two separate and independent grounds: on the ground that the officer’s stop of the respondent amounted to an unconstitutional seizure, and the gun therefore must be suppressed as a fruit of the seizure; and on the alternative ground that even if the officer had a lawful basis to stop the respondent, s/he did not have a lawful basis to frisk the respondent, and the gun therefore must be suppressed as a fruit of this unlawful search of the respondent’s person.

(ii) In arguing the first claim (that the stop was unconstitutional), begin by stating that there is no dispute about the fact that the officer did indeed stop the respondent; then tersely state the applicable legal standard for gauging whether a stop constitutes a “seizure” within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment (and/or the state constitution) and move on quickly to a detailed recitation of facts adduced at the hearing which demonstrate that the officer’s actions did indeed constitute such a “seizure” – beginning with the most dramatic or legally crucial such facts; then tersely state the applicable standard for assessing whether the officer had an adequate basis for stopping the respondent, and similarly promptly move on to the facts demonstrating that s/he did not – mustering the evidence in the same way, strongest first; and conclude by stating the legal principle that the unconstitutionality of the stop requires suppression of the gun as a fruit of an unlawful seizure.

(iii) In arguing the second claim (that the frisk was unconstitutional), begin by stating that there is no dispute about the fact that a frisk amounting to a “search of the person” took place; then tersely state the applicable legal standard for determining the constitutionality of a frisk and get rapidly into the evidence showing that the officer did not have the requisite information to meet that standard; and conclude by stating the legal principle that the gun must be suppressed as a fruit of the unlawful frisk even if it is not suppressed as a fruit of the unlawful stop.

When the relevant legal principles are well settled (like the federal constitutional standards for determining the validity of a stop or frisk), counsel should ordinarily keep the discussion of the law quite brief. As a general rule, counsel should state the legal principles simply and concisely, and then devote most of the argument to fitting facts into the legal framework. Even when the law is not so well settled and the issues in the case make it necessary for counsel to argue law, counsel is well advised to refrain from reciting strings of citations of court decisions or engaging in complex legal analysis in oral argument. See § 16.06 supra. If counsel’s legal position does require intricate reasoning or reference to authorities that are not the staple stuff of suppression motions in counsel’s jurisdiction, s/he does best by handing up a concise written memorandum of law or highlighted photocopies of purportedly controlling judicial opinions. See §§ 16.06-16.07 supra.

In arguing facts, counsel should consider the availability and strategic advisability of various grounds for urging the court to find that the testimony of the other side’s witness(es) is incredible. Since judges are often loth to disbelieve witnesses – particularly police officers and others who make a respectable appearance – counsel should ordinarily (a) include in his or her argument any legally sustainable theories that do not require the judge to reject the testimony of an opposing witness; (b) argue that opposing witnesses are mistaken rather than lying, to the extent that s/he is obliged to contest their testimony and can plausibly assert that it is innocently erroneous; and (c) contest the testimony of as few opposing witnesses – and as little of the testimony of each – as s/he needs to contest in order to win. However, when counsel’s position does demand that s/he ask the judge to discredit an opposing witness, s/he should be prepared to argue, for example, that a police officer’s testimony should be found to be incredible and rejected because:

(1) The officer’s account of actions or events defies “common sense” or “common knowledge.” See, e.g., People v. Lastorino, 185 A.D.2d 284, 285, 586 N.Y.S.2d 26, 27 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1992) (rejecting, as incredible, a police officer’s testimony “that the defendant, who was aware he was under surveillance for at least several minutes, exited his vehicle and left the driver’s door open and a loaded gun visible on the seat, virtually inviting the police to discover the gun”); People v. Void, 170 A.D.2d 239, 241, 567 N.Y.S.2d 216, 217 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1991) (rejecting, as incredible, a police officer’s testimony “that the defendant consented to a police search of the apartment, where a substantial amount of cocaine was stored in plain view in the kitchen sink – a location where the drugs could be readily discovered”); People v. Addison, 116 A.D.2d 472, 474, 496 N.Y.S.2d 742, 744 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1986) (in rejecting a police officer’s testimony that he had reasonable grounds to believe that the defendant was armed and dangerous because the defendant “reach[ed] for his waistband as the . . . officer approached,” the court observes that there were five police cars and several officers on the scene, and “we find it incredible that defendant, in the face of such a show of force, would . . . reach for his waistband”).

(2) At the hearing, counsel impeached the officer with a prior inconsistent statement or statements. See, e.g., People v. Miret-Gonzalez, 159 A.D.2d 647, 552 N.Y.S.2d 958 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1990), app. denied, 76 N.Y.2d 739, 558 N.Y.S.2d 901 (1990) (the court finds a police officer’s testimony incredible, in part because the officer’s account of the car stop and search was contradicted by his incident report); People v. Lebron, 184 A.D.2d 784, 785-87, 585 N.Y.S.2d 498, 550-02 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1992) (the police officer’s testimony was contradicted by statements and omissions in prior police reports).

(3) The officer has a motive to present perjurious testimony. See, e.g., People v. Berrios, 28 N.Y.2d 361, 368, 270 N.E.2d 709, 713, 321 N.Y.S.2d 884, 889 (1971) (acknowledging that “[s]ome police officers . . . may be tempted to tamper with the truth” at a suppression hearing in order to justify their actions in conducting a search or seizure).

(4) The officer’s “demeanor” on the witness stand or the witness’s “mode of telling his [or her] story” indicates that s/he is not telling the truth. People v. Perry, 128 Misc.2d 430, 432, 488 N.Y.S.2d 977, 979 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., N.Y. Cty. 1985). See also People v. Carmona, 233 A.D.2d 142, 144-45, 649 N.Y.S.2d 432, 434 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1996) (in an opinion rejecting the officer’s testimony as incredible, the appellate court refers disparagingly to the officer’s testimony “that he approached the defendant merely to exercise a common law right of inquiry” as a “well-rehearsed claim”).

(5) The officer’s account was refuted, in whole or in part, by a defense witness’s testimony. See, e.g., People v. Torres, 54 Misc.3d 1220(A), 54 N.Y.S.3d 612 (Table), 2017 WL 740983, at *3 (N.Y. County Court, Monroe Cty, January 15, 2017) (rejecting the police officer’s testimony that he observed the defendant’s “vehicle’s taillights were not working” and stopped the car for that reason, and instead crediting the “directly contradict[ory] ... testimony of the defendant’s girlfriend,” who “testified with no obvious contradiction, nervousness or hesitation”).

Finally, counsel should anticipate the judge’s reactions to the legal and factual issues in the case and should frame arguments so as to meet the judge’s likely concerns. For example, as suggested in § 16.07 supra, counsel can foresee the reluctance of a trial judge to announce any broad legal rules which go beyond the boundaries of settled precedent, and counsel can forestall that concern by taking pains to explicitly, narrowly delineate the limits of the ruling s/he is advocating.

§ 22.06(e)  Obtaining or Avoiding Findings by the Motions Judge in Order to Improve the Respondent’s Chances on Appeal

In some jurisdictions the judge is required to record specific findings of fact and conclusions of law in ruling on suppression motions. In other jurisdictions the judge is permitted to announce a yea-or-nay ruling on the motion, without explaining it. Depending upon the nature of the judge’s decision and the lay of the evidence, defense counsel may wish to ask the judge to make or clarify particular findings of fact or legal rulings, in order to improve the respondent’s posture in appellate review proceedings.

If the judge has ruled in the respondent’s favor and counsel anticipates that the prosecutor will appeal, counsel obviously has an incentive to aid the judge in insulating the ruling from reversal. Counsel should consider requesting that the judge amend or revise any troublesome or ambiguous findings of fact or legal conclusions. It is particularly in the respondent’s interest for counsel to urge the judge to rest his or her decision explicitly on record-specific factual grounds, both because appellate review of nisi prius fact-finding is more limited than appellate review of nisi prius legal reasoning and because appellate judges will be more inclined to upset a motions judge’s pro-defense rulings in proportion to the breadth of their potential precedential impact.

If the judge has ruled against the respondent on a ground which counsel suspects is legally erroneous but which the judge did not spell out clearly on the record, counsel may wish to request elaboration of the judge’s reasoning. Absent an overt articulation of incorrect legal reasoning, many appellate courts will uphold a trial court’s ruling if the appellate judges can conjecture any possible permissible rationale for it. However, if a request for clarification will likely lead a judge to seek out more unassailable bases for the denial of a suppression motion or to bolster the denial by making additional findings of fact contrary to the defense, counsel will be wiser to leave ambiguities in the record and decide later what possible use to make of them in appellate arguments. As in most other matters, it is important for counsel to know as much about the judge’s predilections, temperament, opinion-writing habits and intelligence as counsel can learn from discussing these subjects with experienced local defense attorneys.

§ 22.07 AFTER THE SUPPRESSION HEARING: PROTECTING THE RESPONDENT’S RIGHTS AT TRIAL AND PRESERVING APPELLATE REMEDIES

If the motion to suppress is denied, the defense typically cannot take an interlocutory appeal but can obtain appellate review only after conviction and sentencing. If the motion to suppress is granted, the prosecution in some jurisdictions has a statutory or common-law right to pursue an interlocutory appeal; when the prosecutor chooses to forgo that appeal and proceeds to trial without the benefit of the suppressed evidence, an acquittal at trial will forever insulate the suppression ruling from appellate review. In cases in which the motion was granted in part and denied in part, an interlocutory appeal by the prosecutor may activate a defense right to cross-appeal on rulings that were adverse to the respondent. See, e.g., People v. Fenelon, 88 Ill. App. 3d 191, 410 N.E.2d 451, 43 Ill. Dec. 451 (1980); Commonwealth v. Mottola, 10 Mass. App. Ct. 775, 412 N.E.2d 1280 (1980), review denied, 383 Mass. 890, 441 N.E.2d 1042 (1981).

When an interlocutory appeal is taken, an attorney with a client in detention should request the trial court to release the client pending appeal. Counsel can argue that the trial court’s suppression ruling provides the best basis for predicting the outcome of the appeal and that it is highly unfair to subject the respondent to protracted incarceration for a crime for which s/he will probably never be convicted. If the trial court does not release the respondent pending appeal, counsel should ask the appellate court to do so (by a motion filed in the appeal, by a separate appeal of the trial court’s refusal to grant release, or by a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, as local practice makes appropriate) and should request in the alternative that the appellate court hear the appeal of the suppression ruling on an expedited basis.

If the defense loses the suppression motion or if the defense wins and the prosecutor elects to forgo interlocutory appeal, many judges will insist upon proceeding immediately to trial. Often, the defense will want a continuance in order to obtain the transcript of the suppression hearing for use in impeaching prosecution trial witnesses. If, without revealing the defensive strategy imprudently, counsel can articulate specific ways in which the transcript would assist the defense at trial, counsel should advert to them as supporting a motion for a continuance for the purpose of effectuating the respondent’s constitutional rights to effective assistance of counsel, confrontation, and a fair trial. See § 15.02 supra. When the respondent is indigent, counsel should move that a transcript be made and furnished to him or her at state expense, under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment doctrines noted in §§ 4.31(d) and 9.09(b)(1) supra.

Frequently, the judge who presides at the suppression hearing will hear testimony, such as hearsay evidence, that would be inadmissible under the more stringent rules of evidence applicable at trial. If the same judge then presides at a bench trial of the respondent’s guilt or innocence, the result is a finder of fact jaundiced by exposure to inadmissible evidence. The result is even more unfair when a judge suppresses evidence (such as a confession or an identification) and, having heard it at the suppression hearing, is expected to put it completely out of mind in deciding the respondent’s guilt or innocence at trial. Some jurisdictions have dealt with these problems by requiring that the trial be conducted by a different judge from the one who presided at the suppression hearing. In other jurisdictions, assuming that there is more than one juvenile court judge, counsel may wish to seek recusal of the judge who presided at the suppression hearing on the ground that s/he has heard prejudicial information inadmissible at trial. For the standards governing recusal, tactical considerations in deciding whether to seek recusal, and suggestions for the framing of recusal requests, see §§ 20.04-20.07 supra.

Counsel litigating suppression motions must familiarize themselves with the idiosyncratic local requirements for obtaining appellate review of suppression rulings. In some jurisdictions the pretrial denial of a motion to suppress evidence can be reviewed on appeal only if defense counsel renews the motion or objects to the admission of the evidence at trial. In some jurisdictions a suppression ruling unfavorable to the defense can be appealed even after a guilty plea (or a conditional guilty plea); in other jurisdictions the right to appeal can be preserved only by going through the motions of a “stipulated trial” (see § 14.10 supra; § 30.02(c) infra); in still others the respondent must plead not guilty and go through a full-fledged trial in order to obtain appellate review of the suppression ruling.

Occasionally, in cases in which the defense has lost a suppression motion, new facts emerge at trial that would have significantly strengthened the original motion or provided an independent basis for suppression. Under these circumstances counsel should move to re-open the suppression hearing. See Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298, 305, 312-13 (1921) (“where, in the progress of a trial, it becomes probable that there has been an unconstitutional seizure of papers, it is the duty of the trial court to entertain an objection to their admission, or a motion for their exclusion, and to consider and decide the question as then presented, even where a motion to return the papers may have been denied before trial”); United States v. Raddatz, 447 U.S. 667, 678 n.6 (1980) (dictum) (recognizing that a federal “district court’s authority to consider anew a suppression motion previously denied is within its sound judicial discretion”); cf. Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. 478, 488 (1986) (holding, in the context of collateral challenges to a criminal conviction, that defense counsel’s reasonable lack of knowledge of the facts giving rise to a legal claim constitutes sufficient cause to excuse counsel’s failure to pursue the claim in timely fashion). See also, e.g., Commonwealth v. Haskell, 438 Mass. 790, 792, 784 N.E.2d 625, 627-28 (2003) (“renewal [of a suppression motion] ‘is appropriate where new or additional grounds are alleged which could not reasonably have been known when the motion was originally filed,’ . . . but the remedy is not restricted to those circumstances” since “[a] judge’s power to reconsider his own decisions during the pendency of a case is firmly rooted in the common law”).
Chapter 23

Motions To Suppress Tangible Evidence

Part A. Introduction: Tools and Techniques for Litigating Search and Seizure Claims

§ 23.01 OVERVIEW OF THE CHAPTER AND BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

The Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, forbidding “unreasonable searches and seizures,” is the subject of an extensive jurisprudence. Issues raised by the numerous Fourth Amendment doctrines are multiple and complex; the law is often uncertain and in flux. The best general treatment of the subject is WAYNE R. LAFAVE, SEARCH AND SEIZURE (5th ed. & Supp.). See also JOSEPH G. COOK, CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE ACCUSED – PRETRIAL RIGHTS 175-461 (1972); JOHN WESLEY HALL, JR., SEARCH AND SEIZURE (3d ed. 2000); ARNOLD MARKLE, THE LAW OF ARREST AND SEARCH AND SEIZURE (1974); WILLIAM E. RINGEL, SEARCHES & SEIZURES, ARRESTS AND CONFESSIONS (2d ed. 2003 & Supp.); JOSEPH A. VARAM, SEARCHES, SEIZURES AND IMMUNITIES (2d ed. 1974). There are voluminous law review articles of good quality on specific subtopics.

Rather than attempt still another doctrinal discourse here, this chapter approaches the law of search and seizure from a different angle. After a brief description of the major constitutional guarantees that defense counsel may invoke to challenge the legality of police searches and seizures and thereby the admissibility of prosecution evidence produced by those activities (§ 23.02 infra), the text sets out a checklist of questions that counsel can ask and answer (with minimal investigation) about the facts of any particular case s/he is handling (§ 23.03 infra). The references following each question will direct counsel to subsequent sections containing functional analyses of the law applicable to the basic factual situation targeted by the question. These analyses should assist counsel in identifying particular aspects of law enforcement activity that may be assailable in each situation, together with the theoretical grounds and supporting authorities for assailing them.

Throughout the sections on search and seizure law, an emphasis will be placed on issues likely to arise in a typical juvenile delinquency practice. Issues such as searches of students in school will receive greater attention than, for example, electronic surveillance (which tends to be used primarily in police investigations of adult perpetrators) or administrative searches (which tend to be searches of the workplace, thereby involving primarily adults). When issues like electronic surveillance or administrative searches do crop up in a delinquency case, counsel should consult the treatises cited in the first paragraph of this section.

Most of the caselaw discussed in this chapter is adult court caselaw, since most of the developments in search-and-seizure law have taken place in adult court prosecutions. However, the Supreme Court has made clear that the Fourth Amendment applies to adults and juveniles alike and that adult court precedents regarding search and seizure are equally applicable to juvenile prosecutions. See New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 337-38 (1985) (equating the privacy rights of children and adults and demonstrating that prior adult court precedents also define the limits of police intrusiveness in searching or seizing children).

§ 23.02 CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY RESTRAINTS ON SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

§ 23.02(a) General Principles of Fourth Amendment Law

The Fourth Amendment’s proscription of unreasonable searches and seizures governs federal prosecutions by its express terms and state prosecutions by incorporation into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961). It regulates the actions of the police, other law enforcement agents, other government officials (see § 23.34 infra) and, in limited circumstances, private citizens (see, e.g., State v. Scrotsky, 39 N.J. 410, 189 A.2d 23 (1963); Milan v. Bolin, 795 F.3d 726, 729 (7th Cir. 2015) (dictum); cf. Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 614 (1999) (dictum) (“We hold that it is a violation of the Fourth Amendment for police to bring members of the media or other third parties into a home during the execution of a warrant when the presence of the third parties in the home was not in aid of the execution of the warrant”).

Perhaps the simplest way of viewing the vast array of Fourth Amendment caselaw is by breaking it down into six categories of cases:

(i) Caselaw defining the powers of police officers to conduct a search of a person, place, or thing, and to seize items discovered in that search, without the benefit of a search warrant. The Supreme Court has repeatedly declared that “searches conducted outside the judicial process, without prior approval by judge or magistrate, are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment – subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.” Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 357 (1967). See, e.g., Carpenter v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2206, 2221 (2018); Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473, 2482 (2014); Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. 103, 109 (2006); Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 31 (2001); Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 372-73 (1993); Thompson v. Louisiana, 469 U.S. 17, 19-20 (1984); United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 714-15, 717 (1984). The “jealously and carefully drawn” exceptions to the warrant requirement (Jones v. United States, 357 U.S. 493, 499 (1958)) include searches and seizures made with the valid consent of an authorized person (see § 23.18 infra), incident to a valid arrest (see § 23.08 infra), under “exigent circumstances” (see § 23.20 infra), in an operable motor vehicle that there is probable cause to believe contains criminal objects (see § 23.24 infra), and after an officer’s observation of contraband or crime-related objects in “plain view” (see § 23.22(b) infra). In addition to these specific exceptions to the warrant requirement, the courts also will excuse the absence of a warrant and will test a search or seizure under the standard of “general reasonableness” in situations in which the “intrusion on the individual’s Fourth Amendment interests” is minimal (United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 703 (1983); see, e.g., Samson v. California, 547 U.S. 843 (2005); United States v. Sczubelek, 402 F.3d 175, 184-87 (3d
(ii) Caselaw concerning warrantless seizures of the person, either in the form of an “arrest” or in the form of the less extensive restraint first differentiated in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), and commonly called a “Terry stop.” See §§ 23.04-23.14 infra.

(iii) Caselaw dealing with searches and seizures made pursuant to a search warrant. See § 23.17 infra.

(iv) Caselaw pertinent to the procedural issue of when a respondent has a sufficient interest in the area searched or the item seized to mount a challenge to the search or seizure. See §§ 23.15, 23.23 infra.

(v) Caselaw addressing the procedural question of whether, if a search or seizure was unconstitutional, the prosecution may nevertheless use particular items of evidence at trial because they are not viewed as “tainted” by the unlawful search or seizure. See §§ 23.37-23.40 infra.

(vi) Caselaw defining the extent of Fourth Amendment regulation of searches and seizures by government officials who are not in the field of law enforcement, such as public school teachers (see Board of Education of Independent School District No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, supra; Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); New Jersey v. T.L.O., supra) and probation officers (see Griffin v. Wisconsin, supra), and searches or seizures by private citizens acting in collaboration with the police. See § 23.33-23.36 infra.

§ 23.02(b) State Constitutional Protections Against Searches and Seizures

As explained in § 7.09 supra, some state courts in recent years have begun to construe state constitutional provisions as providing greater protections than the parallel provisions of the Constitution of the United States as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States. This has occurred particularly in the area of searches and seizures. See, e.g., State v. Short, 851 N.W.2d 474, 486 (Iowa 2014) (“A survey of jurisdictions in 2007 found that a majority of the state supreme courts have departed from United States Supreme Court precedents in the search and seizure area to some degree.”). Quite a few state courts have developed an extensive body of state constitutional law on searches and seizures, rejecting major doctrines that limit Fourth Amendment rights. Although the state constitutional decisions are too numerous to survey systematically, some of the most significant ones will be noted in the relevant subsections of this chapter. As § 7.09 advises, defense counsel should always invoke state constitutional provisions in addition to the federal Fourth Amendment, even when there are no state constitutional precedents on the issue. This is a cost-free practice, and the advantages of winning a search-and-seizure claim on state-law grounds always make that possibility worth pursuing. See the concluding paragraph of § 7.09.

§ 23.02(c)  State Statutory Provisions Relating to Searches and Seizures

In many jurisdictions there are statutes (i) delineating the circumstances under which a police officer or a private citizen may make an arrest for a felony or misdemeanor (see § 23.07 infra), (ii) limiting the degree of force that may be employed in the course of an arrest (cf. § 23.07 concluding paragraph); and (iii) enacting “knock-and-announce” requirements under which a police officer must give adequate warning of the officer’s identity and intention to enter a dwelling before entering forcibly (see § 23.21 infra). Other statutory regulations of searches and seizures are found in some States but these are less common or less frequently involved in juvenile cases.

In addition to statutes applicable to both adult and juvenile cases, many jurisdictions have special statutory provisions governing police conduct in arresting and booking juveniles. See § 3.06 supra; § 24.14 infra. Violations of these procedures may, in an appropriate case, result in the suppression of tangible evidence.

Finally, there is a federal statute (18 U.S.C. §§ 2510-2520 (2018)) and, in several jurisdictions, state statutes, governing police use of electronic surveillance.

§ 23.03 ANALYZING SEARCH AND SEIZURE ISSUES: THE QUESTIONS TO ASK

In examining a case for possible search and seizure issues, counsel should begin by breaking down the series of governmental actions into their component parts, since each specific act by a government agent may give rise to a separate claim for relief. For example, in a case in which the police stop a person, pat the person down, arrest the person, and seize objects from the person’s possession, counsel should consider all of the following issues: Did the police have a sufficient basis for making the initial Terry stop? Even if the police had the requisite basis for a Terry stop, did they have the additional “specific and articulable facts” necessary for a Terry frisk? If there was an adequate basis for the Terry frisk, did the manner in which the frisk was conducted exceed constitutional limits for a pat-down? Did the police thereafter have an adequate basis for an arrest? Did the subsequent search incident to arrest exceed constitutional limits? If not, was the seizure of each particular object that the search uncovered constitutionally justified? Any of the distinct police actions identified in these questions could generate a basis
The following questions should be asked in analyzing search and seizure claims:

(1) Was the respondent stopped, accosted, arrested, or taken into custody by government agents at any time?

   (a) If so, is it in the interest of the defense to characterize the agents’ action as an arrest or as a Terry stop? See § 23.05 infra. Do the facts support the preferred characterization? See § 23.06 infra.

   (b) If the agents’ action is characterized as an arrest:

      (i) Did the agents have the requisite probable cause to make the arrest? See §§ 23.07, 23.11 infra.

      (ii) Did the agents search the respondent incident to the arrest? If so, did the search comply with the requirements for searches incident to arrest? See § 23.08 infra.

      (iii) Did the post-arrest custodial treatment of the respondent comport with constitutional and statutory requirements? See §§ 23.08(c), 23.14 infra.

   (c) If the agents’ action is characterized as a Terry stop:

      (i) Did the agents have the requisite factual basis for a Terry stop? See §§ 23.09, 23.11 infra.

      (ii) Did the agents conduct a Terry frisk? If so, did they have the requisite facts to support a Terry frisk? See §§ 23.10-23.11 infra.

      (iii) Was the period of the stop unduly extended or the post-stop investigation conducted in a manner that exceeded the justifications for search activities incidental to the stop? See §§ 23.06(a), 23.27, 23.28 infra.

   (d) Did the agents search any closed containers that the respondent had in his or her possession? See §§ 23.08(b), 23.12 infra.

   (e) Was the respondent’s body or clothing inspected? Was any physical examination of the respondent made? Were any tests conducted on the respondent’s body or on any object or fluid, hair, or like substance taken for suppressing evidence. from the respondent’s body? See § 23.14 infra.

(f) Did the incident occur in a school setting? See §§ 23.33-34, 23.36 infra.

(2) Did government agents enter or search the respondent’s home, any premises with which s/he had more than transitory connections, or any premises in which the respondent was legitimately present at the time of the agents’ entry or search?

(a) If so, does the respondent have a constitutionally protected interest that permits him or her to challenge the agents’ entry into the premises, the agents’ search of areas within the premises, or both? See § 23.15 infra.

(b) If the respondent does have the requisite interest:

(i) Was the agents’ entry and was the search authorized by a search warrant? If so, was the warrant validly issued, and was it validly executed? See § 23.17 infra.

(ii) Was the agents’ entry and was the search authorized by an arrest warrant? If so, did the agents limit their activities to arresting the subject of the warrant or use the arrest entry to conduct an impermissible search? See §§ 23.19, 23.22(d) infra.

(iii) Was the agents’ entry and was the search authorized by exigent circumstances? If so, did the agents confine their activities to a range within the scope of this justification? See §§ 23.20, 23.22(d) infra.

(iv) Was the agents’ entry and was the search authorized by the consent of the respondent? If so, was the respondent’s consent voluntary? See § 23.18(a) infra.

(v) Was the agents’ entry and was the search authorized by the consent of some individual other than the respondent? If so, did that individual have the authority to consent to the search of the area? Was the consent voluntary? See § 23.18(b) infra.

(c) Did the agents at any time after they entered the premises detain or search the person of the respondent? If so:

(i) Did the agents have the requisite basis for detaining the respondent? See § 23.22(c) infra.
(ii) Did the agents have the requisite basis for searching the person of the respondent? See § 23.22(c) infra.

(d) Did the agents seize any item that was allegedly in plain view? If so, did the seizure comport with the rules governing the plain view exception to the warrant requirement? See § 23.22(b) infra.

(e) Did the agents comply with the rules requiring them to announce their identity and intention to enter before effecting a forcible entry of a dwelling? See § 23.21 infra.

(3) Did the agents stop, search, or seize any motor vehicle?

(a) If so, does the respondent have a constitutionally protected interest that permits him or her to challenge the agents’ conduct in stopping, searching or seizing the vehicle? See § 23.23 infra.

(b) If the respondent does have the requisite interest:

(i) Did the agents stop the vehicle while it was moving? If so, did the agents have the requisite factual basis for a Terry stop? See § 23.27 infra.

(ii) Did the agents order the respondent out of the vehicle? If so, did they have the requisite basis to issue that order? See § 23.28 infra.

(iii) Did the agents conduct a search of the vehicle incident to an arrest of the respondent? If so, was the arrest valid? Was the search properly limited in scope? See § 23.26 infra.

(iv) Did the agents conduct an evidentiary search of the vehicle? If so, did they have the requisite probable cause for that search? See § 23.24 infra.

(v) During the stop or search of the vehicle, did the agents seize any item that was allegedly in plain view? If so, did the seizure comport with the rules governing the plain view exception to the warrant requirement? See § 23.22(b) infra.

(vi) Was the asserted basis for the stop of the vehicle a traffic infraction? See § 23.28 infra.

(vii) Was the vehicle impounded and thereafter searched in an “inventory search”? If so, was the search conducted pursuant to standardized procedures? Was the alleged inventory a mere pretext for an otherwise impermissible evidentiary search? See § 23.25 infra.

(viii) Did the agents open any closed containers that were in the vehicle? See § 23.24 infra.

(4) Was the respondent or were his or her possessions searched while at school?

(a) If so, was the search conducted by a school official without the involvement of the police? Was it:

(i) A search of the respondent’s person? See §§ 23.33-23.34 infra.

(ii) A search of the respondent’s locker or desk? See § 23.35 infra.

(b) Was the search conducted by a police officer or by a school official acting under the direction of, or in conjunction, with a police officer? See § 23.36 infra.

(5) Did government agents search or seize any physical object belonging to the respondent, whether or not on premises in which s/he has an interest? See § 23.15(d) infra.

(6) Did government agents act on the basis of information obtained from informants, whether those informants were “special agents,” police spies, or private citizens? See § 23.32 infra.

When law enforcement activity that may give rise to search and seizure issues has occurred, it is important to think comprehensively about all the items that could be suppressed as a result of a ruling that the search or seizure was unconstitutional. For example, if an arrest is found to be unlawful, the suppressible fruits of that arrest may include any physical object or substance seized at or after the time of the arrest, any show-up or lineup observations made at or after the time of the arrest, identifications of the respondent’s photograph in a photographic array that was made possible because the respondent was photographed upon arrest, confessions or statements of the respondent made in custody after the arrest or otherwise induced by pressures flowing from the arrest, any physical object or substance or observation obtained by a search or seizure whose validity depends upon consent given while the respondent was in custody after the arrest or upon consent otherwise induced by pressures flowing from the arrest, testimony of witnesses whose identity was learned by interrogation of the respondent following the arrest, and fingerprint identification evidence based upon exemplars taken at the time of the arrest. See § 23.37 infra. While some of these potential fruits of the arrest may be found eventually to be too far removed from the illegality to require suppression, see id., counsel cannot afford to overlook any conceivably viable suppression arguments.

In analyzing the validity of a search or seizure, it is crucial to isolate the facts and circumstances known to the police at the time of the search or seizure from those facts later learned by the police. The constitutionality of police officers’ conduct “must [be] judge[d] . . . in light of the information available to them at the time they acted.” Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 85 (1987). See also Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266, 271 (2000) (“The reasonableness of official suspicion must be measured by what the officers knew before they conducted their search.”); United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 115 (1984) (“[t]he reasonableness of an official invasion of the citizen’s privacy must be appraised on the basis of the facts as they existed at the time that invasion occurred”). It is not always easy to determine what facts were known by the police at the time of a search or seizure. For example, police officers often amend the complaint report, supposedly containing the facts learned from the victim on the scene (see § 8.19(a)(1) supra), to add a detailed description of the respondent based upon the officers’ observations of the respondent after arrest. Counsel should not accept these reports at face value but must cross-examine the police officer to ascertain what precise facts were known to him or her when s/he undertook the search or seizure.

In a few categories of cases, the Supreme Court has held that an unlawful police search or seizure may not require suppression if the actions of the police were so obviously in “good faith” and objectively reasonable that suppression would not further the exclusionary rule’s rationale of deterring police misconduct. The context in which this principle is most often invoked – a police officer’s good faith reliance on a search warrant issued by a magistrate which turns out to have been defective because the magistrate was mistaken in finding probable cause – is discussed in § 23.17 infra. The other situations in which the Court has recognized a “good faith” exception to the exclusionary rule are (1) when the police, in making an arrest, reasonably relied on a computer record of a warrant which a court clerk erroneously failed to update to reflect the later quashing of the warrant (Arizona v. Evans, 514 U.S. 1, 14-16 (1995)); (2) when an arresting officer’s reasonable but erroneous belief in the existence of “an outstanding arrest warrant” stemmed from “a negligent bookkeeping error by another police employee” who failed to update the police computers when the warrant was recalled (Herring v. United States, 555 U.S. 135, 137 (2009)), although this version of the “good faith” rule would be inapplicable and “exclusion [of the fruits of the arrest] would certainly be justified” “[i]f the police have been shown to be reckless in maintaining a warrant system, or to have knowingly made false entries to lay the groundwork for future false arrests” or if “systemic errors” in a warrant system were so “routine or widespread” as to make it “reckless for officers to rely on . . . [the] unreliable warrant system” (id. at 146-47); and (3) “when the police conduct a search in compliance with binding precedent that is later overruled” (Davis v. United States, 564 U.S. 229, 232 (2011)). The Supreme Court also has held that a police officer’s “mistake of law can . . . give rise to the reasonable suspicion necessary to uphold . . . [a] seizure under the Fourth Amendment” as long as the mistake was “objectively reasonable.” Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 530, 534 (2014) (upholding the validity of a police officer’s stop of a car “because one of its two brake lights was out” and “[i]t was . . . objectively reasonable for an officer . . . to think that [the] . . . faulty right brake light was a violation of North Carolina law” even though “a [North Carolina appellate] court later determined that a single working brake light was all the law required” (id. at 539-40)). See also § 23.28 infra. Finally, as discussed, in § 23.21 infra, the Supreme Court has withdrawn the exclusionary rule as a remedy for violations of the Fourth Amendment’s “knock and announce” requirement. See Hudson v. Michigan, 547 U.S. 586, 588, 594 (2006). In some States, one or more of the foregoing limitations on the availability of suppression have been rejected by the state courts as a matter of state constitutional law. See, e.g., § 23.17 infra (citing state caselaw that relies on the state constitution to reject the Supreme Court’s good faith rule for search warrants issued without probable cause). See generally § 7.09 supra.

Part B. On-the-Street Encounters with the Police: Arrests, Searches Incident to Arrest, Terry Stops, Terry Frisks, and Other Encounters

§ 23.04 THE SPECTRUM OF ON-THE-STREET ENCOUNTERS BETWEEN CITIZENS AND THE POLICE: CONTACTS, TERRY STOPS AND ARRESTS

As the Supreme Court has observed, “[s]treet encounters between citizens and police officers are incredibly rich in diversity. They range from wholly friendly exchanges of pleasantries or mutually useful information to hostile confrontations of armed men involving arrests, or injuries, or loss of life.” Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 13 (1968). The Court thus far has identified three categories of encounters, which have differing ramifications for police prerogatives and citizens’ rights: contacts, Terry stops, and arrests.

§ 23.04(a) Contacts

The Fourth Amendment is not called into play by “law enforcement officers . . . merely approaching an individual on the street or in another public place, by asking him if he is willing to answer some questions, by putting questions to him if the person is willing to listen . . . [even if] the officer identifies himself as a police officer. . . . The person approached, however, need not answer any question put to him; indeed, he may decline to listen to the questions at all and may go on his way. . . . He may not be detained even momentarily without [triggering Fourth Amendment protections that require] reasonable, objective grounds for doing so; and his refusal to listen or answer does not, without more, furnish those grounds.” Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 497-98 (1983) (plurality opinion). Compare Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983), with Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177 (2004), discussed in § 23.11(b) infra.

§ 23.04(b) The Dividing Line Between Contacts and “Seizures” Within the Meaning of the Fourth Amendment

If a police officer, going beyond this kind of detention-free contact, “accosts [the] individual and restrains his freedom to walk away, he has ‘seized’ that person” within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment’s restrictions upon “seizures.” Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 16 (1968); Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 50 (1979); Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 254-55 (2007). The restraint may be physical, Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 67 (1968), or it may take the form of a command to “stand still” or to “come along” or any other gesture or expression indicating that the person is not free to go as s/he pleases. Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 203, 207 n.6 (1979); see Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 501-03 & n.9 (1983) (plurality opinion); id. at 511-12 (concurring opinion of Justice Brennan); Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. at 254-55. “What has evolved from our cases is a determination that an initially consensual encounter between a police officer and a citizen can be transformed into a seizure or detention within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, ‘if, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave.’” Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Delgado, 466 U.S. 210, 215 (1984). The touchstone of a Fourth Amendment seizure of a person is whether the police behavior “would . . . have communicated to a reasonable person that he was not at liberty to ignore the police presence and go about his business.” Michigan v. Chesternut, 486 U.S. 567, 569 (1988). Accord, Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 629 (2003) (per curiam); see also Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. at 254-55, 262 (“A police officer may make a seizure by a show of authority and without the use of physical force, but there is no seizure without actual submission; otherwise, there is at most an attempted seizure, so far as the Fourth Amendment is concerned. . . . When the actions of the police do not show an unambiguous intent to restrain or when an individual’s submission to a show of governmental authority takes the form of passive acquiescence, there needs to be some test for telling when a seizure occurs in response to authority, and when it does not. The test was devised by Justice Stewart in United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544 (1980), who wrote that a seizure occurs if ‘in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave,’ id., at 554 (principal opinion). Later on, the Court adopted Justice Stewart’s touchstone . . . but added that when a person ‘has no desire to leave’ for reasons unrelated to the police presence, the ‘coercive effect of the encounter’ can be measured better by asking whether ‘a reasonable person would feel free to decline the officers’ requests or otherwise terminate the encounter’ . . . . [W]hat may amount to submission depends on what a person was doing before the show of authority: a fleeing man is not seized until he is physically overpowered, but one sitting in a chair may submit to authority by not getting up to run away.”). See, e.g., United States v. Smith, 794 F.3d 681, 682, 684-88 (7th Cir. 2015); United States v. Black, 707 F.3d 531, 537-39 (4th Cir. 2013); Clark v. State, 994 N.E.2d 252, 263 (Ind. 2013); State v. White, 887 N.W.2d 172, 176-77 (Iowa 2016). Cf. United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 203-04 (2002) (police questioning of passengers on a bus did not amount to a “seizure” for Fourth Amendment purposes when “[t]he officers gave the passengers no reason to believe that they were required to answer the officers’ questions,” “left the aisle free so that [passengers] could exit,” and did “[n]othing . . . that would suggest to a reasonable person that he or she was barred from leaving the bus or otherwise terminating the encounter”); California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621 (1991) (there was no “seizure” for purposes of the Fourth Amendment when police officers chased a suspect who failed to comply with their directive to halt; therefore, the officers’ lack of a basis for the directive and the pursuit provided no Fourth Amendment ground for suppression of contraband the suspect discarded during the chase; the Court says that “the so-called Mendenhall test, formulated by Justice Stewart’s opinion in United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 554 (1980), and adopted by the Court in later cases . . . [citing Chesternut and Delgado] states a necessary, but not a sufficient, condition for seizure – or, more precisely, for seizure effected through a ‘show of authority.’ Mendenhall establishes that the test for existence of a ‘show of authority’ is an objective one: not whether the citizen perceived that he was being ordered to restrict his movement, but whether the officer’s words and actions would have conveyed that to a reasonable person,” id. at 627-28; if, after such a show of authority, the citizen does not attempt to flee or resist but rather “yield[s],” s/he is deemed to have been seized, id. at 626; see also id. at 629; but if, instead of complying with the show of authority, the citizen flees, no “seizure” is effected until s/he is thereafter physically restrained or submits to restraint, id. at 628-29). Compare United States v. Bowman, 884 F.3d 200 (4th Cir. 2018) (following a traffic stop, a highway patrol officer instructed the driver to sit in the patrol car while the officer verified his license and registration information; the officer then issued the driver a warning citation, returned his license and registration documents, and shook his hand but told him to stay in the patrol car while the officer questioned a passenger who had remained in the stopped vehicle; the directive to stay in the patrol car – to which the driver responded “okay” – was a seizure of the driver and violated the Fourth Amendment in the absence of reasonable suspicion).

“When assessing whether a juvenile was seized for purposes of the fourth amendment, [it is appropriate to] . . . modify the reasonable person standard to consider whether a reasonable juvenile would have thought that his freedom of movement was restricted.” People v. Lopez, 229 Ill. 2d 322, 346, 353-54, 892 N.E.2d 1047, 1061, 1065-66, 323 Ill. Dec. 55, 69, 73-74 (2008). The precedents for considering the particular susceptibility of young people to be overawed by an aura of police authority when a court is determining whether a juvenile is in “custody” for Miranda purposes are discussed in § 24.08(a) infra and should be persuasive in the present context as well. See J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261, 264-65, 271-72 (2011) (“a child’s age properly informs the Miranda custody analysis” because the relevant inquiry is “‘how a reasonable person’ in the suspect’s position ‘would perceive his or her freedom to leave,’” and “[i]t is beyond dispute that children will often feel bound to submit to police questioning when an adult in the same circumstances would feel free to leave”).

As a doctrinal matter, these rules involve a strictly objective inquiry; they do not turn either on the suspect’s subjective belief that s/he is or is not free to leave (Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. at 258 n.4) or on the officer’s unmanifested intentions to restrain the suspect if the suspect attempts to leave (id. at 259-62) (the passenger in a stopped automobile was “seized” within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment even though the record did not establish that the officer “‘was even aware [the passenger] was in the car prior to the vehicle stop’” and thus the officer may not have intended to stop the passenger: “the objective Mendenhall test of what a reasonable passenger would understand . . . leads to the intuitive conclusion that all the occupants were subject to like control by the successful display of authority”). See also Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. at 632 (handcuffing of a suspect was a significant factor in the classification of police conduct as a seizure tantamount to an arrest notwithstanding evidence that the sheriff’s department “‘routinely’” used handcuffs for safety reasons when transporting individuals: “the officers’ motivation of self-protection does not speak to how their actions would reasonably be understood” by the suspect); United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. at 554 n.6 (opinion of Justice Stewart, announcing the judgment of the Court); Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 442 (1984); United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221, 234-35 (1985). However, as a practical matter, judges conducting a suppression hearing in the first instance often tend to be moved in the direction of finding a “seizure” when the officers can be gotten to concede that they would not have permitted the suspect to leave if the suspect had attempted to do so. Therefore, counsel may be well advised to ask the officer or officers a question like: “If [the client] had simply ignored you, turned [his] [her] back on you and walked away, are we to understand that you would have done nothing to prevent [him] [her] from taking off?” Officers with an ego will commonly be unwilling to say that they would have done nothing in this insulting situation; and, if they do say so, the question and answer will have done the defense no harm under the ultimate “objective Mendenhall test” (Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. at 260). Prosecutorial objections to the question can be met by the observation that U.S. Supreme Court opinions attach significance to the information that the question seeks to elicit, see, e.g., Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. at 503 (plurality opinion) (“the State conceded in the Florida courts that Royer would not have been free to leave the interrogation room had he asked to do so. Furthermore, the state’s brief in this Court interprets the testimony of the officers at the suppression hearing as indicating that had Royer refused to consent to a search of his luggage, the officers would have held the luggage and sought a warrant to authorize the search.”); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. at 203, 212 (“although . . . [Dunaway] was not told he was under arrest, he would have been physically restrained if he had attempted to leave”); id. at 212 (Dunaway “was never informed that he was ‘free to go’; indeed, he would have been physically restrained if he had refused to accompany the officers or had tried to escape their custody”) – perhaps because an officer’s subjective intentions will frequently manifest themselves in subtle, visible appearances or “actions . . . [that] show an unambiguous intent to restrain” (Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. at 255).

Some states courts extend their state constitutional guarantees against unreasonable searches and seizures to police conduct that would not be characterized as a “seizure” under the federal Fourth Amendment caselaw. There are, for example, decisions requiring that the police have a degree of justification for conduct that the United States Supreme Court put beyond the bounds of Fourth Amendment regulation in United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. at 203-04 (see, e.g., People v. McIntosh, 96 N.Y.2d 521, 755 N.E.2d 329, 730 N.Y.S.2d 265 (2001)), and in Hodari D., 499 U.S. at 629 (see, e.g., People v. Holmes, 81 N.Y.2d 1056, 1057-58, 619 N.E.2d 396, 397-98, 601 N.Y.S.2d 459, 460-61 (1993)).

§ 23.04(c)

Terry Stops

There is a “general rule that seizures of the person require probable cause to arrest” (Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 499 (1983) (plurality opinion)), but the Court in Terry v. Ohio “created a limited exception to this general rule: certain seizures are justifiable under the Fourth Amendment if there is articulable suspicion that a person has committed or is about to commit a crime” (Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. at 498 (plurality opinion)). “The predicate permitting seizures on suspicion short of probable cause is that law enforcement interests warrant a limited intrusion on the personal security of the suspect. The scope of the intrusion permitted will vary to some extent with the particular facts and circumstances of each case. This much, however, is clear: an investigative detention must be temporary and last no longer than is necessary to effectuate the purpose of the stop. Similarly, the investigative methods employed should be the least intrusive means reasonably available to verify or dispel the officer's suspicion in a short period of time.” Id. at 500. For further discussion of the circumstances justifying a Terry stop, see § 23.09 infra; for discussion of the rules governing Terry frisks, see § 23.10 infra.

§ 23.04(d) Arrests

The line on the spectrum that separates Terry stops from arrests can be described as the “point [at which] . . . police procedures [are] . . . qualitatively and quantitatively . . . so intrusive with respect to a suspect’s freedom of movement and privacy interests as to trigger the full protection of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.” Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811, 815-16 (1985). Obviously, that line is not always easy to pinpoint. As the Court itself has observed, its decisions in “Terry [v. Ohio, supra], Dunaway [v. New York, supra], [Florida v.] Royer[. supra] and [United States v.] Place, [462 U.S. 696 (1983)] considered together, may in some instances create difficult line-drawing problems in distinguishing an investigative stop from a de facto arrest.” United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675, 685 (1985). Certainly, any time the police “forcibly remove a person from his home or other place in which he is entitled to be and transport him to the police station, where he is detained, although briefly, for investigative purposes,” the police have “crossed” the line between Terry stops and arrests and have effected a “seizure[ ] . . . sufficiently like [an] arrest[ ] to invoke the traditional rule that arrests may constitutionally be made only on probable cause.” Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. at 816. Accord, Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 631-32 (2003) (per curiam) (seizure requiring probable cause occurred when “a group of police officers roused[ ] . . . [the 17-year-old defendant] out of bed in the middle of the night,” handcuffed him and took him to the police station in his underwear, and then questioned him in an interrogation room, even though the officers said “‘we need to go and talk,’” the defendant verbally acquiesced, and the sheriff’s department routinely used handcuffs for transporting individuals); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. at 212 (when police removed defendant from his home, transported him to the police station against his will and interrogated him, the defendant’s “detention . . . was in important respects indistinguishable from a traditional arrest”). With respect to lesser intrusions upon an individual’s freedom, the point of arrest is flexible, determined on a case-by-case basis by whether the circumstances of the detention were “more intrusive than necessary to effectuate an investigative detention otherwise authorized by the Terry line of cases,” Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. at 504 (plurality opinion); United States v. Bailey, 743 F.3d 322, 340-41 (2d Cir. 2014) (the police “exceeded the reasonable bounds of a Terry stop when they handcuffed Bailey”: although “not every use of handcuffs automatically renders a stop an arrest requiring probable cause,” the “government failed to make . . . [the requisite] showing” that the police had “a reasonable basis to think that the person detained pose[d] a present physical threat and that handcuffing [was] the least intrusive means to protect against that threat”); Mareska v. Bernalillo County, 804 F.3d 1301, 1310 (10th Cir. 2015) (“the deputies, by ordering the Marescas out of the car one-by-one at gunpoint, making them lie on the ground, handcuffing four of them and placing them in separate patrol cars, effected an arrest”); Reid v. State, 428 Md. 289, 293, 51 A.3d 597, 599 (2012) (police officer’s “use of a Taser to fire two metal darts into Reid’s back converted what otherwise may have been a Terry stop into a de facto arrest for Fourth Amendment purposes”). Accord, Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 696-97 (1981) (to escape “the general rule that an official seizure of the person must be supported by probable cause, even if no formal arrest is made,” the detention must be “significantly less intrusive than an arrest”). The criteria normally considered in making that assessment are described in § 23.06 infra. For further discussion of the standards for making an arrest, see § 23.07 infra.

§ 23.04(e) “Custody” for Purposes of the Miranda Doctrine

It should be noted that there is one other constitutionally significant point on the spectrum of intrusiveness of police contacts with citizens. The protections established in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), and its progeny, are triggered by the police placing a criminal defendant or juvenile respondent in “custody.” See § 24.08(a) infra. In Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984), the Court made clear that the Miranda concept of custody envisions a greater degree of intrusiveness than a Terry stop. See id. at 439-40. It is uncertain, however, whether the Miranda concept of “custody” is synonymous with the Fourth Amendment concept of “arrests” that require probable cause. For detailed discussion of what constitutes “custody” under Miranda, see § 24.08(a) infra.

§ 23.05 TACTICAL REASONS FOR SEEKING A CATEGORIZATION OF POLICE CONDUCT AS AN ARREST OR AS A TERRY STOP

Because there is no “litmus-paper test for distinguishing a consensual encounter from a seizure or for determining when a seizure exceeds the bounds of an investigative stop,” Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 506 (1983) (plurality opinion), the classification of the police action in each case will depend substantially upon the facts that defense counsel elicits from the witnesses and on the quality of counsel’s arguments.

Obviously, it is always in the interest of the defense to characterize a police action as a seizure of the person rather than a “consensual encounter,” because only seizures trigger the protections of the Fourth Amendment. The determination whether the defense stands to gain by characterizing the seizure as a Terry stop or as an arrest is not quite so clear-cut. Before the criteria for classifying seizures are discussed, it is useful to examine the strategic considerations that may make one or the other of the two classifications more beneficial to the respondent.

Ordinarily, defense counsel will wish to establish that a particular restraint was an arrest rather than a Terry stop (or, in cases in which the degree of police restraint escalated over a period of time, that the arrest occurred earlier, rather than later, in the sequence of events). The arrest categorization usually favors the defense because the preconditions for a valid arrest are more demanding than those for a Terry stop, see §§ 23.07, 23.09 infra, making it more difficult for the prosecution to justify the seizure. Moreover, in certain cases, the classification of the seizure as an “arrest” will provide additional grounds for suppression apart from the central claim that the invalidity of the seizure tainted all evidence derived from it. (For discussion of the concept of “derivative evidence,” see § 23.37 infra.) For example, in cases involving confessions or other statements of the respondent, the greater level of custody involved in an arrest will ordinarily guarantee Miranda protection. See § 24.08(a) infra; Órozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324, 327 (1969); compare Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 434 (1984) (“there can be no question that respondent was ‘in custody’ at least as of the moment he was formally placed under arrest and instructed to get into the police car”), with id. at 439-42; cf. § 23.04(e) supra. And the greater degree of coerciveness inherent in an arrest will be a factor for consideration in determining the voluntariness both of incriminating statements (see § 24.04 infra; cf. Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560, 567 (1958)) and of consents to search or seizure (see § 23.18 infra; cf. Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 240 n.29 (1973) (dictum) (“courts have been particularly sensitive to the heightened possibilities for coercion when the ‘consent’ to a search was given by a person in custody”).

In certain cases, however, it may be in the interest of the defense to characterize a restraint as a Terry stop rather than an arrest. One of the most important examples of this is when the classification of the restraint as a Terry stop can be used to invalidate a subsequent search of the respondent. If the restraint were characterized as an arrest and the arrest was lawful because the police had probable cause to arrest, then any postarrest search would be valid as a search incident to arrest. See § 23.08 infra. On the other hand, if the restraint were classified as a Terry stop and if the police lacked the requisite basis for a Terry frisk – specific and articulable facts warranting a reasonable conclusion that the respondent was armed and dangerous, see § 23.10 infra – then the frisk would be invalid (see Thomas v. Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 874-86 (9th Cir. 2016) (dictum) and cases collected) and the fruits of the frisk would have to be suppressed. (Before deciding to attempt to bring a case within the latter principle, however, counsel should consider whether s/he can also bring it within the general rule that “a search incident to a lawful arrest may not precede the arrest,” Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 67 (1968), and can avoid the narrow exception permitting a search incident to arrest to be made immediately preceding the arrest as a part of a single course of action. See § 23.08(d) infra.)

§ 23.06 CRITERIA FOR CATEGORIZING A RESTRAINT (THAT IS, ANY SEIZURE OF THE PERSON) AS A TERRY STOP ON THE ONE HAND OR AN ARREST ON THE OTHER

As already explained, the defense will always want to classify a police action as a “seizure of the person,” in order to bring the Fourth Amendment’s protections into play. This initial step of showing that a “seizure” occurred is ordinarily achieved by establishing that the police made some “show of official authority,” Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 502 (1983) (plurality opinion), that would cause a “‘reasonable person’” to believe “‘that he was not free to leave,’” id. See § 23.04(b) supra. Thus, in Royer, the plurality concluded that a Fourth Amendment “seizure” had occurred when officers approached a suspect in an airport concourse, identified themselves as narcotics agents, told the defendant that he was suspected of transporting drugs, asked him to accompany them to the police room while retaining his airplane ticket and driver’s license, and in no way indicated that he was free to leave. Id. at 502-03. See also Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980) (per curiam).

The next step is to categorize the seizure as either a Terry stop or, conversely, an arrest. See, e.g., Mareska v. Bernalillo County, 804 F.3d 1301, 1308-10 (10th Cir. 2015). Counsel should consider developing the facts on each of the following subjects that bear upon the stop-versus-arrest classification.

§ 23.06(a) The Length of the Restraint

On numerous occasions the Court has said that one of the factors that distinguishes Terry stops from arrests is the relative brevity of a Terry stop. See, e.g., United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 709 (1983) (explaining that “[a]lthough we have recognized the reasonableness of seizures longer than the momentary ones involved in Terry, . . . the brevity of the invasion of the individual’s Fourth Amendment interests is an important factor in determining whether the seizure is so minimally intrusive as to be justifiable on reasonable suspicion,” and then invalidating a 90-minute detention of an air traveler’s luggage on reasonable suspicion: “[A]lthough we decline to adopt any outside time limitation for a permissable Terry stop, we have never approved a seizure of the person for the prolonged 90-minute period involved here and cannot do so on the facts presented by this case”); Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. at 500 (plurality opinion) (“This much, however, is clear: an investigative detention must be temporary and last no longer than is necessary to effectuate the purpose of the stop”); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 212 (1979) (stops are limited to “brief and narrowly circumscribed intrusions”); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 878, 880-82 (1975); Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. at 10. See also, e.g., United States v. Arvizu, 534 U.S. 266, 273 (2002) (dictum) (“brief investigatory stops”). Cf. United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 10-11 (1989) (dictum).

In United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675 (1985), the Court retreated somewhat from an iron-clad rule that a Terry stop must be no longer than momentary. While continuing to recognize that “brevity . . . is an important factor” (id. at 685, quoting United States v. Place, supra), the Court in Sharpe stressed that “our cases impose no rigid time limitations on Terry stops” (Sharpe, 470 U.S. at 685) and stated:

“[W]e have emphasized the need to consider the law enforcement purposes to be served by the stop as well as the time reasonably needed to effectuate those purposes. . . . In assessing whether a detention is too long in duration to be justified as an investigative stop, we consider it appropriate to examine whether the police diligently pursued a means of investigation that was likely to confirm or disprove their suspicions quickly, during which time it was necessary to detain the defendant. . . . A court making this assessment should take care to consider whether the police are acting in a swiftly developing situation . . . .”
Applying this standard in Sharpe, the Court concluded that the 20-minute investigative detention there was a Terry stop, not an arrest because: (i) the police officer “pursued his investigation in a diligent and reasonable manner” and “proceeded expeditiously,” and there was no indication “that the officers were dilatory in their investigation”; (ii) to perform the investigation it was necessary to detain the suspect during the 20-minute period; (iii) the police were acting in a swiftly developing situation; and (iv) “[t]he delay in this case was attributable almost entirely to the evasive actions” of one of the suspects and, in the absence of that suspect’s “maneuvers, only a short and certainly permissible pre-arrest detention would likely have taken place,” id. at 687-88.

In the wake of the Sharpe decision, the relevant question is whether the detention exceeded the “time reasonably needed to effectuate” the “law enforcement purposes to be served by the stop,” id. at 685; accord, Rodriguez v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 1609, 1612 (2015) (“We hold that a police stop exceeding the time needed to handle the matter for which the stop was made violates the Constitution’s shield against unreasonable seizures.”); Illinois v. Caballes, 543 U.S. 405, 407 (2005) (dictum) (“A seizure . . . can become unlawful if it is prolonged beyond the time reasonably required to complete th[e] mission” justifying the seizure); Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326, 332 (2001) (dictum) (“this time period was no longer than reasonably necessary for the police, acting with diligence, to [complete the activity that justified the suspect’s restraint]”); and see, e.g., Johnson v. Thibodeaux City, 887 F.3d 726, 733-35 (5th Cir. 2018); United States v. Jenson, 462 F.3d 399, 404 (5th Cir. 2006); State v. Coles, 218 N.J. 322, 344-47, 95 A.3d 136, 148-50 (2014). (The predicate for this question – and thus another necessary element for characterizing a police action as a stop rather than as an arrest – is that the purposes served by the officer’s actions are consistent with the function of a Terry stop, to confirm or dispel an officer’s suspicions by nonintrusive methods of investigation. See, e.g., People v. Ryan, 12 N.Y.3d 28, 30-31, 904 N.E.2d 808, 809-10, 876 N.Y.S.2d 672, 673-74 (2009) (even assuming that the police had reasonable suspicion to stop the defendant, the detention exceeded the permissible bounds of a Terry stop and became a seizure requiring probable cause when the police held the defendant at the location for 13 minutes while they conducted a photo identification procedure, apparently “to make it convenient for the police to arrest defendant if a positive identification subsequently occurred”). When, as in United States v. Place, the police seized a suspect’s luggage for 90 minutes in order to arrange for a narcotics-sniffing dog and when the police had forewarning of the suspect’s arrival which would have permitted them to make advance preparations and thereby shorten the detention period, a reviewing court could properly conclude that the police failed to act diligently. See United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. at 684-85 (explaining the holding in Place). But diligence is not the only issue. The most diligent of police officers is not permitted to extend a Terry stop indefinitely simply because the purpose of the stop cannot be achieved in a finite period of time. As the Court acknowledged in elaborating its new standard in Sharpe, “[o]bviously, if an investigative stop continues indefinitely, at some point it can no longer be justified as an investigative stop.” 470 U.S. at 685. And the Court in Sharpe, when describing the need for allowing the police to pursue their investigations, specified that it was contemplating investigations that were to be conducted “quickly.” Id. at 686. See also United States v. Foreste, 780 F.3d 518, 525 & n.4 (2d Cir. 2015) (if police officers conduct successive stops of the same individual based on the “same reasonable suspicion,” and if “the officer conducting the subsequent investigation is aware of the prior investigation and the suspicion that supported it, the investigations’ duration and scope must be both individually and collectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment”; “The same would be true were the suspicion justifying the second investigation generated from the first investigation rather than if it were identical to it. In either case, the second stop can be viewed as an extension of the first stop, justifying the stops’ joint evaluation for reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment.”).

§ 23.06(b) Whether the Police Transported the Respondent from the Location of the Stop

The police frequently transport a suspect from the place of initial accosting to another location, either to conduct questioning in a more private setting, or to display the suspect to an eyewitness in a show-up identification procedure, or for some other investigative purpose. In Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811 (1985); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979); Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983); and Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626 (2003) (per curiam), the ambulatory nature of the detention was a significant factor in the Court’s classification of the detention as an arrest rather than a Terry stop.

In Hayes v. Florida, the Court concluded that the forcible removal of a suspect from his home and the non-consensual transportation of the suspect to the police station constituted such an “intrusi[on] with respect to a suspect’s freedom of movement and privacy interests as to trigger the full protection of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.” 470 U.S. at 816. Similarly, in Dunaway v. New York, two of “[t]he pertinent facts relied on by the Court” in finding that the detention was an arrest “were that (1) the defendant was taken from a private dwelling; [and] (2) he was transported unwillingly to the police station.” United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. at 684 n.4 (explaining the holding in Dunaway).

In Royer, one of the factors that transformed “[w]hat had begun as a consensual inquiry in a public place” (460 U.S. at 503) into a full arrest was the transportation of the defendant some 40 feet to a small airport room for questioning. In condemning this movement of the suspect, the plurality in Royer stressed that “[t]he record does not reflect any facts which would support a finding that the legitimate law enforcement purposes which justified the detention in the first instance were furthered by removing Royer to the police room prior to the officer’s attempt to gain his consent to a search of his luggage.” 460 U.S. at 505. See also United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. at 684 (discounting the portion of the Royer opinion that seemed to rely on the length of the detention, and defining the opinion as being concerned primarily with “the fact that the police confined the defendant in a small airport room for questioning”).

In the per curiam opinion in Kaupp v. Texas, the Court relied on the reasoning in Hayes v. Florida and Dunaway v. New York to hold that the police conducted a seizure that was ““in important respects indistinguishable from a traditional arrest’ and therefore required probable cause or judicial authorization” when they removed the 17-year-old defendant from his home in the middle of the night in handcuffs, “placed [him] in a patrol car, dr[oo]ve[ ] [him] to the scene of a crime and then to the sheriff’s offices, where he was taken into an interrogation room and questioned.” Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. at 631. “[W]e have never ‘sustained against Fourth Amendment challenge the involuntary removal of a suspect from his home to a police station and his detention there for investigative purposes . . . absent probable cause or judicial authorization.’” Id. at 630 (quoting Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. at 815). The Court in Kaupp reiterated that “[s]uch involuntary transport to a police station for questioning is ‘sufficiently like arrest[t] to invoke the traditional rule that arrests may constitutionally be made only on probable cause.’” Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. at 630 (quoting Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. at 816).

§ 23.06(c)  The Nature of the Setting in Which the Detention Takes Place

In Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984), in the course of holding Miranda inapplicable to roadside questioning of motorists detained pursuant to traffic stops, the Court made some general observations concerning the distinction between Terry stops and arrests. Explaining that typical traffic stops differ from the usual Miranda custodial setting in that the “exposure to public view . . . diminishes the motorist’s fear that, if he does not cooperate, he will be subjected to abuse,” the Court then commented that in this respect, “the usual traffic stop is more analogous to a so-called ‘Terry stop’ . . . than to a formal arrest.” Id. at 438-39. The Court noted that Terry stops are normally characterized by “[t]he comparatively non-threatening character of [the] detentions.” Id. at 440.

Non-public setting played an important part in the decision in Florida v. Royer, supra. In condemning the transportation of the suspect, the plurality stressed that the effect of the move was to shift the suspect from a “public place” to “a small room – a large closet . . . [where] [h]e was alone with two police officers,” 460 U.S. at 502. Although the Royer plurality did not expressly characterize the change in location as designed to increase the pressure on the suspect, that conclusion is implicit in the plurality’s strong criticism of the lack of any “legitimate law enforcement purposes” in “removing Royer to the police room prior to the officers’ attempt to gain his consent to a search of his luggage.” Id. at 505.

Significantly, the progenitors of the “stop” doctrine, Terry v. Ohio and Sibron v. New York, originally recognized the “stop” power in the context of stops made on the street or in a public place. In extending that power to cases in which police officers board a bus and question passengers, the Court in United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194 (2002), and Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429 (1991), said that “[t]he fact that an encounter takes place on a bus does not on its own transform standard police questioning of citizens into an illegal seizure.” Drayton, 536 U.S. at 204; Bostick, 501 U.S. at 439-40. Acknowledging that “[w]here the encounter takes place is one factor” in assessing whether a “seizure” has taken place, Bostick, 501 U.S. at 437, the Court explained that “an encounter [that] takes place on a bus” may be no more intrusive than one that “occurred on the street” “because many fellow passengers are present to witness [the] officers’ conduct, [and thus] a reasonable person may feel even more secure in his or her decision not to cooperate with police on a bus than in other circumstances,” Drayton, 536 U.S. at 195.

Except for a pair of scenarios – one of which the Supreme Court has addressed in several decisions – all of the Court’s rulings upholding stops have involved “on-the-street” situations, Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. at 210-11, or encounters in similarly public places, such as buses or airport concourses (United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 560-66 (1980) (plurality opinion on this point)). The first exception is a situation in which officers who are executing a valid search warrant for contraband in a home detain an occupant of the premises during the search – a scenario the Court addressed in Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692 (1981), and again in Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93 (2005). See § 23.22(c) infra. In Summers, the Court held that in this situation, officers executing a valid search warrant have “the limited authority to detain the occupants of the premises while a proper search is conducted,” 452 U.S. at 705. Accord, Los Angeles County v. Rettele, 550 U.S. 609, 613-14 (2007) (per curiam). Cf. Bailey v. United States, 568 U.S. 186, 193 (2013) (Summers doctrine is strictly limited to “cases [in which] the occupants detained were found within or immediately outside a residence at the moment the police officers executed the search warrant”); United States v. Watson, 703 F.3d 684, 691-92 (4th Cir. 2013). In Muehler, the Court added that the police also may engage in the additional intrusion of handcuffing an occupant during the search if this measure is necessitated by “inherently dangerous” circumstances such as those that existed in the Muehler case, where the “warrant authoriz[ed] a search for weapons and a wanted gang member reside[d] on the premises” and there was a “need to detain multiple occupants.” 544 U.S. at 100. But, as the Court emphasized in establishing the general rule in Summers, the police officers’ possession of a search warrant in these cases precludes any possibility that the police have arranged for detention in a non-public place for the sake of exploiting the coercive atmosphere to gain information or consent to a search or seizure. The Summers Court made a point of explaining that “the type of detention imposed here is not likely to be exploited by the officer” to extract information from the suspect since “the information the officers seek normally will be obtained through the search and not through the detention.” Summers, 452 U.S. at 701. See also Muehler, 544 U.S. at 101-02 (explaining that, although the police questioned the handcuffed suspect about her immigration status, the case did not require that the Court consider the constitutionality of “questioning that extended the time [the detainee] . . . was detained” or that otherwise “constitute[d] an independent Fourth Amendment violation”). Moreover, in this scenario, extraction of a consent to search or seize would be superfluous since the officers already have a warrant.

The second exceptional scenario is Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326 (2001), where the Court upheld the conduct of police who, after discussions with a homeowner on his front porch, refused to permit him to enter his home unaccompanied by a police escort during a two-hour period while they were seeking a search warrant for the home, based on probable cause to believe there was marijuana inside. The Court justified the restraint of the homeowner’s freedom because “the police had good reason to fear that, unless restrained, . . . [he] would destroy the drugs before they could return with a warrant, id. at 332, and it noted that, on the two or three occasions when a police officer accompanied the homeowner into the house during the two-hour wait, the homeowner had “reentered simply for his own convenience, to make phone calls and to obtain cigarettes” and had given his consent to the officer’s escorting him inside for these purposes, id. at 335.

Accordingly, in situations other than the Summers-Muehler and McArthur scenarios, counsel can argue that any detention of a suspect in a “‘police dominated’” setting (Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. at 439), where no or few other members of the public are “present to witness officers’ conduct” (United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. at 204) and to reinforce “[t]he comparatively nonthreatening character of [the] detention[ ]” (Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. at 440), transforms what might otherwise be merely a Terry stop into an arrest requiring probable cause. The argument has particular force when the police have moved the suspect from a public location to a setting of that sort – a particularly intimidating action. See the discussion of Florida v. Royer in the second paragraph of this section.

§ 23.06(d) Whether the Detention Was for the Purpose of Interrogation

If the purpose of police detention of a suspect is interrogation, the courts are particularly likely to view the interrogation as an arrest requiring probable cause rather than a Terry stop. In Dunaway v. New York, the Court concluded that when the police transported the suspect to the police station for the purpose of interrogation, the “detention . . . was in important respects indistinguishable from a traditional arrest.” 442 U.S. at 212; see also United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. at 684 n.4 (explaining the holding in Dunaway). In Kaupp v. Texas, supra, the Court applied the reasoning of Dunaway to hold that the police had conducted a seizure that was “‘in important respects indistinguishable from a traditional arrest’ and therefore required probable cause or judicial authorization” when they removed the 17-year-old defendant from his home in the middle of the night in handcuffs and drove him “to the sheriff’s offices, where he was taken into an interrogation room and questioned.” 538 U.S. at 631 (quoting Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. at 212). Such “involuntary transport to a police station for questioning,” the Court explained, is “‘sufficiently like arrest[t] to invoke the traditional rule that arrests may constitutionally be made only on probable cause.’” Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. at 630 (emphasis added)). Similarly, in Florida v. Royer, it was deemed significant that the police transported the defendant to the police room for the purpose of interrogation rather than legitimate “reasons of safety and security.” 460 U.S. at 504-05 (plurality opinion). By contrast, in Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. at 701-02 & n.15, the Court emphasized that the detention of the suspect, which the Court classified as a Terry stop, was not designed to extract information from the suspect.

§ 23.07 CIRCUMSTANCES JUSTIFYING AN ARREST

§ 23.07(a) Authorization by Statute or Common Law

“Whether an officer is authorized to make an arrest ordinarily depends, in the first instance, on state law.” Michigan v. DeFillipo, 443 U.S. 31, 36 (1979). In virtually all jurisdictions the conditions for a valid arrest are specified by either statute or caselaw.

State law may require the suppression of evidence obtained as a consequence of a legally unauthorized arrest, see, e.g., Commonwealth v. Le Blanc, 407 Mass. 70, 75, 551 N.E.2d 906, 909 (1990) (“The police officer in this case acted without statutory or common law authority both when he stopped the defendant and when he arrested him. Our case law supports exclusion of evidence when such conduct prejudices the defendant. . . . The requirement that a police officer have lawful authority when he deprives individuals of their liberty is closely associated with the constitutional right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures.”), but such an arrest does not eo ipso violate the Fourth Amendment or require suppression as a matter of federal constitutional law (Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164, 176-77 (2008)). The state-law validity of an arrest may also have other consequences unaffected by federal law: In many States, for example, a defendant or respondent can be convicted of the crime of resisting arrest only if the arrest is lawful. E.g., State v. Robinson, 6 Ariz. App. 424, 433 P.2d 75 (1967); People v. Peacock, 68 N.Y.2d 675, 496 N.E.2d 683, 505 N.Y.S.2d 594 (1986); State v. Mobley, 240 N.C. 476, 83 S.E.2d 100 (1954).

In several jurisdictions the juvenile court statutes establish additional requirements for arrests of juveniles. See §§ 3.03-3.09 supra.

§ 23.07(b)
Arrest Warrants

In cases in which a juvenile respondent is arrested on an arrest warrant (in some jurisdictions called a “custody order”), the defense can challenge the validity of the warrant, and thereby the validity of the arrest, by arguing that the warrant was issued without a showing of probable cause to believe that the respondent committed an offense. See Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480 (1958), as explained in Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 112 n.3 (1964); Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204, 213 (1981) (dictum). In determining whether such an argument is viable, counsel will need to obtain the affidavit or sworn complaint submitted by the police or prosecutor in support of the request for the arrest warrant and examine the sufficiency of the facts presented to the magistrate or judge who issued the warrant. In cases in which an arrest warrant does not correctly name the respondent and instead is issued on the basis of an alias, a nickname, or a description of the person sought, counsel also may be able to challenge the validity of the warrant on the grounds that it does not identify the respondent with the requisite particularity. See, e.g., United States v. Doe, 703 F.2d 745 (3d Cir. 1983).

The practical value of challenging arrest warrants has been drastically curtailed by the holdings in United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984), and Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984), that the exclusionary rule does not apply to evidence obtained through police actions taken in “good faith” reliance upon an apparently valid warrant issued as a consequence of a magistrate’s erroneous finding of probable cause. For discussion of this complicated subject, see § 23.17 infra.
§ 23.07(c) Arrests Without a Warrant: The Basic Authorizations for Warrantless Arrest in Felony and Misdemeanor Cases Respectively

In most jurisdictions the requirements for a warrantless arrest depend upon whether the underlying crime is a felony or a misdemeanor:

(i) If the underlying crime is a felony, a warrantless arrest can be made whenever the arresting officer (or the officer who ordered or requested the arrest) was in possession of facts providing probable cause to believe that the crime was committed and that the person to be arrested had committed it. Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366, 370 (2003); United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976); United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976); Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31, 36 (1979). This is the ubiquitous state-law rule and is also the rule of the Fourth Amendment.

(ii) If the underlying crime is a misdemeanor, the rule in most jurisdictions is that a warrantless arrest can be made only when the offense was committed in the presence of the arresting officer. See Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318, 355-60 (2001) (“Appendix to Opinion of the Court,” listing and quoting state statutes). The Supreme Court has explicitly reserved the question “whether the Fourth Amendment [also] entails an ‘in the presence’ requirement for purposes of misdemeanor arrests.” See id. at 341 n. 11, citing, with a “cf.” signal, Justice White’s statement in a dissent in Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 756 (1984), that the “‘requirement that a misdemeanor must have occurred in the officer’s presence to justify a warrantless arrest is not grounded in the Fourth Amendment.’” The answer to that question is important because “violations of state arrest law” are not necessarily “also violations of the Fourth Amendment” (Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164, 173 (2008)). See § 23.07(a) supra.

(A) Counsel contending that the Fourth Amendment does embody the majority state-law rule limiting misdemeanor arrests to offenses committed in the presence of the arresting officer can point to passages in a number of Supreme Court opinions which treat that proposition as axiomatic. See id. at 171 (“In a long line of cases, we have said that when an officer has probable cause to believe a person committed even a minor crime in his presence, . . . [t]he arrest is constitutionally reasonable.”); id. at 178 (“When officers have probable cause to believe that a person has committed a crime in their presence, the Fourth Amendment permits them to make an arrest”); Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366, 370 (2003) (“A warrantless arrest of an individual in a public place for a felony, or a misdemeanor committed in the officer’s presence, is consistent with the Fourth Amendment if the arrest is supported by probable cause.”); Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. at 354 (“[i]f an officer has probable cause to believe that an individual has committed even a very minor criminal offense in his presence, he may, without violating the Fourth Amendment, arrest the offender.”).

(B) The argument for a “presence” requirement also has strong historical support. Most of the common-law authorities extensively canvassed in the Atwater opinion, 532 U.S. at 326-43, condition an officer’s arrest power in misdemeanor cases upon the circumstance that the misdemeanor was “committed in the presence of the arresting officer” (Jacob W. Landynski, Search and Seizure and the Supreme Court – A Study in Constitutional Interpretation 45 (Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science, Ser. 84, No. 1, 1966), quoted in Atwater, 532 U.S. at 336; and see the earlier American commentaries cited in id. at 343) or “committed in his view” (see the English treatises quoted in Atwater, 532 U.S. at 330-31), or that the offender was found or “taken in the very act” (Money v. Leach, 3 Burr. 1742, 1766, 97 Eng. Rep. 1075, 1088 (K.B.1765), quoted in Atwater, 532 U.S. at 332 n.6).

(C) Pre-Atwater decisions of the federal courts of appeals in several Circuits had rejected the “presence” requirement as a Fourth Amendment precondition for valid arrest upon probable cause, and it is unclear to what extent Atwater will spark a reconsideration of those precedents. See, e.g., United States v. Laville, 480 F.3d 187, 191-94 (3d Cir. 2007); United States v. Dawson, 305 Fed. Appx. 149, 160 n.9 (4th Cir. 2008); United States v. McNeill, 484 F.3d 301, 311 (4th Cir. 2007); Rockwell v. Brown, 664 F.3d 985, 996 (5th Cir. 2011); Alford v. Haner, 446 F.3d 935, 937 n.2 (9th Cir. 2006); Hall v. Hughes, 232 Fed.Appx. 683, 684-85 (9th Cir. 2007). Pending Supreme Court resolution of the issue, counsel should press the claim, when relevant, that the Fourth Amendment does prohibit misdemeanor arrests for offenses of which the arresting officer has no personal, observational knowledge, so that s/he is relying solely on third parties for the information necessary to establish probable cause.

§ 23.07(d) The Probable Cause Requirement for Arrest

As indicated in the preceding two sections, a showing of “probable cause” is the minimum precondition for a valid arrest, with or without a warrant.

Much of the law of the Fourth Amendment is concerned with the concept of “probable cause.” Not only arrest warrants but also search warrants are issued upon a magistrate’s or a judge’s finding of probable cause; not only warrantless arrests but also many types of warrantless searches depend upon the officer’s possession of probable cause. Whether the issue is the validity of an arrest or a search, the constitutional phrase probable cause means “a reasonable ground for belief,” Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 175 (1949): “Probable cause exists where ‘the facts and circumstances within . . . [the officers’] knowledge and of which they had reasonably trustworthy information [are] sufficient in themselves to warrant a man of reasonable caution in the [requisite] belief . . . ,’” id. at 175-76; accord, Florida v. Harris, 568 U.S. 237, 243-44 (2013) (“A police officer has probable cause to conduct a search when ‘the facts available to [him] would “warrant a [person] of reasonable caution in the belief”’ that contraband or evidence of a crime is present. . . . The test for probable cause is not reducible to ‘precise definition or quantification.’ . . . All we have required is the kind of ‘fair probability’ on which ‘reasonable and prudent [people.] not legal technicians, act.’”); Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 371 (2009) (“a ‘fair probability’ . . . or a ‘substantial chance’”); District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 586 (2018); Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. at 370-71; Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 479 (1963). Cf. Carpenter v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2206, 2221 (2018) (holding that a showing of “reasonable grounds” for believing that . . .} records were ‘relevant and material to an ongoing investigation . . .’ . . . [fell] well short of the probable cause required for a warrant” because “[t]he Court usually requires ‘some quantum of individualized suspicion’ before a search or seizure may take place”). “The ‘totality of the circumstances’” known to the officer must be considered (District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. at 588). Specifically, probable cause to arrest is established when there are reasonable grounds to believe that the particular person sought to be arrested has committed a crime; probable cause for a search is established when there are reasonable grounds to believe that objects connected to criminal activity or otherwise subject to seizure are presently located in the particular place to be searched. Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547, 556-57 n.6 (1978); Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204, 213 (1981); Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 554 U.S. at 370; State v. Thompson, 419 S.C. 250, 797 S.E.2d 716 (2017). There are elaborate definitions of the concept of probable cause, e.g., Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 111-12 (1979); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 208 n.9 (1979), and innumerable constructions of it in individual factual situations.

The topic of probable cause for the issuance of warrants will be taken up in discussing search warrants. See § 23.17 infra. With respect to warrantless arrests, the probable cause requirement must be “strictly enforced” (Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. 98, 102 (1959)) because “the informed and deliberate determinations of magistrates empowered to issue warrants as to what searches and seizures are permissible under the Constitution are to be preferred over the hurried action of officers and others . . . while acting under the excitement that attends the capture of persons accused of crime” (United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U.S. 452, 464 (1932)).

“The point of the Fourth Amendment, which often is not grasped by zealous officers, is not that it denies law enforcement the support of the usual inferences which reasonable men draw from evidence. Its protection consists in requiring that those inferences be drawn by a neutral and detached magistrate instead of being judged by the officer engaged in the often competitive enterprise of ferreting out crime. Any assumption that evidence sufficient to support a magistrate's disinterested determination to issue a search warrant will justify the officers in making a search without a warrant would reduce the Amendment to a nullity and leave the people's homes secure only in the discretion of police officers. . . . When the right of privacy must reasonably yield to the right of search is, as a rule, to be decided by a judicial officer, not by a policeman or Government enforcement agent.” (Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 13-14 (1948).)

Accord, United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411, 432 n.6 (1976) (Powell, J., concurring) (emphasizing the Court’s “longstanding position that . . . [such a warrantless arrest] should receive careful judicial scrutiny”).

In determining whether the police had probable cause to arrest, the central question is what facts the police knew before the arrest. “[A]n arrest is not justified by what the subsequent search discloses.” Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. at 104. See also Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. at 371 (“To determine whether an officer had probable cause to arrest an individual, we examine the events leading up to the arrest, and then decide ‘whether these historical facts, viewed from the standpoint of an objectively reasonable police officer, amount to’ probable cause’); Florida v. Harris, 568 U.S. 237, 249 (2013) (‘we do not evaluate probable cause in hindsight, based on what a search does or does not turn up’); and see § 23.03 supra. ‘If probable cause is established at any early stage of the investigation, it may be dissipated if the investigating officer later learns additional information that decreases the likelihood that the defendant has engaged, or is engaging, in criminal activity. A person may not be arrested, or must be released from arrest, if previously established probable cause has dissipated.’ As a corollary . . . of the rule that the police may rely on the totality of facts available to them in establishing probable cause, they also may not disregard facts tending to dissipate probable cause.’” United States v. Ortiz-Hernandez, 427 F.3d 567, 574 (9th Cir. 2005). See also Sanders v. Jones, 2018 WL 1616961, at *2 (6th Cir. April 4, 2018) (holding, in the context of a Fourth Amendment malicious prosecution action, that the probable cause provided by a confidential informant’s identification of Sanders as the individual who sold him drugs would be dissipated if the police officer who received the informant’s report subsequently viewed a videotape of the controlled drug buy and ‘knew or strongly suspected from viewing the video that the person who sold the confidential informant the drugs was not Sanders’). “[I]n determining whether there is probable cause, officers are charged with knowledge of any ‘readily available exculpatory evidence’ that they unreasonably fail to ascertain. . . . ‘[T]he probable cause standard of the Fourth Amendment requires officers to reasonably interview witnesses readily available at the scene, investigate basic evidence, or otherwise inquire if a crime has been committed at all before invoking the power of warrantless arrest and detention.’” Mareska v. Bernalillo County, 804 F.3d 1301, 1310 (10th Cir. 2015). See, e.g., Humbert v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore City, 866 F.3d 546 (4th Cir. 2017) (“Trial testimony indicates that Humbert closely matched a generic physical description [which a rape victim gave of her assailant] – a 5’7”, African-American male in his late 30s to early 40s who was fairly well-spoken – and a generic looking composite sketch of an African-American male. Humbert was also stopped eight days after the assault in the Charles Village neighborhood, [a location that was within blocks of the victim’s home where the rape occurred but was also] near . . . [Humbert’s] homeless shelter and a couple of miles away from where his family members resided. These facts cannot reasonably support the probable cause needed for his arrest.” Id. at 559. “[T]he Officers can find no solace in the victim’s so-called tentative identification, as the evidence demonstrates that the Officers improperly influenced the investigation from its inception. Jones asked the victim multiple times whether her assailant was homeless, and it is undisputed that Humbert was homeless at the time he was stopped. Jones also showed the victim Humbert’s picture and identified him as her attacker a day after the assault occurred, either during or after she completed the composite sketch and only a few days before she saw his photo in the photobook. Again, drawing all reasonable inferences in Humbert’s favor, the evidence indicates that Jones inappropriately affected the victim’s ability to complete the composite sketch and identify her attacker. Such suggestive acts unquestionably nullified the Officers’ ability to rely on the victim's initial reaction to Humbert’s photo.” Id. at 560.). For discussion of some of the factors commonly considered by the courts in assessing whether there was probable cause, see § 23.11 infra. 594
When an arrest is made, with or without a warrant, upon probable cause to believe that a particular individual has committed an offense but the police arrest the wrong individual, their arrest is nonetheless legal if (i) they honestly believe that the person arrested is the individual sought and (ii) they have probable cause for this belief. Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797 (1971). Cf. Garcia v. City of Riverside, 817 F.3d 635, 641 (9th Cir. 2015) (“Whether . . . [the police] had to investigate in the face of . . . [an arrested individual’s] protests and complaints that he wasn’t the person described in the outstanding warrant is an important question. No person deserves to be incarcerated without good reason, and incarceration on a warrant without a reasonable investigation of identity, when the circumstances demand it, is subject to review under the Due Process Clause. The issue is whether LASD’s treatment of Plaintiff’s contention that he was not the warrant subject was so superficial, under the circumstances, that it ignored a duty to investigate and offended due process. ¶ . . . [T]he warrant . . . matched only his first and last name and date of birth. Garcia is nine inches taller and forty pounds heavier than the warrant subject. Even a cursory comparison of Garcia to the warrant subject should have led officers to question whether the person described in the warrant was Garcia. Information that raised questions about Garcia’s identity should have prompted the LASD to investigate more deliberately.”).

Fourth Amendment restrictions on the amount of physical force that can be used to effect an arrest or other seizure are the subject of a body of case law emanating from Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), and Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989). See, e.g., Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1152 (2018); County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539, 1546-47 (2017); White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551-52 (2017) (per curiam), explicated on remand in Pauly v. White, 874 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2017); Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 1539, 1546-47 (2014); Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S. Ct. 1861 (2014); Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 308-10 (2015) (per curiam); Tenorio v. Pitzer, 802 F.3d 1160, 1164 (10th Cir. 2015) (“The Fourth Amendment permits an officer to use deadly force only if there is ‘probable cause to believe that there is a threat of serious physical harm to [the officer] or to others’”); Callahan v. Wilson, 863 F.3d 144, 149 (2d Cir. 2017) (“‘the use of force highly likely to have deadly effects is unreasonable unless the officer had probable cause to believe that the suspect posed a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or to others’”); Zion v. County of Orange, 874 F.3d 1072, 1075 (9th Cir. 2017) (“When police confront a suspect who poses an immediate threat, they may use deadly force against him. But they must stop using deadly force when the suspect no longer poses a threat.”); Longoria v. Pinal County, 873 F.3d 699, 705 (9th Cir. 2017) (“[t]he ‘most important’ factor is whether . . . [the suspect] posed an immediate threat”); Woodcock v. City of Bowling Green, 679 Fed. Appx. 419 (6th Cir. 2017) (fatal shooting held excessive where the officer knew that the deceased “had called the police twice that night, that he had told the police over the phone that he had a gun, and that he had threatened to assault or kill his brother. During the twelve-minute encounter, . . . [the officer] witnessed . . . [the deceased] walk slowly down the railroad tracks perpendicular to the police officers, keep his left hand stuffed wrist-deep into the back of his pants, and ignore officers’ commands. . . . [The officer] was aware that . . . [the deceased] was stumbling, had slurred speech, had possibly urinated on himself, and that there was a ‘good possibility’ he was intoxicated. . . . [The officer] had also heard . . . [the deceased] repeatedly yell ‘shoot me’ in response to warnings the officers gave him and believed . . . [the deceased] was suicidal.” (Id. at 424.) However, “[w]hen . . . [the officer] fired the shot, he had no reason to believe that . . . [the deceased] posed an imminent threat of serious harm to anyone” (id. at 425).); Lewis v. Charter Township of Flint, 660 Fed. Appx. 339, 343 (6th Cir. 2016) (“It has long been established that ‘[t]he use of deadly force to prevent the escape of all felony suspects, whatever the circumstances, is constitutionally unreasonable.’ . . . Where a person attempts to flee in a vehicle, ‘police officers are ‘justified in using deadly force against a driver who objectively appears ready to drive into an officer or bystander with his car,’ but ‘may not use deadly force once the car moves away, leaving the officer and bystanders in a position of safety.’’’); Newmaker v. City of Fortuna, 842 F.3d 1108, 1116 (9th Cir. 2016) (“Excessive force claims are analyzed under a Fourth Amendment reasonableness inquiry. . . . In conducting this analysis, a court must balance the severity of the intrusion on the individual’s Fourth Amendment rights against the government’s need to use force.”); Burwell v. Peyton, 131 F. Supp. 3d 268, 292 (D. Vt. 2015), aff’d, 670 Fed. Appx. 734 (2d Cir. 2016) (“In order to establish that the use of force to effect an arrest was unreasonable and therefore a violation of the Fourth Amendment, . . . [claimants] must establish that the government interests at stake were outweighed by the nature and quality of the intrusion on [plaintiffs’] Fourth Amendment interests’’’); accord, E.W. v. Dolgos, 884 F.3d 172, 176, 179-85 (4th Cir. 2018) (dictum) (“a school resource officer’s decision to handcuff a calm, compliant elementary school student for fighting with another student three days prior” constituted excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment (id. at 176, 179-85); State v. White, 142 Ohio St. 3d 277, 280-85, 29 N.E.3d 939, 944-47 (2015). In some circumstances, violations of these restrictions may require the exclusion of evidence produced by the excessive force. See Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952); cf. § 23.14 infra, discussing Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985), and cognate cases.

§ 23.08 SEARCHES INCIDENT TO ARREST

§ 23.08(a) The “Search Incident to Arrest” Doctrine

Warrantless searches of an arrested person’s clothing and body surfaces are routinely permitted incident to a valid arrest. United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973); Gustafson v. Florida, 414 U.S. 260 (1973); Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. 2160, 2174-76, 2182-83 (2016); United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 14 (1977) (dictum). “[A] lawful custodial arrest creates a situation which justifies the contemporaneous search without a warrant of the person arrested and of the immediately surrounding area.” New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 457 (1981). The rationale for this exception to the warrant requirement is that “[w]hen a custodial arrest is made, there is always some danger that the person arrested may seek to use a weapon, or that evidence may be concealed or destroyed. To safeguard himself and others, and to prevent the loss of evidence, it has been held reasonable for the arresting officer to conduct a prompt, warrantless ‘search of the arrestee’s person and the area “within his immediate control” construing that phrase to mean the area from within which he might gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence.’” United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. at 14. This rationale has crucial implications for the scope of the search permitted incident to arrest (as explained in the following paragraphs) but does not require any case-by-case factual showing of a likelihood that any particular arrestee possesses a weapon or destructible evidence. Rather, what has evolved – in the interest of a bright-line rule – is the treatment of a valid arrest as generically posing the requisite likelihoods and categorically authorizing a search calculated to address them. “The constitutionality of a search incident to an arrest does not depend on whether there is any indication that the person arrested [actually] possesses weapons or evidence. The fact of a lawful arrest, standing alone, authorizes a search.” Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31, 35 (1979). See also Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. at 2183 (under “the search-incident-to-arrest exception, . . . [the arresting officer’s] authority [to search the arrestee’s person] is categorical. It does not depend on an evaluation of the threat to officer safety or the threat of evidence loss in a particular case.”); Illinois v. LaFayette, 462 U.S. 640, 644-45 (1983) (dictum); Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1048, 1049 & n.14 (1983) (dictum). But see State v. Conn, 278 Kan. 387, 391-94, 99 P.3d 1108, 1112-13 (2003) (“In Kansas, the permissible circumstances, purposes, and scope of a search incident to arrest are controlled by statute.” Because the statute authorizing search incident to arrest states the permissible “purpose” of such a search as being ““(a) Protecting the officer from attack’”‘; ““(b) Preventing the person from escaping’”‘; or ““(c) Discovering the fruits, instrumentalities, or evidence of the crime’”’ . . . this court rejected the view that case law applying the Fourth Amendment . . . meant that a search of an automobile could automatically be conducted when an occupant was arrested.” Because “the trooper in this case did not indicate any concern for safety,” “the search cannot be justified as a search incident to arrest.”). A search incident to arrest may be made either at the site of the arrest, United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. at 224-26, 236, or at the stationhouse to which the arrested person is taken, United States v. Edwards, 415 U.S. 800 (1974).

The rule’s rationales do circumscribe it in two principal ways. First, they preclude the extension of the authority for warrantless search to generic situations that are not conceived to be akin to arrests from the standpoint of inciting probable armed resistance or evidence destruction. See, e.g., Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113, 116-19 (1998) (the rationales of the “search incident to arrest” doctrine do not justify a full search of a vehicle when the police stop a motorist for speeding and issue a citation rather than arresting him); Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164, 176-77 (2008) (reaffirming Knowles (dictum)); Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 67 (1968) (“a search incident to a lawful arrest may not precede the arrest”). Second, searches that are innately too intrusive or too expansive to be justified by concerns about armed resistance or evidence destruction cannot be sustained under the search-incident-to-arrest exception to the warrant requirement. See, e.g., Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473, 2493 (2014), discussed further in § 23.08(b) infra (“when a cell phone is seized incident to arrest,” a search “warrant is generally required before . . . a search” may be made of digital information on the phone); Commonwealth v. Morales, 462 Mass. 334, 335, 344, 968 N.E.2d 403, 405, 411-12 (2012) (a search incident to arrest that resulted in exposure of the defendant’s buttocks to public view on a public street constituted a “strip search” that violated both the federal and state constitutions). Cf. Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. at 2177-78, 2184-85 (holding that a motorist who has been arrested for drunk driving can be compelled to submit to a warrantless breath test to determine his or her intoxication level but cannot be compelled to submit to a blood draw because “[b]lood tests are significantly more intrusive, and their reasonableness must be judged in light of the availability of the less invasive alternative of a breath test” (id. at 2184)).

597

“[T]he search-incident-to-arrest rule actually comprises ‘two distinct propositions’: ‘The first is that a search may be made of the person of the arrestee by virtue of the lawful arrest. The second is that a search may be made of the area within the control of the arrestee.’” Id. at 2175-76. The limits of the latter proposition have been established by a series of Supreme Court decisions whose upshot is that searches incident to arrest are restricted to “the arrestee’s person and the area ‘within his immediate control’ – construing that phrase to mean the area from within which he might gain possession of a weapon [to attack the arresting officer] or destructible evidence.” Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 763 (1969). See also United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 14 (1977); Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319, 326 (1979). “That limitation, which . . . define[s] the boundaries of the exception, ensures that the scope of a search incident to arrest is commensurate with its purposes of protecting arresting officers and safeguarding any evidence of the offense of arrest that an arrestee might conceal or destroy. . . . If there is no possibility that an arrestee could reach into the area that law enforcement officers seek to search, both justifications for the search-incident-to-arrest exception are absent and the rule does not apply.” Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332, 339 (2009). Police officers could not, for example, predicate their entry and search of a house on the arrest of a respondent outside the house. See, e.g., Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30 (1970); Shipley v. California, 395 U.S. 818 (1969). See also Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. at 343-44 (narrowing previous rulings in New York v. Belton and Thornton v. United States, 541 U.S. 615, 617 (2004), to “hold that the Chimel rationale authorizes police to search a vehicle incident to a recent occupant’s arrest only when the arrestee is unsecured and within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search,” but announcing an additional rule, which “does not follow from Chimel,” to permit a search incident to arrest in certain “circumstances unique to the vehicle context,” see § 23.26 infra).

Within the “wingspan” area defined by Chimel, a warrantless search incident to arrest is valid if – but only if – the arrest itself is valid under the doctrines summarized in § 23.07 supra. See, e.g., Beck v. Ohio, 379 U.S. 89 (1964).

§ 23.08(b) Searches of Containers in the Possession of Arrested Persons

An issue that frequently arises in cases of searches incident to arrest or Terry frisks is whether these warrantless search powers extend to a closed container that the respondent is carrying, such as a knapsack or gym bag.

In United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1 (1977), the Court implied that large locked receptacles, such as luggage, may be taken from an arrested person as a matter of routine incident to arrest. But the Court also stated explicitly (although in dictum) that containers seized in this manner may not thereafter be opened without a warrant based upon probable cause. Id. at 14-16 & n.10. See also Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128, 142 n.11 (1990) (dictum); United States v.
In New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981), which the Court later circumscribed in Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332 (2009), the Court appeared to take a contrary position. Belton upheld an arresting officer’s opening of a zippered pocket in a leather jacket found on the seat of a car following arrest of the car’s occupants. In dictum the Court in Belton stated a very broad rule that the scope of search incident to arrest of a motorist extends to “the contents of any containers found within the passenger compartment,” Belton, 453 U.S. at 460, including “luggage, boxes, [and] bags,” id. at 460-61 n.4, “whether [the container] . . . is open or closed,” id. at 461.

The subsequent opinion in United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982), further compounds the confusion. First, the Court in Ross gratuitously comments that “[a] container carried at the time of arrest often may be searched without a warrant and even without any specific suspicion concerning its contents.” Id. at 823 (emphasis added). Second, the Court asserts (in the different context of a Carroll vehicle search, see § 23.24 infra), that “a traveler who carries a toothbrush and a few articles of clothing in a paper bag or knotted scarf [may] claim an equal right to conceal his possessions from official inspection as the sophisticated executive with the locked attaché case,” id. at 822. The latter observation appears to rule out any distinction between “paper bags, locked trunks, lunch buckets, and orange crates,” id., so far as the Fourth Amendment privacy interests of the respective possessors of these containers is concerned. Within the framework of the search-incident-to-arrest doctrine, the containers might still be distinguished, allowing search of the paper bag and not the trunk, on the ground that the arrestee’s ability to seize weapons or destructible evidence from the former is greater. That distinction is, however, difficult to reconcile with the holding of United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. at 235, that “[t]he authority to search the person incident to a lawful custodial arrest, while based upon the need to disarm and to discover evidence, does not depend on what a court may later decide was the probability in a particular arrest situation that weapons or evidence would in fact be found upon the person of the suspect.” Belton not merely quotes this Robinson language but draws from it the conclusion that the power of search incident to arrest encompasses “containers [which are] . . . such that they could hold neither a weapon nor evidence of the criminal conduct for which the suspect was arrested.” 453 U.S. at 461. Differences in the accessibility of various containers to the arrestee can hardly be thought decisive of the application of a doctrine that permits search of containers that could not hold a weapon or evidence in the first place. See Thornton v. United States, 541 U.S. 615, 623 (2004) (Belton rule does not “depend[ ] on differing estimates of what items were or were not within reach of an arrestee at any particular moment”). So Belton rests the search-incident-to-arrest power not upon the risk that the arrestee may grab the contents of the container but upon the concept that a “lawful custodial arrest justifies the infringement of any privacy interest the arrestee may have” in containers within his or her reach. Id. But if this is so, the question arises why the search-incident-to-arrest power is restricted to the area within the arrestee’s reach, as Belton concedes that it is (id. at 457-58, 460), and as Gant declares unequivocally that it is (see Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. at 335 (“a vehicle search incident to a recent occupant’s arrest” is not constitutionally “authorize[d]” “after the arrestee has been secured and cannot access the interior of the vehicle”). Chadwick squarely holds that the privacy interests inhering in “property in the possession of a person arrested in public” (433 U.S. at 14) but outside of his or her reach are not dissipated by the fact of a lawful custodial arrest. 433 U.S. at 13-16. And it adds that “[u]nlike searches of the person, United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973) . . . , searches of possessions within an arrestee’s immediate control cannot be justified by any reduced expectations of privacy caused by the arrest.” 433 U.S. at 16 n.10.

This area of Fourth Amendment law was muddied still further when the Court in California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565 (1991), revised the rules governing a Carroll vehicle search (see § 23.24 infra) to eliminate the distinction that Ross, in explaining the import of Chadwick and Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753 (1979), drew between what the police may do when they have probable cause to believe that a seizable object is concealed in a vehicle and what they may do when they have probable cause merely to believe that a seizable object may be contained within some particular receptacle carried in the vehicle. The Acevedo decision concerned solely a Carroll vehicle search and accordingly did not address the nature and scope of the “search incident to arrest” doctrine.

In Arizona v. Gant in 2009, the Court disavowed the lower courts’ “broad reading of Belton” as authorizing “a vehicle search . . . incident to every arrest of a recent occupant notwithstanding that in most cases the vehicle’s passenger compartment will not be within the arrestee’s reach at the time of the search.” Gant, 556 U.S. at 343. Explaining this curtailment of the lower courts’ expansive applications of Belton, the Gant Court stated:

“To read Belton as authorizing a vehicle search incident to every recent occupant’s arrest would . . . untether the rule from the justifications underlying the Chimel exception – a result clearly incompatible with our statement in Belton that it “in no way alters the fundamental principles established in the Chimel case regarding the basic scope of searches incident to lawful custodial arrests.” 453 U.S., at 460, n. 3. Accordingly, we reject this reading of Belton and hold that the Chimel rationale authorizes police to search a vehicle incident to a recent occupant’s arrest only when the arrestee is unsecured and within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search.” (Id.)

Although the five-Justice majority in Gant characterized its decision as merely a “narrow[ing]” of Belton (Gant, 556 U.S. at 348 n.9), the four dissenting Justices viewed the Gant majority opinion as “effectively overrul[ing]” both Belton and Thornton v. United States (id. at 355 (Justice Alito, dissenting, joined in pertinent part by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Kennedy and Breyer)). Even by the shoddy standards for clarity and durability that characterize the U.S.
Supreme Court’s Fourth Amendment jurisprudence generally (see Justice Frankfurter’s classic statement that “[t]he course of true law pertaining to searches and seizures . . . has not – to put it opinion)), the Belton-Gant caselaw is a disaster area. Its unprincipled and unstable quality gives counsel an especially strong argument for urging state high courts to reject it and adopt more protective state constitutional rules to govern this sector, as suggested in § 7.09 supra. See, e.g., State v. Gaskins, 866 N.W.2d 1, 12-13 (Iowa 2015) (“declining to adopt Gant’s broad evidence-gathering purpose as a rationale for warrantless searches of automobiles and their contents incident to arrest under article I, section 8 of the Iowa Constitution” and invalidating a warrantless search of a small portable locked safe found in an automobile following the driver’s arrest for marijuana possession and removal to a squad car; “We now agree with the approach taken by the courts that have rejected the Belton rule that authorized warrantless searches of containers without regard to the Chimel considerations of officer safety and protecting evidence. ‘When lines need to be drawn in creating rules, they should be drawn thoughtfully along the logical contours of the rationales giving rise to the rules, and not as artificial lines drawn elsewhere that are unrelated to those rationales’ . . . . ¶ . . . [W]e decline to adopt Gant’s alternative evidence-gathering rationale for warrantless searches incident to arrest under the Iowa Constitution because it would permit the SITA exception to swallow completely the fundamental textual rule in article I, section 8 that searches and seizures should be supported by a warrant. In other words, ‘use of a [SITA] rationale to sanction a warrantless search that has nothing to do with its underlying justification – preventing the arrestee from gaining access to weapons or evidence – is an anomaly.’”).

Even though Gant did not address (and had no reason to address) the preexisting rules governing searches of containers incident to the arrest of an individual outside the automobile context, Gant throws into question some of the lower court caselaw on this subject because that caselaw was expressly predicated on Belton. See, e.g., State v. Roach, 234 Neb. 620, 627-30, 452 N.W.2d 262, 267-69 (1990) (concluding that Belton applies outside the automobile context and relying on the court’s own and other courts’ broad readings of Belton to uphold a search of a closed container in the possession of an individual arrested inside a house). Given Gant’s repudiation of a broad reading of Belton, counsel can argue that the best source of Supreme Court guidance on the proper handling of container searches incident to arrest is Chadwick. In States in which the courts relied on Belton to authorize container searches even when the container was not physically accessible to the arrestee at and after the time s/he was seized by the arresting officers, counsel can challenge that rule by invoking Gant’s explanation that, in the absence of “circumstances unique to the automobile context” (Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. at 335), the “search-incident-to-arrest . . . rule does not apply” when “there is no possibility that an arrestee could reach into the area that law enforcement officers seek to search” (id. at 339). See State v. Carrawell, 481 S.W.3d 833, 837, 845 (Mo. 2016) (dictum) (“It matters not whether this bag was more akin to luggage or more akin to a purse. Neither is part of the person. It matters only whether the bag was within Carrawell’s immediate control. Because it was not, there was not a valid search incident to arrest.”); see also, e.g., State v. Lamay, 140 Idaho 835, 839-40, 103 P.3d 448, 452-53 (2004) (pre-Gant decision that rejected Belton as inapplicable outside the automobile context and held that the customary rules on searches incident to arrest inside a dwelling do not permit the search of an arrestee’s knapsack if the arrestee is handcuffed and the knapsack is “nearly fifteen feet away . . . and located in a different room”); People v. Gokey, 60 N.Y.2d 309, 311, 313-14, 457 N.E.2d 723, 724, 725, 469 N.Y.S.2d 618, 619, 620 (1983) (state high court, which had previously rejected Belton in favor of a state constitutional rule that resembles the rule the Supreme Court eventually adopted in Gant, applies its state constitutional rule to hold that a warrantless search of an arrestee’s duffel bag was unlawful, even though the bag was “within the immediate control or ‘grabbable area’” of the arrestee “at the time of his arrest” because the “defendant’s hands were handcuffed behind his back and he was surrounded by five police officers and their dog” and thus the circumstances did not “support a reasonable belief that the suspect may gain possession of a weapon or be able to destroy evidence located in the bag”).

In Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473 (2014), the Court addressed the question “whether the police may, without a warrant, search digital information on a cell phone seized from an individual who has been arrested.” Id. at 2480. Distinguishing between “physical objects” and “digital content on cell phones,” the Court concluded that the two governmental interests underlying “Robinson’s categorical rule” for searches of “physical objects” – the risks of “harm to officers and destruction of evidence” – do not have “much force with respect to digital content on cell phones.” Id. at 2484-85. Moreover, while “Robinson regarded any privacy interests retained by an individual after arrest as significantly diminished by the fact of the arrest itself,” “[c]ell phones . . . place vast quantities of personal information literally in the hands of individuals,” and “[a] search of the information on a cell phone bears little resemblance to the type of brief physical search considered in Robinson.” Id. at 2485. See also id. at 2488-89 (“Modern cell phones, as a category, implicate privacy concerns far beyond those implicated by the search of a cigarette pack, a wallet, or a purse.”); id. at 2489 (“Cell phones differ in both a quantitative and a qualitative sense from other objects that might be kept on an arrestee’s person. The term ‘cell phone’ is itself misleading shorthand; many of these devices are in fact minicomputers that also happen to have the capacity to be used as a telephone.”); id. at 2494-95 (“Modern cell phones[,] . . . [w]ith all they contain and all they may reveal, . . . hold for many Americans ‘the privacies of life’” (quoting Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 630 (1886))). Accordingly, the Court “decline[d] to extend Robinson to searches of data on cell phones, and h[elpl instead that officers must generally secure a warrant before conducting such a search.” Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. at 2485. See also id. at 2494 (“even though the search incident to arrest exception does not apply to cell phones, other case-specific exceptions may still justify a warrantless search of a particular phone”); United States v. Camou, 773 F.3d 932, 939, 940-41, 943 (9th Cir. 2014) (a Border Patrol agent’s search of an arrestee’s cell phone, which was retrieved from the arrestee’s vehicle, “was not roughly contemporaneous with Camou’s arrest and, therefore, was not incident to arrest,” because “one hour and twenty minutes passed between Camou’s arrest and Agent Walla’s search of the cell phone” and “a string of intervening acts occurred between Camou’s arrest and the search of his cell phone” that “signaled the arrest was over” by the time of the cell phone search; the search also was not justifiable under the exigent circumstances exception because the search “occurred one hour and twenty minutes after Camou’s arrest,” and, furthermore, “even if we were to assume that the exigencies of the situation permitted a search of Camou’s cell phone to prevent the loss of cell data, the search’s scope was impermissibly overbroad” in that it “went beyond contacts and call logs to include a search of hundreds of photographs and videos stored on the phone’s internal memory”; the search also was not justifiable under the automobile exception because Riley’s reasoning requires that cell phones be classified as “non-containers for purposes of the vehicle exception to the warrant requirement”); United States v. Lopez-Cruz, 730 F.3d 803, 805-06, 808 (9th Cir. 2013) (discussed in § 23.15(d) concluding paragraph infra); State v. K.C., 207 So.3d 951 (Fla. App. 2016) (discussed in § 23.13 subdivision (d) infra); Commonwealth v. Fulton, 179 A.3d 475, 486, 488-89 (Pa. 2018) (rejecting the prosecution’s argument that “no search of the phone occurred because police navigated the menus of the [defendant’s] phone only to obtain the phone’s assigned number”; “The act of powering on Fulton’s flip phone constituted a search, i.e., an intrusion upon a constitutionally protected area (Fulton’s cell phone) without Fulton’s explicit or implicit permission. . . . Turning on the phone exposed to view portions of the phone that were previously concealed and not otherwise authorized by a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement. . . . Powering on the phone is akin to opening the door to a home. It permitted police to obtain and review a host of information on the cell phone, including viewing its wallpaper, reviewing incoming text messages and calls, and accessing all of the data contained in the phone. . . . ¶ Detective Harkins engaged in a second warrantless search when he obtained the phone’s assigned number. After powering on the phone, Detective Harkins navigated through the menus of the flip phone to obtain its number. . . . The act of navigating the menus of a cell phone to obtain the phone’s number is unquestionably a search that required a warrant. . . . ¶ Detective Harkins conducted a third warrantless search of the phone when he monitored incoming calls and text messages. . . . ¶ Contrary to the finding of the trial court and the argument advanced by the Commonwealth before this Court, there is little difference between monitoring the internal and external viewing screens on a cell phone and searching the phone’s call logs. Both result in accessing ‘more than just phone numbers,’ but also ‘any identifying information that an individual might add’ to his or her contacts, including the caller’s photograph, the name assigned to the caller or sender of the text message. . . . Further, and unlike a call log, monitoring a phone’s incoming text messages allows the viewer to see the content of a text message, which indisputably constitutes private data. This is all information that, pursuant to Riley/Wurie, cannot be accessed by police without a warrant. ¶ The rule created by Riley/Wurie is exceedingly simple: if a member of law enforcement wishes to obtain information from a cell phone, get a warrant.”); Jones v. United States, 168 A.3d 703, 713 (D.C. 2017) (police “use of a cell-site simulator to locate . . . [the defendant’s] phone invaded a reasonable expectation of privacy and was thus a search” that violated the Fourth Amendment in the absence of a search warrant); Commonwealth v. Mauricio, 477 Mass. 588, 593, 594, 80 N.E.3d 318, 323, 324 (2017) (construing the state constitution to “hold, for the same reasons articulated by the Supreme Court in Riley [v. California, supra] . . . , that digital cameras may be seized incident to arrest, but that the search of data contained in digital cameras falls outside the scope of the search incident to arrest exception to the warrant requirement”; “Although digital cameras do not allow storage of information as diverse and far ranging as a cell phone, they nevertheless possess the capacity to store enormous quantities of photograph and often video recordings, dating over periods of months and even years, which can reveal intimate details of an individual’s life.”)). And cf. United States v. Saulsberry, 878 F.3d 946 (10th Cir. 2017) (police who detained a driver on reasonable suspicion that he was smoking marijuana in his parked car could search a bag on the floor of the driver’s seat for marijuana, but the officer’s seizure and examination of a stack of credit cards found in the bag exceeded the justification for the search and violated the Fourth Amendment).
§ 23.08(c) “Inventory” Search Incident to Incarceration

