If an arrested person is to be incarcerated, the police may remove, examine, and inventory everything in his or her possession at the lockup. Illinois v. LaFayette, 462 U.S. 640, 646-48 (1983). This “inventory search” power permits the opening, without a warrant, of any container carried by the person, whether or not the police have any reason to suspect its contents and whether or not they could practicably secure the container during the period of the person’s incarceration without opening it up. Id. Presumably the rule of Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473 (2014) – which bars the application of the “search incident to arrest” doctrine to the digital content of a cell phone because “[c]ell phones differ in both a quantitative and a qualitative sense from other objects that might be kept on an arrestee’s person,” id. at 2489; see also § 23.08(b) supra, discussing Riley – applies as well in the context of “inventory” searches incident to incarceration and requires that such a search be authorized either by a search warrant or by some “case-specific exception” that “justif[ies] a warrantless search of a particular phone” id. at 2494). See Commonwealth v. Mauricio, 477 Mass. 588, 595, 80 N.E.3d 318, 325 (2017) (police conducting a stationhouse inventory search of an arrestee’s backpack found a digital camera; “suspecting that the camera was stolen, [they] took steps to investigate its ownership by activating the camera and viewing the stored images”; this search “exceeded the bounds of the inventory search exception to the warrant requirement because it was investigatory in nature” and it was therefore impermissible without a warrant under the Massachusetts constitution); see also State v. Granville, 423 S.W.3d 399, 402 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014) (pre-Riley decision holding that a search warrant was needed for the police to examine the contents of a cell phone that was taken from the defendant “during the booking procedure and placed in the jail property room”: the arrestee, a “high-school student[,] did not lose his legitimate expectation of privacy in his cell phone simply because it was being stored in the jail property room”; the officer “could have seized appellant’s phone and held it while he sought a search warrant, but, even with probable cause, he could not ‘activate and search the contents of an inventoried cellular phone’ without one”). And cf. United States v. Saulsberry, 878 F.3d 946 (10th Cir. 2017) (police who detained a driver on reasonable suspicion that he was smoking marijuana in his parked car could search a bag on the floor of the driver’s seat for marijuana, but the officer’s seizure and examination of a stack of credit cards found in the bag exceeded the justification for the search and violated the Fourth Amendment). The inventory-search exception to the warrant requirement is limited to effects that are in the physical possession of an arrestee at the time of the arrest; it does not authorize the arresting officers to seize the arrestee’s belongings from even a nearby location which they have no other constitutional justification to access. State v. Banks-Harvey, 152 Ohio St. 3d 368, 374, 96 N.E.3d 262, 269-70 (2018) (police stopped a car for speeding and asked the driver to step out of the vehicle; they placed her in the back seat of their patrol cruiser while conducting a warrants check, then arrested her when they learned that she had outstanding arrest warrants for drug offenses; she had left her purse in the vehicle, which was owned by a friend who was present as a passenger; police returned to the vehicle, seized the purse, and searched it pursuant to a policy of conducting “inventory searches” of all arrestees; “Certainly we take no issue with the reasonableness of an administrative policy requiring the search and inventory of personal items that necessarily come into police custody as a result of an arrest. Indeed, . . . [an Ohio statute] requires law-enforcement agencies to keep safe any lawfully seized property that comes into their custody. However, this is not a case in which personal items came into the custody of the police as an incident of lawful police conduct. In this case, the trooper retrieved a personal item belonging to an arrestee from a place that is protected under the Fourth Amendment (the car). At the time the trooper retrieved the appellant’s purse, her identity had already been confirmed and she was handcuffed and under arrest in the trooper’s vehicle. Neither her purse, nor the vehicle that contained her purse, came into police custody as a result of her arrest. On these facts, the state has failed to show that this search fits under the inventory-search exception to the Fourth Amendment’s warrant requirement.

Inventory searches must be conducted “in accordance with established inventory procedures.” Illinois v. LaFayette, 462 U.S. at 648. See id. at 644 (explaining that the validity of inventory searches is to be determined by the principles of Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 654 (1979), a decision that calls for standardized procedures to control “the discretion of the official in the field,” 440 U.S. at 655); see also Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367, 372-76 (1987) (analogizing inventory searches of automobiles to inventory searches of arrested individuals and reaffirming that inventory searches of automobiles must be conducted in accordance with “standard criteria”); Florida v. Wells, 495 U.S. 1, 4 (1990); City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 45 (2000).

Jail personnel may also conduct an intrusive visual search of the body – including body cavities – of an individual who is being admitted into the general population of a holding facility, for the purpose of detecting and confiscating any materials that would compromise the facility’s security. Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington, 566 U.S. 318 (2012).

§ 23.08(d) Search Prior to the Point of Arrest

The general rule is that “a search incident to a lawful arrest may not precede the arrest.” Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 67 (1968). However, the Court has recognized two narrow exceptions to this rule.

If the search and the arrest are parts of a single course of events and “the formal arrest followed quickly on the heels of the challenged search,” Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 111 (1980), then it is not “particularly important that the search preceded the arrest rather than vice versa.” Id. However, the police officer must, of course, have “probable cause to place [the respondent] under arrest” at the time of the search, id., and “[t]he fruits of the search of [the respondent’s] person . . . [cannot be] necessary to support probable cause to arrest.” Id. at 111 n.6. Accord, Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. at 63 (“[i]t is axiomatic that an incident search may not precede an arrest or serve as part of its justification”). See also People v. Reid, 24 N.Y.3d 615, 617, 619, 620, 26 N.E.3d 237, 238, 239, 240, 2 N.Y.S.3d 409, 410, 411, 412 (2014) (Although a search can precede an arrest as long as “the two events were substantially contemporaneous,” the officer “testified [that], but for the search there would have been no arrest at all,” notwithstanding that “probable cause to arrest the driver existed before the search,” and “[w]here that is true, to say that the search was incident to the arrest does not make sense.”; “[T]he ‘search incident to arrest’ doctrine, by its nature, requires proof that, at the time of the search, an arrest has already occurred or is about to occur. Where no arrest has yet taken place, the officer must have intended to make one if the ‘search incident’ exception is to be applied.”).

In cases in which the search and the arrest are not a single course of events, a search prior to arrest nevertheless may be valid if it is restricted to the “very limited search necessary to preserve” some evidence of “ready destructibility” that the suspect would otherwise likely destroy. Cupp v. Murphy, 412 U.S. 291, 296 (1973). Thus, in Cupp, the Court approved the officers’ taking scrapings of what appeared to be dried blood from the fingernails of a suspect, at a point in time when the police already had probable cause to arrest the suspect, even though the formal arrest did not occur until a month later. The Court emphasized that the scope of the search must be strictly limited to the measures needed to “preserve . . . highly evanescent evidence,” id. at 296, and that “a full Chimel search [the type of extensive search permitted incident to arrest upon probable cause] would [not be] . . . justified . . . without a formal arrest and without a warrant.” Id. See the discussion in Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326, 331-34 (2001), of police authority to prevent alerted suspects from destroying evidence; and see the cases dealing with a similar issue in the context of building searches, discussed in § 23.22(c) infra. Note that this authority depends upon the possession by the police of probable cause to believe that seizable evidence exists and is within the capacity of the suspect to destroy. See Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. at 334 (“We have found no case in which this Court has held unlawful a temporary seizure that was supported by probable cause and was designed to prevent the loss of evidence . . . . (emphasis added)); Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113, 116 (1998) (in cases in which there is probable cause to arrest a suspect, “the need to preserve evidence for later use at trial” is one of the justifications for allowing a warrantless search incident to arrest). If the police lack probable cause either (i) to search for seizable evidence or (ii) to arrest a suspect, they have no power to seize evidence in the first place, see, e.g., Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 373 (1993), so they cannot justify a “preventive” search on the theory that it is necessary to preserve destructible evidence.

§ 23.09 CIRCUMSTANCES JUSTIFYING A TERRY STOP

In Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), the Supreme Court held that a state could constitutionally authorize its law enforcement officers to conduct a “stop” – a brief on-the-street detention for the purpose of inquiry and observation – under circumstances giving rise to a rational suspicion of criminal activity but not amounting to the probable cause necessary for arrest. Terry “created an exception to the requirement of probable cause, an exception whose ‘narrow scope’ . . . [the Supreme] Court ‘has been careful to maintain.’” Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85, 93 (1979); see also Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 207-10 (1979); Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 499 (1983) (plurality opinion); id. at 509-11 (concurring opinion of Justice Brennan). See also Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 630 (2003).
The Terry stop must rest upon specific, identifiable facts that, “judged against an objective standard,” Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. at 21; see Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648, 654 (1979), give rise to “a reasonable and articulable suspicion that the person seized is engaged in criminal activity,” Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438, 440 (1980) (per curiam); see Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 51-53 (1979). Considering “the totality of the circumstances,” the “detaining officers must have a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of criminal activity.” United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 417-18 (1981); see also Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S. 323, 327 (2009); United States v. Arvizu, 534 U.S. 266, 273-74 (2002); Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119, 123-24 (2000); Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690, 696 (1996); United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 7-8 (1989) (dictum); Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 356 n.5 (1983) (dictum); Thomas v. Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 877 (9th Cir. 2016) (dictum) (“Just as a suspicion must be reasonable and individualized, it must be based on the totality of the circumstances known to the officer.”). Conduct or circumstances that “describe a very large category of presumably innocent persons” is not sufficient, Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. at 441; Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. at 52; cf. Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. at 91; compare United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. at 8-11; the “particularized suspicion” must be focused upon “the particular individual being stopped,” United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. at 418; see also, e.g., United States v. Black, 707 F.3d 531, 540-41 (4th Cir. 2013); State v. Teamer, 151 So. 3d 421, 427-28 (Fla. 2014) (“The discrepancy between the vehicle registration and the color the deputy observed does present an ambiguous situation, and the Supreme Court has recognized that an officer can detain an individual to resolve an ambiguity regarding suspicious yet lawful or innocent conduct. . . . However, the suspicion still must be a reasonable one. . . . In this case, there simply are not enough facts to demonstrate reasonableness. . . . [T]he color discrepancy here is not ‘inherently suspicious’ or ‘unusual’ enough or so ‘out of the ordinary’ as to provide an officer with a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, especially given the fact that it is not against the law in Florida to change the color of your vehicle without notifying the DHSMV. ¶ The law allows officers to draw rational inferences, but to find reasonable suspicion based on this single noncriminal factor would be to license investigatory stops on nothing more than an officer’s hunch. Doing so would be akin to finding reasonable suspicion for an officer to stop an individual for walking in a sparsely occupied area after midnight simply because that officer testified that, in his experience, people who walk in such areas after midnight tend to commit robberies. Without more, this one fact may provide a ‘mere suspicion,’ but it does not rise to the level of a reasonable suspicion.”). Information “completely lacking in indicia of reliability would either warrant no police response or require further investigation before a forcible stop of a suspect would be authorized.” Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143, 147 (1972) (dictum). See, e.g., Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266, 271 (2000) (an anonymous tip which lacks “moderate indicia of reliability” will not justify a stop, and this is the rule even where the tip contains an “accurate description of a subject’s . . . location and appearance”; “[t]he reasonable suspicion here at issue requires that a tip be reliable in its assertion of illegality, not just in its tendency to identify a determinate person”; and the Terry requirement of “standard pre-search reliability testing” in terms of reasonable suspicion is not relaxed in the cases where the tip asserts that the subject is in possession of an illegal firearm); United States v. Freeman, 735 F.3d 92, 97-103 (2d Cir. 2013); United States v. Brown, 448 F.3d 239 (3d Cir. 2006); United States v. Patterson, 340 F.3d 368
The power of the police to conduct a Terry stop is more limited when the stop is for the purpose of “investigat[ing] past criminal activity . . . rather than . . . to investigate ongoing criminal conduct.” United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221, 228 (1985). The Terry decision itself and almost all of the caselaw establishing standards for Terry stops involved situations in which the “police stopped or seized a person because they suspected he was about to commit a crime . . . or was committing a crime at the moment of the stop.” 469 U.S. at 227. In such situations the stop is justified by the exigencies of crime prevention and the need to avert an imminent threat to public safety. Id. at 228. “A stop to investigate an already completed crime does not necessarily promote the interest of crime prevention as directly . . . [and] officers making a stop to investigate past crimes may have a wider range of opportunity to choose the time and circumstances of the stop.” Id. at 228-29. To conduct a stop for the purpose of investigating a completed crime, a police officer must “have a reasonable suspicion, grounded in specific and articulable facts, that [the] . . . person . . . was involved in or is wanted in connection with a completed felony.” Id. at 229. Moreover, in authorizing such investigatory stops in United States v. Hensley, the Court strongly indicated that these stops may be conducted only in cases in which the police previously “have been unable to locate [the] . . . person,” 469 U.S. at 229, and therefore need to exercise the “stop” power in order to prevent “a person they encounter” (id.) from “flee[ing] in the interim and . . . remain[ing] at large.” Id. See id. at 234-35 (emphasizing that the defendant was “at large” and that the officers who conducted the stop could reasonably conclude, on the basis of a “wanted flyer,” that “a warrant might have been obtained in the period after the flyer was issued”). It is only the inability to find the defendant or respondent in a fixed location – to fully “choose the time and circumstances of the stop” (id. at 228-29) – that creates the exigency necessary to conduct a stop for the purpose of investigating a completed crime. See id. at 228-29; see also Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. at 51. Thus, at least arguably, when the police have known the respondent’s address and failed to avail themselves of the opportunity of conducting a purely voluntary “contact” at the respondent’s home (see § 23.04(a) supra), they may not use their suspicions about the respondent’s involvement in a completed crime to conduct a Terry stop.

For discussion of some of the factors commonly considered by the courts in gauging whether there was an adequate basis for a Terry stop, see § 23.11 infra.

§ 23.10 CIRCUMSTANCES JUSTIFYING A TERRY FRISK; THE PLAIN TOUCH DOCTRINE

In Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), the Court ruled that a state could constitutionally authorize not only a “stop” but also, under appropriate circumstances, a “frisk”: – that is, a pat-down for weapons or a similar “self-protective” search. The frisk must be made incidental to a valid accosting or stop. See, e.g., State v. Serna, 235 Ariz. 270, 275, 331 P.3d 405, 410 (2014) (a Terry frisk could not be conducted during a consensual encounter between a civilian and a police officer even though the civilian admitted to having a gun because “the initial stop was based on consent, not on any asserted suspicion of criminal activity,” and “Terry allows a frisk only if two conditions are met: officers must reasonably suspect both that criminal activity is afoot and that the suspect is armed and dangerous”).

A Terry frisk cannot be conducted for the purpose of seeking evidence; it can only be conducted for the purpose of discovering weapons that might be used against the officer. See Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1049-52 & n.16 (1983); Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S.
366, 373 (1993); Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266, 269-70 (2000). To justify a frisk, the officer needs more than the reasonable suspicion of criminal activity that will justify a stop and needs more than merely a hunch that the suspect might be armed. The officer must be able to “point to specific and articulable facts which, taken together with rational inferences from those facts, reasonably warrant” the conclusion that the officer “is dealing with an armed and dangerous individual,” Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. at 21, 27; see Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. at 63-64; Ybarra Dickerson, 508 U.S. at 373; Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. at 269-72; Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S.
Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 877 (9th Cir. 2016) (dictum) (“Even where certain facts might support reasonable suspicion a suspect is armed and dangerous when viewed initially or in isolation, a frisk is not justified when additional or subsequent facts dispel or negate the suspicion. Just as a suspicion must be reasonable and individualized, it must be based on the totality of the circumstances known to the officer. Officers may not cherry pick facts to justify the serious Fourth Amendment intrusion a frisk imposes.”); State v. Serna, 235 Ariz. at 275, 331 P.3d at 410 (“mere knowledge or suspicion that a person is carrying a firearm” will not suffice because Terry requires “that a suspect be ‘armed and presently dangerous’”); Norman v. State, 452 Md. 373, 424, 156 A.3d 940, 970 (2017) (“that a law enforcement officer must have specific reasons for believing a suspect is armed and dangerous supports the conclusion that the mere odor of marijuana emanating from [a] vehicle with multiple occupants would not give rise to reasonable articulable suspicion that an occupant is armed and dangerous”). But cf. Samson v. California, 547 U.S. 843, 846, 851-52 (2006) (police officer, “who was aware that [Samson] was on parole” and stopped him based on a belief that there was “an outstanding parole warrant” for him but then confirmed that no such warrant had been issued, could nonetheless frisk Samson because Samson’s expectation of privacy was diminished by having signed a statutorily-required agreement to a parole condition of being subject to a “‘search or seizure by a parole officer or other peace officer . . . with or without cause’”); compare State v. Ochoa, 792 N.W.2d 260, 291 (Iowa 2010) (“reject[ing] the holding of Samson under the Iowa Constitution” and “conclud[ing] that a parolee may not be subjected to broad, warrantless searches by a general law enforcement officer without any particularized suspicion or limitations to the scope of the search”).
In addition to limiting the situations in which an officer can make a frisk, the Fourth Amendment also regulates the manner in which frisks may be conducted. A frisk must be “limited to that which is necessary for the discovery of weapons.” Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. at 26. See Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. at 65-66; United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 880-82 (1975); Pennsylvania v. Mims, 434 U.S. 106, 111-12 (1977) (per curiam); Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 500 (1983) (plurality opinion); id. at 509-11 (concurring opinion of Justice Brennan). “If the protective search goes beyond what is necessary to determine if the suspect is armed, it is no longer valid under Terry and its fruits will be suppressed.” Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. at 373. Emphasizing that the frisk approved in Terry consisted of “a limited patting of the outer clothing of the suspect for concealed objects which might be used as instruments of assault” and that it was only after the discovery of such objects that “the officer in Terry place[d] his hands in the pockets of the men he searched,” the Court in Sibron v. New York condemned a frisk in which the officer, “with no attempt at an initial limited exploration for arms, . . . thrust his hand into [the defendant’s] pocket.” 392 U.S. at 65. See also United States v. Johnson, 885 F.3d 1313, 1323-24 (11th Cir. 2018) (in the patdown following a valid stop, an officer felt a single round of ammunition in the defendant’s pocket; his subsequent action of reaching into the pocket to retrieve the bullet and a nylon mesh holster exceeded the permissible bounds of a Terry frisk because a bullet alone poses no danger to officers: “Dickerson, carefully read, does not justify the warrantless retrieval of any item identified during an outer garment pat down. It allows an intrusion into the pocket if an outer clothing search allows a police officer to conclude that an item in a pocket is a weapon or contraband. Items not in these two categories cannot be retrieved. . . . ¶ . . . [T]he presence of a single round of ammunition – without facts supporting the presence, or reasonable expectation of the presence, of a firearm – was insufficient to justify the seizure of the bullet and the holster.”); State v. Privott, 203 N.J. 16, 31-32, 999 A.2d 415, 424-25 (2010) (police officer exceeded the permissible scope of a Terry frisk by “lift[ing] defendant’s tee-shirt to expose defendant’s stomach, and in doing so, observ[ing] a plastic bag with suspected drugs in the waistband of defendant’s pants”). In Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. at 378-79, the Court held that a “police officer . . . overstepped the bounds of the ‘strictly circumscribed’ search for weapons allowed under Terry” by “continu[ing] exploration of respondent’s pocket after having concluded that it contained no weapon.” The frisk must be “limited to those areas in which a weapon may be placed or hidden.” Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. at 1049 (during a Terry search of the passenger compartment of an automobile, the Terry frisk doctrine permits officers to search only those areas that could contain a weapon and were accessible to the suspect). See also United States v. Askew, 529 F.3d 1119, 1123, 1127-44 (D.C. Cir. 2008) (en banc) (police officers’ partial unzipping of the defendant’s outer jacket during a show-up to allow the victim to see whether the defendant’s sweatshirt matched that of the perpetrator exceeded the lawful bounds of a Terry frisk).

If, in the course of a Terry frisk, “a police officer lawfully pats down a suspect’s outer clothing and feels an object whose contour or mass makes its identity [as contraband] immediately apparent,” the officer may be able to seize the object pursuant to the “plain touch” (sometimes called the “plain feel”) doctrine. Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. at 373, 375-76. For the “plain touch” doctrine to justify a seizure, “the officer who conducted the search . . . [had to have been] acting within the lawful bounds marked by Terry” at the time s/he discovered the contraband (id. at 377); the “incriminating character of the object . . . [had to have been] immediately apparent” to the officer without, for example, engaging in “‘squeezing, sliding and otherwise manipulating the contents of the defendant’s pocket’” after it was already apparent that the “pocket . . . contained no weapon” (id. at 378-79); the officer’s recognition of the contraband nature of the object must reach the level of “probable cause” (id. at 377); and it must be evident from the circumstances that the officer was not exploiting an authorized Terry frisk for weapons to engage in “the sort of evidentiary search that Terry expressly refused to authorize . . . and that [the Court has] . . . condemned in subsequent cases” (id. at 378). But cf. People v. Diaz, 81 N.Y.2d 106, 110-12 & n.2, 612 N.E.2d 298, 301-02 & n.2, 595 N.Y.S.2d 940, 943-44 & n.2 (1993) (rejecting the “plain touch” doctrine altogether on state constitutional grounds).

§ 23.11 FACTORS COMMONLY RELIED ON BY THE POLICE TO JUSTIFY AN ARREST OR A TERRY STOP OR FRISK

Invariably, the police invoke the same general factors in case after case to justify their decisions to arrest or to conduct a Terry stop and frisk. In part, this may be due to police experience that these factors are reliable indicators of criminal conduct. In part, it may be because police officers have learned the proper formulaic responses necessary in order to obtain judicial ratification of their actions. The following subsections discuss some of the more controversial factors.

§ 23.11(a) “High Crime Neighborhood”

Police routinely cite the high crime rate in a neighborhood to justify a stop or an arrest. Although the prevalence of crime in a certain area may be of some relevance in determining probable cause or articulable suspicion, see Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 159-60 (1925); Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119, 124 (2000), the Supreme Court has indicated that this factor should be given little weight as a predicate for either an arrest or a Terry stop. In Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47 (1979), the Court invalidated a Terry stop that was based in part on the crime-prone character of the neighborhood, saying: “The fact that appellant was in a neighborhood frequented by drug users, standing alone, is not a basis for concluding that appellant himself was engaged in criminal conduct.” Id. at 52. Accord, Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. at 124 (“An individual’s presence in an area of expected criminal activity, standing alone, is not enough to support a reasonable, particularized suspicion that the person is committing a crime.” (citing Brown v. Texas, supra)); United States v. Black, 707 F.3d 531, 542 (4th Cir. 2013) (“In our present society, the demographics of those who reside in high crime neighborhoods often consist of racial minorities and individuals disadvantaged by their social and economic circumstances. To conclude that mere presence in a high crime area at night is sufficient justification for detention by law enforcement is to accept carte blanche the implicit assertion that Fourth Amendment protections are reserved only for a certain race or class of people. We denounce such an assertion.”); People v. Shabaz, 424 Mich. 42, 60-61, 378 N.W.2d 451, 459 (1985); People v. Holmes, 81 N.Y.2d 1056, 1058, 619 N.E.2d 396, 398, 601 N.Y.S.2d (1993) (suspect’s presence in a “known narcotics location,” even when combined with his flight from the police and a “bulge in the pocket of his jacket,” did not provide the requisite basis for a Terry stop: “Given the unfortunate reality of crime in today’s society, many areas of New York City, at one time or another, have probably been described by the police as ‘high crime neighborhoods’ or ‘narcotics-prone locations.’”). Mere presence in a crime-ridden locale also cannot supply the predicate for a Terry frisk. See Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85, 93-96 (1979) (holding that the defendant’s presence in a sparsely occupied one-room bar “at a time when the police had reason to believe that the bartender would have heroin for sale,” 444 U.S. at 91, did not justify a reasonable belief that the defendant was armed and dangerous).

§ 23.11(b) Failure To Respond to Police Inquiry; Flight

Frequently the police detain or arrest an individual because the individual refused to answer questions or because s/he walked or ran away when the police attempted to question him or her.

When suspects choose to answer the questions of the police, “the responses they give to [the] officers’ questions” can be considered in the calculus of probable cause or articulable F.3d 200 (4th Cir. 2018) (reasonable suspicion was not warranted by driver’s claim that he did not recall the address at which he had picked up a passenger 30 minutes earlier but that the address would be found in the car’s on-board GPS). It is not clear, however, whether (and, if so, to what extent) a refusal to answer inquiries may be given weight in justifying a stop or arrest. In a number of cases, a majority or plurality of the Supreme Court or an individual Justice has stated that a suspect’s refusal to answer police questions cannot provide a predicate for satisfaction of the Fourth Amendment criteria for a Terry stop or an arrest. *See Illinois v.
Wardlow*, 528 U.S. 119, 125 (2000) (“when an officer, without reasonable suspicion or probable cause, approaches an individual, the individual has a right to ignore the police and go about his business”; an individual has the “right to . . . remain silent in the face of police questioning”); Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 437 (1991) (a suspect’s “refusal to cooperate, without more, does not furnish the minimal level of objective justification needed for a detention or seizure”); Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 439 (1984) (a detainee is not obliged to respond” to a police officer’s questions); Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 365 (1983) (Justice Brennan, concurring) (a Terry suspect “must be free . . . to decline to answer the questions put to him”); Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 498 (1983) (plurality opinion) (a suspect’s “refusal to listen [to police questions] or answer does not, without more, furnish . . . grounds” for a Terry stop); *Terry
v. Ohio*, 392 U.S. at 34 (Justice White, concurring) (a suspect’s “refusal to answer furnishes no basis for an arrest”). Similar statements can be found in lower court opinions. See, e.g., *Moya v.
United States*, 761 F.2d 322, 325 (7th Cir. 1985); People v. Howard, 50 N.Y.2d 583, 591-92, 408 N.E.2d 908, 914, 430 N.Y.S.2d 578, 584 (1980). In Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177 (2004), however, the Court rejected a Fourth Amendment challenge to a “stop and identify” statute that allowed an officer to detain a person to “ascertain his identity” if the “circumstances . . . reasonably indicate that the person has committed, is committing or is about to commit a crime’ ’ and that permitted the suspect’s failure to give the officer his or her name under these circumstances to be punished criminally as ‘ ‘obstruct[ing] and delay[ing] . . . a public officer in attempting to discharge his duty.’ ’ Id. at 181-82. In upholding the statute, the Court stated that ‘ ‘[t]he principles of Terry permit a State to require a suspect to disclose his name in the course of a Terry stop,’’ as long as the ‘ ‘statute does not alter the nature of the stop itself . . . [-] does not change its duration . . . or its location’ ’ (id. at 187-88, 189). The Hiibel ruling is expressly limited to situations (and, thus, jurisdictions) in which a statute authorizes an arrest of an individual for refusing to divulge his or her name during a Terry stop. See id. at 187-88 (explaining that prior Court statements, such as those quoted above, regarding a suspect’s right to refuse to answer questions concern the nature and import of Fourth Amendment protections while the Hiibel ‘ ‘case concerns a different issue . . . [in that] the source of the legal obligation arises from Nevada state law, not the Fourth Amendment’ ’). See also, e.g., City of Topeka v. Grabauskas, 33 Kan. App. 2d 210, 222, 99 P.3d 1125, 1134 (2004) (rejecting the prosecution’s Hiibel argument because ‘ ‘[u]nlike the State of Nevada, we have no statute requiring persons to identify themselves . . . [and thus] Hiibel is clearly distinguishable from this case’ ’). Moreover, even in jurisdictions possessing a statute such as the one upheld in Hiibel, ‘ ‘the statutory obligation does not go beyond answering an officer’s request to disclose a name’ ’ (Hiibel, 542 U.S. at 187), and thus a suspect’s failure to answer police questions about other matters presumably cannot be factored into the calculus of probable cause or articulable suspicion. See id. at 185 (explaining that ‘ ‘the Nevada Supreme Court . . . [had] interpreted . . . [the applicable statute] to require only that a suspect disclose his name. . . . ‘ ‘The suspect is not required to provide private details about his background, but merely to state his name to an officer when reasonable suspicion exists’ . . . . As we understand it, the statute does not require a suspect to give the officer a driver's license or any other document. Provided that the suspect either states his name or communicates it to the officer by other means – a choice, we assume, that the suspect may make – the statute is satisfied and no violation occurs.”); and see id. at 187-88 (explaining that a state statutory requirement that ‘ ‘a suspect . . . disclose his name in the course of a valid Terry stop is consistent with” “the purpose, rationale, and practical demands of a Terry stop” and “does not alter the nature of the stop itself”’ ’. Finally, even under a statute such as the one upheld in Hiibel, the initial stop that prompts the question about identity must be “based on reasonable suspicion, satisfying the Fourth Amendment requirements” for Terry stops (id. at 184; see id. at 188; see also, e.g., Commonwealth v. Ickes, 582 Pa. 561, 873 A.2d 698 (2005) (striking down a “stop and identify” statute that, unlike the one in Hiibel, failed to require a valid Terry stop as a predicate for the request for identification)); “an officer may not arrest a suspect for failure to identify himself if the request for identification is not reasonably related to the circumstances justifying the stop” (Hiibel, 542 U.S. at 188); and it must be apparent from the circumstances that “[t]he officer’s request [for identification] was . . . not an effort to obtain an arrest for failure to identify after a Terry stop yielded insufficient evidence” (id. at 189); Johnson v. Thibodeaux City, 887 F.3d 726, 733 (5th Cir. 2018) (“According to the officers, they had probable cause to arrest Johnson for failing to provide identification, an alleged violation of Louisiana Revised Statute 14:108. That statute requires an ‘arrested or detained party’ to provide identification only when the officer is making ‘a lawful arrest’ or a ‘lawful detention.’ ”) The statute could not extend more broadly. Under the Fourth Amendment, police officers may not require identification absent an otherwise lawful detention or arrest based on reasonable suspicion or probable cause. . . . ¶ . . . Thus, under both Louisiana law and the Constitution, Johnson was required to provide identification only if she was otherwise lawfully stopped. The officers would have no probable cause to arrest if the request for identification came during an illegal seizure.”).

Flight may be relevant to the determination of probable cause or articulable suspicion, see Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. at 124-25; Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 66-67 (1968), but it is not dispositive and cannot, in and of itself, supply the basis for an arrest or a stop. See, e.g., Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. at 124 (“flight,” although “suggestive” of “wrongdoing,” “is not necessarily indicative of wrongdoing”); United States v. Green, 670 F.2d 1148, 1152 (D.C. Cir. 1981); People v. Holmes, 81 N.Y.2d 1056, 1058, 619 N.E.2d 396, 398, 601 N.Y.S.2d 459, 461 (1993) (suspect’s flight from the police, even when combined with his presence in a “known narcotics location” and a “bulge in the pocket of his jacket,” did not provide the requisite basis for a Terry stop). Moreover, unless the flight occurs under circumstances in which it is reasonable to infer guilty knowledge, the flight cannot be considered at all. See, e.g., Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 482-83 (1963) (“when an officer insufficiently or unclearly identifies his office or his mission, the occupant’s flight . . . must be regarded as ambiguous conduct [and] . . . afford[s] no sure . . . inference of guilty knowledge”); People v. Shabaz, 424 Mich. at 64, 378 N.W.2d at 461; Commonwealth v. Warren, 475 Mass. 530, 58 N.E.3d 333 (2016) (“Although flight is relevant to the reasonable suspicion analysis in appropriate circumstances, we add two cautionary notes regarding the weight to be given this factor. ¶ First, we perceive a factual irony in the consideration of flight as a factor in the reasonable suspicion calculus. Unless reasonable suspicion for a threshold inquiry already exists, our law guards a person’s freedom to speak or not to speak to a police officer. A person also may choose to walk away, avoiding altogether any contact with police. . . . Where a suspect is under no obligation to respond to a police officer’s inquiry, we are of the view that flight to avoid that contact should be given little, if any, weight as a factor probative of reasonable suspicion. Otherwise, our long-standing jurisprudence establishing the boundary between consensual and obligatory police encounters will be seriously undermined. . . . ¶ Second, . . . where the suspect is a black male stopped by the police on the streets of Boston, the analysis of flight as a factor in the reasonable suspicion calculus cannot be divorced from the findings in a recent Boston Police Department (department) report documenting a pattern of racial profiling of black males in the city of Boston. . . . According to the study, based on FIO [Field Interrogation and Observation] data collected by the department, . . . black men in the city of Boston were more likely to be targeted for police-civilian encounters such as stops, frisks, searches, observations, and interrogations. . . . Black men were also disproportionately targeted for repeat police encounters. . . . We do not eliminate flight as a factor in the reasonable suspicion analysis whenever a black male is the subject of an investigatory stop. However, in such circumstances, flight is not necessarily probative of a suspect’s state of mind or consciousness of guilt. Rather, the finding that black males in Boston are disproportionately and repeatedly targeted for FIO encounters suggests a reason for flight totally unrelated to consciousness of guilt. Such an individual, when approached by the police, might just as easily be motivated by the desire to avoid the recurring indignity of being racially profiled as by the desire to hide criminal activity. Given this reality for black males in the city of Boston, a judge should, in appropriate cases, consider the report’s findings in weighing flight as a factor in the reasonable suspicion calculus.” (id. at 539-40, 58 N.E.3d at 341-42); “in the circumstances of this case, the [defendant’s] flight from [officer] Anjos during the initial encounter added nothing to the reasonable suspicion calculus” (id. at 539, 58 N.E.3d at 342) because the police, who “were handicapped from the start with only a vague description of the perpetrators,” had “far too little information to support an individualized suspicion that the defendant had committed the breaking and entering,” and therefore, “[u]ntil the point when [officer] Carr seized the defendant, the investigation failed to transform the defendant from a random black male in dark clothing traveling the streets of Roxbury on a cold December night into a suspect in the crime of breaking and entering.” (id. at 540, 58 N.E.3d at 342-43.). See also Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. at 128-29, 131-35 (Justice Stevens, concurring in part and dissenting in part, joined by Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer) (identifying a variety of “instances in which a person runs for entirely innocent reasons” and scenarios in which “[f]light to escape police detection . . . may have an entirely innocent motivation”). Compare id. at 124 (majority opinion) (Terry stop was justified by the totality of circumstances, including the suspect’s “unprovoked,” “[h]eadlong flight” “upon noticing the police”) with Banks v. Commonwealth, 2015 WL 3533197 (Ky. App. 2016), summarized in § 23.11(c) infra.

§ 23.11(c) Furtive Gestures; Nervousness

Frequently, a “furtive gesture” of the respondent’s will be the impetus for a stop or an arrest. Although “deliberately furtive actions” may be considered, Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. at 66, the purported furtiveness of the gestures must be carefully scrutinized to determine whether they could be equally consistent with innocent behavior. See, e.g., Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438, 441 (1980) (per curiam) (invalidating a Terry stop because the allegedly furtive “manner in which the petitioner and his companion walked through the airport” was “too slender a reed to support the seizure”); Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. at 52 (striking down a Terry stop that was based on the defendant’s “look[ing] suspicious” and seemingly walking away from a companion upon the arrival of the police, while in a “‘high drug problem area’” (id. at 49); compare Florida v. Rodriguez, 469 U.S. 1 (1984) (per curiam). If the officer’s assertions about “furtive gestures” are vague, defense counsel should consider pinning the officer down on precisely which gestures s/he viewed as suspicious, in order to be able to argue that these actions are consistent with innocent conduct. See, e.g., Thomas v. Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 884 (9th Cir. 2016) (“As one additional reason to believe [that defendant] Thomas was armed, [police officer] Dillard points to Thomas’ demeanor, suggesting Thomas appeared ‘startled and fidgety.’ We do not see how either of these observations support even minimally the inference that Thomas was armed, however. Although Dillard testified Thomas and [his companion] Husky may have appeared ‘a little startled’ when he first confronted them, he also explained that this was ‘a common reaction . . . when a police officer arrives on the scene.’ By fidgety, Dillard meant only that Thomas and Husky exhibited normal hand movements, noting that it is not natural for people to stand in a perfectly still, statuesque form. Thomas and Husky, in other words, behaved normally.”); Banks v. Commonwealth, 2015 WL 3533197, at *3 (Ky. App. 2016) (although the arresting officer “viewed Banks’s act of walking away [from a crowd that “peacefully dispersed” upon the officers’ emergence from their vehicle] as suspicious behavior,” and the officer “explained that people with something to conceal often might step away from a group,” the court of appeals rejects this reasoning and states: “in this case, the group dispersed; there was no longer a group from which to separate. We are not persuaded that peacefully walking away from a gathering is unusual conduct – or at least conduct so noteworthy as to justify a stop and search.”). However, if counsel knows from interviews with the respondent or witnesses that the respondent’s actions really were suspicious, counsel should refrain from giving the officer an opportunity to clarify a vague account.

“[A] driver’s nervousness is not a particularly good indicator of criminal activity, because most everyone is nervous when interacting with the police.’ . . . ‘[M]ere nervousness ‘is of limited value to reasonable suspicion analyses’ . . .’ United States v. Bowman, 884 F.3d 200, 214 (4th Cir. 2018) (dismissing an officer’s contentions that the driver and passenger of a stopped car “appeared to be nervous. . . . [The driver,] Bowman’s hands were shaking as he handed over his vehicle registration and driver’s license after the initial stop; . . . when . . . [the officer] initially approached the car, [the passenger,] Alvarez stared straight ahead instead of looking him in the eye; . . . in both men ‘the carotid artery was beating very hard and rapidly,’ . . . signaling an increased heart rate and nervousness; . . . Bowman ‘couldn’t sit still’ in the patrol vehicle while . . . [the officer] was processing his license and registration”).

§ 23.11(d) Arrests and Terry Stops Based on Tips from Informants

Frequently, a police officer’s decision to make an arrest or a Terry stop is based on information obtained from a third party – either an ordinary citizen or a covert police informer. The standards regulating police reliance on such information are the same in these cases as in other contexts, such as automobile searches (see § 23.24 infra) and “hot pursuit” or “exigent circumstances” entries into premises (see §§ 23.19-23.20 infra) and are discussed in § 23.32 infra.

§ 23.12 POLICE SEIZURES OF OBJECTS FROM THE RESPONDENT’S PERSON; POLICE DEMANDS THAT A RESPONDENT HAND OVER AN OBJECT IN HIS OR HER POSSESSION

Any activity by a police officer or other state agent that is “designed to obtain information . . . by physically intruding on a subject’s body . . . [is] a Fourth Amendment search.” Grady v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 1368, 1371 (2015) (per curiam). Frequently, in the course of an on-the-street encounter between a juvenile respondent and the police, a police officer will seize an object from the respondent. Such “a seizure of personal property [is] . . . per se unreasonable within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment unless it is accomplished pursuant to a judicial warrant . . . [or is justified by] some . . . recognized exception to the warrant requirement.” United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 701 (1983). See, e.g., Beck v. Ohio, 379 U.S. 89 (1964); Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465 (1979). Objects may be seized from the respondent’s person and may be searched without a warrant pursuant to the doctrine of “search incident to arrest” if all of the requirements of that doctrine, including probable cause to arrest, are satisfied. See § 23.08(b) supra. And if the respondent is carrying an object that is visibly contraband, in plain view of the officer, then the seizure and search of that object may be justifiable under the “plain view” doctrine. See § 23.22(b) infra.

Under certain narrowly defined exigent circumstances, for example, when “the seizure is minimally intrusive and operational necessities render it the only practicable means of detecting certain types of crime,” Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 327 (1987), the police may be able to conduct a “Terry-type investigative . . . [detention]” of an object. United States v. Place, 462 U.S. at 709. However, this limited extension of the Terry doctrine has thus far been applied only in cases of “investigative detention of [a] vehicle suspected to be transporting illegal aliens,” Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. at 327 (citing United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411 (1981), and United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975)) and a case involving a “seizure of [a] suspected drug dealer’s luggage at [an] airport to permit exposure to [a] specially trained dog,” Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. at 327 (citing United States v. Place, supra). In each of the cited cases, the Court demanded “reasonable suspicion” of the criminal nature of the object seized, in the ordinary sense of the Terry doctrine (see § 23.09 supra), as a necessary precondition of the seizure.

The police cannot avoid these constitutional restrictions upon seizures by simply ordering the respondent to turn over the object rather than physically taking it from the respondent’s possession. See, e.g., Kelley v. United States, 298 F.2d 310, 312 (D.C. Cir. 1961) (police officers’ demand that “appellant systematically disclose the contents of his clothing, first one pocket, then another, and then another, was no less a search . . . than if the police had themselves reached into the appellant’s pockets”); United States v. Hallman, 365 F.2d 289, 291-92 (3d Cir. 1966); In the Matter of Bernard G., 247 A.D.2d 91, 94, 679 N.Y.S.2d 104, 105 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1998) (police officers’ “ask[ing] . . . [a juvenile] to empty his pockets . . . was the equivalent of searching his pockets themselves”). In cases in which the police officers frame their demand in the form of a request and purportedly obtain the respondent’s consent to the officers’ taking control of the object or searching it, the constitutionality of their actions will ordinarily turn on whether there was a valid, voluntary “consent” under the principles set forth in § 23.18(a) infra. See, e.g., Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983); People v. Gonzalez, 115 A.D.2d 73, 499 N.Y.S.2d 400 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1986), aff’d, 68 N.Y.2d 950, 502 N.E.2d 1001, 510 N.Y.S.2d 86 (1986). But when the sole justification for the encounter is a Terry-type investigative detention, a request for consent to conduct a search of the respondent’s person or possessions which is unrelated to that justification has been held impermissible, tainting the ensuing consent and a search pursuant to it. State v. Smith, 286 Kan. 402, 184 P.3d 890 (2008).

Police officers frequently testify that, when approached or accosted, the respondent threw away an incriminating object, which was then picked up by the officer, or that the respondent disclosed the object to their sight in an attempt to hide it somewhere away from his or her person. This testimony is calculated to invoke the doctrines that the observation of objects “placed . . . in plain view” is not a search, Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 106 (1980) (dictum); see, e.g., Rios v. United States, 364 U.S. 253, 262 (1960), and that it is neither a search nor a seizure to pick up “abandoned” objects thrown on a public road, California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988); California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 624 (1991); see, e.g., Lee v. United States, 221 F.2d 29 (D.C. Cir. 1954).

In these “dropsie” or “throw-away” cases, the defense can prevail by showing that:

(a) The alleged abandonment of the property was itself the product of unlawful police action. Thus abandonment will not be found if (i) the respondent was illegally arrested or illegally detained prior to the time of the alleged “drop” (see Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980) (per curiam); United States v. Beck, 602 F.2d 726 (5th Cir. 1979); Commonwealth v. Harris, 491 Pa. 402, 421 A.2d 199 (1980); State v. Bennett, 430 A.2d 424 (R.I. 1981)); (ii) the police were engaged in an unlawful search prior to the time of the alleged “drop” (see United States v. Newman, 490 F.2d 993 (10th Cir. 1974); State v. Dineen, 296 N.W.2d 421 (Minn. 1980)); or (iii) the police were in the course of unlawfully pursuing the respondent at the time of the alleged “drop.” (Prior to the decision in California v. Hodari D., supra, there were a number of state high court decisions holding that if police officers initiated visible pursuit of an individual without the requisite justification for an arrest or a Terry stop (see §§ 23.07, 23.09 supra) and if the individual responded by fleeing and tossing away an incriminating object, an unconstitutional “seizure” of the individual had occurred at the time when the pursuit became manifest (because, for example, the police activated a flasher or a siren or called to the individual to stand still), and the discarded object was tainted by this illegality and therefore subject to suppression. See, e.g., People v. Shabaz, 424 Mich. 42, 378 N.W.2d 451 (1985); People v. Torres, 115 A.D.2d 93, 499 N.Y.S.2d 730 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1986); Commonwealth v. Barnett, 484 Pa. 211, 398 A.2d 1019 (1979). As a matter of federal constitutional law, those decisions have been cast in doubt by the holding in Hodari D. that an individual who flees when accosted by police is not “seized” for Fourth Amendment purposes until s/he is caught and physically restrained (see § 23.04(b) first paragraph supra). However, the pre-Hodari caselaw should continue to obtain in jurisdictions where (A) state law requires a justification for the initial accosting, and that justification is lacking (see, e.g., People v. Holmes, 81 N.Y.2d 1056, 619 N.E.2d 396, 601 N.Y.S.2d 459 (1993)) or (B) the state courts have rejected Hodari as a matter of state law and continue to hold that a “seizure of the person” occurs at the point of initiation of a manifest police pursuit (see, e.g., State v. Oquendo, 223 Conn. 635, 613 A.2d 1300 (1992); Commonwealth v. Stoute, 422 Mass. 782, 665 N.E.2d 93 (1996); Commonwealth v. Barros, 435 Mass. 171, 755 N.E.2d 740 (2001)). See State v. Quino, 74 Haw. 161, 840 P.2d 358 (1992).

(b) The “dropped” object fell into a constitutionally protected area. See, e.g., Rios v. United States, 364 U.S. at 262 n.6 (taxicab “passenger who lets a package drop to the floor of the taxicab in which he is riding can hardly be said to have ‘abandoned’ it”); \textit{Work v. United States}, 243 F.2d 660, 662-63 (D.C. Cir. 1957) (the trash receptacle into which defendant placed phial of narcotics upon police officers’ entry into a house was within the constitutionally protected “curtilage” of the home); \textit{Commonwealth v. Ousley}, 393 S.W.3d 15, 18, 26-29, 33 (Ky. 2013) (police officers’ search of “closed trash containers,” which were near the defendant’s home, was unlawful because “[t]he containers had not been put out on the street for trash collection” and were within the “curtilage” of the home). (Section 23.15(c) \textit{infra} discusses the concept of “curtilage” in detail.)

(c) The police “dropsie” story is a fabrication, as it often is. \textit{See, e.g., People v. Quinones}, 61 A.D.2d 765, 766, 402 N.Y.S.2d 196, 198 (N.Y. App. Div. 1st Dep’t 1978). In seeking to show that the police officers are fabricating, defense counsel should cross-examine the officers on what they did prior to the “drop” that caused the respondent to disclose to them incriminating matters that were otherwise well-concealed. If plainclothes police are involved, this fact, together with the fact that the respondent had not previously encountered the officers, should be brought out. Even the habitual credulity of judges with regard to police testimony is sometimes shaken by accounts of a respondent’s tossing away incriminating (and often highly valuable) objects at the approach of unannounced, unknown, and unidentifiable police.

(d) The object seized was a repository of information enjoying special Fourth Amendment protection because of its peculiarly private nature and its owner’s efforts to preserve that privacy interest. \textit{See State v. K.C.}, 207 So.3d 951 (Fla. App. 2016) (police chased a speeding car; it pulled into a shopping plaza and stopped; its two occupants fled; the pursuing officers seized several cell phones left in the vehicle; a detective later retrieved the contents of one of the phones, which was password-protected; “[h]e did not obtain a search warrant because he believed that the phone was abandoned.” \textit{Id}. at 952. “The State . . . claims that it could search the cell phone without a warrant under the abandonment exception.” \textit{Id}. at 955. “While we acknowledge that the physical cell phone in this case was left in the stolen vehicle by the individual, and it was not claimed by anyone at the police station, its contents were still protected by a password, clearly indicating an intention to protect the privacy of all of the digital material on the cell phone or able to be accessed by it. Indeed, the password protection that most cell phone users place on their devices is designed specifically to prevent unauthorized access to the vast store of personal information which a cell phone can hold when the phone is out of the owner’s possession.” \textit{Id}. “As the Supreme Court held [in Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473 (2014), discussed in § 23.08(b) \textit{supra}] that a categorical rule permitting a warrantless search incident to arrest of a cell phone contravenes the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, we hold that a categorical rule permitting warrantless searches of abandoned cell phones, the contents of which are password protected, is likewise unconstitutional.” \textit{Id}. at 956.). \textit{See also State v. Worsham}, 227 So.3d 602 (Fla. App. 2017), summarized in § 23.25 \textit{infra}.

\section*{\textcopyright 23.14 POST-ARREST CUSTODIAL TREATMENT OF THE RESPONDENT}
The post-arrest treatment of persons in custody is regulated by statute or caselaw in virtually all jurisdictions. The typical post-arrest procedures are described in some detail in §§ 3.03-3.12 supra. Counsel should be alert to the possibility that an arresting officer’s failure to follow a constitutionally or statutorily required procedure rendered the post-arrest confinement unlawful and supplies a basis for suppressing evidence obtained during the postarrest period. For example, if the police keep the respondent at the stationhouse for an undue length of time instead of bringing him or her to court expeditiously for arraignment, this will almost certainly violate local statutory requirements and may also fall afoul of the constitutional protections in this area (see § 4.28(a) supra), thereby tainting evidence such as confessions or lineup identifications obtained during the period of undue delay. See § 24.15 infra; cf. § 25.07 infra. Similarly, if the police fail to follow local statutory requirements for notifying the respondent’s parent and arranging the parent’s presence during interrogation, these omissions may render the respondent’s confessions suppressible. See § 24.14 infra. Police brutality during the post-arrest period (see, e.g., Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015); Shuford v. Conway, 666 Fed. Appx. 811 (11th Cir. 2016)) may render any subsequent confessions or consents to searches unlawful, see § 24.04(a) infra.

The postarrest period is often the stage at which the police conduct physical examinations, extractions of body fluids, hair, and so forth. An individual’s body is protected by the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments’ prohibition of unreasonable searches of the person, including any procedure that is “designed to obtain information” and that involves “physically intruding on a subject’s body.” Grady v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 1368, 1371 (2015) (per curiam). See Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. 2160, 2173 (2016) (“our cases establish that the taking of a blood sample or the administration of a breath test is a search” for Fourth Amendment purposes). Searches that intrude into the body or breach the body wall – and perhaps other intimate personal examinations – are governed by a set of constitutional principles articulated in Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966), and Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985). The “individual’s interests in privacy and security are weighed against society’s interests in conducting the [search] procedure . . . [in order to determine] whether the community’s need for evidence outweighs the substantial privacy interests at stake.” Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 760. Compare, e.g., Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington, 566 U.S. 318, 322, 330, 339 (2012) (jail’s policy of requiring that “every detainee who will be admitted to the general population . . . undergo a close visual inspection while undressed,” notwithstanding the absence of “reasonable suspicion of a concealed weapon or other contraband,” did not violate the Fourth Amendment, given the “undoubted security imperatives involved in jail supervision” and the “reasonable balance [that had been struck] between inmate privacy and the needs of the institution[ ]”), with United States v. Fowlkes, 804 F.3d 954, 958, 966 (9th Cir. 2015) (“the forcible removal of an unidentified item of unknown size from Fowlkes’ rectum [during processing at jail after a strip search] by officers without medical training or a warrant violated his Fourth Amendment rights”; “the record is devoid of any evidence from which the officers reasonably might have inferred that evidence would be destroyed if they took the time to secure a warrant and summon medical personnel. . . . ¶ Similarly, the record contains no evidence that a medical emergency existed. . . . Thus, there was time to take steps – potentially including, inter alia, securing medical personnel, a warrant, or both – to mitigate the risk that the seizure would cause physical and emotional trauma.”), and with People v. Hall, 10 N.Y.3d 303, 312-13, 886 N.E.2d 162, 169, 856 N.Y.S.2d 540, 547 (2008) (“manual body cavity search” of a suspect at the police station to remove contraband observed during a lawfully conducted strip search violated the Fourth Amendment because there were no exigent circumstances preventing the police from obtaining a warrant). In the application of this balancing test, the following factors are central to an assessment of the “reasonableness,” and thereby of the constitutionality, of the search:

(a) Whether the police officers obtained a search warrant; or, if they failed to obtain a warrant, whether their failure to obtain a warrant was justified because the imminence of disappearance of the evidence made it impracticable to obtain a warrant. Schmerber, 384 U.S. at 770; Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 761. See, e.g., Missouri v. McNeely, 569 U.S. 141, 156, 165 (2013) (“in drunk-driving investigations, the natural dissipation of alcohol in the bloodstream does not constitute an exigency in every case sufficient to justify conducting a blood test without a warrant”); “while the natural dissipation of alcohol in the blood may support a finding of exigency in a specific case, as it did in Schmerber, it does not do so categorically”). Accord, Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. at 2173-74, discussed in subdivision (d) of this section; State v. Schaufele, 325 P.3d 1060, 1068 (Colo. 2014) (“the trial court properly adhered to McNeely in suppressing evidence of Schaufele’s blood draw” because McNeely holds “that the Fourth Amendment requires officers in drunk-driving investigations to obtain a warrant before drawing a blood sample when they can do so without significantly undermining the efficacy of the search . . . .”); McGuire v. State, 493 S.W.3d 177, 197-98 (Tex. App. 2016) (“Fort Bend County had a process in place to assist officers in obtaining warrants. It had assistant district attorneys on call at all hours. Officers, or the assistant district attorneys, could fax transmissions to any of “about 20” Fort Bend County judges at their homes to process a warrant or the officers could take a warrant request to the judges personally. Nonetheless, no effort was made to obtain a warrant by any of the seven officers at the scene. . . . ¶ . . . The State argues that it may have proven difficult to locate a judge to sign a warrant, but, without any effort to do so, the testimony is only speculation. ¶ Having examined the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that the State failed to demonstrate an exigency to excuse the requirement of a warrant.”).

(b) Whether the search was justified by a “clear indication” that incriminating evidence would be found. Schmerber, 384 U.S. at 770; see Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 762 (quoting the Schmerber “clear indication” standard). The Court in United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 540 (1985), subsequently glossed the “clear indication” standard as requiring nothing more than probable cause, but there remains room to argue that a particularly exacting judicial review of the probable-cause determination is appropriate in this context because the degree of justification required for a search always depends upon the extent of “the invasion which the search entails” (Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523, 536-37 (1967); see, e.g., Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 21 (1968); Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 7-9 (1985)), and “‘intrusions into the human body’ . . . perhaps implicate[ ] . . . [the] most personal and deep-rooted expectations of privacy” (Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 760).
(c) “[T]he extent to which the procedure may threaten the safety or health of the individual.” Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 761. With respect to this factor it is particularly relevant to consider whether: “all reasonable medical precautions were taken”; any “unusual or untested procedures were employed”; and “the procedure was performed ‘by a physician in a hospital environment according to accepted medical practices.’” Id.; Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. at 771-72.

(d) “[T]he extent of intrusion upon the individual’s dignitary interests in personal privacy and bodily integrity.” Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 761. With regard to this consideration, it is relevant to examine whether the procedure involved any “‘trauma, or pain’” or violated “the individual’s interest in ‘human dignity.’” Id. at 762 n.5. See, e.g., Maryland v. King, 569 U.S. 435, 446, 465 (2013) (“DNA identification of arrestees is a reasonable search that can be considered part of a routine booking procedure . . . [w]hen officers make an arrest supported by probable cause to hold for a serious offense and they bring the suspect to the station to be detained in custody”; the Court observes that “[a] buccal swab [to obtain a DNA sample] is a far more gentle process than a venipuncture to draw blood . . . [; it] involves but a light touch on the inside of the cheek . . . [and] no ‘surgical intrusions beneath the skin’”; and there are “significant state interests in identifying . . . [the arrestee] not only so that the proper name can be attached to his charges but also so that the criminal justice system can make informed decisions concerning pretrial custody”); compare Birchfield v. North Dakota, supra (upholding state implied-consent laws requiring that drunk-driving arrestees submit to breath tests without a warrant because “breath tests do not ‘implicat[e] significant privacy concerns . . . ’”; “the physical intrusion is almost negligible,” in that “[b]reath tests ‘do not require piercing the skin’ and entail ‘a minimum of inconvenience . . . ’”; the “effort is no more demanding than blowing up a party balloon”; “there is nothing painful or strange about . . . [the procedure of taking a tube into one’s mouth, which is akin to] use of a straw to drink beverages”; “the process [does not] put into the possession of law enforcement authorities a sample from which a wealth of additional, highly personal information could potentially be obtained”; it “results in a BAC [blood alcohol concentration] reading on a machine, nothing more”; and “participation in a breath test is not an experience that is likely to cause any great enhancement in the embarrassment that is inherent in any arrest” (136 S. Ct. at 2176-77), with id. ( “[b]lood tests are a different matter” (id. at 2178) and cannot be compelled without a warrant under “the search incident to arrest doctrine” (id. at 2185) because “[t]hey ‘require piercing the skin and extract a part of the subject’s body’; “for many [people], the process [of having blood drawn, even for medical diagnostic purposes] is not one they relish”; and “a blood test, unlike a breath test, places in the hands of law enforcement authorities a sample that can be preserved and from which it is possible to extract information beyond a simple BAC reading. Even if the law enforcement agency is precluded from testing the blood for any purpose other than to measure BAC, the potential remains and may result in anxiety for the person tested.”) (id. at 2178)). See also State v. Thompson, 886 N.W.2d 224 (Minn. 2016) (applying the Birchfield analysis to invalidate a statute providing that driving a vehicle constitutes implied consent to urine testing). A prime example of a deprivation of dignity sufficient to violate the Due Process Clause occurred in Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952), when “police officers broke into a suspect’s room, attempted to extract narcotics capsules he had put into his mouth, took him to a hospital, and directed that an emetic be administered to induce vomiting.” Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 762 n.5. See also Sims v. Labowitz, 877 F.3d 171, 178 (4th Cir. 2017) (having obtained a search warrant authorizing the photographing of a sexting suspect’s penis, a detective instructed the suspect to masturbate in order to raise an erection; “Although the intrusion suffered by Sims was neither physically invasive nor put him at risk of direct physical harm, the search nonetheless was exceptionally intrusive” and therefore violated the Fourth Amendment.); United States v. Booker, 728 F.3d 535, 537 (6th Cir. 2013) (applying the Fourth Amendment to suppress contraband that was removed from the defendant’s rectum by an emergency-room doctor to whom the police brought the defendant, “reasonably suspecting that Booker had contraband hidden in his rectum” and who “intubated Booker for about an hour, rendered him unconscious for twenty to thirty minutes, and paralyzed him for seven to eight minutes”; “Even though the doctor may have acted for entirely medical reasons, the unconsented procedure while Booker was under the control of the police officers must, in the circumstances of this case, be attributed to the state for Fourth Amendment purposes. The unconsented procedure, moreover, shocks the conscience at least as much as the stomach pumping that the Supreme Court long ago held to violate due process.”). “[D]ue process concerns could be involved if the police initiate[ ] physical violence while administering the [blood alcohol] test, refuse[ ] to respect a reasonable request to undergo a different form of testing, or respond[ ] to resistance with inappropriate force.” South Dakota v. Neville, 459 U.S. 553, 559 n.9 (1983) (dictum); see also id. at 563. Cf. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015) (recognizing that the use of “excessive force” against a pretrial detainee violates Due Process).

(e) Whether there is a “compelling need” (Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 766) for the intrusion or examination because it represents the most accurate and effective method for detecting facts critical to the issue of guilt or innocence. Thus a blood test was approved in Schmerber because the test is “‘a highly effective means of determining the degree to which a person is under the influence of alcohol’” and “the difficulty of proving drunkenness by other means . . . [rendered the] results of the blood test . . . of vital importance if the State were to enforce its drunken driving laws” (Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 762-63 (explaining the holding in Schmerber)). Conversely, the Court concluded in Winston v. Lee that the state had not shown a “compelling need” for the surgical removal of a bullet from the defendant’s body, since the state possessed “substantial” alternative evidence of guilt (see id. at 765-66).

Certain types of physical examinations conducted by law enforcement investigators or consultants may run afoul of other constitutional prohibitions. Tests and examinations that involve the eliciting of “communications” from the accused (such as polygraph tests or the use of “truth serums”) – and perhaps others that require his or her willed cooperation – are impermissible in the absence of a valid waiver of the Privilege Against Self-Incrimination. See Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981) (psychiatric examination); Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. at 764 (dictum) (“lie detector tests”); South Dakota v. Neville, 459 U.S. at 561 n.12 (dictum) (same); see § 12.15(a) supra. A physical examination that is extremely abusive, degrading, or unfair may violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. See Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952); Taglavor v. United States, 291 F.2d 262 (9th Cir. 1961) (alternative ground); United States v. Townsend, 151 F. Supp. 378 (D. D.C. 1957). See also Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2470 (2015) (clarifying that when “an individual detained in a jail prior to trial” brings a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against “jail officers, alleging that they used excessive force against him, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause,” the detainee needs not show that “the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable,” and instead needs show “only that the officers’ use of that force was objectively unreasonable”). Finally, to an extent that is not yet clear, tests and examinations whose reliability depends upon careful administration are impermissible if conducted in the absence of counsel and without a valid waiver of the right to counsel, following the initiation of adversary judicial proceedings. See Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. at 763 n.6 (reserving the question). Compare United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967), and Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220 (1977), with Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 267 (1967); and see §§ 24.13, 25.06 infra.

Part C. Police Entry and Search of Dwellings or Other Premises

§ 23.15 THE THRESHOLD ISSUE: RESPONDENT’S EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY

§ 23.15(a) Introduction to the Concept of Constitutionally Protected Interests and “Standing” To Raise Fourth Amendment Claims

In the preceding discussion of arrests and Terry stops, it was unnecessary to deal with the question whether the police conduct adversely affected any constitutionally protected interest of the respondent. A respondent always has a sufficient interest in the privacy and security of his or her own body to provide a basis for challenging a seizure of the person in the form of an arrest or a Terry stop or to challenge a search of the person incident to an arrest or stop. See, e.g., People v. Burton, 6 N.Y.3d 584, 588, 848 N.E.2d 454, 457, 815 N.Y.S.2d 7, 10 (2006). When addressing issues raised by searches of dwellings or other premises, however, it becomes necessary to inquire whether the respondent has the kind of relationship to the premises that permits him or her to complain if the Constitution is violated in searching them.

Prior to Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978), this inquiry was framed in terms of whether a criminal defendant or juvenile respondent had “standing” to challenge the violation. Rakas changed the terminology to “whether the disputed search and seizure has infringed an interest of the defendant which the Fourth Amendment was designed to protect.” Id. at 140. See also United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. 727, 731-32 (1980); United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 95 (1980); Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 104-06 (1980). But Rakas also recognized that this terminological change would seldom affect either the nature of the traditional inquiry or its result, 439 U.S. at 138-39; and the term “standing” continues to be used in some jurisdictions as a convenient label for the Rakas determination that a particular respondent “is entitled to contest the legality of [the law enforcement conduct which s/he challenges as the basis for invoking the exclusionary rule],” Rakas, 439 U.S. at 140. See United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. at 731.
“... Expectations of privacy protected by the Fourth Amendment... need not be based on a common-law interest in real or personal property, or on the invasion of such an interest.'... Still, ‘property concepts’ are instructive in ‘determining the presence or absence of the privacy interests protected by that Amendment.’... ¶ Indeed, more recent Fourth Amendment cases have clarified that the test most often associated with legitimate expectations of privacy, which was derived from the second Justice Harlan’s concurrence in Katz v. United States, 389 U. S. 347 (1967), supplements, rather than displaces, ‘the traditional property-based understanding of the Fourth Amendment.’” (Byrd v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1518, 1526 (2018.).)

“Although the Court has not set forth a single metric or exhaustive list of considerations to resolve the circumstances in which a person can be said to have a reasonable expectation of privacy, it has explained that ‘[l]egitimation of expectations of privacy by law must have a source outside of the Fourth Amendment, either by reference to concepts of real or personal property law or to understandings that are recognized and permitted by society.’... The two concepts... are often linked. ‘One of the main rights attaching to property is the right to exclude others,’ and, in the main, ‘one who owns or lawfully possesses or controls property will in all likelihood have a legitimate expectation of privacy by virtue of the right to exclude.’” (Id. at 1527.)

But “privacy” interests not linked to the possession of any “property” are also protected. “[W]hile property rights are often informative, our cases by no means suggest that such an interest is ‘fundamental’ or ‘dispositive’ in determining which expectations of privacy are legitimate.” Carpenter v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2206, 2214 n.1 (2018). After repeating that “no single rubric definitively resolves which expectations of privacy are entitled to protection” (id. at 2213-14), the Court in Carpenter observed that:

“the analysis is informed by historical understandings ‘of what was deemed an unreasonable search and seizure when [the Fourth Amendment] was adopted.’... On this score, our cases have recognized some basic guideposts. First, that the Amendment seeks to secure ‘the privacies of life’ against ‘arbitrary power.’... Second, and relatedly, that a central aim of the Framers was ‘to place obstacles in the way of a too permeating police surveillance.’” (Id. at 2214.)

Applying these concepts, Carpenter held that “the Government conducts a search under the Fourth Amendment when it accesses historical cell phone records that provide a comprehensive chronicle of the user’s past movements” (id. at 2211).

§ 23.15(b) Expectation of Privacy; Areas in Which a Respondent Will Ordinarily Be Deemed To Have the Requisite Expectation

In the context of searches of premises, a juvenile respondent’s “standing” will almost always depend upon showing that s/he had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the premises.
This is so because the two principal kinds of constitutionally protected interests that anyone can have in real property are privacy interests and possessory interests; and a juvenile will seldom be the legal possessor of real property. Thus, as a practical matter, the test of a respondent’s right to base a suppression claim upon an unconstitutional search of premises is whether the respondent “had an interest in connection with the searched premises that gave rise to ‘a reasonable expectation [on his or her part] of freedom from governmental intrusion’ upon those premises.”

Combs v. United States, 408 U.S. 224, 227 (1972). An individual may have “a legitimate expectation of privacy in the premises he was using and therefore . . . claim the protection of the Fourth Amendment with respect to a governmental invasion of those premises, even though his ‘interest’ in those premises might not have been a recognized property interest at common law.” Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. at 143 (dictum). When the respondent’s relationship to searched premises is such that s/he “could legitimately expect privacy in the areas which were the subject of the search and seizure [that s/he seeks] . . . to contest,” s/he is entitled to challenge the legality of the search and seizure. Id. at 149 (dictum).

All of the following are examples of premises for which the respondent can claim the requisite expectation of privacy:

(i) The respondent’s home. See, e.g., Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 31 (2001) (“At the very core’ of the Fourth Amendment ‘stands the right of a man to retreat into his home and there be free from unreasonable governmental intrusion.’”); Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 610 (1999) (“The Fourth Amendment embodies [the] centuries-old principle of respect for the privacy of the home”); United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 714 (1984) (“[a]t the risk of belaboring the obvious, private residences are places in which the individual normally expects privacy free of governmental intrusion not authorized by a warrant, and that expectation is plainly one that society is prepared to recognize as justifiable”); United States v. Johnson, 457 U.S. 537, 552 n.13 (1982) (“the Fourth Amendment accords special protection to the home”); Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663, 1670 (2018); Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 589-90 (1980); Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. 83, 99 (1998) (Justice Kennedy, concurring) (“it is beyond dispute that the home is entitled to special protection as the center of the private lives of our people”); Commonwealth v. Porter P., 456 Mass. 254, 260-61 & n.5, 923 N.E.2d 36, 44-45 & n.5 (2010) (juvenile had a reasonable expectation of privacy in, and standing to challenge a search of, the “room that the juvenile and his mother shared at the shelter,” which was “their home” even though it was “a transitional living space,” and even though “he did not own the room,” “he was limited in his use of the room,” and “shelter staff members had a master key and could enter the room for ‘professional business purposes’”). See also State v. Brown, 216 N.J. 508, 517, 529, 535-36, 83 A.3d 45, 50, 57, 61 (2014) (“in determining whether a defendant has a possessory or proprietary interest in a building or residence and therefore standing to object to a warrantless search” under the New Jersey Constitution when the state asserts that “the building was abandoned or, alternatively, . . . [that the defendant was a] trespasser[ ],” “the focus must be whether, in light of the totality of the circumstances, a police officer had an objectively reasonable basis to conclude that a building was abandoned or a defendant was a trespasser before the officer entered or searched the home”; “the record supports the trial court’s finding that the State did not meet its burden of . . . establish[ing] that the property [“a dilapidated row house in the City of Camden’’], although in decrepit condition [“with one or more windows broken, the interior in disarray, the front door padlocked, and the back door off its hinges but propped closed’’], was abandoned or that defendants were trespassers”; “The constitutional protections afforded to the home make no distinction between a manor estate in an affluent town and a ramshackle hovel in an impoverished city.’’). Compare United States v. Knights, 534 U.S. 112, 114, 119-20, 121 (2001) (an individual who was placed on probation pursuant to a California statute that establishes a probation condition that the probationer will “‘[s]ubmit his . . . person, property, place of residence, vehicle, personal effects, to search at anytime, with or without a search warrant, warrant of arrest or reasonable cause by any probation officer or law enforcement officer,’’ and who signed a probation order agreeing to abide by this condition, had a “significantly diminished . . . reasonable expectation of privacy” in his home and was subject to a search of the home based on “reasonable suspicion that [the] probationer . . . is engaged in criminal activity”), with Jones v. State, 282 Ga. 784, 787-88, 653 S.E.2d 456, 459 (2007) (Knights rule is inapplicable because the State has not identified any “valid law, legally authorized regulation, or sentencing order” that limited the defendant’s “right not to have his home searched without a warrant” as a result of his probationary status and that provided him with adequate “notice of that deprivation of rights”), and United States v. Lara, 815 F.3d 605, 607, 611-12 (9th Cir. 2016) (the probation agreement that the defendant signed, authorizing the state to search his “‘person and property, including any residence, premises, [or] container,’” did not authorize the probation officers’ “warrantless, suspicionless searches of his cell phone” during a search of his home; the defendant’s “privacy interest in his cell phone and the data it contained . . . was substantial in light of the broad amount of data contained in, or accessible through, his cell phone,” and the probation agreement did not “clear[ly] and unequivocal[ly] . . . authoriz[e] . . . cell phone searches”), and with State v. Ochoa, 792 N.W.2d 260, 291 (Iowa 2010) (relying on the state constitution to hold that a parolee had an undiminished privacy right to challenge a police search of his motel room).

(ii) An unleased room that is occupied from time to time by the respondent, in rental property owned by the respondent’s parents. Murray v. United States, 380 U.S. 527 (1965) (per curiam), vacating 333 F.2d 409 (10th Cir. 1964); People v. Hill, 153 A.D.3d 413, 416, 60 N.Y.S.3d 23, 27 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2017) (the defendant had standing to challenge a police search of his uncle’s “apartment and surrounding curtilage” because the defendant “had stayed with his [uncle’s] family ‘on and off’ since he was five years old,” and, “although [the] defendant did not have his own room in the apartment and slept on the couch, he stored all of his clothes in the living room, and received mail at the apartment”). See also United States v. Murphy, 516 F.3d 1117, 1124 (9th Cir. 2008), superseded on another issue by Fernandez v. California, 134 S. Ct. 1126 (2014) (the rent-paying lessor of various storage units “testified that he allowed Murphy to stay in the storage units [rent-free] . . . and gave him a key that opened all of the units”; “Murphy's living situation was unconventional, but the record shows that the storage units were the closest thing that he had to a residence. He was sleeping in unit 14 and storing his belongings in unit 17. For the purposes of the Fourth Amendment, this is sufficient to create an expectation of privacy and thus the authority to refuse a search.”).
(iii) A home that the respondent is visiting as a social guest at the invitation of the homeowner or another resident. See Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. at 109 n.2 (Justice Ginsburg, dissenting) (explaining that although the Court majority ruled that there was no reasonable expectation of privacy under the facts of the case, it is “noteworthy that five Members of the Court [one of whom joined the majority opinion and also issued a concurring opinion, one of whom concurred in the judgment, and three of whom dissented] would place under the Fourth Amendment’s shield, at least, “almost all social guests”” (quoting id. at 99 (Justice Kennedy, concurring)); In the Matter of Welfare of B.R.K., 658 N.W.2d 565, 572-78 (Minn. 2003) (a juvenile who was one of fourteen participants in a post-graduation evening drinking party at the home of a friend was “was a short-term social guest” entitled to Fourth Amendment protection even though he “does not contend that he was an overnight guest” and although the party was not authorized by the friend’s parents); State v. Talkington, 301 Kan. 453, 483, 345 P.3d 258, 278-79 (2015) (defendant had “a reasonable expectation of privacy as a social guest in his host’s residence,” which extended to “standing to assert a reasonable, subjective expectation of privacy in the backyard, i.e., curtilage, of his host’s residence”). See also Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91, 98 (1990) (accused had a reasonable expectation of privacy in a friend’s duplex in which he was “[s]taying overnight” as a “houseguest”); Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257 (1960), as explained in Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. at 141, and Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. at 89-90 (majority opinion). Cf. id. at 102 (Justice Kennedy, concurring) (although, “as a general rule, social guests will have an expectation of privacy in their host’s home,” “[t]hat is not the case before us” in that “respondents have established nothing more than a fleeting and insubstantial connection with . . . [the] home,” they were using the “house simply as a convenient processing station” for packaging cocaine, they had never “engaged in confidential communications with [the homeowner] . . . about their transaction,” they “had not been to . . . [the] apartment before, and [they]. . . left it even before their arrest”).

(iv) A hotel room in which the respondent is staying, however temporarily or sporadically. Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483 (1964); United States v. Jeffers, 342 U.S. 48 (1951) (hotel room rented by defendant’s aunts, who had given defendant a key and permission to use the room at will; he “often entered the room for various purposes” (id. at 50)).

(v) In the case of respondents who are employed, their office or work area, even if it is shared with other employees, O’Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709, 714-19 (1987) (public employee’s office); United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U.S. 452 (1932) (business office); Marshall v. Barlow’s, Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 311-15 (1978) (employees’ work areas in factory building); Mancusi v. DeForte, 392 U.S. 364 (1968) (union office shared by defendant and other union officials); Villano v. United States, 310 F.2d 680 (10th Cir. 1962), limited on other grounds in United States v. Price, 925 F.2d 1268 (10th Cir. 1991) (employee’s desk in retail store); United States v. Blok, 188 F.2d 1019 (D.C. Cir. 1951) (employee’s desk in government office).

(vi) “Public” places in which it is customary to allow temporary exclusive occupancy with a measure of privacy, such as taxicabs, Rios v. United States, 364 U.S. 253, 262 n.6 (1960); but cf. Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. at 149 n.16 (dictum), pay telephone booths, Katz v. United

For discussion of privacy rights in the interior of automobiles, see § 23.23 infra.

§ 23.15(c) “Curtilage” and “Open Fields”; Multifamily Apartment Complexes

In determining whether any particular area is or is not within the curtilage, “the extent of the curtilage is determined by factors that bear upon whether an individual reasonably may expect that the area in question should be treated as the home itself. . . . [C]urtilage questions should be resolved with particular reference to four factors: the proximity of the area claimed to be curtilage to the home, whether the area is included within an enclosure surrounding the home, the nature of the uses to which the area is put, and the steps taken by the resident to protect the area from observation by people passing by. . . . [T]hese factors are useful analytic tools . . . to the degree that, in any given case, they bear upon the centrally relevant consideration – whether the area in question is so intimately tied to the home itself that it should be placed under the home’s ‘umbrella’ of Fourth Amendment protection.” United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. at 300-01. Applying this four-part analysis in Dunn, the Court concluded that “the area near a barn, located approximately 50 yards from a fence surrounding a ranch house” (id. at 296) and “60 yards from the house itself” (id. at 302) “lay outside the curtilage of the ranch house” (id. at 301) and was not entitled to Fourth Amendment protection because (i) “the substantial distance” from not only the house but also the fence surrounding the house “supports no inference that the barn should be treated as an adjunct of the house,” id. at 302; (ii) “[v]iewing the physical layout of respondent’s ranch in its entirety, . . . it is plain that the fence surrounding the residence serves to demark a specific area of land immediately adjacent to the house that is readily identifiable as part and parcel of the house,” and the area in question “stands out as a distinct portion of respondent’s ranch, quite separate from the residence” (id.); (iii) “the law enforcement officials possessed objective data indicating . . . that the use to which the barn was being put could not fairly be characterized as so associated with the activities and privacies of domestic life that the officers should have deemed the barn as part of respondent’s home” (id. at 302-03); and (iv) “respondent did little to protect the barn area from observation by those standing in the open fields . . . [since] the fences were designed and constructed to corral livestock, not to prevent persons from observing what lay inside the enclosed areas,” id. at 303. Compare Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663 (2018) (holding that a police officer made a warrantless and hence unconstitutional entry into the curtilage of a home when he walked down the driveway adjacent to a residence and inspected a tarp-covered motorcycle which he had reason to believe was stolen and had outrun police in two traffic-violation incidents; the location is described by the Court as follows: “[T]he driveway runs alongside the front lawn and up a few yards past the front perimeter of the house. The top portion of the driveway that sits behind the front perimeter of the house is enclosed on two sides by a brick wall about the height of a car and on a third side by the house. A side door provides direct access between this partially enclosed section of the driveway and the house. . . . [T]he motorcycle . . . was parked inside this partially enclosed top portion of the driveway that abuts the house.” Id. at 1670-71. “[T]he Fourth Amendment’s protection of curtilage has long been black letter law.’ . . . [T]he Court considers curtilage – ‘the area “immediately surrounding and associated with the home”’ – to be “part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes.’ . . . ¶ When a law enforcement officer physically intrudes on the curtilage to gather evidence, a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment has occurred. . . . Such conduct thus is presumptively unreasonable absent a warrant.” Id. at 1670.). Cf. United States v. Jones, 893 F.3d 66, 2018 WL 3028685 (2d Cir. June 19, 2018), distinguishing Collins and upholding a warrantless search of a truck parked in a multi-family parking lot: “The lot was a common area accessible to other tenants of 232 Westland Street and to tenants of a multi-family building next door, and therefore Jones could not reasonably expect that it should be treated as part of his private home.” Id., 2018 WL 3028685, at ¶4.

In the urban context, application of the four-part test of United States v. Dunn will ordinarily produce the result that “curtilage” is coextensive with a fenced yard. See Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. at 182 n.12 (“for most homes, the boundaries of the curtilage will be clearly marked”); California v. Ciralo, 476 U.S. 207, 212-13 (1986) (treating the area within a fenced yard as curtilage under an analysis that anticipates Dunn’s); Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 430 F.3d 140, 156-58 (3d Cir. 2005); People v. Morris, 126 A.D.3d 813, 814, 4 N.Y.S.3d 305, 307 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015); People v. Theodore, 114 A.D.3d 814, 816-17, 980 N.Y.S.2d 148, 151 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2014). This is consistent with pre-Dunn caselaw. See, e.g., Weaver v. United States, 295 F.2d 360 (5th Cir 1961); Hobson v. United States, 226 F.2d 890 (8th Cir. 1955); State v. Parker, 399 So. 2d 24 (Fla. App. 1981), review denied, 408 So. 2d 1095 (Fla. 1981); People v. Pakula, 89 Ill. App. 3d 789, 411 N.E.2d 1385, 44 Ill. Dec. 919 (1980). Separate closed structures on residential property – garages, for example – are generally held protected by the Fourth Amendment without reference to the ordinary indicia of “curtilage,” such as fencing in. Taylor v. United States, 286 U.S. 1 (1932); see, e.g., State v. Daugherty, 94 Wash. 2d 263, 616 P.2d 649 (1980). See also Commonwealth v. Ousley, 393 S.W.3d 15, 27-29 (Ky. 2013) (trash cans, which were “sitting on the driveway very near the home,” were within the “curtilage” even though “the area in question” was not “enclosed by a fence”: “The home was in an urban area that does not lend itself to enclosures” and a resident’s decision to forego fencing “(for example, because the lot on which his home sits is small) cannot deprive him of having curtilage surrounding his home”); United States v. Alexander, 888 F.3d 628 (2d Cir. 2018) (backyard area in front of a shed a few steps from the back door of defendant's residence, accessible from the street by traversing defendant’s driveway, which he used for parking, barbecues and relaxation is Fourth-Amendment protected curtilage); State v. Chute, 908 N.W.2d 578, 585 (Minn. 2018) (applying the four-part test of United States v. Dunn, supra, to conclude that “the area of Chute’s backyard on which the [stolen] camper [trailer] was parked” was within the curtilage of Chute’s home because “[t]he part of Chute’s dirt driveway on which the trailer was parked is in close proximity to his suburban home”; “[a]erial photographs admitted at trial show that the backyard and dirt driveway are bordered on three sides by a tall, opaque fence on the east side, quite close to where the trailer was parked, a wooded area with a pond to the south, and trees to the west side”; “the driveway and turnaround were regularly used by cars carrying persons seeking a back door entrance to the house and garage,” and “Chute stored scrap materials near the turnaround,” and “in the center of th[e] turnaround was a fire pit with a horizontal log upon which persons could sit to enjoy a fire,” and “[t]hese activities are closely related to the home and associated with the privacies of life”; and, although “the dirt driveway where the camper was parked is visible from County Road D if an observer stands at its northern end and looks directly down it[,] . . . [t]he curtilage of a home . . . need not be completely shielded from public view”); State v. Kruse, 306 S.W.3d 603, 611-12 (Mo. App. 2010) (“The State argues that Kruse did not have an expectation of privacy in his backyard. The State notes that there were no gates or objects to hinder entrance into the backyard. Nothing obstructed a person’s view into the back yard except the buildings. There appears to be a well-travelled route from the driveway to the rear of the property, marked by large pieces of wood resembling railroad ties. The two ‘no trespassing’ signs were posted on doors, which the State says implies that access was denied to the interior of the residence or shed without permission. ¶ We cannot agree that there was no expectation of privacy in the backyard. The officers arrived at the Kruse residence after midnight. No exterior lights were on to welcome the public to come on the premises. The entrance to the residence is in the front yard. The ‘no trespassing’ signs would ordinarily be understood to assert a privacy interest on the entire property. The back yard could not be seen from the road and was not in plain view. The back yard and backdoor were enclosed by trees on three sides and the home on the fourth side. ¶ By entering into the back yard, the police were entering onto property as to which there was a privacy interest protected by the Fourth Amendment”). Cf. Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348 (2014) (per curiam) (dealing inconclusively with a situation that might have stirred “curtilage” issues).

With respect to tenants living in multifamily apartment complexes, some courts have viewed their “curtilage” as very limited. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Thomas, 358 Mass. 771, 774-75, 267 N.E.2d 489, 491 (1971). However, if the building is secured against entry by the general public, then any of the tenants may be able to rely upon the collective expectation of privacy in the corridors and hallways (e.g., United States v. Heath, 259 F.3d 522 (6th Cir. 2001); United States v. Carriger, 541 F.2d 545, 549-52 (6th Cir. 1976); United States v. Booth, 455 A.2d 1351 (D.C. 1983); see also United States v. Whitaker, 820 F.3d 849, 853-54 (7th Cir. 2016) (although the defendant, who lived in a multi-apartment building with “closed hallways,” did not have “a reasonable expectation of complete privacy in the hallway,” this “does not also mean that he had no reasonable expectation of privacy against persons in the hallway snooping into his apartment using sensitive devices not available to the general public”; accordingly, the “police engaged in a warrantless search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment when they had a drug-sniffing dog come to the door of the apartment and search for the scent of illegal drugs”), and the basement (e.g., Garrison v. State, 28 Md. App. 257, 345 A.2d 86 (1975)). Compare McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451 (1948), with United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294 (1987). Similarly, if the back yard to the building is not accessible to the general public, and particularly if it is surrounded by a fence, the back yard area may be “sufficiently removed and private in character that [a tenant] . . . could reasonably expect privacy,” Fixel v. Wainwright, 492 F.2d 480, 484 (5th Cir. 1974). See also United States v. Burston, 806 F.3d 1123, 1125, 1127-28 (8th Cir. 2015) (even though the defendant lived in an “eight-unit apartment building,” and even though the lawn in front of his apartment window “was not in an enclosed area” and “the public [was not] physically prevented from entering or looking at that area other than by the physical obstruction of . . . [a] bush,” the court nonetheless classifies the area as curtilage under the four-part analysis of United States v. Dunn, supra, because the area “was in close proximity to Burston’s apartment — six to ten inches”; “Burston made personal use of the area by setting up a cooking grill between the door and his window”; and “[o]ne function of the bush,” which was “planted in the area in front of the window, [and] which partially covered the window,” “was likely to prevent close inspection of Burston’s window by passersby”). Counsel urging these results can argue that, in light of the established principle that “the Fourth Amendment accords special protection to the home,” United States v. Johnson, 457 U.S. 537, 552 n.13 (1982); see, e.g., Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 559 (2004); Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 31 (2001); Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 610 (1999); Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 748 (1984); Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. at 6; Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. 83, 99 (1998) (Justice Kennedy, concurring), it would be anomalous to deny at least as much protection to shared residential facilities as is given to shared workplace facilities (see § 23.15(b) subdivision (v) supra).

The Fourth Amendment’s protection of the home and its “curtilage” does not extend to “the open fields.” United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. at 300; Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. at 180; Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57 (1924). “[O]pen fields do not provide the setting for those intimate activities that the [Fourth] Amendment is intended to shelter from government interference or surveillance. There is no societal interest in protecting the privacy of those activities, such as the cultivation of crops, that occur in open fields. Moreover, as a practical matter these lands usually are accessible to the public and the police in ways that a home, an office, or commercial structure would not be. It is not generally true that fences or ‘No Trespassing’ signs effectively bar the public from viewing open fields in rural areas.” Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. at 179.

Moreover, if a police officer, while situated in an “open field” – or in any area accessible to the general public – engages in “naked-eye observation of the curtilage” (California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 213 (1986)), that observation is not treated as a “search” subject to Fourth Amendment restrictions. See §§ 23.16, 23.22(b) infra.

§ 23.15(d) Police Search or Seizure of an Object Belonging to the Respondent from Premises in Which the Respondent Has No Privacy Interest

Even if the respondent does not have a privacy interest in any premises searched by the police, s/he may nevertheless challenge a police examination or seizure of an object during a police search of the premises if the respondent is the owner of that object. As the Court observed in United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 113 (1984), “an individual’s possessory interests in [a certain piece of] . . . property” confers upon that individual a Fourth Amendment right to challenge a police officer’s “meaningful interference with [his or her] . . . possessory interests in that property.” Id. Thus, in Jacobsen, the Court concluded that the defendant had the requisite privacy interest to challenge government agents’ assertion of control over, and search of, a package which the defendant had consigned to a private freight carrier, even though the defendant obviously had no privacy interest in the Federal Express office where the search took place. Id. at 114-15. See also, e.g., Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 374 n.3 (2009); Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334, 336-37, 338-39 (2000); Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649 (1980); Recchia v. City of Los Angeles Department of Animal Services, 889 F.3d 533 (9th Cir. 2018) (a homeless person stated a valid claim of Fourth Amendment violation when animal control officers without a warrant seized twenty pet birds which he kept in covered cardboard boxes and cages on the public sidewalk); United States v. Barber, 777 F.3d 1303, 1305 (11th Cir. 2015) (passenger in a car stopped by the police had standing to challenge the search of the bag at his feet, “even if he lacked standing to contest the search of the car,” because it was “his bag” and he “had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his bag”); State v. Crane, 329 P.3d 689, 694-95 (N.M. 2014) (construing the state constitution to hold that a motel occupant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in garbage that was placed in “opaque garbage bags,” which were “sealed from plain view . . . [and] placed directly in the dumpster, rather than being left in the motel room for disposal by the housekeeping staff”).

The individual’s privacy interest in objects that s/he owns extends to “[l]etters and other sealed packages [since these objects] are in the general class of effects in which the public at large has a legitimate expectation of privacy.” United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. at 114. See also Love v. State, 2016 WL 7131259, at *6 (Tex. Crim. App. Dec. 7, 2016) (“appellant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of the text messages he sent,” and “[c]onsequently, the State was prohibited from compelling Metro PCS to turn over appellant’s content-based communications without first obtaining a warrant supported by probable cause”); “Text messages are analogous to regular mail and email communications. Like regular mail and email, a text message has an ‘outside address “visible” to the third-party carriers that transmit it to its intended location, and also a package of content that the sender presumes will be read only by the intended recipient.’”). This is the case as well for the contents of a cell phone. See Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473, 2494-95 (2014) (discussed in § 23.08(b) supra) (“Modern cell phones[,] . . . [w]ith all they contain and all they may reveal, . . . hold for many Americans ‘the privacies of life’” (quoting Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 630 (1886))); United States v. Lopez-Cruz, 730 F.3d 803, 805-06, 808 (9th Cir. 2013) (pre-Riley decision holding that the defendant, whose car was stopped by border patrol agents and who agreed to the agents’ request to inspect and search two cell phones that the defendant identified as belonging to a friend of his,
“had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the phones” and could challenge an agent’s actions in accepting an incoming call and “passing himself as Lopez” and thereby obtaining information that incriminated Lopez: “Lopez had possession of the phones and was using them. He certainly had the right to exclude others from using the phones. He also had a reasonable expectation of privacy in incoming calls and a reasonable expectation that the contents of those calls ‘would remain free from governmental intrusion.’”); State v. Peoples, 240 Ariz. 244, 246, 248-49, 378 P.3d 421, 423, 425-26 (2016) (“an overnight guest who left his cell phone in his host’s apartment . . . did not lose his expectation of privacy in his phone” by leaving “his cell phone behind when he ran from the apartment to direct paramedics” even though “numerous other individuals were present [in the apartment], including police officers,” and this privacy expectation also was not diluted on the ground that “no passcode was required to activate” the phone since “personal belongings need not be locked for a legitimate expectation of privacy to exist” and “[c]ell phones are intrinsically private, and the failure to password protect access to them is not an invitation for others to snoop”); State v. K.C., 207 So.3d 951 (Fla. App. 2016) (discussed in § 23.13 subdivision (d) supra). See also Tracey v. Florida, 152 So. 3d 504, 522, 525-26 (Fla. 2014) (an individual has a reasonable “expectation of privacy of location as signaled by one’s cell phone – even on public roads”; “Simply because the cell phone user knows or should know that his cell phone gives off signals that enable the service provider to detect its location for call routing purposes, and which enable cell phone applications to operate for navigation, weather reporting, and other purposes, does not mean that the user is consenting to use of that location information by third parties for any other unrelated purposes.”; because “no warrant based on probable cause authorized the use of Tracey’s real time cell site location information to track him,” police officers’ use of “cell site location information emanating from his cell phone in order to track him in real time” was an unlawful search and “the evidence obtained as a result of that search was subject to suppression.”); Jones v. United States, 168 A.3d 703, 713 (D.C. 2017) (police “use of a cell-site simulator to locate . . . [the defendant’s] phone invaded a reasonable expectation of privacy and was thus a search” that violated the Fourth Amendment in the absence of a search warrant); Commonwealth v. Augustine, 467 Mass. 230, 231, 232, 4 N.E.3d 846, 849, 850 (2014) (construing the state constitution to hold that the state must obtain a search warrant in order to acquire “historical cell site location information for a particular cellular telephone” from “a cellular telephone service provider”; the court observes that although the information “at issue here is a business record of the defendant’s cellular service provider, he had a reasonable expectation of privacy in it”); State v. Earls, 214 N.J. 564, 569, 70 A.3d 630, 633 (2013) (construing the state constitution to hold that “cell-phone users have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their cell-phone location information, and that police must obtain a search warrant before accessing that information”); State v. Reid, 194 N.J. 386, 399, 945 A.2d 26, 33-34 (2008) (state constitution “protects an individual’s privacy interest in the subscriber information he or she provides to an Internet service provider”). But see City of Ontario v. Quon, 560 U.S. 746, 761-62 (2010) (upholding a police department’s review of text messages sent and received on a government-owned pager that was issued to a police officer and that was reviewed by the department for the purpose of “determin[ing] whether [the officer’s] overages were the result of work-related messaging or personal use,” where the officer had been given advance notice “that his [text] messages were subject to auditing”).

634
§ 23.15(e)  “Automatic Standing”

In some States, criminal defendants and juvenile respondents have “automatic standing” to challenge seizures of contraband whenever they are charged with possession of that contraband; they need not show any proprietary interest or expectation of privacy in the place from which the contraband was seized. This “automatic standing” rule was the law of the Fourth Amendment before United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83 (1980). When the Supreme Court abolished it in Salvucci, some state courts responded by reinstating the rule as a matter of state constitutional law. E.g., State v. Settle, 122 N.H. 214, 447 A.2d 1284 (1982); Commonwealth v. Porter P., 456 Mass. 254, 261 n.5, 923 N.E.2d 36, 45 n.5 (2010); State v. Alston, 88 N.J. 211, 440 A.2d 1311 (1981); Commonwealth v. Sell, 504 Pa. 46, 470 A.2d 457 (1983); State v. Simpson, 95 Wash. 2d 170, 622 P.2d 1199 (1980); see also People v. Millan, 69 N.Y.2d 514, 508 N.E.2d 903, 516 N.Y.S.2d 168 (1987) (adopting a version of automatic standing that grants standing whenever a charge of criminal possession is based upon a statutory presumption of constructive possession). In States that have not reconsidered the “automatic standing” issue since Salvucci, counsel should draw upon the reasoning of these decisions to urge the state courts to restore “automatic standing.” See § 7.09 supra.

§ 23.16 POLICE ENTRY OF PREMISES: GENERAL PRINCIPLES

An entry into a building is a “search” within the Fourth Amendment. Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319, 325 (1979). See Sause v. Bauer, 138 S. Ct. 2561, 2563 (2018) (per curiam). To be constitutional, any police entry of a building must either: (i) be authorized by a search warrant, see § 23.17 infra; or (ii) “fall[] within one of the narrow and well-delineated exceptions to the warrant requirement” (Flippo v. West Virginia, 528 U.S. 11, 13 (1999) (quoting Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 357 (1967)), see §§ 23.18-23.20 infra. E.g., Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 559 (2004) (“Because “‘the right of a man to retreat into his own home and there be free from unreasonable governmental intrusion’” stands “‘[a]t the very core’ of the Fourth Amendment,’ . . . , our cases have firmly established the “‘basic principle of Fourth Amendment law’” that searches and seizures inside a home without a warrant are presumptively unreasonable” (quoting Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 586 (1980))); id. at 590 (“the Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house”); Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 31 (2001) (“With few exceptions, the question whether a warrantless search of a home is reasonable and hence constitutional must be answered no.”); United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 714-15 (1984) (“[s]earches and seizures inside a home without a warrant are presumptively unreasonable absent exigent circumstances”); Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 750 (1984) (a “presumption of unreasonableness . . . attaches to all warrantless home entries”); Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1, 6 (2013) (“when it comes to the Fourth Amendment, the home is first among equals”). See also State v. Jackson, 742 N.W.2d 163, 177 (Minn. 2007) (“in order to be constitutionally reasonable, nighttime searches [of the home] require additional justification beyond the probable cause required for a daytime search”); State v. Gill, 755 N.W.2d 454, 459-60 (N.D. 2008) (joining several federal circuits in holding that warrantless entries of a home cannot be justified by a so-called “community caretaking function of law enforcement officers”).
Entries and inspections of commercial premises are the subject of specialized canons of Fourth Amendment doctrine usually identified by the rubrics “searches of licensed dealers in regulated industries” and “administrative searches.” Warrantless entries and inspections are permissible in the case of a few “pervasively regulated business[es],” . . . and . . . ‘closely regulated’ industries ‘long subject to close supervision and inspection,’’ Marshall v. Barlow’s Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 313 (1978), but this category is a narrow one. See Los Angeles v. Patel, 135 S. Ct. 2443, 2454-55 (2015) (“Over the past 45 years, the Court has identified only four industries that ‘have such a history of government oversight that no reasonable expectation of privacy ... could exist for a proprietor over the stock of such an enterprise,’ Barlow’s, Inc., 436 U.S., at 313 . . . . Simply listing these industries refutes petitioner’s argument that hotels should be counted among them. Unlike liquor sales, Colonnade Catering Corp. v. United States, 397 U.S. 72 . . . (1970), firearms dealing, United States v. Biswell, 406 U.S. 311 . . . (1972), mining, Donovan v. Dewey, 452 U.S. 594 . . . (1981), or running an automobile junkyard, New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691 . . . (1987), nothing inherent in the operation of hotels poses a clear and significant risk to the public welfare. ¶ Moreover, ‘[t]he clear import of our cases is that the closely regulated industry . . . is the exception.’”). For a detailed discussion of the regulated-industries doctrine and its limits, see Liberty Coins, LLC v. Goodman, 880 F.3d 274 (6th Cir. 2018). For “administrative” searches and inspections of other sorts of business premises and commercial enterprises, a search warrant or subpoena is required but may be issued without an individualized showing of cause. Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523 (1967); See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541 (1967). What is required in these latter cases, “in order for an administrative search to be constitutional, [is that] the subject of the search must be afforded an opportunity to obtain precompliance review before a neutral decisionmaker.” Los Angeles v. Patel, 135 S. Ct. at 2452. See, e.g., Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 507-08 (1978) (“To secure a warrant to investigate the cause of a fire, an official must show more than the bare fact that a fire has occurred. The magistrate’s duty is to assure that the proposed search will be reasonable, a determination that requires inquiry into the need for the intrusion on the one hand, and the threat of disruption to the occupant on the other. For routine building inspections, a reasonable balance between these competing concerns is usually achieved by broad legislative or administrative guidelines specifying the purpose, frequency, scope, and manner of conducting the inspections. In the context of investigatory fire searches, which are not programmatic but are responsive to individual events, a more particularized inquiry may be necessary. The number of prior entries, the scope of the search, the time of day when it is proposed to be made, the lapse of time since the fire, the continued use of the building, and the owner’s efforts to secure it against intruders might all be relevant factors. Even though a fire victim’s privacy must normally yield to the vital social objective of ascertaining the cause of the fire, the magistrate can perform the important function of preventing harassment by keeping that invasion to a minimum.”).

If a police entry of a building violates the applicable Fourth Amendment rules, all observations made by the police within the building and all objects seized by the entering officers are excludable. Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10 (1948); Chapman v. United States, 365 U.S. 610 (1961); Work v. United States, 243 F.2d 660 (D.C. Cir. 1957); United States v. Merritt, 293 F.2d 742 (3d Cir. 1961). Evidence derived from these observations or things is also
The concept of a “search” also encompasses situations in which police officers, although not physically entering an area, use artificial contrivances like peepholes or electronic surveillance equipment to extend their presence into a private area. See, e.g., Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505 (1961); Regalado v. California, 374 U.S. 497 (1963) (per curiam); United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 714 (1984); Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. at 34-35, 40; United States v. Jones, 565 U.S. 400, 404-05, 409 (2012); cf. Grady v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 1368, 1370-71 (2015) (per curiam). See also Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. at 11-12 (“The government’s use of trained [drug-sniffing] police dogs to investigate the home and its immediate surroundings is a ‘search’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.”). If, on the other hand, the police merely used technology as a means for viewing what was exposed to observation by the public at large, then there is no “search” for Fourth Amendment purposes. See, e.g., Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730, 740 (1983) (plurality opinion) (officer’s use of flashlight to examine interior of automobile was not “search” since “the interior of an automobile . . . may be viewed from outside the vehicle by either inquisitive passersby or diligent police officers”); United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294, 305 (1987) (“the officers’ use of the beam of a flashlight, directed through the essentially open front of respondent’s barn, did not transform their observations into an unreasonable search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment”); see also, e.g., California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207, 215 (1986) (warrantless observation of marijuana plants in the fenced yard of a home, made possible because police officers flew over the yard in a private plane and observed it from an altitude of 1,000 feet, did not violate the homeowner’s reasonable expectation of privacy because the marijuana plants were “visible to the naked eye,” albeit only with the assistance of the aircraft); cf. Dow Chemical Co. v. United States, 476 U.S. 227, 237-39 (1986) (in the context of inspections of commercial property, where “the Government has ‘greater latitude,’” the Court approves the use of an aerial camera that enhanced human vision “somewhat” but was not “so revealing of intimate details as to raise constitutional concerns”; the Court notes that use of “[a]n electronic device to penetrate walls or windows so as to hear and record confidential discussions of chemical formulae or other trade secrets would raise very different and far more serious questions.”).

The basic principle in this area was established by Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 353 (1967), holding that “electronically listening to and recording . . . words [spoken in a zone of] . . . privacy upon which [a person] . . . justifiably relied” is a “search” for Fourth Amendment purposes, without regard to “the presence or absence of a physical intrusion into any given enclosure.” The principle is illustrated by comparing the decisions in United States v. Knotts, 460 U.S. 276 (1983), and United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705 (1984). In Knotts, the Court held that police officers’ tracing of the movements of an automobile by means of an electronic beeper planted in a can of chloroform purchased by a drug manufacturing suspect was not a “search” since it revealed nothing more than what could be observed through “[v]isual surveillance from public places.” 460 U.S. at 282. In Karo, the police employed the same tactic of installing an electronic beeper in a can of ether, but the can thereafter ended up inside a private home. Distinguishing the Knotts case as limited to surveillance of a public area, the Court in Karo held that “the monitoring of a beeper in a private residence, a location not open to visual surveillance, violates the Fourth Amendment rights of those who have a justifiable interest in the privacy of the residence.” 468 U.S. at 714. See also, e.g., Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27, 29, 31 (2001) (“the use of a thermal-imaging device aimed at a private home from a public street to detect relative amounts of heat within the home constitutes a ‘search’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment”: “obtaining by sense-enhancing technology any information regarding the interior of the home that could not otherwise have been obtained without physical ‘intrusion into a constitutionally protected area,’ . . . constitutes a search – at least where (as here) the technology in question is not in general public use.”). Compare United States v. Jones, 565 U.S. at 404-05, 409 (“hold[ing] that the Government’s installation of a GPS [Global-Positioning-System] device on a target’s vehicle, . . . and its use of that device to monitor the vehicle’s movements, constitutes a ‘search’” – although basing this ruling on a “common-law trespassory test” rather than “the Katz reasonable-expectation-of-privacy test” – and concluding that the government’s attachment of the GPS tracking device to the underside of Jones’ vehicle constituted a “physical intrusion” into “private property for the purpose of obtaining information” and thus a “‘search’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment when it was adopted”), with id. at 418-19, 430 (Alito, J., concurring in the judgment, joined by Ginsburg, Breyer & Kagan, JJ.) (rejecting the majority’s reliance on “18th-century tort law” and reaching the same result as the majority by “asking whether respondent’s reasonable expectations of privacy were violated by the long-term monitoring of the movements of the vehicle he drove,” and concluding that although “relatively short-term monitoring of a person’s movements on public streets accords with expectations of privacy that our society has recognized as reasonable,” “the use of longer term GPS monitoring” – such as occurred in this case, where “law enforcement agents tracked every movement that respondent made in the vehicle he was driving” for “four weeks” – “impinges on expectations of privacy” and thus constitutes a “search” for purposes of the Fourth Amendment). And see Grady v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. at 1369, 1370-71 (applying United States v. Jones to hold that a satellite-based monitoring program for recidivist sex offenders, which tracked program participants by means of a tracking device that participants were required to “wear . . . at all times,” “effect[ed] a Fourth Amendment search”: “a State . . . conducts a search when it attaches a device to a person’s body, without consent, for the purpose of tracking that individual’s movements”; “The State’s program is plainly designed to obtain information. And since it does so by physically intruding on a subject’s body, it effects a Fourth Amendment search.”).

§ 23.17 ENTRY OF PREMISES PURSUANT TO A SEARCH WARRANT

Search warrants are issued by a magistrate (or, in some jurisdictions, by a judge) in an ex parte proceeding. Defense attorneys thus are almost never in a position to contest the sufficiency of the application for a warrant before the warrant is executed. Their first opportunity to challenge a search made pursuant to a search warrant ordinarily comes after the search has been completed, the respondent arrested, and charges filed.

In United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984), and Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984), the Supreme Court limited the grounds for such challenges. Leon and Sheppard held that evidence obtained by a search conducted under a search warrant should not be suppressed if the police officers executing the warrant reasonably relied on the magistrate’s determination of probable cause in issuing the warrant, even though the magistrate’s finding of probable cause was erroneous. Leon and Sheppard are not substantive constitutional decisions; they do not modify the explicit Fourth Amendment rule that a search warrant issued without probable cause is unconstitutional (see, e.g., State v. Thompson, 419 S.C. 250, 797 S.E.2d 716 (2017)); they simply withdraw the ordinary Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule as a means of enforcing this particular constitutional command. Cf. United States v. Werdene, 883 F.3d 204 (3d Cir. 2018) (extending the good-faith doctrine to preclude the exclusion of evidence obtained under a search warrant that violated the Fourth Amendment because it exceeded the territorial jurisdiction of the issuing magistrate “and was not authorized by any positive law” (id. at 214)). See also the concluding paragraph of § 23.03 supra, describing a handful of other circumstances in which the Supreme Court has created a “good faith” exception to the exclusionary rule a là Leon and Sheppard.

In the wake of Leon and Sheppard, there are essentially seven situations in which defense counsel can seek suppression of the proceeds of a search conducted pursuant to a search warrant: (i) when the affidavit submitted in support of the issuance of the warrant states merely “‘bare bones’” conclusions, United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. at 915, 923 n.24, 926, or is “‘so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence entirely unreasonable,’” id. at 923; (ii) when the police knowingly or negligently fail to limit their application for a warrant to the pertinent unit of a multiunit building; (iii) when “the magistrate or judge in issuing a warrant was misled by information in an affidavit that the affiant knew was false or would have known was false except for his reckless disregard of the truth,” id. at 923; (iv) when the affidavit includes information obtained by an earlier unconstitutional search or seizure and this information is necessary to sustain a finding of probable cause; (v) when the magistrate who issues the warrant is not neutral and detached, thereby rendering reliance on the warrant unreasonable, id.; (vi) when the warrant is “so facially deficient – i.e., in failing to particularize the place to be searched or the things to be seized – that the executing officers cannot reasonably presume it to be valid,” id.; and (vii) when the police, in executing the warrant, exceeded the authority granted by it. These seven situations are discussed in greater detail in the following subsections.

The retraction of the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule in Leon and Sheppard does not, of course, control the evidentiary consequences of state constitutional violations in the issuance of warrants. Defense counsel can and should ask state courts to reject Leon and Sheppard as a matter of state constitutional law and continue to suppress evidence obtained by any search made pursuant to a warrant issued without probable cause. See, e.g., State v. Novembrino, 105 N.J. 95, 157-58, 519 A.2d 820, 856-57 (1987); People v. Bigelow, 66 N.Y.2d 417, 426-27, 488 N.E.2d 451, 457-58, 497 N.Y.S.2d 630, 636-37 (1985). The argument for state constitutional repudiation of regressive criminal-procedure decisions handed down by the post-Warren Supreme Court of the United States (see § 7.09 supra) is particularly forceful in this context. Over the past half-century the “basic conclusion” of the Kerner Commission that “[o]ur nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white – separate and unequal” (National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, Report 1 (1968)), has proved increasingly prophetic. More and more, police activity has become the paradigmatic, iconic locus for the fact and for the public awareness that government treats white people differently than people of color. More and more, minority communities have focused their disillusionment, their outrage, their anger, and their fear upon the police as the prime agency of governmental oppression. Ferguson Missouri, Staten Island New York, and their prominent precursors and progeny are only the most obvious demonstrations of this. In a world where minority communities fundamentally distrust the police, any legal ruling that visibly countenances illegal activity carried out by police officers will enhance that distrust. And this is a matter that should concern state judges of every ideological bent, because minority-community bitterness against the police specifically and against law-enforcement processes more generally is all too likely to increase the level of violence which it is the purpose of policing and of the criminal law to prevent. Particularly for ghetto-dwellers who are “without means of escape from an oppressive urban environment” (Final Report of the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence: To Establish Justice, To Ensure Domestic Tranquility [“Eisenhower Commission”] xxi (1969)) and for whom the police stand as the primary agents and symbols of that oppression (see, e.g., Alice Goffman, On the Run: Fugitive Life in an American City (2014)), any retrenchment of visible judicial control over the police can only add to the legitimate feelings of frustration which are “poisoning the spirit of trust and cooperation that is essential to [the] . . . proper functioning” of legal institutions (Eisenhower Commission xv-xvi). Rulings like Leon and Sheppard, which forswear judicial redress for conceded constitutional violations committed by police officers as a result of systemic failings that the police themselves cannot prevent, can only subvert law enforcement as well as the rule of law.

§ 23.17(a) “Bare Bones” Affidavits

In United States v. Leon, supra, the Court recognized that a search warrant and a search conducted pursuant to that warrant are patently invalid if the affidavit submitted in support of the issuance of the warrant states merely “‘bare bones’” conclusions, Leon, 468 U.S. at 923 n.24, 926, or is “so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence entirely unreasonable,” id. at 925. The inadequacy of such an affidavit is so well settled in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence that an officer would be grossly derelict not to know it. See, e.g., Nathanson v. United States, 290 U.S. 41 (1933); Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964); Riggan v. Virginia, 384 U.S. 152 (1966) (per curiam); Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 239 (1983) (dictum) (“[a]n officer’s statement that ‘[a]ffiants have received reliable information from a credible person and do believe’ that heroin is stored in a home, is likewise inadequate”). In these situations, the logic of Leon – to preserve the exclusionary rule in warrant cases when any adequately trained police officer would know that a search warrant is unconstitutional – implies that suppression is required. See State v. Castagnola, 145 Ohio St. 3d 1, 46 N.E.3d 638 (2015) (“[W]hen a defendant’s motion to suppress evidence challenges the validity of a search warrant, claiming that an undiscovered inference stated as an empirical fact usurped the magistrate’s inference-drawing authority, a reviewing court should consider (1) whether the inference was so significant that it crossed the line between permissible interpretation and usurpation of the magistrate’s role in finding probable cause, considering both the relevance and the complexity of the inference and (2) whether the affiant intended the inference to deprive the magistrate of his or her authority to determine whether probable cause existed.” 145 Ohio St. 3d at 24, 46 N.E.3d at 661-62. Applying Leon’s standards – under which ‘[s]uppression remains an appropriate remedy (1) when an officer relies on a warrant that is based on an affidavit “so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render official belief in its existence entirely unreasonable”’ and (2) when a warrant is ‘so facially deficient – i.e., in failing to particularize the place to be searched or the things to be seized – that the executing officers cannot reasonably presume it to be valid”’ (145 Ohio St. 3d at 22-23, 46 N.E.3d at 660) – “we suppress the evidence at issue here because the search-warrant affidavit lacked indicia of probable cause and the search warrant failed to state with particularity the items to be searched for on Castagnola’s computer [so] that the detective could not have relied upon it in good faith.” 145 Ohio St. 3d at 25, 46 N.E.3d at 662.). Searches based on wholly conclusionary affidavits – those that merely recite the ultimate fact in issue or the affiant’s belief of it (for example, that X has a sawed-off shotgun in a certain house) – thus remain challengeable under Leon and Sheppard. Conclusory assertions that the person to be arrested or whose house is to be searched is a “known criminal” or is “known” to deal in narcotics should be accorded “no weight.” See Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410, 414, 418-19 (1969). Allegations that the person named in the warrant consorts with “known” criminals, narcotics dealers, and the like, are doubly worthless. See United States v. Hatcher, 473 F.2d 321 (6th Cir. 1973).

§ 23.17(b) Improper Multi-unit Warrant Applications

If officers seeking a warrant know “or even if they should have known” that the premises described in their application includes separate units with different occupants, they are constitutionally obliged to limit the application to the unit that they are presenting probable cause to search. Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 85-87 (1987) (dictum); see also United States v. Voustianiouk, 685 F.3d 206, 215 (2d Cir. 2012). A violation of this obligation should entail exclusion of any evidence seized from the other units, because the rationale of Leon and Sheppard is to withdraw the exclusionary rule as a remedy for magistrates’ errors in the search warrant process but preserve it as a remedy for police errors.

§ 23.17(c) Affidavits Containing “Deliberate Falsehoods” or Statements Manifesting a “Reckless Disregard for the Truth”

In Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978), the Court held

“that, where the defendant makes a substantial preliminary showing that a false statement knowingly and intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth, was included by the affiant in the warrant affidavit, and if the allegedly false statement is necessary to the finding of probable cause, the Fourth Amendment requires that a hearing be held at the defendant’s request. In the event that at that hearing the allegation of perjury or reckless disregard is established by the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence, and, with the affidavit’s false material set to one side, the affidavit’s remaining content is insufficient to establish probable cause, the search warrant must be voided and the fruits of the search excluded to the same extent as if probable cause was lacking on the face of the affidavit.” (Id. at 155-56.)

See, e.g., Harte v. Board of Commissioners of County of Johnson, Kansas, 864 F.3d 1154 (10th Cir. 2017); Humbert v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore City, 866 F.3d 546 (4th Cir. 2017). The rule of Franks “has a limited scope, both in regard to when exclusion of the seized evidence is mandated, and when a hearing on allegations of misstatements must be accorded.” Id. at 167.

“To mandate an evidentiary hearing, the challenger’s attack must be more than conclusory and must be supported by more than a mere desire to cross-examine. There must be allegations of deliberate falsehood or of reckless disregard for the truth, and those allegations must be accompanied by an offer of proof. They should point out specifically the portion of the warrant affidavit that is claimed to be false; and they should be accompanied by a statement of supporting reasons. Affidavits or sworn or otherwise reliable statements of witnesses should be furnished, or their absence satisfactorily explained. Allegations of negligence or innocent mistake are insufficient. The deliberate falsity or reckless disregard whose impeachment is permitted . . . is only that of the affiant, not of any nongovernmental informant. Finally, if these requirements are met, and if, when material that is the subject of the alleged falsity or reckless disregard is set to one side, there remains sufficient content in the warrant affidavit to support a finding of probable cause, no hearing is required. On the other hand, if the remaining content is insufficient, the defendant is entitled, under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, to his hearing.” (Id at 171-72.)

Accord, United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. at 914, 925. “That said, individuals have a clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution by a . . . [government agent] who has ‘made, influenced, or participated in the decision to prosecute the plaintiff’ by, for example, ‘knowingly or recklessly’ making false statements that are material to the prosecution either in reports or in affidavits filed to secure warrants.” King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 582-83 (6th Cir. 2017). See, e.g., United States v. Glover, 755 F.3d 811, 819-21 (7th Cir. 2014) (“The government’s response to Glover’s motion to suppress revealed Doe’s history as an informant, his multiple convictions, his prior gang affiliation, his use of aliases, and his interest in being paid for useful information. Glover renewed his request for a hearing under Franks v. Delaware, . . . to determine whether the officer acted with reckless disregard for the truth by omitting the credibility information from the probable cause affidavit. To obtain a Franks hearing, the defendant must make a ‘substantial preliminary showing’ of (1) a material falsity or omission that would alter the probable cause determination, and (2) a deliberate or reckless disregard for the truth. . . . This is a burden of production. Proof by a preponderance of the evidence is not required until the Franks hearing itself. . . .‖ In this case, the omitted credibility information was clearly material . . .‖ The district court did not show that it considered whether the credibility omissions themselves, even in the absence of more direct evidence of the officer’s state of mind, provide sufficient circumstantial evidence to support a reasonable and thus permissible inference of reckless disregard for the truth. We hold that they do. . . . ¶ On remand the government may provide a satisfactory explanation for the omission of the damaging information about the informant's credibility, but Glover is entitled to test its explanation. We therefore REVERSE the denial of defendant’s motion to suppress and REMAND for a Franks hearing.”); United States v. Carneiro, 861 F.2d 1171 (9th Cir. 1988) (material omissions and misstatements in an application for an electronic-surveillance warrant rendered the warrant invalid); State v. Tichenor, 2016 WL 4151375, at *3 (Ariz. App. 2016) (“A defendant may challenge an affiant’s statements at an evidentiary hearing after establishing by a preponderance of the evidence, that the affiant 'knowingly and intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth’ made a false, material statement or omitted a material fact in the affidavit. . . . If the trial court finds the affiant intentionally or recklessly made a false material statement or omitted a material fact, the court then must redraft the affidavit by removing the false statement or adding the omitted fact before determining whether sufficient probable cause remains to support the warrant.”).

§ 23.17(d) Warrants Based on Tainted Evidence

If an affidavit in support of a search warrant includes information that is the product of an earlier unconstitutional search or seizure by the police and does not contain sufficient independent evidence to make out probable cause without reference to the tainted evidence, the resulting warrant and any search made under its authority are invalid. United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 719-21 (1984) (dictum); see § 23.40 infra. To the extent that the earlier unconstitutionality was the consequence of improper police conduct rather than improper magisterial conduct, it continues to invoke the exclusionary sanction that Leon and Sheppard retain as a curb on the police and withdraw only as a curb on magistrates. United States v. Bagley, 877 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2017); United States v. Nora, 765 F.3d 1049, 1058-60 (9th Cir. 2014).

§ 23.17(e) Neutral and Detached Magistrate

Exclusion of evidence seized under a warrant is obligatory, even when the police acted in “good faith,” if the magistrate who issued the warrant was not neutral and detached. Leon, 468 U.S. at 923. This principle would include situations “where the issuing magistrate wholly abandoned his judicial role in the manner condemned in Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979),” Leon, 468 U.S. at 923, “allow[ing] himself to become a member, if not the leader, of the search party which was essentially a police operation . . . [and] acting . . . as an adjunct law enforcement officer.” Lo-Ji, 442 U.S. at 327. It would also include situations in which the magistrate “serve[s] merely as a rubber stamp for the police.” Leon, 468 U.S. at 914.

§ 23.17(f) The Particularity Requirement
The Leon/Sheppard doctrine does not alter the longstanding Fourth Amendment requirement that a warrant must identify the premises to be searched and the things to be seized with reasonable particularity. Leon, 468 U.S. at 923; Sheppard, 468 U.S. at 988 n.5; see, e.g., Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 557-63 (2004); Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 84 (1987) (dictum). The Supreme Court has “clearly stated that the presumptive rule against warrantless searches applies with equal force to searches whose only defect is a lack of particularity in the warrant.” Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. at 559. “The manifest purpose of this particularity requirement [is] ... to prevent general searches. By limiting the authorization to search to the specific areas and things for which there is probable cause to search, the requirement ensures that the search will be carefully tailored to its justifications, and will not take on the character of the wide-ranging exploratory searches the Framers [of the Fourth Amendment] intended to prohibit.” Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. at 84. See also Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. at 557-58 (“The fact that the application [for the warrant] adequately described the ‘things to be seized’ does not save the warrant from its facial invalidity. The Fourth Amendment by its terms requires particularity in the warrant, not in the supporting documents.”); the Court declines to reach the question of whether “the Fourth Amendment prohibits a warrant from cross-referencing other documents,” noting that “most Courts of Appeals have held that a court may construe a warrant with reference to a supporting application or affidavit if the warrant uses appropriate words of incorporation, and if the supporting document accompanies the warrant”); Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. at 325-26; Stanford v. Texas, 379 U.S. 476 (1965); Dalia v. United States, 441 U.S. 238, 255-56 (1979) (dictum); United States v. Dunn, 719 Fed. Appx. 746, 748-49 (10th Cir. 2017) (per curiam) (“the particularity requirement was violated” and therefore “the good-faith exception to the exclusionary rule does not apply”; “The warrant here listed particular items to be searched, but prefaced the list with a catch-all phrase, stating that the items to be searched ‘include but are not limited to’ the listed items... The qualifying phrase, ‘not limited to,’ is frequently included with particular categories in a warrant. In those situations, we have held that the ‘not limited to’ language does not taint a warrant when the language serves only to modify one or more categories in the list... But here, the phrase ‘not limited to’ is used in connection with the entire warrant, not just particular categories. Thus, the addition of this phrase allowed officers to search for any item for any reason.”); United States v. Galpin, 720 F.3d 436, 446 (2d Cir. 2013) (“Where, as here, the property to be searched is a computer hard drive, the particularity requirement assumes even greater importance. As numerous courts and commentators have observed, advances in technology and the centrality of computers in the lives of average people have rendered the computer hard drive akin to a residence in terms of the scope and quantity of private information it may contain.”); State v. Castagnola, 145 Ohio St. 3d 1, 19-21, 46 N.E.3d 638, 657-59 (2015) (“the search warrant lacked particularity and was therefore invalid” because the authorization to search “[r]ecords and documents stored on computers” in the defendant’s home “did not contain any description or qualifiers of the ‘records and documents stored on the computer’ that the searcher was permitted to look for”); Wheeler v. State, 135 A.3d 282, 304-05 (Del. 2016) (“warrants, in order to satisfy the particularity requirement, must describe what investigating officers believe will be found on electronic devices with as much specificity as possible under the circumstances. . . . Where, as here, the investigators had available to them a more precise description of the alleged criminal activity that is the subject of the warrant, such information should be included in the instrument and the search and seizure should be appropriately narrowed to the relevant time period so as to mitigate the potential for unconstitutional exploratory rummaging); State v. Henderson, 289 Neb. 271, 289, 854 N.W.2d 616, 633 (2014) (“a warrant for the search of the contents of a cell phone must be sufficiently limited in scope to allow a search of only that content that is related to the probable cause that justifies the search”); In re Appeal of Application for Search Warrant, 71 A.3d 1158, 1162, 1172, 1174, 1181, 1183 (Vt. 2012) (judicial officer who “granted a warrant to search the residence and to seize electronic devices to be searched at an off-site facility” had the authority to attach ex ante conditions “requiring that the search [of the electronic devices] be performed by third parties or trained computer personnel separate from the investigators and operating behind a firewall,” “requiring that the information be segregated and redacted prior to disclosure,” “requiring police to use focused search techniques,” and “prohibiting the use of specialized search tools without prior court authorization”; “Because modern computers contain a plethora of private information, exposing them to wholesale searches presents a special threat of exposing irrelevant but damaging secrets.”; “especially in a nonphysical context, particularity may be achieved through specification of how a search will be conducted”). But cf. United States v. Grubbs, 547 U.S. 90, 98-99 (2006) (“The Fourth Amendment does not require that the warrant set forth the magistrate’s basis for finding probable cause,” and, in the case of an anticipatory search warrant, “does not require that the triggering condition . . . be set forth in the warrant itself”).

§ 23.17(g) Scope of the Search Permitted in Executing a Warrant

The “good faith” doctrine of Leon and Sheppard does not in any way affect the courts’ obligation to review “the reasonableness of the manner in which [a search warrant] . . . was executed.” Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 84 (1987).

The permissible scope of a search pursuant to a warrant is strictly limited to the premises specified in the warrant. Id. at 86-87. See, e.g., United States v. Bershchansky, 788 F.3d 102, 105, 111-12 (2d Cir. 2015) (Department of Homeland Agents, who were authorized by a warrant to search “Apartment 2 at the location where Bershchansky lived,” exceeded the scope of the warrant “by searching Apartment 1 instead”). When the officers who are applying for a warrant know or should know that a particular building contains multiple units, their application and the warrant are required to specify the individual unit to be searched. See § 23.17(b) supra. If, however, they reasonably believe that the entire building is a single unit and in good faith obtain a warrant for the building as a whole, their “failure to realize the overbreadth of the warrant” will be deemed “objectively understandable and reasonable,” Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. at 88, and their search of any portion of the building will be sustained until such time as it discloses that separate units do exist within the building. Id. at 86-89. At that time a continuation of the search beyond the unit for which probable cause was shown to the magistrate – and perhaps any further search at all until the warrant is reissued with a more limited specification of the place to be searched – is unconstitutional, id. at 86-87, and the products of the search are suppressible.
Within the premises specified by the warrant, “the scope of a lawful search is defined by the object of the search and the places in which there is probable cause to believe that it may be found.” Id. at 84. See § 23.22(a) infra. This is a corollary of the pervasive Fourth Amendment principle that “[t]he scope of [a] search must be strictly tied to and justified by the circumstances which rendered its initiation permissible” (New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 457 (1981) (dictum). See also Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. 2160, 2181 (2016) (dictum) (“Search warrants protect privacy in two main ways. First, they ensure that a search is not carried out unless a neutral magistrate makes an independent determination that there is probable cause to believe that evidence will be found. . . . Second, if the magistrate finds probable cause, the warrant limits the intrusion on privacy by specifying the scope of the search – that is, the area that can be searched and the items that can be sought.”). The officers may search “the entire area in which the object of the search may be found,” performing whatever additional “acts of entry or opening may be required to complete the search. Thus a warrant that authorizes an officer to search a home for illegal weapons also provides authority to open closets, chests, drawers, and containers in which the weapon might be found.” United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 820-21 (1982) (dictum); cf. Dalia v. United States, 441 U.S. 238, 257-58 (1979) (dictum). However, the search may not extend into areas that could not contain the objects specified in the warrant. See United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. at 824 (dictum). “[A] warrant to search for a stolen refrigerator would not authorize the opening of desk drawers.” Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649, 657 (1980) (plurality opinion) (dictum).

A search warrant valid when issued may cease to support a constitutional search if changes in circumstances between the time of its issuance and the time of its execution deprive the magistrate’s probable-cause finding of continuing force. “[P]robable cause may cease to exist after a warrant is issued. The police may learn, for instance, that contraband is no longer located at the place to be searched. . . . Or the probable-cause showing may have grown ‘stale’ in view of the time that has passed since the warrant was issued.” United States v. Grubbs, 547 U.S. 90, 95 n.2 (2006). Or information obtained by the officers executing the warrant may provide an innocent explanation for the apparently incriminating facts upon which the magistrate’s finding was based. See Harte v. Board of Commissioners of County of Johnson, Kansas, 864 F.3d 1154, 1182-83 (10th Cir. 2017) (opinion of Judge Phillips). In the case of anticipatory warrants (search warrants issued on a showing of probable cause that requires the occurrence of a future “triggering” event), the warrant may not be executed unless the triggering event is observed to happen in the manner that the warrant describes. United States v. Perkins, 887 F.3d 272 (6th Cir. 2018).

computer files containing “personal financial records . . . not covered by the . . . [original search] warrant”); United States v. Sedaghaty, 728 F.3d 885, 910-15 (9th Cir. 2013) (“The question we consider de novo is whether the search was unreasonable because agents relied on the affidavit in support of the warrant to expand the authorized scope of items detailed in the warrant itself.” “The plain text of the warrant . . . clearly delineates what is to be seized.” “May a broad ranging probable cause affidavit serve to expand the express limitations imposed by a magistrate in issuing the warrant itself? We believe the answer is no. The affidavit as a whole cannot trump a limited warrant.”); cf. Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. at 325.

The sole exception to the four-corners-of-the-warrant limitation upon objects that can be seized is grounded in the “plain view” doctrine discussed in § 23.22(b) infra: Objects not encompassed by the warrant’s terms but which the officer encounters while conducting a search of the limited scope described in the preceding paragraph may be seized if, but only if, their appearance and situation give the officer probable cause to believe that they are contraband or otherwise subject to seizure. Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987); Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730 (1983) (plurality opinion).

When a warrant contains specific restrictions regarding the time or manner of service, violation of those restrictions renders its execution unconstitutional. Jones v. Kirchner, 835 F.3d 74, 85 (D.C. Cir. 2016) (“In this case the magistrate, as clearly indicated on the face of the warrant, affirmatively denied the Defendants permission to search Jones’s house before 6:00 AM. The plaintiff alleges the Defendants nonetheless executed the warrant at 4:45 AM. Just as a warrant is ‘dead,’ and a search undertaken pursuant to that warrant invalid, after the expiration date on the warrant, Sgro v. United States, 287 U.S. 206, 212 . . . (1932), a warrant is not yet alive, and a search is likewise invalid, if executed before the time authorized in the warrant. If the Defendants executed the warrant when the magistrate said they could not, then they exceeded the authorization of the warrant and, accordingly, violated the Fourth Amendment.”).

Regarding searches of persons found on the premises, see § 23.22(c) infra.

§ 23.18 WARRANTLESS ENTRIES OF BUILDINGS AND SEARCHES ON CONSENT

The police may enter a building without a warrant whenever they obtain the valid consent of a party who has the authority to admit persons to the building. Washington v. Chrisman, 455 U.S. 1, 9-10 (1982). “The standard for measuring the scope of a suspect’s consent under the Fourth Amendment is that of ‘objective’ reasonableness – what would the typical reasonable person have understood by the exchange between the officer and the suspect?” Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248, 251 (1991). See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Ortiz, 478 Mass. 820, 820, 90 N.E.3d 735, 736-37 (2018) (“In this case we must decide whether a driver’s consent to allow the police to search for narcotics or firearms ‘in the vehicle’ authorizes a police officer to search under the hood of the vehicle and, as part of that search, to remove the vehicle’s air filter. We hold that it does not. A typical reasonable person would understand the scope of such consent to be limited to a search of the interior of the vehicle, including the trunk.”). Cf. United States v. Lopez-Cruz, 730 F.3d 803, 805-06, 808 (9th Cir. 2013) (although the defendant consented to a border patrol agent’s request to inspect and search two cell phones that the defendant identified as belonging to a friend of his, “the agent’s answering of the phone [which led to the acquisition of information that incriminated the defendant] exceeded the scope of the consent that [the agent] obtained and, thus, violated Lopez’s Fourth Amendment right”).

§ 23.18(a) Voluntariness of the Consent

In order to be valid, the consent must be voluntary. Amos v. United States, 255 U.S. 313 (1921). It must “not be coerced, by explicit or implicit means, by implied threat or covert force . . . no matter how subtly . . . applied.” Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 228 (1973) (dictum). “[W]hen a prosecutor seeks to rely upon consent to justify the lawfulness of a search, he has the burden of proving [by a preponderance of the evidence, see United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 177, 177-78 n.14 (1974)] that the consent was, in fact, freely and voluntarily given.” Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. at 222, and cases cited; see also Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 497 (1983) (plurality opinion); United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 554, 557 (1980) (dictum).

As with confessions, see § 24.03 infra, the test of voluntariness is said to turn upon “the totality of all surrounding circumstances,” Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. at 226: “[A]ccount must be taken of subtly coercive police questions, as well as the possibly vulnerable subjective state of the person who consents,” id. at 229; cf. United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411, 424-25 (1976). Factors that may render a person “vulnerable” and particularly susceptible to coercion include youth, emotional disturbance, lack of education, and mental deficiency. See, e.g., State v. Butler, 232 Ariz. 84, 88-89, 302 P.3d 609, 613-14 (2013); In re J.M., 619 A.2d 497, 502-04 (D.C. 1992); and see § 24.05 infra. See generally Megan Anitto, Consent Searches of Minors, 38 N.Y.U. REV. L. & SOC. CHANGE 1 (2014).

Courts are loth to find voluntary consent when police entry is sought under an apparent show of authority to enter and is merely acquiesced in by the occupant. Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10 (1948); Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U.S. 543 (1968); Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319, 329 (1979). See also United States v. Shaw, 707 F.3d 666, 669 (6th Cir. 2013) (“An officer may not falsely tell a homeowner that he has an arrest warrant for a house, then use that falsity as the basis for obtaining entry into the house.”); cf. State v. Valenzuela, 239 Ariz. 299, 306-07, 371 P.3d 627, 634-35 (2016) (“[W]e conclude that the State failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that Valenzuela’s consent was voluntary. Bumper and Johnson direct this outcome. By telling Valenzuela multiple times that Arizona law required him to submit to and complete testing to determine AC or drug content, the officer invoked lawful authority and effectively proclaimed that Valenzuela had no right to resist the search.”). immaterial. The Bumper Court’s ruling turned on the grandmother’s acquiescence to the officer’s assertion of lawful authority to search regardless of the truthfulness of the officer’s claim to possess a warrant . . . The officer’s claim of authority to search was ‘instinct with coercion’ whether or not he actually possessed a valid warrant.”).

Valid consent may be obtained from an individual who is in police custody, United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. at 424, but “courts have been particularly sensitive to the heightened possibilities for coercion when the ‘consent’ to a search was given by a person in custody.” Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. at 240 n.29. See, e.g., United States v. Hall, 565 F.2d 917, 920 (5th Cir. 1978); Guzman v. State, 283 Ark. 112, 120, 672 S.W.2d 656, 659-60 (1984); Commonwealth v. Smith, 470 Pa. 220, 228, 368 A.2d 272, 277 (1977). See also Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 631 (2003) (per curiam) (police officers’ removal of a 17-year-old suspect from his home in the middle of the night and transporting of him to the stationhouse could not be deemed “consensual” even though the suspect said “‘Okay’” in response to an officer’s statement “‘we need to go and talk’” because there was “no reason to think [the suspect’s] answer was anything more than ‘a mere submission to a claim of lawful authority’”). Consent during a period of illegal custody should be eo ipso ineffective. Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. at 507-08 (plurality opinion); id. at 508-09 (concurring opinions of Justices Powell and Brennan); United States v. Murphy, 703 F.3d 182, 190 (2d Cir. 2012); State v. Betts, 194 Vt. 212, 219-21, 75 A.3d 629, 635-36 (2013) (the rule that “consent obtained during an illegal detention is invalid” necessarily calls for holding as well that “consent for a search is not voluntary when obtained in response to the threat of an unlawful detention”). See also People v. Frederick, 500 Mich. 228, 231, 238, 895 N.W.2d 541, 542-43, 546 (2017) (police officers’ “predawn” knocking on the front doors of the defendants’ homes (at 4 a.m. in one case and 5:30 a.m. in the other) exceeded “the scope of the implied license to approach a house and knock” – which is “time-sensitive” and does not include “knock[ing] at someone’s door in the middle of the night” – and therefore “the defendants’ consent to search – even if voluntary – is invalid unless it is sufficiently attenuated from the illegality”). And see § 23.37 infra.

At least with regard to persons who have not been taken to the stationhouse or other place of closed confinement, the police may obtain valid consent for a warrantless search without first warning the consenting party of his or her Fourth Amendment rights, see Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443, 484-90 (1971); Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. at 234; United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. at 167 n.2; United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. at 424-25; Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477, 483-84 (1981) (dictum), since “knowledge of a right to refuse is not a prerequisite of a voluntary consent,” Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. at 234; see also United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194, 206 (2002); Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33, 39-40 (1996). But cf. State v. Budd, 185 Wash. 2d 566, 573, 374 P.3d 137, 141 (2016) (reaffirming a state constitutional rule that when the police engage in a so-called “knock and talk,” in which they “go to a home without a warrant and ask for the resident’s consent to search the premises,” the “police ‘must, prior to entering the home, inform the person from whom consent is sought that he or she may lawfully refuse to consent to the search and that they can revoke, at any time, the consent that they give, and can limit the scope of the consent to certain areas of the home’”); “Officers must give these warnings before entering the home because the resident’s knowledge of the privilege is a ‘threshold requirement for an intelligent decision as to its exercise.’”). Even with respect to these persons, however, “knowledge of the right to refuse consent is one factor to be taken into account” in determining the voluntariness of consent for federal Fourth Amendment purposes, Schneckloth v. Bustamante, 412 U.S. at 227; see also United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. at 206; United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. at 558-59, and the Court has not rejected the argument that explicit warnings should be required in the case of persons who are in police custody “in the confines of the police station,” United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. at 424, or in similar settings where “the techniques of police questioning and the nature of custodial surroundings produce an inherently coercive situation,” Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. at 247, in which the reasoning of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), see §§ 24.07-24.08 infra, appears to be fully applicable, Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 437-40 (1984); Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675, 685-86 (1988); United States v. Washington, 431 U.S. 181, 187 n.5 (1977) (dictum); Roberts v. United States, 445 U.S. 552, 560-61 (1980) (dictum). And see Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. at 240 n.29, 247 n.36. Cf. Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. at 35 (motorist who was stopped for speeding on the open road, and who was thereafter given a verbal warning and received his driver’s license back from the police officer, did not have to be “advised that he is ‘free to go’” in order for his consent to the officer’s request to search the car to be “recognized as voluntary”).

The extent to which state law can require ex ante blanket consent to certain searches and seizures as a condition of receiving various licences, privileges, or benefits is largely an open question. The convoluted reasoning in United States v. Knights, 534 U.S. 112 (2001), summarized in § 23.15(b) supra plainly implies that a State cannot condition a convict’s release on probation upon his or her agreement to be subject to searches and seizures that would violate the Fourth Amendment in the case of non-probationers. Since Knights “signed . . . [a] probation order, which stated immediately above his signature that “I HAVE RECEIVED A COPY, READ AND UNDERSTAND THE ABOVE TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF PROBATION AND AGREE TO ABIDE BY SAME,” and since one of those terms was “that Knights would ‘[s]ubmit his . . . person, property, place of residence, vehicle, personal effects, to search at anytime, with or without a search warrant, warrant of arrest or reasonable cause by any probation officer or law enforcement officer’ (id. at 114), the case would have been a no-brainer if consents of this sort were legally effective. Conspicuously avoiding this straightforward approach (which the Government forcefully advocated), the Court wrote that it “need not decide whether Knights’ [sic] acceptance of the search condition constituted consent in the Schneckloth sense of a complete waiver of his Fourth Amendment rights, . . . because we conclude that the search of Knights was reasonable under our general Fourth Amendment approach of ‘examining the totality of the circumstances,’ . . . with the probation search condition being a salient circumstance (id. at 118) because “[t]he probation condition . . . significantly diminished Knights’ [sic] reasonable expectation of privacy” (id. at 119-20). A generation later, in Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. 2160 (2016), summarized in § 23.14 subdivision (d) supra, the Supreme Court, “[h]aving concluded that the search incident to arrest doctrine does not justify the warrantless taking of a blood sample” from a motorist arrested for drunk driving (id. at 2185), was required to address the question whether “such tests are justified based on the driver’s legally implied consent to submit to them” (id.) under state “implied-consent laws” that “go beyond” the “typical penalty for . . . [refusal to submit to blood testing for sobriety – namely,] suspension or revocation of the motorist’s license” – and “make it a crime for a motorist to refuse to be tested after being lawfully arrested for driving while impaired” (id. at 2166-67). The Court answered that question in the negative, but on extremely narrow grounds. “Our prior opinions have referred approvingly to the general concept of implied-consent laws that impose civil penalties and evidentiary consequences on motorists who refuse to comply. . . . Petitioners do not question the constitutionality of those laws, and nothing we say here should be read to cast doubt on them. ¶ It is another matter, however, for a State not only to insist upon an intrusive blood test, but also to impose criminal penalties on the refusal to submit to such a test. There must be a limit to the consequences to which motorists may be deemed to have consented by virtue of a decision to drive on public roads.¶ . . . [R]easonableness is always the touchstone of Fourth Amendment analysis, . . . [a]nd applying this standard, we conclude that motorists cannot be deemed to have consented to submit to a blood test on pain of committing a criminal offense.” Id. at 2185-86. Pending the descent of the other shoe, defense counsel should take the position that consents extracted in advance as the price for receiving government “privileges” are void by analogy to cases like Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967); Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. 273 (1968); Lefkowitz v. Turley, 414 U.S. 70 (1973); and Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801 (1977), which hold that “when a State compels testimony by threatening to inflict potent sanctions unless the constitutional privilege is surrendered, that testimony is obtained in violation of the Fifth Amendment and cannot be used against the declarant in a subsequent criminal prosecution” (id. at 805). In each of these Fifth Amendment cases, the “potent sanctions” threatened were nothing more or less than the termination of public employment or of “the opportunity to secure public contracts” (id. at 806) – advantages which the State had no obligation to extend to any particular individuals in the first place.

§ 23.18(b) Authority To Consent: Consent by a Party Other Than the Respondent

Consent by a party other than the respondent is a significant issue in juvenile court because the police routinely obtain consent for entry of a respondent’s room and search of his or her belongings from the respondent’s parent.

The test of a third party’s authority to consent is whether the third party possessed – or reasonably appeared to the police to possess – “common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effects sought to be inspected.” United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164, 171 (1974). See also Frazier v. Cupp, 394 U.S. 731, 740 (1969); Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. 103, 109 (2006) (“the exception for consent extends even to entries and searches with the permission of a co-occupant whom the police reasonably, but erroneously, believe to possess shared authority as an occupant”); Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177, 186 (1990). “Common authority is, of course, not to be implied from the mere property interest a third party has in the property. The authority which justifies the third-party consent does not rest upon the law of property, . . . but rests rather on mutual use of the property by persons generally having joint access or control for most purposes, so that it is reasonable to recognize that any of the co-inhabitants has the right to permit the inspection in his own right and that the others have assumed the risk that one of their number might permit the common area to be searched.” United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. at 171 n.7. See also Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. at 111 (“The constant element in assessing Fourth Amendment reasonableness in the consent cases . . . is the great significance given widely shared social expectations, which are naturally enough influenced by the law of property, but not controlled by its rules.”); Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483 (1964) (hotel manager’s consent to the entry of a guest’s room is ineffective); Chapman v. United States, 365 U.S. 610 (1961) (landlord’s consent to the entry of a tenant’s house is ineffective); cf. Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 583 (1980) (three-year old child’s opening of the door to the house could not constitute valid consent to a police entry to arrest the child’s father).

Although “voluntary consent of an individual possessing [or reasonably appearing to possess the requisite] authority” may suffice “when the suspect is absent,” Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. at 109 (emphasis added), a different standard applies when a co-occupant “who later seeks to suppress the evidence . . . is present at the scene and expressly refuses to consent.” Id. at 106. In Georgia v. Randolph, the Court addressed the latter scenario and held that “a physically present inhabitant’s express refusal of consent to a police search is dispositive as to him, regardless of the consent of a fellow occupant.” Id. at 122-23. Accord, Fernandez v. California, 134 S. Ct. 1126, 1133 (2014) (dictum). See also United States v. Johnson, 656 F.3d 375, 377-79 (6th Cir. 2011) (the defendant’s objection to the search at the scene was sufficient to override the consent given by his wife and her grandmother, even though the defendant “was not a full-time resident of the home and his possessory interest was therefore inferior to that of” the consenting individuals, “who lived there full-time”: the Supreme Court in Randolph “expressly avoided making . . . distinctions” between “relative degrees of possessory interest among residential co-occupants”). Compare Fernandez v. California, 134 S. Ct. at 1130, 1134 (a domestic violence victim’s consent to police entry of the home she shared with the defendant was valid, notwithstanding the defendant’s objection at the time the police arrived, because the “consent was provided by [the] . . . abused woman well after her male partner had been [lawfully] removed” by the police: when “an occupant . . . is absent due to a lawful detention or arrest,” the absent occupant “stands in the same shoes as an occupant who is absent for any other reason”; the Court emphasizes, however, that the defendant did not “contest the fact that the police had reasonable grounds for removing him from the apartment so that they could speak with . . . an apparent victim of domestic violence, outside of [the defendant’s] . . . potentially intimidating presence,” and did “not even contest the existence of probable cause to place him under arrest”), with State v. Coles, 218 N.J. 322, 328, 347-48, 95 A.3d 136, 139, 150-51 (2014) (“As the United States Supreme Court’s Fernandez opinion makes clear, valid third-party consent is subject to the exception that the third party’s consent cannot be manufactured through the unlawful detention of the defendant”); the New Jersey Supreme Court holds on state constitutional grounds, “bolstered by Fourth Amendment principles,” that the officers’ initially valid detention of the defendant became unlawful once his identity and residence were confirmed and thus he “was being unlawfully detained by police, a few houses away from his home” at the time the police obtained consent from his aunt to search his bedroom in her house; the “asserted consent-based search” therefore was unlawful because “[t]he officer’s action detaining defendant in a patrol car when probable cause to arrest was lacking effectively prevented any objection from defendant” and “[it] also prevented him from disputing his aunt’s statements in response to police inquiries about control over the room”).

It should be noted that in Randolph the objecting party and the consenting party were both adults; it is unclear whether the result would be different if the objecting party were a juvenile and the consenting party were his or her adult relative, caretaker or other owner of a possessory interest in the premises that the juvenile lacks; but prosecutors will predictably argue that a child cannot countermand an adult possessor’s consent to a police entry into premises. In cases of this sort, courts may well draw distinctions between different portions of the premises, holding, for example, that the child’s objection cannot exclude the police from common portions of a dwelling but can preclude them from searching the child’s own room or areas of it reserved for storage of the child’s personal effects. See Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. at 112, quoted in the paragraph after next; and cf. § 23.35 infra.

At least in the absence of a child’s refusal of consent to police entry and search of the home, a parent ordinarily will be deemed to have the authority to consent to an entry of the home in which s/he lives with the respondent and to an inspection of any of the “common areas” of the home. The question whether a parent has the authority to consent to a search of his or her child’s room is a far less clear-cut issue. In Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868 (1987), the Court observed in dictum that the interest of “parental custodial authority” would weigh against the application of the warrant requirement to a “search of a minor child’s room,” id. at 876, but that issue was not before the Court, and the majority decision does not purport to address the constitutional interests that could outweigh the interest of “parental custodial authority.” Some lower courts have chosen to adopt a general rule on this subject, either recognizing an absolute parental right to consent emanating from the parent’s ownership of, or control over, the premises, see, e.g., United States v. Stone, 401 F.2d 32, 34 (7th Cir. 1968); Maxwell v. Stephens, 348 F.2d 325, 336-38 (8th Cir. 1965), or conversely holding that the right to consent to a search of one’s room is a personal right that cannot be waived by one’s parent, People v. Flowers, 23 Mich. App. 523, 527, 179 N.W.2d 56, 58 (1970). See generally Kristin Henning, The Fourth Amendment Rights of Children at Home: When Parental Authority Goes Too Far, 53 WM. & MARY L. REV. 55 (2011).

Unless defense counsel is in a jurisdiction that has already adopted a categorical rule concerning a parent’s power to consent to the search of his or her child’s room, counsel’s safest course will usually be to elicit facts showing that this particular family treated the respondent’s room as reserved for his or her private occupancy and use, to the exclusion of other family members, including the parent(s). Such a showing would bring the case within the general rule that a parent cannot consent to search of an area or object that has been clearly demarcated as reserved for the child’s use. See, e.g., In re Scott K., 24 Cal. 3d 395, 595 P.2d 105, 155 Cal. Rptr. 671 (1979) (a parent’s authority to consent to search of the home did not extend to consenting to the search of a child’s locked toolbox inside the child’s bedroom); State v. Peterson, 525 S.W.2d
(a father could not validly consent to search of his child’s room because the room was exclusively reserved for the child’s occupancy and use); see also United States v. Peyton, 745 F.3d 546, 552-56 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (an adult defendant’s great-great-grandmother, with whom he shared a one-bedroom apartment, lacked both actual and apparent authority to consent to a search of a closed shoebox of his that was next to his bed: “The fact that a person has common authority over a house, an apartment, or a particular room, does not mean that she can authorize a search of anything and everything within that area.”); State v. Colvard, 296 Ga. 381, 381-82, 383, 768 S.E.2d 473, 474, 475 (2015) (an adult defendant’s uncle, in whose apartment the defendant lived, did not have authority to consent to a search of the defendant’s bedroom, which was “used exclusively” by the defendant, had a lock on the door for which the uncle did not have a key and the “Uncle could not go into the bedroom when the door was locked,” and the bedroom door was locked at the time of the police entry of the home although “it did not appear that the bedroom door was securely fastened” since the police were able to “pop [it] open” easily); cf. Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. at 112 (“when it comes to searching through bureau drawers, there will be instances in which even a person clearly belonging on premises as an occupant may lack any perceived authority to consent; ‘a child of eight might well be considered to have the power to consent to the police crossing the threshold into that part of the house where any caller, such as a pollster or salesman, might well be admitted,’ 4 LaFave § 8.4(c), at 207 (4th ed. 2004), but no one would reasonably expect such a child to be in a position to authorize anyone to rummage through his parents’ bedroom”); State v. Jackson, 878 N.W.2d 422 (Iowa 2016) (finding a Fourth Amendment violation where an “officer relied on a third party’s consent in conducting the search. The third party possessed actual authority to consent to a search of the bedroom the backpack was in but lacked actual authority to consent to a search of the backpack itself.” Id. at 424. “[A] warrantless search is not authorized when the circumstances would cause a reasonable officer to doubt whether the party consenting had authority to consent with respect to the location to be searched. The mere fact that an officer subjectively relied on third-party consent does not render that reliance reasonable. . . . Reliance on apparent authority to authorize a search is only reasonable when the authority of the person consenting is actually apparent with respect to the location to be searched. Thus, when the totality of the circumstances indicates a reasonable officer would have conducted further inquiry to determine whether the person who consented to a premises search had authority to consent to a search of a closed container, the government must demonstrate the officer did just that in order to establish the search of the container was reasonable.” Id. at 438.); Reeves v. Warden, 346 F.2d 915 (4th Cir. 1965) (a co-tenant cannot consent to entry of an area reserved for the defendant’s private occupancy and use). In making such a showing, counsel should stress any of the following facts that can be proved: The respondent’s room has a lock on it and is normally locked when the respondent is not inside the room; the parent does not normally enter the respondent’s room without asking the respondent’s permission (and the parent does not regularly enter the room at will for the purpose of cleaning it); the family has an understanding that the room has been set aside for the respondent’s private use, and this was done for the sake of giving the respondent an area that s/he could view as private and exclusively his or her own.

§ 23.18(c) Application of the “Private Search” Doctrine to Home Entries by Law Enforcement Officers

This subject – which is analytically distinct from the subject of consent searches but bears some situational and analogical similarity to it – is canvassed thoroughly, with discussion of the relevant authorities, in State v. Wright, 221 N.J. 456, 459-78, 114 A.3d 340, 342-53 (2015):

“In this case, we consider whether the ‘third-party intervention’ or ‘private search’ doctrine applies to a warrantless search of a home.

“The doctrine originally addressed situations like the following: Private actors search an item, discover contraband, and notify law enforcement officers or present the item to them. The police, in turn, replicate the search without first getting a warrant. See, e.g., United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109 (1984) [§ 23.22(b) subdivision (ii) infra]. Because the original search is carried out by private actors, it does not implicate the Fourth Amendment. And if the officers’ search of the item does not exceed the scope of the private search, the police have not invaded a defendant’s protected privacy interest and do not need a warrant.

“The State now seeks to expand the doctrine to a very different setting: the search of a private home. In this case, a resident reported a leak in her apartment to her landlord, who showed up the following day with a plumber. The landlord and plumber entered the apartment while no one was home, spotted the leak in the kitchen, and checked elsewhere for additional leaks. In the rear bedroom, the plumber saw drugs on top of a nightstand and inside an open drawer. He and the landlord notified the police.

“Instead of using that information to apply for a search warrant, an officer walked into the apartment and looked around the kitchen and bedroom area. He, too, noticed the drugs and found a scale as well. The police conducted a full search moments later, with the resident’s consent, and found other contraband.

“Relying on the protections in the State Constitution, we conclude that the private search doctrine cannot apply to private dwellings. Absent exigency or some other exception to the warrant requirement, the police must get a warrant to enter a private home and conduct a search, even if a private actor has already searched the area and notified law enforcement.

“‘To be sure, whenever residents invite someone into their home, they run the risk that the third party will reveal what they have seen to others. . . . A landlord, like any other guest, may tell the police about contraband he or she has observed. And the police, in turn, can use that information to apply for a search warrant. . . . But that course of events does not create an exception to the warrant requirement.
We recognize that residents have a reduced expectation of privacy in their home whenever a landlord or guest enters the premises. But residents do not thereby forfeit an expectation of privacy as to the police. In other words, an invitation to a plumber, a dinner guest, or a landlord does not open the door to one’s home to a warrantless search by a police officer.

The proper course under the State and Federal Constitutions is the simplest and most direct one. If private parties tell the police about unlawful activities inside a person’s home, the police can use that information to establish probable cause and seek a search warrant. In the time it takes to get the warrant, police officers can secure the apartment or home from the outside, for a reasonable period of time, if reasonably necessary to avoid any tampering with or destruction of evidence. Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326, 334 . . . (2001) [§ 23.06(c), fifth paragraph supra]. But law enforcement cannot accept a landlord’s invitation to enter a home without a warrant unless an exception to the warrant requirement applies.”

§ 23.19 WARRANTLESS ENTRY FOR THE PURPOSE OF MAKING A VALID ARREST

Before the decisions in Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), and Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204 (1981), there was a substantial body of caselaw holding that police officers who had probable cause to arrest an individual could constitutionally enter premises (including residential premises) to make the arrest without a search or arrest warrant. In Payton, the Supreme Court held that “the Fourth Amendment . . . prohibits the police from making a warrantless and nonconsensual entry into a suspect’s home in order to make a routine felony arrest” (445 U.S. at 576). See, e.g., Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663, 1672 (2018) (“it is a ‘settled rule that warrantless arrests in public places are valid,’ but, absent another exception such as exigent circumstances, officers may not enter a home to make an arrest without a warrant, even when they haveprobable cause”). This holding has generally been understood to require an arrest warrant – not a search warrant – as the precondition for police entry into a building to effect the arrest of someone believed to be inside; dictum at the end of the opinion said that “an arrest warrant founded on probable cause implicitly carries with it the limited authority to enter a dwelling in which the suspect lives when there is reason to believe the suspect is within” (id. at 603). The reference to a “routine” arrest is conventionally read as distinguishing cases in which there is a demonstrated need to apprehend the suspect immediately, without the delay that applying for a warrant would entail.

In Steagald, the Court held that “a law enforcement officer may [not] legally search for the subject of an arrest warrant in the home of a third party without first obtaining a search warrant.”
warrant[,] absent exigent circumstances or consent” (451 U.S. at 205-06). The gap between Steagald’s “third-party”-home holding and Payton’s “suspect’s”-home dictum left unclear such questions as (1) whether a search warrant is required for “arrest entries” into nonresidential premises; (2) whether a particular residence should be treated as that of the “suspect” in joint-occupancy situations, situations in which the suspect is living as a guest (more or less transiently or permanently) in someone else’s home, and other complicated multi-person living arrangements; and (3) whether “reason to believe the suspect is within” a particular residence means probable cause (see § 23.07(d) supra) or some other degree of founded belief.

More basically, Steagald’s rationale casts doubt on the logical foundation of the Payton dictum itself:

“[W]hile an arrest warrant and a search warrant both serve to subject the probable-cause determination of the police to judicial review, the interests protected by the two warrants differ. An arrest warrant is issued by a magistrate upon a showing that probable cause exists to believe that the subject of the warrant has committed an offense and thus the warrant primarily serves to protect an individual from an unreasonable seizure. A search warrant, in contrast is issued upon a showing of probable cause to believe that the legitimate object of a search is located in a particular place, and therefore safeguards an individual’s interest in the privacy of his home and possessions against the unjustified intrusion of the police.” (451 U.S. at 212-13.)

An individual whose arrest is sought and justified on the ground of probable cause that s/he has committed a crime has no less interest in “the privacy of his home” than any other person. This proposition is the necessary predicate and implication of the well-settled rule of Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969), discussed in § 23.08(a) supra. Chimel was arrested in his home on a valid arrest warrant but a search of areas of his house beyond his “wingspan” was held to violate the Fourth Amendment in the absence of a search warrant for the premises. See also Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30, 33-35 (1970); Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 609-11 (1999); Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325, 335 (1990) (dictum). So, in the “routine” arrest situation contemplated by Payton, where “officers were able to procure . . . warrants for . . . [homeowners’] arrest[s and] . . . [t]here is . . . no reason . . . to suppose that it was impracticable for them to obtain a search warrant as well” (Vale v. Louisiana, supra, 399 U.S. at 35), they should be required to do so.

The lower courts have reached discordant results when wrestling with issues clouded by Payton-Steagald fallout. See 3 WAYNE R. LAFAVE, SEARCH AND SEIZURE: A TREATISE ON THE FOURTH AMENDMENT § 6.1(b) (5th ed. & Supp.). In the current murky state of the law, counsel should not hesitate to take the position that both a search warrant and an arrest warrant are required in order to justify the police entering any premises in which an individual has a Fourth-Amendment-protected interest (see § 23.15 supra) for the purpose of arresting him or her, except when they are “in ‘hot pursuit’ of a fugitive” (Steagald v. United States, supra, 451 U.S. at 221) or under other “exigent circumstances” (see § 23.20 infra) that make it impracticable to obtain a warrant (Steagald v. United States, supra, 451 U.S. at 213-16, 218, 221-22; Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91, 100-01 (1990) (elaborated in § 23.20). This position is supported by the lead opinion in Commonwealth v. Romero, 183 A.3d 364 (Pa. 2018), which meticulously analyzes the pertinent authorities and concludes that

“the Fourth Amendment requires that, even when seeking to execute an arrest warrant, a law enforcement entry into a home must be authorized by a warrant reflecting a magisterial determination of probable cause to search that home, whether by a separate search warrant or contained within the arrest warrant itself. Absent such a warrant, an entry into a residence is excused only by a recognized exception to the search warrant requirement.” (Id. at 405-06.)

On its facts, the Romero case did not involve a police entry into the home of the person they were seeking to arrest; the home they thought was his turned out to be his half-brother’s; and it was the half-brother’s family whose Fourth Amendment rights the Pennsylvania Supreme Court’s lead opinion held ex post to have been violated. But the logic of the opinion would require the same result if the house had been his, because the police action and its justification are identical ex ante in the two situations. It is hornbook Fourth Amendment law that the lawfulness of a search or seizure depends on the circumstances as they appeared to officers at the time they acted (see § 23.07(d) supra); its “reasonableness . . . must be measured by what the officers knew before they conducted their search” (Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266, 271 (2000)).

At the least, Payton’s requirement that arresting officers have “reason to believe” that the person named in their arrest warrant “lives [in]” and is currently “within” the premises they enter should be construed as demanding probable cause for belief that these two preconditions exist. See Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325, 332 (1990) (dictum) (an arrest entry can be sustained only when the officers “[p]ossessing an arrest warrant . . . [have] probable cause to believe [that the person named in the warrant] was in his home”); Lankford v. Geist, 364 F.2d 197 (4th Cir. 1966); United States v. Vasquez-Algarin, 821 F.3d 467 (3d Cir. 2016) (surveying conflicting federal circuit court decisions and concluding that the better rule is that a valid arrest entry requires probable cause (id. at 477-80) to believe “that the arrestee resided at and was present within the targeted home” (id. at 472)). Similarly, if the police act without an arrest warrant in reliance on a claim of exigent circumstances, “there must be at least probable cause to believe” that facts exist which give rise to “the need to prevent a suspect’s escape, or the risk of danger to the police or to other persons inside or outside the dwelling” or which presage the “imminent destruction of evidence.” Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91, 100 (1990). The mere “inherent mobility’ of persons” sought to be arrested does not suffice to establish the requisite exigency because the police can cope with that problem “simply by waiting for a suspect to leave the [premises]” (cf. Steagald v. United States, supra, 451 U.S. at 221 n.14).

Police making any of the permissible types of arrest entry without a search warrant – entries pursuant to an arrest warrant, “hot pursuit” entries, and entries under exigent circumstances – are governed by the following rules:

658
(i) The intended arrest itself must be valid within the principles of § 23.07 supra. If the arrest is not valid, the arrest entry falls with it. E.g., Massachusetts v. Painten, 368 F.2d 142 (1st Cir. 1966), cert. dismissed, 389 U.S. 560 (1968).

(ii) Upon entry, the police may “search anywhere in the house that . . . [the person sought] might . . . [be] found” (id. at 330). However, the entry and search may not exceed the bounds appropriate in hunting for a person (id. at 335-36), and they may not intrude into closed areas too small to contain a human being (see United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 824 (1982) (dictum)), unless the officers have probable cause to believe that the person sought to be arrested is armed and that they therefore “need to check the entire premises [for weapons] for safety reasons” (Payton v. New York, supra, 445 U.S. at 589 (dictum); see Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 298-300 (1967)). Cf. Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987), elaborated in § 23.22(b) infra.

(iii) “Once . . . [the person sought has been] found, . . . the search for him . . . [is] over, and there . . . [is] no longer that particular justification for entering any rooms that had not yet been searched.” Maryland v. Buie, supra, 494 U.S. at 333. “[A]s an incident to the arrest the officers could, as a precautionary matter and without probable cause or reasonable suspicion, look in closets and other spaces immediately adjoining the place of arrest from which an attack could be immediately launched.” Id. at 334. See also § 23.08 supra. “Beyond that, however, . . . [the only basis for continuing the search or entering additional rooms after the arrest is the “protective sweep” doctrine described in § 23.22(d) infra, which requires] articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, would warrant a reasonably prudent officer in believing that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene.” Maryland v. Buie, supra, 494 U.S. at 334.

Another limited exception to the search warrant requirement is a kind of hybrid of “arrest entry” reasoning and “consent” reasoning. In Washington v. Chrisman, 455 U.S. 1 (1982), the United States Supreme Court held that when a person who has been validly arrested in a location other than his or her home requests and receives permission from the arresting officer to return home before being taken to the lockup, the officer may accompany that person into the home, as an exercise of “the arresting officer’s authority to maintain custody over the arrested person” (id. at 6). Contra, State v. Chrisman, 100 Wash. 2d 814, 676 P.2d 419 (1984) (on remand, the Washington Supreme Court rejects the Washington v. Chrisman holding on state constitutional grounds).

To bring the Payton and Steagald warrant requirements into play, it is not always necessary that the police have entered closed quarters before effecting an arrest. Arrests on the threshold of a residence or just outside it are sufficient. See, e.g., United States v. Allen, 813 F.3d 76, 79, 85-86 (2d Cir. 2016) (defendant, who opened his apartment door at police officers’ request and spoke to the officers from “‘inside the threshold’ while the officers stood on the sidewalk,” “was under arrest” when “[t]he officers told Allen that he would need to come down to the police station to be processed for the assault,” and the police thereby violated _Payton_ even though the police had not yet physically entered the apartment: “While it is true that physical intrusion is the ‘chief evil’ the Fourth Amendment is designed to protect against, . . . we reject the government’s contention that this fact requires that _Payton_’s warrant requirement be limited to cases in which the arresting officers themselves cross the threshold of the home before effecting an arrest. The protections of the home extend beyond instances of actual trespass. . . . By advising Allen that he was under arrest, and taking control of his further movements, the officers asserted their power over him _inside his home_.”); _United States v. Nora_, 765 F.3d 1049, 1054, 1060 (9th Cir. 2014) (“The government properly concedes that the police arrested Nora ‘inside’ his home for purposes of the _Payton_ rule. Although officers physically took Nora into custody outside his home in the front yard, they accomplished that feat only by surrounding his house and ordering him to come out at gunpoint. We’ve held that forcing a suspect to exit his home in those circumstances constitutes an in-home arrest under _Payton_.” “Although Nora’s arrest was supported by probable cause, the manner in which officers made the arrest violated _Payton_. Evidence obtained as a result of Nora’s unlawful arrest must be suppressed.”); _People v. Gonzales_, 111 A.D.3d 147, 148-50, 972 N.Y.S.2d 642, 643-44 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013) (police who were told by a complainant that her cousin’s boyfriend had assaulted her in a basement apartment went to the door of that apartment accompanied by the complainant; they knocked; “[w]hen the defendant opened the door, the police asked the complainant if he was the person who had assaulted her, and she said yes. The defendant, who had never left the apartment, even partially, tried to close the door, but the police pushed their way inside and handcuffed him. Minutes later, still inside the apartment, the defendant made an inculpatory statement. . . . ¶ In _Payton v. New York_, 445 U.S. 573 . . . the United States Supreme Court announced a clear and easily applied rule with respect to warrantless arrests in the home: ‘the Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house. Absent exigent circumstances, that threshold may not reasonably be crossed without a warrant’ . . . . The rule under the New York Constitution is the same (see N.Y. Const., art. 1, § 12; _People v. Levan_, 62 N.Y.2d 139, 144, 476 N.Y.S.2d 101, 464 N.E.2d 469). _Payton_ and _Levan_ require suppression of the defendant’s statement under the clear, undisputed facts of this case.”).

§ 23.20 WARRANTLESS ENTRY UNDER “EXIGENT CIRCUMSTANCES”

As mentioned earlier in § 23.19 _supra_, the police may make a warrantless entry for the purpose of effecting an arrest under “exigent circumstances” that preclude the acquisition of an arrest warrant. Thus, in _Warden v. Hayden_, 387 U.S. 294 (1967), the Court approved a building entry by officers without a warrant for the purpose of arresting a fugitive under circumstances of “hot pursuit”: The police observed the defendant flee from the crime scene, saw him enter the building, and reached the building less than five minutes after the defendant. _Cf. United States v. Santana_, 427 U.S. 38, 42-43 & n.3 (1976); _Steagald v. United States_, 451 U.S. 204, 218, 221-22 (1981) (dictum).
“[T]he police bear a heavy burden when attempting to demonstrate an urgent need that might justify warrantless searches or arrests.” Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740, 749-50 (1984). “Before agents of the government may invade the sanctity of the home, the burden is on the government to demonstrate exigent circumstances that overcome the presumption of unreasonableness that attaches to all warrantless home entries.” Id. at 750. Accord, Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30, 34-35 (1970); G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338, 358-59 (1977); Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 393-94 (1978); Brigham City v. Stuart, 547 U.S. 398, 403 (2006). “[I]n the absence of hot pursuit there must be at least probable cause to believe that [facts constituting exigent circumstances – such as the “‘imminent destruction of evidence, . . . or the need to prevent a suspect’s escape, or the risk of danger to the police or to other persons inside or outside the dwelling’” – are] . . . present.” Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91, 100 (1990).

See, e.g., United States v. Collins, 510 F.3d 697, 701 (7th Cir. 2007) (the government’s claim of “exigent circumstances” for a warrantless entry of a dwelling, based on an asserted risk of destruction of evidence, is rejected because “[t]he government has failed to show that in this case the police had probable cause to believe that evidence was being, or was about to be, destroyed when they entered”); United States v. Ramirez, 676 F.3d 755, 762 (8th Cir. 2012) (hotel room occupant’s “attempt to shut the door once he became aware of the police presence outside [the] room” – by partially opening the door in response to an officer’s knocking and claiming to be housekeeping staff – did not provide a reasonable basis for believing that “the destruction of evidence was imminent”: the occupant “was under no obligation to allow the officers to enter the premises at that point and was likewise within his bounds in his attempt to close the door”); Turrubiate v. State, 399 S.W.3d 147, 149, 154 (Tex. Crim. App. 2013) (an exigent circumstances exception is not supported by “probable cause to believe that illegal drugs are in a home coupled with an odor of marijuana from the home and a police officer making his presence known to the occupants”; there must be “additional evidence of . . . attempted or actual destruction based on an occupant’s movement in response to the police knock”). Compare Kentucky v. King, 563 U.S. 452, 455, 462, 471 (2011) (if the police had a reasonable basis to believe that evidence in a dwelling was at risk of imminent destruction, which the Court “assume[s] for purposes of argument,” the exigent circumstances exception could justify a warrantless entry of the dwelling even though “the police, by knocking on the door of a residence and announcing their presence, cause[d] the occupants to attempt to destroy evidence.” As long as “[t]he conduct of the police prior to their entry into the apartment was entirely lawful,” and “the police did not create the exigency by engaging or threatening to engage in conduct that violates the Fourth Amendment,” “the exigent circumstances rule applies”), with King v. Commonwealth, 386 S.W.3d 119, 122 (Ky. 2012), cert. denied, 133 S. Ct. 1995 (2013) (on remand of Kentucky v. King from the U.S. Supreme Court, the Kentucky Supreme Court holds that “the Commonwealth failed to meet its burden of demonstrating exigent circumstances justifying a warrantless entry” because “the sounds . . . [from inside the dwelling that the police] described at the suppression hearing [as evidencing efforts to destroy evidence] were indistinguishable from ordinary household sounds, and were consistent with the natural and reasonable result of a knock on the door”), and State v. Campbell, 300 P.3d 72, 74, 78-79 (Kan. 2013) (“the exigent circumstances exception does not apply in light of the officer’s unreasonable actions in creating the exigency” by not “simply knock[ing] on the door and wait[ing] for an answer . . . [or announc[ing] his presence” but instead] covering the peephole and positioning himself to block the occupant’s ability to determine who was standing at the door,” thereby causing an occupant to “open[ ] the door about a third of the way” while visibly armed with a gun).

In Welsh v. Wisconsin, the Court held that in cases of arrest entries under a claim of exigent circumstances, “an important factor to be considered in determining whether any exigency exists is the gravity of the underlying offense for which the arrest is being made.” 466 U.S. at 753. Explaining that “application of the exigent-circumstances exception in the context of a home entry should rarely be sanctioned when there is probable cause to believe that only a minor offense . . . has been committed,” id., the Court in Welsh struck down a warrantless home entry to make an arrest for the offense of driving while intoxicated. The Court found that “the best indication of the State’s interest in precipitating an arrest” was the State’s classification of the offense as “a noncriminal, civil forfeiture offense” and refused to allow an arrest entry for such an offense, notwithstanding the risk that “evidence of the petitioner’s blood-alcohol level might have dissipated while the police obtained a warrant.” Id. at 754. The Welsh opinion did not go quite as far as holding that “warrantless entry to arrest a misdemeanant is never justified, but only that such entry should be rare.” Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3, 6 (2013) (per curiam). There is, however, language in the Welsh opinion that supports a categorical rule limiting warrantless arrest entries under exigent circumstances to felony arrests. See Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. at 750 n.12, 752-53. At the very least, Welsh “counsel[s] that suspicion of minor offenses should give rise to exigencies only in the rarest of circumstances.” White v. Stanley, 745 F.3d 237, 240-41 (7th Cir. 2014) (“smell of burning marijuana” inside a house did not provide a basis for exigent-circumstances entry of the house). See also Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. at 100-01 (holding that the lower court “applied essentially the correct standard in determining . . . that in assessing the risk of danger, the gravity of the crime and likelihood that the suspect is armed should be considered,” and approving the lower court’s “fact-specific application of th[is] . . . proper legal standard . . . [to reject a claim of exigent circumstances even though the] grave crime [of murder] was involved . . . [because] respondent ‘was known not to be the murderer but thought to be the driver of the getaway car,’ . . . and . . . the police had already recovered the murder weapon”); Harris v. O’Hare, 770 F.3d 224, 235 (2d Cir. 2014). Cf. Brigham City v. Stuart, 547 U.S. at 405 (distinguishing Welsh v. Wisconsin on the ground that “Welsh involved a warrantless entry by officers to arrest a suspect for driving while intoxicated” and “the ‘only potential emergency’ confronting the officers was the need to preserve evidence (i.e., the suspect’s blood-alcohol level)” whereas “[h]ere, the officers were confronted with ongoing violence occurring within the home”); Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. at 6 (noting that in Welsh “there was no immediate or continuous pursuit of [Welsh] from the scene of a crime” and cautioning that “despite our emphasis in Welsh on the fact that the crime at issue was minor – indeed, a mere nonjailable civil offense – nothing in the opinion establishes that the seriousness of the crime is equally important in cases of hot pursuit”; the “federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect,” id. at 5 (citing cases)).
When the police make a valid arrest entry in “hot pursuit,” they may lawfully observe anything in the building that comes into “plain view” while they are seeking out the suspect and effecting his or her arrest, and they may seize objects in “plain view” if, but only if, there is probable cause to believe that the objects are contraband or crime-related. See § 23.22(b) infra. They may not search the premises more intensively or intrusively than is necessary to find the person sought to be arrested, see Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987), except when that person is known to be armed. In Warden v. Hayden, the Court did allow police who entered a building in “hot pursuit” of an armed fugitive to make a warrantless search within the building to the extent necessary to find weapons. 387 U.S. at 298-300. But see, e.g., People v. Jenkins, 24 N.Y.3d 62, 65, 20 N.E.3d 639, 641, 995 N.Y.S.2d 694, 696 (2014) (although the police lawfully broke down the door of an apartment as they pursued an armed suspect into the apartment and also acted lawfully in searching the apartment and arresting the defendant and another man who were hiding under a bed, the officers’ subsequent search of a closed box – which was found to contain a gun – was unlawful and therefore the gun should have been suppressed: “by the time [the] Officer . . . opened the box, any urgency justifying the warrantless search had abated” because “[t]he officers had handcuffed the men and removed them to the living room where they (and the two women) remained under police supervision,” and thus “the police ‘were in complete control of the house’” and “there was no danger that defendant would dispose of or destroy the weapon . . . nor was there any danger to the public or the police”; accordingly, “the police were required to obtain a warrant prior to searching the box”).

In addition to “hot pursuit” arrest entries, law enforcement officers may make warrantless building entries in the “exigent circumstances” presented by a manifest need to render assistance to an occupant who is in physical danger or to prevent serious bodily injury. See City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1774-75 (2015) (police officers, who were dispatched to a group home for mentally ill residents to help take a resident to a secure ward at a hospital, did not violate the Fourth Amendment by using a social worker’s key to enter the resident’s room when she did not respond to the officers’ knocking on her door, announcing their identity, and saying that they wanted to help her; the officers’ subsequent reentry of the apartment, after they initially retreated in the face of the resident’s approaching them with a knife and threatening to kill them, also was justified as “part of a single, continuous” entry in a “continuing emergency” in which the police “knew that delay could make the situation more dangerous”); Michigan v. Fisher, 558 U.S. 45, 47-49 (2009) (per curiam) (the “emergency aid exception” to the warrant requirement – which permits “law enforcement officials . . . [to] enter a home without a warrant to render emergency assistance to an injured occupant or to protect an occupant from imminent injury” – justified a warrantless entry of a home by police officers who “respond[ed] . . . to a report of a disturbance” and, upon “arriv[ing] at the scene,” “encountered a tumultuous situation in the house,” “found signs of a recent injury, perhaps from a car accident, outside,” and “could see violent behavior inside” the house; the circumstances were sufficient to justify a reasonable belief on the officers’ part that an occupant “had hurt himself (albeit non-fatally) and needed treatment that in his rage he was unable to provide, or that [the occupant] was about to hurt, or had already hurt someone else.”); Brigham City v. Stuart, 547 U.S. at 403 (“law enforcement officers may enter a home without a warrant to render emergency assistance to an injured occupant or to protect an occupant from imminent injury’); Michigan v. Tyler, 436 U.S. 499, 509-10 (1978) (firefighting officials require neither “a warrant [n]or consent before entering a burning structure to put out the blaze,” id. at 509; and, because “[f]ire officials are charged not only with extinguishing fires, but with finding their causes,” id. at 510, they “need no warrant [or consent] to remain in a building for a reasonable time to investigate the cause of a blaze after it has been extinguished,” id.). See also, e.g., Ryburn v. Huff, 565 U.S. 469, 474-77 (2012) (per curiam); United States v. Barone, 330 F.2d 543 (2d Cir. 1964); Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. at 392-93 (dictum), and authorities cited; but see Carlson v. Fewins, 801 F.3d 668 (6th Cir. 2015) (exigency dissipated).

In dicta, the Supreme Court has frequently suggested the existence of a more general “exigent circumstances” exception to the warrant requirement. See, e.g., Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10, 14-15 (1948); United States v. Jeffers, 342 U.S. 48, 51 (1951); Chapman v. United States, 365 U.S. 610, 615 (1961); Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. at 392-94; Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 702 n.17 (1981); Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. 2160, 2173-74 (2016); cf. Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465, 471 (1979); New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 457 (1981). However, the Court has never sustained a warrantless building entry on the “exigent circumstances” theory when the purpose of the entry was to make a search unassociated with an arrest or with the peacekeeping responsibilities of the police to provide emergency aid and to avert serious bodily injury. Probably the “exigent circumstances” exception extends no further than “hot pursuit” and “emergency assistance” cases, see Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. at 34-35; Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. at 392-93, although the tenor of some of the Supreme Court dicta does. See State v. Vargas, 213 N.J. 301, 305, 313-17, 321-26, 63 A.3d 175, 177, 182-84, 187-89 (2013) (reviewing relevant decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court and concluding that these decisions do not support treating the “community-caretaking” function of the police – as manifested here by the police officers’ seeking to “check on the welfare of a resident” in response to concerns expressed by the landlord – as “a justification for the warrantless entry and search of a home in the absence of some form of an objectively reasonable emergency”).

§ 23.21 “KNOCK AND ANNOUNCE” REQUIREMENTS: RESTRICTIONS UPON THE MANNER OF POLICE ENTRY

The preceding sections deal with restrictions upon the circumstances under which building entries can be made. There are also legal restrictions upon the manner of police entry.

In most jurisdictions, “knock and announce” statutes require that the police announce their presence and identity as officers, explain the purpose of their intended entry, and request to be admitted peaceably, before they may break and enter. See, e.g., Miller v. United States, 357 U.S. 301 (1958) (construing 18 U.S.C. § 3109 and the local law of the District of Columbia). Although these statutes are commonly framed in terms of police “breaking” open a door, their requirements are usually held to apply whenever the police open any door, whether locked or unlocked, forcibly or nonforcibly, see Sabbath v. United States, 391 U.S. 585 (1968), and in some jurisdictions the statutes are also applied to police entries through an already open door,

The statutes or cases construing the statutes usually provide for emergency exceptions to the “knock and announce” requirement. The exceptions commonly include situations in which there is reasonable ground to believe that an announcement would (i) jeopardize the safety of the entering officer, (ii) cause the destruction of evidence, or (iii) be a “useless gesture” because it is apparent from the surrounding circumstances that the occupants of the premises already know of the authority and purpose of the police. See, e.g., Miller v. United States, 357 U.S. at 308-10; Sabbath v. United States, 391 U.S. at 591; cf. Dalia v. United States, 441 U.S. 238, 247-48 (1979); Washington v. Chrisman, 455 U.S. 1, 10 n.7 (1982).

The Supreme Court has recognized that “knock and announce” requirements are embodied in the Fourth Amendment. See Wilson v. Arkansas, 514 U.S. 927 (1995) (the “common-law ‘knock and announce’ principle forms a part of the reasonableness inquiry under the Fourth Amendment”). Accord, United States v. Banks, 540 U.S. 31, 36-37 (2003); United States v. Ramirez, 523 U.S. 65, 70 (1998); Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385, 387 (1997); and see Jones v. Kirchner, 835 F.3d 74, 79-80 (D.C. Cir. 2016); Terebesi v. Torresso, 764 F.3d 217, 241-43 (2d Cir. 2014). Cf. Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348 (2014) (per curiam). The Court has held, however, that the exclusionary rule is not available to suppress evidence obtained in the course of a building entry that is unconstitutional solely because the entering officers violated the Fourth Amendment “knock and announce” rule. Hudson v. Michigan, 547 U.S. 586, 599-600, 602 (2006). See id. at 602-03 (Justice Kennedy, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, thus supplying the vote necessary to produce a 5-Justice majority, but writing separately to “underscore[ ]” the following “[t]wo points”: “First, the knock-and-announce requirement protects rights and expectations linked to ancient principles in our constitutional order . . . [and] [t]he Court’s decision should not be interpreted as suggesting that violations of the requirement are trivial or beyond the law’s concern. Second, the continued operation of the exclusionary rule, as settled and defined by our precedents, is not in doubt. Today’s decision determines only that in the specific context of the knock-and-announce requirement, a violation is not sufficiently related to the later discovery of evidence to justify suppression.”). Because Hudson v. Michigan concerned only the consequences of a federal Fourth Amendment violation, it does not preclude state courts from enforcing their respective state-law “knock and announce” requirements by exclusion and suppression. See, e.g., State v. Jean-Paul, 295 P.3d 1072, 1076 (N.M. App. 2013) (adhering to New Mexico’s pre-Hudson exclusionary rule: “[W]hile both the federal and state constitutions include the knock-and-announce requirement, the remedies for a violation under the two constitutions are not the same.”); State v. Rockford, 213 N.J. 424, 453, 64 A.3d 514, 530 (2013) (reserving the question “whether the exclusionary rule is the appropriate remedy for an unconstitutional execution of a knock-and-announce warrant under our State Constitution” in the wake of Hudson); § 7.09 supra. For the reason stated in § 23.17 concluding paragraph supra, the case for state-law rejection of Hudson is a strong one. See, e.g., State v. Cable, 51 So. 3d 434 (Fla. 2010) (“[I]n Benefield v. State, 160 So. 2d 706 (Fla.1964), . . . this Court held that a violation of Florida’s knock-and-announce statute vitiated the ensuing arrest and required the suppression of the evidence obtained in connection with the arrest.” Id. at 435.
“[T]he [Benefield] Court noted that ‘[s]ection 901.19, Florida Statutes, . . . appears to represent a codification of the English common law . . . . ¶ ‘Entering one’s home without legal authority and neglect to give the occupants notice have been condemned by the law and the common custom of this country and England from time immemorial. It was condemned by the yearbooks of Edward IV, before the discovery of this country by Columbus. . . . ¶ This sentiment has moulded our concept of the home as one’s castle as well as the law to protect it. The law forbids the law enforcement officers of the state or the United States to enter before knocking at the door, giving his name and the purpose of his call. There is nothing more terrifying to the occupants than to be suddenly confronted in the privacy of their home by a police officer decorated with guns and the insignia of his office. This is why the law protects its entrance so rigidly.’” Id. at 439. “[B]ecause Hudson does not address the remedy for state-created statutory violations, Hudson does not require us to recede from Benefield.” Id. at 442.; Berumen v. State, 182 P.3d 635 (Alaska App. 2008) (“[T]he issue before us is one of state law, so the United States Supreme Court's decision in Hudson does not bind us.” Id. at 637. “The police officers in this case violated a longstanding requirement of Alaska law that is designed to protect the privacy and dignity of this state’s citizens. On the issue of whether the police must announce their claimed authority and purpose, and on the related issue of whether the police are allowed to break into a building if they have neither sought nor been refused admittance, the statute is written in clear and unambiguous terms. . . . ¶ . . . [T]he evidence found in the hotel room was ‘secured through such a flagrant disregard’ of the procedure specified by the Alaska legislature that it ‘cannot be allowed to stand without making the courts themselves accomplices in [willful] disobedience of [the] law.’” Id. at 642.).

Police entries that involve SWAT-squad tactics or other exercises of massive force can be challenged as unreasonable searches and as violations of Due Process under both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments (see, e.g., Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 430 F.3d 140, 151-53 (3d Cir. 2005); Milan v. Bolin, 795 F.3d 726 (7th Cir. 2015); Carlson v. Fewins, 801 F.3d 668 (6th Cir. 2015); Greer v. City of Highland Park, Michigan, 884 F.3d 310 (6th Cir. 2018)), and state law if they are excessively violent. Hudson should not withdraw the Fourth Amendment exclusionary remedy in such cases, because they would evoke the independent principle of Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952), which is, at its root, a prohibition against “convictions . . . brought about by methods that offend ‘a sense of justice’” (id. at 173 (emphasis added)) or governmental “conduct that shocks the conscience” (id. at 172).

§ 23.22 SCOPE OF PERMISSIBLE POLICE ACTIVITY AFTER ENTERING THE PREMISES

§ 23.22(a) The Requisite Relationship Between Police Activity Inside the Dwelling and the Purpose of the Entry

The scope of an officer’s investigatory powers, once inside a building, is defined by the circumstances that permitted his or her entry under the principles of §§ 23.16-23.20 supra. United States v. King, 227 F.3d 732, 750-54, 755 (6th Cir. 2000); United States v. Sedaghaty, 728 F.3d 885, 910-15 (9th Cir. 2013); United States v. Angelos, 433 F.3d 738, 746 (10th Cir. 2006). This is a corollary of the general rule that “the purposes justifying a police search strictly limit the permissible extent of the search.” Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79, 87 (1987) (dictum). Accord, id. at 84 (“the scope of a lawful search is ‘defined by the object of the search and the places in which there is probable cause to believe that it may be found’”). See also, e.g., Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 611 (1999) (dictum) (“the Fourth Amendment . . . require[s] that police actions in execution of a warrant be related to the objectives of the authorized intrusion”); New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 457 (1981) (dictum) (“'[t]he scope of [a] search must be strictly tied to and justified by’ the circumstances which rendered its initiation permissible’”); Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128, 140 (1990) (dictum) (“'[i]f the scope of the search exceeds that permitted by the terms of a validly issued warrant or the character of the relevant exception from the warrant requirement, the subsequent seizure is unconstitutional without more’”). A search must be “carefully tailored to its justifications,” so as to avoid “tak[ing] on the character of the wide-ranging exploratory searches the Framers [of the Fourth Amendment] intended to prohibit.” Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. at 84. See also Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325, 335-36 (1990). Cf. United States v. Foster, 100 F.3d 846, 849 (10th Cir. 2006) (“Under the law of this circuit, ‘even evidence which is properly seized pursuant to a warrant must be suppressed if the officers executing the warrant exhibit “flagrant disregard” for its terms.’ . . . The basis for blanket suppression when a search warrant is executed with flagrant disregard for its terms ‘is found in our traditional repugnance to “general searches” which were conducted in the colonies pursuant to writs of assistance.’ . . . To protect against invasive and arbitrary general searches, the Fourth Amendment mandates that search warrants ‘particularly describ[e] the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.’”).

Thus, as explained in § 23.17(g) supra, when the police enter a dwelling or other premises pursuant to a search warrant, the search ordinarily may not extend into areas that are not covered by the warrant or into areas that could not contain the objects specified in the warrant. If the entry was predicated upon the consent of a member of the household, the officers’ movement within the home is limited by the scope of the consent that was given and the extent of the individual’s authority to consent. See § 23.18 supra. If the entry was made for the purpose of effecting an arrest, whether with or without a warrant, the officers possess only the freedom of movement necessary to locate and to apprehend the person sought to be arrested (see § 23.19 supra), unless they can justify a further search of the premises as a “protective sweep” (see § 23.22(d) infra). If the entry was made in the exercise of the officers’ peacekeeping functions, they may not undertake even the most minimal search beyond the needs of those functions. Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987). See, e.g., In the Matter of the Welfare of J.W.L., 732 N.W.2d 332, 339 (Minn. App. 2007) (police officer, who lawfully entered a dwelling without a warrant under the exigent circumstances exception due to a 911 call from inside the dwelling, thereafter violated the Fourth Amendment by taking photographs of graffiti in a bedroom that were subsequently used to connect the respondent to graffiti incidents).

§ 23.22(b) Police Officers’ Search and Seizure of Objects While Searching the Premises; The “Plain View” Exception to the Warrant Requirement
Often, while inside a building, dwelling unit, or other premises, police officers catch sight of an object that they believe to be contraband or evidence of a crime. The officer will then inspect the object further or will seize it.

As explained in § 23.15(d) supra, a respondent has a constitutionally protected interest against the search or seizure of an object that belongs to him or her, regardless of whether s/he is on the premises at the time the search or seizure takes place, and regardless of whether s/he has any privacy interest in the premises. Like other searches and seizures made without a warrant, “warrantless searches of such effects are presumptively unreasonable,” United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 114-15 (1984), and must be brought within one of the exceptions to the warrant requirement in order to be valid.

However, an officer’s mere observation of an object from a location where the officer is entitled to be is not considered a “search” within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. See § 23.16 supra. “[O]bjects falling in the plain view of an officer who has a right to be in the position to have that view” may be scrutinized without any further justification and without Fourth Amendment limitation. Harris v. United States, 390 U.S. 234, 236 (1968); see Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321, 325 (1987) (dictum). As long as the officer’s entry and movement to the location were justified by either a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement, the “viewing of the object in the course of a lawful search is as legitimate as it would have been in a public place.” Id. at 327.

Although simple observation of the object is not a constitutionally regulated “search,” any action by the police that “‘meaningfully interfere[s]’ with [a] respondent’s possessory interest in [an object] . . . amount[s] to a seizure” within the Fourth Amendment. Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. at 324; Horton v. California, 496 U.S. at 136-37. And any physical manipulation of the object that reveals its hidden features or contents is a “search” of the object. Thus, in Hicks, when officers who had entered a residence in an emergency peace-keeping situation observed what they suspected to be stolen stereo equipment, the Court acknowledged in dictum that their “mere recording” of a stereo component’s serial number would not constitute a search or seizure if the serial number was in plain view, 480 U.S. at 324, but the Court held that when the officers went beyond merely observing the stereo equipment and moved it slightly for the purpose of disclosing serial numbers that were not in plain view, their action constituted a “search of objects in plain view,” id. at 327. This was an “independent search,” “unrelated to the objectives of the authorized intrusion” into the residence, which “produce[d] a new invasion of respondent’s privacy,” and it consequently violated the Fourth Amendment in the absence of adequate justification. Id. at 325.

To justify a “seizure” or a “search” of an object which is in “plain view,” the prosecution must demonstrate that the following three conditions are satisfied:

(i) The officer must be lawfully in the location from which s/he observed the object. See, e.g., Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. at 326 (“‘the initial intrusion that brings the police within plain view of such [evidence] [must be] . . . supported . . . by one of the recognized exceptions to the warrant requirement,’ . . . such as the exigent-circumstances [exception]”); Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663, 1672 (2018) (“‘any valid warrantless seizure of incriminating evidence’ requires that the officer ‘have a lawful right of access to the object itself’”); Horton v. California, 496 U.S. at 137 (“[i]t is, of course, an essential predicate to any valid warrantless seizure of incriminating evidence that the officer did not violate the Fourth Amendment in arriving at the place from which the evidence could be plainly viewed”); State v. Kruse, 306 S.W.3d 603 (Mo. App. 2010); cf. Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1 (2013); Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366, 375 (1993), discussed in § 23.10 supra (police must be “lawfully in a position from which they view an object”).

(ii) The seizure or search of the object must be justified by “probable cause to believe the [object] . . . was stolen,” Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. at 328, or is “contraband,” id. at 327 (dictum), or was an instrument or is evidence of a crime. Cf. Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. at 375 (police must have “probable cause to believe that an object in plain view is contraband”). As the Court explained in Arizona v. Hicks, a seizure or search of an object discovered “during an unrelated search and seizure” must be justified under the same “standard of cause” that “would have been needed to obtain a warrant for that same object if it had been known to be on the premises.” Id. at 327. The “incriminating character [of the object] must . . . be ‘immediately apparent.’” Horton v. California, 496 U.S. at 136. Cf. Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. at 375 (“If . . . the police lack probable cause to believe that an object in plain view is contraband without conducting some further search of the object – i.e., if ‘its incriminating character [is not] ‘immediately apparent,’” . . . – the plain-view doctrine cannot justify its seizure.”). Thus, in Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971), the plain view exception did not justify a police seizure of “two automobiles parked in plain view on the defendant’s driveway . . . [because even though] the cars were obviously in plain view, . . . their probative value remained uncertain until after the interiors were swept and examined microscopically.” Horton v. California, 496 U.S. at 134-37 (explaining the holding in Coolidge). Compare id. at 142 (upholding a police seizure of firearms and stun guns in plain view under circumstances in which “it was immediately apparent to the officer that they constituted incriminating evidence”). See also, e.g., People v. Sanders, 26 N.Y.3d 773, 775, 777-78, 47 N.E.3d 770, 771-72, 27 N.Y.S.3d 491, 492-93 (2016) (a police officer’s warrantless seizure of the hospitalized defendant’s clothes, which “were in a clear plastic bag that rested on the floor of a trauma room a short distance away from the stretcher on which defendant was situated in a hospital hallway,” was not justified by the plain view exception because, although the officer “knew defendant to have been shot,” the officer did not have “probable cause to believe that defendant’s clothes were the instrumentality of a crime” since the officer did not know at that time “that entry and exit wounds were located on an area of defendant’s body that would have been covered by the clothes defendant wore at the time of the shooting.”). If a police officer has probable cause to believe that a substance seized in plain view is a narcotic, then the additional seizure involved in destroying a minute amount of the substance in the course of a narcotic “field test” does not necessitate a search warrant. United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. at 124-26.
(The probable-cause requirement just described is subject to a narrow exception under exigent circumstances when “the seizure is minimally intrusive and operational necessities render it the only practicable means of detecting certain types of crime.” Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. at 327. The limits of this principle are discussed in the second paragraph of § 23.12 supra.)

(iii) In cases in which a police seizure of an object involves an invasion of the respondent’s interests above and beyond the initial observation of the object, the additional intrusion also must be constitutionally justified. “[N]ot only must the officer be lawfully located in a place from which the object can be plainly seen, but he or she must also have a lawful right of access to the object itself,” Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128, 137 (1990). Cf. Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. at 375 (“the officers [must] have a lawful right of access to the object”). Cf. United States v. Saulsberry, 878 F.3d 946 (10th Cir. 2017), summarized in § 23.08(c) supra. Thus, for example, “‘[i]ncontrovertible testimony of the senses that an incriminating object is on premises belonging to a criminal suspect may establish the fullest possible measure of probable cause. But even where the object is contraband, this Court has repeatedly stated and enforced the basic rule that the police may not enter and make a warrantless seizure.’” Horton v. California, 496 U.S. at 137 n.7. See, e.g., People v. Vega, 276 A.D.2d 414, 414, 714 N.Y.S.2d 291, 291-92 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2000) (police officers, who observed contraband in the defendant’s room from the officers’ “lawful vantage point” in “the hallway in th[e] residential hotel” could not rely on the “plain view” doctrine to enter the room and seize the contraband: “it was still necessary to establish that the police had lawful access to the [interior of the defendant’s room] . . . either by way of a search warrant or some exception to the warrant requirement, such as exigent circumstances.”).

In Coolidge v. New Hampshire, a plurality of the Court concluded that the plain view doctrine should also be subject to a requirement that “the discovery of [the] evidence in plain view . . . be inadvertent,” 403 U.S. at 469. Subsequently, in Horton v. California, a majority of the Court rejected this rule, holding that “even though inadvertence is a characteristic of most legitimate ‘plain view’ seizures, it is not a necessary condition.” 496 U.S. at 130. However, in the two decades between the Coolidge and Horton decisions, state court decisions in 46 States had followed the Coolidge plurality’s approach of recognizing an “inadvertent discovery” requirement for “plain view” searches and seizures. Horton, 496 U.S. at 145 (dissenting opinion of Justice Brennan); see id. at 149-52, Appendix A (listing the state court decisions). In many of these States, it may be possible to persuade the state courts to retain the “inadvertent discovery” rule as a matter of state constitutional law. See, e.g., State v. Meyer, 78 Hawai‘i 308, 314 & n.6, 893 P.2d 159, 165 & n.6 (1995); Commonwealth v. Balicki, 436 Mass. 1, 9-10, 762 N.E.2d 290, 298 (2002). See generally § 7.09 supra.

§ 23.22(c) Detention and Searches of Persons Found on the Premises

Sometimes, in executing a search warrant for a dwelling, the police detain and search one or more individuals who were on the premises at the time the police entered.
If the search warrant specifically names a certain person and authorizes the search of that person, then the police may conduct the search as long as the warrant and the search comply with the requirements described in § 23.17 supra. If the warrant does not authorize the search of individuals but merely authorizes a search of the premises to find certain objects, then the officers cannot extend their search of the premises to the individuals present on the premises. “[A] warrant to search a place cannot normally be construed to authorize a search of each individual in that place.” Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85, 92 n.4 (1979). See also United States v. Watson, 703 F.3d 684, 689-94 (4th Cir. 2013). If the police have specific and articulable facts giving rise to a reasonable belief that a particular individual on the premises is armed and dangerous, then the officers may conduct a Terry frisk of that individual. See § 23.10 supra. But “[t]he ‘narrow scope’ of the Terry exception does not permit a frisk for weapons on less than reasonable belief or suspicion directed at the person to be frisked, even though that person happens to be on premises where an authorized . . . search is taking place.” Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. at 94.

In Ybarra, the Court struck down a police pat-down of a patron of a bar, who was on the premises during the execution of a search warrant for the bar and the bartender. The Court explained that “a person’s mere propinquity to others independently suspected of criminal activity does not, without more, give rise to probable cause to search that person.” 444 U.S. at 91. As several lower courts have recognized, the principles established in Ybarra necessarily apply not only to searches of patrons of a commercial establishment but also to searches of individuals who are visiting a private home at the time that the police effect an entry and search of the home. See, e.g., United States v. Clay, 640 F.2d 157, 161-62 (8th Cir. 1981); People v. Tate, 367 Ill. App. 3d 109, 853 N.E.2d 1249, 304 Ill. Dec. 883 (2006); State v. Vandiver, 257 Kan. 53, 891 P.2d 350 (1995); Beeler v. State, 677 P.2d 653 (Okla. Crim. App. 1984); Lippert v. State, 664 S.W.2d 712 (Tex. Crim. App. 1984). Cf. Leveto v. Lapina, 258 F.3d 156, 163-65 (3d Cir. 2001) (Alito, J.) (IRS agents executing a search warrant could not validly frisk a homeowner in the absence of justification for a Terry frisk). See also Guy v. Wisconsin, 509 U.S. 914, 914-15 (1993) (Justice White, dissenting from denial of certiorari) (describing a division of authority among lower courts with regard to “whether this Court’s holding in Ybarra v. Illinois . . . applies where a search warrant for drugs is executed in a private home”).

In Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 705 (1981), and Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93 (2005), the Court did hold that an owner or resident of premises may be detained and prevented from leaving the premises while the police execute a search warrant of the premises. See also Bailey v. United States, 568 U.S. 186 (2013); Los Angeles County v. Rettele, 550 U.S. 609 (2007) (per curiam); Illinois v. McArthur, 531 U.S. 326 (2001), discussed in § 23.06(c) supra. Using broad language, the Court stated in Summers, and reiterated in Muehler, that “a warrant to search for contraband . . . implicitly carries with it the limited authority to detain the occupants of the premises while a proper search [of the premises themselves] is conducted.” Summers, 452 U.S. at 705; Muehler, 544 U.S. at 98 (quoting Summers); Los Angeles County v. Rettele, 550 U.S. at 613 (quoting Summers); Bailey, 568 U.S. at 208 (quoting Summers). However, the facts of these cases and the reasoning of the opinions demonstrate that the phrase “occupant[ ] of the premises” is meant to refer solely to “residents” (terms that are used interchangeably by the Summers Court, see id. at 701-03; see also Rettele, 550 U.S. at 609, 615; Muehler, 544 U.S. at 106, 110 (Justice Stevens, concurring) (concurring opinion, representing the views of 4 Justices, describes occupants as “resident[s],” each of whom “had his or her or own bedroom”) and not to persons who happen to be visiting the premises at the time when the police effect their entry. In Summers, in which the Court announced the rule that an occupant may be detained while the police search a home pursuant to a warrant, the defendant owned the house that was searched and several of the Court’s rationales for upholding the detention were predicated upon the defendant’s status as the owner of the premises. The Court explained that the defendant, as owner of the house, could facilitate the search by “open[ing] locked doors or locked containers to avoid the use of force that is . . . damaging to property,” 452 U.S. at 703; the Court pointed out that “residents” like the defendant would ordinarily wish to “remain in order to observe the search of their possessions,” id. at 701; and it observed that since the place of detention was the detainee’s own residence, the seizure would “add only minimally to the public stigma associated with the search itself,” id. at 702. In Muehler, the Court did not revisit the reasoning for the rule, treating its earlier holding in Summers as “categorical[ly]” authorizing the detention of a resident who “was asleep in her bed” when the police executed the warrant and “entered her bedroom” (544 U.S. at 96, 98), and the Court focused on a new question presented by the facts of Muehler: whether the police improperly engaged in the additional intrusion of handcuffing this resident for the duration of the search. The Court concluded that handcuffing is permissible if this measure is necessitated by “inherently dangerous” circumstances such as those that existed in the Muehler case, where the “warrant authoriz[ed] a search for weapons and a wanted gang member reside[d] on the premises” and there was a “need to detain multiple occupants.” Id. at 100. But cf. id. at 102 (Justice Kennedy, concurring and thus supplying the vote necessary to produce a 5-Justice majority: “[t]he restraint should . . . be removed if, at any point during the search, it would be readily apparent to any objectively reasonable officer that removing the handcuffs would not compromise the officers’ safety or risk interference or substantial delay in the execution of the search.”). In Bailey, the Court made clear that the Summers rule is strictly limited to “cases [in which] the occupants detained were found within or immediately outside a residence at the moment the police officers executed the search warrant” (568 U.S. at 193). “A spatial constraint defined by the immediate vicinity of the premises to be searched is . . . required for detentions incident to the execution of a search warrant. The police action permitted here – the search of a residence – has a spatial dimension, and so a spatial or geographical boundary can be used to determine the area within which both the search and detention incident to that search may occur. Limiting the rule in Summers to the area in which an occupant poses a real threat to the safe and efficient execution of a search warrant ensures that the scope of the detention incident to a search is confined to its underlying justification. Once an occupant is beyond the immediate vicinity of the premises to be searched, the search-related law enforcement interests are diminished and the intrusiveness of the detention is more severe.” (Id. at 201.) Dicta in the Bailey opinion use the term “occupant” without specifying the precise connection that it implies between the premises being searched and the individual whose detention is in question under Summers (see id. at 193-99), but the Court does describe the Summers rule as involving a “detention [that] occurs in the individual’s own home” (id. at 200), and the Court emphasized that the “exception [that Summers created] to the Fourth Amendment rule prohibiting detention absent probable cause must not diverge from its purpose and rationale” (id. at 194).

As some lower courts have concluded, the Summers rule cannot be construed as authorizing detentions of individuals who happen to be visiting the premises at the time of a police entry. See, e.g., Lippert v. State, 664 S.W.2d 712 (Tex. Crim. App. 1984); State v. Broadnax, 98 Wash. 2d 289, 654 P.2d 96 (1982). See also Commonwealth v. Catanzaro, 441 Mass. 46, 51-52 & n.10, 803 N.E.2d 287, 291 & n.10 (2004). In order to detain visitors, the police must have the specific and articulable facts necessary to conduct a Terry stop. See § 23.09 supra. Nor does the Summers rule authorize a frisk of anyone — visitor, resident or owner — in the course of executing a search warrant for premises. See, e.g., Leveto v. Lapina, 258 F.3d 156, 163-66 (3d Cir. 2001) (Alito, J.); Denver Justice and Peace Committee, Inc. v. City of Golden, 405 F.3d 923, 928-32 (10th Cir. 2005). As § 23.10 supra indicates, the power to detain an individual briefly for investigation, whether under Terry or under Summers, carries with it no automatic power to frisk that individual; any frisk must be justified by a particularized and objectively reasonable suspicion that the detainee is armed and dangerous. See, e.g., id. at 932.

§ 23.22(d) “Protective Sweep” of the Premises

“A ‘protective sweep’ is a quick and limited search of a premises, incident to an arrest and conducted to protect the safety of police officers or others. It is narrowly confined to a cursory visual inspection of those places in which a person might be hiding.” Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325, 327 (1990). When the police “effect[ ] the arrest of a suspect in his home pursuant to an arrest warrant, [the police] may conduct a warrantless protective sweep of all or part of the premises . . . if the searching officer ‘possesse[s] . . . a reasonable belief based on “specific and articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, reasonably warrant[s] . . .” the officer in believing’ . . . that the area swept harbor[s] . . . an individual posing a danger to the officer or others.” Id. at 327-28. See also id. at 334, 335-37; United States v. Serrano-Acevedo, 892 F.3d 454 (1st Cir. 2018) (holding a putative “protective sweep” unconstitutional for lack of reasonable grounds for such a belief). The Court in Buie “emphasize[d] that such a protective sweep, aimed at protecting the arresting officers, if justified by the circumstances, is . . . not a full search of the premises, but may extend only to a cursory inspection of those spaces where a person may be found. . . . The sweep lasts no longer than is necessary to dispel the reasonable suspicion of danger and in any event no longer than it takes to complete the arrest and depart the premises.” Id. at 335-36. See, e.g., United States v. Bagley, 877 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2017) (“Deputy U.S. Marshals obtained a search warrant allowing entry into a house solely to locate and arrest Mr. Bagley [“a convicted felon who was named in an arrest warrant for violating the terms of his supervised release”]. . . . When they arrived, Mr. Bagley was allegedly in the southeast bedroom. He eventually surrendered and was handcuffed near the front door. ¶ The deputy marshals then conducted a protective sweep of the entire house. In the southeast bedroom, deputy marshals found two rounds of ammunition and a substance appearing to be marijuana. . . . ¶ Mr. Bagley may have been in the living room when the protective sweep began. . . . ¶ The government argues that it doesn’t matter where Mr. Bagley was at the time of the protective sweep because he had earlier been ‘arrested’ in the southeast bedroom. With this focus on the place of the purported earlier arrest, the government argues that the deputy marshals could enter the southeast bedroom because Mr. Bagley had announced his surrender when he was in the southeast bedroom, rendering him under ‘arrest’ at that time. . . . We disagree. . . . The deputy marshals could conduct a protective sweep only if the protective sweep was justified at the time of the arrest; the deputy marshals could not conduct the arrest and later conduct a protective sweep based on an earlier arrest somewhere in the house.” Id. at 1153-55. Nor could the sweep be justified on the theory that some dangerous person other than Bagley may have been in the house. “When the deputy marshals entered the southeast bedroom, Mr. Bagley, his girlfriend, and her children had already left the house. The deputy marshals had no way of knowing, one way or another, whether anyone besides Mr. Bagley was still in the house. . . . [L]ack of knowledge cannot constitute the specific, articulable facts required . . . .” Id. at 1156.).

Part D. Automobile Stops, Searches, Inspections, and Impoundments

§ 23.23 THE THRESHOLD ISSUE: RESPONDENT’S INTEREST IN THE AUTOMOBILE OR EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY INSIDE IT

Just as a respondent who seeks to challenge a police entry and search of premises must have a constitutionally protected interest or legitimate expectation of privacy in the premises, see § 23.15 supra, so, too, a respondent who seeks to challenge a police stop or search of an automobile must have a sufficient possessory or privacy interest in the vehicle – or, alternatively, a sufficient personal interest in its unhindered movement – to complain about the particular police action in question.

A respondent has the requisite interest to complain of an unconstitutional automobile search in each of the following situations:

(i) The automobile belongs to the respondent, even though it is out of his or her possession at the time of the search, see, e.g., Cash v. Williams, 455 F.2d 1227, 1229-30 (6th Cir. 1972); United States v. Powell, 929 F.2d 1190, 1196 (7th Cir. 1991) (an absentee owner has standing to challenge the search of a vehicle although s/he does not have standing to challenge the mere stopping of the vehicle for a purported traffic violation); State v. Foldesi, 131 Idaho 778, 963 P.2d 1215 (Idaho App. 1998), as long as the respondent has not given up possession of the vehicle in a manner that deprives him or her of any remaining legitimate expectation of privacy in it, United States v. Jenkins, 92 F.3d 430, 434-35 (6th Cir. 1996); see generally Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978).

(ii) The automobile is in the respondent’s lawful possession under circumstances that comport the possessor’s ordinary right to exclude undesired intrusions by others, see Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. at 144 n.12 (dictum). This would certainly include of situations in which the respondent is driving a family member’s or friend’s automobile with the permission of the owner. See, e.g., United States v. Valdez Hocker, 333 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2003); People v. Lewis, 217 A.D.2d 591, 593, 629 N.Y.S.2d 455, 457 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1995). Cf. Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91, 96-100 (1990); Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257 (1960), as explained in Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. at 141. It would also include situations in which the respondent has rented the vehicle from a car rental agency (United States v. Walton, 763 F.3d 655 (7th Cir. 2014) (granting standing even though the renter’s driving license was suspended); United States v. Cooper, 133 F.3d 1394 (11th Cir. 1998) (granting standing even though the rental agreement had expired before the search); United States v. Henderson, 241 F.3d 638, 646-47 (9th Cir. 2000) (dictum) (same)) or is “listed on a rental agreement as an authorized driver” (United States v. Walker, 237 F.3d 845, 849 (7th Cir. 2001), and cases cited). It also includes persons to whom the renter has entrusted the vehicle, even if s/he does so in violation of terms in the rental agreement that restrict authorized drivers to designated individuals. Byrd v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1518 (2018) (“[A]s a general rule, someone in otherwise lawful possession and control of a rental car has a reasonable expectation of privacy in it even if the rental agreement does not list him or her as an authorized driver.” Id. at 1524. “The Court sees no reason why the expectation of privacy that comes from lawful possession and control and the attendant right to exclude would differ depending on whether the car in question is rented or privately owned by someone other than the person in current possession of it.” Id. at 1528. “[T]he mere fact that a driver in lawful possession or control of a rental car is not listed on the rental agreement will not defeat his or her otherwise reasonable expectation of privacy.” Id. at 1531. A “car thief would not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in a stolen car” but anyone in “lawful possession” does (id. at 1529.).

(iii) The vehicle is a taxicab in which the respondent is a lawful passenger. See Rios v. United States, 364 U.S. 253, 262 n.6 (1960).

(iv) The respondent is a lawful occupant of any vehicle at the time of the search, United States v. Mosley, 454 F.3d 249 (3d Cir. 2006) (“when a vehicle is illegally stopped by the police, no evidence found during the stop may be used by the government against any occupant of the vehicle unless the government can show that the taint of the illegal stop was purged,” id. at 251), and cases cited; see also United States v. Kimball, 25 F.3d 1, 5-6 (1st Cir. 1994), and the search invades an area of the vehicle in which, as a lawful occupant, the respondent has “any legitimate expectation of privacy,” Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. at 150 n.17 (dictum). See also Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334, 338-39 (2000) (“a bus passenger [who] places a bag in an overhead bin” has a reasonable expectation that “other passengers,” “bus employees,” and police officers will not “feel the bag in an exploratory manner”).
A respondent can complain of an unconstitutional stop of an automobile if s/he was in the vehicle at the time of the stop. Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 251, 257 (2007) (“When a police officer makes a traffic stop, the driver of the car is seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We hold that a passenger is seized as well and so may challenge the constitutionality of the stop.”); “A traffic stop necessarily curtails the travel a passenger has chosen just as much as it halts the driver”); United States v. Grant, 349 F.3d 192, 196 (5th Cir. 2003). If the respondent was not in the automobile at the time of the stop, s/he can nevertheless challenge the stop if s/he is the owner of the automobile, see Cash v. Williams, 455 F.2d at 1229-30, or if s/he has established a sufficient privacy interest in the automobile through repeated use to invoke the same rights as an owner. Cf. Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257 (1960), as explained in Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. at 141; Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. at 96-100.

Even when an individual has the requisite possessory interest or expectation of privacy in an automobile, s/he cannot claim any privacy rights with respect to the car’s Vehicle Identification Number (VIN) located on the dashboard “because of the important role played by the VIN in the pervasive governmental regulation of the automobile and the efforts by the Federal Government to ensure that the VIN is placed in plain view.” New York v. Class, 475 U.S. 106, 114 (1986). In Class, the Court held that the public nature of the VIN empowers the police to move papers obstructing the VIN, in order to view the number in the course of a valid stop for a traffic violation, at least under circumstances in which the driver on his or her own initiative leaves the vehicle and therefore is not in a position to accede to a lawful request to move the papers so that the number can be inspected. See id. at 114-16. Contra, People v. Class, 67 N.Y.2d 431, 494 N.E.2d 444, 503 N.Y.S.2d 313 (1986) (reaffirming, on state constitutional grounds, the opinion reversed in New York v. Class, supra). In cases in which an entry into a car was not justified by a traffic violation, some lower courts have ruled that the public nature of the VIN does not justify the opening of the vehicle for the purpose of inspecting the VIN. See People v. Piper, 101 Ill. App. 3d 296, 427 N.E.2d 1361, 56 Ill. Dec. 815 (1981); State v. Simpson, 95 Wash. 2d 170, 622 P.2d 1199 (1980); but see United States v. Forrest, 620 F.2d 446 (5th Cir. 1980).

For discussion of the “automatic standing” principle and of the evolution of the general concepts governing “standing” to challenge searches and seizures, see § 23.15 supra.

§ 23.24 EVIDENTIARY SEARCHES OF AUTOMOBILES: THE “AUTOMOBILE EXCEPTION” TO THE WARRANT REQUIREMENT

Dyson, 527 U.S. 465 (1999) (per curiam), with Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964), and Dyke v. Taylor Implement Mfg. Co., 391 U.S. 216 (1968). See also California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386 (1985) (extending the Carroll rule to a motor home parked in a downtown parking lot); Florida v. White, 526 U.S. 559, 565, 566 (1999) (the Carroll rule permitting search of a vehicle based on probable cause to believe that it contains contraband may permit seizure of the car based on “probable cause to believe that the vehicle itself was contraband” as long as “the warrantless seizure . . . did not involve any invasion of respondent’s privacy” because, for example, the vehicle was in “a public area”); Bell v. City of Chicago, 835 F.3d 736, 739 (7th Cir. 2016) (rejecting a Fourth Amendment challenge to a municipal ordinance that authorizes seizure and impounding of vehicles upon probable cause to believe they have been “used in an illegal manner or in connection with an illegal act, such as possession of illegal drugs in a vehicle, drag racing, or solicitation of a prostitute”).

If there is probable cause to believe that seizable objects may be concealed in any part of the vehicle, then the police may search every part of the vehicle and every container within it which is capable of holding the seizable object. Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. at 307; California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565, 580 (1991); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982); United States v. Johns, 469 U.S. 478, 482-83 (1985). The only limitation on the scope of the search is that it may not extend into areas incapable of holding the object, including containers that are not “capable of concealing the object of the search.” Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. at 307 (dictum); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. at 820-21, 823-24 (dictum).

The Carroll decision and its progeny establishing special rules for automobile searches and seizures are based in substantial part upon the inherent mobility of automobiles, which renders the securing of a warrant impracticable. See Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. at 304; Pennsylvania v. Labron, 518 U.S. 938, 940 (1996) (per curiam); California v. Carney, 471 U.S. at 390-91. (The caselaw also mentions two other factors that distinguish automobiles from buildings – the lesser degree of privacy that an automobile offers, e.g., Pennsylvania v. Labron, 518 U.S. at 940; South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364, 367 (1976), and the fact that automobiles are subject to extensive noncriminal regulation by the state, e.g., Pennsylvania v. Labron, 518 U.S. at 940; Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433, 441 (1973). But the latter factors have never been invoked independently to uphold a warrantless police search that invades what privacy an automobile does afford, in a case where no noncriminal regulatory concern drew police attention to a particular vehicle.) Accordingly, in Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971), the Court held that an almost totally immobilized automobile could not be searched without a warrant. Coolidge arguably forbids the application of Carroll’s automobile exception to the warrant requirement in situations in which there are no reasonable grounds to apprehend that a vehicle may be moved before a warrant can be obtained. See id. at 462 (plurality opinion) (except “where ‘it is not practicable to secure a warrant,’ . . . the ‘automobile exception,’ despite its label, is simply irrelevant”); Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964); United States v. Bradshaw, 490 F.2d 1097 (4th Cir. 1974); State v. LeJean, 276 Ga. 179, 182-83, 576 S.E.2d 888, 892-93 (2003) (alternative ground); United States v. Bazinet, 462 F.2d 982, 986 n.3 (8th Cir. 1972) (dictum); United States v. McCormick, 502 F.2d 281 (9th Cir. 1974); cf. State v. Gonzales, 236 Or. App. 391, 236 P.3d 834 (2010), subsequent history in 265 Or. App. 655, 337 P.3d 129 (2014). The Carroll rule applies, in other words, only “[w]hen a vehicle is being used on the highways, or if it is readily capable of such use and is found stationary in a place not regularly used for residential purposes – temporary or otherwise.” California v. Carney, 471 U.S. at 392. Compare State v. Witt, 223 N.J. 409, 447-48, 126 A.3d 850, 872-73 (2015) (“In . . . [State v. Alston, 88 N.J. 211, 233, 440 A.2d 1311 (1981)] we held that the automobile exception authorized the warrantless search of an automobile only when the police have probable cause to believe that the vehicle contains contraband or evidence of an offense and the circumstances giving rise to probable cause are unforeseeable and spontaneous. . . . ¶ Here, we part from the United States Supreme Court’s interpretation of the automobile exception under the Fourth Amendment and return to the Alston standard, this time supported by Article I, Paragraph 7 of our State Constitution. Alston properly balances the individual’s privacy and liberty interests and law enforcement’s investigatory demands. Alston’s requirement of ‘unforeseeability and spontaneity,’ . . . does not place an undue burden on law enforcement. For example, if a police officer has probable cause to search a car and is looking for that car, then it is reasonable to expect the officer to secure a warrant if it is practicable to do so. In this way, we eliminate the . . . fear that ‘a car parked in the home driveway of vacationing owners would be a fair target of a warrantless search if the police had probable cause to believe the vehicle contained drugs.’ . . . In the case of the parked car, if the circumstances giving rise to probable cause were foreseeable and not spontaneous, the warrant requirement applies.”).

In Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663 (2018) (summarized in § 25.15.3 supra), the Supreme Court held that a police officer violated the Fourth Amendment when, without a warrant, he entered the curtilage of a home to inspect a tarp-covered motorcycle parked in the driveway adjacent to the house. The Court rejected Virginia’s argument “that this Court’s precedent indicates that the automobile exception is a categorical one that permits the warrantless search of a vehicle anytime, anywhere, including in a home or curtilage” (id. at 1673). Because the Court’s ratio decidendi was that an illegal search occurred at the point at which the officer trespassed on the curtilage, it was unnecessary for the Court to reach the question whether the bike’s lack of mobility would have insulated it from warrantless search and seizure if it had been similarly parked and draped somewhere other than on private residential premises. There are, however, hints in the opinion which suggest that the answer to this question should be yes. The Court parsed the Carroll doctrine by saying: “The ‘ready mobility’ of vehicles served as the core justification for the automobile exception for many years. . . . Later cases then introduced an additional rationale based on ‘the pervasive regulation of vehicles capable of traveling on the public highways.’” Id. at 1669-70. But the latter-day “additional rationale” would seem to be applicable to Collins’ motorcycle no matter where it was parked, and the Court does not discuss it further. (As noted above, no Supreme Court decision has ever sustained a warrantless vehicle search solely on the basis of the regulatory rationale.) By contrast, the Collins Court does recur to the “ready mobility” rationale in distinguishing Scher v. United States, 305 U. S. 251 (1938): “Whereas Collins’ motorcycle was parked and unattended when Officer Rhodes intruded on the curtilage to search it, the officers in Scher first encountered the vehicle when it was being driven on public streets, [and] approached the curtilage of the home only when the driver turned into the garage, and searched the vehicle.” Id. at 1674. Thus, the immobility of Collins’ bike played a significant albeit inexplicit role in the outcome. And see Commonwealth v. Loughnane, 173 A.3d 733 (Pa. 2017), a pre-Collins decision also involving a warrantless police search of a vehicle parked in a residential driveway. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court invalidated the search not only out of concern for the vehicle’s proximity to the defendant’s residence, but because of the perceived inapplicability of Carroll’s mobility rationale. “Absent exigent circumstances, the concern about the inherent mobility of the vehicle does not apply, as the chance to search and/or seize the vehicle is not fleeting. . . . The vehicle is parked where the defendant lives and it will typically either remain there or inevitably return to that location.” Id. at 745. There is language in id. at 744, suggesting that a vehicle parked in a public parking lot differs from one parked in a residential driveway because a public parking facility “is typically an interim destination, but a home’s driveway is often the end of that day’s travels.” Nevertheless, Collins and Loughnane justify counsel’s advocating the position that a warrantless search of an immobile, unattended vehicle in any location falls outside the Carroll “automobile exception” (Collins, 138 S. Ct. at 1669).

When the police have probable cause to make a warrantless search of a vehicle under Carroll but, instead of searching it on the street, they lawfully impound it, they may exercise the Carroll prerogative to search it without a warrant later at the police station (e.g., Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. at 52; Michigan v. Thomas, 458 U.S. 259, 261-62 (1982) (per curiam); Florida v. Meyers, 466 U.S. 380 (1984) (per curiam); and see United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. at 807 n.9 (“if an immediate search on the street is permissible without a warrant, a search soon thereafter at the police station is permissible if the vehicle is impounded”), at least when no additional invasion of privacy interests results from their delay in making the search and when the delay is not inordinate (see United States v. Johns, 469 U.S. at 487 (dictum), citing Justice White’s dissenting opinion in Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. at 525). The same rule permitting delayed searches applies to closed containers found in the vehicle. United States v. Johns, 469 U.S. at 482-83. But see State v. Witt, 223 N.J. at 448-49, 126 A.3d at 873 (“We also part from federal jurisprudence that allows a police officer to conduct a warrantless search at headquarters merely because he could have done so on the side of the road. . . . ‘Whatever inherent exigency justifies a warrantless search at the scene under the automobile exception certainly cannot justify the failure to secure a warrant after towing and impounding the car’ at headquarters when it is practicable to do so. . . . Warrantless searches should not be based on fake exigencies. Therefore, under Article I, Paragraph 7 of the New Jersey Constitution, we limit the automobile exception to on-scene warrantless searches.”).

§ 23.25 INVENTORY SEARCHES OF IMPOUNDED VEHICLES

The immediately preceding section dealt with the circumstances under which the police can conduct warrantless searches of automobiles “for the purpose of investigating criminal conduct, with the validity of the searches . . . dependent on the application of the probable cause and warrant requirements of the Fourth Amendment.” Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367, 371 (1987). “By contrast, an inventory search may be ‘reasonable’ under the Fourth Amendment even though it is not conducted pursuant to warrant based upon probable cause.” Id.

The police may conduct an “inventory search” of the contents of an impounded automobile, including an examination of the contents of containers found in the automobile (id. at 374-75), if the inventory search complies with the following four requirements:

(i) The search must be conducted in accordance with “standardized procedures,” id. at 372, based upon “reasonable police regulations relating to inventory procedures,” id.. Accord, Florida v. Wells, 495 U.S. 1, 4 (1990) (“standardized criteria . . . or established routine”); South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364, 366, 376 (1976). See, e.g., Wells, 495 U.S. at 4-5 (suppressing contraband found in the course of an alleged inventory search because “the Florida Highway Patrol had no policy whatever with respect to the opening of closed containers encountered during an inventory search . . . [and] absent such a policy, the instant search was not sufficiently regulated to satisfy the Fourth Amendment”).

(ii) The police must not be acting “in bad faith or for the sole purpose of investigation,” Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. at 372. See also id. at 374 (speaking of “reasonable police regulations relating to inventory procedures administered in good faith”); id. at 376 (noting that “[t]here was no showing that the police chose to impound Bertine’s van in order to investigate suspected criminal activity”); Florida v. Wells, 495 U.S. at 4 (“an inventory search must not be a ruse for a general rummaging in order to discover incriminating evidence”); South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. at 376 (police had no “investigatory . . . motive”); Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433, 447 (1973) (officer conducting the search had no purpose to look for criminal evidence). United States v. Johnson, 889 F.3d 1120, 1125-26 (9th Cir. 2018) (“The government argues that, regardless what the officers’ personal motivations were for searching Johnson’s car, such motivations are simply not relevant to our Fourth Amendment inquiry. In most contexts, that is true. . . .” However, in an opinion published after the district court’s decision in this case, our court held that administrative searches conducted without individualized suspicion – such as drunk-driving checkpoints or vehicular inventory searches – are an exception to this general rule. . . . Thus, an administrative search may be invalid where the officer’s ‘subjective purpose was to find evidence of crime.’ . . . However, the mere ‘presence of a criminal investigatory motive’ or a ‘dual motive – one valid, and one impermissible –’ does not render an administrative stop or search invalid; instead, we ask whether the challenged search or seizure ‘would . . . have occurred in the absence of an impermissible reason.’”). See generally City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 45-46 (2000) (dictum) (discussing “inventory search” caselaw).

(iii) The automobile must be lawfully “in the custody of the police,” Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. at 372, in the sense that an adequate justification exists for the police to impound the vehicle, see South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. at 365-66, 375; Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. at 443. “[T]he threshold question in inventory cases is whether the impoundment itself was proper. . . .” Fair v. State, 627 N.E.2d 427, 431 (Ind. 1993). “[W]hen the impoundment is not specifically directed by state law, the risk increases that a decision to tow will be motivated solely by the desire to conduct an investigatory search. . . . [Thus] we hold that to prevail on the question of whether an impoundment was warranted in terms of the community caretaking function, the prosecution must demonstrate: (1) that the belief that the vehicle posed some threat or harm to the community or was itself imperiled was consistent with objective standards of sound policing, . . . and (2) that the decision to combat that threat by impoundment was in keeping with established departmental routine or regulation.” Id. at 433. Depending upon state law, the police may be empowered to impound an automobile for traffic or parking violations, South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. at 365-66, 375; incident to the arrest of the driver, Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. at 368 & n.1; and in connection with routine highway management duties, such as the removal of a disabled vehicle that was “a nuisance along the highway,” Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. at 443. But the Fourth Amendment regulates the permissible duration of the impound. Brewster v. Beck, 859 F.3d 1194 (9th Cir. 2017) (although police could lawfully impound a vehicle on the ground that its owner’s driving license had been suspended, the protraction of the impound period under a state statute providing that a “vehicle so impounded shall be impounded for 30 days” (id. at 1195) violated the Fourth Amendment: “The exigency that justified the seizure vanished once the vehicle arrived in impound and Brewster showed up with proof of ownership and a valid driver’s license.” ¶ “A seizure is justified under the Fourth Amendment only to the extent that the government’s justification holds force. Thereafter, the government must cease the seizure or secure a new justification. Appellees have provided no justification here.” Id. at 1196-97.).

(iv) The search may not intrude into repositories of electronic information akin to those protected by the rule of Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473 (2014) (discussed in § 25.8.2 supra). See State v. Worsham, 227 So.3d 602, 603 (Fla. App. 2017) (“Without a warrant, the police downloaded data from the ‘event data recorder’ or ‘black box’ located in Worsham’s impounded vehicle. We affirm [the granting of Worsham’s suppression motion], concluding there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in the information retained by an event data recorder and downloading that information without a warrant from an impounded car in the absence of exigent circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment.”).

In approving an inventory search in South Dakota v. Opperman, the Court emphasized that the car’s owner was “not present to make other arrangements for the safekeeping of his belongings.” 428 U.S. at 375. In its subsequent decision in Colorado v. Bertine, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not require the police to forgo an inventory search in favor of the “‘less intrusive’” procedure of offering a driver “the opportunity to make other arrangements for the safekeeping of his property.” 479 U.S. at 373. Arguably, Bertine means only that the police need not opt for “‘less intrusive’” procedures in deciding whether to conduct an inventory search incident to impoundment, whereas Opperman implies that the police do have to consider less intrusive alternatives in determining whether it is necessary to impound the car in the first place. The Bertine opinion recognizes that impoundments must be based on “standardized criteria, related to the feasibility and appropriateness of parking and locking [the] . . . vehicle rather than impounding it,” 479 U.S. at 376, but because the only challenge made to the impoundment in Bertine was a claim that the applicable police regulation gave too much discretion to individual officers, see id. at 375-76, the Court there did not elaborate this parking-and-locking passage or consider what other constitutional requirements, if any, govern impoundments as a distinct species of Fourth Amendment “seizures” of automobiles. Some state courts have found impoundments to be unreasonable and violative of the Fourth Amendment when the sole purpose of the impoundment was safekeeping of the automobile while the driver was in custody and that goal could have been achieved by the less intrusive measures of turning the car over to an unarrested passenger, Virgil v. Superior Court, 268 Cal. App. 2d 127, 73 Cal. Rptr. 793 (1968), or leaving the car parked in a legal parking space if this would not be unduly time-consuming for the police and would not expose the car to undue risk of theft or vandalism, State v. Slockbower, 79 N.J. 1, 397 A.2d 1050 (1979); State v. Simpson, 95 Wash. 2d 170, 662 P.2d 1199 (1980).

681

If the police have the authority to impound an automobile and to conduct an inventory search of it, they can make the search at the scene, at the police station, or at other locations. Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. at 373 (inventory search was not rendered unreasonable simply because the vehicle “was towed to a secure, lighted facility”). “[T]he security of the storage facility does not completely eliminate the need for inventorying; the police may still wish to protect themselves or the owners of the lot against false claims.” Id.

The state courts have been active in developing independent state constitutional restrictions upon inventory searches. See, e.g., State v. Daniel, 589 P.2d 408, 417 (Alaska 1979) (police cannot open “closed, locked or sealed luggage, containers, or packages contained within a vehicle” during an inventory search); State v. Opperman, 247 N.W.2d 673, 675 (S.D. 1976) (“noninvestigative police inventory searches of automobiles without a warrant must be restricted to safeguarding those articles which are within plain view of the officer’s vision”). This is an area in which defense counsel is particularly advised to follow the suggestion of § 7.09 supra and invoke state-law principles as alternative grounds for challenging searches and seizures.

§ 23.26 SEARCHES OF AUTOMOBILES INCIDENT TO THE ARREST OF THE DRIVER OR OCCUPANTS

Automobiles may be subjected to a warrantless search of limited scope incidental to the valid arrest of their drivers or occupants, under the doctrine of “search incident to arrest” (see § 23.08 supra), as modified by the Supreme Court in Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332 (2009) to account for certain “circumstances unique to the vehicle context” (id. at 343). These searches may be made without a warrant only at the immediate time and place of the arrest. See Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964); Dyke v. Taylor Implement Mfg. Co., 391 U.S. 216 (1968); Chambers v. Maroney 399 U.S. 42, 47 (1970); Cardwell v. Lewis, 417 U.S. 583, 591-92 n.7 (1974); id. at 599 n.4 (Stewart, J., dissenting); United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1, 14-15 (1977). This “search incident to arrest” rule applies not only in “situations where the officer makes contact with the occupant [of a vehicle] while the occupant is inside the vehicle” but also “when the officer first makes contact with the arrestee after the latter has stepped out of his vehicle.” Thornton v. United States, 541 U.S. 615, 617 (2004). In accordance with the search-incident-to-arrest rule that applies to all situations including the automobile context, the search may “include ‘the arrestee’s person and the area ‘within his immediate control’ – construing that phrase to mean the area from which he might gain possession of a weapon or destructible evidence.’” Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. at 339. See also id. at 343 (narrowing New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981), to clarify that the customary search-incident-to-arrest rule “authorizes police to search a vehicle incident to a recent occupant’s arrest only when the arrestee is unsecured and within reaching distance of the passenger compartment at the time of the search”). In Gant, the Court responded to “circumstances unique to the vehicle context” by holding that police officers also may search a vehicle incident to the arrest of a “recent occupant” “when it is ‘reasonable to believe evidence relevant to the crime of arrest might be found in the vehicle.’” Id. See also id. at 343-44 (explaining that “[i]n many cases, as when a recent occupant is arrested for a traffic violation, there will be no reasonable basis to believe the vehicle contains relevant evidence,” “[b]ut in others, including Belton and Thornton, the offense of arrest will supply a basis for searching the passenger compartment of an arrestee’s vehicle and any containers therein”; the Court applies its new rule to hold a vehicle search unlawful because “Gant clearly was not within reaching distance of his car at the time of the search” and thus the search could not be justified under the customary search-incident-to-arrest rule, and “Gant was arrested for driving with a suspended license – an offense for which police could not expect to find evidence in the passenger compartment of Gant’s car”). See also State v. Noel, 236 W. Va. 335, 779 S.E.2d 877 (2015). Compare State v. Snapp, 174 Wash. 2d 177, 181-82, 275 P.3d 289, 291 (2012) (construing the state constitution to reject that portion of the Gant rule that allows a search of a vehicle incident to the arrest of a recent occupant when “it is reasonable to believe evidence relevant to the crime of arrest might be found in the vehicle”).

When an automobile is stopped to ticket the driver for a traffic violation, a warrantless “search of the passenger compartment of [the] . . . automobile, limited to those areas in which a weapon may be placed or hidden, is permissible if the police officer possesses a reasonable belief . . . that the suspect [driver or occupant] is dangerous and the suspect may gain immediate control of weapons [from the vehicle].” Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1049 (1983). Unlike a search incident to arrest, which is authorized by the mere fact of a valid arrest, this latter sort of weapons search requires both a valid stop and reasonable grounds to believe that the driver or occupant is dangerous and may grab a weapon from the car to use against the officers. Id. at 1046-53 & nn.14, 16. See, e.g., United States v. Hussain, 835 F.3d 307, 314-17 (2d Cir. 2016).

So far as the Fourth Amendment is concerned, an officer who sees a driver violate the traffic laws may choose either to make an arrest and thereby acquire the full power of search incident to arrest or to issue a ticket or other form of summons and acquire only the relatively limited search power described in Long. See Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164, 176-77 (2008); Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113, 114, 118-19 (1998); United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973); Gustafson v. Florida, 414 U.S. 260 (1973). Even if state law categorizes the traffic infraction as one that must be handled by a ticket or other form of summons rather than a full-scale arrest, an arrest which thus violates state law does not give rise to a Fourth Amendment basis for suppressing evidence unless either the arrest or the search incident to that arrest violated the Fourth Amendment rules summarized in §§ 23.07(b)-23.08(d). See Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164, 167, 171, 177-78 (even though police officers’ arrest of Moore for driving on a suspended license violated Virginia state law, which restricted the officers to “issu[ing] Moore a summons instead of arresting him,” the arrest satisfied the applicable Fourth Amendment standard of “probable cause to believe a person committed . . . [a] crime in [the officer’s] presence,” and accordingly the contraband obtained by the police in a valid search incident to arrest was not suppressible under the Fourth Amendment). Suppression in such cases may be available, however, on state constitutional grounds. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Hernandez, 456 Mass. 528, 531-32, 924 N.E.2d 709, 711-12 (2010); and see § 7.09 supra.

§ 23.27 “TERRY STOPS” OF AUTOMOBILES AND ATTENDANT SEARCHES

“The law is settled that in Fourth Amendment terms a . . . stop [of a moving vehicle] entails a seizure of the driver [and any passengers in the vehicle] ‘even though the purpose of the stop is limited and the resulting detention quite brief.’” Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 255 (2007). See also Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S. 323, 327 (2009). By analogy to the Terry stop doctrine (§ 23.09 supra), “law enforcement agents may briefly stop a moving automobile to investigate a reasonable suspicion that its occupants are involved in criminal activity.” United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221, 226 (1985); see, e.g., United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675 (1985); Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979) (dictum). In limited circumstances, the police can also conduct a Terry stop of an automobile “to investigate past criminal activity.” United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. at 228. See § 23.09 supra. Neither sort of investigative stop may be made in the absence of “reasonable suspicion.” Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. at 254 n.2, 255-56. See also United States v. Mosley, 454 F.3d 249 (3d Cir. 2006). The standard of “reasonable suspicion” for an automobile stop is the same as that for a pedestrian stop, discussed in § 23.09 supra. See, e.g., United States v. Uribe, 709 F.3d 646, 649-50 (7th Cir. 2013); United States v. Cohen, 481 F.3d 896 (6th Cir. 2007); State v. Teamer, 151 So. 3d 421, 427-30 (Fla. 2014).

“[A]s in the case of a pedestrian reasonably suspected of criminal activity,” the Terry frisk doctrine permits “a patdown of the driver or a passenger [of a lawfully stopped vehicle] during a . . . [vehicle] stop” if the police have “reasonable suspicion that the person subjected to the frisk is armed and dangerous.” Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S. at 327. Also by analogy to Terry, police who validly stop a vehicle may search some areas of it for weapons if the officers possess a reasonable belief, based on specific and articulable facts, that a detained suspect is dangerous and that s/he can gain immediate control of weapons from the vehicle. Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1049 (1983). The search must, however, be “limited to those areas [of the vehicle] in which a weapon may be placed or hidden.” Id.

§ 23.28 TRAFFIC STOPS AND ATTENDANT SEARCHES

Automobiles may, of course, be stopped for traffic violations (see United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973); Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996)) if – but only if – the police have “reasonable suspicion” to justify the traffic stop. See Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S. 323, 327 (2009); Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 254 n.2, 255-56 (2007); Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 530, 536 (2014). (Heien also holds that a police officer’s “objectively reasonable” mistake of law – a plausible interpretation of an ambiguous traffic-code provision which is subsequently construed by a state appellate court in a manner contrary to the officer’s “reasonably, even if mistakenly” advised reading of it (id. at 535) – does not invalidate the “reasonable suspicion” required for a traffic-violation stop if the officer’s visual observations of the vehicle bring it, factually, within his mistaken reading. See § 23.03 concluding paragraph supra.). See also Melendres v. Arpaio, 695 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2012), permanent injunction affirmed in relevant part in Melendres v. Arpaio, 784 F.3d 1254 (9th Cir. 2015) (racial profiling of Hispanics for automobile stops by county police officers in a border State violated the Fourth Amendment: “[B]ecause mere unauthorized presence [of an alien in the United States] is not a criminal matter, suspicion of unauthorized presence alone does not give rise to an inference that criminal activity is ‘afoot’” (695 F.3d at 1001). “[U]nlike illegal entry, mere unauthorized presence . . . is not a crime.” 695 F.3d at 1000). “Absent suspicion that a ‘suspect is engaged in, or is about to engage in, criminal activity,’ law enforcement may not stop or detain an individual.” Id.; United States v. Paniagua-Garcia, 813 F.3d 1013, 1014 (7th Cir. 2016) (“The government failed to establish that the officer [who stopped the defendant’s car] had probable cause or a reasonable suspicion that Paniagua was violating the no-texting [while driving] law. The officer hadn’t seen any texting; what he had seen was consistent with any one of a number of lawful uses of cellphones.”); United States v. Murphy, 703 F.3d 182, 188 (2d Cir. 2012) (the trial court did not err in rejecting, as incredible, a police officer’s testimony at a suppression hearing that he observed the defendant’s car exit the interstate without signaling and thus in violation of traffic laws); State v. Kooima, 833 N.W.2d 202, 210 (Iowa 2013) (“Cases decided by us and other courts require a personal observation of erratic driving, other facts to substantiate the allegation the driver is intoxicated, or details not available to the general public as to the defendant’s future actions in order to spawn a reasonable inference . . . [that an anonymous] tipster had the necessary personal knowledge that a person was driving while intoxicated and the stop comports with the requirements of the Fourth Amendment. To hold otherwise would cause legitimate concern because such tips would let the police stop persons on anonymous tips that might have been called in for vindictive or harassment purposes or based solely on a hunch or rumor.”).

An officer making this sort of stop may order the driver out of the car, whether the officer proposes to arrest the driver or merely to give the driver a summons. Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977) (per curiam). In the former case, the officer may conduct a complete search of the driver’s person and may also search the passenger compartment of the car incident to the driver’s arrest, to the extent indicated in § 23.26 supra; in the latter, the officer may frisk the driver and search the passenger compartment of the car for weapons if, but only if, the requisite conditions for a Terry frisk (see §§ 23.10, 23.26 supra) are met. If the officer invokes the Mimms doctrine to order the driver out of the car, the officer can detain the driver outside the car for the period necessary to conduct an inquiry and inspect the Vehicle Identification Number. New York v. Class, 475 U.S. 106, 115-16 (1986); Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S. at 333; see § 23.23 supra.
See also Rodriguez v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 1609, 1615 (2015) (traffic stops often “include[ ] ‘ordinary inquiries incident to [the traffic] stop,’” which “[t]ypically . . . involve checking the driver’s license, determining whether there are outstanding warrants against the driver, and inspecting the automobile’s registration and proof of insurance”; an officer may conduct these checks but “may not do so in a way that prolongs the stop, absent the reasonable suspicion ordinarily demanded to justify detaining an individual.”). Compare Sharp v. United States, 132 A.3d 161, 169-70 (D.C. 2016) (when “the encounter does not begin with a stop for a traffic violation” – as in this case of a defendant who was seated behind the wheel of a lawfully parked car – an officer cannot ask the driver to exit the vehicle in a manner that would appear to a reasonable person to foreclose “a genuine choice to decline the request and stay in the car,” absent “reasonable articulable suspicion to justify the seizure”); State v. Keaton, 222 N.J. 438, 442, 448, 450, 119 A.3d 906, 908, 912, 913 (2015) (a police officer does not have “a legal right to enter an overturned car in order to obtain registration and insurance information for the vehicle, without first requesting permission, or allowing defendant an opportunity to retrieve the documents himself”; although a police officer who conducts a lawful traffic stop “may search the car for evidence of ownership” “[i]f the vehicle’s operator is unable to produce proof of registration,” such a “warrantless search of a vehicle is only permissible after the driver has been provided the opportunity to produce his credentials and is either unable or unwilling to do so.”). Regarding DWI sobriety testing, see § 23.14 subdivision (a) supra.

The Mimms doctrine also allows “an officer making a traffic stop . . . [to] order passengers to get out of the car pending completion of the stop.” Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408, 415 (1997). See Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S. at 333 (“The temporary seizure of driver and passengers ordinarily continues, and remains reasonable, for the duration of the stop.”); but see Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. at 415 n.3 (expressly reserving the question whether “an officer may forcibly detain a passenger for the entire duration of the stop”); and cf. United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221, 235-36 (1985); People v. Porter, 136 A.D.3d 1344, 1345, 24 N.Y.S.3d 470, 472 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2016) (the police unlawfully detained the passenger of a lawfully stopped car, who had “asked whether he could leave the scene,” by telling him that “he must remain present with them until the inventory search [of the arrested driver’s car] was complete”; “the justification for th[e] stop [of the car and for detaining the passenger pursuant to that stop] ended once the driver had been arrested for th[e] [traffic] offense.”). The officer also can conduct a protective “patdown of . . . a passenger during a [lawful] traffic stop” under the customary Terry frisk standard if the officer has a “reasonable suspicion that the person subjected to the frisk is armed and dangerous.” Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S. at 327, 333; see § 23.10 supra. Search activity exceeding the scope of a Terry frisk is not permitted; and when an officer, during a traffic stop, requests and receives permission from a passenger to conduct a search of his or her possessions for evidence unrelated to the traffic violation that justified the stop, the request has been held impermissible, the consent tainted, and the ensuing search and seizure unconstitutional. State v. Smith, 286 Kan. 402, 184 P.3d 890 (2008).

Because “[t]emporary detention of individuals during the stop of an automobile by the police, even if only for a brief period and for a limited purpose, constitutes a [Fourth Amendment] ‘seizure’ of ‘persons’” (Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. at 809), and because “a police stop exceeding the time needed to handle the matter for which the stop was made violates the Constitution’s shield against unreasonable seizures,” a “seizure justified only by a police-observed traffic violation . . . ‘becomes unlawful if it is prolonged beyond the time reasonably required to complete the mission’ of issuing a ticket for the violation.” Rodriguez v. United States, 135 S. Ct. at 1612. “Authority for the seizure . . . ends when tasks tied to the traffic infraction are— or reasonably should have been— completed.” Id. at 1614. “On-scene investigation into other crimes . . . detours [that’s a verb] from that mission,” as do “safety precautions taken in order to facilitate such detours.” Id. at 1616. Accordingly, the Court held in Rodriguez that a dog sniff of a car stopped for a traffic infraction, which resulted in the dog’s alerting to the presence of drugs and an ensuing search of the car and seizure of drugs violated the Fourth Amendment because it was “conducted after completion of . . . [the] traffic stop” and thus “‘prolonged [the traffic stop] beyond the time reasonably required to complete the mission’ of issuing a ticket for the violation.” Id. at 1612. See also United States v. Bowman, 884 F.3d 200 (4th Cir. 2018).

§ 23.29 LICENSE CHECKS; STOPS OF AUTOMOBILES AT ROADBLOCKS AND CHECKPOINTS

In Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979), the Court condemned the previously widespread practice of “stop checks” of vehicles selected by roving patrols. The Court in Prouse held that the Fourth Amendment does not permit the flagging down of selected automobiles for the purpose of “check[ing] [the] . . . driver’s license and the registration of the automobile” unless “there is at least articulable and reasonable suspicion that a motorist is unlicensed or that an automobile is not registered.” 440 U.S. at 663.

The Court in Prouse suggested, however, that it might sustain other “methods for spot checks that involve less intrusion or that do not involve the unconstrained exercise of discretion” by police officers. Id. It included “[q]uestioning of all oncoming traffic at roadblock-type stops [as] . . . one possible [constitutional] alternative.” Id. In the subsequent case of Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990), the Court upheld the constitutionality of “a State’s use of highway sobriety checkpoints” (id. at 447), in which motorists passing through selected sites were “briefly stopped” (id. at 455), “briefly examined for signs of intoxication” (id. at 447), and asked some questions (id.), in accordance with established “guidelines setting forth procedures governing checkpoint operations [and] . . . site selection” (id.). “The average delay for each vehicle was approximately 25 seconds.” Id. at 448. The Court acknowledged that “a Fourth Amendment ‘seizure’ occurs when a vehicle is stopped at a checkpoint.” Id. at 450. Accord, City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32, 40 (2000) (“It is well established that a vehicle stop at a highway checkpoint effectuates a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.”). The Sitz Court concluded, however, that “the balance of the State’s interest in preventing drunken driving, the extent to which this system can reasonably be said to advance that interest, and the degree of intrusion upon individual motorists who are briefly stopped” (496 U.S. at 455) provided the requisite constitutional justification for the use of the sobriety checkpoint procedure.
The Court emphasized that the “‘objective’ intrusion [upon seized motorists], measured by the duration of the seizure and the intensity of the investigation, [w]as minimal” (id. at 452) and that the procedure did not suffer from the same “degree of ‘subjective intrusion’ and . . . potential for generating fear and surprise [on the part of seized motorists]” (id.) as did the roving-patrol stops condemned in Prouse (see Sitz, 496 U.S. at 452-53). The Court in Sitz further distinguished the sobriety checkpoint procedure from the roving-patrol stops on the grounds that the “checkpoints are selected pursuant to . . . guidelines, and uniformed police officers stop every approaching vehicle” (id. at 453), thereby avoiding the “‘kind of standardless and unconstrained discretion [which] is the evil the Court has discerned . . . in previous cases’” (id. at 454 (quoting Prouse, 440 U.S. at 661)) and the state in Sitz presented “empirical data” (id.) demonstrating that the checkpoint procedure made at least some measurable contribution to controlling “the drunken driving problem” (id. at 451; see id. at 454-55). Finally, the Court in Sitz took pains to make clear “what our inquiry is not about.” Id. at 450. Explaining that the issue “address[ed] [was] only the initial stop of each motorist passing through a checkpoint and the associated preliminary questioning and observation by checkpoint officers[,]” the Court noted that “[d]etention of particular motorists for more extensive field sobriety testing may require satisfaction of an individualized suspicion standard.” Id. at 450-51. The Court further cautioned that “[n]o allegations are before us of unreasonable treatment of any person after an actual detention at a particular checkpoint.” Id. at 450.

Thereafter, in City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, the Court struck down a “highway checkpoint program whose primary purpose . . . [was] the discovery and interdiction of illegal narcotics” (531 U.S. at 34), in which the police stopped a predetermined number of vehicles, conducted a license and registration check, and walked around each stopped car with a narcotics-detection dog (see id. at 34-35). In holding this practice to be unconstitutional, the Court distinguished Sitz and also an earlier decision that had upheld the routine stopping of vehicles and the brief questioning of their occupants by immigration authorities at designated checkpoints near an international border (United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976), discussed in § 23.30 infra). “In none of these cases,” the Court explained, “did we indicate approval of a checkpoint program whose primary purpose was to detect evidence of ordinary criminal wrongdoing.” Edmond, 531 U.S. at 38. Emphasizing that “our checkpoint cases have recognized only limited exceptions to the general rule that a seizure must be accompanied by some measure of individualized suspicion” (id. at 41), the Court declared that “[w]e decline to suspend the usual requirement of individualized suspicion where the police seek to employ a checkpoint primarily for the ordinary enterprise of investigating crimes” (id. at 44). See also id. at 34, 41-42, 48; Singleton v. Commonwealth, 364 S.W.3d 97, 104-06 (Ky. 2012) (applying Edmond to strike down a traffic checkpoint that was designed to catch violators of a city ordinance requiring that motor vehicles display a “city sticker” that shows residence or employment within city limits).

The Court returned to these issues in Illinois v. Lidster, 540 U.S. 419 (2003), rejecting a Fourth Amendment challenge to “a highway checkpoint where police stopped motorists to ask them for information about a recent hit-and-run accident.” Id. at 421. The Court distinguished Edmond on the ground that that case “involved a checkpoint at which police stopped vehicles to look for evidence of drug crimes committed by occupants of those vehicles” (id. at 423) whereas the “primary law enforcement purpose [of the checkpoint in Lidster] was not to determine whether a vehicle’s occupants were committing a crime, but to ask vehicle occupants, as members of the public, for their help in providing information about a crime in all likelihood committed by others [and] . . . [t]he police expected the information elicited to help them apprehend, not the vehicle’s occupants, but other individuals.” Id. at 423. Applying the criteria the Court had previously employed in Sitz, the Court upheld the checkpoint in Lidster because “[t]he relevant public concern was grave” in that “[p]olice were investigating a crime that had resulted in a human death . . . [a]nd the stop’s objective was to help find the perpetrator of a specific and known crime, not of unknown crimes of a general sort”; “[t]he stop advanced this grave public concern to a significant degree” in that “[t]he police appropriately tailored their checkpoint stops to fit important criminal investigatory needs”; and, “[m]ost importantly, the stops interfered only minimally with liberty of the sort the Fourth Amendment seeks to protect,” in that “each stop required only a brief wait in line – a very few minutes at most,” “[c]ontact with the police lasted only a few seconds,” “[p]olice contact consisted simply of a request for information and the distribution of a flyer,” and, “[v]iewed subjectively, the contact provided little reason for anxiety or alarm” since “[t]he police stopped all vehicles systematically” and “there is no allegation here that the police acted in a discriminatory or otherwise unlawful manner while questioning motorists during stops.” Id. at 427-28.

In addition to approving the checkpoints in Sitz and Lidster and border stops by immigration authorities in Martinez-Fuerte, the Court has indicated that it is likely to accept standardized checkpoint procedures in other settings if the stops are not protracted, do not involve any physical searches of the car or occupants, and are not made solely at the discretion of officers in the field. In Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730 (1983), the Court and all parties appear to have assumed the constitutionality of a “routine driver’s license checkpoint.” See id. at 733 (plurality opinion). And in Prouse, the Court noted that its holding did not “cast doubt on the permissibility of roadside truck weigh-stations and inspection checkpoints, at which some vehicles may be subject to further detention for safety and regulatory inspection than are others.” 440 U.S. at 663 n.26.

In light of the Court’s opinions in these cases, the validity of various spot-check practices (for example, pollution emission tests, agricultural produce inspections, and game wardens’ inspections, as well as driver’s license and registration inspections) involving the brief stopping of vehicles without a reasonable suspicion that the particular vehicle stopped is being operated in violation of an applicable regulatory law appears to turn upon four considerations:

First is whether the “primary purpose [of the checkpoint program] was to detect evidence of ordinary criminal wrongdoing” (City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. at 41) by one or more of the “vehicle’s occupants” (Illinois v. Lidster, 540 U.S. at 423). Such situations are governed by “an Edmond-type rule of automatic unconstitutionality.” Id. at 424. The Court stated in dicta in Edmond that an exception to this rule may apply to “emergency” situations, such as where the police set up “an appropriately tailored roadblock . . . to thwart an imminent terrorist attack or to catch a dangerous criminal who is likely to flee by way of a particular route.”

Edmond, 531 U.S. at 44. But, in the absence of such “exigencies” (id.), Edmond prohibits a checkpoint “program whose primary purpose is ultimately indistinguishable from the general interest in crime control,” except when, as in Lidster, “[t]he stop’s primary law enforcement purpose was not to determine whether a vehicle’s occupants were committing a crime, but to ask vehicle occupants, as members of the public, for their help in providing information about a crime in all likelihood committed by others” and “[t]he police expected the information elicited to help them apprehend, not the vehicle’s occupants, but other individuals” (Lidster, 540 U.S. at 423).

Second is the extent to which some sort of spot check is necessary and will likely be effective to enforce the regulatory scheme in question. See Illinois v. Lidster, 540 U.S. at 427; Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. at 451; Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. at 658-61. Counsel challenging a checkpoint stop should contend that the standard of necessity is high. In approving the use of sobriety checkpoints in Sitz, the Court cited statistical and anecdotal evidence of the extent of “alcohol-related death and mutilation on the Nation’s roads” (496 U.S. at 451 & n.*) and observed that “[n]o one can seriously dispute the magnitude of the drunken driving problem or the States’ interest in eradicating it.” Id. at 451; accord, id. at 455-56 (Justice Blackmun, concurring). Similarly, in sustaining immigration checkpoint stops in border regions, see § 23.30 infra, the Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized “the enormous difficulties of patrolling a 2,000-mile open border,” United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 418 (1981), and the vital national importance of patrolling it effectively. See, e.g., Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 273 (1973); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 878-79, 881 (1975); United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. at 551-57. And, in upholding a “highway checkpoint where police stopped motorists to ask them for information about a recent hit-and-run accident,” the Court in Illinois v. Lidster explained that “[t]he relevant public concern was grave . . . [in that] [p]olice were investigating a crime that had resulted in a human death . . . [and] [t]he stop advanced this grave public concern to a significant degree.” 540 U.S. at 421, 427. See also id. at 425 (“voluntary requests [of “members of the public in the investigation of a crime”] play a vital role in police investigatory work”). With regard to the assessment of “the degree to which . . . [a checkpoint procedure] advances the public interest” (Sitz, 496 U.S. at 453), the Court has made clear that reviewing courts may not strike down a law enforcement technique that is a reasonable means of dealing with the problem simply because some “[e]xperts in police science” might view a different technique as “preferable” [sic] (id.). However, a procedure may be found to violate the Fourth Amendment if the state fails to present empirical data justifying the procedure (see Sitz, 496 U.S. at 454-55) or if the procedure falls below an as yet unspecified threshold of effectiveness (see Sitz, 496 U.S. at 454-55 (finding that the sobriety checkpoint procedure under review sufficiently advanced the state’s interest in controlling drunk driving because it resulted in arrests of “approximately 1.6 percent of the drivers passing through the checkpoint,” which compared favorably with the “0.5 percent” “ratio of illegal aliens detected to vehicles stopped” by the immigration checkpoint procedure approved in Martinez-Fuerte).

Third is the extent to which the visibility and regularity of the spot-check practice are

§ 23.30 BORDER SEARCHES OF AUTOMOBILES

The “border search” doctrine allows customs and immigration officials to stop and search all vehicles (or persons) entering the United States from abroad. It requires no warrant, probable cause, Terry-type “reasonable suspicion,” or other justification. United States v. Touset, 890 F.3d 1227, 1231 (11th Cir. 2018) (alternative ground) (holding, despite Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473 (2014) [discussed in § 25.8.2 supra], that “the Fourth Amendment does not require any suspicion for forensic searches of electronic devices at the border”). This unfettered search power is, however, limited to the “border itself [or] . . . its functional equivalents.” Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 272 (1973). See also United States v. Flores-Montano, 541 U.S. 149, 154 (2004) (“the expectation of privacy is less at the border than it is in the interior”).

Other than at the border and its functional equivalents, customs and immigration searches of automobiles may not be made without a warrant or probable cause. Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. at 274-75 (condemning a warrantless “roving patrol” search without probable cause); United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891 (1975) (condemning a warrantless “fixed check point” search without probable cause). Roving patrols of customs or immigration agents are permitted to make brief warrantless stops of vehicles in regions near the border on the basis of “reasonable suspicion” that a particular vehicle contains smuggled goods or illegal aliens. United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 880-84 (1975); United States v. Villamonte-Marquez, 462 U.S. 579, 587-88 (1983) (dictum) (discussing the border-search doctrines applicable to automobiles while developing a somewhat different rule for ships “located in waters offering ready access to the open sea”). These roving-patrol stops are akin to domestic Terry stops and are governed by similar rules. See §§ 23.04-23.06, 23.09, 23.27 supra. “The officer may question the driver and passengers about their citizenship and immigration status, and he may ask them to explain suspicious circumstances, but any further detention or search must be based on consent or probable cause.” United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. at 881-82.

Equally limited stops of all or selected vehicles may be made routinely at fixed checkpoints in the border area, without a warrant, probable cause, or “reasonable suspicion.” United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976). But the “claim that a particular exercise of [administrative] discretion in locating or operating a checkpoint is unreasonable is subject to post-stop judicial review.” Id. at 559. Routine checkpoint stops, like roving-patrol stops made upon “reasonable suspicion,” must be restricted to “brief questioning” and may not include either prolonged detention or search in the absence of “consent or probable cause.” Id. at 566-67. See also United States v. Flores-Montano, 541 U.S. at 155 n.2 (reserving “the question ‘whether, and under what circumstances, a border search might be deemed “unreasonable” because of the particularly offensive manner in which it is carried out’”).

The opinions in Ortiz and Brignoni-Ponce purport to reserve the question whether searches and more extensive detentions in connection with immigration stops (either by roving patrols or at fixed checkpoints) may be made without reasonable suspicion or probable cause concerning the individual vehicle stopped, under the authorization of a search warrant “issued to stop cars in a designated area on the basis of conditions in the area as a whole,” Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. at 882 n.7; see also Ortiz, 422 U.S. at 897 n.3. This question was generated by Justice Powell’s concurring opinion in Almeida-Sanchez, which adopts the concept of an “area” search warrant from the Supreme Court’s building-code cases (see Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523 (1967)) and suggests that such a warrant might validate immigration searches in border areas. Because Justice Powell’s concurrence was necessary to make up a 5-4 majority in Almeida-Sanchez and the Court has not become more sympathetic to Fourth Amendment rights since his departure, the likelihood is strong that “area” search warrants will be sustained in border-region immigration cases. See also United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. at 555, 564 n.18.

Amendment’s balance of reasonableness is qualitatively different at the international border than in the interior’); id. at 544 (“at the international border, . . . the Fourth Amendment balance of interests leans heavily to the Government”).

Part E. Probable Cause or Articulable Suspicion Based on Information Obtained from Other Police Officers or Civilian Informants

§ 23.31 POLICE ACTION BASED ON INFORMATION LEARNED FROM OTHER POLICE OFFICERS

Frequently, Officer A concludes that a person is guilty of an offense and conveys that conclusion to Officer B – directly or through some form of police bulletin or dispatch or “wanted flyer” – in connection with a request or directive that the person be arrested or held for questioning. Some courts were inclined to sustain B’s arrest or stop of the person in this situation, even though A lacked probable cause or articulable suspicion for A’s conclusion, on the theory that B had probable cause or articulable suspicion generated by a communication from an apparently reliable informant – namely, fellow officer A. This bootstrap has, however, been firmly rejected by the Supreme Court on the obvious ground that “an otherwise illegal arrest cannot be insulated from challenge by the decision of the instigating officer to rely on fellow officers to make the arrest.” Whiteley v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560, 568 (1971). Accord, United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221, 230 (1985). Police dispatches gain no credibility from the mere fact of their internal transmission. Cf. Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. at 163-64 n.6.

Thus, when police officers rely on a flyer or dispatch to make an arrest, the admissibility of evidence uncovered during a search incident to that arrest “turns on whether the officers who issued the flyer [or dispatch] possessed probable cause to make the arrest.” United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. at 231 (dictum). See, e.g., People v. Powell, 101 A.D.3d 756, 758, 955 N.Y.S.2d 608, 610 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2012). Similarly, in cases of Terry stops based on a flyer or dispatch, “[i]f the flyer [or dispatch] has been issued in the absence of a reasonable suspicion, then a stop in the objective reliance upon it violates the Fourth Amendment.” United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. at 232. Of course, this adequacy of the underlying information is only the necessary condition – not a sufficient condition – for the validity of a detention based upon internal police communications. In addition, the officer who effects the detention must be aware of the communication and must be able to identify the person detained as the individual sought. See State v. Gardner, 135 Ohio St. 3d 99, 104-05, 984 N.E.2d 1025, 1029-30 (2012) (even if there is a valid arrest warrant for an individual, a police seizure of that individual cannot be predicated on the existence of the warrant unless the arresting officer “knew that there was a warrant for the individual’s arrest”); United States v. Hussain, 835 F.3d 307, 316 n.8 (2d Cir. 2016) (“we decline to extend the collective [police] knowledge doctrine to cases where, as here, there is no evidence that an officer has communicated his suspicions with the officer conducting the search, even when the officers are working closely together at a scene”). If the circumstances give rise to questions about the reliability of the communication or the identity of a suspect as the individual sought, police officers are obliged to take reasonable measures to verify the information and their conclusions before taking action. See, e.g., Mareska v. Bernalillo County, 804 F.3d 1301, 1310-12 (10th Cir. 2015) (a police officer who arrested a truck’s occupants based upon an erroneously-received stolen vehicle report for a different vehicle was obliged to “confirm the accuracy of her information in light of the disparity between the vehicle described on the stolen vehicle report and that driven by the Marescas”; “[I]n determining whether there is probable cause, officers are charged with knowledge of any ‘readily available exculpatory evidence’ that they unreasonably fail to ascertain. . . . [T]he probable cause standard of the Fourth Amendment requires officers to reasonably interview witnesses readily available at the scene, investigate basic evidence, or otherwise inquire if a crime has been committed at all before invoking the power of warrantless arrest and detention.”).

§ 23.32 POLICE ACTION BASED ON INFORMATION LEARNED FROM A CIVILIAN INFORMANT

§ 23.32(a) The General Standard

Unless a police officer witnessed the crime or some objective manifestation of criminal conduct, police action – whether it be an arrest, a search, a Terry stop or a Terry frisk – will usually depend upon information learned from civilians. The source of the information may be either an ordinary citizen (a complainant or an eyewitness) or a “police informer” who is trading the information for cash or leniency on criminal charges to which s/he is subject. The identity of the source of the information may not even be known to the police, as in the case of an anonymous phone tip or an informant relaying information that s/he heard “on the street” without revealing the precise source of the information.

Defense attorneys usually confront the issue of informants’ tips in either of two contexts: (i) when the officer presented the information to a magistrate in support of a request for a search warrant or arrest warrant and defense counsel is challenging a search or arrest made pursuant to the resulting warrant, or (ii) when the officer relied on the informant’s tip in making a warrantless arrest, search, stop, or frisk. If the officer acted pursuant to a warrant, the scope of review of the magistrate’s reliance upon information derived from nonpolice informants will be quite limited under Fourth Amendment doctrine, although it may be more expansive under state constitutional law. See § 23.17 supra. Essentially, the issue in warrant cases is whether the informant’s information, as presented in the police affidavit in support of the warrant, was “‘so lacking in indicia of probable cause as to render’” the issuance of a warrant manifestly unreasonable. United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 923 (1984); see § 23.17(a) supra.

In cases in which the officer acted without a warrant, the reviewing court must engage in a far more piercing examination of the reliability and sufficiency of the informant’s communications to the police. Judicial review of police reliance on information from informants was formerly governed by a two-pronged test of “veracity” and “basis of knowledge” established in Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964), and Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969). The Aguilar-Spinelli standard has been preserved in several States as a matter of state constitutional

Under the Gates opinion, the question whether information received from an informant supplies the requisite predicate for a search and seizure (whether that predicate be probable cause or articulable suspicion) is to be determined by the “totality of the circumstances,” including, inter alia, the “informant’s ‘veracity,’ ‘reliability,’ and ‘basis of knowledge.’” 462 U.S. at 230-39. Whereas the Aguilar-Spinelli standard treated “veracity” and “basis of knowledge” as separate criteria, both of which had to be satisfied, the Gates standard treats them as intertwined aspects of a “totality-of-the-circumstances analysis” in which “a deficiency in one [aspect] may be compensated for, in determining the overall reliability of a tip, by a strong showing as to the other, or by some other indicia of reliability.” 426 U.S. at 233. In Gates, the Court concluded that it was possible to overlook the lack of direct evidences of “veracity” and “basis of knowledge” of an anonymous letter because the information in the letter was so detailed as to imply that the informant must be highly knowledgeable and accurate, and “independent investigative work” by the police had corroborated substantial portions of the details relating to conduct by the suspects which “at least suggested” criminal activity. Id. at 243-46. See also Navarette v. California, 134 S. Ct. 1683, 1686, 1688-90 (2014) (an anonymous 911 call reporting that “a vehicle had run [the caller] . . . off the road” “bore adequate indicia of reliability for the officer to credit the caller’s account” and to rely on this information in conducting a traffic stop because (1) the caller’s report that “she had been run off the road by a specific vehicle – a silver Ford F-150 pickup, license plate 8D94925 – . . . necessarily claimed eyewitness knowledge of the alleged dangerous driving” and “[t]hat basis of knowledge lends significant support to the tip’s reliability”; (2) police confirmation of “the truck’s location near mile marker 69 (roughly 19 highway miles south of the location reported in the 911 call) at 4:00 p.m. (roughly 18 minutes after the 911 call) . . . suggests that the caller reported the incident soon after she was run off the road,” and “[t]hat sort of contemporaneous report has long been treated as especially reliable”; and (3) “the caller’s use of the 911 emergency system,” which has “features that allow for identifying and tracing callers,” is an additional “indicator of veracity,” although this is not “to suggest that tips in 911 calls are per se reliable”; the Court majority in this 5-4 decision acknowledges that “this is a ‘close case.’”). Compare Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266, 270, 271-72 (2000) (an anonymous tip that a certain individual at a particular location was in possession of a gun did not provide the police with an adequate basis for a stop and frisk, even though the police found a person matching the description at that precise location, because “‘an anonymous tip alone seldom demonstrates the informant’s basis of knowledge or veracity’” and, although “there are situations in which an anonymous tip, suitably corroborated, exhibits ‘sufficient indicia of reliability to provide reasonable suspicion to make the investigatory stop,’” the “unknown, unaccountable informant . . . neither explained how he knew about the gun nor supplied any basis for believing he had inside information about [the subject]” and the police confirmation of the accuracy of the tipster’s “description of [the] subject’s readily observable location and appearance . . . does not show that the tipster has knowledge of concealed criminal activity”: “The reasonable suspicion here at issue requires that a tip be reliable in its assertion of illegality, not just in its tendency to identify a determinate person.”); United States v. Freeman, 735 F.3d 92, 94, 97-103 (2d Cir. 2013) (an anonymous caller’s two calls to 911 reporting that an individual “is possibly armed with a firearm” and was “arguing with a female” and describing this individual’s appearance in detail and giving his precise location “did not provide the police with the reasonable suspicion needed to stop Freeman”: “[t]he fact that the call was recorded and that the caller’s apparent cell phone number is known does not alter the fact that the identity of the caller is still unknown, leaving no way for the police (or for the reviewing court) to determine her credibility and reputation for honesty”; the detailed information about the individual’s appearance and location “does nothing to ‘show that the tipster has knowledge of concealed criminal activity’”; and “the facts that the stop occurred at night in a ‘high crime’ area” do not “enhance the reliability of the phone call by confirming in it some individualized detail.”); United States v. Martinez, 486 F.3d 855, 863 (5th Cir. 2007) (finding no reasonable suspicion where the “police had verified information that the person in the car they stopped was the ‘Angel’ whom the informant desired to accuse” but “had no verified information . . . that linked Martinez to any criminal behavior” and “[t]he informant also provided no verifiable predictive information about Martinez’s future behavior that would have indicated any ‘inside knowledge’ about Martinez”); United States v. Brown, 448 F.3d 239, 252 (3d Cir. 2006) (concluding that “an excessively general description, combined with an honest but unreliable location tip [i.e., a tip by a citizen whose identity is known but whose reliability is not known to the police,] in the absence of corroborating observations by the police, does not constitute reasonable suspicion under the ‘narrowly drawn authority’ of Terry v. Ohio”); State v. Kooima, 833 N.W.2d 202, 210-11 (Iowa 2013) (“we hold a bare assertion [of drunk driving] by an anonymous tipster, without relaying to the police a personal observation of erratic driving, other facts to establish the driver is intoxicated, or details not available to the general public as to the defendant’s future actions does not have the requisite indicia of reliability to justify an investigatory stop. Such a tip does not meet the requirements of the Fourth Amendment.”).

The pre-Gates caselaw applying the Aguilar-Spinelli test contains extensive discussion of the concepts of “veracity” and “basis of knowledge” with respect to informants’ tips. Although Gates overrules the Aguilar-Spinelli approach of treating these factors as separate and independent criteria, it acknowledges the relevance of both and does not undermine the earlier judicial analyses of “veracity” and “basis of knowledge.”

§ 23.32(b)  “Veracity” of the Informant

The “veracity” inquiry examines whether there are facts showing either that the informant is generally credible or that the information that s/he gave on this particular occasion is reliable. Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. at 114-15. Information from an informant of unknown or doubtful reliability is worth little. E.g., Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 480-81 (1963); Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. 687, 688-89 (1982); Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. at 270-71. See, e.g., *United States v. Glover, 755 F.3d 811, 815-16 (7th Cir. 2014) (“Officer Brown’s affidavit did not include any available information on Doe’s credibility. . . . ¶ . . . The complete omission of information regarding Doe’s credibility is insurmountable, and it undermines the deference we would otherwise give the decision of the magistrate to issue the search warrant.”). “Even a known informant’s information may require corroboration if an affidavit supplies little information concerning that informant’s reliability.” United States v. Clay, 630 Fed.Appx. 377, 385 (6th Cir. 2015).

“[T]he ordinary citizen who has never before reported a crime to the police” is generally viewed as “more reliable than one who supplies information on a regular basis.” United States v. Harris, 403 U.S. 573, 599 (1971) (Harlan, J., dissenting). If the source of information is an informant who “supplies information on a regular basis,” then a critical question is whether the information supplied in prior cases proved to be accurate. See, e.g., McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300, 303-04 (1967); United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798, 817 n.22 (1982). Mere conclusory allegations about the accuracy of the informant in prior cases are insufficient, see Gates, 462 U.S. at 239; Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. at 114-15; details must be supplied concerning the number of times the informant has provided information in the past and the extent to which that information led to arrests and convictions. See, e.g., State v. Robinson, 185 Vt. 232, 239, 969 A.2d 127, 132 (2009) (“The mere statement that the informant had in the past provided unspecified, albeit purportedly ‘credible,’ ‘accurate,’ or ‘reliable’ information that ‘concerned’ drug deals or dealers does not establish the informant’s inherent credibility”); United States v. Neal, 577 Fed. Appx. 434, 441 (6th Cir. 2014) (“This Court has repeatedly held that an affidavit that furnishes details of an informant’s track record of providing reliable tips to the affiant can substantiate the informant’s credibility, such that other indicia of reliability may not be required when relying on the informant's statements. ¶ However, where the affidavit does not aver facts showing the relationship between the affiant and the informant, or detail the affiant’s knowledge regarding the informant providing prior reliable tips that relate to the same type of crimes as the current tip concerns, this Court has generally found that other indicia of reliability must be present to substantiate the informant’s statements.”). Compare McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. at 303-04 (credibility of an informant was sufficiently established by the informant’s having supplied information on fifteen to twenty prior occasions that proved accurate and resulted in numerous arrests and convictions), with State v. Betts, 194 Vt. 212, 224-25, 75 A.3d 629, 638-39 (2013) (trooper’s affidavit, which “indicated that the confidential informant [who was the source of the information upon which the police relied] had ‘provided . . . information in the past that has led to the arrest of at least three separate individuals for various narcotics offenses’” – but which “contain[ed] no indication as to the actual nature of the informant’s cooperation or information in the past, how the information ‘led’ to the alleged arrests, or the final outcome of any of the cases in which he or she was involved” – failed to provide the reviewing court with a sufficient “basis upon which to discharge its constitutional duty to independently analyze the informant’s credibility”). In cross-examining a police officer on the issue of prior performance of an informant, defense counsel should try to pin down precisely how many bad tips the informant has given in the past. Although the courts have not squarely confronted the question of how high a “batting average” is necessary to establish the credibility of an informant and although it certainly is not “required that informants used by the police be infallible,” Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. at 245 n.14, there will be a point at which the number of prior instances of inaccuracy tips the scales in favor of a finding of unreliability. See id. at 234 (courts must engage in “a balanced assessment of the relative weights of all the various indicia of reliability (and unreliability) attending an informant’s tip”); Massachusetts v. Upton, 466 U.S. 727, 732 (1984) (per curiam) (dictum) (same).

Apart from the general credibility of the informant, information given on a particular occasion gains reliability if it is an admission against penal interest. See, e.g., United States v. Harris, 403 U.S. at 583-85 (plurality opinion); Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. at 425 (Justice White, concurring); United States v. Ruiz, 623 Fed. Appx. 378 (9th Cir. 2015). Conversely, when the informant is known to have an incentive to give incriminating information – when, for example, the informant was paid for the information – there is reason to distrust the information. See, e.g., Rutledge v. United States, 392 A.2d 1062, 1066 (D.C. 1978) (“the expectation of reward for services is an ambiguous variable which very well could furnish reason to be honest and accurate in the hope of being utilized again or, conversely, reason to distort or fabricate, in order to earn at least one payment”). For an excellent enumeration and analysis of the factors to be considered in evaluating the veracity of a citizen informant, see United States v. Brown, 448 F.3d 239, 249-51 (3d Cir. 2006).

The necessary showing of veracity “requires that a tip be reliable in its assertion of illegality, not just in its tendency to identify a determinate person.” Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266, 272 (2000) (“Florida contends that the tip was reliable because its description of the suspect's visible attributes proved accurate: There really was a young black male wearing a plaid shirt at the bus stop. . . . These contentions misapprehend the reliability needed for a tip to justify a Terry stop. ¶ An accurate description of a subject’s readily observable location and appearance is of course reliable in this limited sense: It will help the police correctly identify the person whom the tipster means to accuse. Such a tip, however, does not show that the tipster has knowledge of concealed criminal activity. . . . Cf. 4 W. LaFave, Search and Seizure § 9.4(h), p. 213 (3d ed.1996) (distinguishing reliability as to identification, which is often important in other criminal law contexts, from reliability as to the likelihood of criminal activity, which is central in anonymous-tip cases).”

§ 23.32(c) The Informant’s “Basis of Knowledge”

Whereas the “veracity” inquiry focuses on whether the informant is likely to be telling the truth, the inquiry into the informant’s “basis of knowledge” is concerned with whether the informant has a sufficient basis for knowing the information s/he relates, even assuming that s/he is telling the truth. In Aguilar v. Texas, the Court held that one of the principal defects in a police officer’s affidavit was its failure to reveal “some of the underlying circumstances from which the informant concluded that the narcotics were where he claimed they were.” 378 U.S. at 114.

The “basis of knowledge” concern is satisfied whenever the informant asserts a direct perceptual basis for knowing the facts: when, for example, the informant personally saw criminal behavior or contraband, see, e.g., United States v. Bruner, 657 F.2d 1278, 1297 (D.C. Cir. 1981), or was a participant in the crime, see, e.g., United States v. Estrada, 733 F.2d 683, 686 (9th Cir. 1984). Mere conclusory recitations, such as that “the informant had personal knowledge,” will not suffice, United States v. Long, 439 F.2d 628, 630-31 (D.C. Cir. 1971); People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260, 1266-67 (Colo. 1994); State v. Baca, 97 N.M. 379, 381, 640 P.2d 485, 487 (1982): There must be some concrete, factual indication of the basis for the informant’s “personal knowledge.” See, e.g., United States v. Wall, 277 Fed. Appx. 704 (9th Cir. 2008).

The Court explained in Spinelli v. United States, supra, that “[i]n the absence of a statement detailing the manner in which the information was gathered, it is especially important that the tip describe the accused’s criminal activity in sufficient detail that the magistrate may know that he is relying on something more substantial than a casual rumor circulating in the underworld or an accusation based merely on an individual’s general reputation” (393 U.S. at 416). When testing this sort of “self-verifying detail” (United States v. Gifford, 727 F.3d 92, 99 (1st Cir. 2013)), the courts must critically consider whether the details are such that they must have been derived from direct observation or insider information, as distinguished from scuttlebutt. See id. at 100 (“While the Government offers the informant’s statements regarding the contemporaneous state of the marijuana grow as well as the autumn grow as self-authenticating, without any statements as to the informant’s basis of knowledge, there is no means of determining whether that information was obtained first-hand or through rumor. The information is not so specific and specialized that it could only be known to a person with inside information. Further, information about Gifford’s former and current occupation are not so self-verifying to establish the reliability of the informant.”). See also, e.g., United States v. Martinez, 486 F.3d 855, 861-64 (5th Cir. 2007) (finding no reasonable suspicion where an informant “provided no verifiable predictive information . . . that would have indicated any ‘inside knowledge’”); United States v. Bush, 647 F.2d 357, 364 & n.6 (3d Cir. 1981) (the informant’s statement that two men had flown to New York to obtain heroin and would return that evening was not an adequate “self-verifying detail,” since it was not the type of fact that “arguably would only be known to someone with reliable information” and it was “surely equally probable that the informant was merely repeating a rumor overheard on the street”); Shivers v. State, 258 Ga. App. 253, 573 S.E.2d 494 (2002); West v. State, 137 Md. App. 314, 768 A.2d 150 (2000).

§ 23.32(d) Partial Corroboration of the Informant’s Statement Through Police Investigation

In upholding reliance on the informant’s tip in Illinois v. Gates, the Court stressed that the information “had been corroborated in major part” as a result of police investigation. 462 U.S. at 243. The Court explained that “[t]he corroborations of the letter’s predictions that the Gateses’ car would be in Florida, that Lance Gates would fly to Florida in the next day or so, and that he would drive the car north toward Bloomingdale all indicated, albeit not with certainty, that the informant’s other assertions also were true.” Id. at 244. These events, though not necessarily dispositive of criminal activity, were viewed by the Court as “suggestive of a prearranged drug run.” Id. at 243. In contrast, in Florida v. J.L., the Court held that an anonymous tip that a certain individual at a particular location was in possession of a gun did not provide the police with an adequate basis for stopping and frisking that individual, even though the police observations corroborated that there was a person matching the description at that precise location, because the corroborating observations must support the reliability of the tip’s “assertion of illegality,” not just the reliability of its “identification” [of] a determinate person.” 529 U.S. at 272; see § 23.22(b) concluding paragraph supra. Thus, in gauging whether an informant’s tip has been adequately corroborated through police investigation, the courts have been careful to require that the activity witnessed by the police be at least “suspicious,” Rutledge v. United States, 392 A.2d 1062, 1066-67 (D.C. 1978), or “suggestive of . . . criminal activity,” People v. Elwell, 50 N.Y.2d 231, 241, 406 N.E.2d 471, 477, 428 N.Y.S.2d 655, 662 (1980). See also, e.g., United States v. Reaves, 512 F.3d 123, 127-28 (4th Cir. 2008).

In some circumstances, the corroborations can come from prior reports of criminal activity. Thus, in Massachusetts v. Upton, 466 U.S. 727 (1984), the Court found that an informant’s tip describing stolen goods concealed in her former boyfriend’s motor home was partially corroborated by police reports of recent burglaries in which the descriptions of certain of the items stolen “tallied with” the informant’s descriptions of the stolen goods. See id. at 733-34.

§ 23.32(e) Disclosure of the Informant’s Name at the Suppression Hearing

In cases in which a search or seizure was based either wholly or partly on an informant’s tip, defense counsel almost invariably will want to obtain the informant’s name from the police or the prosecutor, so as to be able to make an independent investigation of the informant’s prior “track record,” the informant’s “basis of knowledge,” and any bias that the informant may have against the respondent. Disclosure of the informant’s identity is not available as a matter of right, but can be ordered in the discretion of the judge presiding at a suppression hearing. See, e.g., Schmid v. State, 615 P.2d 565, 570-71 (Alaska 1980). The so-called “informer’s privilege” and its effect upon the respondent’s right to disclosure of the names of confidential informants at a suppression hearing is discussed in § 9.10(a) supra.

Part F. School Searches and Seizures

§ 23.33 APPLICABILITY OF FOURTH AMENDMENT PROTECTIONS TO THE SCHOOL SETTING

It has always been clear that the Fourth Amendment applies to searches and seizures made by police officers inside a school building. See, e.g., Piazzola v. Watkins, 316 F. Supp. 624, 626-27 (M.D. Ala. 1970), aff’d, 442 F.2d 284 (5th Cir. 1971). It is equally clear that if a school official conducts a search or seizure of a student at the behest of the police, the school official is acting as an “agent” of the police and is subject to the same restrictions that would govern police conduct under the circumstances. See § 23.36 infra. 700
Prior to New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), there was some debate about whether school officials were subject to the restrictions of the Fourth Amendment in conducting searches and seizures on their own initiative without any instigation by the police. In T.L.O., the Court concluded that the Fourth Amendment’s “prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures applies to searches conducted by public school officials.” Id. at 333. The T.L.O. opinion decisively rejects the argument that school officials’ in loco parentis status confers the untrammeled search prerogatives of parents, saying:

“Today’s public school officials do not merely exercise authority voluntarily conferred on them by individual parents; rather, they act in furtherance of publicly mandated educational and disciplinary policies. . . . In carrying out searches and other disciplinary functions pursuant to such policies, school officials act as representatives of the State, not merely as surrogates for the parents, and they cannot claim the parents’ immunity from the strictures of the Fourth Amendment.” (Id. at 336-37.)

Although holding that the Fourth Amendment governs school officials’ searches, the Court in T.L.O. did not demand that such searches comply with the same rules that regulate police searches. The rules for assessing the validity of a school official’s search of a student’s person are discussed in § 23.34 infra. The topic of school officials’ searches of students’ desks and lockers is taken up in § 23.35 infra. Compare J.P. ex rel. A.P. v. Millard Public Schools, 285 Neb. 890, 892, 905, 908-09, 830 N.W.2d 453, 457, 465, 466-67 (2013) (“T.L.O.’s school-needs exception . . . for the search of students on school grounds” did not apply to a school official’s search of a student’s truck that was “parked on a public street across from the school” and thus “was not in the school environment or under the dominion and control of the school”). Finally, § 23.36 infra examines the standards that must be applied when a school official acts at the behest of the police rather than on his or her own initiative. See generally Barry C. Feld, T.L.O and Redding’s Unanswered (Misanswered) Fourth Amendment Questions: Few Rights and Fewer Remedies, 80 Miss. L.J. 847 (2011); Annot., Search conducted by school official or teacher as violation of Fourth Amendment or equivalent state constitutional provision, 31 A.L.R.5th 229 (1995, updated). The lower courts are divided on whether school security officers (sometimes called “school resource officers” or “school safety officers”) should be classified as “school officials” or “law enforcement officers” for purposes of the T.L.O. doctrine. See, e.g., State v. Meneese, 174 Wash. 2d 937, 947, 282 P.3d 83, 88 (2012) (discussing the caselaw of other jurisdictions and holding under the federal and state constitutions that the “school search exception” of T.L.O. did not apply to a school resource officer’s search of a student’s backpack because the officer was “a fully commissioned law enforcement officer employed by the Bellevue Police Department who has no ability to discipline students” and who “was seeking to obtain evidence for criminal prosecution, not evidence for informal school discipline”).
It should be noted that the Court in T.L.O. expressly declined to address the question whether “the exclusionary rule applies to the fruits of unlawful searches conducted by school authorities.” T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 333 n.3. It was unnecessary for the Court to reach this issue because the Court found the search of T.L.O. constitutionally valid. However, as the lower courts have concluded in applying the substantive rules announced in T.L.O., the interests served by the exclusionary rule necessarily call for the exclusion of evidence unlawfully seized by school officials. See, e.g., In re William G., 40 Cal. 3d 550, 567 n.17, 709 P.2d 1287, 1298 n.17, 221 Cal. Rptr. 118, 129 n.17 (1985); R.S.M. v. State, 911 So. 2d 283 (Fla. App. 2005); In re Doe, 104 Hawai‘i 403, 91 P.3d 485 (2004), partially overruled on another issue, In re Doe, 105 Hawai‘i 505, 100 P.3d 75 (2004); State v. Pablo R., 139 N.M. 744, 137 P.3d 1198 (N.M. App. 2006); In the Interest of Dumas, 357 Pa. Super. 294, 515 A.2d 984 (1986). Although the goal of deterring police misconduct is not implicated in this context, the exclusionary rule’s other goals of assuring that individuals’ rights to privacy are protected and of preserving “that judicial integrity so necessary in the true administration of justice” (Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 660 (1961)) can only be effectuated by excluding unlawfully seized evidence from juvenile delinquency trials. In re William G., 40 Cal. 3d at 567 & n.17, 709 P.2d at 1298 & n.17, 221 Cal. Rptr. at 129 & n.17. And because school officials are “state actors” charged with heeding the “strictures of the Fourth Amendment,” T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 336-37, and simultaneously charged with disciplinary responsibilities that may tempt them to disregard those strictures, there is much the same constitutional need to deter their misconduct as there is to deter police misconduct. See, e.g., State v. Baccino, 282 A.2d 869, 871 (Del. Super. 1971). Moreover, as Justice Stevens pointed out in an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part in New Jersey v. T.L.O., “[i]n the case of evidence obtained in school searches, the ‘overall educative effect’ of the exclusionary rule adds important symbolic force to this utilitarian judgment. . . . Schools are places where we inculcate the values essential to the meaningful exercise of rights and responsibilities by a self-governing citizenry. If the Nation’s students can be convicted through the use of arbitrary methods destructive of personal liberty, they cannot help but feel that they have been dealt with unfairly.” 469 U.S. at 373-74.

T.L.O.’s special rules for searches and seizures inside a school building may apply as well to external areas that are clearly part of the school grounds, but T.L.O.’s applicability presumably ends at the boundary line between school property and public-use areas adjacent to a school. Compare Gonzalez v. Huerta, 826 F.3d 854, 855, 858-59 (5th Cir. 2016) (a school district police officer, who was sued for detaining a school employee’s husband in the school parking lot for refusing to show identification, was entitled to qualified immunity notwithstanding two “prior Supreme Court cases [that] have held that police may not detain an individual solely for refusing to provide identification,” because “neither of those cases dealt with incidents occurring on school property,” and “[t]his is no small distinction, as the Supreme Court has routinely reconsidered the scope of individual constitutional rights in a school setting.”), with J.P. ex rel. A.P. v. Millard Public Schools, 285 Neb. 890, 830 N.W.2d 453 (2013) (“T.L.O.’s school-needs exception . . . for the search of students on school grounds” (id. at 905, 830 N.W.2d at 465) did not apply to a school official’s “search of a student’s pickup truck that was parked on a public street across from the school” (id. at 892, 830 N.W.2d at 457) and thus “was not in the school environment or under the dominion and control of the school” (id. at 909, 830 N.W.2d at 467). Although some courts “have expanded T.L.O.’s reasonable suspicion standard to a school’s search of a student’s vehicle parked on school grounds” and some courts have “extend[ed] the T.L.O. standard to school searches conducted while a student was attending a school-sponsored class or activity that was held off campus,” the court explains that “none of these cases, nor any that we have found, recognize a right of school officials to conduct off-campus searches of a student’s person or property which are unrelated to school-sponsored activities. To the contrary, courts have held that school officials lack authority to conduct such searches.” (Id. at 900-01, 830 N.W.2d at 462.).

§ 23.34 SEARCHES OF THE STUDENT’S PERSON BY SCHOOL OFFICIALS

In developing a standard to regulate school officials’ searches of students, the Court in T.L.O. balanced “the child’s interest in privacy” against “the substantial interest of teachers and administrators in maintaining discipline in the classroom and on school grounds.” T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 339. The Court concluded that “the school setting requires some easing of the restrictions to which searches by public authorities are ordinarily subject,” id. at 340, including the warrant requirement and the probable cause requirement. Id. at 340-41. Accord, Board of Education of Independent School District No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822, 828-30 (2002); Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646, 653 (1995). See also Shuman ex rel. Shertzer v. Penn Manor School District, 422 F.3d 141, 147 (3d Cir. 2005) (extending the T.L.O. standard for “searches in public schools” to “seizures in that context,” and holding that a student was “‘seized’ within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment” when an assistant principal “told [him] to remain in the conference room under [the assistant principal’s] direction for several hours,” and that “reasonableness is the appropriate benchmark to determine whether [such] a seizure in the public school context survives Fourth Amendment scrutiny”).

Under the standard adopted in T.L.O., “the legality of a search of a student . . . depend[s] simply on the reasonableness, under all the circumstances, of the search.” T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 341. The determination of “the reasonableness of any search involves a two-fold inquiry: first, one must consider ‘whether the . . . action was justified in its inception,’ . . . ; second, one must determine whether the search as actually conducted ‘was reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.’” Id.

“Under ordinary circumstances, a search of a student by a teacher or other school official will be “justified at its inception” when there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence that the student has violated or is violating either the law or the rules of the school. Such a search will be permissible in its scope when the measures adopted are reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction.” (New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 341-42 (footnotes omitted).)

See also Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 371 (2009) (“Perhaps the best that can be said generally about the required knowledge component of probable cause for a law enforcement officer’s evidence search is that it raise a ‘fair probability,’ . . . or a ‘substantial chance,’ . . . of discovering evidence of criminal activity. The lesser standard for school searches could as readily be described as a moderate chance of finding evidence of wrongdoing.”); id. at 372 n.1 (“[w]hen the object of a school search is the enforcement of a school rule,” “the rule’s legitimacy” also may be at issue because a search can be found to be “unreasonable owing to some defect or shortcoming of the rule it was aimed at enforcing”).

Applying the standard to the facts of the T.L.O. case, the Court concluded that (i) the school vice-principal’s “decision to open T.L.O.’s purse was reasonable,” id. at 347, because a teacher had observed T.L.O. smoking cigarettes in the girls’ bathroom in violation of school rules and it was therefore reasonable to suspect that T.L.O. had cigarettes in her purse, id. at 345-46; (ii) when the vice-principal, in opening and removing a pack of cigarettes, observed a package of rolling papers, the “reasonable suspicion that T.L.O. was carrying marihuana as well as cigarettes in her purse . . . justified further exploration of T.L.O.’s purse, which turned up more evidence of drug-related activities: a pipe, a number of plastic bags of the type commonly used to store marihuana, a small quantity of marihuana, and a fairly substantial amount of money,” id. at 347; and (iii) “[u]nder these circumstances, it was not unreasonable to extend the search to a separate zippered compartment of the purse; and when a search of that compartment revealed an index card containing a list of ‘people who owe me money’ as well as two letters, the inference that T.L.O. was involved in marihuana trafficking was substantial enough to justify [the vice-principal] . . . in examining the letters to determine whether they contained any further evidence.” Id. Thus school searches, like all other searches, are subject to the general rule that each increasing level of intrusiveness must be justified by additional facts warranting the intensification of the intrusion.

In applying the T.L.O. standard in Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, the Court similarly scrutinized the record carefully to determine whether the facts known to the school officials justified the initial intrusion and the subsequent level of additional intrusion. The Court concluded that (i) an assistant principal had adequate “suspicion . . . to justify a search of [a student’s] . . . backpack and outer clothing” in the student’s “presence and in the relative privacy of [the assistant principal’s] . . . office,” based upon information from other students giving rise to a reasonable suspicion that the student was “giving out contraband pills” in violation of a school rule and that the student was “carrying [such pills] . . . on her person and in the [backpack]”; but that (ii) when the school nurse and an administrative assistant thereafter conducted a more intrusive search of the student’s person in the nurse’s office, directing the student to “remove her clothes down to her underwear, and then ‘pull out’ her bra and the elastic band on her underpants,” “thus exposing her breasts and pelvic area to some degree,” this “quantum leap from outer clothes and backpacks to exposure of intimate parts” violated the Fourth Amendment because the facts known to the school officials did not indicate that there was “danger to the [other] students from the power of the drugs [that the student was “reasonably suspected of carrying”] or their quantity,. . . [or] any reason to suppose that . . . [the student] was carrying pills in her underwear.” Safford, 557 U.S. at 368-69, 373-77.
In challenging school searches, defense counsel should argue that the T.L.O. standard incorporates the Terry “articulable suspicion” requirement, see § 23.09 supra. Significantly, when the Court applied the first prong of its T.L.O. test – the inquiry into whether there are “reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence” (id. at 342) – the Court relied on Terry and its progeny to define the requisite quantum of suspicion. Id. at 346 (saying that the inquiry demands more than the type of “‘inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or ‘hunch’” condemned in Terry and equating the required level of certainty with the Terry-level showing called for in United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411 (1981)). See also Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. at 370 (reiterating T.L.O.’s ruling that “searches by school officials” are to be judged “by a Fourth Amendment standard of reasonableness that stops short of probable cause”) and then referencing prior Fourth Amendment caselaw on probable cause in the adult criminal context to observe that “[p]erhaps the best that can be said generally about the required knowledge component of probable cause for a law enforcement officer’s evidence search is that it raise a ‘fair probability,’ . . . or a ‘substantial chance,’ . . . of discovering evidence of criminal activity” while “[t]he lesser standard for school searches could as readily be described as a moderate chance of finding evidence of wrongdoing”); id. at 373-74 (scrutinizing the record carefully to determine whether the specific facts known to school officials were sufficient to “justify a search of [the student’s] backpack and outer clothing” based upon “reasonable suspicion” that the student was “carrying . . . [“contraband pills”] on her person and in the carryall”); id. at 370 (summarizing the T.L.O. rule by saying that “[w]e have . . . applied a standard of reasonable suspicion to determine the legality of a school administrator’s search of a student”). In applying T.L.O., the lower courts have analyzed school officials’ actions under this Terry standard of justification. See, e.g., G.C. v. Owensboro Public Schools, 711 F.3d 623, 633-34 (6th Cir. 2013) (in a decision issued even before the Supreme Court’s announcement of strict privacy protections for cell phones’ digital content in Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473 (2014), the court of appeals holds that school officials’ search of a cell phone confiscated from a student violated T.L.O., notwithstanding the school officials’ “background knowledge of [G.C.’s] drug abuse . . . [and] depressive tendencies” because “there is no evidence in the record to support the conclusion . . . that the school officials had any specific reason at the inception of the . . . search to believe that G.C. then was engaging in any unlawful activity or that he was contemplating injuring himself or another student”); In re William G., 40 Cal. 3d 550, 566, 709 P.2d 1287, 1297, 221 Cal. Rptr. 118, 128 (1985) (the T.L.O. “standard is more stringent than other ‘less than probable cause’ standards . . . because it depends on objective and articulable facts”); In the Interest of Dumas, 357 Pa. Super. 294, 298, 515 A.2d 984, 986 (1986) (striking down a school search under the T.L.O. standard because the assistant principal “was unable to articulate any reasons for [ ] his suspicion” that the student who had been caught smoking cigarettes was “involved with marijuana”).

Counsel should further argue that factors such as “furtive gestures” and refusal to answer questions should be accorded no greater weight in the school setting than in the context of a Terry stop and frisk. See, e.g., William G., 40 Cal. 3d at 567, 709 P.2d at 1297, 221 Cal. Rptr. at 128 (citing Terry caselaw for the conclusion that a student’s “‘furtive gestures’ in trying to hide his calculator case from [school official’s] view cannot, standing alone, furnish sufficient cause to search”); see id. (citing Terry caselaw for the proposition that “William’s demand for a warrant did not create a reasonable suspicion upon which to base the search. Such conduct merely constitutes William’s legitimate assertion of his constitutional right to privacy and to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. There are many reasons why a student might assert these rights, other than an attempt to prevent disclosure of evidence that one has violated a proscribed activity. A student cannot be penalized for demanding respect for his or her constitutional rights.”). For discussion of the relevance of these factors in the Terry context, see § 23.11 supra.

In litigating under the T.L.O. standard, counsel can also draw upon the caselaw dealing with a police officer’s right to rely on hearsay information in conducting a Terry stop or frisk, see §§ 23.31-23.32 supra. See Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. at 370-71 (recognizing that the Court’s prior decisions on probable cause, including cases dealing with police reliance on hearsay, “have an implicit bearing on the reliable knowledge element of reasonable suspicion” even though “these factors cannot rigidly control” the “lesser standard” governing “the required knowledge component” of reasonable suspicion for any particular school search since “the standards are ‘fluid concepts that take their substantive content from the particular contexts’ in which they are being assessed”); id. at 381-82 (Justice Ginsburg, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (disagreeing with the majority’s conclusion that an assistant principal who conducted an unconstitutional search had qualified immunity, and explaining that the unreasonableness of the school official’s actions is shown by, inter alia, his reliance “on the bare accusation of another student whose reliability the Assistant Principal had no reason to trust”). Thus, as a state court concluded in applying a general-reasonableness standard to a school search in a pre-T.L.O. case, there must be scrutiny of “the probative value and reliability of the information used as a justification for the search.” Doe v. State, 88 N.M. 347, 352, 540 P.2d 827, 832 (N.M. App. 1975).

Counsel should insist that the reviewing court strictly enforce the second prong of the T.L.O. standard – that the “scope” of a search be “reasonably related to the objectives of the search and not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction.” T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 342. The Court’s analysis of the T.L.O. record under this prong can be used to illustrate the limitations it imposes on the scope of search. When the vice-principal knew nothing more than that a highly reliable source, a teacher, had observed a student smoking cigarettes in violation of a school rule, the vice-principal was permitted to take the limited step of opening the student’s purse and removing the cigarettes. See id. at 344-46. When that action revealed evidence of the criminal act of possession of marijuana, the vice-principal could engage in “further exploration” of the purse. See id. at 347. It was only after the discovery of marijuana itself – a discovery that in the police context would justify an arrest and a full-scale search incident to arrest – that the vice-principal was permitted to make the additional intrusion of examining the interior of the zippered compartment. See id. Finally, it was only after this intrusion revealed evidence of the far more serious crime of narcotics sale that the vice-principal was permitted to take the ultimate step of reading T.L.O.’s letters. See id. Compare, e.g., In the Interest of Doe, 77 Hawai‘i 435, 442-43, 887 P.2d 645, 652-53 (1994) (principal’s search of a student’s handbag conformed to T.L.O. standard because the principal had “reasonable grounds to suspect that Minor may be concealing marijuana in her purse” and “the search ceased” after the student emptied her purse, disclosing a bag of marijuana, and State v. Drake, 139 N.H. 662, 667, 662 A.2d 265, 268 (1995) (principal’s search of a student’s knapsack complied with T.L.O. because the principal had reasonable grounds to believe that the student was “likely using, and possibly distributing, drugs” and would have drugs with him in school that day, and the principal first asked the student to empty his pockets, resulting in the discovery of a rolling paper package with what appeared to be marijuana on it, whereupon the principal asked the student to open his knapsack and thereby found several bags of marijuana), with Coronado v. State, 835 S.W.2d 636, 637, 641 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992) (although “the first prong of T.L.O. is met” in that the assistant principal had “reasonable grounds to suspect that [the student] was violating school rules by ‘skipping’” class and leaving school early, the assistant principal’s “searches of [the student’s] clothing and person, locker, and vehicle were excessively intrusive in light of the infraction of skipping school,” notwithstanding the assistant principal’s reasons for suspecting that the student was selling drugs to other students).

In its post-T.L.O. decision in Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, the Court elaborated upon T.L.O.’s general statements about “excessive[] intrus[ions]” by addressing the criteria that apply when school officials engage in a search that involves “exposure of [a student’s] intimate parts.” 557 U.S. 364, 370, 374-77 (2009). In Safford, a school nurse and an administrative assistant “directed [the student] to remove her clothes down to her underwear, and then ‘pull out’ her bra and the elastic band on her underpants,” which “necessarily exposed her breasts and pelvic area to some degree.” Id. at 374. The Court characterized such a search as a “quantum leap” beyond less intrusive searches of “outer clothes and backpacks” (id. at 377), and explained:

“[B]oth subjective and reasonable societal expectations of personal privacy support the treatment of such a search [that exposes a student’s “intimate parts”] as categorically distinct [from less intrusive searches], requiring distinct elements of justification on the part of school authorities for going beyond a search of outer clothing and belongings.

“[Student] Savana’s subjective expectation of privacy against such a search is inherent in her account of it as embarrassing, frightening, and humiliating. The reasonableness of her expectation (required by the Fourth Amendment standard) is indicated by the consistent experiences of other young people similarly searched, whose adolescent vulnerability intensifies the patent intrusiveness of the exposure. . . . The common reaction of these adolescents simply registers the obviously different meaning of a search exposing the body from the experience of nakedness or near undress in other school circumstances. Changing for gym is getting ready for play; exposing for a search is responding to an accusation reserved for suspected wrongdoers and fairly understood as so degrading that a number of communities have decided that strip searches in schools are never reasonable and have banned them no matter what the facts may be, see, e.g., New York City Dept. of Education, Reg. No. A-432, p. 2 (2005), online at

“The indignity of the search does not, of course, outlaw it, but it does implicate the rule of reasonableness as stated in T.L.O., that “the search as actually conducted [be] reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place.” 469 U.S., at 341 (internal quotation marks omitted). The scope will be permissible, that is, when it is “not excessively intrusive in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction.” Id., at 342. . . .

“. . . The meaning of such a search [which exposes “intimate parts” of the student’s body], and the degradation its subject may reasonably feel, place a search that intrusive in a category of its own demanding its own specific suspicions.” (Safford, 557 U.S. at 374-77.)

See also id. at 380 (Justice Stevens, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“I have long believed that “[i]t does not require a constitutional scholar to conclude that a nude search of a 13-year-old child is an invasion of constitutional rights of some magnitude.”” (quoting Doe v. Renfrow, 631 F.2d 91, 92-93 (7th Cir. 1980))); id. at 381-82 (Justice Ginsburg, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“humiliating stripdown search” of the 13-year-old student “was abusive”); T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 382 n.25 (Justice Stevens, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“T.L.O.’s prohibition of excessively intrusive searches of students precludes “the shocking strip searches that are described in some cases that have no place in the schoolhouse”); Tarter v. Raybuck, 742 F.2d 977, 982-83 (6th Cir. 1984) (body cavity search of student would be per se unreasonable). In Safford, the Court held that the school officials’ “quantum leap from outer clothes and backpacks to exposure of intimate parts” violated the Fourth Amendment because the facts known to the school officials did not indicate that there was “danger to the [other] students from the power of the drugs [that the student was “reasonably suspected of carrying”] or their quantity, . . . [or] any reason to suppose that . . . [the student] was carrying pills in her underwear.” Safford, 557 U.S. at 374, 376-77.

In cases involving older students, especially students close to the age of eighteen, defense counsel should argue that T.L.O.’s requirement that searches be tempered according to the “age . . . of the student,” T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 342, stringently restricts the authority of school officials in searching students whose privacy interests are more closely akin to adults’. Counsel can point out that the greater maturity of an older student renders it less justifiable to subordinate the student’s privacy rights to the needs of the school. Cf. Smyth v. Lubbers, 398 F. Supp. 777, 785-86 (W.D. Mich. 1975) (college’s assertion of the right to search students’ dormitory rooms is rejected in part because the adult status of the students precludes their being denied the same privacy rights as adults outside the educational institution).

A question reserved in T.L.O. was “whether individualized suspicion is an essential element of the reasonableness standard . . . for searches by school authorities.” 469 U.S. at 342 n.8. The Court explained that “[b]ecause the search of T.L.O.’s purse was based upon an individualized suspicion that she had violated school rules, . . . we need not consider the circumstances that might justify school authorities in conducting searches unsupported by individualized suspicion.” Id. See also Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. at 653
(“The school search we approved in T.L.O., while not based on probable cause, was based on individualized suspicion of wrongdoing.”). Thereafter, the Court has, on two occasions, upheld a program of random drug testing, without individualized suspicion, of students who voluntarily participated in extracurricular activities. See Board of Education of Independent School District No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, 536 U.S. at 830-38 (school district’s policy of random drug testing of students voluntarily participating in competitive extracurricular activities is upheld by applying a three-pronged standard – which considers the nature of privacy interest affected; the character of the intrusion; and the nature and immediacy of the government’s concerns and the efficacy of the policy in meeting them – and concluding that (1) the privacy interests of the children were diminished because they voluntarily chose to participate in extracurricular activities which were highly regulated; (2) urinalysis was a “negligible” intrusion, especially given that the test results were not turned over to law enforcement officials, the only consequence of refusing to participate in drug testing was nonparticipation in the extracurricular activity, and students did not face expulsion or suspension or any other school-related sanctions even if they tested positive; and (3) there was sufficient evidence of student use of drugs to justify the need for the drug testing program.); Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. at 646, 648, 654-65 (school district’s policy of “random urinalysis drug testing of students who participate in the District’s school athletics programs” is upheld by applying the same three-pronged analytic apparatus employed in Earls, and concluding that (1) the very nature of school sports results in a lesser degree of privacy, and student athletes “voluntarily subject themselves to a degree of regulation even higher than that imposed on students generally”; (2) the urinalysis testing process, as administered under the district’s guidelines, involved a “negligible” degree of intrusion; and (3) there was concrete evidence of a significant increase in the use of drugs by the student body, “particularly those involved in interscholastic athletics,” and there was a basis for concluding that “drug use by school athletes” gives rise to a “particularly high” “risk of immediate physical harm to the drug user or those with whom he is playing his sport.”). As the Court’s analyses in Acton and Earls make clear, the constitutionality of a search of students without individualized suspicion turns upon a balancing of context-specific facts and circumstances. See, e.g., Doe ex rel. Doe v. Little Rock School District, 380 F.3d 349, 351, 354-56 (8th Cir. 2004) (rejecting a school district’s attempt to apply Acton and Earls to justify a district practice of “subject[ing] secondary public school students to random, suspicionless searches of their persons and belongings,” and explaining that, “[u]nlike the suspicionless searches of participants in school sports and other competitive extracurricular activities that the Supreme Court approved in Vernonia and Earls, in which ‘the privacy interests compromised by the process’ of the searches were deemed ‘negligible,’ . . . the type of search at issue here invades students’ privacy interests in a major way”; “[i]n sharp contrast to these cases, the fruits of the searches at issue here are apparently regularly turned over to law enforcement and are used in criminal proceedings against students whose contraband is discovered”; and the district had failed to present the kinds of “particularized evidence” offered by the school districts “[i]n both Vernonia and Earls... to ‘shore up’ their assertions of a special need to institute administrative search programs for extracurricular-activity participants.”); B.C. v. Plumas Unified School District, 192 F.3d 1260, 1268 & nn.10-11 (9th Cir. 1999) (rejecting a school district’s attempt to apply Acton to justify the use of a drug-sniffing dog to sniff all of the students in a classroom for drugs, and explaining that, “[i]n contrast [to Acton], the search in this case took place in a classroom where students were engaged in compulsory, educational activities,” and that, “[i]n sharp contrast” to Acton, “the record here does not disclose that there was any drug crisis or even a drug problem” at the school at the time of the search); Kittle-Aikeley v. Strong, 844 F.3d 727, 741 (8th Cir. 2016) (“We conclude that the district court properly applied [National Treasury Employees Union v.] Von Raab, [489 U.S. 656 (1989)] when it conducted a program-by-program analysis. The category of students who may be drug tested as a condition of attending Linn State is composed only of those students who enroll in safety-sensitive educational programs. By requiring all incoming students to be drug tested, Linn State defined the category of students to be tested more broadly than was necessary to meet the valid special need of deterring drug use among students enrolled in safety-sensitive programs.”). See also York v. Wahkiakum School District No. 200, 163 Wash. 2d 297, 299, 178 P.3d 995, 997 (2008) (rejecting Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton on state constitutional grounds and holding that “warrantless random and suspicionless drug testing of student athletes violates the Washington State Constitution”).

§ 23.35 SEARCHES OF STUDENTS’ LOCKERS OR DESKS BY SCHOOL OFFICIALS

T.L.O. expressly reserved “the question, not presented by this case, whether a schoolchild has a legitimate expectation of privacy in lockers, desks, or other school property provided for the storage of school supplies,” and what “standards (if any) govern[ ] searches of such areas by school officials or by other public authorities acting at the request of school officials.” 469 U.S. at 337 n.5.

A number of lower court decisions have concluded that students have a reasonable expectation of privacy in their lockers, at least in the absence of an express school policy or state regulation that could render such an expectation unreasonable. See, e.g., State v. Jones, 666 N.W.2d 142, 147-48 (Iowa 2003) (citing caselaw from other jurisdictions); Commonwealth v. Snyder, 413 Mass. 521, 526, 597 N.E.2d 1363, 1366 (1992) (citing caselaw from other jurisdictions). In situations involving a school policy or state regulation establishing a school’s right of access to the contents of students’ lockers, some courts have found that students lacked a reasonable expectation of privacy in their lockers, see, e.g., In Interest of Isaiah B., 176 Wis. 2d 639, 649-50, 500 N.W.2d 637, 641 (1993) (there was a written school policy “retaining ownership and possessory control of school lockers... and notice of the locker policy is given to students”), or had a reduced expectation of privacy in the locker, see, e.g., Commonwealth v. Cass, 551 Pa. 25, 38-39, 709 A.2d 350, 356-57 (1998) (given that the Code of Student Conduct “forewarned [students] that their lockers are subject to a search by school officials without prior warning” and that “school officials... possess a master key that can open all combination locks” and “are constantly in the student lockers to make general repairs as needed, without first giving notice to the students,” the students – although “possess[ing] a legitimate expectation of privacy in their assigned lockers” – had only a “minimal” “privacy expectation”), while other courts have held that students possess an undiminished expectation of privacy in their lockers even when a school policy or state regulation purports to render such a privacy expectation unreasonable, see, e.g., State v. Jones, 666 N.W.2d 142, 147-48 (Iowa 2003) (a student “maintained a legitimate expectation of privacy in the contents of his locker” even though both “school district policy . . . and state law . . . clearly contemplate and regulate searches of school lockers”).

Defense counsel can draw on language in the T.L.O. opinion to mount a persuasive argument that students should be viewed as having a privacy interest in lockers and desks assigned to them for the storage of personal belongings. The Court observed:

> “Although this Court may take notice of the difficulty of maintaining discipline in the public schools today, the situation is not so dire that students in the schools may claim no legitimate expectations of privacy. . . . Nor does the State’s suggestion that children have no legitimate need to bring personal property into the schools seem well anchored in reality. Students at a minimum must bring to school not only the supplies needed for their studies, but also keys, money, and the necessaries of personal hygiene and grooming. In addition, students may carry on their persons or in purses or wallets such nondisruptive yet highly personal items as photographs, letters, and diaries. Finally, students may have perfectly legitimate reasons to carry with them articles of property needed in connection with extracurricular or recreational activities. In short, schoolchildren may find it necessary to carry with them a variety of legitimate, noncontraband items, and there is no reason to conclude that they have necessarily waived all rights to privacy in such items merely by bringing them onto school grounds.” (469 U.S. at 338-39.)

See also Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364, 374 n.3 (2009) (“it is common ground that [a 13-year-old student] . . . had a reasonable expectation of privacy covering the personal things she chose to carry in her backpack”).

In rebutting the argument that the school’s proprietary interest in the locker or desk confers the right to search at will, defense counsel can analogize the student’s privacy interest in his or her locker or desk to the privacy interest of a government employee in a locker or a desk provided by a governmental employer for the employee’s exclusive use in a government building. In O’Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709 (1987), a plurality of the Court concluded that considerations similar to those involved in T.L.O.’s analysis of schoolhouse searches of students were pertinent to “workplace” searches of a public employee’s desk and filing cabinet by his or her governmental employer. See id. at 719-26. Although there was a 4-1-4 split on several issues in O’Connor, five Justices agreed that the government employee in that case had a constitutionally protected privacy interest in his office; all nine Justices agreed that he had such an interest in his desk and file cabinets; and all nine agreed that a government employee could acquire a constitutionally protected privacy interest in the whole of an office assigned for his or her exclusive use despite its physical location in a government-owned building. Id. at 714-19 (plurality opinion); id. at 731 (concurring opinion of Justice Scalia) (“I would hold . . . that the offices of government employees, and a fortiori the drawers and files within those offices, are covered by Fourth Amendment protections as a general matter”); id. at 741 (dissenting opinion of Justice Blackmun) (“Dr. Ortega clearly had an expectation of privacy in his office, desk, and file cabinets, particularly with respect to the type of investigatory search involved here”). The plurality in O’Connor applied a T.L.O. standard to gauge the reasonableness of a search of the employee’s desk and file cabinets, see id. at 725-26, and approvingly cited lower court caselaw applying a similar standard to an employer’s search of an employee’s locker. See id. at 721, citing United States v. Bunkers, 521 F.2d 1217 (9th Cir. 1975). Thus counsel can argue that the opinions in O’Connor demonstrate that the T.L.O. standard should apply to a teacher’s or principal’s search of a student’s locker or desk, at least when the locker or desk is set aside for the student’s personal use, the student stores “personal items” in the locker or desk, and the school has not published regulations discouraging students from storing personal items in their lockers and desks. See O’Connor, 480 U.S. at 718-19; see also Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646, 665 (1995) (analogizing the issues that arise in a school search “when the government acts as guardian and tutor” of students to the issues that arise “when the government conducts a search in its capacity as employer (a warrantless search of an absent employee’s desk to obtain an urgently needed file, for example),” and citing O’Connor v. Ortega); United States v. Speights, 557 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1977) (police officer had a legitimate expectation of privacy in a locker at the stationhouse); Commonwealth v. Gabrielle, 269 Pa. Super. 338, 409 A.2d 1173 (1979) (employee had legitimate expectation of privacy in a workplace locker).

§ 23.36 SEARCHES BY SCHOOL OFFICIALS AT THE BEHEST OF THE POLICE

The Supreme Court in T.L.O. also reserved the “question of the appropriate standard for assessing the legality of searches conducted by school officials in conjunction with or at the behest of law enforcement agencies.” 469 U.S. at 341 n.7.

With virtual unanimity the lower courts have held that when school officials act in cooperation with the police in conducting a search, the search must be judged under the ordinary rules that govern police searches, including the warrant requirement and the probable cause standard. See, e.g., Picha v. Wielgos, 410 F. Supp. 1214, 1219-21 (N.D. Ill. 1976); Piazzola v. Watkins, 316 F. Supp. 624, 626-27 (M.D. Ala. 1970), aff’d, 442 F.2d 284 (5th Cir. 1971); M.J. v. State, 399 So. 2d 996 (Fla. App. 1981); State v. Heirtzler, 147 N.H. 344, 349-52, 789 A.2d 634, 638-41 (2001). Contra, Doe v. Renfrow, 475 F. Supp. 1012 (N.D. Ind. 1979), remanded in part on other grounds, 631 F.2d 91 (7th Cir. 1980) (school search conducted by school officials in conjunction with police officers was not subject to the full protections of the Fourth Amendment because the school officials had initiated the search and invited the participation of the police and the police had agreed that no arrests would be made as a result of finding drugs on students). See generally Michael Pinard, From the Classroom to the Courtroom: Reassessing Fourth Amendment Standards in Public School Searches Involving Law Enforcement Authorities, 45 Ariz. L. Rev. 1067 (2003).

The caselaw holding that the involvement of the police calls forth the full panoply of Fourth Amendment protections is consistent with the long-established doctrine that even a search or seizure by a private citizen, normally not regulated at all by the Fourth Amendment, United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 113-15 (1984); Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465 (1921), will be subject to Fourth Amendment restrictions if:

(i) The search was ordered or requested by a government official, see, e.g., United States v. Hardin, 539 F.3d 404, 417-20 (6th Cir. 2008) (apartment building “manager was acting as an agent of the government” when he entered the defendant’s apartment at the request of police officers); Corngold v. United States, 367 F.2d 1 (9th Cir. 1966) (alternative ground) (customs agent asked an airline transportation agent to open a package placed with the airline for shipment); People v. Barber, 94 Ill. App. 3d 813, 419 N.E.2d 71, 50 Ill. Dec. 204 (1981) (police officers requested that landlord enter tenant’s apartment); Commonwealth v. Dembo, 451 Pa. 1, 301 A.2d 689 (1973) (police officer seeking evidence of criminal conduct asked postal authorities to open package; postal authorities had contractual authority to open any package to verify shipping rate); compare United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. at 115 n.10 (in holding that Federal Employee’s opening of package was private action not subject to Fourth Amendment restrictions, the Court points out that “the lower courts found no governmental involvement in the private search”); or

(ii) The search was a “joint endeavor” of a private individual and the police, in that: (A) the police conducted the search jointly with the private citizen, see, e.g., State v. Scrotsky, 39 N.J. 410, 189 A.2d 23 (1963) (detective and defendant’s landlady entered suspect’s apartment together to recover landlady’s stolen goods); Nicaud v. State ex rel. Hendrix, 401 So. 2d 43 (Ala. 1981) (police accompanied shipyard foreman onto shrimp boat); or (B) the officer tacitly encouraged the private citizen to conduct the search, see, e.g., Moody v. United States, 163 A.2d 337 (D.C. 1960); State v. Becich, 13 Or App. 415, 509 P.2d 1232 (1973); Commonwealth v. Borecky, 277 Pa. Super. 244, 419 A.2d 753 (1980). (It should be noted that although the probation officer’s search of a probationer’s home in Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868 (1987), involved a police escort, id. at 871 – apparently requested by the probation officer in light of his articulable suspicion that the probationer possessed a handgun, see id. – the Court’s opinion treats the search as having been “carried out entirely by the probation officers,” id. Accordingly, the Griffin decision does not have any implications for the “joint endeavor” doctrine.)

Part G. Derivative Evidence: Fruits of Unlawful Searches and Seizures

§ 23.37 THE CONCEPT OF “DERIVATIVE EVIDENCE”: EVIDENCE THAT MUST BE SUPPRESSED AS THE FRUITS OF AN UNLAWFUL SEARCH OR SEIZURE

When government agents have violated the restrictions of the Fourth Amendment or state constitutional or statutory protections against unlawful searches or seizures, the court must suppress not only evidence directly obtained by the violation but also “derivative evidence,” that is, evidence to which the police are led “by the exploitation of that illegality.” Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 488 (1963); see also Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 597-603 “Wong Sun . . . articulated the guiding principle for determining whether evidence derivatively obtained from a violation of the Fourth Amendment is admissible against the accused at trial: ‘The exclusionary prohibition extends as well to the indirect as the direct products of such invasions.’ 371 U.S., at 484. . . . As subsequent cases have confirmed, the exclusionary sanction applies to any ‘fruits’ of a constitutional violation – whether such evidence be tangible, physical material actually seized in an illegal search, items observed or words overheard in the course of the unlawful activity, or confessions or statements of the accused obtained during an illegal arrest and detention.” United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463, 470 (1980) (dictum). It also applies to the testimony of witnesses that has a sufficiently close “causal connection” to the constitutional violation, United States v. Ceccolini, 435 U.S. 268, 274 (1978); see id. at 274-75 (dictum); Jones v. United States, 168 A.3d 703, 723-26 (D.C. 2017), although in order to exclude “live-witness testimony . . . , a closer, more direct link between the illegality and that kind of testimony is required,” id. at 278; see also id. at 280, except perhaps “where the search was conducted by the police for the specific purpose of discovering potential witnesses,” id. at 276 n.4; see also id. at 279-80.

The possible chains of causal connection may be elaborate, e.g., Smith v. United States, 344 F.2d 545 (D.C. Cir. 1965); United States v. Tane, 329 F.2d 848 (2d Cir. 1964), and counsel should be alert to follow them out. “[T]he question” determining the excludability of any particular piece of evidence is said to be “whether the chain of causation proceeding from the unlawful conduct has become so attenuated or has been interrupted by some intervening circumstance so as to remove the ‘taint’ imposed upon that evidence by the original illegality.” United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. at 471. Accord, Utah v. Strieff, 136 S. Ct. at 2061; compare Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 216-19 (1979), and Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. 687 (1982), with Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 106-10 (1980); and see United States v. Ceccolini, 435 U.S. at 276 (“we have declined to adopt a ‘per se or “but for” rule’ that would make inadmissible any evidence, whether tangible or live-witness testimony, which somehow came to light through a chain of causation that began with an illegal arrest”); id. at 273-74.

Categories of derivative evidence that have been held tainted by a respondent’s unconstitutional arrest or detention, so as to require their suppression include:

(a) Any physical object or substance seized without a warrant at or after the time of arrest, the validity of whose seizure depends on the arrest. Beck v. Ohio, 379 U.S. 89 (1964); Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 60, 62-66 (1968); Whiteley v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560 (1971). Searches incident to arrest (§ 23.08 supra) and “frisks” incident to a Terry stop (§ 23.10 supra) are unconstitutional if the arrest or stop is unconstitutional. E.g., United States v. Di Re, 332 U.S.
Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. 98 (1959). Similarly, if an unconstitutionally arrested or detained person attempts to drop or throw away objects or exposes them to the police when attempting to discard them, their observation and seizure are tainted by the arrest or detention. Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980) (per curiam); see § 23.13 supra. A respondent needs not have independent standing to complain about the search or seizure of an object if its obtention by the government was the consequence of an earlier search or seizure that s/he does have standing to contest. Jones v. United States, 168 A.3d 703, 722 (D.C. 2017) (“[w]hile the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine applies only when the defendant has standing regarding the Fourth Amendment violation which constitutes the poisonous tree, the law imposes no separate standing requirement regarding the evidence which constitutes the fruit of that poisonous tree”).

(b) Any observations made in the course of effecting the arrest – before, during, or after the arrest – whose validity depends on the arrest. Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10 (1948). Thus, when police enter a building pursuant to the “arrest entry” doctrine (§ 23.19 supra), unconstitutionality of the arrest or intended arrest will invalidate their observations of objects in “plain view” (§ 23.22(b) supra) within the building and their subsequent searches or seizures of those objects. See Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. at 12-13, 17; Massachusetts v. Painten, 368 F.2d 142 (1st Cir. 1966), cert. dismissed, 389 U.S. 560 (1968).

(d) Any physical object or substance or observation obtained by a search or seizure whose validity depends upon consent, when the consent is given in custody after the arrest or otherwise induced by pressures flowing from the arrest. Consent to a police search or seizure (§ 23.18 supra) is ineffective if given during an unlawful confinement, Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S.
(e) Fingerprint exemplars taken after the arrest, Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721 (1969); Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811 (1985); Bynum v. United States, 262 F.2d 465 (D.C. Cir. 1958); see Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. at 692-93 (dictum), and, by the same logic, any other evidence obtained through physical custody of the respondent – lineup identifications, body-test results, and so forth (see § 23.14 supra). E.g., United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463, 472 (1980) (the Court assumes the Government is correct in conceding that pretrial photo and lineup identifications following an arrest made without probable cause must be suppressed); Young v. Conway, 698 F.3d 69, 84-85 (2d Cir. 2012) (state court order suppressing the complainant’s lineup identification as the fruit of an unconstitutional arrest without probable cause also should have precluded an in-court identification by the complainant because “the State failed to meet its burden to prove an independent basis [for an in-court identification] by clear and convincing evidence”); People v. Teresinki, 30 Cal. 3d 822, 832, 180 Cal. Rptr. 617, 622-23, 640 P.3d 753, 758-59 (1982) (a pretrial identification by an eyewitness to a robbery based upon booking photos resulting from a vehicle stop and investigative detention made without reasonable suspicion must be suppressed); Ferguson v. State, 301 Md. 542, 547-53, 483 A.2d 1255, 1257-60 (1984) (an identification by a robbery victim in a holding cell showup following an arrest without probable case must be suppressed); State v. Le, 103 Wash. App. 354, 360-67, 12 P.3d 653, 656-60 (2000) (an identification by a police officer who had witnessed a fleeing burglar and was called to view the defendant in a showup at the scene of the defendant’s warrantless arrest in his home – a dwelling entry that violated the rule of Payton v. New York – should have been suppressed, although the trial court’s failure to suppress it was harmless error because of other overwhelming evidence of guilt); 6 WAYNE R. LAFAVE, SEARCH AND SEIZURE § 11.4(g) (5th ed. & Supp.); but see United States v. Olivares-Rangel, 458 F.3d 1104, 1112-16 (10th Cir. 2006) (holding that the exclusion of physical evidence obtained by routine processing of an arrestee following an unconstitutional arrest – in this case, an arrest tainted by an investigative stop without reasonable suspicion – is required only if the arrest was made for the purpose of obtaining that evidence).

(f) Evidence derived from any of the foregoing sources. See, e.g., United States v. Bagley, 877 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2017); United States v. Nora, 765 F.3d 1049 (9th Cir. 2014). However, evidence obtained by the police following an unconstitutional search or seizure is not suppressible if the prosecution shows that (i) the police officers’ knowledge of the evidence and access to it derived from an “independent source” unconnected with the search or seizure, Segura v. United States, 468 U.S. 796 (1984); Murray v. United States, 487 U.S. 533 (1988), or (ii) the evidence “ultimately or inevitably would have been discovered by lawful means” in the course of events even if the search or seizure had not produced it, Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431, 444 (1984) (a Sixth Amendment decision placed on grounds equally applicable to the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule); or (iii) “the connection between unconstitutional police conduct and the evidence is remote or has been interrupted by some intervening circumstance, so that ‘the interest protected by the constitutional guarantee that has been violated would not be served by suppression of the evidence obtained’” (Utah v. Strieff, 136 S. Ct. 2056, 2061 (2016)). This third exception to the exclusionary rule goes by the name of “the attenuation doctrine” (id.). Applying it in the Strieff case, the Court held that the “doctrine applies when an officer makes an unconstitutional investigatory stop; learns during that stop that the suspect is subject to a valid arrest warrant; and proceeds to arrest the suspect and seize incriminating evidence during a search incident to that arrest” (id. at 2059). “The three factors articulated in Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 (1975), guide our analysis. First, we look to the ‘temporal proximity’ between the unconstitutional conduct and the discovery of evidence to determine how closely the discovery of evidence followed the unconstitutional search. . . . Second, we consider ‘the presence of intervening circumstances.’ . . . Third, and ‘particularly significant, we examine ‘the purpose and flagrancy of the official misconduct.’” Utah v. Strieff, 136 S. Ct. at 2062. The latter two considerations were determinative, the Court wrote, because (a) “the second factor, the presence of intervening circumstances, strongly favors the State”; “the warrant was valid, it predated . . . [the] investigation [which generated the Terry stop of Strieff], and it was entirely unconnected with the stop. And once . . . [the investigating officer] discovered the warrant, he had an obligation to arrest Strieff.” (Utah v. Strieff, 136 S. Ct. at 2062); and (b) the investigating officer “was at most negligent . . . [i]n stopping Strieff”: he made “errors in judgment” but “there is no indication that this unlawful stop was part of any systemic or recurrent police misconduct. To the contrary, all the evidence suggests that the stop was an isolated instance of negligence that occurred in connection with a bona fide investigation of a suspected drug house”: “[I]t is especially significant that there is no evidence that . . . [this] illegal stop reflected flagrantly unlawful police misconduct.” (Id. at 2063).

§ 23.38 PROSECUTORIAL BURDEN OF DISPROVING “TAINT” OF UNLAWFUL SEARCH AND SEIZURE

717
When unconstitutional activity by the police or other government agents has been shown that may have led to evidence proffered by the prosecution, the prosecutor has the burden of demonstrating that the evidence is untainted. See Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219, 224-26 (1968); Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 604 (1975); Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 218 (1979); Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 107, 110 (1980); Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. 687, 690 (1982); Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. 626, 633 (2003) (per curiam); United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962), aff’d after remand, 319 F.2d 661 (2d Cir. 1963); United States v. Serrano-Acevedo, 892 F.3d. 454, 459-60 (1st Cir. 2018); cf. Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 183 (1969) (dictum); and compare Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 286-87 (1977). See, e.g., United States v. Stokes, 733 F.3d 438, 446 (2d Cir. 2013) (the trial court erred in finding that the government had satisfied its burden of proving “by a preponderance of the evidence that the guns and ammunition would inevitably have been discovered”: the trial court “failed to account for all of the demonstrated historical facts in the record, and in doing so, failed adequately to consider . . . plausible contingencies that might not have resulted in the guns’ discovery”); State v. Banks-Harvey, 152 Ohio St. 3d 368, 375-76, 96 N.E.3d 262, 271-72 (2018) (“The state argues that the local police officer’s observation of an empty capsule on the vehicle’s floorboard provided probable cause to believe the vehicle contained contraband and, thus, to conduct a warrantless search of the vehicle under the automobile exception to the warrant requirement . . . . ¶ It was only after the trooper removed the appellant’s purse from the vehicle [in violation of the Fourth Amendment], began to search it, and stated that he had found narcotics in it that the local officer approached the trooper and told him that he was ‘pretty sure’ he had observed a capsule on the vehicle’s floorboard. . . . ¶ Even assuming that the local officer’s observation of the capsule afforded him probable cause to search the vehicle, the inevitable-discovery exception would not apply if the local officer based his decision to search the vehicle on knowledge of the contraband found in the unlawful search of the appellant’s purse. . . . ¶ [Thus,] the . . . [record] fail[s] to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence a reasonable probability that the local officer would inevitably have discovered the contraband in the appellant’s purse apart from the trooper’s removal and search of the purse in violation of the appellant’s Fourth Amendment rights.”); Rodriguez v. State, 187 So. 3d 841, 849 (Fla. 2015) (“The question before this Court is whether the inevitable discovery rule requires the prosecution to demonstrate that the police were in the process of obtaining a warrant prior to the misconduct or whether the prosecution need only establish that a warrant could have been obtained with the information available prior to the misconduct.”); “Because the exclusionary rule works to deter police misconduct by ensuring that the prosecution is not in a better position as a result of the misconduct, the rule cannot be expanded to allow application where there is only probable cause and no pursuit of a warrant. If the prosecution were allowed to benefit in this way, police misconduct would be encouraged instead of deterred, and the rationale behind the exclusionary rule would be eviscerated.”); Brown v. McClennen, 239 Ariz. 521, 524-525, 373 P.3d 538, 542-543 (2016) (“The [inevitable discovery] exception does not turn on whether the evidence would have been discovered had the deputy acted lawfully in the first place. . . . Rather, the exception applies if the evidence would have been lawfully discovered despite the unlawful behavior and independent of it.”); Gore v. United States, 145 A.3d 540, 548-49 (D.C. 2016) (“The inevitable discovery doctrine shields illegally obtained evidence from the exclusionary rule if the government can show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the evidence ‘ultimately or inevitably would have been discovered by lawful means.’ . . . ‘Would’ – not ‘could’ or ‘might’ – is the word the Supreme Court used in Nix v. Williams[, infra] and is, therefore, the ‘constitutional standard.’ . . . ¶ The requirements of the inevitable discovery doctrine were not met in this case. At the time the police officers illegally entered appellant’s room, and even when they seized Mr. Ward’s property from her bathroom, the ‘lawful process’ that supposedly would have ended in the inevitable discovery of that property there – the putative application for a search warrant for the room – had not begun. Indeed, it was never begun; we have only Officer Tobe’s statement that he ‘could’ have applied for a warrant in the event a hypothetical search of nearby dumpsters (which itself had not been commenced and was hardly certain to have been performed) was unproductive. Of course, whenever police officers disregard the warrant requirement, they ‘could’ have applied for a warrant instead. But in this case, there is no solid evidence that the officers would have done so.”); Jones v. United States, 168 A.3d 703, 722 (D.C. 2017) (“[T]he government is asking us to find inevitable discovery where the police had mutually exclusive options and, for whatever reason, chose the option that turned out to be unlawful. The inevitable-discovery doctrine does not apply in this type of situation. . . . (“[T]he argument that ‘if we hadn’t done it wrong, we would have done it right’ is far from compelling.””).

In Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431, 444 n.5 (1984), the Supreme Court implied that “the usual burden of proof” on this issue is “a preponderance of evidence.” It may, however, be greater in situations in which the illegality is peculiarly likely to have tainted the sort of evidence that the prosecution is offering or when there is peculiar “difficulty in determining” questions of cause and effect because these involve “speculative elements.” Id. Both considerations were mentioned in Nix as distinguishing United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 240 (1967), which held that the prosecutor’s burden of proof in showing that in-court identification testimony is not tainted by the witness’s exposure to the accused in an earlier, unconstitutional identification confrontation is “clear and convincing evidence.” See also Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220, 225-26 (1977) (dictum). And see Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 461-62 (1972), holding that when an individual has given compelled testimony under an immunity grant, the prosecution bears “the heavy burden of proving that all of the evidence it proposes to use was derived from legitimate independent sources.” See also Braswell v. United States, 487 U.S. 99, 117 (1988); United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27, 40 & n.22 (2000). Both Nix and Wade were Sixth Amendment right-to-counsel cases; Kastigar and Braswell and Hubbell were Fifth Amendment self-incrimination cases; the Supreme Court has not squarely addressed the prosecutor’s burden of proving its evidence untainted following a Fourth Amendment search-and-seizure violation. But there appears to be no reason to distinguish among kinds of constitutional violations when it comes to the standards for determining whether derivative evidence is “‘purged of the primary taint.’” Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356, 365 (1972). The Nix opinion derived its statement of the “usual burden of proof at suppression hearings” from Fourth and Fifth Amendment caselaw (see also Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 167-69 (1986); Wade’s companion case, Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 272-73 (1967), expressly adopted principles of taint that were first announced in the Fourth Amendment context (see also Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. at 226, 231);

State constitutional decisions may heighten the prosecution’s burden of dissipating taint. See, e.g., State v. Rodrigues, 128 Hawai‘i 200, 211-15, 286 P.3d 809, 820-24 (2012) (discussing and applying a state constitutional rule that follows Justice Brennan’s dissent in Nix v. Williams by requiring that the prosecution “satisfy a heightened burden of proof”” of “clear and convincing evidence” in order to rely on the inevitable discovery exception); and see generally § 7.09 supra.

§ 23.39 RELEVANCE OF THE “FLAGRANCY” OF THE POLICE CONDUCT IN ASCERTAINING “TAINT”

The Brown case itself involved the question of the admissibility of a confession following an illegal arrest (as did Dunaway, Rawlings, Taylor, and Kaupp). The Brown majority opinion leaves unclear whether the “flagrancy” principle is limited to that issue or is applicable to determinations of taint in other contexts. Arguably, “flagrancy” is particularly relevant in connection with the inquiry whether confessions – “(verbal acts, as contrasted with physical evidence),” 422 U.S. at 600 – are tainted by unconstitutional police treatment of a suspect because the degree of official disregard of a suspect’s rights is particularly likely to affect the suspect’s choice to confess. See Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 312 (1985). The Brown majority notes specifically that “[t]he manner in which Brown’s arrest was effected gives the appearance of having been calculated to cause surprise, fright, and confusion.” 422 U.S. at 605. If this is the rationale for considering “flagrancy” as a factor in the exclusionary calculus in confession cases, then “flagrancy” should also be considered in cases involving motions to suppress the tangible fruits of searches and seizures based on consent given after an unconstitutional arrest or stop, or in unconstitutional detention, or as a result of other unconstitutional police conduct that is potentially intimidating. And the courts do consistently consider the “flagrancy of . . . official misconduct” in consent-search cases. E.g., United States v. Martinez, 486 F.3d 855, 865 (5th Cir. 2007) (applying the flagrancy principle in determining to exclude firearms seized in a dwelling search based upon consent given following a stop made without reasonable suspicion); United States v. Robeles-Ortega, 348 F.3d 679, 684-85 (7th Cir. 2003) (applying the flagrancy principle in determining to exclude drugs seized in a dwelling search based upon consent given following a forcible, warrantless entry by five DEA agents with drawn guns); United States v. Jones, 234 F.3d 234, 243 (5th Cir. 2000) (applying the flagrancy principle in determining to exclude drugs seized in a vehicle search based upon consent given after a vehicle stop was unconstitutionally prolonged); State v. Munroe, 244 Wis. 2d 1, 13-14, 630 N.W.2d 223, 228-29 (Wis. App. 2001) (applying the flagrancy principle in determining to exclude drugs seized in a motel-room search based on consent given after an entry to request identification was unconstitutionally prolonged).

But the “flagrancy” principle appears to apply more broadly than in cases involving intimidating police conduct that may influence a suspect’s will to confess or consent. The Brown majority supports its “flagrancy” statement with a footnote citing lower court decisions that involved both confessional and nonconfessional evidence (Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. at 604 n.9); and it purports, at the outset of its opinion, to be explicating the principles announced in Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963), “to be applied where the issue is whether statements and other evidence obtained after an illegal arrest or search should be excluded” (422 U.S. at 597 (emphasis added)). A concurring opinion by Justice Powell explains the relevance of “flagrancy” by reference to a notion which has appeared in a few other Supreme Court decisions (see, e.g., United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531, 542 (1975); United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. 433, 454 n.28, 458-59 n.35 (1976)), that the exclusionary rule “is most likely to be effective” in cases of willful or gross police violations of the Constitution (422 U.S. at 611). If this is the rationale for the “flagrancy” principle – or any part of its rationale – then the principle should apply to all exclusionary-rule issues. “In view of the deterrent purposes of the exclusionary rule[,] consideration of official motives may play some part in determining whether application of the exclusionary rule is appropriate. . . .” Scott v. United States, 436 U.S. 128, 135-36 (1978) (dictum). See also id. at 139 n.13; United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 911 (1984). Strong support for the proposition that “flagrancy” is relevant in this broader manner to the adjudication of issues bearing on the excludability of derivative evidence is provided by the Supreme Court’s opinion in Utah v. Strieff, 136 S. Ct. 2056 (2016), summarized in § 23.37 subdivision (f) supra. As noted there, Strieff repeatedly refers to the “‘flagrancy of the official misconduct” as “‘particularly’ significant” (id. at 2062) and “‘especially significant’” (id. at 2063) and explains that its consideration “reflects . . . [the exclusionary rule’s core deterrent] rationale by favoring exclusion only when the police misconduct is most in need of deterrence – that is, when it is purposeful or flagrant” (id.). For additional cases that take account of the flagrancy of unconstitutional police conduct in applying the exclusionary rule to evidence other than confessions and the products of consent searches, see, e.g., People v. Sampson, 86 Ill. App. 3d 687, 694, 408 N.E.2d 3, 9, 41 Ill. Dec. 657, 663 (1980) (requiring a hearing on a motion to suppress a lineup identification following an arrest without probable cause); Ferguson v. State, 301 Md. 542, 549-53, 483 A.2d 1255, 1258-60 (1984) (excluding a show-up identification following an arrest without probable cause); Hill v. State, 692 S.W.2d 716, 723 (Tex. Crim. App. 1985) (excluding a lineup identification following an arrest without probable cause or any legal authorization, made for the purpose of exhibiting the defendant in the lineup); State v. Le, 103 Wash. App. 354, 360-62, 12 P.3d 653, 657-58 (2000) (holding that a pretrial identification by a police officer who had witnessed a fleeing burglar and was called to view the defendant in a show-up at the scene of the defendant’s warrantless home arrest in violation of the rule of Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), should have been suppressed, although its admission was harmless because of other overwhelming evidence of guilt); and cf. United States v. Olivares-Rangel, 458 F.3d 1104, 1112-16 (10th Cir. 2006) (holding that the exclusion of physical evidence obtained by routine processing of an arrestee following an unconstitutional arrest is required only if the arrest was made for the purpose of obtaining that evidence). Compare Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 259-61, 263 (2007) (rejecting a lower court approach that would have permitted a police claim of lawful intent to uphold a seizure – by treating an officer’s assertion that s/he had no intent to seize an individual as a basis for finding that no such seizure took place – and instead announcing a rule that is designed to avert the “powerful incentive” that police have to engage in certain “kind[s] of” conduct the Court has previously found to be unlawful). But cf. Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996) (rejecting the argument that an objectively valid traffic stop is unconstitutional when it is used as a pretext for an impermissible investigatory search, and stating more generally that, in making the initial determination whether police action is constitutional, the Supreme Court has “never held . . . that an officer’s motive invalidates objectively justifiable behavior under the Fourth Amendment” (id. at 812); thus, that “[s]ubjective intentions play no role in ordinary, probable-cause Fourth Amendment analysis” (id. at 813)); Arkansas v. Sullivan, 532 U.S. 769 (2001) (per curiam) (same); Devenpeck v. Alford, 543 U.S. 146, 153 (2004) (“Our cases make clear that an arresting officer’s state of mind (except for the facts that he knows) is irrelevant to the existence of probable cause.”).

See § 22.05(a), third paragraph supra for a tactical caveat regarding defense recourse to “flagrancy” analysis.

§ 23.40 UNAVAILABILITY OF “TAINTED” EVIDENCE AS JUSTIFICATION FOR ANY SUBSEQUENT POLICE ACTION

Illegally obtained evidence or information that may not be used in court also may not be used to justify any subsequent police action. The fruits of an illegal search, for example, may not be used to supply the probable cause required for a later arrest, Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10 (1948), or search, see United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962), aff’d after remand, 319 F.2d 661 (2d Cir. 1963); cf. New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 344 (1985) (dictum), or for the issuance of a warrant, United States v. Giordano, 416 U.S. 505, 529-34 (1974); Steagald v. United States, 451 U.S. 204 (1981) (by implication); Hair v. United States, 289 F.2d 894 (D.C. Cir. 1961). When they are so used, the products of the second police action are tainted by the illegality of the first, see Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 177 (1969) (dictum); United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705, 719 (1984) (dictum), unless the prosecution shows “sufficient untainted evidence” (that is, information not derived in any way from the first action) to justify the later one (id.). This evidence must be “genuinely independent of [the] . . . earlier, tainted [police action],” a condition that cannot be met if either (1) the police “decision to seek [a] . . . warrant [or conduct the second search] was prompted by what they had seen during the initial entry,” or (2) “information obtained during that entry was presented to the Magistrate and affected his decision to issue the warrant [or is necessary to justify the second search without a warrant, if it was so made].” Murray v. United States, 487 U.S. 533, 542 (1988). Cf. United States v. Hubbell, 530 U.S. 27 (2000).
Chapter 24

Motions To Suppress Confessions, Admissions, and Other Statements of the Respondent

Part A. Introduction

§ 24.01 STRATEGIC REASONS FOR SEEKING SUPPRESSION OF THE RESPONDENT’S STATEMENTS, WHETHER INCUSLATORY OR EXCULPATORY

The doctrines described in this chapter supply grounds for suppressing not only confessions but any statement by the respondent – “whether inculpatory or exculpatory – that the prosecution may seek to introduce at trial.” Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 301 n.5 (1980) (emphasis in original); see also Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 476-77 (1966).

Ordinarily, counsel will want to suppress all statements made by the respondent. In the case of a confession or a damaging admission, this is self-evident; the confession or admission is frequently the most damning thing the prosecutor has. In cases involving ostensibly exculpatory statements, a suppression motion is also the prudent course, since the facts that emerge at trial may render the statement more damaging than counsel can predict. For example, a statement asserting self-defense may prove to be detrimental in a case in which the state has no other persuasive proof that the respondent was the person who committed the assault. Also, counsel’s pursuit of a suppression motion may serve the ancillary goals of discovery and creation of transcript material for use in impeaching prosecution witnesses at trial. See §§ 22.02, 22.04(b), 22.04(c) supra.

§ 24.02 APPLICABILITY OF ADULT COURT SUPPRESSION DOCTRINES TO JUVENILE COURT PROCEEDINGS

The discussion in this chapter of the constitutional and statutory grounds for suppressing statements interweaves adult and juvenile court caselaw. Although the Supreme Court has not expressly held the Miranda doctrine applicable to juvenile delinquency prosecutions, Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707, 717 n.4 (1979), and has not explicitly addressed the “procedures or constitutional rights” governing suppression of statements extracted during the “pre-judicial stages of the juvenile process” (In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 13 (1967); compare Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596 (1948) (applying traditional due process requirements to determine the validity of a statement by a juvenile prosecuted in adult court)), the Court has recognized the logic of extending the safeguards provided in adult court to juvenile confessional evidence (see In re Gault, 387 U.S. at 49-52; see also id. at 56 & n.97) and has approvingly cited lower court caselaw applying adult court doctrines of statement suppression in juvenile court proceedings (see id. at 52-55). The lower courts uniformly hold these doctrines applicable to juvenile proceedings. See, e.g., United States v. Fowler, 476 F.2d 1091, 1092 (7th Cir. 1973); In re Creek, 243 A.2d 49 (D.C. 1968); In the Interest of Edwards, 227 Kan. 723, 725, 608 P.2d 1006, 1008-

Part B. Involuntary Statements

§ 24.03 GENERAL STANDARD FOR ASSESSING VOLUNTARINESS

As noted in § 22.03(d) subdivision (ii) supra, whenever the defense claims that a respondent’s statement was “involuntary” and is therefore inadmissible in evidence as a matter of Due Process, the prosecution bears the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence (and, in some jurisdictions, by proof beyond a reasonable doubt) that the statement was voluntarily made.

“This Court has long held that certain interrogation techniques either in isolation or as applied to the unique characteristics of a particular suspect, are so offensive to a civilized system of justice that they must be condemned under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment . . . . Although these decisions framed the legal inquiry in a variety of different ways, usually through the ‘convenient shorthand’ of asking whether the confession was ‘involuntary,’ . . . the Court’s analysis has consistently been animated by the view that ‘ours is an accusatorial and not an inquisitorial system,’ . . . and that, accordingly, tactics for eliciting inculpatory statements must fall within the broad constitutional boundaries imposed by the Fourteenth Amendment’s guarantee of fundamental fairness.” (Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. 104, 109-10 (1985).)
Indeed, some coercive behavior on the part of government agents is an indispensable ingredient of an involuntary-statement claim: In Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986), the Court rejected a defendant’s contention that his confession was involuntary solely because his mental illness drove him to confess. But this does not mean that a defendant’s or respondent’s mental, emotional, or physical vulnerability is immaterial. To the contrary, Connelly reaffirms the clear holding of Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199 (1960), that mental illness is “relevant to an individual’s susceptibility to police coercion” (479 U.S. at 165); and in Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652 (2004), the Court definitively declared that “whether ‘the defendant’s will was overborne,’ . . . [is] a question that logically can depend on ‘the characteristics of the accused’” (id. at 667-68), so “we do consider a suspect’s age and experience” – together with other “characteristics of the accused . . . [including] the suspect’s . . . education, and intelligence, . . . as well as a suspect’s prior experience with law enforcement” as bearing on “the voluntariness of a statement” (id.). See also Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596, 599 (1948), discussed in § 24.05(a) infra. Personal qualities and conditions relevant to the assessment of a suspect’s susceptibility to coercion include intellectual disability (Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. at 441-44; Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. at 620-21, 624-25, 635), educational privation (Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560 (1958); Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191 (1957)), physical pain and drug ingestion (Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 (1963); Beecher v. Alabama, 408 U.S. 234 (1972)), and any “unique characteristics of a particular suspect” (Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. at 109) that impair the suspect’s “powers of resistance to overbearing police tactics” (Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. at 442). In addition, the propriety or impropriety of police conduct is itself measured, to a large extent, by its tendency to weaken the suspect’s will. See, e.g., Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959); Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528 (1963); cf. Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. at 423 (“[a]lthough highly inappropriate, even deliberate deception of an attorney [that keeps the attorney from coming to the police station to advise a suspect who is undergoing interrogation] could not possibly affect a suspect’s decision to waive his Miranda rights unless he were at least aware of the incident”). State constitutional protections may exclude statements found to be involuntary for reasons wholly apart from any inappropriate police behavior. See State v. Rees, 748 A.2d 976, 977, 978-79 (Me. 2000) (construing the state constitution to reject Colorado v. Connelly’s holding that “coercive police activity is a necessary predicate to the finding that a confession is not “voluntary” within the meaning of the Due Process Clause’’; the state supreme court affirms a trial court’s finding of involuntariness which was based entirely on the defendant’s “dementia,” and which “stressed that this ruling makes no finding of improper or incorrect conduct upon the part of the investigating officers’’). And see § 17.11 supra.

Thus the caselaw provides a basis for presenting involuntary-statement claims from any one or more of three perspectives:

(a) with an emphasis upon the behavior of the police as constituting “coercive government misconduct,” Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 163, that is “revolting to the sense of justice,” id., quoting Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278, 286 (1936); see, e.g., Brooks v. Florida, 389 U.S. at 414-15; cf. Crowe v. County of San Diego, 608 F.3d 406, 432 (9th Cir. 2010) (“One need only read the transcripts of the boys’ interrogations, or watch the videotapes, to understand how thoroughly the defendants’ conduct in this case “shocks the conscience.” Michael and Aaron – 14 and 15 years old, respectively – were isolated and subjected to hours and hours of interrogation during which they were cajoled, threatened, lied to, and relentlessly pressured by teams of police officers. ‘Psychological torture’ is not an inapt description. In Cooper v. Dupnik, 963 F.2d 1220, 1223 (9th Cir. 1992), we held that police violated an adult suspect’s substantive due process rights when they ‘ignored Cooper’s repeated requests to speak with an attorney, deliberately infringed on his Constitutional right to remain silent, and relentlessly interrogated him in an attempt to extract a confession.’ . . . The interrogations of Michael and Aaron are no less shocking. Indeed, they are more so given that the boys’ interrogations were significantly longer than Cooper’s, the boys were minors, and Michael was in shock over his sister’s brutal murder. The interrogations violated Michael’s and Aaron’s Fourteenth Amendment rights to substantive due process.”

(b) with an emphasis upon the effects of the police behavior on the accused’s psychological state, considering the accused’s individual weaknesses and vulnerabilities, see, e.g., Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. at 620-21, 624-25, 635; Davis v. North Carolina, 384 U.S. 737 (1966); Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564, 573-74 (1987) (dictum), as bearing on the question whether the confession was “‘the product of a rational intellect and a free will,’” Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 398 (1978); see also Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. at 308 (“[a]ny questioning by police officers which in fact produces a confession which is not the product of a free intellect renders that confession inadmissible”; emphasis in original); or

(c) with an emphasis upon the tendency of the police behavior to overbear the will of someone in the accused’s position and condition, see, e.g., Sims v. Georgia, 389 U.S. 404 (1967); Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. at 116 (“the admissibility of a confession turns as much on whether the techniques for extracting the statements, as applied to this suspect, are compatible with a system that presumes innocence and assures that a conviction will not be secured by inquisitorial means as on whether the defendant’s will was in fact overborne”; emphasis in original).

Defense counsel should select the perspective or perspectives that will make the most of the facts of the particular case.

It should be noted that although the lower courts occasionally confuse or interweave analyses of involuntariness and Miranda claims, the two claims are separate and distinct. See, e.g., Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 432-35 (2000); Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. at 109-10; Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298, 303-04 (1985); Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 163-71; cf. United States v. Patane, 542 U.S. 630, 636-41 (2004) (plurality opinion). The doctrines may overlap in their application to the facts of a particular case: for example, the facts showing the involuntariness of the statement will usually also show the involuntariness of the respondent’s waiver of Miranda rights. Cf. Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 169-70. But counsel should be precise in identifying the constitutional basis of the claim, both because it may significantly affect the appropriate analysis (see, e.g., Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. at 667 (“the objective Miranda custody inquiry could reasonably be viewed as different from doctrinal tests that depend on the actual mindset of a particular suspect”)) and because it may affect the scope of relief for any constitutional violation that is found. For example, a statement suppressed on Miranda grounds cannot be used in the prosecution’s case in chief but can be used to impeach the respondent if s/he testifies at trial, whereas a statement suppressed because of a finding of involuntariness under the Due Process Clause cannot be used by the prosecution for any purpose. See § 24.23 infra. And the scope of exclusion of derivative evidence is broader in the case of involuntary statements than in the case of statements obtained in violation of Miranda. See § 24.20 infra.

§ 24.04 POLICE COERCION RENDERING A STATEMENT INVOLUNTARY

As explained in § 24.03 * supra*, “coercive police activity is a necessary predicate to the finding that a confession is not ‘voluntary’ within the meaning of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.” Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 167 (1986). “While each confession case has turned on its own set of factors justifying the conclusion that police conduct was oppressive, all have contained a substantial element of coercive police conduct.” Id. at 163-64. The concept of “coercive police activity” includes physical force or the threat of force (see § 24.04(a) infra), excessively long detention or intimidating circumstances of detention (see § 24.04(b) infra), promises of leniency or threats of adverse governmental action (see § 24.04(c) infra), and tricks or artifices (see § 24.04(d) infra).

§ 24.04(a) Physical Force or Threat of Force

As the Supreme Court observed in Sims v. Georgia, 389 U.S. 404, 407 (1967) (per curiam): “It needs no extended citation of cases to show that a confession produced by violence or threats of violence is involuntary and cannot constitutionally be used against the person giving it.” See, e.g., Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279, 287-88 (1991) (“Fulminante’s will was overborne in such a way as to render his confession the product of coercion” as a result of a fellow inmate, who was a government agent, offering to protect him from other inmates if he confessed: “Our cases have made clear that a finding of coercion need not depend upon actual violence by a government agent; a credible threat is sufficient.”); Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560 (1958) (a confession was rendered involuntary by the totality of police conduct “and particularly the culminating threat” (id. at 567) that the Chief of Police was preparing to admit a lynch mob into the jail); State v. Hilliard, 318 S.E.2d 35, 36 (W. Va. 1983) (a confession was rendered involuntary when a police officer told the accused he would “knock [his] . . . head off” if he didn’t confess).
Serious physical abuse or the threat of it will ordinarily be held to render subsequent statements involuntary even when it is not closely related in time or circumstances to police interrogation or the making of the statements. See, e.g., Sims v. Georgia, 389 U.S. at 405-07 (on the facts of the case, set forth at greater length in Sims v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 538 (1967), a confession was rendered involuntary because the defendant was physically abused, even though the abuse took place several hours prior to, and in a different location from, the confession); Beecher v. Alabama, 389 U.S. 35 (1967) (per curiam), as construed in Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 163 n.1 (the “crucial element of police overreaching” was holding a gun to the head of the wounded defendant at the time of his arrest, five days prior to the interrogation and confession).

§ 24.04(b) Intimidating or Overbearing Circumstances of Interrogation or Detention

The coerciveness of interrogation increases with the length of the interrogation (see, e.g., Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596 (1948) (15-year-old questioned from midnight to 5 a.m.); Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959) (adult interrogated for eight hours); Doody v. Ryan, 649 F.3d 986, 990, 1023 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (“sleep-deprived” 17-year-old interrogated by a “tag team of detectives” in “relentless, nearly thirteen-hour interrogation”); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d 145, 162-63, 699 N.W.2d 110, 118-19 (2005) (14-year-old questioned for five-and-a-half hours)), and with the length of time that the suspect is held incommunicado by the police (see, e.g., Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. at 600 (15-year-old held incommunicado and denied access to his mother for five days); Gallegos v. Colorado, 370 U.S. 49 (1962) (14-year-old held incommunicado for five days); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d at 162-63, 699 N.W.2d at 118-19 (“In this case, [14-year-old] Jerrell was handcuffed to a wall and left alone for approximately two hours. He was then interrogated for five-and-a-half more hours before finally signing a written confession . . . . The duration of Jerrell’s custody and interrogation was longer than the five hours at issue in Haley. Indeed, it was significantly longer than most interrogations. Under these circumstances, it is easy to see how Jerrell would be left wondering ‘if and when the inquisition would ever cease.’” (footnote omitted)). See also Crowe v. County of San Diego, 608 F.3d 406, 432 (9th Cir. 2010) (holding, in a civil rights action, that the police interrogations of two juvenile suspects violated their “Fourteenth Amendment rights to substantive due process” because the 14-year-old and 15-year-old youths “were isolated and subjected to hours and hours of interrogation during which they were cajoled, threatened, lied to, and relentlessly pressured by teams of police officers”.

Prolonged detention under oppressive or debilitating conditions can render a confession involuntary even in the absence of extensive interrogation. See Brooks v. Florida, 389 U.S. 413, 414-15 (1967) (per curiam) (“Putting to one side quibbles over the dimensions of the windowless sweatbox into which Brooks was thrown naked with two other men, we cannot accept his statement as the voluntary expression of an uncoerced will. For two weeks this man’s home was a barren cage fitted only with a hole in one corner into which he and his cell mates could defecate. For two weeks he subsisted on a daily fare of 12 ounces of thin soup and eight ounces of water. For two full weeks he saw not one friendly face from outside the prison, but was completely under the control and domination of his jailers. These stark facts belie any contention that the confession extracted from him within minutes after he was brought from the cell was not tainted by the 14 days he spent in such an oppressive hole.

The coerciveness of these tactics also increases with the youth of the respondent. Thus the court in State in the Interest of S.H., 61 N.J. 108, 293 A.2d 181 (1972), found a 10-year-old’s confession involuntary because he was “isolated in a room with a detective for a period of 90 minutes” of interrogation (id. at 114, 293 A.2d at 184) and denied contact with his father. See also, e.g., A.M. v. Butler, 360 F.3d 787, 797, 800-01 (7th Cir. 2004) (statement must be deemed involuntary because accused was 11 years old, “had no prior experience with the criminal justice system,” and “was questioned for almost 2 hours in a closed interrogation room with no parent, guardian, lawyer, or anyone at his side”). There is an extensive jurisprudence on the subject of police denying juveniles access to their parents or guardians, which is described in § 24.14 infra. An excessive period of detention at the police station may also run afoul of state statutory requirements for post-arrest treatment of juveniles, which are described in § 24.15 infra.

Even if the period of detention is not excessively long, unusually harsh conditions of confinement preceding the confession, such as deprivations of food, sleep, or medication, can render the confession involuntary. See, e.g., Greenwald v. Wisconsin, 390 U.S. 519 (1968) (denial of food, sleep, and medication for high blood pressure); Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433 (1961) (inadequate food and medical attention); Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560 (1958) (three days with little food); State v. Garcia, 301 P.3d 658, 666-67, 668 (Kan. 2013) (confession was rendered involuntary by “coercive tactics” of “withholding requested relief for an obviously painful untreated gunshot wound over the course of a several-hours-long interrogation” (“[e]ven if Garcia did not confess solely to obtain medical treatment”) and by the officer’s assurance to the suspect that “a murder charge and accompanying life sentence could be avoided by admitting to the robbery and testifying against” another (even though “[i]t appears that Garcia refused to take the bait because he thought it was a trick”).

§ 24.04(c) Promises of Leniency or Threats of Adverse Governmental Action

A confession is involuntary if “obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight, [or] by the exertion of any improper influence.” Hutto v. Ross, 429 U.S. 28, 30 (1976) (per curiam), quoting Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 542-43 (1897). See, e.g., Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528, 534 (1963) (confession held involuntary largely because police told the defendant “that state financial aid for her infant children would be cut off, and her children taken from her, if she did not ‘cooperate’”); Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 514 (1963) (a confession was rendered involuntary in part because of “the express threat of continued incommunicado detention and . . . the promise of communication with and access to family”); Sharp v. Rohling, 793 F.3d 1216, 1219 (10th Cir. 2015) (a confession was rendered involuntary by the interrogating officer’s promise of “leniency – no jail”); United States v. Lopez, 437 F.3d 1059, 1066 (10th Cir. 2006) (“the federal agents’ promising Lopez that he would spend 6 rather than 60 years in prison if he admitted to killing Box by mistake and the Agents’ misrepresenting the strength of the evidence they had against Lopez, resulted in Lopez’s first confession being coerced and, thus, involuntary”; “although Lopez’s second confession came after a night’s sleep and a meal, and almost twelve hours elapsed between confessions, the coercion producing the first confession had not been dissipated.”); United States ex rel. Everett v. Murphy, 329 F.2d 68 (2d Cir. 1964) (a confession was rendered involuntary when police falsely promised assistance in arranging less serious charges than they knew would be brought); Rincher v. State, 632 So. 2d 37, 40 (Ala. Crim. App. 1993) (17-year-old’s stationhouse statement was “coerced” because a police captain “promised . . . [him] that he could go home if he made a statement”); People v. Perez, 243 Cal. App. 4th 863, 866-67, 196 Cal. Rptr. 3d 871, 875 (2016) (“Perez’s statements were clearly motivated by a promise of leniency, rendering the statements involuntary”: “a police sergeant told Perez that if he ‘[told] the truth and was ‘honest,’ then, ‘we are not gonna charge you with anything’”); People v. Ramadon, 314 P.3d 836, 838, 844-45 (Colo. 2013) (the defendant’s statements were rendered involuntary by the interrogating officer’s telling him “that, if he did not tell the truth, he would likely be deported to Iraq,” and “insinuat[ing] that Ramadon would not be deported if he admitted to committing the sexual assault”); State v. Howard, 825 N.W.2d 32, 34, 41 (Iowa 2012) (an interrogating detective “crossed the line into an improper promise of leniency” and thereby rendered the confession inadmissible by repeatedly referring to “getting help” for the suspect (who had been arrested for sexually abusing a minor) and overtly suggesting that “if Howard admitted to sexually abusing A.E. he merely would be sent to a treatment facility similar to that used to treat drug and alcohol addiction in lieu of further punishment”); State v. Polk, 812 N.W.2d 670, 676 (Iowa 2012) (an interrogating officer “crossed the line” and rendered the resulting confession involuntary by “combining statements that county attorneys ‘are much more likely to work with an individual that is cooperating’ with suggestions . . . [that the defendant] would not see his kids ‘for a long time’ unless he confessed”); In the Interest of J.D.F., 553 N.W.2d 585, 589 (Iowa 1996) (“J.D.F.’s inculpatory admission was induced by the police promising that they would take him home rather than to the juvenile intake center”); State v. Brown, 286 Kan. 170, 182 P.3d 1205 (2008) (a child welfare agency worker unconstitutionally coerced a statement by pressuring the defendant to admit culpability for his child’s injury or else risk losing custody of his children); Dye v. Commonwealth, 411 S.W.3d 227, 232-34 (Ky. 2013) (police coerced a confession by falsely telling the 17-year-old defendant that the only way to avoid the death penalty was to confess, even though the police “knew, or should have known, that . . . [he] was not death-eligible,” and by telling the defendant that “a confession is the only way he will avoid daily prison assault”); State v. Wiley, 61 A.3d 750, 760 (Me. 2013) (an interrogating officer’s “concrete representation of a short jail sentence followed by probation in exchange for Wiley’s cooperation” was a “primary motivating force for the ensuing confession” and rendered it involuntary); State v. Smith, 203 Neb. 64, 66, 277 N.W.2d 441, 443 (1979) (a confession was rendered involuntary when police promised to “attempt to have the matter transferred to juvenile court” if defendant cooperated).

§ 24.04(d) Tricks or Artifices

Although the Supreme Court has never ruled a confession involuntary solely because it was induced by tricks or artifices, the Court has cited trickery as one of the factors considered when holding a confession involuntary in the light of “the totality of the situation” (*Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 323 (1959) (a police officer who was a close childhood friend of the defendant’s misleadingly told the defendant that he, the officer, would get in trouble with the police force if the defendant failed to confess). See also Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564, 576 n.8 (1987) (dictum) (citing Spano, supra, and Lynumn v. Illinois, supra).

Lower courts have similarly treated police artifice as a factor in the “totality of the circumstances” leading to a finding of involuntariness. See, e.g., Dye v. Commonwealth, 411 S.W.3d 227, 232-34 (Ky. 2013), summarized in § 24.04(c) supra; United States v. Lall, 607 F.3d 1277, 1287 (11th Cir. 2010) (“Gaudio explicitly assured Lall that anything he said would not be used to prosecute him. . . . Gaudio’s promise was deceptive. . . . Gaudio told him he would not be charged for any statements or evidence collected on the night of the robbery. . . . It is inconceivable that Lall, an un counsel ed twenty-year-old, understood at the time that a promise by Gaudio that he was not going to pursue any charges did not preclude the use of the confession in a federal prosecution. Indeed, it is utterly unreasonable to expect any un counsel ed layperson, especially someone in Lall’s position, to so parse Gaudio’s words. On the contrary, the only plausible interpretation of Gaudio’s representations, semantic technicalities aside, was that the information Lall provided would not be used against him by Gaudio or anyone else. Under these circumstances, Gaudio’s statements were sufficient to render Lall’s confession involuntary and to undermine completely the prophylactic effect of the Miranda warnings Gaudio previously administered.”); United States v. Lopez, 437 F.3d 1059, 1065 (10th Cir. 2006) (“in this case, the agents’ misrepresentation of the evidence against Lopez, together with Agent Hopper’s promise of leniency to Lopez if he confessed to killing Box by mistake, are sufficient circumstances that would overbear Lopez’s will and make his confession involuntary”); United States v. Morales, 233 F. Supp. 160 (D. Mont. 1964) (a juvenile’s statement was rendered involuntary partly because he was falsely told that his accomplices had signed statements implicating him); Gray v. Commonwealth, 480 S.W.3d 253, 260-61 (Ky. 2016) (the police “overbore Gray’s free will” by showing him “falsified documents purporting to represent the official results of a state-policelab’s DNA examination” and making false statements about other evidence inculpating him); In re Elias V., 237 Cal. App. 4th 568, 571, 579, 583, 588, 188 Cal. Rptr. 3d 202, 204, 211, 214, 218 (2015) (a 13-year-old’s confession was rendered involuntary because his will was “‘overborne’” by the police officers’ use of “the type of coercive interrogation techniques condemned in Miranda,” including the so-called “‘Reid Technique,’” which uses “a ‘cluster of tactics’ [termed “‘maximization/ minimization’”] designed to convey . . . ‘the interrogator’s rock-solid belief that the suspect is guilty and that all denials will fail’ [and] ‘to provide the suspect with moral justification and face saving excuses for having committed the crime in question,’” and also including police claims of fictitious evidence implicating the suspect, notwithstanding that even “the most recent edition of the Reid manual on interrogations notes that . . . ‘this technique should be avoided when interrogating a youthful suspect with low social maturity’ because such suspects ‘may not have the fortitude or confidence to challenge such evidence and depending on the nature of the crime, may become confused as to their own possible involvement if the police tell them evidence clearly indicates they committed the crime.’”’); State v. Swindler, 296 Kan. 670, 680-81, 294 P.3d 308, 315-16 (2013) (a statement was rendered involuntary because the police obtained it by using a “bait and switch” tactic of assuring the defendant that “he was free to terminate the interrogation and leave at any time” but then breaking these “rules of engagement . . . as soon as they thought Swindler might slip away without telling them what they wanted to hear”); People v. Thomas, 22 N.Y.3d 629, 642-43, 8 N.E.3d 308, 314-15, 985 N.Y.S.2d 193, 199-200 (2014) (police officers’ “highly coercive deceptions” – threatening the defendant that if he “continued to deny responsibility for his child’s injury, his wife would be arrested and removed from his ailing child's bedside,” and falsely asserting that “his disclosure of the circumstances under which he injured his child was essential to assist the doctors attempting to save the child’s life” – “were of a kind sufficiently potent to nullify individual judgment in any ordinarily resolute person and were manifestly lethal to self-determination when deployed against defendant, an unsophisticated individual without experience in the criminal justice system”); Young v. State, 670 P.2d 591, 594-95 (Okla. Crim. App. 1983) (statement found involuntary partly because of polygraph examiner’s “gross misstatement of the law” that defendant would have to convince judge and jury that he was “perfectly innocent”); State v. Caffrey, 332 N.W.2d 269, 272-73 (S.D. 1983) (juvenile’s statement found involuntary partly because of the “interrogating officers[’] deliberately mislead[ing] [him] . . . into thinking that he would be compelled to submit to a lie detector test”); United States v. Anderson, 929 F.2d 96 (2d Cir. 1991) (a DEA agent gave defendant Anderson Miranda warnings and “then proceeded to tell Anderson that if he asked for an attorney, no federal agents would be able to speak to him further; the agent added ‘this [is] the time to talk to us, because once you tell us you want an attorney we’re not able to talk to you and as far as I [am] concerned, we probably would not go to the U.S. Attorney or anyone else to tell them how much [you] cooperated with us.’ The ‘if you want a lawyer you can’t cooperate’ language was repeated three times.” (id. at 97); “[T]hese statements were false and/or misleading. It is commonplace for defendants who have acquired counsel to meet with federal law enforcement officials and agree to cooperate with the government.” (id. at 100). “Under the totality of the circumstances, Agent Valentine’s statements contributed to the already coercive atmosphere inherent in custodial interrogation and rendered Anderson’s . . . confession involuntary as a matter of law.” Id. at 102.); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d 145, 163-64, 699 N.W.2d 110, 119 (2005) (“pressures brought to bear on the [14-year-old] defendant” included police officers’ use of “psychological techniques” during interrogation: “Not only did the detectives refuse to believe Jerrell’s repeated denials of guilt, but they also joined in urging him to tell a different ‘truth,’ sometimes using a ‘strong voice’ that ‘frightened’ him. Admittedly, it does not appear from the record that Jerrell was suffering from any significant emotional or psychological condition during the interrogation. Nevertheless, we remain concerned that such a technique applied to a juvenile like Jerrell over a prolonged period of time could result in an involuntary confession.”). See generally Christopher Slobogin, Manipulation of Suspects and Unrecorded Questioning: After 50 Years of Miranda Jurisprudence, Still Two (or Maybe Three) Burning Issues, 97 B.U. L. REV. (forthcoming, 2017), available at https://ssrn.com/abstract=2914588.

Beyond their bearing on the issue of voluntariness, deceptive interrogation practices may affect the admissibility and weight of incriminating statements under other evidentiary principles. When interrogating officers ply a suspect with misleading information or use psychological ploys that create a significant risk of eliciting false confessions, counsel should urge the exclusion of any inculpatory responses as unreliable, under the court’s authority to refuse to admit evidence which is substantially more prejudicial than probative. See § 30.03 infra. In Aleman v. Village of Hanover Park, 662 F.3d 897, 906-07 (7th Cir. 2011), Circuit Judge Posner wrote for the court that “[t]he question of coercion is separate from that of reliability” and that “a trick that is as likely to induce a false as a true confession renders a confession inadmissible because of its unreliability even if its voluntariness is conceded. . . . If a question has only two answers – A and B – and you tell the respondent [untruthfully] that the answer is not A, and he has no basis for doubting you, then he is compelled by logic to ‘confess’ that the answer is B. . . . A confession so induced is worthless as evidence, and as a premise for an arrest.” (Judge Posner’s concluding phrase implies that if the respondent’s inculpatory statements are indispensable to the probable cause required for a subsequent arrest or search, the arrest or search is unconstitutional and any evidence which they produce is excludable on that account. See, e.g., §§ 23.07, 23.17, 23.24, 23.26, 23.37, 23.40 supra; § 24.17 infra. And even if the court refuses to entirely exclude a deception-induced inculpatory statement, respondent’s counsel is free to argue to the trier of fact at trial that the deceptive interrogation procedure renders the statement incredible (see Brian L. Cutler & Richard A. Leo, Analyzing Videotaped Interrogations and Confessions, 40-DEC THE CHAMPION 40 (December 2016); Brian L. Cutler & Richard A. Leo, False Confessions in the 21st Century, 40-MAY THE CHAMPION 46 (May 2016); James L. Trainum, How the Police Generate False Confessions: An Inside Look at the Interrogation Room (2016)) and also casts doubt upon “the reliability of the investigation” as a whole by “‘discrediting . . . the police methods employed in assembling the case,’” cf. Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 446 (1995).

Under some circumstances there may be a constitutionally significant distinction between “affirmative misrepresentations” by the police and their misleading of a suspect through “mere silence.” Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. at 576 & n.8. In Spring, the Supreme Court reversed the finding of two state appellate courts that a suspect’s waiver of the privilege against self-incrimination was invalid and that his incriminating statements were improperly obtained when the interrogating officers who gave him his Miranda warnings (see § 24.07 infra) failed to inform him of the specific crimes about which he would be questioned and when the context of the interrogation did not make these apparent. The Court rejected this finding on the broad ground that a suspect’s knowledge of the topic of an interrogation is not a necessary precondition for a valid waiver of the Fifth Amendment privilege and that interrogating officers are therefore not obliged to inform suspects on this subject. However, in dealing with Spring’s argument that his interrogators had practiced a form of trickery by failing to tell him what crimes they were investigating, the Court emphasized both that “the Colorado courts made no finding of official trickery,” 479 U.S. at 575, and that “mere silence by law enforcement officials as to the subject matter of an interrogation” (id. at 576) is distinguishable from the “affirmative misrepresentations by the police [that were found] sufficient to invalidate a suspect’s waiver of the Fifth Amendment privilege” in Spano v. New York [360 U.S. 315 (1959)] . . . and Lynumn v. Illinois [372 U.S. 528, 534 (1963)] . . .” (479 U.S. at 576 n.8). “In this case, we are not confronted with an affirmative misrepresentation by law enforcement officials as to the scope of the interrogation and do not reach the question whether a waiver of Miranda rights would be

§ 24.05 CHARACTERISTICS OF THE RESPONDENT THAT ARE RELEVANT TO THE ASSESSMENT OF VOLUNTARINESS

The Supreme Court has long recognized that personal characteristics of a suspect that render him or her particularly vulnerable to coercion – such as youth, mental illness, intellectual disability, limited intellect, limited education, intoxication, and the effects of drugs – are significant factors in the “totality of the circumstances” that determine the voluntariness of a statement. See, e.g., Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596 (1948) (age of 15); Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568 (1961) (I.Q. of 64, illiteracy); Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191 (1957) (less than third-grade education). See § 24.03, fourth paragraph, supra.

In Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986), the Court made clear that a claim of involuntariness for Fourteenth Amendment Due Process purposes cannot be based solely on the personal frailties of a suspect. Reversing a lower court finding of involuntariness predicated exclusively on the accused’s mental illness, the Court emphasized that federal constitutional protections are triggered only by “‘state action,’” id. at 165, and it accordingly held that some form of “coercive police activity is a necessary predicate to the finding that a confession is not ‘voluntary’ within the meaning of the Due Process Clause.” Id. at 167. Connelly does, however, reaffirm in dictum that a suspect’s “mental condition is surely relevant to an individual’s susceptibility to police coercion” (id. at 165): “as interrogators have turned to more subtle forms of psychological persuasion, courts have found the mental condition of the defendant a more significant factor in the ‘voluntariness’ calculus” (id. at 164). And in Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652 (2004), the Court repeated (again in dictum) that “we do consider a suspect’s age and [extent of prior] experience [with the criminal justice system]” when gauging, for purposes of assessing the “voluntariness of a statement,” whether “‘the defendant’s will was overborne,’ . . . a question that logically can depend on ‘the characteristics of the accused.’” Id. at 667-68 (majority opinion); see also id. at 668 (the “characteristics of the accused” relevant to this assessment “can include the suspect’s age, education, and intelligence, . . . as well as a suspect’s prior experience with law enforcement”). See also Procunier v. Atchley, 400 U.S. 446, 453-54 (1971) (suspect’s “[l]ow intelligence, denial of the right to counsel and failure to advise of the right to remain silent were not in themselves coercive [but] . . . were relevant . . . in establishing a setting in which actual coercion might have been exerted to overcome the will of the suspect”); State v. Carrillo, 156 Ariz. 125, 136, 750 P.2d 883, 894 (1988) (dictum) (“[W]e do not believe Connelly forbids consideration of the accused's subjective mental state. Certainly the police are not permitted to take advantage of the impoverished, the mentally deficient, the young, or the inexperienced by employing artifices or techniques that destroy the will of the weakest but leave Thus a suspect’s vulnerable state of mind can lend coercive force to police words and actions that would not be deemed coercive in the case of a suspect with normal powers of resistance. See, e.g., Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433, 442 (1961) (the defendant’s “youth, his subnormal intelligence, and his lack of previous experience with the police” impaired “his powers of resistance to overbearing police tactics”); Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. at 599 (five hours of incommunicado interrogation rendered a confession involuntary because the defendant was only 15 years old, and “[t]hat which would leave a man cold and unimpressed can overawe and overwhelm a lad in his early teens”); United States v. Preston, 751 F.3d 1008, 1028 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (“Even if we would reach a different conclusion regarding someone of normal intelligence, we hold that the officers’ use of the [interrogation] methods employed here to confuse and compel a confession from the intellectually disabled eighteen-year-old before us produced an involuntary confession”); United States v. Blocker, 354 F. Supp. 1195, 1201-02 (D. D.C. 1973) (“[i]n this case, defendant’s age [21] and limited mental ability suggest that the defendant would be particularly susceptible to psychological coercion in the form of threats and promises of leniency”)). Moreover, personal characteristics such as youth and intellectual disability may be sufficient in and of themselves to render a statement inadmissible under state-law doctrines of involuntariness. See § 24.16 infra.

The following are common factors that may be considered as bearing on voluntariness under a federal constitutional analysis:

§ 24.05(a) Youth

The Supreme Court “has emphasized that admissions and confessions of juveniles require special caution,” In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 45 (1967), and that the courts must take “the greatest care . . . to assure that the [juvenile’s] admission was voluntary, in the sense not only that it was not coerced or suggested, but also that it was not the product of ignorance of rights or of adolescent fantasy, fright, or despair.” Id. at 55 (footnote omitted). In reversing the conviction of a 15-year-old in Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596 (1948), the Court wrote:

What transpired would make us pause for careful inquiry if a mature man were involved. And when, as here, a mere child – an easy victim of the law – is before us, special care in scrutinizing the record must be used. Age 15 is a tender and difficult age for a boy of any race. He cannot be judged by the more exacting standards of maturity. That which would leave a man cold and unimpressed can overawe and overwhelm a lad in his early teens.

Id. at 599. The Court similarly stressed the inherent vulnerability of young people in finding in Gallegos v. Colorado, 370 U.S. 49, 54 (1962), that a 14-year-old’s confession was involuntary:

“[A] 14-year-old boy, no matter how sophisticated, is unlikely to have any conception of what will confront him when he is made accessible only to the police. . . . He cannot be compared with an adult in full possession of his senses and knowledgeable of the consequences of his admissions.”
In Yarborough v. Alvarado, the Court reiterated that the “characteristics of the accused [relevant to the assessment of the “voluntariness of a statement”] can include the suspect’s age, education, and intelligence, . . . as well as a suspect’s prior experience with law enforcement.” 541 U.S. at 668. See also id. at 667-68 (“we do consider a suspect’s age and experience” when gauging, for purposes of assessing the “voluntariness of a statement,” whether “‘the defendant’s will was overborne’”). Cf. Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460, 471 (2012) (explaining, in the context of criminal sentencing, that the Court has recognized, based on “science and social science” as well as “common sense” and “what ‘any parent knows,’” that “children ‘are more vulnerable . . . to . . . outside pressures’”).

The lower courts have similarly treated the youth of the suspect as a highly significant factor in assessing the voluntariness of a confession. See, e.g., Woods v. Clusen, 794 F.2d 293 (7th Cir. 1986); Williams v. Peyton, 404 F.2d 528 (4th Cir. 1968); Shelton v. State, 287 Ark. 322, 699 S.W.2d 728 (1985); State in the Interest of S.H., 61 N.J. 108, 293 A.2d 181 (1972); People v. Ward, 95 A.D.2d 351, 466 N.Y.S.2d 686 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1983); State v. Caffrey, 332 N.W.2d 269 (S.D. 1983); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d 145, 159, 699 N.W.2d 110, 117 (2005) (“Simply put, children are different than adults, and the condition of being a child renders one ‘uncommonly susceptible to police pressures.’ . . . We therefore view Jerrell’s young age of 14 to be a strong factor weighing against the voluntariness of his confession.”). In urging courts to recognize the need for particular solicitude to assure that juveniles’ inculpatory statements are not admitted into evidence unless they are truly voluntary, counsel can point to empirical findings that a disproportionately high percentage of documented instances of false confessions (about 33%) involve juvenile suspects. Steven A. Drizin & Richard A. Leo, The Problem of False Confessions in the Post-DNA World, 82 N.C. L. REV. 891, 941-43 (2004). See also Steven A. Drizin & Greg Luloff, Are Juvenile Courts a Breeding Ground for Wrongful Convictions?, 34 N. KY. L. REV. 257 (2007); Saul M. Kassin, Steven A. Drizin, Thomas Grisso, Gisli H. Gudjonsson, Richard A. Leo & Allison D. Redlich, Police-Induced Confessions: Risk Factors and Recommendations, 34 LAW & HUM. BEHAV. 3, 8-9, 19, 30-31 (2010); Allison D. Redlich, The Susceptibility of Juveniles to False Confessions and False Guilty Pleas, 62 RUTGERS L. REV. 943 (2010); Joshua A. Tepfer, Laura H. Nirider & Lynda Tricarico, Arresting Development: Convictions of Innocent Youth, 62 RUTGERS L. REV. 887, 904-08 (2010); J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261, 269 (2011) (“[T]he pressure of custodial interrogation is so immense that it ‘can induce a frighteningly high percentage of people to confess to crimes they never committed.’ Corley v. United States, 556 U.S. 303, 321 (2009) (citing Drizin & Leo, . . . [supra]); see also Miranda, 384 U.S., at 455, n. 23. . . . That risk is all the more troubling – and recent studies suggest, all the more acute – when the subject of custodial interrogation is a juvenile. See Brief for Center on Wrongful Convictions of Youth et al. as Amici Curiae 21–22 (collecting empirical studies that ‘illustrate the heightened risk of false confessions from youth’).”); In the Matter of Jimmy D., 15 N.Y.3d 417, 431, 938 N.E.2d 970, 979, 912 N.Y.S.2d 537, 546 (2010) (Lippman, C.J., dissenting) (“So long as juveniles cannot be altogether preserved from rigors of police interrogation, it would behoove us not to minimize the now well-documented potential for false confessions when suggestible and often impulsive and impaired children are ushered into the police interview room.”); “Children do resort to falsehood... to alleviate discomfort and satisfy the expectations of those in authority, and, in so doing, often neglect to consider the serious and lasting consequences of their election. There are developmental reasons for this behavior which we ignore at the peril of the truth-seeking process.”). A reference to these findings in briefing and argument is often useful for a couple of reasons. First, although the voluntariness and the reliability of confessions are analytically distinct issues (see § 24.22 infra), a judge who is persuaded that a confession poses significant risks of unreliability will, as a practical matter, be more prone to suppress it as involuntary. Second, in courts where the judge who presides at the suppression hearing is likely to be the same judge who will also sit as the trier of fact in a subsequent bench trial of the issue of the respondent’s guilt or innocence (see § 22.07 supra), the respondent’s interests are obviously best served by persuading the judge during the suppression hearing that any inculpatory statement s/he hears is not only technically suppressible but probably inaccurate.

§ 24.05(b) Mental Illness, Intellectual Disability, Limited Education

A factor such as mental illness, which impairs the suspect’s “mental condition[,] is surely relevant to an individual’s susceptibility to police coercion.” Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 165 (discussing Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199 (1960)). See also, e.g., Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 322 & n.3 (1959) (emotional instability); Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191, 193, 196 (1957) (schizophrenia); Eisen v. Picard, 452 F.2d 860, 863-66 (1st Cir. 1971); Jackson v. United States, 404 A.2d 911, 924 (D.C. 1979) (mental illness) (“Here, there was compelling evidence to show that appellant was mentally ill at the time of his statements: his history of mental illness, the incoherent nature of his statement, the testimony of Detective Wood and Dr. Papish, and the trial court’s acknowledgement of the irrationality of appellant’s statement.”); William C. Follette, Richard A. Leo, & Deborah Davis, Mental Health and False Confessions, in Elizabeth Kelley (ed.) Representing People with Mental Disabilities (2017) [Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=3028918]; Drizin & Leo, supra at 973-74.

A suspect may be rendered particularly vulnerable to police coercion by intellectual disability. See, e.g., Sims v. Georgia, 389 U.S. 404 (1967) (limited mental capacity); Davis v. North Carolina, 384 U.S. 737 (1966) (low level of intelligence); Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433 (1961) (intellectual disability); Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568 (1961) (I.Q. of 64); United States v. Preston, 751 F.3d 1008, 1027-28 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) (18-year-old with an I.Q. of 65); Shelton v. State, 287 Ark. 322, 699 S.W.2d 728 (1985) (juvenile who was nearly 18 but had marginal intelligence and maturity); In the Interest of Thompson, 241 N.W.2d 2 (Iowa 1976) (I.Q. of 71); State in the Interest of Holfield, 319 So. 2d 471 (La. App. 1975) (intellectual disability; I.Q. of 67); People v. Knapp, 124 A.D.3d 36, 46, 995 N.Y.S.2d 869, 877 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2014) (I.Q. of 68; a defense expert testified that the “defendant is ‘a suggestible and overly compliant individual, which is not unusual in [intellectually disabled] . . . individuals who are frequently “yea-saying,” in turn causing him to be easily intimidated by the interrogation process’’”); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d at 160, 699 N.W.2d at 117 (“low average intelligence”). See also Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304, 320 & n.25 (2002) (observing that there is a “possibility of false confessions” in cases of intellectually disabled defendants, and noting that the “disturbing number of inmates on death row [who] have been exonerated . . . included at least one [intellectually disabled] . . . person who unwittingly confessed to a crime that he did not commit.”); Drizin & Leo, supra at 970-73.

§ 24.05(c) Effects of Drugs or Alcohol

Several lower court decisions have recognized that intoxication through alcohol can have the same resistance-impairing effects as drugs and should be considered in assessing the voluntariness of a statement. See, e.g., State v. Mikulewicz, 462 A.2d 497 (Me. 1983); State v. Discoe, 334 N.W.2d 466 (N.D. 1983).

§ 24.05(d) Lack of Prior Experience with the Police

The Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized that “lack of previous experience with the police” can impair a suspect’s “powers of resistance to overbearing police tactics.” Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433, 442 (1961); see, e.g., Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. at 667-68; Clewis v. Texas, 386 U.S. 707, 712 (1967); Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 321-22 (1959); Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 667-68 (2004) (dictum). Accord, Woods v. Clusen, 794 F.2d 293, 297 (7th Cir. 1986); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d at 161, 699 N.W.2d at 117 (limited “experience with law enforcement” – two prior arrests for misdemeanor offenses that never resulted in a delinquency finding – “may have contributed to . . . [a 14-year-old’s] willingness to confess”). See also Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707, 726-29 (1979) (dictum) (prior “experience with the police” is relevant to assessment of the voluntariness of Miranda waivers).

§ 24.05(e) Combination of Factors
Frequently, counsel’s case will feature more than one of the foregoing factors and others – physical exhaustion, pain resulting from physical injuries, emotional depression, and so forth. Counsel should argue that the several factors combined to render the respondent particularly susceptible to coercion. See, e.g., A.M. v. Butler, 360 F.3d 787, 800-01 (7th Cir. 2004) (11-year-old with no prior court experience); Woods v. Clusen, 794 F.2d 293 (7th Cir. 1986) (16-year-old with no prior court experience); Thomas v. North Carolina, 447 F.2d 1320 (4th Cir. 1971) (15-year-old with an I.Q. of 72 and limited education); In the Interest of Thompson, 241 N.W.2d 2 (Iowa 1976) (17-year-old with an I.Q. of 71 and a fourth-grade reading level); State in the Interest of Holifield, 319 So. 2d 471 (La. App. 1975) (intellectually disabled 14-year-old with an I.Q. of 67); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d at 159, 699 N.W.2d at 117 (14-year-old with an I.Q. of 84 and limited prior involvement with the juvenile justice system). Cf. Edmonds v. Oktibbeha County, 675 F.3d 911, 914, 915, 916 (5th Cir. 2012) (recognizing, in the context of a section 1983 suit against police deputies, that the “thirteen-year-old accused’s separation from his mother, his desire to please adults, and his inexperience with the criminal justice system all weigh against [a finding of] voluntariness [of his confession].” but ultimately concluding that voluntariness was established by the totality of the circumstances, including the accused’s disclosure “in his videotaped retraction (and also later on national television)” that he falsely confessed in order “to help his sister” and that “the deputies did not coerce him into confessing.”). The assistance of a psychological consultant who can testify as a defense expert or advise counsel of judicially noticeable writings documenting the interactive effects of factors present in the particular case will often be important. See §§ 12.08-12.10 supra.

§ 24.06 APPLICABILITY OF THE INVOLUNTARINESS DOCTRINE TO COERCION BY SCHOOL OFFICIALS OR PRIVATE CITIZENS

Although the Supreme Court has not considered the applicability of the due process doctrine of involuntariness to the school setting, the logic of the Court’s decisions in Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986), and New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), strongly suggests that the doctrine does apply to coercive action by principals, teachers, and other school officials. Because the Connelly case involved the traditional setting of police interrogation, the Court understandably spoke in terms of “coercive police activity” as the “predicate” for a finding of involuntariness (id. at 167) in holding that a suspect’s mental illness alone will not support such a finding. But the Court’s basic reasoning was that “some sort of ‘state action’ [is required] to support a claim of violation of the Due Process Clause,” id. at 165 – some “link between coercive activity of the State, on the one hand, and a resulting confession by a defendant, on the other.” Id. See also id. at 167 (“coercion brought to bear on the defendant by the State”); id. at 163 (“coercive government misconduct”); State v. Brown, 286 Kan. 170, 174-75, 182 P.3d 1205, 1209-10 (2008) (rejecting the state’s argument that “coercive conduct must be induced by law enforcement” in order to render a statement involuntary under Colorado v. Connelly, and suppressing a statement induced by a child welfare agency worker: Connelly requires “a link between the coercive activity of the State and the defendant’s resulting confession” but does not limit “‘State actors’” to “law enforcement”). And the Court has recognized on other occasions that “school authorities are state actors for purposes of the constitutional guarantees of . . . due process” (New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. at 336) and that, “[i]n carrying out searches and other disciplinary functions pursuant to [“publicly mandated educational and disciplinary policies”] . . ., school officials act as representatives of the State.” Id. See also Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565 (1975). Thus the conclusion is inescapable that, just as a school official’s search of a student is subject to Fourth Amendment restrictions (see §§ 23.33-23.34 supra), a school official’s interrogation of a student is subject to the due process doctrine of involuntariness. See, e.g., People v. Benedict V., 85 A.D.2d 747, 747, 445 N.Y.S.2d 798, 799 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1981) (student’s statement to detective inside the principal’s office was rendered involuntary by the principal’s “conduct in the questioning” when the principal “expressly assumed the role of parental protector and, in furtherance of that role, encouraged defendant to make a confession”).

Coercive activity by a private citizen, on the other hand, is not “state action” that will trigger the due process doctrine of involuntariness. See Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 165-66. But this is not to say that coercive private conduct is wholly irrelevant to the due process inquiry. There are at least two respects in which private action can play a role in a finding that a statement was involuntary:

First, the occurrence of private coercive action will be relevant to the extent that it made the youth particularly vulnerable to any coercion exercised by the police. The Court in Connelly plainly recognized that, as long as due process protections are called into play by “some sort of ‘state action’” (id. at 165), non-police-related influences such as a suspect’s mental problems may be “relevant to an individual’s susceptibility to police coercion,” id. See § 24.05 supra. Accordingly, if a parent or other private individual exerts pressure on the respondent prior to or during the police interrogation, this may be considered in assessing the impact of coercive police activity on the respondent.

Second, the connection between a private individual and the police may implicate the general rule that private action loses its “private” character when the citizen acts at the behest of, or in conjunction with, the police. Cf. People v. Jones, 47 N.Y.2d 528, 393 N.E.2d 443, 419 N.Y.S.2d 447 (1979) (private security guard’s questioning of suspect was subject to Miranda requirements because of police involvement in arresting the suspect and in creating a “custodial atmosphere” for the interrogation); Sims v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 538 (1967), and 389 U.S. 404 (1967) (per curiam) (brutality practiced on defendant by a private party in the presence of police officers who had the defendant in custody is given substantial weight in finding a confession involuntary). See also § 23.36 supra; §§ 24.12, 24.13(b) infra. Thus, for example, if the police request or encourage a parent to exercise a coercive influence over his or her child during police interrogation, the ensuing coercion may properly be attributed to the police. See In the Matter of Raymond W., 44 N. Y.2d 438, 441, 377 N.E.2d 471, 472, 406 N.Y.S.2d 27, 28 (1978) (explaining that “if it be established that . . . [parental] guidance or influence is not exercised by the parent independently but at the behest or on behalf of the prosecutor, such circumstance should weigh heavily to indicate the involuntariness of the child’s confession”).

In addition, coercive activity by a private citizen may be sufficient in and of itself to render a statement inadmissible under state law doctrines of involuntariness. See § 24.16 infra.

Part C. Miranda Violations

§ 24.07 THE MIRANDA DOCTRINE GENERALLY

The rule of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), excludes any incriminating response made to custodial interrogation unless the response was preceded by specified warnings of the respondent’s rights and an effective waiver by the respondent of those rights. “In order to be able to use statements obtained during custodial interrogation of the accused, the State must warn the accused prior to such questioning of his right to remain silent and of his right to have counsel, retained or appointed, present during interrogation.” Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707, 717 (1979) (dictum). See, e.g., Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 437, 444 (2000) (reaffirming the Miranda doctrine and clarifying that, notwithstanding the Court’s previous references to the “Miranda warnings as ‘prophylactic’” (id. at 437), “Miranda announced a constitutional rule” (id. at 444)); Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610, 617 (1976); Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96, 99-100 & n.6 (1975) (dictum).

“Custodial interrogation” is a term of art. The Miranda doctrine applies only when a respondent is in “custody” – or its “functional equivalent” – (see § 24.08(a) infra) and makes statements in response to “interrogation,” see § 24.08(b) infra.

If these two conditions are satisfied, Miranda requires the suppression of the respondent’s statements whenever (a) the required warnings were not given or were defective (see § 24.09 infra); (b) the respondent’s waiver of Miranda rights was involuntary (see § 24.10(a) infra) or was not “knowing and intelligent” (see § 24.10(b) infra); or (c) the police failed to honor the respondent’s assertion of the right to remain silent or the right to counsel (see § 24.11 infra).

The Miranda rule governs statements made by a person in custody for any criminal offense, “regardless of the nature or severity of the offense of which he is suspected or for which he was arrested.” Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 434 (1984) (finding constitutional error in the admission of unwarned incriminating statements made after an arrest for a “misdemeanor traffic offense,” id. at 429). The Supreme Court has created only two exceptions to the Miranda rule. First, in New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984), the Supreme Court recognized “a narrow exception to the Miranda rule,” 467 U.S. at 658, when police officers, “in the very act of apprehending a suspect [who had been reported to be armed and who was found to be wearing an empty shoulder holster when arrested], were confronted with the immediate necessity of ascertaining the whereabouts of a gun which they had every reason to believe the suspect had just removed from his empty holster and discarded in [a public] . . . supermarket,” id. at 657. “[O]n these facts,” id. at 655, and when the only question asked by the arresting officer was “about the whereabouts of the gun,” id. at 657, the Court held that “there is a ‘public safety’ exception to the requirement that Miranda warnings be given before a suspect’s answer may be admitted into evidence.” 467 U.S. at 655. Quarles has since been described as holding that “when the police arrest a suspect under circumstances presenting an imminent danger to the public safety, they may without informing him [or her] of [the Miranda] . . . rights ask questions essential to elicit information necessary to neutralize the threat to the public.” Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. at 429 n.10. Compare Cronk v. State, 443 N.E.2d 882, 887 (Ind. App. 1983) (the public safety exception applied to the police officers’ questions to the defendant about the location of a bomb that he said he had planted but “the emergency . . . expired” after state police troopers found and dismantled the bomb, and therefore the subsequent questioning of the defendant at the jail about the bomb required Miranda warnings). Second, in Pennsylvania v. Muniz, 496 U.S. 582 (1990), the Court recognized “a ‘routine booking question’ exception which exempts from Miranda’s coverage questions to secure the “‘biographical data necessary to complete booking or pretrial services,’” such as “name, address, height, weight, eye color, date of birth, and current age,” as long as the questions asked are “reasonably related to the police’s administrative concerns” and are not “‘designed to elicit incriminatory admissions,’” Id. at 601-02 & n.14. Compare United States v. Pacheco-Lopez, 531 F.3d 420, 423-24 (6th Cir. 2008) (the “booking exception” of Pennsylvania v. Muniz did not apply to officer’s questions to defendant about “where he was from, how he had arrived at the house, and when he had arrived” because the house was “ostensibly linked to a drug sale” and therefore questions about the defendant’s “origin” and his connections to the house were “reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response,” thus mandating a Miranda warning’); United States v. Williams, 842 F.3d 1143, 1145, 1147-49 (9th Cir. 2016) (the “booking exception” did not apply to a deputy sheriff’s question to the defendant “whether he was a gang member” and the defendant’s resulting admission of gang membership, because the officer had “‘reason to know that . . . [the] answer may incriminate’” the defendant; even though “no gang-related charges were then pending,” a defendant “charged with a violent crime in California who is a gang member is subject to far greater jeopardy than those who are not gang members . . . [a]nd, the same is true under federal law”); People v. Hiraeta, 117 A.D.3d 964, 964, 986 N.Y.S.2d 217, 218-19 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2014) (booking exception did not apply to “the defendant’s statement to a detective regarding his gang affiliation, which was probative of his identity as one of the victim’s attackers”); United States v. Phillips with the following: 146 F. Supp. 3d 837, 848 (E.D. Mich. 2015), ruling on another issue aff’d, 677 Fed. Appx. 294 (6th Cir. 2017) (“the Defendant’s responses to the officer’s questions regarding his criminal history and the location of his vest resulted from a ‘custodial interrogation,’ not biographical questioning subject to the booking exception”). With these sole exceptions, “[i]n the years since the decision in Miranda, we have frequently reaffirmed the central principle established by that case: if the police take a suspect into custody and then ask him [or her] questions without informing him [or her] of the [Miranda] rights . . ., [the] responses cannot be introduced into evidence to establish . . . guilt.” 468 U.S. at 429.

§ 24.08 THE PRECONDITION FOR APPLICABILITY OF MIRANDA PROTECTIONS: “CUSTODIAL INTERROGATION”

§ 24.08(a) “Custody”

Miranda comes into play only “after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise

Thus the Miranda warnings and waivers are not required when investigating officers interview an unarrested suspect in his or her residence, even though “the ‘focus’ of [a criminal] . . . investigation may . . . have been on [him or her],” Beckwith v. United States, 425 U.S. 341, 347 (1976); they are not required when a suspect comes voluntarily to the police station in response to an officer’s telephonic request for an interview, at least when the suspect is “immediately informed that [s/he is] . . . not under arrest” and when “there is no indication that [his or her] . . . freedom to depart [is] . . . restricted in any way,” Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 U.S. 492, 495 (1977) (per curiam); see also California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121 (1983) (per curiam); and they are not required when a probationer is questioned by his or her probation officer during a probation-supervision conference in the latter’s office, even when attendance at such conferences is a condition of probation enforceable by its possible revocation, Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984) (“Murphy was not ‘in custody’ for purposes of receiving Miranda protection since there was no ‘formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement’ of the degree associated with a formal arrest,” id. at 430). Cf. United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564, 578-82 (1976) (plurality opinion) (alternative ground) (subpoenaed grand jury witness has no right to Miranda warnings or to have counsel present in the grand jury room). “[T]he roadside questioning of a motorist detained pursuant to a traffic stop [does not] . . . constitute custodial interrogation,” Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 423 (1984), nor does questioning during a “‘Terry stop’” (468 U.S. at 439-40; see §§ 23.04-23.06 supra), unless the person stopped “is subjected to treatment that renders him [or her] ‘in custody’ for practical purposes,” 468 U.S. at 440, under the “settled [principle] that the safeguards prescribed by Miranda become applicable as soon as a suspect’s freedom of action is curtailed to a ‘degree associated with formal arrest,’” 468 U.S. at 440. See, e.g., United States v. Perdue, 8 F.3d 1455, 1464-65 (10th Cir. 1993) (“The traditional view . . . is that Miranda warnings are simply not implicated in the context of a valid Terry stop. . . . This view has prevailed because the typical police-citizen encounter envisioned by the Court in Terry usually involves no more than a very brief detention without the aid of weapons or handcuffs, a few questions relating to identity and the suspicious circumstances, and an atmosphere that is ‘substantially less “police dominated” than that surrounding the kinds of interrogation at issue in Miranda.’ . . . ¶ The last decade, however, has witnessed a multifaceted expansion of Terry. Important for our purposes is the trend granting officers greater latitude in using force in order to ‘neutralize’ potentially dangerous suspects during an investigatory detention. . . . Thus, today, consonant with this trend, we held [earlier in the opinion] that police officers acted reasonably under the Fourth Amendment when they, without probable cause and with guns drawn, stopped Mr. Perdue’s car, forced him to get out of his car, and demanded that he lie face down on the ground. . . . ¶ One cannot ignore the conclusion, however, that by employing an amount of force that reached the boundary line between a permissible Terry stop and an unconstitutional arrest, the officers created the ‘custodial’ situation envisioned by Miranda and its progeny. Mr. Perdue was forced out of his car and onto the ground at gunpoint. He was then questioned by two police officers while police helicopters hovered above. During the questioning, Mr. Perdue remained face down on the ground while the officers kept their guns drawn on him and his pregnant fiancee. . . . A reasonable man in Mr. Perdue’s position could not have misunderstood the fact that if he did not immediately cooperate, his life would be in danger. Any reasonable person in Mr. Perdue’s position would have felt ‘completely at the mercy of the police.’ . . . We therefore find as a matter of law that Mr. Perdue was in police custody during the initial questioning by Officer Carreno.”). And see §§ 23.04(d), 23.04(e), 23.06 supra.

However, Miranda applies to the questioning of a person who is handcuffed and surrounded by police officers, even in a public place. New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649, 654 n.4, 655 (1984) (dictum); and see Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. at 441 n.34, 442 n.36, giving other examples of street-arrest questioning that constitute “custodial interrogation.” And it applies to any questioning of a person involuntarily detained in closed quarters, even though those quarters may be the person’s own home and even though the questioning may be wholly unrelated to the reason for the detention. Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968) (state prison inmate questioned in prison by federal revenue agent shortly before federal authorities decide to pursue a criminal tax investigation); Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324 (1969) (suspect arrested and questioned by police officers in his boardinghouse bedroom); United States v. Hashime, 734 F.3d 278, 280-81, 283-84, 285 (4th Cir. 2013) (the interrogation of a 19-year-old was “custodial” even though it took place in his home, the officers said that “they were not there to arrest anyone but rather to execute a search warrant,” “the door to the room in which he was interrogated was open,” the officers told him that he “was free to leave,” and the officers offered him “multiple breaks” during the interrogation: although these factors “do cut against custody, they are decidedly outweighed” by the “sheer length” of the three-hour interrogation, the number of federal and state law enforcement officers who “streamed into the house with their guns drawn,” and the fact that Hashime “‘was rousted from bed at gunpoint, . . . not allowed to move unless guarded, and ultimately separated from his family’” during the interrogation.); United States v. Craighead, 539 F.3d 1073, 1084-89 (9th Cir. 2008) (the court finds an in-home interrogation “custodial” for Miranda purposes under a standard that considers: “(1) the number of law enforcement personnel and whether they were armed; (2) whether the suspect was at any point restrained, either by physical force or by threats; (3) whether the suspect was isolated from others; and (4) whether the suspect was informed that he was free to terminate the interview, and the context in which any such statements were made.”); In re I.J., 906 A.2d 249, 262-63 (D.C. 2006) (16-year-old juvenile, who was residing in a youth center pursuant to a court order of probation, was in “custody” for Miranda purposes when he was questioned by a police officer, in an office of the center, about a crime the youth allegedly committed on the premises). See also State v. McKenna, 166 N.H. 671, 675, 686, 103 A.3d 756, 760, 769 (2014) (court holds on state constitutional grounds that the defendant was in “custody” for Miranda purposes when police officers questioned him as he was walking around the grounds of his restaurant and campground for an hour and a half, at least at the point at which they stopped him from walking into a wooded area and told him to remain in the open areas; “Although the defendant was informed that he was not under arrest, there is no evidence that the officers ever informed the defendant that he was free to terminate the interrogation. In addition, we accord substantial weight to the fact that the officers’ questions were accusatory and focused on the defendant’s alleged criminal activity.”). Cf. Howes v. Fields, 565 U.S. 499, 512, 515 (2012) (questioning of a prison inmate does not automatically trigger Miranda’s requirements because “service of a term of imprisonment, without more, is not enough to constitute Miranda custody”; Miranda “custody” was not established on a record showing that the inmate was taken aside and questioned in private about “events that took place outside the prison” because “[a]ll of the[ ] objective facts are consistent with an interrogation environment in which a reasonable person would have felt free to terminate the interview and leave”: the inmate “was told at the outset of the interrogation, and was reminded again thereafter, that he could leave and go back to his cell whenever he wanted”; the inmate “was not physically restrained or threatened and was interviewed in a well-lit, average-sized conference room, where he was ‘not uncomfortable’”; and the inmate “was offered food and water, and the door to the conference room was sometimes left open.”).

The determination “whether a suspect is ‘in custody’ is an objective inquiry” that involves the following “[t]wo discrete inquiries”:

“first, what were the circumstances surrounding the interrogation; and second, given those circumstances, would a reasonable person have felt he or she was at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave. Once the scene is set and the players’ lines and actions are reconstructed, the court must apply an objective test to resolve the ultimate inquiry: was there a formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement of the degree associated with formal arrest.’” (J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261, 270 (2011) (quoting Thompson v. Keohane, 516 U.S. 99, 112 (1995)).

 Accord, Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. at 442; Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318, 322-25 (1994) (per curiam). In the case of a minor, the Supreme Court has recognized that this “reasonable person” test must take into account the age of the child “so long as the child’s age was known to the officer at the time of police questioning, or would have been objectively apparent to a reasonable officer.” J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. at 277. See id. at 264-65 (“It is beyond dispute that children will often feel bound to submit to police questioning when an adult in the same circumstances would feel free to leave. Seeing no reason for police officers or courts to blind themselves to that commonsense reality, we hold that a child’s age properly informs the Miranda custody analysis.”); id. at 272-73 (“A child’s age is far ‘more than a chronological fact.’ . . . It is a fact that ‘generates commonsense conclusions about behavior and perception.’ . . . Such conclusions apply broadly to children as a class. . . . Time and again, this Court has drawn these commonsense conclusions for itself. We have observed that children ‘generally are less mature and responsible than adults,’ . . . that they ‘often lack the experience, perspective, and judgment to recognize and avoid choices that could be detrimental to them,’ . . . that they ‘are more vulnerable or susceptible to . . . outside pressures’ than adults. . . . Addressing the specific context of police interrogation, we have observed that events that ‘would leave a man cold and unimpressed can overawe and overwhelm a lad in his early teens.’ . . . Describing no one child in particular, these observations restate what ‘any parent knows’ – indeed, what any person knows – about children generally.”); id. at 269 (“By its very nature, custodial police interrogation entails ‘inherently compelling pressures.’ . . . Even for an adult, the physical and psychological isolation of custodial interrogation can ‘undermine the individual’s will to resist and . . . compel him to speak where he would not otherwise do so freely.’ . . . Indeed, the pressure of custodial interrogation is so immense that it ‘can induce a frighteningly high percentage of people to confess to crimes they never committed.’ . . . That risk is all the more troubling— and recent studies suggest, all the more acute— when the subject of custodial interrogation is a juvenile.”). Accord, e.g., In the Matter of Delroy S., 25 N.Y.3d 1064, 1066, 33 N.E.3d 1289, 1291, 12 N.Y.S.3d 19, 21 (2015) (11-year-old juvenile respondent was in “custody” for purposes of Miranda when police officers went into his family’s apartment, at the invitation of his older sister, and asked him “what happened?”; “‘a reasonable 11 year old would not have felt free to leave’”). See generally Martin Guggenheim & Randy Hertz, J.D.B. and the Maturing of Juvenile Confession Suppression Law, 38 WASH. U. J. L. & SOC. POLICY 109 (2012). Even before the United States Supreme Court’s J.D.B. decision, with its notable insistence that the special vulnerabilities of youth are an important factor for consideration, a number of state courts had recognized that a respondent’s age must be taken into account in determining whether a minor is “in custody” for Miranda purposes. See, e.g., People v. Howard, 92 P.3d 445, 450 (Colo. 2004); In the Interest of Doe, 130 Idaho 811, 818, 948 P.2d 1047, 1061, 1065-66, 323 Ill. Dec. 55, 69, 73-74 (2008); In re D.A.R., 73 S.W.3d 505, 510-11 (Tex. App. 2002).

If the respondent was formally arrested or was placed under physical restraint “of the ‘degree associated with a formal arrest,’” this plainly suffices to establish “custody” for Miranda purposes. New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. at 655 (dictum). If s/he was not, the “custody” issue requires “‘examin[ation] [of] all of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation,’ . . . including any circumstance that ‘would have affected how a reasonable person in the suspect’s position ‘would perceive his or her freedom to leave.’” J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. at 271. See also id. (the custody test “ask[s] how a reasonable person in the suspect’s position would understand his freedom to terminate questioning and leave”; “On the other hand, the ‘subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned’ are irrelevant.”). Relevant factors include (i) whether the detention was merely “temporary and brief” or was “prolonged” (Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. at 437-38; see also id. at 441); (ii) whether the respondent was subjected to only a “modest number of questions” or was subjected to “‘persistent questioning’” (id. at 442 & n.36; see also id. at 438); and (iii) whether the questioning took place in a public location, where “exposure to public view both reduces the ability of an unscrupulous policeman to use illegitimate means to elicit self-incriminating statements and diminishes the [suspect’s] . . . fear that, if he does not cooperate, he will be subjected to abuse” (id. at 438). “Some of the factors relevant to whether a reasonable person would believe he was free to leave include ‘the purpose, place, and length of interrogation,’ along with ‘the extent to which the defendant is confronted with evidence of guilt, the physical surroundings of the interrogation, the duration of the detention, and the degree of pressure applied to the defendant.’” State v. Snell, 142 N.M. 452, 456, 166 P.3d 1106, 1110 (N.M. App. 2007), quoting State v. Munoz, 126 N.M. 535, 544, 972 P.2d 847, 856 (N.M. 1998).
For discussion of whether a school official’s interrogation of a student inside the principal’s office is sufficiently “custodial” to trigger Miranda protections, see § 24.12 infra.

§ 24.08(b) “Interrogation”

The Miranda concept of “interrogation” encompasses:

“express questioning or its functional equivalent. That is to say, the term ‘interrogation’ under Miranda refers not only to express questioning, but also to any words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect.” (Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 300-01 (1980)).

As the Court has explained, the police-should-know test “focuses primarily upon the perceptions of the suspect, rather than the intent of the police. This focus reflects the fact that the Miranda safeguards were designed to vest a suspect in custody with an added measure of protection against coercive police practices, without regard to objective proof of the underlying intent of the police.” Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. at 301. The assessment of the suspect’s perceptions is predicated upon a “reasonable person” standard rather than a subjective standard, because “the police surely cannot be held accountable for the unforeseeable results of their words or actions.” Id. at 301-02. Accordingly, “the definition of interrogation can extend only to words or actions on the part of police officers that they should have known were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response.” Id. at 302 (emphasis in original).

“In deciding whether particular police conduct is interrogation,” the courts have been admonished to “remember the purpose behind [the] . . . decisions in Miranda and Edwards [v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981)]: preventing government officials from using the coercive nature of confinement to extract confessions that would not be given in an unrestrained environment.” Arizona v. Mauro, 481 U.S. at 529-30. Thus if the police set in motion “compelling influences [or] . . . psychological ploys” (id. at 529) that “implicate this purpose” (id. at 530) and create an “atmosphere of oppressive police conduct” (id. at 528 n.5), their behavior “properly could be treated as the functional equivalent of interrogation.” Id. at 527.

In urging that police conduct short of explicit questioning amounted to “interrogation,” counsel can point to the following sorts of factors:

(i) “the police carried on a lengthy harangue in the presence of the suspect” rather than simply “a few offhand remarks” (Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. at 303).
“under the circumstances, the officers’ comments were particularly ‘evocative’” (id.). See, e.g., State v. Bond, 237 Wis. 2d 633, 642-43, 647, 614 N.W.2d 552, 556-57, 558 (2000) (a police officer’s statement to the defendant in a witness-intimidation case that “‘you’re the man behind the man,’” implying that the defendant was “‘the man who does the dirty work, . . . the muscle,’” was “‘particularly “evocative”’ or provocative,” and “the functional equivalent of interrogation”).

the police used “psychological ploys, such as to ‘posi[t]’ ‘the guilt of the subject,’ to ‘minimize the moral seriousness of the offense,’ and ‘to cast blame on the victim or on society’” (Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. at 299 (quoting Miranda, 384 U.S. at 450)). See also Arizona v. Mauro, 481 U.S. at 526, 529. The Miranda opinion cites a number of police manuals describing sophisticated interrogation techniques; counsel will often find it helpful to peruse these and other “police science” hornbooks because any similarity between the techniques they advise to elicit incriminating statements and the behavior of the officers in counsel’s own case will be highly persuasive that the latter behavior was “interrogation.” See, e.g., Hill v. United States, 858 A.2d 435, 443 (D.C. 2004) (finding that the officer’s statement to the defendant that “‘he was being charged with second-degree murder and that . . . [his friend] “told [the police] what happened”’” was the “functional equivalent of interrogation” because the officer employed “classic interrogation techniques” recommended in the Reid manual on criminal interrogations, which was cited in the Miranda opinion); United States v. Rambo, 365 F.3d 906, 909-10 (10th Cir. 2004) (“While the district court concluded that the lack of questions indicated there was no interrogation by Moran, the use of questions is not required to show that interrogation occurred. . . . ¶ The portion of the interview available on videotape opens with Moran informing Rambo that much of the blame will fall on Rambo’s shoulders. As the Supreme Court has recognized, one of the techniques used by police during interrogation is to ‘posit the guilt of the subject.’ . . . Thus, Moran’s first comments are an example of interrogation explicitly recognized by the Supreme Court. Moreover, other questions and comments recorded on the videotape support the conclusion that Rambo was under interrogation. ¶ Given the context, Moran’s comment ‘if you want to talk to me about this stuff, that’s fine,’ is fairly understood as an attempt to refocus the discussion on the robberies. Moran reiterates this invitation four times during the course of the interview. . . . ¶ While the government claims that Moran’s only goal was to obtain a waiver of the right to remain silent, that assertion ignores the appropriate test for determining if an interrogation occurred. It is true that an investigating officer’s intention may be relevant, but it is the objectively measured tendency of an action to elicit an incriminating response which is ultimately determinative. . . . Moran’s interaction with Rambo was reasonably likely to produce incriminating information and, therefore, Rambo was under interrogation.”); In re Elias V., 237 Cal. App. 4th 568, 571, 579, 583, 588, 188 Cal. Rptr. 3d 202, 204, 211, 214, 218 (2015), quoted in § 24.04(d), second paragraph, supra. See also the Cutler & Leo articles cited in the penultimate paragraph of § 24.04(d).

(iv) the police were aware that the suspect was:

(A) “unusually disoriented or upset at the time of his arrest” (Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. at 302-03). See, e.g., Xu v. State, 191 S.W.3d 210, 217 (Tex. App. 2005) (“the officers should have known their interrogation would result in Xu’s oral statement. . . . The detectives described Xu as emotional and upset throughout the day. He was described as ‘hysterical.’ He repeatedly wept and clutched a picture of his wife and daughter. The detectives knew Xu’s English was broken and that he came from China, where the culture is far different than that of the United States.”).

(B) “unusual[ly] susceptib[le] . . . to a particular form of persuasion” (Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. at 302 n.8) because of young age, intellectual disability, mental illness, or the effects of alcohol or other substances. See, e.g., Benjamin v. State, 116 So. 3d 115, 123 (Miss. 2013) (a police officer’s “tactics” of “foster[ing] the suspect’s mistaken belief that talking would allow him to avoid a night in jail” and encouraging the suspect’s mother to “pressure” him to talk to the police “constituted the functional equivalent of interrogation” because the police should have known that these “psychological ploys . . . were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from fourteen-year-old Benjamin”); In the Matter of Ronald C., 107 A.D.2d 1053, 486 N.Y.S.2d 575 (N.Y App. Div., 4th Dep’t 1985) (because the accused was only 13 years old and was unaccompanied by a parent or counsel, the police should have known that placing the alleged burglar’s tools in front of him was likely to elicit an incriminating response).

(C) “unusual[ly] susceptib[le]” (Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. at 302 n.8) to priming for any other reason. See, e.g., State v. Juranek, 287 Neb. 846, 856, 844 N.W.2d 791, 801 (2014) (“the detective knew about Juranek’s propensity to talk without being interrogated and should have expected that if asked about the incident, Juranek would confess again”).

(v) the police intended to elicit an admission. Even though the officers’ intentions are not controlling, the “intent of the police . . . may well have a bearing on whether the police should have known that their words or actions were reasonably likely to evoke an incriminating response” (Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. at 301 n.7, 303 n.9). See, e.g., Drury v. State, 368 Md. 331, 332, 341, 793 A.2d 567, 568, 573 (2002) (a police officer’s action in showing the defendant “physical evidence” and telling him “that the evidence would be processed for fingerprints” was the “functional equivalent of interrogation”: the officer’s “actions were aimed at invoking an incriminating remark”; “indeed, there is no explanation for his conduct but that he expected to elicit such statements.”); State v. Brooks, 193 Vt. 461, 464, 468, 70 A.3d 1014, 1016-17, 1019 (2013) (“the interaction [between the detective and the defendant] at the holding cell” – in which the “[d]efendant asked ‘what was going on’ in the case, and Detective Plusch informed him of the current police investigation,” whereupon the defendant made an incriminating statement – “was an interrogation, regardless of how casual a conversation it might appear. Detective Plusch admitted that he hoped informing defendant about the investigation would produce some admission of guilt.”). Cf. § 23.04(b) second paragraph supra.

§ 24.09 VALIDITY OF THE MIRANDA WARNINGS

Miranda requires that the police preface any custodial interrogation with the following warnings to the suspect:

(a) that s/he has a right to remain silent, Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. at 467-68;

(b) that any statement s/he makes can and will be used in court as evidence against him or her, id. at 469; Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454, 466-67 (1981);

(c) that s/he has a right “to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him [or her] during interrogation,” Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. at 471; and

(d) that if s/he cannot afford a lawyer, s/he has a right to have a lawyer appointed, “prior to interrogation,” to represent him or her without cost, id. at 474.

See generally id. at 444, 467-73.

Some jurisdictions require that an additional warning be given to any juvenile who may be subject to transfer to adult court, advising him or her of the possibility of transfer. See, e.g., State v. Benoit, 126 N.H. 6, 18-19, 490 A.2d 295, 303-04 (1985); State v. Simon, 680 S.W.2d 346, 353 (Mo. App. 1984). See also In the Interest of J.M.J., 726 N.W.2d 621, 628 (S.D. 2007) (“advisement of the possibility of being tried as an adult, although not a per se rule, is ‘a significant factor in evaluating the voluntariness of a statement or confession under the totality of the circumstances.’”). (For discussion of transfer, see Chapter 13.) One state court has ruled on state constitutional grounds that a juvenile must be given a supplementary Miranda warning advising him that “‘if his counsel, parent, or guardian is not present, . . . he has a right to communicate with them, and that, if necessary, reasonable means will be provided for him to do so.’” Ex Parte Whisenant, 466 So. 2d 1006, 1007 (Ala. 1985). See also ALA. CODE § 12-15-202(a)(2), (b)(4) (2018) (codifying the Whisenant rule in a statutory roster of “[r]ights of the child when taken into custody” and “[r]ights of the child before being questioned while in custody” by requiring that juveniles be advised, both at the time they are taken into custody and before being questioned while in custody, that “the child has the right to communicate with his or her parent, legal guardian, or legal custodian whether or not that person is present,” and that, “[i]f necessary, reasonable means will be provided for the child to do so”).

Each of the Miranda warnings must be given expressly, and an incriminating statement made during custodial interrogation is inadmissible unless a foundation is laid for it by an affirmative showing in the trial record that all of the warnings were given. See Clark v. Smith, 403 U.S. 946 (1971) (per curiam) (reversing a conviction for admission of a confession made after three of the four Miranda warnings were given; only the right of an indigent to have state-paid counsel was omitted); accord, Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433, 445 (1974) (dictum). Proof by the prosecution that the respondent knew his or her Miranda rights will not excuse a failure to warn. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. at 468-69, 471-73.

The police need not precisely parrot the language of Miranda when they give Miranda warnings. Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195, 201 (1989) (upholding a warning which included the statement “‘We have no way of giving you a lawyer, but one will be appointed for you, if you wish; if and when you go to court,’” id. at 198, on the ground that the warning also said explicitly, “‘You have a right to talk to a lawyer for advice before we ask you any questions, and to have him with you during questioning,’” id.; the Court viewed this combination of advice as conveying the accurate information that, although the police were not obliged to furnish the arrested person with a lawyer, they were obliged to stop questioning him if he requested a lawyer, id. at 202-03.); Florida v. Powell, 559 U.S. 50, 53, 62 (2010) (the Miranda requirement that an individual must be “‘clearly informed,’ prior to custodial questioning, that he has, among other rights, ‘the right to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation’” was satisfied by a police officer’s advising the defendant that he “has ‘the right to talk to a lawyer before answering any of . . . [the law enforcement officers’] questions’”; that “‘[i]f you cannot afford to hire a lawyer, one will be appointed for you without cost and before any questioning’”; and that “‘[y]ou have the right to use any of these rights at any time you want during this interview’” (id. at 53), because “[i]n combination, the two warnings reasonably conveyed . . . [the suspect’s] right to have an attorney present, not only at the outset of interrogation, but at all times.”); see also California v. Prysock, 453 U.S. 355 (1981) (per curiam). What is required is that the warnings be “‘a fully effective equivalent’” of the Miranda cautions, Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. at 202, quoting Miranda, 384 U.S. at 476 (emphasis in the original Duckworth opinion), and “reasonably ‘conve[y] to [a suspect] his rights as required by Miranda,’” 492 U.S. at 203, quoting California v. Prysock, 453 U.S. at 361. Cf. United States v. Botello-Rosales, 728 F.3d 865, 867-68 (9th Cir. 2013) (per curiam) (“the Spanish-language [Miranda] warning administered to Botello before he was interrogated failed to ‘reasonably convey’” the “government’s obligation to appoint an attorney for an indigent suspect who wishes to consult one” because “the Spanish word ‘libre’ [used by the detective] to mean ‘free,’ or without cost” actually “translates to ‘free’ as being available or at liberty to do something”; this “constitutional infirmity” was not “cure[d]” by the officers’ prior administration of “correct Miranda warnings in English to Botello” because “[e]ven if Botello understood the English-language warnings, there is no indication in the record that the government clarified which set of warnings was correct.”); United States v. Murphy, 703 F.3d 182, 193 (2d Cir. 2012) (a police officer’s “instruct[ion] [to] the defendants that they could ‘decide at anytime to give up these rights, and not talk to us’ . . . [failed] to ‘ensure that the person in custody ha[d] sufficient knowledge of his . . . constitutional rights relating to the interrogation’”): the officer’s “incorrect formulation strongly suggested that the defendants should talk if they wished to exercise their rights – or, put another way, that they would waive their rights if they remained silent.”); United States v. Wysinger, 683 F.3d 784, 798-800 (7th Cir. 2012) (an admonition to a suspect that he had the “right to talk to a lawyer for advice before we ask any questions or have one – have an attorney with you during questioning” (id. at 798) was inadequate because it told the suspect “that he could talk to an attorney before questioning or during questioning” when “[i]n fact, Wysinger had a right to consult an attorney both before and during questioning” (id.): “A person given a choice between having a lawyer with him before questioning or during questioning might wait until it is clear that questioning has begun before invoking his right to counsel” (id. at 800); here, the interrogating agent “implied that Wysinger could decide whether to exercise his rights after [the] Agent . . . ‘la[id] it out for’ him and told him ‘what the story is,’ and that, in the meantime, he should ‘listen for a minute.’ The time to invoke his rights, in other words, had not yet arrived.” (id. at 801); an incorrectly worded Miranda warning, one that suggests that Miranda rights apply only to direct questioning or to the time before direct questioning, followed by diversionary tactics that redirect the suspect away from asserting those rights, frustrates the purpose of the Miranda protections” (id. at 800)); Lujan v. Garcia, 734 F.3d 917, 931-32 (9th Cir. 2013) (“The problem here is that the words used by law enforcement did not reasonably convey to Petitioner that he had the right to speak with an attorney present at all times – before and during his custodial interrogations. In the end, we find that the ‘choice’ communicated to Petitioner was that he could speak without an attorney or he could remain silent throughout his interrogations. Speaking with an attorney present was not an option presented to Petitioner. Thus, Miranda was never satisfied. ¶ Before his first interrogation, Petitioner was told the following regarding his Miranda rights: ¶ Your rights are you have the right to remain silent, whatever we talk about or you say can be used in a court of law against you, and if you don’t have money to hire an attorney one’s appointed to represent you free of charge. So, those are your rights. If you have questions about the case, if you want to tell us about what happened tonight, we’ll take your statement, take your statement from beginning to end. We’ll give you an opportunity to explain your side of the story. That’s what we’re looking for and we’re looking for the truth. So you understand’ all that? ¶ . . . [The State] argues that, during Petitioner’s third interrogation, Detective Rodriguez provided an ‘enhanced Miranda warning’ that advised Petitioner above what the Miranda warning itself provides by telling Petitioner that his legal counsel would likely advise against making any statements to the police. The detective advised Petitioner, ‘I doubt that if you hire an attorney they’ll let you make a statement, usually they don’t. That’s the way it goes. So, that’s your prerogative, that’s your choice.’ This advice did not inform Mr. Lujan of his constitutional right to counsel. It was improper, unauthorized legal advice.”); United States v. San Juan-Cruz, 314 F.3d 384, 388-89 (9th Cir. 2002) (a Border Patrol agent’s administration of the Miranda warning about the right to a lawyer free of cost was rendered ineffective by the agent’s having previously informed the defendant, who was a Mexican national questioned “about his immigration status and intent,” that he had the right under immigration laws “to have an attorney present during questioning but ‘not at the [G]overnment’s expense’”; “When a warning, not consistent with \textit{Miranda}, is given prior to, after, or simultaneously with a \textit{Miranda} warning, the risk of confusion is substantial, such that the onus is on the Government to clarify to the arrested party the nature of his or her rights under the Fifth Amendment.”); \textit{People v. Dunbar}, 24 N.Y.3d 304, 308, 316, 23 N.E.3d 946, 947-48, 953, 998 N.Y.S.2d 679, 680, 681, 686 (2014) (local booking practice, in which a detective investigator of the D.A.’s office advised suspects that “‘this is your opportunity to tell us your story,’ and ‘your only opportunity’ to do so before going before a judge,” fatally “undermined the subsequently-communicated \textit{Miranda} warnings” by conveying to suspects that “remaining silent or invoking the right to counsel would come at a price – they would be giving up a valuable opportunity to speak with an assistant district attorney, to have their cases investigated or to assert alibi defenses. . . By advising them that speaking would facilitate an investigation, the interrogators implied that these defendants’ words would be used to help them, thus undoing the heart of the warning that anything they said could and would be used against them.”); \textit{People v. Alfonso}, 142 A.D.3d 1180, 1180-81, 38 N.Y.S.3d 566, 568-69 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2016) (the interrogating detective “undermined the \textit{Miranda} warnings and rendered them ineffective” by saying to the defendant that he had “‘an opportunity now to tell [his] side of the story, if [he] want[ed] to,’” and that “‘obviously, anything that you say can also help you and benefit you in certain ways, you know what I mean’ . . ‘potentially’”); “indicat[ing] that in his ‘younger days,’ he [the detective] would have bounced the defendant off ‘about . . . five walls’”; “reiterat[ing] that he was going to give the defendant an opportunity to give his side of the story, and promis[ing] him that he ‘potentially [could] help [himself]’”; and, as “the defendant ultimately began to give a statement, . . . interrupt[ing] him and, referring to the \textit{Miranda} warnings form, [and] indicat[ing] that it was a ‘bullshit form that [he] had to get past’”). A state court is, of course, free to construe its state constitution as requiring strict conformity with the language of \textit{Miranda}. See § 7.09 supra.

\textbf{§ 24.10 VALIDITY OF THE RESPONDENT’S WAIVER OF MIRANDA RIGHTS}

In addition to showing that the respondent received valid \textit{Miranda} warnings (see § 24.09 supra), the prosecution must show that the respondent made a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent waiver of the \textit{Miranda} rights. \textit{Edwards v. Arizona}, 451 U.S. 477, 482-84 (1981); see, e.g., \textit{Garner v. United States}, 424 U.S. 648, 657 (1976) (dictum); \textit{Fare v. Michael C.}, 442 U.S. 707, 724-27 (1979) (dictum); \textit{United States v. Garibay}, 143 F.3d 534 (9th Cir. 1998); \textit{United States v. Lall}, 607 F.3d 1277, 1282-84 (11th Cir. 2010). The element of “voluntariness” is discussed further in § 24.10(a) \textit{infra}, and the “knowing and intelligent” element in § 24.10(b). The waiver must be made by the respondent himself or herself; parents cannot waive \textit{Miranda} rights on behalf of their children. See, e.g., \textit{Smith v. State}, 484 So. 2d 560, 561 (Ala. Crim. App. 1986); \textit{In the Matter of the Welfare of S.W.T.}, 277 N.W.2d 507, 512-13 (Minn. 1979).

A waiver needs not be express: “[I]n at least some cases waiver can be clearly inferred from the actions and words of the person interrogated.” \textit{North Carolina v. Butler}, 441 U.S. 369, 373 (1979). In certain circumstances, “a waiver of Miranda rights may be implied through ‘the defendant’s silence, coupled with an understanding of his rights and a course of conduct indicating waiver.’” Berghuis v. Thompkins, 560 U.S. 370, 385 (2010) (quoting North Carolina v. Butler, 441 U.S. at 369). See Berghuis, 560 U.S. at 385-86 (“[t]he record in this case shows that Thompkins waived his right to remain silent,” notwithstanding the absence of an explicit waiver, because “[t]here was more than enough evidence in the record to conclude that Thompkins understood his Miranda rights” and thus that “he chose not to invoke or rely on those rights when he did speak; Thompkins’s answer to the interrogating officer’s question was ‘a ‘course of conduct indicating waiver’ of the right to remain silent,’” and “there is no evidence that Thompkins’s statement was coerced.”).

For discussion of the state’s burden of persuasion in showing a waiver of Miranda rights, see § 22.03(d)(ii) supra.

§ 24.10(a) The Requirement That Miranda Waivers Be Voluntary

A waiver of Miranda rights, “[o]f course, . . . must at a minimum be ‘voluntary’ to be effective against an accused.” Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 169 (1986) (dictum); Miranda, 384 U.S. at 444, 476. “[T]he relinquishment of the right must have been voluntary in the sense that it was the product of a free and deliberate choice rather than intimidation, coercion, or deception.” Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564, 573 (1987) (dictum); Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 420 (1986) (dictum); Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. at 725.

The Court has indicated that the “indicia of coercion” recognized in the context of the due process issue of the voluntariness of statements (see §§ 24.03-24.05 supra) are also relevant to the voluntariness of a waiver of Miranda rights. See Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. at 573-74; Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 169-70. The decisive question is whether the respondent’s “will [was] overborne and his capacity for self-determination critically impaired” because of coercive police conduct.” Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. at 574. In making that inquiry, the courts may consider: “the duration and conditions of detention . . . the manifest attitude of the police toward . . . [the accused], his physical and mental state, [and] the diverse pressures which sap or sustain his powers of resistance and self-control.” Id. (quoting Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 602 (1961) (opinion of Justice Frankfurter)).

Excessively long detention or detention under oppressive conditions can suffice to render a Miranda waiver involuntary. See § 24.04(b) supra. Miranda says expressly that the fact that an accused’s statement was made after “lengthy interrogation or incommunicado incarceration . . . is inconsistent with any notion of a voluntary relinquishment of the privilege [against self-incrimination],” Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. at 476 (emphasis added). One aspect of incommunicado detention of juveniles that has received substantial attention in the caselaw is denial of access to a parent or other “interested adult.” For discussion of the relevance of this factor in assessing voluntariness of a juvenile’s waiver, see § 24.14 infra.
The voluntariness of a Miranda waiver can also be undermined by a police officer’s use of force or the threat of force (see § 24.04(a) supra) or by police promises of leniency or threats of adverse governmental action (see § 24.04(c) supra). “[E]vidence that the accused was . . . tricked . . . into a waiver will, of course, show that the defendant did not voluntarily waive his [Fifth Amendment] privilege.” Miranda, 384 U.S. at 476. Accord, United States v. Lall, 607 F.3d 1277, 1282-84 (11th Cir. 2010), summarized in § 24.04(d) second paragraph supra. See also Miranda, 384 U.S. at 449-55 (describing the methods by which “interrogators . . . induce a confession out of trickery” (id. at 453)). Cf. Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412 (1986) (accepting the basic proposition that police “‘trick[ery]’ . . . can vitiate the validity of a waiver,” id. at 423, but concluding that police misrepresentations to the suspect’s attorney did not undermine the voluntariness of waivers by a suspect who was unaware of the misrepresentations). And see the discussion of Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564 (1987), in the concluding paragraph of § 24.04(d) supra; see generally Christopher Slobogin, Manipulation of Suspects and Unrecorded Questioning: After 50 Years of Miranda Jurisprudence, Still Two (or Maybe Three) Burning Issues, 97 B.U. L. REV. (forthcoming, 2017), available at https://ssrn.com/abstract=2914588.

As in the due process voluntariness context (see § 24.05 supra), the respondent’s “mental condition is surely relevant to an individual’s susceptibility to police coercion,” Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 165 (dictum); see J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261, 272 (2011) (discussed in § 24.10(b) infra), and thereby to the assessment of the voluntariness of a waiver of Miranda rights. See Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. at 573-74 (dictum); see also Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. at 725 (dictum). A waiver by a juvenile must be scrutinized with “special caution,” In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 45 (1967); see also Miller v. Alabama, 132 S. Ct. 2455, 2464 (2012) (explaining, in the context of criminal sentencing, that the Court has recognized, based on “science and social science” as well as “common sense” and “what ‘any parent knows,’” that “children ‘are more vulnerable . . . to . . . outside pressures’”), especially when the natural vulnerability of youth has been exacerbated by other factors, such as intellectual disability, illiteracy, intoxication, or lack of prior experience with the court system. Counsel should develop any factor bearing on a respondent’s psychological or emotional vulnerability. See, e.g., Rodriguez v. McDonald, 872 F.3d 908, 922-23 (9th Cir. 2017) (14-year-old with “Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder and a ‘borderline’ I.Q. of seventy-seven”); Woods v. Clusen, 794 F.2d 293 (7th Cir. 1986) (16-year-old with no prior court experience); United States v. Blocker, 354 F. Supp. 1195 (D. D.C. 1973) (21-year-old with “low intelligence” and only one prior arrest); In re Estrada, 1 Ariz. App. 348, 403 P.2d 1 (1965) (14-year-old with low level of education and literacy); In re Roderick P., 7 Cal. 3d 801, 500 P.2d 1, 103 Cal. Rptr. 425 (1972) (intellectually disabled 14-year-old with no prior arrests); In re S.W., 124 A.3d 89, 104 (D.C. 2015) (“emphasiz[ing] the role of [the 15-year-old] appellant’s juvenile status” in the court’s conclusion that the interrogating detective’s “veiled threat to throw appellant to the ‘lions’” rendered the youth’s Miranda waiver involuntary; “in the juvenile context, . . . [the courts must exercise ‘special caution’ in conducting a voluntariness analysis.”); In the Interest of Thompson, 241 N.W.2d 2 (Iowa 1976) (17-year-old with an I.Q. of 71); State in the Interest of Holifield, 319 So. 2d 471 (La. App. 1975) (14-year-old with an I.Q. of 67); Commonwealth v. Cain, 361 Mass. 224, 279 N.E.2d 706 (1972) (15-year-old with no prior experience with police, who was denied § 24.10(b) The Requirement That Miranda Waivers Be “Knowing and Intelligent”

A Miranda waiver “must have been made with a full awareness both of the nature of the right being abandoned and the consequences of the decision to abandon it. Only if the ‘totality of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation’ reveal both an uncoerced choice and the requisite level of comprehension may a court properly conclude that the Miranda rights have been waived.” Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 421 (1986) (dictum); see Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564, 573-74 (1987) (dictum).

On the basis of a three-year series of empirical studies of delinquent youth and adult criminal offenders, Grisso concluded that: “[a]s a class, juveniles of ages 14 and below demonstrate incompetence to waive their rights to silence and legal counsel”; and “[a]s a class, juveniles of ages 15 and 16 who have I.Q. scores of 80 or below lack the requisite competence to waive their rights to silence and counsel.” Grisso I at 193-94; Grisso II at 1160. Juveniles aged 15 and 16 with I.Q. scores above 80 exhibited “a level of understanding and perception” comparable to the sample population of 17-to-21 year-olds and thus could not be distinguished as a class from adults; nevertheless, approximately one third to one half of the 15 and 16 year-olds with I.Q. scores above 80 proved incapable of adequately understanding Miranda rights. Grisso I
In a study of sample populations of delinquent and nondelinquent youths, Ferguson and Douglas similarly found that more than 90 per cent of the juveniles failed to fully comprehend Miranda warnings, and that even the use of a simplified version of the language of the Miranda warnings did not remedy these deficiencies in comprehension. Ferguson & Douglas, supra at 53-54.

To test the validity of the findings of psychological studies such as the foregoing in actual interrogation situations, Feld examined “quantitative and qualitative data – interrogation tapes and transcripts, police reports, juvenile court filings, and probation and sentencing reports – of the routine police interrogation of sixty-six juveniles sixteen years of age or older whom prosecutors charged with a felony offense.” Feld, Juveniles’ Competence to Exercise Miranda Rights: An Empirical Study of Policy and Practice, supra at 28. As he explains, the findings of his “study are very consistent with laboratory research . . . [and] tend[ ] to bolster the validity of developmental psychologists’ experimental findings that younger juveniles do not understand their Miranda rights, lack adjudicative competence, and remain at greater risk to give false confessions.” Id. at 99. See also Steven A. Drizin & Richard A. Leo, The Problem of False Confessions in the Post-DNA World, 82 N.C. L. REV. 891, 941-943 (2004), discussed in § 24.05(a) supra.

Some courts have cited such empirical studies as evidence that a substantial portion of the juvenile population is unable to comprehend Miranda warnings. See, e.g., A.M. v. Butler, 360 F.3d 787, 801 n.11 (7th Cir. 2004); State v. Benoit, 126 N.H. 6, 13-14, 490 A.2d 295, 300-01 (1985); In the Matter of B.M.B., 264 Kan. 417, 429-33, 955 P.2d 1302, 1310-13 (1998); Commonwealth v. A Juvenile (No. 1), 389 Mass. 128, 131-32, 449 N.E.2d 654, 656 (1983); see also State in the Interest of S.H., 61 N.J. 108, 115, 293 A.2d 181, 184-85 (1972) (treating it as axiomatic that “[r]ecitation of the Miranda warnings to a boy of 10 even when they are explained is undoubtedly meaningless”); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d 145, 159 n.6, 699 N.W.2d 110, 117 n.6 (2005) (referring generally to “scholarly research” as supporting the proposition that “children are less likely to understand their Miranda rights” “[b]ecause their intellectual capacity is not fully developed”). But cf. State v. Griffin, 273 Conn. 266, 286-87, 869 A.2d 640, 652 (2005) (in holding that the judge at a suppression hearing was not required to admit the testimony of a defense expert who used a protocol developed by Thomas Grisso to evaluate the 14-year-old defendant’s competency to understand Miranda warnings, the Connecticut Supreme Court says: “On the basis of the evidence presented at the suppression hearing, we simply cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in ruling that the Grisso test [i.e., Grisso’s protocol for evaluating competency] did not satisfy the [state law] . . . standard [for admissibility of expert testimony] . . . [but] [o]f course, we do not foreclose the possibility that, in a future case, sufficient evidence regarding the reliability of the Grisso test will be presented such that it may be found to pass muster”). The New Hampshire Supreme Court in State v. Benoit ruled on state constitutional grounds that “before a juvenile can be deemed to have voluntarily, knowingly and intelligently waived” Miranda rights, “he or she must be informed, in language understandable to a child, of his or her rights,” 126 N.H. at 18-19, 490 A.2d at 304, and the court set forth a simplified juvenile rights form in an appendix to its opinion, id. at 22-24, 490 A.2d at 306-07. The Kansas Supreme Court in In the Matter of B.M.B. and the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Commonwealth v. A Juvenile (No. 1) responded to the problem of juveniles’ inability to comprehend Miranda warnings by establishing requirements that a parent or other concerned adult be present during police interrogation, and that the juvenile be permitted to consult with the adult. See § 24.14 infra.

In addressing the relevance of a suspect’s young age for another aspect of the Miranda doctrine – the assessment of whether a suspect is in “custody” for purposes of Miranda (see generally § 24.08(a)) – the Supreme Court in J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261 (2011) observed that “[t]ime and again,” the Court has taken into account the constitutional implications of the inherent immaturity and vulnerability of youth, including in “the specific context of police interrogation”:

“We have observed that children ‘generally are less mature and responsible than adults,’ Eddings, 455 U.S., at 115–116; that they ‘often lack the experience, perspective, and judgment to recognize and avoid choices that could be detrimental to them,’ Bellotti v. Baird, 443 U.S. 622, 635 (1979) (plurality opinion); that they ‘are more vulnerable or susceptible to . . . outside pressures’ than adults, Roper, 543 U.S., at 569; and so on. See Graham v. Florida, 560 U.S. [48, 68,.] . . . (2010) (finding no reason to ‘reconsider’ these observations about the common ‘nature of juveniles’). Addressing the specific context of police interrogation, we have observed that events that ‘would leave a man cold and unimpressed can overawe and overwhelm a lad in his early teens.’ Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596, 599 (1948) (plurality opinion); see also Gallegos v. Colorado, 370 U.S. 49, 54 (1962) (‘[N]o matter how sophisticated,’ a juvenile subject of police interrogation ‘cannot be compared’ to an adult subject). Describing no one child in particular, these observations restate what ‘any parent knows’ – indeed, what any person knows – about children generally. Roper, 543 U.S., at 569.FNS

“ Although citation to social science and cognitive science authorities is unnecessary to establish these commonsense propositions, the literature confirms what experience bears out. See, e.g., Graham v. Florida, [560 U.S. 48, 68.] 130 S. Ct. 2011, 2026 (2010) (‘[D]evelopments in psychology and brain science continue to show fundamental differences between juvenile and adult minds’).”

(J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. at 272-73 & n.5.)

See also Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460, 471 (2012) (explaining that the Court has recognized, based on “science and social science” as well as “common sense” and “what ‘any parent knows,’” that “children are constitutionally different from adults for purposes of sentencing” because, inter alia, “children have a ‘lack of maturity and an underdeveloped sense of responsibility,’” leading to recklessness, impulsivity, and heedless risk-taking,” and “children are more vulnerable . . . to . . . outside pressures’”). The lower courts similarly have recognized that the very nature of adolescence causes juveniles to be less able than adults to weigh consequences and to make informed, meaningful judgments, even on highly important matters. See, e.g., People v. Mitchell, 2 N.Y.3d 272, 275-76, 810 N.E.2d 879, 881-82, 778 N.Y.S.2d 427, 429-30 (2004) (establishing a more protective rule for the invocation of the state constitutional right to counsel in juvenile delinquency and juvenile offender cases because “[c]hildren of tender years lack an adult’s knowledge of the probable cause of their acts or omissions and are least likely to understand the scope of their rights and how to protect their own interests . . . [and they] may not appreciate the ramifications of their decisions or realize all the implications of the importance of counsel”); In the Matter of Benjamin L., 92 N.Y.2d 660, 669, 708 N.E.2d 156, 161, 685 N.Y.S.2d 400, 405 (1999) (establishing a more protective rule for the operation of the state constitutional right to a speedy trial in juvenile delinquency cases because “[t]ypically, a juvenile . . . is unlikely to appreciate the importance of taking affirmative steps toward the ultimate resolution of the case, and is just as unlikely to possess the means and sophistication to do so” and “[m]oreover, many youths in juvenile proceedings suffer from educational handicaps and mental health problems, which undermine their capacity to anticipate a future presentment and to appreciate the need to take self-protective measures”).

The most effective way for counsel to use the published empirical studies in an individual case is by presenting expert testimony that combines a discussion of the general statistics with a finding by a psychiatrist or psychologist, based upon a clinical examination of the respondent, that this particular youth is unable to comprehend the Miranda warnings in the form in which they were administered to him or her by the police. Social scientists have developed forensic tests for assessing a juvenile’s ability to comprehend Miranda rights; counsel can find an expert conversant with such tests by consulting local psychiatrists and psychologists and the relevant departments of the state university. Cf. In re Ariel R., 98 A.D.3d 414, 417, 419, 950 N.Y.S.2d 17, 21 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2012) (respondent’s treating psychiatrist, who was called as a witness for the defense at a confession suppression hearing, should have been allowed to “render an opinion as to whether appellant could have understood the juvenile Miranda warnings read to him”; although the psychiatrist “did not perform any tests on appellant that were specifically designed to determine appellant’s competency to waive Miranda,” the psychiatrist’s “evaluations of appellant’s receptive communication skills and IQ . . . [were] sufficient to enable him to form an opinion as to the ultimate question of whether appellant had adequate language and cognitive skills to understand the Miranda warnings.”); Smith v. State, 918 A.2d 1144 (Del. 2007) (the denial of a suppression motion presented without the benefit of expert testimony was required to be reversed in the light of expert testimony presented at a subsequent competency hearing). For general discussion of the use of expert witnesses and the right to court funds for retention of experts when representing indigent respondents, see Chapter 11 and §§ 12.08-12.10 supra.

To put together a persuasive presentation, counsel also should obtain the respondent’s school records and should consult any teachers who could testify regarding the respondent’s reading and comprehension abilities. If the child is in special education classes because of his or her learning disabilities or educational deficits, there may be extensive evaluations in the child’s school file, and counsel should consider presenting the testimony of the special education teachers who prepared the reports. See, e.g., Cooper v. Griffin, 455 F.2d 1142 (5th Cir. 1972) (on the basis of special education teachers’ testimony concerning the low I.Q. scores and comprehension levels of the juvenile defendants, the court concludes that their Miranda waivers were not “knowing and intelligent”).

Counsel should also consider putting the respondent on the witness stand at the suppression hearing to testify about his or her understanding of the meaning of the various Miranda warnings. Such testimony can be dramatic and persuasive, providing the judge with a first-hand view of the child’s limitations. See, e.g., State in the Interest of Holifield, 319 So. 2d 471, 472-73 (La. App. 1975).

Other personal characteristics of a respondent that were identified in previous sections as bearing on the voluntariness of a statement (see § 24.05 supra) and the voluntariness of a Miranda waiver (see § 24.10(a) supra) also are relevant to a determination of whether a respondent’s waiver of Miranda rights was “knowing and intelligent.” Thus, a respondent may have been unable to comprehend the language employed in Miranda warnings and/or the concepts embodied in the warnings because of:

(i) Intellectual disability. See, e.g., Cooper v. Griffin, 455 F.2d 1142, 1145-46 (5th Cir. 1972) (two juveniles, who were 15 and 16 years old, and whose I.Q. “was said to range between 61 and 67” (id. at 1145) “could not have made a ‘knowing and intelligent’ waiver of their rights” (id. at 1146): they “surely had no appreciation of the options before them or of the consequences of their choice. Indeed it is doubtful that they even comprehended all of the words that were read them” (id.)); People v. Jiminez, 863 P.2d 981, 982, 985 (Colo. 1993) (the defendant who was found by a psychologist to be “‘function[ing] at about the 6 year old level,’” and who had never been to school and had “‘a very limited vocabulary,’” did not make a “knowing and intelligent” waiver of his Miranda rights); Smith v. State, 918 A.2d 1144 (Del. 2007) (an intellectually disabled 14-year-old, who “was functioning at a second grade level” (id. at 1151), “could not sign his name because he did not know how” (id.) and who “could not read the Miranda warnings himself, [and] so was given a quick and confusing explanation of what they supposedly meant” (id.) did not make a “knowing” waiver of his Miranda rights (id.)); State v. Thorpe, 274 N.C. 457, 461, 164 S.E.2d 171, 174 (1968) (an intellectually disabled 20-year-old, “who had left school before he completed the third grade,” did not make a valid waiver of his right to counsel during questioning).

(ii) Mental illness. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Hilton, 443 Mass. 597, 603, 607, 823 N.E.2d 383, 390, 393 (2005) (defendant who “suffer[ed] from schizophrenia and ha[d] a schizotypal personality disorder,” did not understand “the Miranda warnings” and thus could not have made a “knowing and intelligent” waiver).
(iii) Intoxication or the effects of drugs. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Anderl, 329 Pa. Super. 69, 81, 477 A.2d 1356, 1362 (1984) (“we conclude that the appellee’s waiver of his Miranda rights was vitiated by his intoxication and that the statements made by the appellee while in custody should be suppressed”); State v. Young, 117 N.M. 688, 692, 875 P.2d 1119, 1123 (1994) (“[V]oluntary intoxication is relevant to determining whether a waiver was knowing and intelligent. See . . . 1 Wayne R. LaFave & Jerold H. Israel, Criminal Procedure § 6.9, at 527 (1984). On remand, the trial court shall consider the evidence of Defendant’s intoxication in determining whether Defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his rights.”); State v. Kinn, 288 Minn. 31, 36, 178 N.W.2d 888, 891 (1970), partially overruled on other grounds, State v. Herem, 384 N.W.2d 880 (Minn. 1986) (“The lower court’s attention is called to the fact that the evidence indicates that defendant was obviously intoxicated during all of the time that the investigation and arrest took place. In view of this circumstance, the court should consider the evidence as it bears upon the question of whether defendant was mentally competent to waive his constitutional rights at any point.”); People v. Knedler, 329 P.3d 242, 245-46 (Colo. 2014) (recognizing that “a defendant’s level of intoxication at the time of the Miranda advisement is relevant to a waiver’s validity” and that a defendant may be so “intoxicated that he or she could not have made a knowing and intelligent waiver,” and explaining the “set of subfactors to [be used in] assess[ing] a defendant’s competence in cases involving intoxication,” but ultimately concluding that the totality of the circumstances adequately established that “Knedler’s decision to waive his rights was informed and deliberate”).

Even if a respondent had the intellectual capacity to comprehend Miranda warnings, there will be substantial questions about whether a waiver was “knowing and intelligent” in any case in which s/he was not a native English speaker and in which the Miranda warnings were read to him or her in English rather than in his or her native language. See, e.g., United States v. Barry, 979 F. Supp. 2d 715, 719 (M.D. La. 2013) (a Miranda waiver was not voluntary, knowing and intelligent because “the warnings were not in Barry’s native tongue, there was no use of a translator, the rights were not explained to him at length, and his understanding was assumed but not confirmed”); see also United States v. Botello-Rosales, 728 F.3d 865, 867-68 (9th Cir. 2013) (per curiam), summarized in § 24.09 fourth paragraph supra.

§ 24.11 STATEMENTS TAKEN AFTER THE RESPONDENT HAS ASSERTED HIS OR HER MIRANDA RIGHTS TO SILENCE OR COUNSEL

The discussion in § 24.10 supra described the normal standard for assessing waivers of Miranda rights. If, instead of making an immediate and final waiver of Miranda rights, the respondent asserts at any time the right to silence or the right to counsel, there are more stringent standards for determining the validity of any subsequent Miranda waivers.
Provided that the respondent has used language adequate to assert the right (see § 24.11(a) infra), the standard to be applied following an assertion of the right to silence is the one discussed in § 24.11(b) infra, and the standard to be applied after an assertion of the right to counsel is the one discussed in § 24.11(c) infra.

§ 24.11(a) Sufficiency of the Language Used in Asserting the Right

An assertion of Miranda rights needs not expressly refer to the rights: As long as the respondent’s statements manifest a “clear indication[ ]” of his or her desire to exercise a particular right, they are sufficient to invoke the right. Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 404-05, 412 n.1 (1977) (discussing invocation of the right to counsel); Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. at 444-45 (the right to counsel is asserted whenever the suspect “indicates in any manner” that s/he wants a lawyer); Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 459 (1994) (dictum) (the right to counsel is invoked if a suspect makes a “‘statement that can reasonably be construed to be an expression of a desire for the assistance of an attorney’”). See, e.g., Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975) (by implication) (the right to silence was invoked when a suspect told the police that he did not want to say “[a]nything about the robberies,” id. at 105 n.11); Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. 91 (1984) (per curiam) (the right to counsel was invoked when, in response to administration of Miranda warnings, defendant said: “‘Uh, yeah, I’d like to do that,’” id. at 93). See also Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675, 681-84 (1988); Connecticut v. Barrett, 479 U.S. 523, 529 (1987) (dictum); Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938); Jones v. Harrington, 829 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir. 2016) (the defendant “simply and unambiguously” invoked the right to silence (id. at 1142) by saying, after “hours of questioning,” “‘I don’t want to talk no more’” (id. at 1132), which “means the government cannot use against Jones anything he said after his invocation. And that includes using Jones’s subsequent statements to ‘cast retrospective doubt on the clarity of [Jones’s] initial request itself.’” (id.)); Garcia v. Long, 808 F.3d 771 (9th Cir. 2015) (the defendant asserted his right to silence by responding to the officer’s question “‘do you wish to talk to me?’” with “a simple ‘no’” (id. at 773); notwithstanding “other statements Garcia made during the interview” (id.), “‘no’ meant ‘no.’” (id.)); Hurd v. Terhune, 619 F.3d 1080, 1088-89 (9th Cir. 2010) (“Hurd unambiguously invoked his right to silence when the officers requested that he reenact the shooting . . . [and] Hurd responded to the officers’ requests by saying, among other things, ‘I don’t want to do that,’ ‘No,’ ‘I can’t,’ and ‘I don’t want to act it out because that – it’s not that clear.’”); United States v. Rodriguez, 518 F.3d 1072, 1077-78, 1081 (9th Cir. 2008) (the defendant, who responded to a question whether he wanted to talk to a law enforcement official by stating “‘I’m good for tonight,’” had “at best, [made] an ambiguous invocation of the right to silence,” but his subsequent statement had to be suppressed “because his interrogator failed to clarify [defendant’s] . . . wishes with regard to his Miranda warnings” before commencing interrogation); Anderson v. Terhune, 516 F.3d 781, 787 (9th Cir. 2008) (en banc) (“Following the issuance of Miranda in 1966 and the literally thousands of cases that repeat its rationale, we rarely have occasion to address a situation in which the defendant not only uses the facially unambiguous words ‘I plead the Fifth,’ but surrounds that invocation with a clear desire not to talk any more. The state court accurately recognized that under Miranda, ‘if [an] individual indicates in any manner, at any time prior to or during questioning, that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease,’ . . . but then went on to eviscerate that conclusion by stating that the comments were ‘ambiguous in context ¶ . . . because they could have been interpreted as not wanting officers to pursue the particulars of his drug use as opposed to not wanting to continue the questioning at all. By asking defendant what he meant by pleading the fifth, the officer asked a legitimate clarifying question.[’] ¶ Using ‘context’ to transform an unambiguous invocation into open-ended ambiguity defies both common sense and established Supreme Court law. It is not that context is unimportant, but it simply cannot be manufactured by straining to raise a question regarding the intended scope of a facially unambiguous invocation of the right to silence.”); Deviney v. State, 112 So. 3d 57 (Fla. 2013) (a suspect’s repeated declarations during interrogation that he was “done” and “ready to go home” (id. at 77) “represented an unequivocal invocation of his right to remain silent” (id.) particularly when “Deviney further indicated his desire to end questioning by standing and attempting to leave the interrogation room” (id. at 78)); State v. Maltese, 222 N.J. 525, 546, 120 A.3d 197, 209 (2015) (the “defendant affirmatively asserted his right to remain silent” by “repeatedly stat[ing] that he wanted to speak with his uncle, whom he considered ‘better than a freaking attorney,’ before answering any further questions,” and “specifically stat[ing] that he wanted to consult with his uncle about ‘what to do’”); State v. King, 300 P.3d 732, 733 (N.M. 2013) (“King clearly invoked his right to remain silent” (id. at 735) when he responded to the officer’s inquiry “‘Do you wish to answer any questions?’” by stating “‘Not at the moment. Kind of intoxicated.’” (id. at 733): “There is nothing ambiguous about his statement, which made it clear that he did not want to speak with the police. The adverb ‘not’ is unequivocally a negative expression” (id. at 735); “Although King’s statement suggested that he might want to talk at a later time, there was absolutely no respite from the interrogation in this case (id. at 736)”; § 24.11(c) infra (further discussing the standards governing the invocation of the right to counsel).

In determining whether the words used by the respondent constituted an assertion of Miranda rights, the courts may properly take into account the “age and experience of a juvenile.” Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707, 725 (1979). See, e.g., In the Interest of Thompson, 241 N.W.2d 2, 7 (Iowa 1976) (17-year-old with low I.Q. asserted the right to counsel when, in response to a police inquiry whether he had a lawyer, he named an attorney; the court observes that such a child “should not be expected to persistently, repeatedly and articulately invoke his constitutional rights before they will be recognized”).

Newly arrested juveniles frequently ask to speak to their parents, and some juveniles who are already on probation ask to speak to their probation officer. In Fare v. Michael C., the Court rejected the argument that a request to speak with one’s probation officer can “constitute[ ] a per se request to remain silent,” 442 U.S. at 723, or a request for counsel, id. at 722-23. However, the Court recognized that in a particular case, the “age and experience of a juvenile [may] indicate that his request for his probation officer or his parents is, in fact, an invocation of [the] . . . right to remain silent.” Id. at 725. Accord, United States ex rel. Riley v. Franzen, 653 F.2d 1153 (7th Cir. 1981) (recognizing that, in an appropriate case, a juvenile’s request for a parent could constitute either an invocation of the right to silence or the right to counsel); In the Matter of H.V., 252 S.W.3d 319, 326-27 (Tex. 2008) (sixteen-year-old unambiguously asserted the right to counsel by asking to speak to his mother and then, in response to a police denial of that request, stating that he “wanted his mother to ask for an attorney”). See also People v. Rivera, 41 Cal. 3d 388, 710 P.2d 362, 221 Cal. Rptr. 562 (1985) (ruling on state constitutional grounds that a juvenile suspect’s request to speak with a parent will be deemed a per se invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination and will bar further interrogation).

If the respondent’s initial assertion is adequately clear, then it is not rendered ambiguous by subsequent statements indicating a willingness to speak with the police. Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. 91 (1984) (per curiam). Accord, Jones v. Harrington, 829 F.3d at 1132, 1136, 1140. Such “subsequent statements are relevant only to the question whether the accused [later] waived the right he had invoked. Invocation and waiver are entirely distinct inquiries, and the two must not be blurred.” Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. at 98.

The courts will honor a partial assertion of Miranda rights and give effect to the limitations established by the suspect if those limitations are clearly and unequivocally stated. Thus, in Connecticut v. Barrett, 479 U.S. 523 (1987), the Court recognized that the defendant’s statement “he was willing to talk about [the incident] verbally but he did not want to put anything in writing until his attorney came,” id. at 526, constituted an invocation of the right to counsel with respect to written, but not oral, statements. See also United States v. Jumper, 497 F.3d 699, 706 (7th Cir. 2007) (the defendant asserted his right to silence with respect to specific questions by saying, in answer to these questions, “I don’t want to answer that’.

The respondent can invoke his or her right to silence or to counsel even after initially waiving such rights. “The mere fact that he may have answered some questions or volunteered some statements on his own does not deprive him of the right to refrain from answering any further inquiries until he has consulted with an attorney and thereafter consents to be questioned.” Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. at 444-45.

§ 24.11(b)  Assertion of the Right to Silence

“If the individual indicates in any manner, at any time prior to or during questioning, that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease.” Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. at 473-74; see Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96, 100-01 (1975) (dictum). However, this does not mean that an arrested individual who has once declined to answer questions “can never again be subjected to custodial interrogation by any police officer at any time or place on any subject.” Mosley, 423 U.S. at 102.

In Mosley, the Court sustained the admission of a murder confession by a defendant, notwithstanding his earlier assertion of his right to silence, because the unusual facts of the case showed that his assertion had been “scrupulously honored” (id. at 104) by the police. The defendant had been arrested for several robberies and, upon administration of full Miranda warnings, told the arresting officer that he did not want to say “[a]nything about the robberies.” Id. at 105 n.11. The arresting officer respected that assertion of the right to silence by “promptly cess[ing] the interrogation,” id. at 97, and the defendant was never again questioned about the robberies for which he had been arrested. See id. at 105-06. “After an interval of more than two hours,” id. at 104, the defendant was taken from his cell to “another location” in the building, id., “by another police officer,” id., who was not shown to have had any connection with the earlier questioning, see id. at 105. This second police officer gave the defendant another complete set of Miranda warnings and then questioned the defendant “about an unrelated holdup murder.” Id. at 104. In response to the second administration of Miranda warnings, the defendant signed a Miranda “notification form” and then proceeded to answer questions, initially denying the murder and then, within 15 minutes, admitting guilt. See id. at 98. During all of these proceedings the defendant never asked to see a lawyer. Id. at 101 n.7. The Supreme Court held that “the admissibility of statements obtained after [a] . . . person in custody has decided to remain silent depends under Miranda on whether his ‘right to cut off questioning’ was ‘scrupulously honored,’” id. at 104, and that, on this record, Mosley’s “‘right to cut off questioning’ was fully respected,” id. “This is not a case . . . where the police failed to honor a decision of a person in custody to cut off questioning, either by refusing to discontinue the interrogation upon request or by persisting in repeated efforts to wear down his resistance and make him change his mind.” Id. at 105-06.

Under Mosley, the courts will find that the police failed to “scrupulously honor” a suspect’s invocation of the right to remain silent and will suppress any ensuing statement if the police (a) do not cease questioning as soon as the suspect invokes his or her right to silence, see, e.g., Anderson v. Smith, 751 F.2d 96, 102-03 (2d Cir. 1984); State v. Aguirre, 301 Kan. 950, 349 P.3d 1245 (2015), or (b) engage in “repeated rounds of questioning to undermine the will of the person being questioned,” Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. at 102; see, e.g., United States v. Hernandez, 574 F.2d 1362, 1368-69 (5th Cir. 1978); United States v. Rambo, 365 F.3d 906, 910-911 (10th Cir. 2004) (“If Rambo invoked his right to remain silent and Moran failed to ‘scrupulously honor[ ]’ that right, Rambo’s confession must be suppressed. . . . The government contends that it was Rambo who reinitiated communication after invoking his right to remain silent and, therefore, Moran was not required to terminate the interview. That argument ignores Moran’s active role in continuing the interview after Rambo invoked his rights. When Rambo stated that he did not want to discuss the robberies, Moran made no move to end the encounter. Instead he acknowledged Rambo’s request, but told Rambo that he would be charged with two aggravated robberies and that other agencies would want to speak with Rambo. Those comments reflect both further pressure on Rambo to discuss the crimes and a suggestion that despite Rambo’s present request to terminate discussion of the topic, he would be questioned further.”); People v. Jackson, 103 A.D.3d 814, 816-17, 959 N.Y.S.2d 540, 543 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013) (an “arresting officer failed to ‘scrupulously honor’ the defendant’s [assertion of the right to silence] . . . when he deliberately engaged the defendant in conversation . . . [and] told the defendant that, unless someone confessed to ownership of the gun, all three occupants of the car would be charged with its possession, . . . [thereby] engaging in the functional equivalent of interrogation in that he knew or should have known that his comments were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response”).
When litigating cases in which interrogation was resumed after a respondent’s assertion of the right to silence, counsel may be advised to seek a state constitutional ruling forbidding such a resumption even under circumstances in which Mosley would allow it. See, e.g., State v. O’Neill, 193 N.J. 148, 176-78, 936 A.2d 438, 454-55 (2007); and see generally § 7.09 supra.

§ 24.11(c)  Assertion of the Right to Counsel

“[W]e . . . hold that when an accused has invoked his right to have counsel present during custodial interrogation, a valid waiver of that right cannot be established by showing only that he responded to further police-initiated custodial interrogation even if he has been advised of his rights. We further hold that an accused, . . . having expressed his desire to deal with the police only through counsel, is not subject to further interrogation by the authorities until counsel has been made available to him, unless the accused himself initiates further communication, exchanges, or conversations with the police.” (Id. at 484-85.)

See also Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146, 150 (1990); Shea v. Louisiana, 470 U.S. 51, 54-55 (1985); Moore v. Berghuis, 700 F.3d 882 (6th Cir. 2012) (a murder suspect turned himself in and asked the police to call the number on his attorney’s business card; an officer called and got the attorney’s answering service; the officer told the suspect that he had reached only the attorney’s answering device, not the attorney. (Id. at 884.) The officer then “‘asked [Moore] did he want to talk to [the officer] and [Moore] said yes he did.’ The officer . . . then had Moore sign a form waiving his constitutional rights, and ‘asked [Moore] could he tell [the officer] about . . . the fatal shooting . . . .’” (Id. at 888.) “[T]o demonstrate that Moore waived his asserted right to counsel and was therefore ‘not subject to further interrogation by the authorities until counsel [was] made available to him,’ the government must have shown that Moore ‘himself initiate[d] further communication, exchanges, or conversations with the police.’ Edwards, . . . Though the Supreme Court in [Berghuis v. Thompkins, 560 U.S. 370 (2010), summarized in § 24.10] recently addressed the issue of waiver of Miranda rights, we do not read Tompkins’s waiver analysis to alter the Edwards rule regarding waiver of the right to counsel. In Tompkins, the Court did not alter, or even speak to, the Edwards analysis regarding the waiver of the right to counsel; instead, Tompkins clarifies the waiver analysis for the right to remain silent.” 700 F.3d at 888.; Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 458 (1994) (dictum); McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 176-77 (1991) (dictum); Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778, 794-95 (2009) (dictum). But see Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98, 109, 110 (2010) (the Edwards rule does not bar “reinterrogat[i]on] after a break in custody that is of sufficient duration to dissipate . . . [the] coercive effects” of the initial period of “Miranda custody”; this will ordinarily be the case when the “break in custody” has been at least “14 days,” a period of time that “provides plenty of time for the suspect to get reacclimated to his normal life, to consult with friends and counsel, and to shake off any residual coercive effects of his prior custody.”).

“Edwards set forth a ‘bright-line rule’ that all questioning must cease after an accused requests counsel.” Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. 91, 98 (1984) (per curiam). “Edwards is ‘designed to prevent police from badgering a defendant into waiving his previously asserted Miranda rights.’ . . . The rule ensures that any statement made in subsequent interrogation is not the result of coercive pressures.” Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. at 150-51. See also Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. at 97-99 (rejecting arguments that a request for counsel made partway through the administration of Miranda warnings was insufficient to trigger the Edwards rule and that equivocations in the suspect’s responses to the remaining warnings could be considered as rendering his initial request for counsel ambiguous). “The Edwards rule . . . is not offense specific: Once a suspect invokes the Miranda right to counsel for interrogation regarding one offense, he may not be reapproached regarding any offense unless counsel is present.” McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. at 177 (dictum). Accord, Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675, 682 (1988).

“Invocation of the Miranda right to counsel ‘requires, at a minimum, some statement that can reasonably be construed to be an expression of a desire for the assistance of an attorney.’ . . . [I]f a suspect makes a reference to an attorney that is ambiguous or equivocal in that a reasonable officer in light of the circumstances would have understood only that the suspect might be invoking the right to counsel, . . . [the Supreme Court’s] precedents do not require the cessation of questioning. . . . Although a suspect need not ‘speak with the discrimination of an Oxford don,’ . . . he must articulate his desire to have counsel present sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request for an attorney.” Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. at 459. See also id. at 462 (upholding determination of “courts below . . . that . . . [Davis]’ remark to the . . . agents – ‘Maybe I should talk to a lawyer’ – was not a request for counsel” and that the agents could continue questioning “to clarify whether [Davis] . . . in fact wanted a lawyer”); Connecticut v. Barrett, 479 U.S. 523, 529 (1987) (the Edwards rule was not triggered by a defendant’s announcement that he would not give the police a written statement unless his lawyer was present but had no problem in talking about the incident: “Barrett’s limited requests for counsel . . . were accompanied by affirmative announcements of his willingness to speak with the authorities.”); People v. Nelson, 53 Cal. 4th 367, 381, 266 P.3d 1008, 1019, 135 Cal. Rptr. 3d 312, 325 (2012) (“Where, as here, a juvenile has made a valid waiver of his Miranda rights and has agreed to questioning, a postwaiver request for a parent is insufficient to halt questioning unless the circumstances are such that a reasonable officer would understand that the juvenile is actually invoking – as opposed to might be invoking – the right to counsel or silence.”). Compare Sessoms v. Grounds, 776 F.3d 615, 617-18, 630-31 (9th Cir. 2015) (en banc) (the defendant’s question to the interrogating officers “‘There wouldn’t be any possible way that I could have a – a lawyer present while we do this?’” combined with his follow-up statement “‘that’s what my dad asked me to ask you guys . . . uh, give me a lawyer,’” constituted “an unambiguous request for counsel, which should have cut off any further questioning”); United States v. Hunter, 708 F.3d 938, 948 (7th Cir. 2013) (“Given the decisive language and the prior context of Hunter’s request to Detective Karzin, we find that Hunter’s request, ‘Can you call my attorney?’ was an unambiguous and unequivocal request for counsel”); United States v. Wysinger, 683 F.3d 784, 795-96 (7th Cir. 2012) (defendant unequivocally invoked his right to counsel in an exchange with the interrogating officer that began with the defendant’s asking “I mean, do you think I should have a lawyer? At this point?” to which the officer responded “If you want an attorney, by all means, get one,” and the defendant replied “I mean, but can I call one now? That’s what I’m saying.”); Wood v. Ercole, 644 F.3d 83, 92 (2d Cir. 2011) (the defendant “unambiguously asserted his right to counsel” by saying ‘I think I should get a lawyer’”); Yenawine v. Motley, 402 Fed. Appx. 997, 998 (6th Cir. 2010) (defendant’s request for counsel was sufficient to trigger Edwards’s protection and to require the exclusion of his inculpatory statement where “(1) the . . . [defendant] was under police interrogation when he stated, ‘[M]aybe I should talk to an attorney’; (2) the . . . [defendant] named his attorney and gave the police officer his attorney's business card; and (3) shortly thereafter, the police continued questioning the . . . [defendant] and he gave a statement”); Ballard v. State, 420 Md. 480, 491, 24 A.3d 96, 102 (2011) (the defendant “unambiguous[ly] and unequivocal[ly] assert[ed] . . . the right to counsel” by stating: “You mind if I not say no more and just talk to an attorney about this”); People v. Slocum, 133 A.D.3d 972, 975-76, 20 N.Y.S.3d 440, 444 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2015) (the defendant unequivocally invoked his right to counsel by responding to the officer’s question “‘if he felt that he should have an attorney or if he wanted to be represented by the Public Defender’s office’” by saying “‘Yeah, probably.’”).

“If a suspect requests counsel [with the degree of clarity described in the preceding paragraph] at any time during the interview, he is not subject to further questioning until a lawyer has been made available or the suspect himself reinitiates conversation.” Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. at 458 (dictum). With the sole exception of the situation in which the suspect has “reinitiate[d] conversation,” the invocation of the Miranda right to counsel “bar[s] police-initiated interrogation unless the accused has counsel with him at the time of questioning.” Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. at 153. See also id. (“when counsel is requested, interrogation must cease, and officials may not reinitiate interrogation without counsel present, whether or not the accused has consulted with his attorney”).

In order to sustain the admissibility of an incriminating statement under the Edwards exception for a suspect’s reinitiation of discussions with the police, the prosecution must show not only that the respondent took the initiative in resuming the interchange by broaching or specifically requesting further conversation with police officers or prosecuting authorities but also that, in the ensuing interchange, any responses made by the respondent to police interrogation (as defined in § 24.08(b) supra) manifested a valid waiver of the rights to remain silent and to have counsel (under the standards described in § 24.10 supra). See Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. at 156 (“Edwards does not foreclose” further police questioning if “the accused . . . initiated the conversation or discussions with the authorities” and if there was “a waiver of Fifth Amendment protections”); Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. at 94-95 (“if the accused invoked his right to counsel, courts may admit his responses to further questioning only on finding that he (a) initiated further discussions with the police, and (b) knowingly and intelligently waived the right he had invoked”); Oregon v. Bradshaw, 462 U.S. 1039, 1044 (1983) (plurality opinion) (dictum) (“even if a conversation . . . is initiated by the accused, where reinterrogation follows, the burden remains upon the prosecution to show that subsequent events indicated a waiver of the Fifth Amendment right to have counsel present during the interrogation”); Rodriguez v. McDonald, 872 F.3d 908, 924-25 (9th Cir. 2017) (“[B]y suggesting to Mr. Rodriguez that he would be imminently charged with murder but that cooperation would result in more lenient treatment from the court, the probation office, and from the police themselves, the officers ‘effectively told [Mr. Rodriguez] he would be penalized if he exercised rights guaranteed to him under the Constitution of the United States.’ . . . Because this pressure followed Mr. Rodriguez’s invocation of his right to counsel, it constituted ‘badgering’ in direct violation of Miranda and Edwards. . . . Particularly in light of Mr. Rodriguez’s special vulnerabilities to coercion [due to his young age of 14, Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder, and “borderline” I.Q. of 77], . . . we hold that these coercive police tactics overbore Mr. Rodriguez’s will, and that his waiver of his previously invoked right to counsel was not voluntary.”); Benjamin v. State, 116 So. 3d 115, 123 (Miss. 2013) (even if the police officer’s post-assertion interactions with the 14-year-old suspect had been initiated by the suspect himself rather than improperly engineered by the officer, the resulting statement nonetheless would have to be suppressed because “we cannot say that the record demonstrates that Benjamin’s waiver was made with full awareness of the nature of the right and the consequences of abandoning it”: “Benjamin’s youth rendered him particularly susceptible to parental pressure” and “[i]t is manifestly apparent that Benjamin conceded to pressure from his mother and to his desire to avoid a night in jail in deciding to waive his rights.”).

The Supreme Court has not yet established definitive criteria for the kind of communication from a detained individual to his or her custodians that will satisfy the “initiation” prong of the Edwards rule. In Oregon v. Bradshaw, the Court split 4-to-4 on whether a defendant’s question to officers “‘Well, what is going to happen to me now?’” manifested a “willingness and a desire for a generalized discussion about the investigation” or was “merely a necessary inquiry arising out of the incidents of the custodial relationship” that could not “be fairly said to represent a desire on the part of an accused to open up a more generalized discussion relating directly or indirectly to the investigation.” 462 U.S. at 1045-46 (plurality opinion). The confession in Bradshaw was held admissible, but only through the concurring vote of Justice Powell, who adopted an analysis that was rejected by all eight other members of the Court.

In applying the “initiation” requirement, the lower courts have found waivers to be invalid when the police prompted or stimulated the suspect’s initiation of communications by, for example, reciting incriminating evidence in detail, see, e.g., Wainwright v. State, 504 A.2d 1096 (Del. 1986); Koza v. State, 718 P.2d 671 (Nev. 1986), or informing the suspect that his or her accomplices have given confessions incriminating him or her, see, e.g., State v. Quinn, 64 Md. App. 668, 498 A.2d 676 (1985), or telling the suspect about further investigation that police officers are conducting to gather incriminating evidence, State v. McKnight, 131 Hawai’i 379.
§ 24.12 APPLICABILITY OF MIRANDA REQUIREMENTS TO INTERROGATION BY SCHOOL OFFICIALS OR PRIVATE CITIZENS

Questioning by any “agent of the State” falls within Miranda. See, e.g., Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454, 466-67 (1981) (“That [the defendant] . . . was questioned by a psychiatrist designated by the trial court to conduct a neutral competency examination, rather than by a police officer, government informant, or prosecuting attorney, is immaterial,” once the answers to the questioning are sought to be used against the defendant at trial); Jackson v. Conway, 763 F.3d 115, 138-40 (2d Cir. 2014) (Miranda requirements applied to a Child Protective Services caseworker’s post-arrest questioning of the defendant “in connection with ‘an independent civil investigation for possible family court action.’”); “While her investigation was civil in nature, if she discovered during the course of that investigation that [the defendant] sexually abused [the complainant], [the Child Protective Services worker] was required by New York law to report that finding to the ‘appropriate local law enforcement’ authorities.”); United States v. Fowler, 476 F.2d 1091 (7th Cir. 1973) (interrogation of a juvenile by a postal inspector is controlled by Miranda). Questioning by a private citizen is also subject to the Miranda requirements if the citizen acted at the behest of, or in conjunction with, the police. See, e.g., People v. Jones, 47 N.Y.2d 528, 533, 393 N.E.2d 443, 445, 419 N.Y.S.2d 447, 450 (1979) (the state cannot avoid the Miranda “restrictions by using a private individual as its agent . . . nor can it claim that only a private act is involved when government officers, subject to constitutional limitations, have participated in the act”); see also Broom v. United States, 118 A.3d 207, 212-16 (D.C. 2015) (the statements and behavior of the defendant’s companion, which “contributed materially to an atmosphere of coercion and custody” for purposes of the Miranda rule, were “attributable to the police”: “the officers had made a statement that would reasonably be understood as a highly coercive threat to take . . . the child [of the defendant’s companion, Ms. Hagans] into state custody, which predictably led Ms. Hagans to cry and beg [the defendant] Mr. Broom to cooperate with the officers; and Mr. Broom would reasonably have viewed Ms. Hagans’s implicit accusation as strengthening the evidence that the officers had against Mr. Broom”); cf. In the Matter of Raymond W., 44 N.Y.2d 438, 439, 377 N.E.2d 471, 472, 406 N.Y.S.2d 27, 28 (1978) (coercive influence by a parent upon a child during interrogation would lose its private character if the parent acted “at the behest or on behalf of the prosecutor”). For discussion of this doctrine in other contexts, see § 24.06 supra (due process voluntariness); § 23.36 supra (Fourth Amendment); § 24.13(b) infra (Sixth Amendment).

While school officials are clearly “representatives of the State” (cf. New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 336 (1985)) for purposes of Miranda, the application of the Miranda rule to the school setting requires resolution of the separate threshold issue whether the school setting is sufficiently “custodial” (see § 24.08(a) supra) to trigger Miranda protections. In holding in Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984), that a probation interview in the probation officer’s office was not “custodial” for Miranda purposes, the Court indicated the factors to be considered in assessing whether a nonpolice setting is custodial:

“Custodial arrest is said to convey to the suspect a message that he has no choice but to submit to the officers’ will and to confess. . . . It is unlikely that a probation interview, arranged by appointment at a mutually convenient time, would give rise to a similar impression. Moreover, custodial arrest thrusts an individual into “an unfamiliar atmosphere”or “an interrogation environment . . . created for no purpose other than to subjugate the individual to the will of his examiner.” . . . Many of the psychological ploys discussed in Miranda capitalize on the suspect’s unfamiliarity with the officers and the environment. Murphy’s regular meetings with his probation officer should have served to familiarize him with her and her office and to insulate him from psychological intimidation that might overbear his desire to claim the privilege. Finally, the coercion inherent in custodial interrogation derives in large measure from an interrogator’s insinuations that the interrogation will continue until a confession is obtained. . . . Since Murphy was not physically restrained and could have left the office, any compulsion he might have felt from the possibility that terminating the meeting would have led to revocation of probation was not comparable to the pressure on a suspect who is painfully aware that he literally cannot escape a persistent custodial interrogator.” (465 U.S. at 433.)

When a similar analysis is applied to interrogation of students inside a principal’s or assistant principal’s office, it becomes evident that such a setting, unlike the probation interview considered in Murphy, is “custodial.” A mandatory directive to leave class and report to the principal’s office stands in sharp contrast to “a probation interview, arranged by appointment at a mutually convenient time.” Id. The principal’s office is hardly a familiar or supportive setting for a student, since students normally are called into the office for disciplinary reasons. Given children’s susceptibility to intimidation (see §§ 24.05(a), 24.10 supra) and the principal’s unique position of authority over the children in his or her school, there is a high probability of “psychological intimidation that might overbear [the child’s] desire to claim the [Fifth Amendment] privilege.” 465 U.S. at 433. Finally, children ordered to report to a principal’s office do not have the luxury of simply leaving the office at any time they choose; rather, they are “painfully aware that [they] . . . literally cannot escape a persistent custodial interrogator.” Id. Accordingly, the logic of Murphy calls for the application of Miranda protections to questioning in the school setting, at least when such questioning occurs in the intimidating environment of a principal’s or assistant principal’s office. See generally Paul Holland, Schooling Miranda: Policing Interrogation in the Twenty-First Century Schoolhouse, 52 LOY. L. REV. 39 (2006). A fortiori, “custody” is established when a student is summoned by a school administrator to his or her office and questioned there by a police officer. See, e.g., In the Interest of Doe, 130 Idaho 811, 818-19, 948 P.2d 166, 174 (Idaho App. 1997); N.C. v. Commonwealth, 396 S.W.3d 852, 855, 865 (Ky. 2013); In the Interest of C.H., 277 Neb. 565, 574-75, 763 N.W.2d 708, 715-16 (2009); In re D.A.R., 73 S.W.3d 505, 512 (Tex. App. 2002); State v. D.R., 84 Wash App. 832, 836-38, 930 P.2d 350, 353 (1997), rev. denied, 132 Wash. 2d 1015, 943 P.2d 662 (1997). See also State v. Antonio T., 352 P.3d 1172, 1179-80 (N.M. 2015) (deputy sheriff’s “mere presence during Principal Sarna’s questioning of Antonio converted the school disciplinary interrogation into a criminal investigatory detention, and it therefore triggered the protections” of a state statute requiring that the child be “advised of his or her statutory right to remain silent” and the ramifications of waiving that right, even though “Deputy Charley did not escort Antonio to Principal Sarna’s office, ask Antonio any questions himself, or tell Principal Sarna which questions to ask Antonio”: “Deputy Charley’s mere presence in Principal Sarna’s office as Principal Sarna questioned Antonio subjected Antonio to an investigatory detention” and thereby triggered the statutory protections; “Deputy Charley’s presence in the room not only created a coercive and adversarial environment, it also granted him access to evidence necessary to prosecute criminal delinquent behavior”).

Part D. Other Constitutional, Common-Law, and Statutory Bases for Suppressing Statements

§ 24.13 SUPPRESSION UNDER THE SIXTH AMENDMENT RIGHT TO COUNSEL: THE MASSIAH PRINCIPLE

In Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), the Court held that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel required the exclusion of an incriminating statement made by a defendant to an electronically bugged police undercover informer in the absence of the defendant’s lawyer after indictment. As construed in subsequent cases, the Massiah rule reaches all statements “deliberately elicited” by any overt or covert government agent from an accused who neither has a lawyer present nor has waived the right to have a lawyer present at any time after the “initiation of adversary . . . proceedings.” United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264, 273-74 n.11 (1980); Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159, 171-76 (1986); Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436, 456-59 (1986) (dictum); Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586, 590 (2009) (dictum); see also State v. Marshall, 882 N.W.2d 68, 81-106 (Iowa 2016) (a thoroughgoing analysis of all elements of the Massiah doctrine, based on an extensive collection of caselaw); Blakeney v. State, 236 So.3d 11, 24-26 (Miss. 2017).

Unlike the Miranda doctrine (see § 24.08(a) supra), the Massiah principle is not limited to situations in which the accused is in “custody.” Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291, 300 n.4 (1980) (dictum); United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. at 273-74 & n.11 (dictum); Massiah, 377 U.S. at 206. Massiah himself was at large on bond when he made his incriminating statement, and the circumstances of its making were in no way coercive. See id. at 202-03.

The central issues in applying Massiah are whether the respondent’s statement was made at a “critical stage” of the proceedings (§ 24.13(a) infra), whether it was “deliberately elicited” by the authorities (§ 24.13(b) infra), and, in cases in which the prosecution claims that the respondent waived the right to counsel, whether that waiver was valid (§ 24.13(c) infra).

§ 24.13(a) “Critical Stages” of the Proceedings

773
The Massiah doctrine applies to “any interrogation occurring after the first formal charging proceeding, the point at which the Sixth Amendment right to counsel initially attaches.” Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 428 (1986) (dictum); see also id. at 429-32. “[O]nce the adversary judicial process has been initiated, the Sixth Amendment guarantees a defendant the right to have counsel present at all ‘critical’ stages of the criminal proceedings,” and “[i]nterrogation by the State is such a stage.” Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778, 786 (2009) (dictum). See also Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 398 (1977) (“a person is entitled to the help of a lawyer at or after the time that judicial proceedings have been initiated against him – ‘whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information or arraignment’”); Rothgery v. Gillespie County, Texas, 554 U.S. 191, 194 (2008) (“the right to counsel guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment applies at the first appearance before a judicial officer at which a defendant is told of the formal accusation against him and restrictions are imposed on his liberty”); id. at 198, 213; compare Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 122-25 (1975) (when the “state system[ ] of criminal procedure” (id. at 123) assigns only a “limited function and . . . nonadversary character” (id. at 122) to probable cause determinations, such determinations are not “critical stages” for purposes of the right to counsel); Moss v. Weaver, 525 F.2d 1258 (5th Cir. 1976) (applying Gerstein to juvenile court proceedings conducted under the same Florida procedures considered in Gerstein).

In most jurisdictions the “Initial Hearing” in a juvenile case involves arraignment on the Petition. See §§ 4.12-4.14 supra. Accordingly, the Massiah protections would commence at Initial Hearing. For discussion of variations in procedure at the Initial Hearing and their implications for the right to counsel, see § 4.03 supra. See also, e.g., State in the Interest of P.M.P., 200 N.J. 166, 177-78, 975 A.2d 441, 447-48 (2009) (state statutory right to counsel, which applies to “‘every critical stage of the proceeding which, in the opinion of the court may result in the institutional commitment of the juvenile,’” is triggered when “the Prosecutor’s Office initiates a juvenile complaint and obtains a judicially approved arrest warrant,” and therefore “‘[t]he State’s questioning of [a juvenile] defendant and the receipt of his statement in the absence of counsel’” at this pre-arraignment stage requires suppression of the statement).

The Supreme Court has rejected the proposition that Massiah applies prior to the commencement of adversary proceedings on a particular charge if the suspect is already represented by an attorney in connection with other charges on which adversary proceedings have commenced. See Texas v. Cobb, 532 U.S. 162, 168 (2001) (“a defendant’s statements regarding offenses for which he ha[s] not been charged . . . [are] admissible notwithstanding the [prior] attachment of his Sixth Amendment right to counsel on other charged offenses,” even if those other charges are “‘factually related’”; the attachment of the right to counsel on one charge will carry over to other offenses only when those offenses, whether or not formally charged, “would be considered the same offense [as the charged offense] under the . . . test [of Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932), discussed in § 17.08(b)(2) supra]”); McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171, 175-76 (1991); Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. at 428-32; see also Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. at 180 n.16 (dictum); Honeycutt v. Donat, 535 Fed. Appx. 624, 629 (9th Cir. 2013). This is the rule in most jurisdictions. See, e.g., State v. Sparklin, 296 Or. 85, 672 P.2d 1182.
(1983); State v. Clawson, 270 S.E.2d 659 (W. Va. 1980). Cf. Rubalcado v. State, 424 S.W.3d 560, 571-73 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014) (applying the rule of Texas v. Cobb but nonetheless concluding that the attachment of the right to counsel in a case in one county required the suppression of statements a police agent elicited from the defendant about uncharged conduct in another county because those statements “incriminate[d] [the] defendant with regard to [the] two separate offenses simultaneously” and the State ultimately used the statements against the defendant at trial in the case in which the right to counsel had already attached). Nevertheless, in States in which the courts have not yet ruled on the protections afforded by the state constitutional right to counsel in this context, counsel should urge them to adopt a state constitutional rule that an accused has the right to have counsel present during interrogation once the accused is represented by an attorney, regardless of whether that representation is on the charges about which the suspect is being interrogated or on other charges. See, e.g., People v. Cohen, 90 N.Y.2d 632, 638-39 & n., 687 N.E.2d 1313, 1316-17 & n., 665 N.Y.S.2d 30, 33-34 & n.* (1997) (the attachment of the state constitutional right to counsel on one charge will bar questioning on another, not-yet-charged offense if “the two criminal matters are so closely related transactionally, or in space or time, that questioning on the unrepresented matter would all but inevitably elicit incriminating responses regarding the matter in which there had been an entry of counsel” or if the “defendant is in custody on the charge upon which the right to counsel has indelibly attached,” regardless of whether the new matter is “related or unrelated” to the charge for which the defendant is in custody); and see generally § 7.09 supra.

In Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), the Court indicated that a suspect’s retention of counsel before interrogation can activate the Sixth Amendment right to counsel during pre-arraignment interrogation, at least when the suspect explicitly requests the presence of counsel during interrogation. Later cases have, however, reinterpreted Escobedo as based on the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination rather than the Sixth Amendment, see Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. at 428-31; United States v. Gouveia, 467 U.S. 180, 188 n.5 (1984), and have rejected the argument that pre-arraignment retention of an attorney alters the general rule that Sixth Amendment protections commence at the first formal charging proceeding. Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. at 429-32. Counsel can, of course, urge the state courts to adopt a more protective rule on state constitutional grounds. See, e.g., People v. Grice, 100 N.Y.2d 318, 321, 794 N.E.2d 9, 10-11, 763 N.Y.S.2d 227, 229 (2003) (“A suspect’s [state constitutional] right to counsel can . . . attach before an action is commenced when a person in custody requests to speak to an attorney or when an attorney who is retained to represent the suspect enters the matter under investigation”); People v. Mitchell, 2 N.Y.3d 272, 275-76, 810 N.E.2d 879, 881-82, 778 N.Y.S.2d 427, 429-30 (2004) (“the parent or legal guardian of a juvenile delinquent or juvenile offender [youths who are 13, 14, or 15 years old and are prosecuted in adult court] may invoke the [state constitutional] right to counsel on his or her child’s behalf”: “[a]lthough a third party cannot invoke counsel on behalf of an adult defendant,” “[c]hildren of tender years lack an adult’s knowledge of the probable cause of their acts or omissions and are least likely to understand the scope of their rights and how to protect their own interests . . . [and] may not appreciate the ramifications of their decisions or realize all the implications of the importance of counsel”); People v. Houston, 42 Cal. 3d 595, 724 P.2d 1166, 230 Cal. Rptr. 141 (1986) (abrogated by a subsequent initiative constitutional amendment) (rejecting Moran v. Burbine on state constitutional grounds and holding that the right to counsel protects a suspect’s relationship with retained counsel even earlier than the first formal charging proceeding); State v. Stoddard, and construing the due process clause of the state constitution to require that “a suspect . . . be informed promptly of timely efforts by counsel to render pertinent legal assistance [and that] . . .
[a]rmed with that information, the suspect . . . be permitted to choose whether he wishes to speak with counsel, in which event interrogation must cease,” 206 Conn. at 166-67, 537 A.2d at 452); and see generally § 7.09 supra.

§ 24.13(b)  Statements “Deliberately Elicited” by the Government

The Massiah protections apply to ordinary police interrogation (see Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387 (1977); Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778, 786-87 (2009) (dictum)), to court-ordered psychiatric examinations of the respondent whose products are used to incriminate him (1989) (per curiam), to conversations between the respondent and police spies or state-activated jailhouse snitches, United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980), and to similar “investigatory techniques that are the equivalent of police interrogation.” Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436, 459 (1986) (per curiam). See also, e.g., Commonwealth v. Hilton, 443 Mass. 597, 603-04, 614-15, 823 N.E.2d 383, 391, 398-99 (2005) (“for purposes of a Sixth Amendment analysis, court officer Marrin [“whose job responsibilities included the transportation of detainees between the holding cells and the court room, maintaining order in the court room, and providing security for the judges and the public” and who conversed with the defendant as “Marrin was escorting the defendant back to the holding area’’] must be viewed as an agent of law enforcement”; “[o]nce the Sixth Amendment right to counsel has attached, the Massiah line of cases . . . prohibits ‘government efforts to elicit information from the accused’ . . . , including interrogation by ‘the government or someone acting on its behalf’”; references in the caselaw to “the Sixth Amendment as prohibiting questioning by ‘the police’ and their agents . . . do not mean that the Sixth Amendment’s protections are implicated only by actions involving the ‘police,’ but merely operate to describe the most common fact pattern raised by such cases.”); State v. Oliveira, 961 A.2d 299, 310-11 (R.I. 2008) (a child protective services investigator was an “agent of the state” for Sixth Amendment purposes, even though she “did not interview defendant at the direct behest of the police or prosecution,” because the agency’s “protocol required that she work cooperatively with law enforcement personnel,” she had already “exchanged information” with the police about the case, and she acknowledged that “one of her purposes in interviewing defendant was to ‘add to the evidence’”); Rubalcado v. State, 424 S.W.3d 560, 574-76 (Tex.
Crim. App. 2014) (the complaining witness was a “government agent” for Sixth Amendment purposes because the “police encouraged [her] to call appellant for the purpose of eliciting a confession” and “supplied [her] with the recording equipment, and an officer was present during those calls”).

When a police officer, informer, or agent “stimulate[s]” conversations with the respondent for the purpose of “elicit[ing] [incriminating] information,” this “‘indirect and surreptitious interrogatio[n]’” comes within Massiah’s strictures against deliberately eliciting incriminating statements. United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. at 273. Similarly, if the agent engages the respondent “in active conversation about [his or her] . . . upcoming trial [in a manner that is] . . . certain to elicit” incriminating statements, the agent’s “mere[ ] participat[ion] in this conversation [will be deemed] . . . ‘the functional equivalent of interrogation’” in violation of Massiah. Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. at 177 n.13; Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. at 459 (dictum). See also, e.g., Fellers v. United States, 540 U.S. 519, 524-25 (2004) (the lower court “erred in holding that the absence of an ‘interrogation’ foreclosed petitioner’s [Sixth Amendment] claim”: “the officers in this case ‘deliberately elicited’ information from petitioner” by informing him, upon “arriving at petitioner’s house, . . . that their purpose in coming was to discuss his involvement in the distribution of methamphetamine and his association with certain co-conspirators” as well as to arrest him in connection with his indictment on a methamphetamine conspiracy charge; the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies in this situation even though the interchange between the petitioner and the arresting officers was no longer than 15 minutes and the petitioner apparently made his inculpatory admissions immediately upon being advised of the arresting officers’ purpose.); Ayers v. Hudson, 623 F.3d 301, 311-12 (6th Cir. 2010) (“agency in the Massiah context [is not limited] to cases where the State gave the informant instructions to obtain evidence from a defendant”; “[t]o hold otherwise would allow the State to accomplish ‘with a wink and a nod’ what it cannot do overtly”).

On the other hand, there is no Massiah violation if the police plant a stool pigeon in an accused’s jail cell as a cellmate but the “police and their informant” take no additional “action, beyond merely listening, that [is] . . . designed deliberately to elicit incriminating remarks.” Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. at 459. “[A] defendant does not make out a violation of [Massiah] . . . simply by showing that an informant, either through prior arrangement or voluntarily, reported his incriminating statements to the police.” Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. at 459.

If a civilian informant deliberately elicits statements from an accused within the foregoing principles, the courts will find a Massiah violation even though the government agents who employed the informant instructed him or her to refrain from questioning the accused (United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. at 268, 271) or to refrain from inducing the suspect to make incriminating statements, Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. at 177 n.14. Compare Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. at 460-61 (finding no Massiah violation found when the informant not only was instructed to refrain from questioning or eliciting incriminating statements but “followed those instructions”).

§ 24.13(c) Waiver

 “[T]he Sixth Amendment right to counsel may be waived by a defendant [or respondent], so long as relinquishment of the right is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent.” Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778, 786 (2009) (citing, inter alia, Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938)). See also, e.g., Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506, 513-16 (1962); Montejo, 556 U.S. at 797-98 (remanding so that Montejo can “press any claim he might have that his Sixth Amendment waiver was not knowing and voluntary, e.g., his argument that the waiver was invalid because it was based on misrepresentations by police as to whether he had been appointed a lawyer”). It is “incumbent upon the State to prove ‘an intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege’ . . . [and] courts [assessing “an alleged waiver of the right to counsel” must] indulge in every reasonable presumption against waiver.” Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387, 404 (1977). See also Satterwhite v. Texas, 486 U.S. 249, 256 (1988).

When the respondent’s incriminating statement was made to any sort of a police spy, there can obviously be no waiver: The fact that the accused is unaware s/he is making a statement for government consumption suffices to exclude the possibility of a waiver as defined by Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. at 464: – that is, an “intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege.” When the statement was made to a person whom the respondent knew to be a government agent, the test of a valid waiver of the right to counsel is basically similar in the Sixth Amendment context of Massiah and in the Fifth Amendment context of Miranda. See Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U.S. 285 (1988); Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. at 786, 794-95. The principles and precedents discussed in § 24.10 supra are generally controlling. See, e.g., Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. at 401-06. For example, a waiver made after administration of the ordinary Miranda warnings will “typically” be effective. Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. at 786, 794-95; Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U.S. at 300. However, because the Sixth Amendment imposes on “the prosecutor and the police . . . an affirmative obligation not to act in a manner that circumvents and thereby dilutes the protection afforded by the right to counsel,” Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. at 171, some waivers that would be valid in the Miranda setting are not valid in the Massiah setting. See Patterson v. Illinois, 487 U.S. at 297 n.9 (dictum) (“we have permitted a Miranda waiver to stand where a suspect was not told that his lawyer was trying to reach him during questioning [citing Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412 (1986)]; in the Sixth Amendment context, this waiver would not be valid”); cf. Powell v. Texas, 492 U.S. 680 (1989) (per curiam) (holding, in the context of a court-ordered pretrial psychiatric examination, that a determination that “the defendant waived his Fifth Amendment privilege by raising a mental-status defense [at trial] . . . [does] not suffice to resolve the defendant’s separate Sixth Amendment claim” (id. at 685), and that the lower court erred by “conflat[ing] . . . the Fifth and Sixth Amendment analyses” (id. at 683) and by treating the defendant’s waiver of his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent as also waiving the Sixth Amendment right to counsel).

In Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U.S. 625 (1986), the Supreme Court established a now-defunct “prophylactic rule that once a criminal defendant invokes his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, a subsequent waiver of that right – even if voluntary, knowing, and intelligent under traditional standards – is presumed invalid if secured pursuant to police-initiated conversation.” Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344, 345-46 (1990). In Montejo v. Louisiana, the Court overruled Jackson and eliminated this “prophylactic rule,” explaining that even “after arraignment, when Sixth Amendment rights have attached,” a defendant is adequately protected by the “three layers of prophylaxis” that apply both before and after arraignment: “Under Miranda’s prophylactic protection of the right against compelled self-incrimination, any suspect subject to custodial interrogation has the right to have a lawyer present if he so requests, and to be advised of that right. 384 U.S., at 474. Under Edwards [v. Arizona]'s prophylactic protection of the Miranda right, once such a defendant ‘has invoked his right to have counsel present,’ interrogation must stop. 451 U.S. [477], at 484 [(1981)]. And under Minnick [v. Mississippi]'s prophylactic protection of the Edwards right, no subsequent interrogation may take place until counsel is present, ‘whether or not the accused has consulted with his attorney.’ 498 U.S. [146], at 153 [(1990)].” Montejo, 556 U.S. at 794-95. State courts are free to retain the Jackson rule as a matter of state constitutional law. See, e.g., State v. Bevel, 231 W. Va. 346, 348, 745 S.E.2d 237, 239 (2013) (“we decline to adopt Montejo and find that the right to counsel that has been recognized in this state for more than a quarter century continues to be guaranteed by article III, section 14 of the West Virginia Constitution”); and see generally § 7.09 supra.

§ 24.14 CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY STANDARDS GOVERNING INVOLVEMENT OF A RESPONDENT’S PARENT OR GUARDIAN DURING POLICE INTERROGATION

§ 24.14(a) Constitutional Standards

In Gallegos v. Colorado, 370 U.S. 49 (1962), the Court indicated that the assessment of the voluntariness of a juvenile’s statement should take into account the presence or absence of the child’s parent or other concerned adults during police interrogation. Invalidating the confession of a fourteen-year-old as involuntary under the Due Process Clause, the Court explained:

“A lawyer or an adult relative or friend could have given the petitioner the protection which his own immaturity could not. Adult advice would have put him on a less unequal footing with his interrogators. Without some adult protection against this inequality, a 14-year-old boy would not be able to know, let alone assert, such constitutional rights as he had.” (Id. at 54.)

In In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), the Court again recognized the important role of parents in safeguarding their children’s rights during interrogation, indicating that “the presence and competence of parents” are relevant considerations in gauging the validity of a child’s waiver of the right to self-incrimination. Id. at 55. The Court cited approvingly to requirements of parental presence in a State statute, state court caselaw, and the Standards for Juvenile and Family Courts. See id. at 48-49. However, the Gault decision itself was concerned solely with “admissions in court” (id. at 56) and did not resolve “the procedures or constitutional rights applicable to the pre-judicial stages of the juvenile process.” Id. at 13.

Subsequently, in Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707 (1979), the Court failed to include parental presence in its roster of factors relating to the voluntariness of a juvenile’s waiver, see id. at 725, although this has little significance because the Court was not purporting to set forth an exclusive roster. See id. at 725 (factors specifically mentioned are “include[d]” among the relevant factors). See, e.g., Quick v. State, 599 P.2d 712, 719 (Alaska 1979) (treating the Court’s roster in Michael C. as self-evidently non-exclusive, and adding to the roster the consideration of “whether there has been any prior opportunity to consult with a parent, guardian, or attorney”). The Court in Michael C. found the juvenile respondent’s waiver voluntary notwithstanding the absence of his parents during his interrogation. However, this holding also is of limited significance on the issue of parental presence because the Court did not have before it any claims that the absence of Michael C.’s parents was relevant to the constitutional analysis. See id. at 712-16. Moreover, even if the respondent in Michael C. had claimed that the absence of his parents impaired the voluntariness of his waiver, the Court could have found on the facts of that case that Michael C.’s advanced age, intelligence, and experience with the courts made him peculiarly unlikely to need parental support under a totality-of-the-circumstances analysis. See id. at 726 (emphasizing that the respondent “was a 16-½-year-old juvenile with considerable experience with the police[,] . . . [who] had a record of several arrests[,] . . . had served time in a youth camp, and . . . had been on probation for several years” and that “[t]here is no indication that he was of insufficient intelligence to understand the rights he was waiving, or what the consequences of that waiver would be”); cf. id. at 725-26 (explaining that different standards of waiver might apply in cases of “young persons . . . with limited experience and education and with immature judgment”); see, e.g., Quick v. State, 599 P.2d at 719-20 (having construed Fare v. Michael C. as permitting consideration of parental presence during interrogation as a factor in the totality of the circumstances, the Alaska Supreme Court follows Michael C.’s reasoning in upholding the admissibility of a confession of a 17-year-old with extensive prior court experience, notwithstanding the absence of his parents during the interrogation).

Several state court decisions, both before and after the Supreme Court’s decision in Fare v. Michael C., have concluded that parental presence is a relevant consideration in the totality of the circumstances (see § 24.10 supra) bearing upon the question whether a juvenile’s waiver of Miranda rights was sufficiently voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. E.g., In re Andre M., 207 Ariz. 482, 485-86, 88 P.3d 552, 555-56 (2004) (“presence of the child’s parents” is always a factor to be considered in a totality-of-the-circumstances assessment of the validity of a juvenile’s waiver of Miranda rights but it is a “particularly significant factor” in any case in which “law enforcement personnel . . . frustrates a parent’s attempt to confer with his or her child”; and in the absence of a state showing of “good cause for barring a parent from a juvenile’s interrogation, a strong inference arises that the state excluded the parent in order to maintain a coercive atmosphere or to discourage the juvenile from fully understanding and exercising his constitutional rights”); In the Interest of Thompson, 241 N.W.2d 2 (Iowa 1976); State v. Fernandez, 712 So. 2d 485, 489 & n.5 (La. 1998); McIntyre v. State, 309 Md. 607, 526 A.2d 30 (1987); State v. Hogan, 297 Minn. 430, 440, 212 N.W.2d 664, 671 (1973); Commonwealth v. Williams, 504 Pa. 511, 475 A.2d 1283 (1984); Theriault v. State, 66 Wis. 2d 33, 223 N.W.2d 850 (1974).

State courts have also concluded that parental presence is a significant factor in the totality-of-the-circumstances test commonly used to assess the voluntariness of a juvenile’s statement under the Due Process Clause (see §§ 24.03-24.06 supra). E.g., State in the Interest of Some state courts have gone beyond the totality-of-the-circumstances tests and have established a prophylactic rule requiring that a parent (or guardian or other “interested adult”) be present at the interrogation of a juvenile and that the juvenile be permitted to consult privately with that adult prior to answering questions. Such a rule has been established through a variety of constitutional rationales, relying either on federal constitutional provisions, see, e.g., Lewis v. State, 259 Ind. 431, 288 N.E.2d 138 (1972) (in light of juveniles’ susceptibility to coercion and their inability to appreciate the full consequences of their actions, the court adopts the “interested adult” requirement as a prerequisite to either voluntary or knowing and intelligent Miranda waivers); In the Matter of B.M.B., 264 Kan. 417, 432-33, 955 P.2d 1302, 1312-13 (1998) (relying on empirical data on juveniles’ inability to comprehend Miranda warnings and also caselaw from other jurisdictions to “conclude that the totality of the circumstances [standard] is not sufficient to ensure that . . . [“a juvenile under 14 years of age”] makes an intelligent and knowing waiver of his rights,” given “the immaturity and inexperience of a child under 14 years of age and the obvious disadvantage such a child has in confronting a custodial police interrogation,” and “hold[ing], therefore, that a juvenile under 14 years of age must be given an opportunity to consult with his or her parent, guardian, or attorney as to whether he or she will waive his or her rights to an attorney and against self-incrimination”); Commonwealth v. A Juvenile (No. 1), 389 Mass. 128, 449 N.E.2d 654 (1983) (focusing solely on the “knowing and intelligent” prong of the Miranda waiver requirements, the court relies on empirical evidence of juveniles’ inability to comprehend Miranda rights to establish the “interested adult” rule as an indispensable requirement for knowing and intelligent waiver by a child under 14, and as important, but not decisive, in assessing whether a waiver by a child 14 or over was knowing and intelligent); accord, Commonwealth v. Alfonso A., 438 Mass. 372, 780 N.E.2d 1244 (2003) (holding, in the case of a child over 14, that the “interested adult” rule precludes a waiver unless the adult is physically present or otherwise actually engaged in the interaction between the police and the juvenile – as, for example, by “participating through speaker telephone,” 438 Mass. at 382, 780 N.E.2d at 1252 – and unless the adult is informed by the police of the juvenile’s rights; recognizing that “a juvenile in trouble may be embarrassed to ask for an adult’s help,” and that, unless the interested adult is actually engaged in the interaction “[t]here is too great a risk that a juvenile will engage in a show of bravado rather than admit to any desire or need to consult with an adult,” 438 Mass. at 383, 780 N.E.2d at 1253); State v. Presha, 163 N.J. 304, 315-16, 748 A.2d 1108, 1114-15 (2000) (reaffirming the court’s prior ruling in In re S.H. that “[i]n respect of confessions by juveniles of any age, courts should consider the adult’s absence as a highly significant factor among all other facts and circumstances . . . [and] should give that factor added weight when balancing it against all other factors,” and, in light of the changes in the juvenile justice process that have resulted in an “increased focus on the apprehension and prosecution of youthful offenders” and a correspondingly enhanced “significance” of “the parent’s role in an interrogation setting,” especially “[w]hen younger offenders are in custody,” adopting a “‘bright-line’” rule for cases involving “a juvenile under the age of fourteen” that “when a parent or legal guardian is absent from an interrogation involving a juvenile that young, any confession resulting from the interrogation should be deemed inadmissible as a matter of law, unless the adult was unwilling to be present or truly unavailable”), or state constitutional provisions, see, e.g., In re E.T.C., 141 Vt. 375, 449 A.2d 937 (1982) (stressing the immaturity and limited capacity of juveniles, the court construes its state constitution to require parental presence and consultation as a prerequisite to voluntary and intelligent waiver of Miranda rights). The decisions employing a voluntariness analysis (under either the Due Process Clause or Miranda) can be squared with the Supreme Court’s insistence in Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986), that any finding of involuntariness rest upon coercive acts by the police, because a denial of a juvenile’s access to his or her parents is a particularly coercive form of incommunicado detention. See id. at 163-64 & n.1 (recognizing that incommunicado detention satisfies the coercion requirement); see also §§ 24.04(b), 24.10(a) supra.

§ 24.14(b) Statutory Requirements

In addition to the constitutional grounds described in the foregoing section, several jurisdictions have statutes mandating parental presence during police interrogation of a juvenile that provide a statutory basis for suppression of juveniles’ statements. See, e.g., People v. Maes, 194 Colo. 235, 571 P.2d 305 (1977) (statement held inadmissible because of the violation of a state statute requiring the presence of a parent or custodian during interrogation; social services caseworker could not act as the custodian because the statute requires that the child be “advised and counseled concerning his constitutional rights by someone whose interests are clearly with the child,” id at 238, 571 P.2d at 306); In the Interest of J.A.N., 346 N.W.2d 495 (Iowa 1984) (statement held inadmissible because of the violation of a state statute requiring parents’ written consent to the waiver of the right to counsel when the child is under the age of 16); In the Matter of Z.M., 337 Mont. 278, 292, 160 P.3d 490, 501 (2007) (suppressing a 14-year-old’s statement because the police violated a state statute requiring that children below 16 years of age be afforded an opportunity to consult with a parent or counsel on “whether or not to waive his [or her] rights”); State v. Smith, 317 N.C. 100, 343 S.E.2d 518 (1986) (statement held inadmissible because the police violated a state statute requiring that the police cease all questioning if a juvenile suspect, after being advised of his or her statutory right to parental presence during police questioning, requests the presence of a parent); State v. Branham, 153 N.C. App. 91, 98-99, 569 S.E.2d 24, 28-29 (2002) (statement held inadmissible under a state statute because the 16-year-old suspect “requested his mother’s presence during his statement” but the “officers neither produced her nor ceased the questioning”; the “defendant’s mother[s] refus[al] to see him” does not render the statutory requirement inapplicable because “she did not have the ability to, in effect, waive [her son’s] right to have her present during interrogation”); J.T.P. v. State, 544 P.2d 1270 (Okla. Crim. App. 1975) (statement held inadmissible because of the violation of a state statute requiring that a parent or guardian or attorney be present during the questioning of a juvenile and be advised of the child’s rights).

Even States which do not specifically require parental presence during interrogation have statutes requiring that the police notify parents and guardians of a child’s arrest. Violations of these notification requirements may provide a basis for suppression of the child’s statements. See, e.g., United States v. C.M. (A Juvenile), 485 F.3d 492, 499-501, 505 (9th Cir. 2007) (violations of the federal Juvenile Delinquency Act, including the Act’s parental notification provisions, required exclusion of the ensuing statement); State v. Walker, 352 N.W.2d 239 (Iowa 1984) (statement held inadmissible because police violated a statute by failing to inform a father of the nature of the charge and of the father’s right to speak to, and confer with, his son); In the Matter of Michelet P., 70 A.D.2d 68, 419 N.Y.S.2d 704 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1979) (statement held inadmissible because police failed to comply with statutory requirement of parental notification); Sublette v. State, 365 So. 2d 775 (Fla. App. 1978), app. dism’d, 378 So. 2d 349 (Fla. 1979) (violation of statutory requirement of parental notification held to require suppression of children’s statements, particularly where a child requests that officers contact his or her parent); In the Interest of Jerrell C.J., 283 Wis. 2d 145, 166 & n.9, 699 N.W.2d 110, 120 & n.9 (2005) (“remind[ing] law enforcement officials that [a] Wisconsin [statute] . . . requires an ‘immediate attempt’ to notify the parent when a juvenile is taken into custody,” and reaffirming a state common law rule that “the failure ‘to call the parents for the purpose of depriving the juvenile of the opportunity to receive advice and counsel’ will be considered ‘strong evidence that coercive tactics were used to elicit the incriminating statements’” and that the resulting statement should be deemed involuntary in violation of due process).

§ 24.15 STATEMENTS OBTAINED DURING A PERIOD OF UNNECESSARY DELAY FOLLOWING ARREST

In McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), and Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957), the Supreme Court exercised its supervisory powers over the federal courts to enforce prompt-arraignment requirements (currently contained in Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 5(a)) by excluding confessions obtained from arrested persons during a period of unlawful delay in bringing them before a judicial officer for a determination of probable cause. As a result of subsequent legislative enactments described in detail in Corley v. United States, 556 U.S. 303 (2009), the McNabb-Mallory rule has been modified to provide a basis for excluding confessions obtained during “unreasonable or unnecessary” delays of more than six hours before preliminary arraignment in federal prosecutions (Corley, 556 U.S. at 322). See, e.g., United States v. Thompson, 772 F.3d 752, 762-63 (3d Cir. 2014) (“Thompson’s confession[,] [which] came considerably after the six-hour period had run,” is suppressed under the McNabb-Mallory rule because “the government delayed Thompson’s arraignment so that they could continue to persuade him to cooperate,” and the court “hold[s] that pursuit of cooperation is not a reasonable excuse for delay in presentment”); United States v. Pimental, 755 F.3d 1095, 1101, 1104 (9th Cir. 2014) (suppressing “incriminating statements that Torres Pimental made to Agent Aradanás on Sunday morning, about forty-eight hours after his Friday morning arrest, and before he was presented to a magistrate judge on Tuesday,” because “[i]t is undisputed that Torres...
Pimental’s incriminating statements . . . were made more than six hours after his . . . arrest and before his . . . initial appearance,” and this “delay was not a result of the distance to be traveled to the nearest available magistrate holding a presentment calendar that Friday,” and the “delay in presenting Torres Pimental [also] does not fall within” other “reasonable delays apart from transportation, distance, and the availability of a magistrate”).

The juvenile court statutes of most States contain provisions requiring prompt delivery of a newly arrested juvenile to court or to a juvenile facility. These provisions supply a predicate for state-law exclusionary rules analogous to the McNabb-Mallory rule. See, e.g., People v. Jordan, 149 Mich. App. 568, 386 N.W.2d 594 (1986) (adopting “the exclusionary principle of McNabb,” id. at 576, 386 N.W.2d at 598, and excluding a juvenile’s statement because the police violated the statutory requirement that a child under the age of 17 be taken “immediately before the juvenile division of the probate court”); State v. Wade, 531 S.W.2d 726, 727 (Mo. 1976) (statement held inadmissible because police violated statutory requirement that a child “shall be taken immediately and directly before the juvenile court or delivered to the juvenile officer or person acting for him”); J.T.P. v. State, 544 P.2d 1270 (Okla. Crim. App. 1975) (statement held inadmissible because the police violated a statutory requirement that a child “shall be taken immediately to the court”); State v. George Anthony W., 200 W. Va. 86, 88, 92-94, 488 S.E.2d 361, 363, 367-69 (1996) (the statements of two juveniles are held inadmissible, and orders transferring the juveniles to adult court based on these statements are set aside, because the police violated a statutory requirement that “when a juvenile is taken into custody, he must immediately be taken before a referee, circuit judge, or magistrate,” and the “evidence supports the conclusion” that the “primary purpose” of the delay was to question the juveniles about a homicide).

Arguably, the decision in Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), lays a federal constitutional foundation for something akin to the McNabb-Mallory exclusionary rule in state prosecutions. As explained in § 4.28(a) supra, Gerstein establishes a Fourth Amendment right to a prompt judicial determination of probable cause following a warrantless arrest. See, e.g., Manuel v. City of Joliet, Ill., 137 S. Ct. 911 (2017); Fisher v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, 690 F.2d 1133, 1140 (4th Cir. 1982); Lively v. Cullinane, 451 F. Supp. 1000, 1004-05 (D. D.C. 1978). Accordingly, when the police hold a respondent beyond the period prescribed by County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991), as the limit of permissible detention without a probable-cause determination (see § 4.28(a) supra), counsel can argue that the Fourth Amendment requires the suppression of any statements made by the respondent during the unlawfully protracted custody. See, e.g., State v. Huddleston, 924 S.W.2d 666, 675-76 (Tenn. 1996) (suppressing a statement obtained by the police during a 72-hour period in which the defendant was held without a judicial determination of probable cause in violation of Gerstein and County of Riverside v. McLaughlin); Norris v. Lester, 545 Fed. Appx. 320, 321, 327 (6th Cir. 2013) (“appellate counsel was ineffective for failing to argue [under County of Riverside v. McLaughlin] that [Norris’] confession was obtained after the violation of his constitutional right to a prompt probable-cause determination”). The general Fourth Amendment rule excluding statements made in confinement following an unconstitutional arrest (§ 24.19 infra) supports this result. However, as the Supreme Court observed in Powell v. Nevada, 511 U.S. 79, 85 n.* (1994), that Court has not yet ruled on the specific question whether “a suppression remedy applies” to a Gerstein violation of “failure to obtain authorization from a magistrate for a significant period of pretrial detention.”

§ 24.16 STATE COMMON-LAW DOCTRINES REQUIRING THE SUPPRESSION OF STATEMENTS AS INVOLUNTARY

In addition to the federal constitutional doctrine excluding coerced confessions, see §§ 24.03-24.06 supra, there are state common-law doctrines that may exclude a confession on the ground that it is “involuntary.” See Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157, 167 (1986); Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534, 540-44 (1961); State v. Kelly, 61 N.J. 283, 290-93, 294 A.2d 41, 45-46 (1972). Although the issue under the federal Constitution (and many state constitutional self-incrimination and due process clauses) is whether the respondent’s will was overborne, the issue under the state’s common law is likely to be whether the confession was made in circumstances that render it untrustworthy or unreliable.

The distinction between the constitutional and common-law doctrines is highly significant in juvenile cases. Personal characteristics of the respondent, such as youth, low I.Q., and suggestibility, that are pertinent but not decisive in the constitutional analysis, see §§ 24.03, 24.05 supra, may alone render a statement so unreliable as to require its exclusion under state common law.

In addition, the common-law doctrine affords a basis for suppressing statements coerced by private citizens. Whereas coercive behavior by private citizens cannot supply the “state action” necessary for a due process violation, see Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. at 165-67, it may render a respondent’s statement unreliable and thus inadmissible under state common law. See, e.g., State v. Kelly, 61 N.J. at 292-94, 294 A.2d at 46-47 (holding a statement coerced by a private security guard inadmissible under state law because it was unreliable although not unconstitutionally involuntary).

The substantive details and procedural aspects of the common-law doctrine of involuntariness vary considerably among jurisdictions, and counsel must consult local statutes and caselaw. In a number of jurisdictions, for example, the prosecutor must lay a foundation for the introduction of any statement of the respondent by showing that it was made “without the slightest hope of benefit” and “without the remotest fear of injury.” See, e.g., State v. Ritter, 268 Ga. 108, 109-10, 485 S.E.2d 492, 494 (1997) (“Under Georgia law, only voluntary incriminating statements are admissible against the accused at trial. OCGA § 24-3-50. When not made freely and voluntarily, a confession is presumed to be legally false and can not be the underlying basis of a conviction. . . . To make a confession admissible, it must have been made voluntarily, i.e., ‘without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury.’ OCGA § 24-3-50. . . . A reward of lighter punishment is generally the ‘hope of benefit’ to which OCGA § 24-3-50 refers. . . . The State bears the burden of demonstrating the voluntariness of a confession by a preponderance of the evidence.”); State v. Crank, 105 Utah 332, 142 P.2d 178, 184-85 (1943) (“When the state seeks to put the confession before the jury it must establish its competency to the court. To do this it must show that the confession was given by the accused as his voluntary act; as an expression of his independent and free will, uninfluenced by fear of punishment or by hope of reward; that it was not induced or influenced by any advantages or benefits that might accrue to him or those near or dear to him, nor was it given to lighten any penalties or punishments the law might impose on him if tried and convicted without confessing; and that it was not giver [sic in 142 P.2d at 184; spelled correctly as “given” in 105 Utah at 347] as a result of a desire to escape or avoid any misery, threats, acts, or conduct of any other person, having it in their power, or whom he believed had it in their power, to inflict upon him, or upon those whom it was his duty or privilege to protect.”).

In cases in which the facts provide defense counsel with a viable state common-law challenge to a respondent’s statement, counsel should ordinarily attempt to litigate that claim in a pretrial hearing even if the normal practice is to raise the issue by an evidentiary objection at trial. A mid-trial ruling excluding the statement as unreliable will come too late to prevent the trier of fact from hearing the contents of the statement in a bench trial; and even in a jury trial there is a risk of the jurors’ getting wind that the question being litigated while they are sent out to wait involves a confession by the respondent. Accordingly, in jurisdictions that permit motions in limine, counsel will usually want to raise the common-law contention as an in limine matter and, if the statement is excluded, counsel should consider moving to recuse the motions judge from sitting as factfinder at a bench trial. See §§ 7.03, 20.05 supra. If the jurisdiction is one in which the court may entertain or decline to entertain motions in limine at its discretion, counsel will increase the likelihood of obtaining a pretrial adjudication of the common-law ground by joining it with a constitutional ground (see §§ 24.03-24.15 supra and §§ 24.19-24.20 infra) on which pretrial suppression motions are authorized by statute or court rule or which are customarily litigated on pretrial motions in limine under local practice. Since the facts bearing on the common-law and constitutional grounds will invariably overlap, counsel can present strong arguments of judicial convenience for hearing the two (or more) claims at the same time. (An exception to this strategy is the situation in which the suppression hearing will be conducted by a pro-prosecution judge and there is a realistic prospect that the trial judge will be more defense-friendly.)

§ 24.17 STATEMENTS OBTAINED BY EAVESDROPPING ON A CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE RESPONDENT AND DEFENSE COUNSEL

officer was in the room with the suspect while he telephoned his attorney); State v. Sugar, 84 N.J. 1, 417 A.2d 474 (1980) (the police used an electronic device to listen in on a conversation between the suspect and counsel in an interrogation room). See also State v. Lenarz, 301 Conn. 417, 425, 22 A.3d 536, 542 (2011) (holding that a prosecution had to be dismissed because the contents of the defendant’s computer, seized by police executing a valid search warrant in the course of their investigations and later transmitted to the forensics lab and the prosecutor, contained extensive information about defense strategy that was protected by attorney-client privilege: “[W]e conclude generally that prejudice may be presumed when the prosecutor has invaded the attorney-client privilege by reading privileged materials containing trial strategy, regardless of whether the invasion of the attorney-client privilege was intentional.”); Matter of Neary, 84 N.E.3d 1194, 1197 (Ind. 2017) (imposing disciplinary sanctions for professional misconduct upon a prosecutor who monitored audio and video feeds of a stationhouse interview between one arrestee and his attorney and also viewed the DVD recording of another arrestee’s discussions with defense counsel during a “break” in a negotiated statement-taking session; “the constitutional imperative of honoring and protecting the confidentiality of a defendant’s communications with counsel is a principle “[w]e would have hoped . . . too obvious to mention.”

Although the rule is clear, its doctrinal underpinnings are murky. In Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545 (1977), the Court characterized its Black and O’Brien decisions as grounded upon the Fourth Amendment, but in United States v. Morrison, 449 U.S. 361, 364-65 (1981) (dictum), it treated them as based upon the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. The Sixth Amendment analysis is complicated further by the subsequent holding in Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412 (1986), that the Sixth Amendment does not protect the attorney-client relationship prior to the attachment of the right to counsel at the first formal charging proceeding.

In this unsettled state of the law, counsel is advised to advance alternative grounds for any motion to suppress statements obtained by police eavesdropping on attorney-client conversations. Counsel should urge that the statements must be suppressed under the Fourth Amendment (see Weatherford v. Bursey, supra; Gennusa v. Canova, 748 F.3d 1103, 1112-13 (11th Cir. 2014)), the Sixth Amendment (see United States v. Morrison, supra), state constitutional protections of the right to counsel (see, e.g., People v. Grice, 100 N.Y.2d 318, 321, 794 N.E.2d 9, 10-11, 763 N.Y.S.2d 227, 229 (2003), summarized in § 24.13(a), concluding paragraph, supra)), state constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures, the statutory or common-law privilege for attorney-client communications (see, e.g., State v. Beaupre, 123 N.H. at 159, 459 A.2d at 236), and, in cases of electronic eavesdropping, the federal and state statutory restrictions upon electronic surveillance (see, e.g., 18 U.S.C. §§ 2510-2520 (2018)).

§ 24.18 ELECTRONIC RECORDING OF INTERROGATIONS

In a number of jurisdictions, the police are required to electronically record interrogations, usually with video-recording equipment. In some jurisdictions, this requirement was established by a court decision (see, e.g., Stephan v. State, 711 P.2d 1156, 1157 (Alaska 1986) (“we hold that an unexcused failure to electronically record a custodial interrogation conducted in a place of detention violates a suspect’s right to due process, under the Alaska Constitution, . . . and that any statement thus obtained is generally inadmissible”); State v. Scales, 518 N.W.2d 587, 592 (Minn. 1994) (adopting the requirement by means of the court’s “supervisory power to insure the fair administration of justice”); in others, it was established by a statute (see, e.g., ILL. COMP. STAT. ANN. ch. 705, § 405/5-401.5 (2018); IND. CODE ANN. § 31-30.5-1-1(2) (2018); WIS. STAT. ANN. § 938.195 (2018)). Typically, the police are required to record “all custodial interrogation including any information about rights, any waiver of those rights, and all questioning.” State v. Scales, 518 N.W.2d at 592. See also Commonwealth v. Adonsoto, 475 Mass. 497, 507-08 & n.9, 58 N.E.3d 305, 315-16 & n.9 (2016) (establishing “a new protocol” that, “where practicable, . . . all [police] interviews and interrogations using interpreter services will be recorded,” and “[t]he defendant must be advised that the conversation is being recorded”; “The implementation of this protocol will provide significantly enhanced protections and assurances of reliability for defendants who speak through an interpreter. Reliability is an essential factor of due process to the defendant. . . . A recording allows defendants and judges to independently evaluate accuracy, and thus, the reliability of interpreter services.”). There may be exceptions for situations in which recording is not feasible (see, e.g., WIS. STAT. ANN. § 938.195(2)). Some statutes confer upon the prosecution a procedural benefit at the suppression hearing if a statement was electronically recorded; counsel should be alert to the possibility of challenging such provisions on constitutional grounds. See, e.g., State v. Barker, 149 Ohio St. 3d 1, 73 N.E.3d 365 (2016) (holding that a statute on electronic recording of juveniles’ custodial statements, which provided that statements “‘are presumed to be voluntary if . . . electronically recorded’” (id. at 1, 73 N.E.3d at 368), “may not supersede the constitutional rule announced in Miranda” and therefore “cannot lessen the protections announced in Miranda by removing the state’s burden of proving a suspect’s knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of rights prior to making a statement during a custodial interrogation” (id. at 8, 73 N.E.3d at 373); and holding further that such a statutory presumption, at least as applied to juveniles, violates due process, because the “[a]ppliance of the statutory presumption would remove all consideration of the juvenile’s unique characteristics from the due-process analysis unless the juvenile introduced evidence to disprove voluntariness when the interrogation was electronically recorded” and “there is no rational relationship between the existence of an electronic recording and the voluntariness of a suspect’s statement[,] . . . especially . . . where, as with R.C. 2933.81(B), the statute requires only that the statement sought to be admitted, not the entire interrogation, be recorded” (id. at 12, 73 N.E.3d at 377)).

Although video-recording provides a degree of protection against abusive police practices, it is not nearly as protective as proponents of this reform may believe. A crafty detective or officer can do an end-run around the recording requirement by making promises or threats (or engaging in other types of psychological manipulations of the respondent) before the video-camera is turned on. Moreover, if the interrogation is protracted, the police presumably will turn off the camera periodically to allow the respondent to use the bathroom or to take a break from interrogation. During these breaks, the police have additional opportunities to engage in off-camera manipulations of the respondent. As a result, the video the judge eventually sees at a suppression hearing (and that the jury may see at trial) is often a carefully stage-managed performance, with the police as both on-stage actors and behind-the-scenes directors. In such cases, the use of a recording actually may make things worse for the respondent because the video images provide the judge and jury with a compelling – but dangerously false – appearance of careful, responsible police work.

Accordingly, defense attorneys in jurisdictions with electronic recording of interrogations need to be alert to the possibility that police improprieties took place off-camera. Counsel should interview the client carefully about what the police said and did before the video camera was turned on and during all breaks in the recording. Although litigation about such off-camera statements and actions of the police will usually come down to the respondent’s word against the officers’, counsel can at least use the police reports and the time counters in the video to document all of the opportunities the police had to apply pressure on the respondent off-camera (e.g., at the scene of the arrest, in the police car on the way to the station, during booking, in the interrogation room before the camera was turned on, and during breaks in the interrogation). Naturally, counsel should also watch for any indications of alterations in the video. Some state statutes prescribe safeguards against alterations (see, e.g., Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. ch. 705, § 405/5-401.5(b)(2)).

§ 24.19 STATEMENTS OBTAINED THROUGH VIOLATION OF THE RESPONDENT’S FOURTH AMENDMENT RIGHTS OR ILLEGAL EAVESDROPPING

The aspect of the principle most frequently encountered in juvenile cases is the one concerning statements made in police custody following an unconstitutional arrest or Terry stop. These statements are inadmissible unless “intervening events break the causal connection between the illegal arrest [or stop] and the confession so that the confession is “‘sufficiently an act of free will to purge the primary taint.’” Taylor v. Alabama, 457 U.S. 687, 690 (1982); accord, Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. at 632-33; compare Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98, 106-10 (1980). In determining whether the prosecution has met its burden of showing a break in the connection (see § 23.38 supra), “[t]he temporal proximity of the arrest and the confession, the presence of intervening circumstances, . . . and, particularly, the purpose and flagrancy of the official misconduct are all relevant.” Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 603-04 (1975). Accord, Kaupp v. Texas, 538 U.S. at 632-33. More particularly, the Supreme Court has recognized that illegal detentions “designed to provide an opportunity for interrogation [are] . . . likely to have coercive aspects likely to induce self-incrimination.” Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692, 702 n.15 (1981) (dictum). The relevant Fourth Amendment restrictions on arrest and investigative detention are discussed in §§ 23.04-23.14 supra. See also § 23.37 supra.

§ 24.20 STATEMENTS TAINTED BY PRIOR ONES THAT WERE UNLAWFULLY OBTAINED: THE “CAT OUT OF THE BAG” DOCTRINE

Prior to Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298 (1985), the finding that an incriminating statement had been taken from an accused in violation of either the Due Process requirement of voluntariness or the Miranda rules commonly led to the suppression of any subsequent statement of the accused on the same subject before consulting a lawyer. This result was not commanded by any majority opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States but appeared to be required by the Court’s per curiam decision in Robinson v. Tennessee, 392 U.S. 666 (1968), approving Justice Harlan’s concurring opinion in Darwin v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 346, 349-51 (1968). Justice Harlan there reasoned that once an accused has given the police a confession, his or her subsequent statements to them about the crime are more likely to be the products of a belief that the “cat is out of the bag” than of an independent choice to commit a fresh act of self-incrimination. Thus if the first confession was constitutionally inadmissible, it taints all later statements made by the accused without the legal advice necessary to place the first confession in perspective.

In Elstad, the Court rejected similar reasoning as the basis for an argument that “an initial failure of law enforcement officers to administer the warnings required by Miranda . . ., without more, ‘taints’ subsequent admissions made after a suspect has been fully advised of and has waived his Miranda rights.” 470 U.S. at 300. Elstad holds that if the only illegality in obtaining a first incriminating statement is a Miranda violation, “a careful and thorough administration of Miranda warnings serves to cure the condition that rendered the unwarned statement inadmissible.” Id. at 310-11. Thus, the “admissibility of any subsequent statement . . . turn[s] . . . solely on whether it is knowingly and voluntarily made.” Id. at 309.

As a result of the analysis in Elstad and later Supreme Court decisions elaborating Elstad, the federal scope-of-taint rule to be applied in successive-statement situations now turns upon the reason the first statement is found to be unconstitutional.

§ 24.20(a) Statements Tainted by a Prior Statement Taken In Violation of the Due Process Clause and the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment

In Elstad, the Supreme Court recognized that “[t]here is a vast difference between the direct consequences flowing from coercion of a confession by physical violence or other deliberate means calculated to break the suspect’s will and the uncertain consequences of disclosure of a ‘guilty secret’ freely given in response to an unwarned but noncoercive question . . . .” 470 U.S. at 312. Accordingly, Elstad’s repudiation of the concept of presumptive taint is limited to Miranda violations (§§ 24.07-24.12 supra) and does not extend to involuntary confessions (§§ 24.03-24.06 supra). E.g., United States v. Lopez, 437 F.3d 1059, 1066-67 & n.4 (10th Cir. 2006); Shelton v. State, 287 Ark. 322, 699 S.W.2d 728 (1985). The Elstad opinion says that “[w]hen a prior statement is actually coerced” (470 U.S. at 310), or perhaps even when it is simply “obtained through overtly or inherently coercive methods which raise serious Fifth Amendment and Due Process concerns” (id. at 312 n.3), “the time that passes between confessions, the change in place of interrogations, and the change in identity of the interrogators all bear on whether that coercion has carried over into the second confession” (id. at 310); and the admissibility of the second confession is subject to a “requirement of a break in the stream of events” (id., citing Westover v. United States, decided with Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)). See also Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 605 n.12 (1975); cf. Clewis v. Texas, 386 U.S. 707, 710 (1967) (requiring the exclusion of a third incriminating statement made after two earlier ones where there was “no break in the stream of events . . . sufficient to insulate the [later] statement from the effect of all that went before”). In these Due Process cases, a second confession must be shown to be “an act independent of the [previous] confession,” Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433, 444 (1961), and the prosecution plainly bears the burden of proof on that issue, Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984) (dealing with the exclusionary consequences of a confession obtained in violation of the Sixth Amendment and suggesting that the prosecution’s burden of proving the dissipation of taint – “by a preponderance of the evidence” (467 U.S. at 444) – is the same in Fifth Amendment cases (see id. at 442 & n.3) (discussed in § 23.38 supra). See, e.g., People v. Guilford, 21 N.Y.3d 205, 209, 213, 991 N.E.2d 204, 206, 209, 969 N.Y.S.2d 430, 432, 435 (2013) (suppressing a statement as the fruit of an earlier involuntary statement because the prosecution failed to prove that the defendant had been “restored to the status of one no longer under the influence” of the coercion that tainted the earlier statement “so as to render plausible the characterization of [the] subsequent admission as voluntary.” Although the 49½-hour interrogation that produced the involuntary first statement was followed by an “eight-hour ‘break,’” during which the defendant was arraigned and had an opportunity to confer with counsel, these circumstances could not “attenuate[ ] the taint of the wrongful interrogation” and “transform [the defendant’s] coerced capitulation into a voluntary disclosure.”); United States v. Anderson, 929 F.2d 96, 102 (2d Cir. 1991) (“[A]gent Valentine coerced Anderson’s first confession with improper tactics. Moreover, nothing in the record suggests that the taint clinging to the first confession was dissipated. No significant time elapsed between the first questioning by agent Valentine and when Anderson made his statement to agent Moorin. The suspect was at all times in custody and under close police supervision with the same agents present on both occasions. Agent Moorin made no effort to dispel the original threat. In fact, his statement that Anderson ‘could only help himself by cooperating’ only reaffirmed agent Valentine’s earlier coercive statements [that if Anderson exercised his Miranda rights, he could not thereafter cooperate with the Government and gain the benefits of cooperation]. The district court correctly found a continuing presumption of compulsion applied to the second statement. Hence, Anderson’s waiver, tainted by the earlier, coerced confession, was also involuntary and should be suppressed. Moreover, suppression of the second statement here also serves the objectives of deterrence and trustworthiness. It operates as a disincentive for police to coerce a confession by threatening a defendant with false and/or misleading statements. The fact-finding process is also enhanced since a confession obtained in the manner this one was may be untrustworthy.”).

§ 24.20(b) Statements Tainted by a Prior Statement Taken In Violation of Miranda

Although Elstad rejected a general rule of presumptive taint in the Miranda context, a violation of Miranda in the taking of one statement may nonetheless provide a basis for suppressing a subsequent statement as a fruit of the earlier violation in certain circumstances.

The Court in Elstad distinguished the case before it from cases “concerning suspects whose invocation of their rights to remain silent and to have counsel present were flatly ignored while police subjected them to continued interrogation.” 470 U.S. at 313 n.3. Thus, as Justice Brennan observed in his dissenting opinion in Elstad, “the Court concedes that its new analysis does not apply where the authorities have ignored the accused’s actual invocation of his Miranda rights to remain silent or to consult with counsel. . . . In such circumstances, courts should continue to apply the traditional presumption of tainted connection.” 470 U.S. at 346 n.28 (emphasis in original). See, e.g., State v. Hartley, 103 N.J. 252, 511 A.2d 80 (1986) (concluding that the “cat out of the bag” doctrine has continuing vitality in cases in which the initial statement is suppressed on grounds of police failure to scrupulously honor a suspect’s invocation of the rights to counsel or to remain silent).

In Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600 (2004), the Court addressed the applicability of Elstad to a situation in which police officers question a suspect without Miranda warnings and then administer the warnings and re-question the suspect for the purpose of obtaining an admissible, Mirandized statement. A majority of the Court ruled that, in at least some circumstances, such a sequence of interrogations renders Elstad inapplicable and requires the suppression of the second statement as a fruit of the Miranda violation in obtaining the first statement. A four-Justice plurality concluded that the admissibility of the subsequent Mirandized statement turns on ‘whether it would be reasonable to find that in these circumstances the warnings could function ‘effectively’ as Miranda requires.” 542 U.S. at 611-12. The inquiry into effectiveness involves the questions whether “the warnings [could] effectively advise the suspect that he had a real choice about giving an admissible statement at that juncture” and whether the warnings could “reasonably convey that [the suspect] could choose to stop talking even if he had talked earlier.” Id. at 612. Relevant factors include “the completeness and detail of the questions and answers in the first round of interrogation, the overlapping content of the two statements, the timing and setting of the first and the second, the continuity of police personnel, and the degree to which the interrogator’s questions treated the second round as continuous with the first.” Id. at 615. It is also a plausible reading of the Seibert plurality opinion that Miranda warnings and other corrective procedures administered after a suspect has made initial admissions in violation of Miranda cannot “function ‘effectively’ as Miranda requires” (id. at 611-12) if they do not inform the suspect that those earlier admissions cannot be used in evidence against him or her, so that the suspect is no longer laboring under the impression that “what he has just said will be used, with subsequent silence being of no avail.” Id. at 613. On the facts of the Seibert case itself, the plurality concluded that the midstream Miranda warnings were ineffective because “[t]he warned phase of questioning proceeded after a pause of only 15 to 20 minutes, in the same place as the unwarned segment,” with “the same officer” doing the questioning; “he said nothing to counter the probable misimpression that the advice that anything Seibert said could be used against her also applied to the details of the incriminating statement previously elicited”; and “[i]n particular, the police did not advise . . . [Seibert] that her prior statement could not be used.” Id. at 616. (A footnote to the sentence making the latter point says: “We do not hold that a formal addendum warning that a previous statement could not be used would be sufficient to change the character of the question-first procedure to the point of rendering an ensuing statement admissible, but its absence is clearly a factor that blunts the efficacy of the warnings and points to a continuing, not a new, interrogation.” Id. at 616 n.7.) Justice Kennedy concurred in the judgment in Seibert, providing the fifth vote for suppression of Seibert’s statement, on the narrower ground that “in the infrequent case, such as we have here, in which the two-step interrogation technique was used in a calculated way to undermine the Miranda warning” (id. at 622), “postwarning statements that are related to the substance of prewarning statements must be excluded unless curative measures are taken before the postwarning statement is made . . . to ensure that a reasonable person in the suspect’s situation would understand the import and effect of the Miranda warning and of the Miranda waiver” (id.), and “[n]o curative steps were taken in this case” (id.). Under Justice Kennedy’s approach, “a substantial break in time and circumstances between the prewarning statement and the Miranda warning may suffice in most circumstances, as it allows the accused to distinguish the two contexts and appreciate that the interrogation has taken a new turn. . . . [a]lternatively, an additional warning that explains the likely inadmissibility of the prewarning custodial statement may be sufficient” (id.). See also Bobby v. Dixon, 565 U.S. 23, 32 (2011) (per curiam) (“the effectiveness of th[e] Miranda warnings was not impaired by the sort of ‘two-step interrogation technique’ condemned in Seibert” because “there was simply ‘no nexus’ between Dixon’s unwarned admission to forgery and his later, warned confession to murder” and there was a “significant break in time and dramatic change in circumstances” between the two interrogations, “creatin[g] ‘a new and distinct experience’” and “ensuring that Dixon’s prior unwarned interrogation did not undermine the effectiveness of the Miranda warnings he received before confessing to Hammer’s murder”). Compare Reyes v. Lewis, 833 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2016) (“Reyes’s postwarning confession should have been suppressed” because the “police officers deliberately employed a two-step interrogation technique, and . . . they did not take appropriate ‘curative measures,’ in violation of [Missouri v. Seibert” (id. at 1033); during the administration of the Miranda warnings, Detective Brandt “played down their importance,” saying he “wanted ‘just to clarify stuff,’ [and] suggesting by his use of the word ‘clarify’ that the ‘stuff’ had already been conveyed in the earlier interview, and that the only purpose of the later interview was clarification. Brandt then said he wanted to ‘read you your rights’ because ‘you’ve been sitting in that room and the door was locked and you’re not free to leave.’ An experienced officer in Brandt’s position would have known that to a reasonable person not trained in the law, let alone a fifteen-year-old high school freshman, these stated reasons were hardly an effective means of conveying the fact that the warning he was about to give could mean the difference between serving life in prison and going home that night.” (id. at 1032); “After Brandt read the Miranda warnings, he said, ‘Do you understand each of these rights that I’ve explained to you? Yeah? OK. Can we talk about the stuff we talked about earlier today? Is that a yes?’ While giving the Miranda warnings, Brandt did not pause to ask ‘Is that a yes?’ after asking if Reyes understood ‘each of the rights’ listed. Only after the Miranda warnings had been completed and after Brandt asked whether ‘we [can] talk about the stuff we talked about earlier today’ did Brandt finally ask ‘Is that a yes?’ and wait for a response. In contrast to the interrogation in Seibert, Brandt did not ask Reyes for a signed waiver of rights or a signed acknowledgment of having read and understood the Miranda warnings. ¶ The psychological, spatial, and temporal break between the unwarned and warned interrogations was not enough to cure the violation. Perhaps most important, Brandt had been a continuous presence throughout.” Id.); United States v. Barnes, 713 F.3d 1200, 1203, 1205-07 (9th Cir. 2013) (per curiam) (“the interrogation was a ‘deliberate two-step’ approach in contravention of Missouri v. Seibert” because the “evidence reflects that the agents deliberately employed the two-step interrogation tactic,” “[t]here was no break or dividing point in the interrogation,” “[t]he agents treated the second round of interrogation as continuous with the first,” and “the agents took no curative measures to mitigate their error” such as “tak[ing] a substantial time break in the interrogation or warn[ing] Barnes that what he had said before the warnings could not be used against him.”); United States v. Capers, 627 F.3d 470, 477, 483, 485 (2d Cir. 2010) (resolving an issue that “Justice Kennedy had no reason to explore” – “how a court should determine when a two-step interrogation had been executed deliberately” – by “hold[ing] that the burden rests on the prosecution to disprove deliberateness”; and applying this rule to require suppression of the defendant’s second (post-warning) confession is required because “the Government has failed to meet its burden of demonstrating that Capers was not subjected to a [deliberate] two-step interrogation” and because “there were no curative measures to ensure that the defendant was not misled with regard to his rights prior to his second confession”); Kelly v. State, 997 N.E.2d 1045, 1053-55 (Ind. 2013) (post-warning statements were the “product of the ‘question-first’ interrogation practice disapproved of in Seibert and therefore inadmissible” because the pre-warning and post-warning statements “concern the same subject . . . [and] were made in the same location, mere minutes apart, in response to the same officer. Most significantly, however, Chief Kiphart and another officer referred to Kelly’s pre-warning admission three times during the post-warning interrogation. . . . Such references, we believe, inevitably diluted the potency of the Miranda warning such that it was powerless to cure the initial failure to warn, even if that failure was a product of good-faith mistake.”); State v. Navy, 386 S.C. 294, 303-04, 688 S.E.2d 838, 842 (2010) (Seibert requires suppression of two postwarning statements, given the absence of “the curative measures suggested by Justice Kennedy,” even though the record does not show that this was a case of a “deliberate” police use of a “‘question first’ strategy”); Martinez v. State, 272 S.W.3d 615, 626-27 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008) (applying Justice Kennedy’s analysis in Seibert to suppress a videotaped statement obtained with a “deliberate two-step strategy” because “the officers did not apprise appellant of his Miranda rights when they began custodial interrogation and failed to apply any curative measures in order to ameliorate the harm caused by the Miranda violation”).

Elstad does not govern cases in which a respondent testifies at trial in order to rebut or explain an incriminating pretrial statement that was erroneously admitted in violation of Miranda. That situation continues to be governed by the exclusionary rule of Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968). See Lujan v. Garcia, 734 F.3d 917, 924-30 (9th Cir. 2013) (in Harrison the “Court held that if Harrison had testified ‘in order to overcome the impact of confessions illegally obtained and hence improperly introduced, then his testimony was tainted by the same illegality that rendered the confessions themselves inadmissible,’” id. at 925; “Harrison outlines a clear exclusionary rule that applies to the States,” id. at 927; “The opinions of Elstad and Harrison should not be conflated to create ambiguity where there is none. Harrison sets forth a clearly established rule that has not been undermined by Elstad.” ¶ Under the Harrison exclusionary rule, when a criminal defendant’s trial testimony is induced by the erroneous admission of his out-of-court confession into evidence as part of the government’s case-in-chief, that trial testimony cannot be introduced in a subsequent prosecution, nor can it be used to support the initial conviction on harmless error review, because to do so would perpetuate the underlying constitutional error.” Id. at 930.).

Even in cases in which a respondent’s second statement is not subject to federal constitutional suppression as the fruit of an earlier Miranda violation because of the rule of Elstad and the limitations of Seibert, counsel can urge the state courts to reject Elstad as a matter of state constitutional law and to preserve the “cat out of the bag” doctrine in its entirety. See, e.g., State v. O’Neill, 193 N.J. 148, 180-81, 936 A.2d 438, 457 (2007); People v. Bethea, 67 N.Y.2d 364, 493 N.E.2d 937, 502 N.Y.S.2d 713 (1986); State v. Aguirre, 301 Kan. 950, 961-62, 349 P.3d 1245, 1252 (2015) (“In State v. Matson, 260 Kan. 366, 374, 921 P.2d 790 (1996), this court said that the validity of a Miranda waiver, after a suspect has previously invoked those rights, depends on whether ‘the accused (a) initiated further discussions with the police and (b) knowingly and intelligently waived the previously asserted right.’ . . . The State failed the Matson test by reinitiating the second interrogation. ¶ Consequently, the taint of the Miranda rights violation in the first interview was not sufficiently attenuated to validate the rights waiver for the second interview, and the statements obtained in the second interview should have been suppressed, as well.”); In the Matter of Daniel H., 15 N.Y.3d 883, 885-87, 938 N.E.2d 966, 968-69, 912 N.Y.S.2d 533, 535-36 (2010) (Ciparick, J., dissenting from the dismissal of an appeal on jurisdictional grounds) (expressing the view that, under the state constitutional standard for analyzing Seibert issues, which resembles the Seibert plurality’s approach, a juvenile’s “age should be a factor in considering whether his Mirandized statement was sufficiently attenuated from his prior, unwarned statement” because the “risk that Miranda warnings might be ineffective is heightened where, as here, the suspect is a juvenile” and thus “is less likely than an adult to perceive any given period spent in constant police custody as a ‘break,’” “is more likely to feel compelled to continue answering questions posed by the same officers who conducted the unwarned interrogation,” and “is less likely to comprehend the meaning of Miranda warnings read shortly following a confession and understand that he can remain silent”); and see generally § 7.09 supra.

§ 24.20(c) Statements Tainted by a Prior Statement Taken In Violation of the Sixth Amendment

The Supreme Court has expressly reserved the question “whether the rationale of Elstad applies when a suspect makes incriminating earlier police questioning in violation of [the] Sixth Amendment standards” discussed in § 24.13. See Fellers v. United States, 540 U.S. 519, 525 (2004). The analytic approach the Court used in Elstad to reject the concept of presumptive taint for fruits of a Miranda violation and to distinguish the situation of a coerced confession (see § 24.20(a) supra) would seem to render Elstad inapplicable when the interests at stake are those protected by the Sixth Amendment’s right to counsel. As in the due process context, the prosecution bears the burden of proving that a Sixth Amendment violation in taking the previous statement did not taint the subsequent statement. See Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431, 441-48 (1984).

§ 24.20(d) Statements Tainted by a Prior Statement Taken In Violation of the Fourth Amendment

The reasoning of Elstad and the distinction that it drew between Miranda violations and coercion in violation of the Due Process Clause (see § 24.20(a) supra) also suggest that Elstad does not limit the pre-Elstad caselaw governing suppression of a second statement following a previous statement obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment (see Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200, 218 n.20 (1979) (dealing with “subsequent statements . . . which . . . were ‘clearly the result and the fruit of the first’” where an initial statement was the product of an arrest without probable cause). As in the other contexts discussed in §§ 24.20(a) and 24.20(c) supra, the prosecution bears the burden of proving dissipation of taint. See Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. at 441-48 (addressing the prosecutorial burden of disproving taint in the Sixth Amendment context and suggesting that the same rule applies in Fourth Amendment cases (id. at 442)).

§ 24.20(e) Potential Implications of Elstad for Physical Fruits of an Unconstitutionally Obtained Statement

The principles discussed in the preceding subparts have to do with suppression of statements as the fruits of a constitutional violation in obtaining a previous statement. In United States v. Patane, 542 U.S. 630 (2004), a plurality of three Justices, joined by two other Justices on narrower reasoning, employed the rationale of Elstad to conclude that a Miranda violation in obtaining a statement does not provide a basis for suppressing “the physical fruits of the suspect’s unwarned but voluntary statements.” \textit{Id.} at 634, 636 (plurality opinion). \textit{Accord, id.} at 644-45 (Justice Kennedy, concurring in the judgment, joined by Justice O’Connor). Here again, the Court limited its analysis to \textit{Miranda} violations, distinguishing them from the situation of a coerced statement. \textit{See id.} at 634 (plurality opinion); \textit{id.} at 645 (Justice Kennedy, concurring in the judgment). \textit{See, e.g., Dye v. Commonwealth, 411 S.W.3d 227, 236-38 (Ky. 2013)} (suppression of the defendant’s statement as involuntary in violation of Due Process also required the suppression of the physical “evidence seized pursuant to the . . . search warrant . . . which was issued upon information contained in his involuntary confession”). Even with respect to \textit{Miranda} violations, counsel can seek a more protective rule on state constitutional grounds. \textit{See, e.g., State v. Farris}, 109 Ohio St. 3d 519, 529, 849 N.E.2d 985, 996 (2006) (“We . . . join the other states that have already determined after \textit{Patane} that their state constitutions’ protections against self-incrimination extend to physical evidence seized as a result of pre-\textit{Miranda} statements”); \textit{State v. Knapp}, 285 Wis. 2d 86, 89, 130, 700 N.W.2d 899, 901, 921 (2005) (after the Supreme Court’s \textit{vacatur} and remand of the state supreme court’s previous decision in light of \textit{United States v. Patane}, the Wisconsin Supreme Court relies on the state constitution to reinstate its previous result that physical evidence had to be suppressed as a fruit of a \textit{Miranda} violation); \textit{State v. Peterson}, 181 Vt. 436, 446-47, 923 A.2d 585, 592-93 (2007) (“agree[ing] with” decisions of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, Ohio Supreme Court, and Wisconsin Supreme Court that rejected \textit{United States v. Patane} on state constitutional grounds, and construing “the Vermont Constitution and our exclusionary rule” to hold that “[p]hysical evidence gained from statements obtained under circumstances that violate \textit{Miranda} is inadmissible in criminal proceedings as fruit of the poisonous tree”); and see generally §7.09 \textit{supra}.

\textit{Part E. Trial Issues in Cases Involving Incriminating Statements by the Respondent}

\textbf{§ 24.21 PROSECUTORIAL PROOF OF CORPUS DELICTI}

In some jurisdictions, a trial judge can refuse to admit a confession into evidence before the prosecution has presented a \textit{prima facie} case of the commission of the offense charged. This preliminary showing is commonly called the \textit{corpus delicti}. \textit{See, e.g., State v. Curlew, 459 A.2d 160, 163-64 (Me. 1983)} (“Maine case law . . . leaves the order of proof within the sound judicial discretion of the trial judge. . . . [T]he exercise of discretion . . . should be guided by a strong preference for proof of the corpus delicti prior to admitting in evidence a confession or admission of the defendant.”). The \textit{corpus delicti} needs not include proof of the identity of the respondent (although, of course, it is possible that some of the evidence comprising the \textit{corpus delicti} will \textit{also} tend to identify the respondent). \textit{See, e.g., Stano v. State, 473 So. 2d 1282, 1287 (Fla. 1985)} (“There are three elements to the corpus delicti of a homicide: 1) The fact of death; 2) the criminal agency of another; and 3) the identity of the victim.”). In other jurisdictions the term “\textit{corpus delicti}” simply expresses the near-universal rule that a respondent’s confession must be corroborated in order to make a submissible case for the prosecution; \textit{corpus delicti} analysis relates to the standard of proof for a directed verdict and does not control the order of proof. \textit{See, Jurisdictions that do enforce the corpus delicti principle as regulating the order of proof ordinarily give the trial judge discretion to permit the prosecutor to vary the order and to prove the confession prior to the corpus, subject to “connecting up.” See, e.g., State v. Hendrickson, 140 Wash. App. 913, 921-24, 168 P.3d 42, 424-26 (2007). Defense counsel should object to the confession and resist any variance in the order of proof. Frequently the prosecution’s case on corpus delicti is borderline, and a judge who has heard the details of a confession will tend to lean somewhat against the accused in determining whether the corpus has been proved.

§ 24.22 THE RIGHT OF THE DEFENSE TO SHOW THE CIRCUMSTANCES UNDER WHICH THE STATEMENT WAS MADE

When a defense motion to suppress an incriminating statement of the respondent has been denied and the prosecution introduces the statement at trial, the defense will frequently want to show the coercive circumstances that prompted the statement, so as to persuade the trier of fact that the statement should be accorded little weight in the assessment of guilt or innocence. In Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986), the Court made clear that a respondent cannot be precluded from presenting evidence of this sort at trial despite the denial of a pretrial motion challenging the confession as involuntary on the basis of the same evidence. The Court explained that the guarantees of “procedural fairness” embodied in the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments (id. at 689-90) require that the defense be permitted to present evidence at trial concerning “the physical and psychological environment that yielded the confession . . . regardless of whether the defendant marshaled the same evidence earlier in support of an unsuccessful motion to suppress, and entirely independent of any question of voluntariness.” Id. at 689. See also People v. Bedessie, 19 N.Y.3d 147, 149, 161, 970 N.E.2d 380, 381, 388-89, 947 N.Y.S.2d 357, 358, 365-66 (2012) (recognizing that, “in a proper case,” the accused is entitled to present “expert testimony [at trial] on the phenomenon of false confessions” because “there is no doubt that experts in such disciplines as psychiatry and psychology or the social sciences may offer valuable testimony to educate a jury about those factors of personality and situation that the relevant scientific community considers to be associated with false confessions”); State v. Perea, 322 P.3d 624, 640-41 (Utah 2013) (“expert testimony regarding the phenomenon of false confessions should be admitted so long as it meets the standards set out in rule 702 of the Utah Rules of Evidence and it is relevant to the facts of the specific case”: “False confessions are an unsettling and unfortunate reality of our criminal justice system”; “expert testimony about factors leading to a false confession assists a ‘trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue’”; “[r]ecent laboratory-based studies have identified several factors that increase the likelihood of false confessions”; and “[t]o require a defendant to testify regarding the factors that contributed to his alleged false confession, rather than allow the use of an expert witness, opens the defendant up to cross-examination and impinges on his constitutionally guaranteed right against self-incrimination.”). The Cutler & Leo articles cited in the penultimate paragraph of § 24.04(d) supra provide information and insights that will be helpful to defense counsel in arguing that the trier of fact should discredit incriminating statements produced by commonplace

In arguing that the circumstances surrounding the making of a statement vitiate its credibility, counsel should point out that, as the Supreme Court has recognized, “authoritative opinion has cast formidable doubt upon the reliability and trustworthiness of ‘confessions’ by children.” In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 52 (1967). “[C]onfessions of juveniles require special caution” (id. at 45), and “the greatest care must be taken to assure that the admission . . . was not the product of . . . adolescent fantasy, fright or despair” (id. at 55). See also J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261, 269 (2011) (“[T]he pressure of custodial interrogation is so immense that it ‘can induce a frighteningly high percentage of people to confess to crimes they never committed.’ . . . That risk is all the more troubling – and recent studies suggest, all the more acute – when the subject of custodial interrogation is a juvenile.”). See generally § 24.05(a) (discussing empirical findings on false confessions by juvenile suspects); and the discussion of an interrogator’s trickery in obtaining a confession as a factor undermining its credibility in Aleman v. Village of Hanover Park, 662 F.3d 897 (7th Cir. 2011), summarized in § 24.04(d).

§ 24.23 THE PROSECUTOR’S POWER TO USE A SUPPRESSED STATEMENT FOR IMPEACHMENT

The rules governing prosecutorial use of suppressed statements to impeach a respondent’s trial testimony vary, depending upon the constitutional doctrine under which the statement was suppressed.

If a statement was suppressed on grounds of involuntariness (§§ 24.03-24.06 supra), then the statement is inadmissible for impeachment or any other purpose at trial. Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 397-98, 402 (1978); see New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450, 458-60 (1979); Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586, 590 (2009) (dictum).

If a statement was suppressed on Miranda grounds (§§ 24.07-24.12 supra) but was not found involuntary, federal constitutional law does not forbid the prosecutor to use that statement for impeachment of the respondent’s inconsistent testimony at trial. Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971); Oregon v. Hass, 420 U.S. 714 (1975).

Statements suppressed on Sixth Amendment grounds (§ 24.13 supra) also may be used by the prosecution to impeach a respondent’s inconsistent testimony at trial. In Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586 (2009), the Court held that a statement which had been deliberately elicited by a jailhouse informant acting as an agent for law enforcement officers and which had not been preceded by a valid waiver of the right to counsel was “concededly elicited in violation of the Sixth Amendment” but “was admissible to challenge [the defendant’s] . . . inconsistent testimony at trial.” Id. at 594.

State courts may take a dim view of the prosecutor’s use of illegally obtained statements for impeachment, and counsel should argue that the state constitution prohibits prosecutors from using statements suppressed on Miranda or Sixth Amendment grounds for any purpose at trial. See, e.g., People v. Disbrow, 16 Cal. 3d 101, 113, 545 P.2d 272, 280, 127 Cal. Rptr. 360, 368 (1976) (abrogated by a subsequent initiative constitutional amendment); State v. Santiago, 53 Hawai’i 254, 265-66, 492 P.2d 657, 664 (1971); see also State v. Brunelle, 148 Vt. 347, 351-55, 534 A.2d 198, 202-04 (1987) (construing the state constitution’s explicit guarantee of “the right to testify on one’s own behalf” and the state constitution’s due process clause to “hold that previously suppressed evidence is unavailable to the State for impeachment purposes except when it is clear that the defendant has testified during direct examination” to “facts contradicted by previously suppressed evidence bearing directly on the crime charged”; “We believe this rule will achieve a fair balance between defendant’s right to testify on his or her own behalf and the State’s interest in preventing perjury. To permit the use of suppressed evidence to impeach testimony first brought out on cross-examination would upset this balance and impose an untenable chilling effect on defendant’s right to testify.”); and see generally § 7.09 supra.

Even under the federal constitutional rule permitting statements obtained in violation of Miranda and the Sixth Amendment to be used for impeachment of the respondent, they cannot be used to impeach defense witnesses other than the respondent. See, e.g., James v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 307 (1990) (state court erred in “expanding the scope of the impeachment exception to permit prosecutors to use illegally obtained evidence to impeach the credibility of defense witnesses” (id. at 313); the “impeachment exception [is] limited to the testimony of [the] defendant[ ]” (id. at 320)).

§ 24.24 ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE OF THE RESPONDENT'S PRE- OR POST-ARREST SILENCE

Prosecutors commonly offer evidence of a respondent’s pretrial failure to avow innocence or deny guilt in either of two contexts. Proof that the respondent failed to deny accusations made in his or her presence by police or private citizens may be offered (usually in the prosecution’s case in chief) as “adoptive admissions,” or “tacit admissions.” And proof that the respondent did not tell the police – or did not tell anyone before trial – the exculpatory story that s/he relates in his or her trial testimony may be offered (usually on cross-examination of the respondent, but sometimes through prosecution witnesses called in rebuttal) to impeach the respondent’s testimony as a “recent fabrication.”

Common-law rules of evidence regarding these two kinds of proof vary considerably from State to State. Some States have precluded prosecutorial use of an accused’s pretrial silence because the evidence has low probative value (given that the accused’s taciturnity may have been motivated by an awareness of the right to silence or of the risks of responding to police questioning, by distrust of the police, or by any of a host of other factors) and there is a high risk that the introduction of the evidence will prejudice the accused. See, e.g., People v. Williams, 25 N.Y.3d 185, 190-93, 31 N.E.3d 103, 105-08, 8 N.Y.S.3d 641, 643-46 (2015); and see State v. Easter, 130 Wash. 2d 228, 235 n.5, 922 P.2d 1285, 1289 n.5 (1996) (citing caselaw from other States in which the courts “ruled on evidentiary grounds [that] pre-arrest silence is not admissible because of its low probative value and high potential for undue prejudice”).

Apart from the complexities of these common-law evidentiary doctrines, proof of the respondent’s silence to show an “adoptive admission” or “recent fabrication” raises state and federal constitutional issues. The constitutional analysis is affected by whether the silence that the prosecutor seeks to prove occurred (1) before or after arrest and (2) before or after administration of the Miranda warnings described in § 24.09 supra.

In Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610, 619 (1976), the Supreme Court squarely held that an accused’s “silence, at the time of arrest and after receiving Miranda warnings” is constitutionally inadmissible against him or her, even for the purpose of impeaching the accused’s trial testimony as a recent fabrication. The reasoning of Doyle is that the Miranda warnings implicitly assure the person to whom they are given that s/he may remain silent with impunity, and it is fundamentally unfair and a violation of due process to use the person’s subsequent silence as incriminating evidence, 426 U.S. at 617-19, particularly inasmuch as the silence is “insolubly ambiguous because of what the State is required to advise the person arrested,” id. at 617. See also Portuondo v. Agard, 529 U.S. 61, 74-75 (2000) (dictum); Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 628 (1993) (dictum); Hurd v. Terhune, 619 F.3d 1080, 1088-89 (9th Cir. 2010); People v. Shafier, 483 Mich. 205, 218-19, 768 N.W.2d 305, 313 (2009); People v. Clary, 494 Mich. 260, 833 N.W.2d 308 (2013); State v. Brooks, 304 S.W.3d 130, 133-34 (Mo. 2010). The Doyle doctrine prohibits the state from “mak[ing] use of the defendant’s exercise of [his] . . . rights [to remain silent] in obtaining his conviction,” Wainwright v. Greenfield, 474 U.S. 284, 292 (1986), and thus bars not only the use of silence to impeach the accused but also any use of the accused’s assertion of his Miranda rights as proof of sanity in a case in which an insanity defense is asserted. Id. at 295.

In Greer v. Miller, 483 U.S. 756 (1987), the Court held that Doyle did not require the invalidation of a conviction when the prosecutor asked a single impermissible question touching on the defendant’s silence after Miranda warnings and the trial court immediately sustained a defense objection and gave a curative instruction. Greer illustrates the desirability of filing a pretrial motion for an order in limine forbidding the prosecutor’s use or attempted use of evidence that is inadmissible under Doyle. See § 7.03 supra regarding the utility of such motions, at least in jurisdictions where the respondent is entitled to a jury trial and those in which it is possible to litigate motions in limine before a judge other than the one who will sit at a bench trial of the issue of guilt or innocence (§ 20.05 supra).

Doyle concerned the implications of the administration of Miranda warnings and thus does not govern prosecutorial evidence of either a respondent’s pre-arrest silence (Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231, 239-40 (1980)), or post-arrest silence when no Miranda warnings were given (Fletcher v. Weir, 455 U.S. 603, 606-07 (1982) (per curiam). In Jenkins and Fletcher, the Court rejected Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment challenges to the prosecution’s use of un-Mirandized defendants’ silence to cross-examine them at trial. Significantly, the defendants in Jenkins and Fletcher had not combined their silence with an explicit invocation of the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination. Moreover, because the prosecutorial use of silence in both cases occurred during the cross-examination of a testifying defendant at trial, the cases fit within the principle that once an accused has chosen to abandon his or her position of silence by testifying, the prosecution has an overriding interest in being permitted to test the accused’s story for veracity through “‘the traditional truth-testing devices of the adversary process.’” Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. at 238.

In Salinas v. Texas, 570 U.S. 178 (2013), the Court granted certiorari on the question “[w]hether or under what circumstances the Fifth Amendment’s Self-Incrimination Clause protects a defendant’s refusal to answer law enforcement questioning before he has been arrested or read his Miranda rights.” See Petition for a Writ of Certiorari at i, Salinas v. Texas, (No. 12-246), 2012 WL 3645103, at *i. Salinas once again involved a defendant who did not expressly invoke his Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination, but the case differed from Jenkins and Fletcher in that the prosecutor used the defendant’s prearrest, non-Mirandized silence in the prosecution’s case in chief. In a 5-4 decision, the Court rejected the defendant’s Fifth Amendment claim, but the majority was unable to agree on a rationale. A plurality opinion, authored by Justice Alito and joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Kennedy, concluded that Salinas’s “Fifth Amendment claim fails because he did not expressly invoke the privilege against self-incrimination in response to the officer’s question.” Salinas, 570 U.S. at 181 (plurality opinion). Justices Thomas and Scalia concurred in the judgment on the broader rationale that “Salinas’ claim would fail even if he had invoked the privilege because the prosecutor’s comments regarding his precustodial silence did not compel him to give self-incriminating testimony.” Id. at 192 (Thomas J., concurring in the judgment, joined by Scalia, J., arguing for the overruling of the entire jurisprudence of Griffin v. California and its progeny (see § 33.05 infra)). The four dissenting Justices concluded that even when there has been no express invocation of the Fifth Amendment Privilege, use of an accused’s silence in the prosecution’s case in chief is nonetheless barred if “an exercise of the Fifth Amendment’s privilege” can be “fairly infer[red] from an individual’s silence and surrounding circumstances.” Id. at 203 (Breyer J., dissenting, joined by Ginsburg, Sotomayor, and Kagan, JJ.).

In the wake of Salinas, it seems readily apparent that a suspect’s explicit invocation of the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination will bar the prosecution from using the suspect’s silence as evidence in its case in chief at trial. See, e.g., United States v. Okatan, 728 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2013) (Okatan, seated in his automobile, was approached by a border patrol agent who questioned Okatan about his reasons for being in the area, then “warned Okatan that lying to a federal officer is a criminal act and asked whether he was there to pick someone up. Okatan said that he wanted a lawyer” and the agent then arrested him (id. at 114). “[E]ven when an individual is not in custody, because of ‘the unique role the lawyer plays in the adversary system of criminal justice in this country,’ . . . a request for a lawyer in response to law enforcement questioning suffices to put an officer on notice that the individual means to invoke the privilege [against self-incrimination]” (id. at 119). “[W]e conclude that where, as here, an individual is interrogated by an officer, even prior to arrest, his invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination and his subsequent silence cannot be used by the government in its case in chief as substantive evidence of guilt.” Id. at 120.). Although Justice Alito’s plurality opinion in Salinas only addresses the question of what happens when a suspect fails to invoke the Privilege explicitly, the opinion’s wording and reasoning convey that the plurality surely would have reached the opposite result if the Privilege had been invoked explicitly. Moreover, even if only a single member of the plurality were to support a bar to the use of silence in such a situation, that single vote would combine with the four Salinas dissenters’ votes to create a majority in favor of a prohibitory rule.

The prosecution should also be barred from using a suspect’s silence in its case in chief if the suspect explicitly invoked the right to counsel after being advised of it, whether through Miranda warnings or in some other form. Such an invocation should command the protections of the Doyle exclusionary rule because the prosecution’s use of silence under these circumstances would work the same type of unfairness that was condemned in Doyle.

This is another area in which state constitutional guarantees may offer more protection than their federal parallels. See § 7.09 supra. Some state courts have concluded that their respective constitutions bar prosecutorial use of a suspect’s pretrial silence, either categorically (see Commonwealth v. Molina, 628 Pa. 465, 502, 104 A.3d 430, 452 (Pa. 2014) (the state constitution “is violated when the prosecution uses a defendant’s silence whether pre or post-arrest as substantive evidence of guilt”); People v. Pavone, 26 N.Y.3d 629, 47 N.E.3d 56, 26 N.Y.S.3d 728 (2015) (dictum) (holding that the prosecution’s use of the defendant’s pretrial silence violates the state constitution’s due process guarantee, “whether the People use defendant’s silence as part of the case-in-chief or for impeachment purposes” (id. at 641, 47 N.E.3d at 66, 26 N.Y.S.3d at 738) and “reject[ing] the People’s artificial distinction between defendants who are arrested and remain silent before Miranda warnings have been provided, and those who remain silent afterwards” (id. at 642, 47 N.E.3d at 67, 26 N.Y.S.3d at 739): “[i]ndeed this Court has even held that pre-arrest silence cannot be used against a defendant in the People’s case-in-chief.” Id.), or at least if it took place after arrest (State v. Hoggins, 718 So. 2d 761 (Fla. 1998); State v. Davis, 38 Wash. App. 600, 686 P.2d 1143 (1984)) or “at or near the time of arrest, during official interrogation, or while in police custody” (State v. Muhammad, 182 N.J. 551, 569, 868 A.2d 302, 312 (2005)).
Chapter 25

Motions To Suppress Identification Testimony

§ 25.01 INTRODUCTION AND OVERVIEW

In the vast majority of delinquency cases, the prosecution proves the respondent’s identity as the perpetrator through an in-court identification of the respondent: The complainant or an eyewitness testifies that the youth seated next to defense counsel is the person who committed the crime. (The exceptions are cases in which the perpetrator’s identity is proved through scientific evidence (such as fingerprints or serology evidence), circumstantial evidence (such as the respondent’s possession of the fruits of the crime), the respondent’s confession, and/or the testimony of a turncoat accomplice.)

Although some cases may involve a respondent who is a longstanding acquaintance of the complainant or eyewitness, most identifications in delinquency cases are based upon the complainant’s or eyewitness’s momentary observation of a stranger. Frequently, that identification has been shaped (or at least affected) by the witness’s participation in one or more of the following police identification procedures:

(a) A “lineup” in which the witness observes the respondent standing among a group (usually ranging from seven to ten persons) and is asked to select the perpetrator.

(b) A “show-up” in which the witness is shown only the respondent and asked whether the respondent was the perpetrator.

(c) A “photographic identification procedure” in which the witness either is shown a group of photographs (a “photo array” usually consisting of five to ten “mug shots” or a “mug-book” – an entire book of mug shots) and asked to select the perpetrator or is shown a single photograph and asked whether the person depicted was the perpetrator.

As the Supreme Court has recognized, a “witness’ recollection of the stranger can be distorted easily by the circumstances or by later actions of the police,” Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98, 112 (1977), and “[t]he influence of improper suggestion upon identifying witnesses probably accounts for more miscarriages of justice than any other single factor – perhaps it is responsible for more such errors than all other factors combined.” United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 229 (1967). See also Perry v. New Hampshire, 565 U.S. 228, 245 (2012) (“the annals of criminal law are rife with instances of mistaken identifications’” (quoting Wade, 388 U.S. at 228)).

The Court has established three separate constitutional doctrines regulating the use of identification testimony, each of which provides a basis for suppressing identification testimony by the complainant and any eyewitnesses:

(b) The Sixth Amendment doctrine: Police-staged lineups and show-ups held after the right to counsel has attached may be unconstitutional if they were conducted in the absence of counsel for the respondent. See § 25.06 infra.

(c) The Fourth Amendment doctrine: Testimony regarding a lineup or other custodial identification made as a result of an illegal arrest or detention is inadmissible. See § 25.07 infra.

State-law doctrines may provide additional bases for objecting to identification testimony. See § 25.08 infra.

In some jurisdictions, statutes or court rules provide for a pretrial motion to suppress identification testimony. At such a hearing the prosecutor ordinarily presents the police officer who conducted the identification procedure and the complainant or eyewitness who made the identification. (In some jurisdictions the prosecutor presents only the police officer, taking advantage of the admissibility of hearsay evidence in a suppression hearing (see § 22.03(e) supra) to have the officer testify to the witness’s identification as well as the witness’s account of his or her ability to observe the perpetrator.) In any pretrial identification suppression hearing at which an identifying witness will testify, it is advisable for the defense to waive the respondent’s presence during the witness’s testimony. See § 22.03(b) supra.

In other jurisdictions defense objections to identification testimony or motions to suppress it are litigated in a mid-trial hearing or a series of voir dire examinations of the prosecution’s identification witnesses. In jury trials it “may often be advisable [and,] . . . [i]n some circumstances . . . may be constitutionally necessary” to conduct such hearings outside the presence of the jury, Watkins v. Sowders, 449 U.S. 341, 349 (1981), although there is no “per se [constitutional] rule compelling such a procedure in every case.” Id. Here, too, counsel should arrange that the respondent be removed from the courtroom during the voir dire proceedings litigating the admissibility of identification testimony.

This chapter examines the various doctrines governing suppression or exclusion of identification testimony. Procedural requirements governing suppression motions and strategic considerations in drafting the motions are discussed in Chapter 7. Techniques for conducting a suppression hearing are discussed in Chapter 22.

Part A. Due Process Grounds for Suppressing an Identification as Unreliable
§ 25.02 THE DUE PROCESS STANDARD

Police-staged identification procedures that are unduly suggestive may impair the reliability of the resulting identification and render it inadmissible. Foster v. California, 394 U.S. 440 (1969). The focus of the Due Process standard for admissibility of identification testimony is the interplay between (1) actions by law enforcement agents that may undermine the reliability of an identification, and (2) the susceptibility of each identifying witness’s testimony to distortion by those actions. As in the case of confessions (see § 24.03 supra), unreliability alone – unaffected by any governmental behavior that could contribute to it – will not support suppression or exclusion of identification testimony. Some state activity conducing to inaccuracy is necessary. See Perry v. New Hampshire, 565 U.S. 228, 248 (2012), discussed in § 25.05 infra. Once that activity is shown, “[i]t is the reliability of identification evidence that primarily determines its admissibility.” Watkins v. Sowders, 449 U.S. 341, 347 (1981); Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98, 113-14 (1977). See Sexton v. Beaudreaux, 138 S. Ct. 2555, 2559-60 (2018) (per curiam) (dictum).

Under current Due Process doctrine, the admissibility of an identification is determined by weighing “the corrupting effect of the suggestive identification” against factors showing the identification to be reliable notwithstanding the suggestiveness of the police-staged confrontation. Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. at 114. See also Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188, 199 (1972) (the “central question” is whether “the identification procedure was reliable even though the confrontation procedure was suggestive”). In gauging the reliability of the identification, “[t]he factors to be considered . . . include the opportunity of the witness to view the criminal at the time of the crime, the witness’ degree of attention, the accuracy of his prior description of the criminal, the level of certainty demonstrated at the confrontation, and the time between the crime and the confrontation.” Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. at 114. See also Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. at 199-200; Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377, 385 (1968). If a suggestive police identification procedure created a “very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification,” then the court must suppress both the pretrial identification, Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. at 197 (dictum), and any in-court identifications tainted by the constitutionally defective pretrial identification, see Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1, 4-6 (1970) (dictum).

Thus the prevailing federal Due Process inquiry has two distinct components. The court determines, first, whether any police identification procedure was suggestive. If it was suggestive, then the distorting influence of the procedure is weighed against considerations indicating that the identification is nevertheless reliable. See, e.g., State v. Thamer, 777 P.2d 432, 435 (Utah 1989) (“We apply a two-step test to determine whether a pre-indictment or pre-information photo array is so suggestive that the subsequent admission of an in-court identification violates the due process clause. First, we must determine whether there was a pretrial photographic identification procedure used which was so impermissibly suggestive as to give rise to a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. . . . Second, if the photo array is impermissibly suggestive, then the in-court identification must be based on an untainted, independent foundation to be reliable.”); State v. Novotny, 297 Kan. 1174, 1180-83, 307 P.3d 1278, 1284-86 (2013) (essentially the same). Section 25.03 infra examines the factors involved in assessing the suggestiveness of a police identification procedure, and § 25.04 examines the reliability factors. Section 25.05 explores the possible arguments that a respondent is entitled to suppression of an unreliable identification even when there was no police suggestiveness.

Of course, the state courts are free to construe their state constitutions as establishing a more protective due process standard than the federal test for admission of identification testimony. See, e.g., Young v. State, 374 P.3d 395 (Alaska 2016) (construing the state constitution to “depart from Manson v. Brathwaite and the Alaska cases that relied on it as the touchstone” because “[d]evelopments in the science related to the reliability of eyewitness identifications, and courts’ responses to those developments, have significantly weakened our confidence in the Brathwaite test as a tool for preventing the admission of unreliable evidence at trial, and therefore its capacity for protecting the due process rights afforded by the Alaska Constitution” (id. at 413); “we are convinced that the Brathwaite test does not adequately assess the reliability of eyewitness identifications and thus allows the admission of very persuasive evidence of doubtful reliability” (id. at 416); the court replaces “the [Neil v.] Biggers factors” with a list that reflects the “scientific literature” on “the factors that can affect the reliability of eyewitness identifications” (id. at 417); the court also holds that a defendant’s presentation of “some evidence of suggestiveness” is sufficient to require “an evidentiary hearing on the issue,” that “a defendant need not show that a procedure was ‘unnecessarily suggestive’ in order to get a hearing,” and that “[a]t the hearing the State must present evidence that the identification is nonetheless reliable” (id. at 427); the court further holds that “[i]f eyewitness identification is a significant issue in a case, the trial court should issue an appropriate jury instruction that sets out the relevant factors affecting reliability.” (id. at 428)); State v. Henderson, 208 N.J. 208, 287 n.10, 288-93, 27 A.3d 872, 919 n.10, 919-922 (2011) (construing the state constitution’s due process clause to remedy the “shortcomings” of the Supreme Court’s Manson v. Brathwaite standard by adopting a “new framework” that “allows judges to consider all relevant factors that affect reliability in deciding whether an identification is admissible; that is not heavily weighted by factors that can be corrupted by suggestiveness; that promotes deterrence in a meaningful way; and that focuses on helping jurors both understand and evaluate the effects that various factors have on memory.”); State v. Dubose, 285 Wis. 2d 143, 148, 165-66, 699 N.W.2d 582, 584-85, 593-94 (2005) (“adopt[ing] standards for the admissibility of out-of-court identification evidence similar to those set forth in the United States Supreme Court’s [pre-Manson] decision in Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 . . . (1967) [§ 27.3.1 infra]” and holding that “evidence obtained from an out-of-court showup is inherently suggestive and will not be admissible unless, based on the totality of the circumstances, the procedure was necessary”; recognizing that “[a] lineup or photo array is generally fairer than a showup,” and therefore specifying that “[a] showup will not be necessary . . . unless the police lacked probable cause to make an arrest or, as a result of other exigent circumstances, could not have conducted a lineup or photo array.”); People v. Adams, 53 N.Y.2d 241, 423 N.E.2d 379, 440 N.Y.S.2d 902 (1981) (rejecting the “totality of the circumstances” analysis of Neil v. Biggers and Manson v. Brathwaite in favor of the Supreme Court’s earlier analytical approach, which looked first at the suggestiveness of the identification and, upon finding it unduly suggestive, excluded the identification unless the prosecution could show that the identification had an “independent source”); Commonwealth v. Johnson, 420 Mass. 458, 463, 472, 650 N.E.2d 1257, 1260, 1265 (1995) (same as People v. Adams, supra: “reject[ing] Brathwaite” on state constitutional grounds and “adher[ing] to the stricter rule of per se exclusion previously followed by the Supreme Court and first set forth in the Wade-Gilbert-Stovall trilogy”); State v. Lawson, 352 Or. 724, 740, 761-62, 291 P.3d 673, 685, 696-97 (2012) (“Based on [an] . . . extensive review of the current scientific research and literature,” the state supreme court takes “judicial notice of the data contained in those various sources as legislative facts” to revise the state-law “test governing the admission of eyewitness testimony.” Inter alia, the burden rests on “the state as the proponent of the eyewitness identification” to “establish all preliminary facts necessary to establish admissibility of the eyewitness evidence”; then, “[i]f the state satisfies its burden,” the burden shifts to the defendant to establish that, “although the eyewitness evidence is otherwise admissible, the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading the jury, or by considerations of undue delay or needless presentation of cumulative evidence.”); see also Dennis v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 834 F.3d 263, 336-40 (3d Cir. 2016) (en banc) (McKee, C.J., concurring) (discussing the above-cited opinions of the New Jersey and Oregon Supreme Courts as examples of state courts’ “creat[ion] [of] new procedures and evidentiary frameworks that minimize the risks associated with erroneous eyewitness identifications”); and see generally § 7.09 supra.

§ 25.03 SUGGESTIVENESS OF POLICE IDENTIFICATION PROCEDURES

See also Dennis v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 834 F.3d 263, 314-45 (3d Cir. 2016) (en banc) (McKee, C.J., concurring) (documenting and analyzing factors that undermine the reliability of eyewitness identifications); Bey v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 856 F.3d 230, 240 & nn.50-51 (3d Cir. 2017) (“The scientific community has understood for decades that eyewitness identifications that are certain and confident are not necessarily accurate. . . . Rather, a witness may honestly hold beliefs about what he or she saw that are distorted, inaccurate, or even completely wrong.”); Commonwealth v. Gomes, 470 Mass. 352, 369-76, 22 N.E.3d 897, 910-16 (2015) (discussing five principles of eyewitness identification that “we determine to have achieved a near consensus in the relevant scientific community and therefore are ‘so generally accepted’ that it is appropriate that they now be included in a revised model jury instruction regarding eyewitness identification,” and “also summariz[ing] the research that informed our conclusions as to each generally accepted principle”); Commonwealth v. Bastaldo, 472 Mass. 16, 18, 32 N.E.3d 873, 877 (2015) (supplementing the court’s decision in Gomes, supra, by further discussing cross-racial and cross-ethnic identifications, and holding that “[i]n criminal trials that commence after the issuance of this opinion, a cross-racial instruction should always be included when giving the model eyewitness identification instruction, unless the parties agree that there was no cross-racial identification,” and that trial judges have the “discretion to include a cross-ethnic eyewitness identification instruction in appropriate circumstances”); People v. Boone, 30 N.Y.3d 521, 529-30, 535-36, 91 N.E.3d 1194, 1198-99, 1202-03, 69 N.Y.S.3d 215, 219-20, 223-24 (2017) (“In light of our discussion of the cross-race effect, which has been accepted by a near consensus in the relevant scientific community of cognitive and social psychologists, and recognizing the very significant part that inaccurate identifications play in wrongful convictions, we reach the following holding: in a case in which a witness’s identification of the defendant is at issue, and the identifying witness and defendant appear to be of different races, a trial court is required to give, upon request, during final instructions, a jury charge on the cross-race effect, instructing (1) that the jury should consider whether there is a difference in race between the defendant and the witness who identified the defendant, and (2) that, if so, the jury should consider (a) that some people have greater difficulty in accurately identifying members of a different race than in accurately identifying members of their own race and (b) whether the difference in race affected the accuracy of the witness’s identification.” ¶ Such an instruction is needed because “[t]here is . . . a significant disparity between what the psychological research shows and what uninstructed jurors believe.” ¶ “Expert testimony on the cross-race effect is not a precondition of a jury charge on the subject.”). The following subsections discuss recurring features of identification procedures that judicial opinions have recognized as suggestive. Counsel should emphasize these when they are present but should also consult the social-science literature cited above to document other factors that tend to make identifications unreliable.

A model for best practices in staged identification proceedings is set out in Louisiana 2018 Senate Bill 38, signed into law on May 23, 2018, and constitutes a valuable resource for defense counsel as illustrating state-of-the-art understanding of how these proceedings should be conducted. Available at http://www.legis.la.gov/Legis/ViewDocument.aspx?id=1087122, it requires agencies administering identification procedures to adopt policies designed to reduce erroneous eyewitness identifications and to enhance the reliability and objectivity of such identifications. All agencies must either adopt the model policy recommended by the Louisiana Sheriff’s Executive Management Institute or draft their own policies based on “[c]redible field, academic, or laboratory research on eyewitness memory.” The policies must include, inter alia, the following information regarding evidence-based practices:

“(a) Procedures for selecting photograph and live lineup filler photographs or participants to ensure that the photographs or participant:
   “(i) Are consistent in appearance with the description of the alleged perpetrator.
   “(ii) Do not make the suspect noticeably stand out.
“(b) Instructions given to a witness before conducting a photograph or live lineup identification procedure shall include a statement that the person who committed the offense may or may not be present in the procedure.
“(c) Procedures for documenting and preserving the results of a photograph or live lineup identification procedure, including the documentation of witness statements, regardless of the outcome of the procedure.
“(d) Procedures for administering a photograph or live lineup identification procedure to an illiterate person or a person with limited English language proficiency.
“(e) For a live lineup identification procedure, if practicable, procedures for assigning an administrator who is unaware of which member of the live lineup is the suspect in the case or alternative procedures designed to prevent opportunities to influence the witness.
“(f) For a photograph identification procedure, procedures for assigning an administrator who is capable of administering a photograph array in a blind manner or in a blinded manner consistent with other proven or supported best practices designed to prevent opportunities to influence the witness.”

The policies must “[p]rovide [(i)] that a witness who makes an identification based on a photograph or live lineup identification procedure be asked immediately after the procedure to state, in the witness’s own words, how confident the witness is in making the identification” and (ii) that these witness statements be documented and preserved. “A video record of identification procedures shall be made or, if a video record is not practicable, an audio record shall be made. If neither a video nor audio record are practicable, the reasons shall be documented in writing, and the lineup administrator shall make [and preserve] a full and complete written record of the lineup . . . .” Noncompliance with the procedures is not alone grounds for exclusion of identification testimony but “[e]vidence of failure to comply . . . (1) [m]ay be considered by the . . . court in adjudicating motions to suppress an eyewitness identification” and (2) [m]ay be admissible in support of any claim of eyewitness misidentification . . . .”

[Note: When codified, SB 38 will appear as a new Title V-A of the Louisiana Code of Criminal Procedure, composed of Articles 251 through 253.]

§ 25.03(a)    Show-ups
The Supreme Court has recognized that show-up identification procedures, in which the accused is exhibited to the witness in a one-on-one confrontation, are inherently suggestive. See, e.g., United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 234 (1967) (“[i]t is hard to imagine a situation more clearly conveying the suggestion to the witness that the one presented is believed guilty by the police”); Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293, 302 (1967) (dictum) (“[t]he practice of showing suspects singly to persons for the purpose of identification, and not as part of a lineup, has been widely condemned”).

Notwithstanding the inherent suggestiveness of show-ups, the Court has sustained a show-up in the victim’s hospital room against due process challenge when the use of this procedure was “imperative” because the witness was so gravely wounded that it was impossible to “kn[o]w how long . . . [the witness] might live.” Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. at 302. Under these circumstances the Court found that the show-up was not “unnecessarily suggestive,” id. (emphasis added); “the police followed the only feasible procedure,” id. Several lower courts have similarly sustained immediate, on-the-scene show-ups as justified by the need to find the perpetrator rapidly. However, show-ups will not be approved when the lapse of time between the crime and the show-up rendered it unnecessary to employ the inherently suggestive show-up procedure. See, e.g., People v. Cruz, 129 A.D.3d 119, 122, 125, 10 N.Y.S.3d 214,218, 220 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2015) (a show-up which took place “approximately one hour after the 911 telephone call had been placed” was unnecessarily suggestive because there were no “exigent circumstances warranting a showup identification”: “The 55 year old complainant, though bruised and visibly shaken, was not suffering from any life threatening wounds that would have made her otherwise unable or unavailable to make an identification at a later time or at the precinct where she was already located.”); People v. Brown, 121 A.D.2d 733, 504 N.Y.S.2d 457 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1986) (a show-up which was “conducted an hour after the crime was committed” was not justified by “‘exigent circumstances’ or a showing that ‘it would have been unduly burdensome . . . ‘to form some kind of lineup’’”).

The inherent suggestiveness of a show-up is exacerbated by the police officers’ use of procedures that:

(a) provide the witness with additional reasons for believing that the single person being shown is the perpetrator, see, e.g., Velez v. Schmer, 724 F.2d 249 (1st Cir. 1984) (the police used suggestive language: “‘This is him, isn’t it?’”); Styers v. Smith, 659 F.2d 293 (2d Cir. 1981) (a show-up at the police station after a police officer told the victim that he was leaving to pick up the robbery suspects); People v. Adams, 53 N.Y.2d 241, 248-49, 423 N.E.2d 379, 382, 440 N.Y.S.2d 902, 905 (1981) (“[s]howing the suspects together also enhanced the possibility that if one of them were recognized the others would be identified as well . . . [and] permitting the victims as a group to view the suspects . . . increased the likelihood that if one of them made an identification the others would concur”); People v. Buckery, 130 A.D.3d 640, 641, 12 N.Y.S.3d 291, 292 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015) (before the show-up of the defendant and three others for a robbery committed by four people, a police officer “walked up to the complainant, holding the wallet [which had been “recovered from one of the suspects other than the defendant”], and . . . the complainant identified it immediately before being asked by the police whether he recognized any of the suspects”); State v. Moore, 343 S.C. 282, 287, 540 S.E.2d 445, 448 (2000) (“the witness was brought to a location where two individuals, wearing clothing similar to that described by the witness, were surrounded by uniformed police officers”); State v. Williams, 162 W. Va. 348, 249 S.E.2d 752 (1978) (the police told the victim that his money was found in the possession of the three suspects whom he was about to view), or

(b) magnify the custodial features of the situation, so as to enhance the impression that the police are certain of the respondent’s guilt, see, e.g., Clark v. Caspari, 274 F.3d 507, 511 (8th Cir. 2001) (during the show-up, the two suspects were handcuffed and “surrounded” by police officers, “one of whom was holding a shotgun”); United States ex rel. Hudson v. Brierton, 699 F.2d 917 (7th Cir. 1983) (the defendant was locked in a jail cell at the time of viewing); People v. Williams, 127 A.D.3d 1114, 1116, 7 N.Y.S.3d 434, 437 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015) (“the defendant was the only person standing in the street, in handcuffs, surrounded by the police with high-beam headlights shining on his face, during the showup proceeding”); People v. Brown, 121 A.D.2d 733, 504 N.Y.S.2d 457 (NY. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1986) (during the show-up the suspects were surrounded by several police officers and had handcuffs dangling from their wrists).

§ 25.03(b) Lineups

A lineup is impermissibly suggestive if some aspect of the respondent’s appearance (age, race, skin complexion, height, weight, attire) renders him or her distinctive from the others in the line, especially if the unique characteristic makes the respondent the only person in the line who fits the known description of the perpetrator. See, e.g., Raheem v. Kelly, 257 F.3d 122, 135–37 (2d Cir. 2001) (lineup was suggestive in the case of two witnesses because they had given a description of the perpetrator as wearing a black leather coat and the defendant was the only person in the line wearing a black leather coat); United States v. Downs, 230 F.3d 272, 273, 275 (7th Cir. 2000) (lineup was suggestive because the witnesses had described the perpetrator as “lightly unshaven” and the defendant “was the only man in a line-up of five who lacked a moustache”); Martin v. Indiana, 438 F. Supp. 234 (N.D. Ind. 1977), aff’d, 577 F.2d 749 (7th Cir. 1978) (lineup was suggestive because the perpetrator had been described as a tall black man in his mid-thirties, and the only black man in the line other than the defendant was short and eighteen years old); State v. Henderson, 116 Ariz. 310, 569 P.2d 252 (1977) (lineup was suggestive because the perpetrator had been described as being in his early to middle thirties, and the defendant was 36 years old but the other five persons in the lineup were in their early to middle twenties); People v. Perry, 133 A.D.3d 410, 410, 18 N.Y.S.3d 539, 539 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2015) (a lineup was suggestive because the defendant was the only participant who matched the complainant’s description of the perpetrator as having a “‘deformed right eye’”; notwithstanding “the practical difficulties in finding fillers with similarly defective eyes,” a “‘simple eye patch provided to each of the lineup participants or a hand over an eye would have sufficed to remove any undue suggestiveness of the procedure.’”); People v. Robinson, 123 A.D.3d 1062, 1062, 999 N.Y.S.2d 499, 500 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2014) (a lineup was suggestive where “three [of the four] fillers appear[ed] visibly older than the defendant” and “[t]he age disparity was sufficiently apparent as to orient the viewer toward the defendant as a perpetrator of the crimes charged”); People v. Pena, 131 A.D.3d 708, 709, 16 N.Y.S.3d 184, 184 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015) (a lineup was suggestive where the defendant “was the only lineup participant dressed in a red shirt, the item of clothing which figured prominently in the description of the assailant’s clothing that the complainant gave to the police”); People v. Sapp, 98 A.D.2d 784, 469 N.Y.S.2d 803 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1983) (a lineup was suggestive where the defendant was the only person in the line wearing the type of jacket that the witness had described the perpetrator as wearing); State v. Boykins, 173 W. Va. 761, 765-66, 320 S.E.2d 134, 138 (1984) (a lineup was suggestive where the defendant “was the only person in the lineup who wore a dark blue or black toboggan: the type of clothing the culprit allegedly wore,” and “all but one of the people in the lineup was taller than” the defendant). See also People v. Perkins, 28 N.Y.3d 432, 437, 68 N.E.3d 679, 682, 45 N.Y.S.3d 860, 863 (2016) (a “distinctive feature” that causes a defendant to stand out in a lineup can render the lineup “unduly suggestive” even if that feature did not “figure[ ] prominently in the witness’s description” of the perpetrator).

The manner in which the police conduct the lineup can also make it impermissibly suggestive. See, e.g., United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 234 (1967) (dictum) (practice of permitting witnesses to be present during each other’s viewing of a lineup is “a procedure said to be fraught with dangers of suggestion”); People v. Boyce, 89 A.D.2d 623, 452 N.Y.S.2d 676 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1982) (suggestive post-lineup remarks by police).

§ 25.03(c) Photographic Identifications

Courts have consistently recognized that:

“improper employment of photographs by police may sometimes cause witnesses to err in identifying criminals. A witness may have obtained only a brief glimpse of a criminal, or may have seen him under poor conditions. Even if the police subsequently follow the most correct photographic identification procedures and show him the pictures of a number of individuals without indicating whom they suspect, there is some danger that the witness may make an incorrect identification. This danger will be increased if the police display to the witness only the picture of a single individual who generally resembles the person he saw, or if they show him the pictures of several persons among which the photograph of a single such individual recurs or is in some way emphasized. The chance of misidentification is also heightened if the police indicate to the witness that they have other evidence that one of the persons pictured committed the crime. Regardless of how the initial misidentification comes about, the witness thereafter is apt to retain in his memory the image of the photograph rather than of the person actually seen, reducing the trustworthiness of subsequent lineup or courtroom identification.”

(\textit{Simmons v. United States}, 390 U.S. 377, 383-84 (1968)).

Showing a potential identification witness a single photograph is both highly suggestive and unnecessarily so because – in the absence of extraordinary circumstances – the police can easily put together a photo array. \textit{See Manson v. Brathwaite}, 432 U.S. 98, 99, 109, 117 (1977) (dictum) (accepting the state’s concession); \textit{United States v. Dailey}, 524 F.2d 911, 914 (8th Cir. 1975); \textit{State v. Al-Bayyinah}, 356 N.C. 150, 157, 567 S.E.2d 120, 124 (2002). In \textit{Simmons} and \textit{Manson}, the Supreme Court declined to adopt a “per se rule” (\textit{Manson}, 432 U.S. at 112) excluding identifications that follow a single-photo display, but both cases allow the admission of such identifications only after conducting the two-step analysis described in § 25.02 supra and finding a strong showing that, “under the “totality of the circumstances[,]” the identification was reliable even though the confrontation procedure was suggestive” (\textit{Manson}, 432 U.S. at 106). \textit{See also}, e.g., \textit{State v. Ostrem}, 535 N.W.2d 916, 921 (Minn. 1995) (“In determining whether pretrial eyewitness identification evidence must be suppressed, a two-part test is applied. . . . The first inquiry focuses on whether the procedure was unnecessarily suggestive. . . . Whether a pretrial identification procedure is unnecessarily suggestive turns on whether the defendant was unfairly singled out for identification. . . . Single photo line-up identification procedures have been widely condemned as unnecessarily suggestive. . . . However, under the second prong of the test, the identification evidence, even if suggestive, may be admissible if the totality of the circumstances establishes that the evidence was reliable. . . . If the totality of the circumstances shows the witness’ identification has adequate independent origin, it is considered to be reliable despite the suggestive procedure. . . . The test is whether the suggestive procedures created a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification.”). \textit{Compare State v. Jackson}, 454 So. 2d 398, 400-01 (La. App. 1984) (“In the present case, the witness was shown a two-view mug shot of the defendant from the D.A.’s file. There can be little doubt that this procedure was impermissibly suggestive. The display of a single photograph of the defendant rather than an array of photographs depicting different individuals has repeatedly been held to be improper. . . . [T]he photographic identification took place some eight months after the crime. This substantial lapse of time, coupled with the relatively brief period of observation and the absence of a physical description, casts grave doubt upon the reliability of the in-court identification. . . . Weighing these indicia of reliability against the corrupting effect of the one photograph show-up, we conclude there was a substantial likelihood of misidentification. Accordingly, the trial judge committed reversible error in admitting the identification testimony.”); \textit{Wise v. Commonwealth}, 6 Va. App. 178, 367 S.E.2d 197 (1988) (a police investigator showed bank-robbery eyewitnesses “a bank surveillance photograph depicting a man who had robbed a Maryland bank” and then showed them “a photo array consisting of six photographs” \textit{(id. at 180, 367 S.E.2d at 198); “We believe that significant problems are inherent in the use of a single-photograph identification procedure. . . . ‘[A] single photograph display is one of the most suggestive methods of identification and is always to be viewed with suspicion.’ . . . [S]ince the police showed Phelps and Wampler a single photograph of Wise as part of their out-of-court identification procedure, we find the out-of-court identification process was unduly suggestive." both Phelps and Wampler first identified Wise five months after the robbery when shown a single photograph of him. The record shows that both witnesses were unable to describe the robber’s facial features at any time prior to seeing the single photograph. Further, Phelps could not pick him out of the photo array in January 1986, one month prior to seeing the single photograph. Wampler was not shown the photo array at that time. We believe that these facts demonstrate an absence of other indicia of reliability and require us to find that the trial court erred in admitting evidence of their out-of-court identifications. ¶ . . . [S]ince we find that neither Wampler’s nor Phelps’ in-court identifications originated independently of their out-of-court identifications, we conclude that the trial court erred in admitting this evidence at trial.” (Id. at 184-87, 367 S.E.2d at 200-02.)); People v. Marshall, 26 N.Y.3d 495, 506-08, 45 N.E.3d 954, 962-64, 25 N.Y.S.3d 58, 66-68 (2015) (even if the defendant’s photograph was shown to the witness by the prosecutor as part of “trial preparation” and “not for purposes of an identification,” the witness’s exposure “to defendant’s likeness” creates a risk that “the display was unduly suggestive, and therefore, tainted an in-court identification”).

A “photo array” – a group of photographs (usually mug shots) including the respondent’s photograph – will be found suggestive if the respondent’s photograph is the only one that matches the description of the perpetrator (see, e.g., United States v. Sanders, 479 F.2d 1193 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (only the defendant’s photograph depicted facial hair that was in any way comparable to the witness’s description of the perpetrator); Commonwealth v. Thornley, 406 Mass. 96, 99-101, 546 N.E.2d 350, 352-53 (1989) (a thirteen-photograph array was suggestive because both witnesses had described the perpetrator as wearing glasses, and “the defendant’s picture was the only one in the array with glasses”); Butler v. State, 102 So. 3d 260, 263, 265-66 (Miss. 2012) (a photo of a lineup stage was impermissibly suggestive because the witness described the perpetrator as “around five-feet-five-inches tall,” the accused is “actually five-feet-six-inches tall,” the “other suspects in the photo lineup were between five-feet-eleven-inches and six-feet-four-inches tall,” and their relative heights would have been apparent because the suspects “were pictured standing beside a height marker”)) or if the respondent’s photograph differs from the others in some way that would give it special salience (see, e.g., Sloan v. State, 584 S.W.2d 461, 467 (Tenn. Crim. App.1978) (“the photographic identification procedure was suggestive in that the photograph of defendant was emphasized by the fact that it was a portrait of him in a Navy uniform, and the other photographs were mugshots”); People v. Smith, 122 A.D.3d 1162, 1163, 997 N.Y.S.2d 534, 535-36 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2014) (a photo array was unduly suggestive, even though “[t]he array depicts six individuals of equivalent age and ethnicity who are reasonably similar in appearance,” because of a formatting difference between the defendant’s photo and the other photos: “[W]hile the other five photos depict individuals from the shoulders up with the upper portion of their photos consisting of nothing more than a blank, gray background, defendant is shown from the chest up with the top of his head reaching to the very top of the photo,” and “[t]hus, defendant’s face occupies the space that, in all of the other photos, is bare.”)).

As with lineups, see § 25.03(b) supra, a police officer’s comments or the way in which the police conduct the photographic identification can render even a properly constituted photo array suggestive. See, e.g., Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. at 383 (“[t]he chance of misidentification is also heightened if the police indicate to the witness that they have other evidence that one of the persons pictured committed the crime”); United States v. Trivette, 284 F. Supp. 720 (D. D.C. 1968) (a detective drew the witness’s attention to the defendant’s photograph by asking “‘Is that the man?’”); Young v. State, 374 P.3d 395, 399-400, 407 (Alaska 2016) (a “detective’s comment made . . . [the photo array] identification procedure ‘so suggestive as to create “a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification”’”: after the eyewitness—who was “a criminal defense lawyer and former prosecutor”—“put his finger tentatively on Young’s photograph, . . . the detective told him to ‘trust your instincts’”; although the witness testified that he ‘was kind of going there’ in selecting Young as the shooter and may well have picked Young anyway, he also testified that he took the detective’s comment to mean ‘that’s the guy we want you to pick’ and that it ended his deliberations.”); People v. Fernandez, 82 A.D.2d 922, 440 N.Y.S.2d 677 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1981) (four eyewitnesses were permitted to view photographs together). A roster of safeguards aimed at assuring the reliability of photo displays is found in United States Department of Justice, Memorandum for Heads of Department Law Enforcement Components, All Department Prosecutors, Eyewitness Identification: Procedures for Conducting Photo Arrays (January 6, 2017), available at https://apps.npr.org/documents/document.html?id=3254083-DAG-Memo-Procedures-for-Photo-Arrays (policies, e.g., governing the number and nature of photos displayed, directing federal investigators to document or record an eyewitness’s confidence in an identification at the time the i.d. is made, and encouraging “blind” or “blinded” photo arrays [i.e., arrangements that keep the agent conducting the session ignorant of information that could tip the witness off as to which photo represents the prime suspect]). Counsel arguing that the photographic identification procedure used in his or her case was unduly suggestive can usefully contrast them with these DOJ guidelines. See also the Louisiana statutory model summarized in § 25.03 supra.

If the police or the prosecution failed to preserve the photo array used in the identification procedure, counsel should ask the court to apply a presumption that the array was impermissibly suggestive. See, e.g., United States v. Honer, 225 F.3d 549, 553 (5th Cir. 2000) (“when the government fails to preserve the photographic array used in a pretrial line-up ‘there shall exist a presumption that the array is impermissibly suggestive’”); People v. Holley, 26 N.Y.3d 514, 517, 45 N.E.3d 936, 937, 25 N.Y.S.3d 40, 41 (2015) (the prosecution’s “failure to preserve a computer-generated array of photographs shown to an identifying witness” gave rise to “a rebuttable presumption that the array was unduly suggestive”).

§ 25.03(d) Aggregation of Identification Procedures

Frequently, a witness is exposed to a combination of identification procedures. For example, a witness who identifies the respondent in a show-up or a photographic identification display is thereafter shown the respondent in a lineup. The employment of successive identification procedures all involving the respondent is itself suggestive because the witness learns to recognize the respondent from the previous police-arranged viewing(s). See Foster v. California, 394 U.S. 440, 442-43 (1969).
§ 25.04 RELIABILITY OF THE IDENTIFICATION

As explained in § 25.02 supra, under the federal Due Process rule even unduly suggestive police procedures will not render an identification inadmissible if the factors indicating its reliability outweigh the suggestiveness of the police conduct.

The factors to be considered in assessing the reliability of an identification “include the opportunity of the witness to view the criminal at the time of the crime, the witness’ degree of attention, the accuracy of his prior description of the criminal, the level of certainty demonstrated at the confrontation, and the time between the crime and the confrontation.” Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98, 114 (1977). Thus, in Manson, the Court held that the identification was reliable because:

(a) The witness had a good “opportunity to view” the perpetrator, since the scene was well-lit and the witness was “within two feet” of the perpetrator and “looked directly at” him for “two to three minutes.” Id. at 114.

(b) The witness’s “degree of attention” was excellent, in that the witness was “a specially trained, assigned, and experienced officer [who] . . . could be expected to pay scrupulous attention to detail, for he knew that subsequently he would have to find and arrest [the perpetrator] . . . [and] that his claimed observations would be subject later to close scrutiny and examination at any trial.” Id. at 115. In addition, since the witness was of the same race as the defendant, there were no problems of cross-racial identification. Id.

(c) The description given by the witness was extremely detailed and accurate, including the perpetrator’s “race, his height, his build, the color and style of his hair, and the high cheekbone facial feature” as well as the “clothing the [perpetrator] . . . wore.” Id.

(d) The witness was absolutely certain of the identification, stating, “‘There is no question whatsoever.’” Id.

(e) The witness gave his description to the investigating officer “within minutes of the crime” and “[t]he photographic identification took place only two days later.” Id. at 116.

In cases not exhibiting the indicia of reliability that marked the identification in Manson, lower courts have held that the suggestiveness of police procedures outweighed the identification’s reliability. See, e.g., Raheem v. Kelly, 257 F.3d 122, 138-40 (2d Cir. 2001) (the witnesses to a robbery and shooting in a bar were “drinking scotch” and were not paying attention to the robbers until the witnesses “heard the shot and saw the shooter holding a gun, [and] the hold-up was announced,” and “[p]lainly their attention was immediately focused more on th[e] man” who “brandished his gun at them” than at the other robber, and “[f]urther, it is human nature for a person toward whom a gun is being pointed to focus his attention more on the gun than on the face of the person pointing it”); Velez v. Schmer, 724 F.2d 249, 251-52 (1st Cir. 1984) (the witnesses had only about a minute to observe the perpetrator and gave virtually no description); Dickerson v. Fogg, 692 F.2d 238, 245 (2d Cir. 1982) (victim was “frightened and agitated . . . having just had his life threatened and a gun at his neck”); Jackson v. Fogg, 589 F.2d 108 (2d Cir. 1978) (the eyewitnesses had only a few seconds to observe the gunman before running for cover); United States v. Dailey, 524 F.2d 911 (8th Cir. 1975) (the witness had limited opportunity to observe the perpetrator, seeing him for no more than 30 seconds in heavy rain, and there was a discrepancy between the description and the defendant’s appearance); People v. Fuller, 71 A.D.2d 589, 418 N.Y.S.2d 427 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1979) (there was a gross discrepancy between the appearance of the 17-year-old defendant and the witness’s description of the perpetrator’s age and build); State v. Moore, 343 S.C. 282, 289, 540 S.E.2d 445, 449 (2000) (the eyewitness “saw the two defendants for only a very brief period of time, at some distance”; her “attention was likely not as acute as it might have been had she been the victim of a crime”; and “the degree of accuracy of [her] description is tenuous, at best . . . [inasmuch as] [h]er descriptions were based primarily on the suspects’ clothing and race, and that one was taller than the other”).

§ 25.05 SUPPRESSION OF AN IDENTIFICATION AS UNCONSTITUTIONALLY UNRELIABLE EVEN THOUGH POLICE ACTION IS MINIMAL OR NON-EXISTENT

Under the federal due process standard for suppressing an identification as unconstitutionally unreliable, “a preliminary judicial inquiry into the reliability of an eyewitness identification” is required only if the identification was “procured under unnecessarily suggestive circumstances arranged by law enforcement.” Perry v. New Hampshire, 565 U.S. 228, 248 (2012). See id. at 232-33 (“We have not extended pretrial screening for reliability to cases in which the suggestive circumstances were not arranged by law enforcement officers. . . . Our decisions . . . turn on the presence of state action and aim to deter police from rigging identification procedures, for example, at a lineup, showup, or photograph array. When no improper law enforcement activity is involved, . . . it suffices to test reliability through the rights and opportunities generally designed for that purpose, notably, the presence of counsel at postindictment lineups, vigorous cross-examination, protective rules of evidence, and jury instructions on both the fallibility of eyewitness identification and the requirement that guilt be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.”).

In States that have not already chosen to follow the federal constitutional standard on this issue, counsel can argue that the state constitution or state statutes or rules should be construed to afford a suppression remedy for unreliable identifications even in the absence of suggestive police conduct. See, e.g., State v. Chen, 208 N.J. 307, 310-11, 27 A.3d 930, 932 (2011) (“Recent social science research reveals that suggestive conduct by private actors, as well as government officials, can undermine the reliability of eyewitness identifications and inflate witness confidence. We consider that evidence in light of the court’s traditional gatekeeping role to ensure that unreliable, misleading evidence is not presented to jurors. We therefore hold [under N.J. R. EVID. 104] that, even without any police action, when a defendant presents evidence that an identification was made under highly suggestive circumstances that could lead to a mistaken identification, trial judges should conduct a preliminary hearing, upon request, to determine the admissibility of the identification evidence.”). See also State v. Hibl, 290 Wis. 2d 595, 610-13, 618, 714 N.W.2d 194, 202-03, 206 (2006) (even when an identification does not stem from a “police procedure,” as in cases of “‘spontaneous’ identifications resulting from ‘accidental’ confrontations” between an eyewitness and the suspect, the “circuit court still has a limited gatekeeping function to exclude such evidence under [WIS. STAT. §] 904.03”). See generally § 7.09 supra. Compare State v. Johnson, 312 Conn. 687, 688-90, 700, 703-05, 94 A.3d 1173, 1174-75, 1180-81, 1183-84 (2014) (rejecting the argument that “the due process clauses of the Connecticut constitution provide protection against allegedly unduly suggestive eyewitness identification procedures undertaken by a private actor,” but recognizing that due process principles are implicated if “the [identification] evidence is so extremely unreliable that its admission would deprive the defendant of his right to a fair trial” and furthermore recognizing that state evidentiary law “goes above and beyond minimal constitutional requirements” and provides a basis for excluding, at trial, “unreliable identification evidence that is tainted by unduly suggestive private conduct”).

In seeking to persuade a state court to construe the state constitution to provide a suppression remedy for unconstitutionally unreliable identifications even though police action is minimal or non-existent, counsel will often find it useful to direct the court’s attention to the extensive empirical evidence on the unreliability of eyewitness identifications even when the police were not involved. See, e.g., the sources cited in § 25.03 supra and in State v. Chen, 208 N.J. at 938-40, 27 A.3d at 320-23; Perry v. New Hampshire, 565 U.S. at 262-65 & nn.5-11 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting).

§ 25.05(a) Identifications Made for the First Time in Court

In State v. Dickson, 322 Conn. 410, 141 A.3d 810 (2016), the Connecticut Supreme Court observed that “[t]he United States Supreme Court has not yet addressed the question of whether first time in-court identifications are in the category of unnecessarily suggestive procedures that trigger due process protections” (id. at 422, 141 A.3d at 821), but it agreed with Dickson’s contention that “first time in-court identifications are inherently suggestive and implicate a defendant’s due process rights no less than unnecessarily suggestive out-of-court identifications” (id. at 423, 141 A.3d at 822). “[W]e are hard-pressed to imagine how there could be a more suggestive identification procedure than placing a witness on the stand in open court, confronting the witness with the person who the state has accused of committing the crime, and then asking the witness if he can identify the person who committed the crime.” Id. (original emphasis). “Accordingly, we conclude that first time in-court identifications, like in-court identifications that are tainted by an unduly suggestive out-of-court identification, implicate due process protections and must be prescreened by the trial court.” Id. at 426, 141 A.3d at 825. “[W]e now set forth the specific procedures that the parties and the trial court must follow. Preliminarily, we take this opportunity to emphasize that, in cases in which the identity of the perpetrator is at issue and there are eyewitnesses to the crime, the best practice is to conduct a nonsuggestive identification procedure as soon after the crime as is possible.” Id. at 444-45, 141 A.3d at 835. “In cases in which there has been no pretrial identification, however, and the state intends to present a first time in-court identification, the state must first request permission to do so from the trial court.” Id. at 445, 141 A.3d at 835. “The trial court may grant such permission only if it determines that there is no factual dispute as to the identity of the perpetrator, or the ability of the particular eyewitness to identify the defendant is not at issue.” Id. at 446, 141 A.3d at 835-36.

“If the trial court determines that the state will not be allowed to conduct a first time identification in court, the state may request permission to conduct a nonsuggestive identification procedure, namely, at the state’s option, an out-of-court lineup or photographic array, and the trial court ordinarily should grant the state’s request. If the witness previously has been unable to identify the defendant in a nonsuggestive identification procedure, however, the court should not allow a second nonsuggestive identification procedure unless the state can provide a good reason why a second bite at the apple is warranted. If the eyewitness is able to identify the defendant in a nonsuggestive out-of-court procedure, the state may then ask the eyewitness to identify the defendant in court.

If the trial court denies a request for a nonsuggestive procedure, the state declines to conduct one, or the eyewitness is unable to identify the defendant in such a procedure, a one-on-one in-court identification should not be allowed. The prosecutor may still examine the witness, however, about his or her observations of the perpetrator at the time of the crime, but the prosecutor should avoid asking the witness if the defendant resembles the perpetrator.” (Id. at 446-47, 141 A.3d at 836-37.)

Accord, State v. Torres, 175 Conn. App. 138, 167 A.3d 365 (2017). Dickson is a seminal decision supported by a well-reasoned opinion; counsel in other jurisdictions would do well to urge its adoption on both federal and state due process grounds. See § 17.11 supra.

Part B. Other Grounds for Suppressing Identification Testimony

§ 25.06 VIOLATIONS OF THE SIXTH AMENDMENT RIGHT TO COUNSEL

Section 24.13 supra describes the doctrine establishing that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches at the time of commencement of adversary judicial proceedings. As noted in that section, some state courts have relied upon state constitutional guarantees to afford the protections of the right to counsel even earlier in the criminal process.

Once the right to counsel has attached, the respondent is entitled to the assistance of counsel at a lineup or show-up. United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967). The violation of that right requires the suppression of testimony relating to any identification made at the lineup or show-up. Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220, 231-32 (1977); Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263, 272-74 (1967). In cases in which the right to counsel was violated, witnesses who participated in the unconstitutional lineup or show-up are also precluded from making an in-court identification. of the respondent unless the prosecution proves “by clear and convincing evidence that the in-court identifications [are] . . . based upon observations of the suspect other than the lineup [or show-up] identification.” See United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. at 240.

Unlike lineups and show-ups, photographic identification procedures do not require the presence of counsel under the Sixth Amendment caselaw. United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300 (1973).

§ 25.07 VIOLATIONS OF THE FOURTH AMENDMENT: IDENTIFICATIONS RESULTING FROM AN ILLEGAL ARREST OR TERRY STOP

If a lineup, show-up, or other identification exhibition is held while the respondent is in custody following an illegal arrest or Terry stop, any resulting identification must be suppressed as the fruit of the Fourth Amendment violation. See § 23.37 subdivision (e) supra. In-court identifications tainted by the illegality of the earlier ones would also be inadmissible. See United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463, 472-73 (1980) (dictum); Young v. Conway, 698 F.3d 69, 84-85 (2d Cir. 2012).

A fact pattern that arises with considerable frequency and provides fertile grounds for suppression of identifications is that an eyewitness gives a very vague description of the perpetrator, the police arrest or detain the respondent because s/he matches the description, and an identification procedure is then held. If the defense succeeds in invalidating the arrest or Terry stop on the ground that the vague description failed to provide the requisite probable cause or articulable suspicion, see §§ 23.07, 23.09 supra, the identification must be suppressed.

§ 25.08 STATE LAW GROUNDS OF OBJECTION TO IDENTIFICATIONS

In addition to the constitutional rules that may require suppression of an identification, some jurisdictions have evidentiary doctrines that afford a basis for objecting to identification testimony. In some jurisdictions, police officers and other observers of an out-of-court identification are barred from recounting the identification, either by rules prohibiting third-party bolstering of identifications (see, e.g., People v. Walton, 99 A.D.2d 847, 472 N.Y.S.2d 453 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1984); Brownfield v. State, 668 P.2d 1165 (Okla. Crim. App. 1983); Lyons v. State, 388 S.W.2d 950 (Tex. Crim. App. 1965)), or by a hearsay-based rule barring such testimony generally or in specific circumstances such as when the eyewitness does not testify at trial (see, e.g., People v. Johnson, 68 Ill. App. 3d 836, 842, 386 N.E.2d 642, 647, 25 Ill. Dec. 371, 376 (1979)) or when the eyewitness takes the stand but is unable to make an in-court identification (see generally Francis M. Dougherty, Annot., Admissibility and weight of extrajudicial or pretrial identification where witness was unable or failed to make in-court identification, 29 A.L.R.4th 104 (1984 & Supp.)). Some jurisdictions recognize an objection to identification evidence when the identification is so unreliable that its probative value is outweighed by its prejudicial nature. See, e.g., State v. Lawson, 352 Or. 724, 740, 761-62, 291 P.3d 673, 685, 696-97 (2012), summarized in § 25.02 concluding paragraph, supra; State v. Johnson, 312 Conn. 687, 700, 94 A.3d 1173, 1180-81 (2014), summarized in § 25.05 second paragraph supra; and see § 30.03 infra.
Chapter 26

Interlocutory Review of Pretrial Rulings by Means of Prerogative Writs

§ 26.01 THE AVAILABILITY OF PREROGATIVE WRITS TO OBTAIN INTERLOCUTORY REVIEW OF PRETRIAL RULINGS

In most jurisdictions, pretrial rulings denying defense motions or resolving other issues unfavorably to the defense are unappealable because of the absence of any appellate jurisdiction to entertain interlocutory appeals. See, e.g., In the Matter of Appeal in Maricopa County Juvenile Action No. JT-295003, 126 Ariz. 409, 411, 616 P.2d 84, 86 (Ariz. App. 1980); In the Interest of A.M., 94 Ill. App. 3d 86, 88, 418 N.E.2d 484, 485, 49 Ill. Dec. 630 (1981). The ordinary means of securing appellate review of claimed errors in pretrial rulings is an appeal from the trial court’s judgment adjudicating the respondent a delinquent and entering a dispositional order. See § 39.02 infra. Except in a few States – for example, California, where interlocutory review by prerogative writs is expressly authorized by statute in some situations and has been encouraged by judicial decision in others (see, e.g., People v. Mena, 54 Cal. 4th 146, 152-58 & n.10, 277 P.3d 160, 165-69 & n.10, 141 Cal. Rptr. 3d 469, 475-79 & n.10 (2012); Maine v. Superior Court of Mendocino County, 68 Cal. 2d 375, 378-81, 438 P.2d 372, 374-76, 66 Cal. Rptr. 724, 726-28 (1969)) – there is no established practice of providing immediate review of interim orders in criminal proceedings even when, as a practical matter, they may be uncorrectable after verdict.

Interlocutory review by an appellate court may nonetheless be available through the prerogative writs of mandamus and prohibition. In the vast majority of jurisdictions, statutes or the common law give appellate courts the power to issue these prerogative writs. In appropriate circumstances the writs may be used to obtain immediate review of pretrial orders in delinquency cases. See, e.g., Daniel V. v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. App. 4th 28, 39-40, 49, 42 Cal. Rptr. 3d 471, 477-78, 485 (2006) (granting a petition for a peremptory writ of mandate on the ground that the trial judge had abused her discretion by erroneously denying, as untimely, a petition for judicial disqualification under a statute that “calls for automatic reassignment [of the case] to another judge if a challenge is duly presented”); P.V. v. District Court in and for the Tenth Judicial District, 199 Colo. 357, 609 P.2d 110 (1980) (granting a petition for writs of prohibition and mandamus and directing the trial court to dismiss a delinquency Petition for violation of the juvenile’s constitutional and statutory rights to a speedy trial); People ex rel. Thomas v. Judges of the Family Court, 85 Misc. 2d 569, 379 N.Y.S.2d 656 (N.Y. Supreme Ct., Special Term 1976) (issuing a writ of prohibition forbidding the Family Court to try a juvenile on a Petition that was barred by double jeopardy); State in the Interest of Joshua, 327 So. 2d 429 (La. App. 1976) (granting a petition for writs of mandamus and prohibiting and directing the juvenile court to give a detained juvenile a probable-cause hearing); State ex rel. Mateo D.O. v. Circuit Court for Winnebago County, 280 Wis. 2d 575, 584, 696 N.W.2d 275, 280 (Wis. App. 2005) (“grant[ing] the petition for a supervisory writ of mandamus and direct[ing] the chief judge and circuit court to honor the [juvenile’s] request for judicial substitution” pursuant to a statute that provides for automatic disqualification upon the filing of a timely request “in proper form”).
Traditionally, the prerogative writs lie to compel (in the case of mandamus) or to prohibit (in the case of prohibition) action by an inferior court that is necessary to prevent the court from proceeding unlawfully because of a “lack of jurisdiction” or “gross abuse of discretion.” Many pretrial rulings in delinquency cases would seem susceptible of being brought within the framework of these concepts. “Jurisdiction” is a flexible notion, as the evolution of the term in habeas corpus practice attests. See Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938); Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963). “Lack of jurisdiction” needs not connote the absence of any competence in a court to act at all in a proceeding; it may also signify that some fundamental principle of law disempowers the particular action which the court is taking in a matter otherwise within its competence to adjudicate. And “gross abuse of discretion” may mean almost anything an appellate court wants it to mean, as every lawyer knows. Moreover, it is not uncommon for appellate courts, when refusing to issue prerogative writs on the ground that no “abuse of discretion” appears, nevertheless to offer some gratuitous advice to the trial court regarding the appropriate exercise of its discretion or otherwise to express opinions on the merits that the trial court may take to heart thereafter. See, e.g., Kerr v. United States District Court, 426 U.S. 394, 405-06 (1976).

Therefore, particularly when defense counsel can urge that a pretrial order in a delinquency case (a) is plainly wrong or (b) is wrong by force of a constitutional guarantee and (c) has the effect of imposing adverse consequences upon the respondent that may be irremediable at a subsequent stage, the case for interlocutory relief by prerogative writ would seem to be strong. Thus, for example, when the trial judge has denied an indigent respondent’s motion for state funds for investigative services, counsel could invoke the constitutional doctrines discussed in §§ 4.31(d) and 11.03(a) supra in a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the judge to authorize the funds. In support of this application for interlocutory review, counsel could stress the crucial need for prompt investigation to find witnesses and preserve physical evidence and could argue that delaying review until appeal would irremediably deprive the respondent of the opportunity to gather evidence indispensable for a fair trial.

§ 26.02 TACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS: POTENTIAL ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF INTERLOCUTORY REVIEW

Counsel would be well advised to keep in mind the possibilities of using mandamus or prohibition to attempt to secure relief against unfavorable pretrial orders. Matters such as discovery, speedy trial, double jeopardy, and the right to state-paid investigative assistance and expert consultation seem particularly appropriate subjects for interlocutory review by use of the writs.

As a practical matter, counsel will frequently come to an appellate court in a more favorable posture before trial than after. After trial the result of sustaining counsel’s contention will be the reversal of a judgment and the consequent waste of a good deal of judicial and prosecutorial effort. After trial the case may come before appellate judges on a record that reeks of the respondent’s guilt. Under these circumstances the judges are likely to resolve all doubts in favor of the prosecution. Furthermore, particular claims may be made more persuasive and their equities more visible at the pretrial stage. For example, in postjudgment review of the denial of a respondent’s request for pretrial discovery, the appellate court will have the benefit of hindsight and may say that – in light of the developments at trial – the respondent does not seem to have been hurt by not knowing whatever s/he was denied the right to know in preparing his or her defense. On an application for a prerogative writ before trial, the appellate judges know no more about the case than does defense counsel, and they can plainly see counsel’s preparatory predicament. They may rule for a respondent at this stage in a case in which they would be hard pressed to rule for the respondent after judgment.

Pursuit of interlocutory review procedures also may indirectly produce relief by inducing the prosecutor to accede to defense counsel’s requests. The prospect of an appeal after judgment is so remote as to give most prosecutors little reason to capitulate on close questions that the trial court will probably decide in favor of the prosecution. By contrast, the immediate headache of having to oppose an interlocutory mandamus petition may seem to the prosecutor incommensurate with the harm of giving the respondent what defense counsel wants.

On the other hand, there are potential disadvantages to interlocutory proceedings. The most important of these is the risk of irritating the trial judge by going over his or her head to a higher court. This risk is, of course, particularly grave in those jurisdictions where juvenile cases are tried without a jury, since the judge whose pretrial rulings are being “taken upstairs” will thereafter serve as the trier of fact at trial. If counsel is not sufficiently familiar with the judge to gauge his or her likely temperamental reactions to interlocutory writ proceedings, counsel should consult other attorneys who have appeared before that judge, particularly attorneys who have sought interlocutory review of the judge’s pretrial rulings.

In cases in which the respondent is detained before trial, counsel also must take into account the risk of prolonging the period of pretrial detention as a result of interlocutory proceedings. When a detained respondent is likely to receive probation in the event of an adjudication of delinquency, it may well be preferable to delay appellate litigation of all issues until the postjudgment stage, after the respondent has been released from custody and placed on probation. Even when the respondent is likely to be sentenced to a period of incarceration if found delinquent, the consequences of prolonging his or her pretrial detention must be carefully considered in the many jurisdictions where a respondent receives no “credit” at sentencing for time spent in pretrial detention. In these situations, counsel will have to weigh the likelihood of prevailing in the interlocutory proceeding and thereby improving the prospects of winning at trial against the possible harms to the respondent of protracted pretrial detention.
Chapter 27

Trial: General Characteristics; The Opening Stage

Part A. General Characteristics of the Trial

§ 27.01 THE RESPONDENT'S PRESENCE DURING THE TRIAL

Under ordinary circumstances a criminal trial cannot be held in absentia, see Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162, 182 (1975), and the same rule applies to juvenile prosecutions, see, e.g., R.L.R. v. State, 487 P.2d 27, 42-43 (Alaska 1971); In the Matter of Rodney R., 119 A.D.2d 677, 500 N.Y.S.2d 805 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1986). The accused “has a right to be present at all important stages of trial.” McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168, 178 (1984) (dictum); See, e.g., Lewis v. United States, 146 U.S. 370, 372 (1892) (“A leading principle that pervades the entire law of criminal procedure is that, after indictment found, nothing shall be done in the absence of the prisoner”); Insyxiengmay v. Morgan, 403 F.3d 657, 669 (9th Cir. 2005); State v. Lopez, 271 Conn. 724, 859 A.2d 898 (2004); State v. Bird, 308 Mont. 75, 43 P.3d 266 (2002); State v. Irby, 170 Wash. 2d 874, 246 P.3d 796 (2011); State v. Harris, 229 Wis. 2d 832, 601 N.W.2d 682 (Wis. App. 1999); cf. Rushen v. Spain, 464 U.S. 114, 117 (1983) (per curiam) (dictum). See also United States v. Salim, 690 F.3d 115, 122 (2d Cir. 2012) (the accused’s “right to be present during resentencing,” which “extends to resentencing,” “requires physical presence and is not satisfied by participation through videoconference”); United States v. Crandall, 748 F.3d 476, 481 (2d Cir. 2014) (“the Sixth Amendment right to participate in one’s own trial encompasses the right to reasonable accommodations for impairments to that participation, including hearing impairments”).

In most jurisdictions the right derives from several sources. It is often conferred by statute or rule of court (see, e.g., Crosby v. United States, 506 U.S. 255 (1993)); it is held to be protected by the common state constitutional guarantees of due process and of confrontation; and it is protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and by the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the federal Constitution. The latter two components of the right overlap but are not coextensive. “The [Supreme] Court has assumed that, even in situations where the defendant is not actually confronting witnesses or evidence against him, he has a due process right ‘to be present in his own person whenever his presence has a relation, reasonably substantial, to the fullness of his opportunity to defend against the charge.’” Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. 730, 745 (1987) (dictum); see also United States v. Gagnon, 470 U.S. 522, 526 (1985) (per curiam) (dictum) (same, quoting Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 105-06 (1934)); Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 819 n.15 (1975) (dictum) (“an accused has a right to be present at all stages of the trial where his absence might frustrate the fairness of the proceedings”); Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127, 142 (1992) (Justice Kennedy, concurring in the judgment) (an accused’s “right to be present at trial . . . derives from the right to testify and rights under the Confrontation Clause”).

826
In the Stincer opinion, the Court elaborates the scope of this Due Process right by saying that it is a “right to be present at any stage of the criminal proceeding that is critical to its outcome if [the defendant’s] . . . presence would contribute to the fairness of the procedure.” 482 U.S. at 745. The same opinion seems to treat the measure of the Confrontation Clause right as “whether there has been any interference with the defendant’s opportunity for effective cross-examination,” id. at 744-45 n.17, as a result of the defendant’s exclusion during a stage of the trial at which the testimony of prosecution witnesses is received, see id. at 739-40. But the latter right is clearly broader than that because the Court has squarely held that “the Confrontation Clause guarantees the defendant a face-to-face meeting with witnesses appearing before the trier of fact” in at least one situation in which the right of effective cross-examination was not significantly implicated. Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 1016 (1988) (holding that the Confrontation Clause was violated by a procedure under which a screen was placed between the defendant and child complainants while they testified in a sex case, with no “individualized findings” that the “particular witnesses needed special protection,” id. at 1021). See also Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 850 (1990) (dictum) (“our precedents confirm that a defendant’s right to confront accusatory witnesses may be satisfied absent a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial only where denial of such confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy and only where the reliability of the testimony is otherwise assured”); State ex rel. Montgomery v. Padilla, 237 Ariz. 263, 265, 349 P.3d 1100, 1102 (Ariz. App. 2015) (“A trial court may exercise its discretion to restrict a self-represented defendant from personally cross-examining a child witness without violating a defendant’s constitutional rights to confrontation and self-representation. It can do so, however, only after considering evidence and making individualized findings that such a restriction is necessary to protect the witness from trauma. Because the State did not present such evidence – and in fact eschewed the opportunity to present evidence when invited – the trial court had no basis to restrict . . . [the defendant] from cross-examining the child witnesses.”); State ex rel. Montgomery v. Padilla, 239 Ariz. 314, 317-18, 371 P.3d 642, 645-46 (Ariz. App. 2016) (“Given the constitutional significance of limiting a defendant’s right to confront witnesses face-to-face and a pro se defendant’s right to personally cross-examine those witnesses,” the court adopts the widespread rule that “require[s] clear and convincing evidence of harm [to] be proffered by the State to establish the necessity of an accommodation”); State v. Rogerson, 855 N.W.2d 495, 500, 506, 507-08 (Iowa 2014) (Maryland v. Craig’s standard for the permissibility of using “a one-way video system in which the witness could not see or hear the defendant, but the defendant, judge, and jury could see and hear the witness” also applies to “two-way video systems . . . [which] allow both the defendant and the witness to see and hear one another simultaneously during the testimony”: “Because face-to-face confrontation is constitutionally preferable to remote testimony of any kind, . . . two-way video testimony . . . should be acceptable only upon a showing of necessity to further an important public interest and only when the testimony’s reliability can be otherwise assured.”); “the State failed to meet the necessity prong of that standard,” either with respect to witnesses who “resided a significant distance from Iowa and had suffered serious injuries” but who had not been shown by the State to be “beyond the court’s subpoena power or . . . unable to travel because of their injuries,” or with respect to state lab employees, because “the State’s justifications of mere distance, cost, and efficiency are insufficient to overcome Rogerson’s Sixth Amendment rights, and there is no evidence that the witnesses are unable to travel.”); State v. Schwartz, 327 P.3d 1108, 1111-14 (N.M. App. 2014) (holding that the defendant’s “rights under the confrontation clauses of the United States and New Mexico Constitutions were violated when the district court permitted four witnesses to testify by two-way video over the Internet [via Skype] without the necessary findings that use of video was necessary”; the requisite necessity was not established by the circumstance that three of the witnesses resided out of the state; and a doctor’s letter stating that one of them “is suffering from severe stress, anxiety[,] and depression and is physically and psychologically unable to travel out of the state [of Florida] for the foreseeable future . . . . was inadequate as a matter of law to support a conclusion that . . . [this witness – the defendant’s mother – ] could not testify in person.”); Hall v. Warden, Lee Arrendale State Prison, Hall v. Warden, Lee Arrendale State Prison with the following: 686 Fed. Appx. 671, 673, 681-83 (11th Cir. 2017) (per curiam) (“the trial court’s erroneous application of an inapplicable statute” for closed-circuit testimony by a child witness, which resulted in defense counsel and the defendant being “in separate rooms with no way to communicate with each other” during the witness’s testimony, “raise[d] ‘extremely serious Sixth Amendment problems’”; “at the moment . . . [the defendant’s] attorney needed . . . [the defendant’s] help the most, it was unavailable . . . . Attorney-client communication during cross-examination allows ‘tactical decisions to be made and strategies to be reviewed’. . . . ‘The lawyer may need to obtain from his client information made relevant by the . . . testimony, or he may need to pursue inquiry along lines not fully explored earlier.’”); State v. Ulestad, 127 Wash. App. 209, 215, 111 P.3d 276, 279 (2005) (“The court failed to provide Ulestad with constant communication with his attorney as required by subsection (h) of RCW 9A.44.150 [during the child-molestation complainant’s testimony by one-way television hookup]. Instead, the court allowed Ulestad to communicate with his attorney only by stopping the proceedings. But this is delayed, not constant communication. Moreover, to talk with his attorney, Ulestad had to signal his intent to do so in front of the jury and interrupt the trial. Such a procedure carries substantial risk that the defendant will be intimidated from exercising even this limited communication with his attorney. We hold that the trial court erred in failing to strictly follow the constant communication requirement of RCW 9A.44.150. The error is reversible without a showing of prejudice.”).

Whatever the exact scope of these several rights in esoteric situations, their effect in the ordinary case is to require the respondent’s physical presence in court during all proceedings in which factual matters are at issue or in which dispositive rulings are made by the court, but not during arguments of purely legal questions or discussions of matters of trial administration at sidebar or in chambers. Cf. United States v. Gagnon, 470 U.S. at 526-29 (the Constitution was not violated by defendants’ absence from chambers proceedings in which a juror who had expressed concern that one defendant appeared to be sketching jury members in the courtroom was questioned by court and counsel); Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. at 739-47 (the Constitution was not violated by the defendant’s absence from chambers proceedings in which prospective child witnesses were examined by the court and counsel to determine their competency to testify; the Court notes that the same questions asked of the witnesses in chambers could have been repeated in open court and that the trial court’s ruling that the witnesses were competent was subject to reconsideration during their courtroom testimony.). Many trial judges routinely permit the respondent to be present during even chambers conferences on minor matters, and counsel should ordinarily request that his or her client be allowed to attend every proceeding in the case.
This will reassure the client that counsel is not “selling out” in private conversations with the judge and prosecutor and will forestall postconviction allegations of covert “deals” between counsel and the court.

Proceedings that the respondent has a right to attend may be held in his or her absence only when:

(a) the respondent has personally waived the right to be present, see Taylor v. Illinois, 629 (D.C. Cir. 1963), or

(b) the court finds that the respondent has chosen voluntarily not to attend the proceedings, see Taylor v. United States, 414 U.S. 17 (1973) (per curiam); cf.
Tacon v. Arizona, 410 U.S. 351 (1973), or

(c) the respondent is engaging in disruptive courtroom conduct which makes it impossible to carry on the trial, see Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337 (1970); United States v. Ward, 598 F.3d 1054, 1057-60 (8th Cir. 2010); Gray v. Moore, 520 F.3d 616, 622-25 (6th Cir. 2008).

In United States v. Gagnon, 470 U.S. at 528-29, the Supreme Court held that the defendant’s right to attend court proceedings guaranteed by Federal Criminal Rule 43 could also be waived simply by tacit acquiescence on the part of defendants who had knowledge that proceedings were being conducted in their absence; but the Court’s consideration of these same defendants’ Due Process contentions on the merits implies that a constitutional right to attend proceedings could not be so waived. See Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. at 417-18 (dictum); cf. Brookhart v. Janis, 384 U.S. 1 (1966). (It is hornbook law that the standard for waiver of constitutional rights is more exacting than that for ordinary waivers. E.g., Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938) (“It has been pointed out that ‘courts indulge every reasonable presumption against waiver’ of fundamental constitutional rights and that we ‘do not presume acquiescence in the loss of fundamental rights.’ A waiver is ordinarily an intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege.”)).

The respondent has a right to be free of handcuffs, leg braces, and other physical (2017). Only when a respondent “insists on conducting himself in a manner so disorderly, disruptive, and disrespectful of the court that his trial cannot be carried on with him in the courtroom,” does the court have discretion to order the respondent shackled as an alternative to trial in absentia. Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. at 343; see also Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501, 505-06 (1976) (dictum); United States v. Haynes, 729 F.3d 178, 188-90 (2d Cir. 2013). In a jury trial it is “inherently prejudicial” to require the respondent to appear before the jury in fetters, Deck v. Missouri, 544 U.S. 622, 635 (2005); Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 U.S. 560, 568 (1986) (dictum), since “the sight of shackles and gags might have a significant effect on the jury’s feelings about the [respondent].” Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. at 344. See also Stephenson v. Neal, 865 F.3d 956, 958-59 (7th Cir. 2017) (defense counsel was ineffective at the capital sentencing phase of a trial in “failing to object to his client’s having to wear a stun belt, given the absence of any reason to think his client would go berserk in the courtroom”; “The box on Stephenson’s [stun] belt was on his back under his shirt yet visible to the jurors as a bulge. ¶ . . . [S]eeing the bulge and recognizing it as the action part of a stun belt the jurors may have thought it evidence that Stephenson was violent and unpredictable . . . . It’s also possible that wearing the stun belt affected Stephenson’s demeanor and appearance throughout the trial – made him nervous and fearful, which jurors might interpret incorrectly as signs of guilt.”). And even in a bench trial (or other non-jury proceeding, such as a pretrial hearing or a sentencing) it has been recognized that physical restraints undermine the presumption of innocence and the dignity of the proceedings and may also impair the respondent’s ability to communicate effectively with counsel in presenting a defense. See, e.g., United States v. Sanchez-Gomez, 859 F.3d at 660, 661-62 (the due process “right to be free from shackles in the courtroom” applies “whether the proceeding is pretrial, trial, or sentencing, with a jury or without”; “This right to be free from unwarranted shackles no matter the proceeding respects our foundational principle that defendants are innocent until proven guilty. The principle isn’t limited to juries or trial proceedings. It includes the perception of any person who may walk into a public courtroom, as well as those of the jury, the judge and court personnel. A presumptively innocent defendant has the right to be treated with respect and dignity in a public courtroom, not like a bear on a chain. . . . ¶ And it’s not just about the defendant. The right also maintains courtroom decorum and dignity . . . . A member of the public who wanders into a criminal courtroom must immediately perceive that it is a place where justice is administered with due regard to individuals whom the law presumes to be innocent. That perception cannot prevail if defendants are marched in like convicts on a chain gang. Both the defendant and the public have the right to a dignified, inspiring and open court process. Thus, innocent defendants may not be shackled at any point in the courtroom unless there is an individualized showing of need.”); Tiffany A. v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. App. 4th 1344, 1348, 1361-62, 59 Cal. Rptr. 3d 363, 364-65, 374-75 (2007) (granting a writ of prohibition to “preclude the use of physical restraints upon . . . minors who appear in juvenile court proceedings . . . absent an individualized determination of need for the restraints”: court distinguishes the use of shackles in juvenile proceedings from the shackling of adults in criminal cases because “[t]he objectives of the juvenile justice system differ from those of the adult criminal justice system, and thus justify a less punitive approach to those who stand accused (and not yet to be found criminally culpable) before the court”; “The use of shackles in a courtroom absent a case-by-case, individual showing of need creates the very tone of criminality juvenile proceedings were intended to avoid.”); In re Amendments to the Florida Rules of Juvenile Procedure, 26 So. 3d 552, 556, 562-63 (2009) (per curiam) (“We find the indiscriminate shackling of children . . . repugnant, degrading, humiliating, and contrary to the stated primary purposes of the juvenile justice system and to the principles of therapeutic justice”; rules are amended to prohibit the use of “[i]nstruments of restraint, such as handcuffs, chains, irons, or straitjackets, . . . on a child during a court proceeding . . . unless the court finds both that: (1) The use of restraints is necessary due to one of the following factors: (A) Instruments of restraint are necessary to prevent physical harm to the child or another person; (B) The child has a history of disruptive courtroom behavior that has placed others in potentially harmful situations or presents a substantial risk of inflicting physical harm on himself or herself or others as evidenced by recent behavior; or (C) There is a founded belief that the child presents a substantial risk of flight from the courtroom; and (2) There are no less restrictive alternatives to restraints that will prevent flight or physical harm to the child or another person, including, but not limited to, the presence of court personnel, law enforcement officers, or bailiffs.

In re Staley, 67 Ill. 2d 33, 364 N.E.2d 72, 7 Ill. Dec. 85 (1977) (reversing a delinquency adjudication in a bench trial because the respondent was handcuffed during the trial, and rejecting the argument that the rule prohibiting restraints applies only to jury trials); WASH. JUV. CT. RULE 1.6 (2014) (“Juveniles shall not be brought before the court wearing any physical restraint devices except when ordered by the court during or prior to the hearing” based upon a finding that the “use of restraints is necessary” to prevent harm to the respondent or others or due to “a substantial risk of flight from the courtroom,” and furthermore that “[t]here are no less restrictive alternatives to restraints that will prevent flight or physical harm to the respondent or another person, including, but not limited to, the presence of court personnel, law enforcement officers, or bailiffs”). See also In the Interest of R.W.S., 728 N.W.2d 326, 330 (N.D. 2007) (“With respect to a juvenile court proceeding, we recognize the concerns about the effect of visible physical restraints on a jury do not apply. However, we agree with those courts holding that juveniles have the same rights as adult defendants to be free from physical restraints.”).

For similar reasons a respondent who is in custody is entitled to attend the trial in civilian attire rather than institutional garb. In a jury trial this is a matter of constitutional right if the respondent makes a timely request, because “the constant reminder of the accused’s condition implicit in . . . distinctive, identifiable [institutional] attire may affect a juror’s judgment.” Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. at 504-05. See, e.g., Bentley v. Crist, 469 F.2d 854 (9th Cir. 1972), and cases cited. See also Deck v. Missouri, 544 U.S. at 635 (dictum). And although a judge in a bench trial is ordinarily presumed to be capable of ignoring this kind of prejudicial influence, “[p]rison attire [is] . . . offensive even when there is no jury.” AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION. STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, Commentary to Standard 15-3.1 (3d ed. 1996).

If the respondent is unable to speak English or is hearing-impaired, s/he is entitled to an interpreter in order to effectuate his or her rights to be present at all proceedings and to confront witnesses. See, e.g., United States ex rel. Negron v. New York, 434 F.2d 386, 389-90 (2d Cir. 1970); INSTITUTE OF JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION-AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION JOINT COMMISSION ON JUVENILE JUSTICE STANDARDS, STANDARDS RELATING TO ADJUDICATION, Standard 2.7(B) & Commentary (1980).

§ 27.02 DEFENSE COUNSEL’S PRESENCE

Defense counsel is required to be present at all stages of the trial, in the courtroom or in chambers. See, e.g., United States v. Russell, 205 F.3d 768 (5th Cir. 2000); Green v. Arn, 809
F.2d 1257 (6th Cir. 1987), subsequent history in 839 F.2d 300 (6th Cir. 1988); McKnight v. State, 320 S.C. 356, 465 S.E.2d 352 (1995); Commonwealth v. Johnson, 574 Pa. 5, 828 A.2d 1009 (2003); see Davis v. Ayala, 135 S. Ct. 2187, 2199-2200 (2015) (dissenting opinion of Justice Sotomayor, joined by Justices Ginsburg, Breyer and Kagan); but see Woods v. Donald, 135 S. Ct. 1372 (2015). If counsel has reason to believe that the prosecutor has communicated with the judge ex parte about the case during a recess, counsel should insist that the communication be placed on the record. This is especially important in bench trials, in which the disclosure of inadmissible evidence, such as the respondent’s prior record, can bias the judge’s factfinding.

In jury trials, counsel must also be alert for any indications that the judge has communicated orally or in writing with the jury outside of counsel’s presence. These communications may provide the basis for a mistrial motion, no matter how innocuous the message. See, e.g., Rogers v. United States, 422 U.S. 35 (1975); cf. United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 459-62 (1978); but see United States v. Gagnon, 470 U.S. 522 (1985) (per curiam). If counsel learns that any communication or message was conveyed between the judge and jury, counsel should ordinarily object and request that a record be made before a stenographer of the contents and circumstances of the occurrence. See Rushen v. Spain, 464 U.S. 114 (1983) (per curiam).

Attempts by the court to impose restrictions upon communication between defense counsel and the respondent during trial should be challenged under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to the federal Constitution. See In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 36 (1967) (“[t]he child ‘requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him’”). In Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976), the Supreme Court held that a trial court order forbidding a criminal defendant to consult with his attorney during an overnight recess taken while the defendant was on the witness stand violated the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. However, in Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. 272 (1989), the Court upheld an order forbidding the defendant to consult with his attorney during a 15-minute recess taken at the end of the defendant’s direct examination and before cross. Leeke distinguished Geders on the ground that:

“the normal consultation between attorney and client that occurs during an overnight recess would encompass matters that go beyond the content of the defendant’s own testimony – matters that the defendant does have a constitutional right to discuss with his lawyer, such as the availability of other witnesses, trial tactics, or even the possibility of negotiating a plea bargain. It is the defendant’s right to unrestricted access to his lawyer for advice on a variety of trial-related matters that is controlling in the context of a long recess. . . . The fact that such discussions will inevitably include some consideration of the defendant’s ongoing testimony does not compromise that basic right. But in a short recess in which it is appropriate to presume that nothing but the [defendant’s ongoing] testimony will be discussed, the testifying defendant does not have a constitutional right to advice.” (Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. at 284).
Compare Martin v. United States, 991 A.2d 791, 793-96 (D.C. 2010) (“Martin claims the trial court violated his Sixth Amendment right to counsel by ordering him not to speak to his attorney about his testimony over a weekend recess that interrupted his cross-examination. . . . ¶ The government argues, and appellant elects not to dispute, that the order in this case was narrower than the flat prohibition in Geders and Perry because – understood in context – the judge’s instruction ‘not to speak to anyone’ forbade only discussion of appellant’s testimony. Even if that is so, the order still ‘went further than the law permits.’”).

§ 27.03 THE PRESENCE OF THE RESPONDENT’S PARENT OR GUARDIAN

It is the customary practice in all jurisdictions to permit the respondent’s parent or guardian to attend the trial. In some jurisdictions the juvenile code or caselaw explicitly confers upon the respondent the right to have his or her parent present during trial, and a violation of that right has been held sufficient to require the reversal of an adjudication of delinquency. See, e.g., In re Nikim M., 144 A.D.3d 424, 424, 41 N.Y.S.3d 474, 475-76 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2016) (the trial court erred by starting the factfinding hearing without taking sufficient steps to ensure that the respondent’s absent parent, had who informed counsel that she “would not be able to attend,” had been adequately “notified of both the date and time, and hence been given a reasonable opportunity to attend”); In the Matter of John D., 104 A.D.2d 885, 480 N.Y.S.2d 390 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1984) (judge’s denial of a respondent’s request for a continuance for the purpose of arranging his mother’s presence at trial violated the statutory requirement that a parent be notified of trial and given a reasonable opportunity to attend); In the Interest of Hopkins, 227 So. 2d 282 (Miss. 1969) (application of the rule on witnesses to exclude a respondent’s mother from the courtroom violated the statute requiring parental presence); State in the Interest of V.M., 363 N.J. Super. 529, 535, 833 A.2d 692, 696 (2003) (trial court abused its discretion by applying the rule on witnesses to exclude a respondent’s parent, given that “the parent’s right to be present in the courtroom” outweighs “the acknowledged goals of sequestration”).

The respondent has a due process right to have his or her parent or guardian notified of the trial. In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 33-34 (1967). However, it has been held that the respondent does not have a due process right to a continuance when a parent, who has been notified of the hearing date, fails to appear because of illness. Ronald M. v. Dunston, 628 F. Supp. 1200 (S.D.N.Y. 1986).

§ 27.04 BENCH TRIALS: THEIR NATURE AND IMPLICATIONS FOR DEFENSE STRATEGIES AND TECHNIQUES

§ 27.04(a) Nature of Bench Trials

As explained in § 21.01 supra, most States provide that delinquency cases are to be tried to a judge rather than a jury. In the remaining States the respondent has the option of electing or waiving a jury trial. See § 21.02 supra.
Bench trials tend to be less formal than jury trials. In many jurisdictions it is customary for defense counsel to waive opening statement. See § 29.03(a) infra for discussion of factors to consider in deciding whether to follow this practice. Rules of evidence are often more lax in bench trials, since both the trial judge and the appellate courts like to believe that a judicial factfinder is capable of ignoring inadmissible and even prejudicial information. See §§ 18.10(a), 21.02(b) subdivision (3) supra. In some jurisdictions, judges seem to feel freer in a bench trial than in a jury trial to intervene in a lawyer’s direct or cross-examination by posing questions directly to the witness, but counsel can (and – if the matter is sufficiently important – should) press for the application of constraints upon judicial intervention similar to those that govern jury trials. See § 20.05 penultimate paragraph supra. See, e.g., In the Matter of Yadiel Roque C., 17 A.D.3d 1168, 793 N.Y.S.2d 857 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2005). See generally Michael Pinard, Limitations on Judicial Activism in Criminal Trials, 33 CONN. L. REV. 243 (2000).

As indicated in § 21.02(b), a judge is likely to react to the facts and the law in ways that a jury would not. Judges tend to credit the testimony of police officers and other professionals, and many judges are skeptical of the testimony of the respondent and his or her family and friends. Judges tend to be far less likely than juries to decide cases on the basis of emotion. This can be damaging when the equities favor the respondent (for example, when the respondent reacted to extreme provocation that is not legally exonerating), but it can be helpful in cases in which the victim is personable. Judges are capable of understanding complex legal defenses that a jury would not, and judges may also be more willing than jurors to apply legal doctrines that favor the defense such as the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt and the prohibition against drawing adverse inferences from the accused’s failure to take the stand.

As indicated in § 20.05, bench trials may be complicated by the fact that the judge has learned inadmissible information about the case or the respondent from a variety of sources. If the judge’s knowledge of this information derives from presiding over the detention hearing or a suppression hearing in the case, counsel will at least be aware of the nature of the information. But if the judge’s source of knowledge is a hearing in the case of of a co-respondent at which counsel was not present or a prior case of the respondent’s in which s/he was represented by a different attorney or scuttlebutt around the courthouse, counsel will not even be apprised of the facts that are potentially influencing the judge.

Judges also are affected by their experience in having presided over numerous prior trials and having observed certain fact patterns recur. Occasionally, this can be helpful to the defense – for example, (1) when a judge has learned to overcome his or her incredulity about assertions of outrageous misconduct by the police during interrogations and searches because s/he has heard enough credible witnesses testify to them, or (2) when a judge has learned to discredit certain standard police fabrications like the “dropsie” scenario described in § 23.13 supra, or (3) when a judge has become skeptical of snitches after hearing enough of their standard perjurious spiel. Far more often, however, the judge’s history is likely to hurt the respondent by making the judge dubious of a defense that s/he has heard too often. For example, a judge who has heard numerous respondents claim that, at the time of their arrest for possession of a firearm or drugs, they had just “found” the contraband item and innocently picked it up to examine it is likely to disbelieve a respondent’s testimony to that effect even when it is supported by the facts and circumstances.

§ 27.04(b) Implications for Defense Strategies and Techniques

Because so many judges are prone to disfavor the defense in fact-finding – particularly when a case boils down to a swearing contest between the respondent and police witnesses or “respectable” complainants – and because most judges are relatively receptive to legal theories supported by appellate caselaw, defense counsel in a bench trial is usually advised to develop defenses that involve the application of some legal doctrine. A motion for a judgment of acquittal (see §§ 32.01, 35.01-35.04 infra) that relies upon appellate opinions to demonstrate that the prosecution’s proof of a certain element of the crime is insufficient as a matter of law will often be more effective in a bench trial than an affirmative defense that depends upon the judge’s crediting defense witnesses. See generally Martin Guggenheim & Randy Hertz, Reflections on Judges, Juries and Justice: Ensuring the Fairness of Juvenile Delinquency Trials, in Symposium on Juvenile Justice Reform, 33 Wake Forest L. Rev. 553, 586-93 (1998); Paul Holland, Sharing Stories: Narrative Lawyering in Bench Trials, 16 Clin. L. Rev. 195 (2009).

Accordingly, in preparing for a bench trial, counsel should comprehensively research the appellate caselaw on each element of the crime or crimes that the prosecution has charged. In particular, counsel should look for appellate decisions holding the prosecution’s proof of a certain element to be insufficient as a matter of law. (In many jurisdictions, favorable precedents of this sort are more likely to come from intermediate appellate courts than from the State’s highest court: High-court judges – particularly those in States where their jurisdiction in criminal and delinquency appeals is discretionary – often disdain to decide issues of evidentiary sufficiency.) Thus, for example, in an assault case in which a specified amount of physical injury must be proved in order to make out the degree of assault that is charged (such as “great bodily harm”), counsel should collect and be prepared to cite appellate decisions requiring a more serious type of injury than the prosecution is likely to be able to prove. As § 35.02 infra suggests, when the law is particularly extensive or complex, counsel should consider preparing a written memorandum of points and authorities to submit in support of a motion for a judgment of acquittal.

Given the likelihood that legal doctrines will be influential in a bench trial, counsel should also particularly research the caselaw recognizing and defining potentially applicable inferences and presumptions, both those that favor the defense and those that favor the prosecution. Thus, for example, counsel should be prepared to cite caselaw supporting a “missing witness” inference when the prosecution fails to present a witness under its control (see § 10.08 supra) and should be prepared to document the immunity of the defense to such an inference when, for example, the appellate opinions establish a prerequisite for its application (such as that the witness be peculiarly available to the defense (see, e.g., Lawson v. United States, 514 A.2d 787, 790-92 (D.C. 1980)) that is lacking in the case at hand.
Whenever counsel intends to present an “affirmative defense” (see § 35.05 infra), counsel should exhaustively research the standards that the defense must satisfy, as well as the prosecution’s obligation to disprove the defense. To the extent possible, counsel will want to frame the factual testimony to precisely fit the fact patterns of prior cases in which the defense prevailed and then to cite those cases in closing argument.

Counsel should consult other defense attorneys who have appeared before the judge, to find out whether s/he applies a stringent standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. If so, it may be advisable to rest the defense solely on the theory that the prosecution has failed to meet its burden of proof rather than presenting defense witnesses and taking the chance that the judge will find them incredible and will use their incredibility as a basis for convicting.

In a bench trial, counsel will have to calculate the judge’s patience and equanimity. As §§ 29.03(a) and 34.07 infra suggest, it may be advisable to acquiesce in a local custom of waiving opening statement in order to avoid straining the judge’s tolerance from the get-go. Similarly, counsel is often well advised to forgo objections to inadmissible evidence and procedural irregularities that are not sufficiently damaging and demonstrably out of bounds so that there is a serious prospect of appellate reversal if the objections are overruled and the client is convicted. Insisting upon time-consuming formal procedures (such as technical completion of the foundations for admission of items of prosecution evidence) and making formalistic points (such as obvious arguments that particular items of prosecution evidence are admissible for limited purposes and cannot be considered for other purposes) will only serve to irritate a harried or self-complacent judge and to jaundice his or her reactions to the defense case.

Before moving for recusal or disqualification of a judge, counsel should carefully consider the possibility that the judge will deny the motion, with the net result that the judge will still preside over the case but have reason to resent counsel and the respondent. See § 20.07 supra.

Finally, it is important for counsel to keep in mind that the same judge who tries the facts will ordinarily also preside at sentencing. If the judge is likely to view the respondent’s testimony as perjurious and to punish it by a stiff sentence, counsel may be wise to keep the respondent off the stand and to rely upon other defense witnesses and/or cross-examination of the state’s witnesses to lay the foundation for an argument that the prosecution has failed to sustain its burden of proof. If the judge is likely to believe that the respondent persuaded relatives or friends to perjure themselves, these witnesses should also be kept off the stand unless their testimony is crucial to establish a defense theory of the case that is by far the respondent’s best hope of acquittal.

§ 27.05 JURY TRIALS: CONDUCT OF THE JURY DURING TRIAL; ADJUSTING STRATEGY AND TECHNIQUES TO THE IDIOSYNCRASIES OF JURIES

§ 27.05(a) Conduct of the Jury During Trial
§ 27.05(a)(1) Sequestration

In adult criminal court, it is customary in capital cases – although no longer invariably required in all jurisdictions – to sequester the jury from the time when the jurors are selected until they are discharged at the end of the trial. They eat and sleep at a hotel or a court facility under the supervision of court officers. In other cases, on request of the prosecution or defense, this same procedure may be ordered in the court’s discretion.

Counsel could seek sequestration of the jury in a delinquency case in which community attitudes are hostile to the respondent or if media coverage of the trial is expected to be extensive and prejudicial. Such a request may be based upon the respondent’s federal constitutional right to a fair trial by an impartial jury (see §§ 20.03(b), 21.03(a), 28.03(a) supra). See Nebraska Press Assn. v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539, 564 (1976) (dictum); Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 378-79 & n.5 (1979) (dictum); Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 580-81 (1980) (plurality opinion) (dictum); cf. Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560, 574 (1981) (dictum). However, except when local hostility or prejudicial publicity is extreme, sequestration should usually not be requested. It inconveniences and irritates jurors and often forces them into close and continuing contact with a deputy marshal, sheriff, or other law enforcement official.

Whether or not the jury is sequestered overnight and during lunch recesses, it is ordinarily kept together in the courthouse throughout the court day and is accompanied by a court or law enforcement officer whenever it is out of the jury box. If the jury is placed in the charge of any officer having law enforcement duties, counsel should ask the judge at the outset of trial (and in the absence of the jury) to question the officer to make certain that s/he had no contact with the investigation of the case or apprehension of the respondent and has not talked about the case with officers involved. See Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466 (1965); Gonzales v. Beto, 405 U.S. 1052 (1972) (per curiam). The judge should be requested to instruct the officer not to discuss any aspect of the case with any juror.

§ 27.05(a)(2) Jury Misconduct; Contacts Between Jurors and Other Persons

The jurisdictions vary with regard to whether and under what circumstances they require mistrials or new trials on account of jury misconduct such as consulting the Bible or discussing media reportage during deliberations. After verdict, the questioning of jurors on these subjects is effectively barred in many jurisdictions by a broad interpretation of the common-law prohibition against jurors impeaching their verdicts by testimony concerning the thinking or deliberative processes underlying the verdict. Codifications of that prohibition in statutes or rules of court (such as FED. RULE EVID. 606(b) (2018)) may or may not permit post-verdict interrogation of jurors regarding various sorts of jury misconduct. Compare Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107 (1987), and Warger v. Shauers, 135 S. Ct. 521 (2014), with People v. Harlan, 109 P.3d 616 (Colo. 2005), and People v. Budzyn, 456 Mich. 775, 66 N.W.2d 229 (1997). Federal Rule 606(b) explicitly provides that jurors “may testify about whether: ¶ (A) extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury’s attention; ¶ (B) an outside influence was improperly brought to bear on any juror; or ¶ (C) a mistake was made in entering the verdict on the verdict form”; and many parallel state provisions similarly distinguish between juror testimony regarding the deliberative process and juror testimony regarding improper “extraneous prejudicial information.” See, e.g., James v. State, 912 So. 2d 940, 949-50 (Miss. 2005); State v. Yang, 196 Wis. 2d 359, 538 N.W.2d 817 (Wis. App. 1995). Some States additionally authorize testimony about other sorts of jury misconduct. E.g., Ind. Rule Evid. 606(b) (2018) (“a juror may testify . . . to drug or alcohol use by any juror”); Mont. Rule Evid. 606(b) (2018) (“a juror may testify . . . as to . . . whether any juror has been induced to assent to any general or special verdict, or finding on any question submitted to them by the court, by a resort to the determination of chance”); Vt. Rule Evid. 606(b) (2018) (“a juror may testify . . . about . . . whether any juror discussed matters pertaining to the trial with persons other than fellow jurors”). Moreover, in certain circumstances counsel may be able to invoke a constitutional interest that overrides a statute or rule prohibiting the post-verdict questioning of jurors. For example, the Supreme Court has held that in a case in which “a juror makes a clear statement that indicates he or she relied on racial stereotypes or animus to convict a criminal defendant, the Sixth Amendment requires that the no-impeachment rule give way in order to permit the trial court to consider the evidence of the juror’s statement and any resulting denial of the jury trial guarantee.” Peña-Rodriguez v. Colorado, 137 S. Ct. 855, 869 (2017). See also Tharpe v. Sellers, 138 S. Ct. 545 (2018).

Before verdict, counsel who has reason to suspect that jurors are misbehaving will seldom want to risk angering them by precipitating a judicial inquiry unless (1) the trial appears pretty clearly to be going badly for the defense, and (2) local law very clearly requires a mistrial for the kind of juror misconduct in question, and (3) counsel is very sure that s/he can prove the misconduct. Less controversial problems, such as a juror’s appearing to doze off or to be distracted or indisposed during trial, can usually be handled by calling the matter to the court’s attention at sidebar (cf. Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. at 127 (noting that counsel’s observations of jurors during trial plays an important part in spotting incapacitation of individual jurors and thereby safeguarding the accused’s “Sixth Amendment interests in an unimpaired jury”)) – or, if proceedings have been going on for quite a while without a recess, simply suggesting to the court that a bathroom break might serve everyone’s convenience at this time. When counsel takes the former tack and names a particular juror as a potential problem, s/he should ask the judge, in dealing with the problem, not to identify counsel as the whistleblower.

In most courtrooms the jury is admonished by the judge, in his or her opening remarks to the panel and again before every recess, not to discuss the case with anyone or among themselves until they are sent out to deliberate and reach a verdict. The jurors are told that if anyone approaches them about the case or if they overhear any conversation or comment about the case, they are to report that fact to the court immediately. Once a trial has begun and it comes to the court’s attention that a juror may have had improper contacts with non-jurors, the juror in question is usually interrogated by the judge (either in chambers or in open court with the other jurors sent out during the process) about the occurrence and the details of the episode. See People v. Moore, 321 P.3d 510, 514 (Colo. App. 2010) (“A trial court should deal with juror exposure to prejudicial publicity during trial as follows: ¶ 1) the trial court must determine whether the publicity is inherently prejudicial; ¶ 2) if so, the court should canvass the jury to determine whether the jury learned of the prejudicial publicity; and ¶ 3) the trial court should individually examine exposed jurors to determine how much they know of the publicity and what effect, if any, the publicity will have on their deliberations’’); and see, e.g., People v. Hillsman, 1999 WL 33437900 (Mich. App. 1999); State v. Stigger, 2006 WL 2194507 (N.J. Super. 2006); State v. Smith, 418 S.W.3d 38 (Tenn. 2013); cf. Remmer v. United States, 347 U.S. 227 (1954); Smith v. Phillips, 455 U.S. 209, 215-17 (1982). Other sorts of pre-deliberation incidents of jury misbehavior that are brought to the court’s attention are similarly handled. See, e.g., State v. Brown, 442 N.J. Super. 153, 121 A.3d 878 (2015). If the court then decides that the juror ought to be withdrawn from the jury, s/he may be excused, even over the objection of a party. If dismissal of a juror leaves a number less than that prescribed by law to hear the case, both sides must agree to allow the submission of the case to this lesser number of jurors, or a mistrial is declared.

§ 27.05(a)(3) Contacts Between Defense Counsel or the Respondent and Jurors

If counsel encounters the jury or individual jurors in or around the courthouse or elsewhere during trial, s/he should say a polite good morning or good afternoon and nothing else. The respondent and his or her parent or guardian should be instructed by counsel to do the same. Counsel, the respondent, and the respondent’s family must scrupulously avoid talking to jurors about anything, even things unrelated to the case. If conversation is observed, the juror is likely to be called into chambers to explain it, and s/he will feel that counsel has gotten him or her into trouble with the court. Conversation observed by counsel between the prosecutor and jurors should be reported to the court.

§ 27.05(b) Adjusting Strategies and Techniques to the Idiosyncrasies of Jury Trials

The nuances of effective jury work depend to a large extent upon fact-specific variables pertaining to the case (the type of crime; age, race, and gender of the accused; age, race, and gender of the victim; prejudicial evidence like gory photographs; extenuating facts like the provocation that caused the respondent to act; and sympathy-arousing facts like police mistreatment of the respondent) and pertaining to the jury that has been selected (age, race, gender, social class, and occupations of the jurors). The few generalizations that can be offered about jury work must be applied cautiously, considering these specifics.

It is advisable, whenever possible, to prove the respondent’s innocence rather than relying on the hope of persuading the jury to acquit an apparently guilty respondent because the prosecution has failed to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. To this end, counsel should ordinarily seize the initiative early in the case, presenting the defense theory in an opening statement unless its disclosure at the outset would enable the prosecutor to rebut it more effectively in the prosecution’s case-in-chief. See § 29.03(b), (c) infra. Since most jurors expect an innocent person to testify and since many of them will be incapable of following the judge’s instruction to disregard the respondent’s failure to take the stand, it is usually preferable for the respondent to testify in a jury trial. The exceptions are cases in which the respondent’s story is inherently incredible or s/he presents it incredibly (see § 33.06 subdivision (D) infra) or in which s/he can be impeached with evidence of prior crimes (see §§ 33.05-33.09 infra) that are particularly likely to convince the jury that the respondent committed the present crime or is despicable even if s/he did not. Other considerations will sometimes warrant keeping the respondent off the stand (see § 33.06 subdivisions (G) through (K) infra), but only if they trump the typical reluctance of juries to acquit respondents who don’t “come clean.”

A crucial difference between a jury trial and a bench trial is that jurors are not familiar with criminal law and criminal procedure. Accordingly, the jury will often be baffled by the directions that defense counsel is taking in cross-examination. Although counsel will have an opportunity in closing argument to weave together points made during cross-examination, the argument may come too late to win over some jurors, who will already have made up their minds that counsel is fighting over irrelevant points because s/he cannot contest the major incriminating facts. In addition, even when a juror follows the points that counsel is making, there will often be so much material covered that the juror will forget much of it. Therefore, when possible, counsel should use his or her opening statement to familiarize the jury with the key points in the defense theory of the case and should then explicitly develop those points in cross-examination of prosecution witnesses and direct examination of defense witnesses.

Jurors tune out quickly when things get tedious. In examining witnesses, counsel should present the crucial facts in the simplest and most straightforward manner possible. When s/he has to make a lengthy closing argument, counsel should modulate the volume of his or her voice and use dramatic pauses to attract the jury’s attention at crucial points, as well as using verbal cues like “the most important thing for you to remember is . . . .”

Exhibits are very important in a jury trial. They can be used during examinations and during closing argument as props to hold the jury’s attention and to make it easier for the jurors to follow and remember testimony. Thus, for example, a lengthy oral recitation of where the respondent walked is far less comprehensible and memorable than a poster on which the respondent draws his or her path, particularly if the poster is then introduced into evidence so that it can be examined by the jurors in the jury room.

Appearances also are important in a jury trial. The jurors are likely to be impressed by a respondent who dresses well and testifies in a forthright, coherent style. They are likely to be swayed by character witnesses and alibi witnesses who are respectable members of the community. In most cases, counsel should periodically confer with the client at the defense table throughout the trial as the evidence emerges and tactical decisions need to be made, so that the jury can see that the respondent is a reasoning, concerned human being rather than a mindless brute. (Obvious exceptions to this performative style apply in prosecutions for crimes of calculation: fraud, insider trading, masterminding a criminal enterprise, and so forth.) Counsel should prepare the client not to laugh, look bored, or make angry remarks during trial; the jury must not get the impression either that the respondent is not taking the charges seriously or that the respondent is prone to losing his or her temper.

In conducting a jury trial, counsel must always keep in mind the jurors’ prerogative of acquitting on the basis of sympathetic facts that do not amount to a legal defense. Counsel should ordinarily present any mitigating facts that are admissible, even if they do not form a part of counsel’s defense theory and even if counsel does not intend to rely on them in closing argument.

§ 27.06 PREPARATION OF A TRIAL FOLDER OR “TRIAL BRIEF” AND AN EXHIBIT FILE

Orderly examination of witnesses and quick citation of relevant authority impress judges and jurors. In addition, a well-presented case is easier for the trier of fact to grasp. Counsel will ordinarily find that an indispensable aid to the orderly presentation of a case at trial is a trial folder or, as it is sometimes called, a trial brief. This folder is for counsel’s own use in the courtroom. Arranged to suit counsel’s taste, it may helpfully contain:

1. all significant documents filed in the case (the Petition; any written defensive pleas; motions and supporting memoranda; and so forth);
2. reproductions of relevant statutes and cases;
3. [in a jury trial:] a checklist of questions for voir dire;
4. a checklist of questions for each witness;
5. a checklist of the exhibits that counsel intends to proffer, indicating through which witness each exhibit will be introduced;
6. reproductions of all documentary exhibits;
7. [in a jury trial:] proposed jury instructions with supporting citations;
8. statements taken from prosecution witnesses;
9. statements taken from defense witnesses;
10. any reports prepared by defense experts;
11. documents obtained from the prosecution through discovery;
12. transcripts of all pretrial hearings;
13. copies of defense subpoenas and their returns; and
14. any other documents and all materials gathered by investigators.

A separate file should be maintained of the original documents that counsel will put into evidence, in their proper order. Counsel should ascertain before trial whether it is the court’s custom to have counsel mark (that is, number) their own exhibits or whether this is done by the clerk. If the former, counsel should save possible trial fumbling by marking the exhibits in advance. Each should be designated “Respondent’s Exhibit No. _____” or by some similar form, so that they can be numbered before trial without reference to the possible number of prosecution exhibits.

§ 27.07 DECIDING WHETHER TO CALL THE RESPONDENT BY FIRST NAME OR LAST NAME AT TRIAL

In juvenile court in most jurisdictions, the normal practice is to refer to the respondent by first name rather than as Mr. or Ms. ________________. During pretrial proceedings and bench trials, counsel should follow local custom in calling a respondent by first name or last name. It makes no sense to irritate the judge by rejecting the procedure the judge views as customary and appropriate.

In jury trials, however, counsel is freer to deviate, since jurors do not come into trial with any expectations or knowledge of customary juvenile court practice. Usually, the respondent gains some advantage from being called by his or her first name, especially in cases in which s/he is charged with a crime of violence. The first-name usage emphasizes the respondent’s youthfulness, making him or her appear less menacing and culpable. On the other hand, calling the respondent by his or her last name lends an air of formality that may bring home to the jurors the gravity of the proceedings and the magnitude of their decision. There are no hard-and-fast rules here; counsel should be guided by what s/he believes will be best with the particular jury, what s/he feels comfortable with, and what the respondent prefers. Of course, much will depend on the age of and size of the respondent: It would be ludicrous for counsel to call a diminutive 12-year-old “Mr.” or “Ms.”

§ 27.08 PUBLIC TRIAL

Traditionally, delinquency proceedings have been closed to the public and the press in order to effectuate the juvenile courts’ policies of confidentiality. See Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 443 U.S. 97, 107-08 (1979). Although some jurisdictions remain rigorous in excluding the public and the press, there has been an increasing trend toward opening delinquency proceedings to both. See generally Linda A. Szymanski, Confidentiality of Juvenile Delinquency Hearings (2008 Update), 13:5 National Center for Juvenile Justice (NCJJ) Snapshot (May 2008) (surveying state statutes on “confidentiality of juvenile delinquency hearings” and reporting that, “[c]urrently, 14 states have statutes and/or court rules that permit or require juvenile delinquency hearings to be open to the general public,” and “[a]nother 21 states open delinquency hearings to the public but place certain age/offense requirements on the openness of the hearing”; and “[f]ifteen jurisdictions have statutes and/or court rules that generally close delinquency hearings to the public”). But see, e.g., In the Matter of M.C., 527 N.W.2d 290, 292 (S.D. 1995) (describing the South Dakota legislature’s 1991 repeal of a statute that had afforded general public access to juvenile court hearings and the legislature’s substitution of a statute requiring that such hearings be “‘closed unless the court finds compelling reasons to require otherwise’”). Some States authorize public access in all cases except when the likely prejudice to a juvenile respondent outweighs the public interest, see, e.g., IOWA CODE ANN. § 232.39 (2018); other States permit access in cases involving respondents over a certain age or crimes of a certain magnitude, see, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 676 (2018); MINN. STAT. ANN. § 260B.163(1)(c) (2018); and still other States permit press access while continuing to exclude the general public, see, e.g., D.C. CODE ANN. § 16-2316(e)(2) (2018); ILL. COMP.
The state’s power to regulate access to juvenile proceedings is circumscribed both by constitutional rights of the respondent and by First Amendment rights of the press and public. “The right to an open public trial is a shared right of the accused and the public, the common concern being the assurance of fairness.” Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1, 7 (1986) [Press-Enterprise II].

An adult criminal defendant has a Sixth Amendment right to a public trial. In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 266-73 (1948); Waller v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39 (1984); Presley v. Georgia, 558 U.S. 209, 211-15 (2010) (per curiam); Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 856-57 (1975) (dictum); Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 379-81 (1979) (dictum); Weaver v. Massachusetts, 137 S. Ct. 1899, 1909 (2017) (dictum) (“Although [the Court in Waller v. Georgia, supra] . . . recognized that there would be instances where closure was justified, this Court noted that ‘such circumstances will be rare’”; “Although the Court [in Presley v. Georgia, supra] expressly noted that courtroom closure may be ordered in some circumstances, the Court also stated that it was ‘still incumbent upon’ the trial court ‘to consider all reasonable alternatives to closure.’”; “A public-trial violation can occur, moreover, as it did in Presley, simply because the trial court omits to make the proper findings before closing the courtroom, even if those findings might have been fully supported by the evidence.”). See also People v. Alvarez, 20 N.Y.3d 75, 78-79, 81, 979 N.E.2d 1173, 1174, 1176, 955 N.Y.S.2d 846, 847, 849 (2012) (ordering a new trial because of the violation of Alvarez’s right to a public trial: “Upon returning from the lunch recess, defense counsel notified the court that, although it had escaped his notice, defendant advised him that his parents had not been present for the morning’s jury selection proceedings. Although defendant’s parents were present at that time, counsel moved for a mistrial based on the earlier denial of the right to a public trial. The court denied the motion, observing that the courtroom had been filled by prospective jurors and that in ‘every trial we ask the family to step out and as soon as seats are available, they are [the] first ones offered seats.’ ¶ . . The protest raised by defense counsel in Alvarez, both immediately after the violation and as soon as he realized that an error had occurred, was sufficient to preserve the public trial issue. Notably, the court did not take issue with the credibility of counsel’s representation that he had only just learned that defendant’s parents had been excluded from the courtroom; nor was there any indication that counsel was attempting to engage in some type of artifice. In these circumstances, where only five jurors had been selected, the appropriate remedy would have been to grant the request for a mistrial and start jury selection anew.”).

Due process requires that juvenile respondents be accorded the same right to protect themselves from “judicial oppression [by] . . . focusing community attention upon the trial of their cases.” McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528, 555 (1971) (concurring and dissenting opinion of Justice Brennan). See, e.g., R.L.R. v. State, 487 P.2d 27, 35-39 (Alaska 1971) (holding that juvenile respondents have a state constitutional right to a public trial). But see State ex rel. Plain Dealer Publishing Company v. Geauga County Court of Common Pleas, Juvenile Division, 90 Ohio St. 3d 79, 82-83, 734 N.E.2d 1214, 1218 (2000) (per curiam) (holding that, notwithstanding the federal and state constitutional guarantees that give rise to a “presumption of openness” in “most criminal proceedings,” the media and the public “do not have a . . . constitutional right of access to . . . juvenile delinquency proceedings, including the transfer hearing” because “[j]uvenile court proceedings have historically been closed to the public, and public access to these proceedings does not necessarily play a significant positive role in the juvenile court process”). Accordingly, the power of a juvenile court to close the proceedings over the respondent’s objection and demand for a public trial is doubtless very limited. Although “the [respondent’s] right to an open trial may give way in certain cases to other rights or interests, such as . . . the government’s interest in inhibiting disclosure of sensitive information, . . . [s]uch circumstances will be rare [and] . . . ‘[t]he presumption of openness may be overcome only by an overriding interest based on findings that closure is essential to preserve higher values and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest.’” Waller v. Georgia, 467 U.S. at 45.

When the respondent conversely requests a closed trial or does not object to one, the constitutional issues are more complicated. Fortunately, they seldom arise in practice because neither the press nor the public cares to attend most juvenile trials, and the ordinary juvenile court judge is unlikely to worry greatly about their theoretical rights to attend if nobody shows up in the courtroom demanding those rights. In the unusual case in which anyone is likely to demand them – ordinarily, cases of sensational crimes that have sparked sufficient media interest to create a realistic possibility that representatives of the press may undertake legal proceedings to gain admittance – counsel will have to contend with First Amendment issues. Compare Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980) (the closure of trial on the merits without considering alternative means of protecting the defendant from adverse publicity is unconstitutional); Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court, 457 U.S. 596 (1982) (the mandatory closure of portions of the trial on the merits of a sex offense while complainants under age 18 are testifying is unconstitutional); Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501 (1984) [Press-Enterprise I] (closure of voir dire examination of prospective jurors and sealing of the voir dire transcript without considering alternative means of protecting the defendant from adverse publicity and protecting jurors’ compelling privacy interests held unconstitutional); and Press-Enterprise II, 478 U.S. at 13-15 (the closure of a preliminary hearing and sealing of the transcript without adequate determinations that these procedures are necessary to protect the defendant’s right to a fair trial and without consideration of alternative protective measures held unconstitutional), with Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. at 387-94 (the closure of a pretrial suppression hearing is constitutional). In this situation the respondent must demonstrate that “closure is required to protect the [respondent’s] . . . superior right to a fair trial, or that some other overriding consideration requires closure.” Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. at 564 (plurality opinion). See Press-Enterprise I, 464 U.S. at 510; Press-Enterprise II, 478 U.S. at 13-14. The court is obliged to balance the First Amendment rights of the press and the public against the danger that open proceedings will impair the respondent’s right to a fair trial and such considerations as the “purposes and traditions of the juvenile court [which] dictate that . . . the delinquency proceeding be administered (1) to avoid for one who has the defense of infancy the stigma attached to defense or conviction of ‘criminal’ charges and (2) to assure, to the extent possible, that the young person’s experience with the law is constructive and

As a tactical matter the defense will ordinarily want closure. Because the only juvenile cases that attract press attention are those involving heinous crimes, media coverage is likely to be highly unfavorable to the respondent, placing pressure upon the judge to convict. The exceptions, as explained in Justice Brennan’s concurring and dissenting opinion in McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, are cases in which the respondent is charged with a political crime and “there may be a substantial ‘temptation to use the courts for political ends,’” 403 U.S. at 556, or in which the circumstances of the case or the biases of the judge create other dangers of “misuse of the judicial process,” id.

When a crime has stirred strong emotions in the community or in the victim’s family, victim’s-rights advocates or family members who want to see a respondent convicted and severely punished may seek to display their support for these results in various ways – by wearing mourning garb or message-bearing T-shirts or buttons in the courtroom (if spectators are admitted to the trial), by conducting demonstrations outside the courthouse, and so forth. In jurisdictions where delinquency charges are tried to a jury, counsel should move for an order prohibiting all such exhibitions in locations where the jury may be exposed to them. The motion should invoke the court’s inherent authority to regulate its proceedings so as to “preserve the calm and dignity of a court,” Carey v. Musladin, 549 U.S. 70, 81 (2006) (Justice Kennedy, concurring), and to avoid “a risk of improper considerations” affecting the jury’s fair and impartial deliberation of the case, id. at 82 (Justice Souter, concurring). See, e.g., Wright v. State, 276 Ga. 419, 420, 577 S.E.2d 782, 784 (2003) (“[t]he trial court forbade those wearing the T-shirts [bearing the victim’s picture] from entering the courtroom, and the record does not show that any juror was ever exposed to a relative of . . . [the victim] who was wearing one”); Johnson
v. Commonwealth, 259 Va. 654, 676, 529 S.E.2d 769, 781-82 (2000) (“When Johnson raised his objection to the buttons at the beginning of trial, the court ruled that the spectators would not be permitted to display the buttons in any manner that would allow the jurors to see them. The court also ruled that anyone wearing a button was required to refrain from any contact with any of the jurors.”); State v. Speed, 265 Kan. 26, 48, 961 P.2d 13, 30 (1998) (“[I]t would seem that the wearing of such buttons or t-shirts is not a good idea because of the possibility of prejudice which might result. Under the circumstances, it would have been better for the district court to have ordered the buttons removed or the t-shirts covered up.”); State v. Rose, 112 N.J. 454, 541-42, 548 A.2d 1058, 1104 (1988) (“[A] trial court’s paramount responsibility in presiding over a criminal trial is to assure that the proceedings are conducted fairly and that a verdict is rendered impartially by the jury. To that end, a court has broad discretionary powers that may be exercised to protect the jury from extraneous pressures that might affect the proper discharge of its sworn duty. In appropriate circumstances, that power might properly be exercised by imposing limitations on the dress of police or correction officers, by prohibiting the display of buttons or emblems, or by other proscriptions necessary to preserve decorum and an atmosphere of impartiality in the courtroom.”). Cf. Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501, 503 (1976) (“To implement the presumption [of innocence], courts must be alert to factors that may undermine the fairness of the fact-finding process. In the administration of criminal justice, courts must carefully guard against dilution of the principle that guilt is to be established by probative evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt.”). The motion should also invoke the state and federal Due Process guarantees of a fair trial by an impartial jury (see § 20.03(b) supra; § 28.03(a), subpart (iv) infra). See State v. Franklin, 174 W. Va. 469, 475, 327 S.E.2d 449, 455 (1985). The extent of federal constitutional protection in this area is cloudy in the wake of Carey v. Musladin, so it is particularly important for counsel to cite the respondent’s state as well as federal rights to due process and to trial by an impartial jury. See § 7.09 supra.

§ 27.09 TRANSCRIPTION OF PROCEEDINGS AND THE RESPONDENT’S RIGHT TO OBTAIN A TRANSCRIPT

In most jurisdictions trials in juvenile court, like trials in adult criminal court, are routinely attended by a court reporter or stenographer who records the proceedings at public expense. Whenever this is not so, counsel should arrange to have a reporter present to record the trial proceedings; and if the respondent is indigent, counsel should move the court to order the trial recorded without cost to the defense. The constitutional right of an indigent to a state-paid transcription of stenographically recorded trial testimony in the event of an appeal is firmly settled, see § 39.02(b) infra, and on grounds which logically compel the conclusion that the indigent has a cognate right to have the proceedings recorded in forma pauperis in the first place. See, e.g., State in the Interest of Collins, 288 So. 2d 918 (La. App. 1973); see also In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 58 (1967) (describing the burdens imposed upon the judicial system when a juvenile court fails to transcribe the trial).

Counsel should be alert to local practices under which some portions of the trial, such as the closing arguments of counsel, are not transcribed. Counsel should request their transcription except when it is absolutely clear that nothing of any significance will occur in the proceeding. A full transcript is indispensable whenever there is any prospect of an appeal, because – for example – appellate courts reviewing a trial in which the closing arguments have not been transcribed may well find “harmless error” in the erroneous admission of the very piece of inadmissible evidence that the prosecutor used to clinch his or her summation.

In major trials it is ordinarily possible for a respondent who can afford it to procure a “day transcript” – that is, to arrange with the court reporter to have each day’s testimony transcribed in the evening and delivered to counsel at night for use at trial the next day. This is a valuable aid for many purposes: cross-examining prosecution witnesses, reviewing the testimony of defense witnesses to be sure that no gaps are left in the proof, quoting from the evidence in argument to the jury. Because of its considerable utility and its availability to those with money, the argument that an indigent has the right to the same service without cost is cogent. See § 4.31(d) supra. Accordingly, counsel should not hesitate to move for a free day transcript in a long or complicated trial on a serious charge.

Part B. The Opening Stage of the Trial

§ 27.10 THE PRELIMINARY CONFERENCE WITH THE JUDGE BEFORE TRIAL BEGINS

In most cases it is customary for the judge, the prosecutor, and defense counsel to confer briefly immediately prior to the commencement of trial, to review the status of pretrial matters and assure that all pending motions that should be disposed of before trial have been disposed of; to estimate the probable length of trial and to plan convenient recesses; to make arrangements to accommodate the convenience of an expert witness and the like; to discuss any problems occasioned by the failure of witnesses to appear; and sometimes to attempt to expedite matters by stipulations. In a bench trial this pretrial conference is immediately followed by opening statements or, if counsel have waived openings (see § 29.03(a) infra), by the presentation of the prosecution’s first witness. In a jury trial the pretrial conference is immediately followed by voir dire examination of prospective jurors. See Chapter 28.

Counsel may be well advised to request such a pretrial conference if one is not routinely held. Its utility should be considered for the following purposes, among others:

(a) To attempt to enlist some judicial support if counsel feels that the prosecutor is taking an unreasonable position in pressing certain charges that should be dropped, or to explore diversion (see Chapter 19), or to “try out” an agreed sentencing recommendation on the judge (see § 14.06(c)(2) supra). Judges differ considerably on whether they will involve themselves in plea negotiation and what they regard as a reasonable disposition of particular kinds of cases. Counsel who is not familiar with the attitudes of the presiding judge should inquire of other defense attorneys who have had experience with the judge before undertaking to pursue this goal.
(b) To anticipate evidentiary problems that will arise at trial and attempt to resolve them. If counsel anticipates that the prosecutor will attempt to introduce items of evidence whose admissibility the defense plans to contest, and particularly if the evidence will be prejudicial to the respondent, counsel should consider making a motion in limine at the pretrial conference for a ruling excluding the evidence. Cf. § 7.03 supra. In a jury trial such a ruling ensures that the evidence will not reach the jury through the prosecutor’s opening statement or through a witness who blurts out the matter before defense counsel can object. In a bench trial, counsel may be able to persuade the judge to rule on the admissibility of the evidence without listening to its content (for example, ruling in the abstract that the respondent’s prior juvenile record is inadmissible for impeachment except to the extent that it consists of crimen falsi, without hearing what kind or number of adjudications of delinquency it does consist of) or, if the content of the evidence is material to a ruling on its admissibility, certify the issue to another judge for resolution. See § 30.07(a) infra; see also §§ 20.05-20.07 supra. If the judge is unwilling to rule until the prosecutor has actually sought to introduce the challenged items of evidence at trial, counsel should request an order that the prosecutor refrain from mentioning the evidence in opening statement and conduct examinations of witnesses in a fashion that will permit both a defense objection and a ruling on it before it is disclosed to the trier of fact.

(c) To arrange to stipulate certain matters, in the interest of trial convenience (see § 30.02(b) infra).

(d) To obtain agreement that certain witnesses need not be called by either party and that neither party will request or be entitled to a missing witness instruction or inference because of the other party’s failure to call them. (See § 10.08 supra.) Counsel may also want to seek other agreements or advance judicial rulings on matters that will determine whether s/he is going to call particular witnesses: for example, an agreement or ruling that the presentation of good-character evidence by the defense will not open the door to the prosecutor’s use of certain prior delinquency adjudications of the respondent in cross-examining the character witnesses (see §§ 30.07(a), 33.17 infra).

(e) To obtain discovery of the prosecution’s case. As explained in § 27.12 infra, in those jurisdictions where the prosecutor is obliged by discovery rules to turn over prior statements or convictions of prosecution witnesses after, but not before, the witness has concluded his or her direct examination, it may be possible to invoke the judge’s discretion to order that these materials be delivered to defense counsel at some earlier time – at the beginning of trial or during a recess prior to the witnesses’ testimony – by pointing out that this will avoid mid-trial delays. In addition, the defense will usually obtain some degree of discovery of the prosecution’s case simply by raising and discussing the various matters noted in subsections (a)-(d) supra and similar matters.

(f) To impress the judge. When the judge already knows and respects the prosecutor but defense counsel is a stranger to the court, defense counsel starts off at a significant disadvantage. In these circumstances the pretrial conference is an excellent opportunity for defense counsel to make a good impression on the judge by demonstrating counsel’s preparation and reasoned judgment.

(g) To get a sense of the judge’s attitude toward the case. Counsel will want to learn, if s/he can, both how the judge is likely to react to certain kinds of evidentiary issues at trial (for example, whether the judge is disposed to exercise liberally or sparingly the court’s discretion to exclude prejudicial matter (see § 30.03 infra); whether the judge is likely to respond favorably to a highly technical hearsay argument) and how the judge is likely to react to the case and to the respondent at sentencing in the event of conviction if the defense presents one or another line of evidence or argument. The answers to these questions may not only affect counsel’s trial strategies but, in some cases, suggest the wisdom of a last-minute guilty plea instead of trial.

§ 27.11 THE RULE ON WITNESSES

The trial judge possesses “broad power to sequester witnesses before, during, and after their testimony.” Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80, 87 (1976) (dictum); see also Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. 272, 281-82 (1989). Usually either party may request that all witnesses who have not yet testified in the case (and also those who may be recalled) be excluded during the taking of testimony. This is called, in the jargon, asking for the rule on witnesses or, simply, asking for the rule.

The rule is not ordinarily applicable to expert witnesses, but the court will consider excluding them in a particular case if there appears reason to do so. In some jurisdictions, a victims’ rights statute or state constitutional provision may also establish an exception to the rule on witnesses for the victim and the parents of a minor victim. See, e.g., State v. Uriarte, 194 Ariz. 275, 277-79, 981 P.2d 575, 577-79 (Ariz. App. 1998); and see generally Jay M. Zitter, Validity, Construction, and Application of State Constitutional or Statutory Victims’ Bill of Rights, 91 A.L.R.5th 343 (2001 & Supp.).

Defense counsel should ordinarily invoke the rule on witnesses. It not only helps to prevent prosecution witnesses from homogenizing their testimony but deprives successive prosecution witnesses of the opportunity to learn from counsel’s cross-examination of earlier witnesses both the defense theory of the case and counsel’s techniques for pursuing it on cross. Invoking the rule on witnesses particularly tends to give the defense an advantage in all cases in which the respondent is going to testify: S/he cannot be excluded under the rule (see § 27.01 supra; Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. at 88) and will thus be the only witness who has heard all the others. (Section § 10.10 supra discusses the respondent’s potential role as cleanup hitter.)

In cases in which the respondent’s parent or guardian will be a witness, counsel can oppose application of the rule on witnesses to exclude the parent or guardian. See, e.g., State in the Interest of V.M., 363 N.J. Super. 529, 535, 833 A.2d 692, 696 (2003); In the Interest of Hopkins, 227 So. 2d 282 (Miss. 1969).
In some courts a specific request is required if the rule is invoked against police witnesses: There is some sort of conventional understanding that they are not covered by an exclusion order unless their coverage is made explicit. Counsel should expressly ask that they be excluded, and should keep an eye open throughout the trial lest they reappear (see § 22.03(c) supra). Prosecutors will sometimes attempt to defeat the rule by asking that the investigating officer be permitted to remain at the prosecution table “to assist with the case.” Defense counsel should object to this procedure. There is no reason why a properly prepared prosecuting attorney needs assistance.

In cases involving a prosecution witness who is a child, when counsel’s pretrial investigation indicates that the child has been coached by a parent, counsel should approach the bench at the beginning of the trial and request that the parent be excluded from the courtroom until after the child has testified, whether or not the parent is going to be a witness.

If the trial is conducted in a jurisdiction that permits press attendance at delinquency proceedings, see § 27.08 supra, and if media coverage of the trial is expected to be intensive, counsel should consider requesting not only that prosecution witnesses be excluded from the courtroom when they are not testifying but also that they be sequestered throughout the trial. See Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 581 (1980) (plurality opinion) (dictum). If this request is denied, counsel should ask that at least the court bring all of the witnesses into the courtroom before the trial begins and admonish them not to read anything in the papers, watch anything on TV, or listen to anything on the radio about the case and not to discuss it with other people or listen to others discuss it, until after they have testified and been relieved from further attendance. Counsel should make clear that this latter request is not being made as an alternative to the request for sequestration previously denied and that counsel is preserving a claim of error in the denial of the first request even if the second is granted.

§ 27.12 DISCOVERY AT TRIAL

§ 27.12(a) Defense Discovery

Chapter 9 describes the information and materials that the respondent can obtain from the prosecutor in pretrial discovery and the procedures for obtaining them. In many jurisdictions the prosecutor is obliged to turn over certain additional items at trial if the respondent requests their production.

§ 27.12(a)(1) Prior Statements of Witnesses

The prosecutor is commonly required to produce copies of all prior statements of prosecution witnesses upon defense counsel’s request. See, e.g., Minn. Rule Juv. Delinquency Proc. 10.04(1)(A) (2018). Although some jurisdictions require that these statements be delivered to the defense before trial, see, e.g., Fla. Rule Juv. Proc. 8.060(a) (2018), other jurisdictions allow the prosecutor to withhold them until trial and to turn them over to defense counsel only at the commencement of the trial, see, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 331.4(1)(a) (2018), or from time to time during trial, at the conclusion of each witness’s direct examination (see, e.g., In re S.W.B., 321 A.2d 564 (D.C. 1974)).

In jurisdictions in which the defense is not technically entitled to obtain the prior statements of each witness until after the witness has testified on direct examination, counsel can often persuade the prosecutor (or, if persuasion fails, solicit the judge’s assistance in pressuring the prosecutor) to turn over the prior statements of all prosecution witnesses at the beginning of the trial in order to avoid mid-trial delays caused by defense counsel’s need to scrutinize the statements of every witness when counsel first receives them, during the period between each witness’s direct examination and cross-examination. If the prosecutor has not turned the statements over to defense counsel before trial and has indicated that s/he does not intend to turn them over until each witness has testified on direct examination, counsel should ordinarily inform the court of this situation at the pretrial conference (see § 27.10 supra) and should seek the court’s assistance in obtaining the statements earlier. Counsel might urge, for example, that the statements be turned over at the beginning of trial “in the interest of trial efficiency and so that I will not have to be continually requesting recesses to read statements in the middle of each witness’s testimony.” Prior statements of prosecution witnesses can be extremely useful in cross-examining their makers (see § 31.10 infra), and the earlier counsel obtains the statements, the more time s/he will have to use them in planning cross-examination. Obtaining the statements early also enables counsel to start cross-examination immediately after the completion of direct examination in cases in which this seems desirable in order to deny a witness the opportunity to reflect and regroup between direct and cross or in order to begin undercutting a witness before the witness’s testimony on direct “sinks in” and makes indelible impressions on the trier of fact. In a jury trial, counsel may also want to be prepared to begin cross-examination immediately in order to avoid the jury’s thinking that s/he is delaying cross because the witness has “stumped” the defense with seriously damaging testimony.

If a prosecutor intentionally violates a statute or court rule by refusing to divulge witnesses’ prior statements or if the prosecutor is unable to comply because the prosecuting authorities or the police have destroyed or lost the statements, counsel can seek sanctions such as the preclusion (or striking) of the testimony of the witness whose statements have not been furnished to the defense. In some jurisdictions the applicable statute or court rule specifically provides for these sanctions. In jurisdictions where it does not, counsel can base a request for sanctions upon the court’s inherent authority to enforce the statute or court rule, as well as upon the constitutional doctrines summarized in §§ 9.09(a), 9.09(b)(1), 9.09(b)(3), 9.09(b)(5), 9.09(b)(6), 9.09(b)(7) supra.

In jurisdictions that do not have statutes or rules providing for disclosure of the prior statements of prosecution witnesses, counsel can invoke the same doctrines as the basis for an argument that disclosure is constitutionally required.

§ 27.12(a)(2) Prior Criminal Records of Witnesses
Some jurisdictions also require the prosecutor to turn over to the defense at trial any records of judgments of conviction of prosecution witnesses and information about any charges that are pending against prosecution witnesses. See, e.g., MINN. RULE JUV. DELINQUENCY PROC. 10.04(1)(A) (2018) (including juvenile delinquency adjudications); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 331.4(1)(b)-(c) (2018). In jurisdictions in which the applicable statute, court rule, or caselaw does not already provide for this kind of disclosure (including the disclosure of juvenile delinquency adjudications), counsel should invoke the constitutional doctrines referenced at the end of the preceding section to demand that s/he be informed about all prior convictions and juvenile adjudications of prosecution witnesses and pending charges against them.

In jurisdictions in which the prosecutor is merely required to turn over information about prior convictions and not the record of the judgments of conviction, counsel can usually obtain a certified record of the judgments from the court in which the convictions were handed down. A certified record will be necessary to prove the conviction if the witness denies it when asked about it on cross-examination. See § 31.11 infra.

Techniques for impeaching witnesses with their prior criminal record are discussed in § 31.11.

§ 27.12(b) Prosecutorial Discovery

In some jurisdictions the prosecution has a right to discovery of the written or recorded statements of defense witnesses prior to trial or at the commencement of the defense case or at the conclusion of each defense witness’s direct examination. See, e.g., FLA. RULE JUV. PROC. 8.060(b) (2018); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 331.4(2)(a) (2018). Counsel should ordinarily resist any attempt by the prosecutor or the judge to compel the production of defense witnesses’ statements before the commencement of the defense case at trial, insisting that the respondent has a constitutional prerogative to delay until that time the decision whether to present evidence. See § 9.12 penultimate paragraph supra. Insofar as local statutes or court rules require earlier disclosure, their constitutionality can be challenged under the principles discussed in that section. Statutes or rules that purport to require defense disclosure without requiring similar disclosure by the prosecution should be challenged under Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470 (1973). See § 9.09(b)(7) supra. And see §§ 5.05 concluding paragraph, 8.10, 9.13 supra for suggestions of ways in which counsel can insulate his or her own notes of pretrial interviews with defense witnesses as “work product.”

§ 27.12(c) Inspection In Camera Before Production of Materials Whose Disclosure is Sought by Either Party at Trial; Making a Record of Redaction Proceedings

When the prosecutor or defense counsel requests at-trial discovery and the opposing party resists it, the trial judge may be able to determine from the respective arguments of counsel that the requested disclosure should not be ordered or that it should be ordered in its entirety. If, however, the contents of the material requested bear upon its discoverability, or if the opponent of disclosure contends that some part of it should be withheld, the ordinary procedure is for the judge to inspect the material in camera. See, e.g., Campbell v. United States, 365 U.S. 85 (1961), and 373 U.S. 487 (1963); United States v. Miller, 771 F.2d 1219, 1229-33 (9th Cir. 1985); United States v. Peters, 625 F.2d 366, 369-72 (10th Cir. 1980). Should s/he determine that only a portion of the material is discoverable, s/he will redact the non-discoverable parts and order the remainder disclosed. See, e.g., Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 26.2(c) (2018); 18 U.S.C. § 3500(c) (2018); Commonwealth v. Warren, 23 Mass. L. Rptr. 83, 2007 WL 2781936 (Mass. Super. 2007). (In the case of documents and records, the redaction is done on the face of the text; in the case of oral material, the judge hears the witness’s testimony in chambers and has it stenographically or electronically recorded and transcribed, then redacts the transcript.) If any part of defense counsel’s request is denied, counsel should (1) review the redacted version of the material that s/he receives, and, if it suggests arguments for broader disclosure, renew his or her request for the so-far undiscovered material; (2) put the disclosed portions of the material to whatever good use they can serve in cross-examining; (3) ask the witness, during this cross, for information about the context of the disclosed portions; (4) renew counsel’s request for production of the undisclosed portions in light of the contextual information thus developed; and (5) request the judge to preserve under seal, for the record on any appeal, (a) the entire, unredacted version of the material submitted in chambers, and (b) a transcript of all proceedings conducted in chambers in connection with the abridged discovery. See, e.g., State v. Hager, 271 N.W.2d 476 (N.D. 1978) (examining the unredacted version of a prosecution witness’s statement and holding that the redaction of “parts . . . containing information of possible impeachment value” was reversible error (id. at 484): “the sole basis on which the trial court may excise portions of a producible statement is if those statements do not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness” (id. at 483)).

§ 27.13 REQUESTS BY THE COURT THAT COUNSEL ESTIMATE THE LENGTH OF TIME THAT THE DEFENSE CASE WILL TAKE

Frequently, at the commencement of the trial, the judge will ask the prosecutor and defense counsel how long the case will take and how many witnesses each attorney intends to present. In a bench trial this inquiry is not particularly problematic so long as counsel is careful to emphasize that his or her assessment is extremely tentative and that s/he will not make any final decisions about defense evidence until after s/he has heard the prosecution’s case-in-chief. In a jury trial, however, the inquiry can be deadly if made in front of the jury. Since jurors, unlike a judge, are not likely to understand the necessity for flexibility in any trial plan, they may respond to a later change of defense plans by deducing that defense counsel has found the prosecution’s evidence more formidable than anticipated or has discovered mid-way through trial that the respondent and his or her witnesses were lying.

Accordingly, if asked in front of the jury about the expected length of the defense case or the number of defense witnesses, counsel should ask leave to approach the bench. Out of the hearing of the jury, s/he should explain that s/he has not yet decided whether to present evidence; that s/he wishes to hear the prosecution’s case before s/he determines how to conduct the defense; that s/he will be prejudiced if s/he is forced to make a commitment in the presence of the jury at this time; and that s/he will be equally prejudiced if the jury is informed of counsel’s indecision. S/he should then offer the judge for the court’s own planning purposes the best estimate s/he can make of the probable length of the defense case if s/he does present evidence, and s/he should request that this estimate not be mentioned in the hearing of the jury.

If the judge insists on an announcement in open court or discloses counsel’s estimate to the jury, counsel should object on the grounds of the federal and state constitutional privileges against self-incrimination and guarantees of the right to effective assistance of counsel. Counsel should point out that the purpose and effect of the self-incrimination privileges are to allow the defense to reserve the option of presenting or not presenting evidence until after the prosecution has proved its case. To require an election before that stage violates the privileges and also violates the respondent’s constitutional rights to counsel by impeding counsel’s ability to make an advised decision with regard to how the defense should be conducted. Cf. Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972); Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. 333, 339 n.9 (1978) (dictum); Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 344 (1980) (dictum).

If a sidebar conference is refused, counsel should reply to the judge’s inquiry by saying that it is difficult to tell how long the case will take, that it depends on the prosecution’s evidence, how the cross-examination goes, the availability of witnesses, and a number of matters that are not yet evident. If the court attempts to put counsel down or to nail counsel down, counsel may want to move for a mistrial on the ground that requiring a commitment of evidence by the defense before the prosecution has presented a prima facie case violates the Fifth and Sixth Amendments and parallel state constitutional guarantees.
Chapter 28

Selecting the Jury at Trial: The Voir Dire

§ 28.01 INTRODUCTION

In a jury trial, the voir dire is the process by which the actual trial jurors (and alternates) are selected from the jury panel. Prior to the voir dire, counsel has had no real hand in the jury selection process, apart from the possibility of attacking it here or there for procedural defects. At the voir dire, counsel will have the opportunity to play a large part in determining what particular jurors are going to sit on the trial of the case. S/he will also have his or her first chance to talk to those jurors – directly or indirectly – and to say some things to them that will strongly affect their attitudes toward counsel, the respondent, and the case.

§ 28.02 DEFENSE OBJECTIONS TO THE PANEL PRIOR TO THE VOIR DIRE

Before or at the time the panel is brought into the courtroom, counsel is given a list of the individuals on it, ordinarily indicating names, addresses, and occupations. Counsel’s previous investigation of the venirepersons, coupled with this list of those among them who have been selected for the panel, may suggest some ground of challenge to the panel collectively. See §§ 21.03-21.04 supra. If counsel decides to make such a challenge, s/he should do so before the panel is brought in to the courtroom. If that is not possible, s/he should ask leave to approach the bench and should make the challenge out of the hearing of the prospective jurors. Counsel is hardly going to be received favorably by the jurors if, on their first contact, s/he is cast in the role of an objector – and one who opposes their very presence in court.

§ 28.03 VOIR DIRE PROCEDURE GENERALLY

Practice on voir dire differs widely from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Its common features are these: Prospective jurors are are sworn in (see Barral v. State, 131 Nev. Adv. Op. 52, 353 P.3d 1197 (2015)), and are told something about the case and the parties and participants in it. They are questioned, either individually or collectively or in both ways, to determine whether they (1) lack the statutory qualifications to be a juror, (2) are otherwise subject to challenge, or (3) should be relieved from jury duty at their request (a disposition sometimes described by saying that the juror is “excused” or “granted an excuse” or “granted an exemption”) because of personal hardship, important conflicting obligations, or similar matters. The prosecution and defense are given the opportunity to object to any juror on grounds that are legally sufficient to preclude him or her from sitting (that is, in the jargon, “to challenge the juror for cause”); and the trial jurors (and alternates) are selected from the remaining panelists through the exercise of peremptory challenges or “strikes” by prosecution and defense.

Thus, there are two sorts of challenges to individual jurors: challenges for cause and peremptory challenges.
§ 28.03(a) Challenges for Cause

Challenges for cause assert that a prospective juror is not lawfully able to serve. They may be based on any of a number of grounds, the most important being:

(i) Lack of statutory qualifications.

(ii) Implied bias. The circumstances that support a challenge for implied bias are specified by statute in some jurisdictions; in others, they are left to common-law elucidation by the courts. They ordinarily include: (1) a financial interest or other direct personal stake in the outcome of the case, and (2) a familial relationship, business relationship, or other close connection to the respondent, the complainant or victim, a witness, or counsel for one of the parties.

(iii) Express bias. This traditionally meant an unyielding belief in the accused’s guilt or innocence that the juror is unable to suspend. In some jurisdictions a venireperson who asserts that s/he is able to put aside his or her opinion and to consider the case fairly on the basis of the evidence presented at trial will escape a challenge for cause on the ground of express bias. There has, however, been a movement away from this position: Courts are increasingly coming to the view that a venireperson’s protestations of ability to disregard his or her preexisting biases and be guided solely by the evidence will not insulate him or her from a challenge for cause if those preexisting biases are strong. See, e.g., State v. Faucher, 227 Wis. 2d 700, 731-32, 596 N.W.2d 770, 784-85 (1999) (“The circuit court believed that Kaiser was honest when he testified that he could set aside his opinion. On our review of the record we conclude that the circuit court’s finding that Kaiser was a reasonable person who was sincerely willing to put aside his opinion is not clearly erroneous. . . . The circuit court’s determination that juror Kaiser was not subjectively biased is not clearly erroneous. . . . ¶ The circuit court did not consider whether juror Kaiser was objectively biased. Upon concluding that Kaiser was sincere in his willingness to set aside his opinion, the circuit court ended its inquiry. The circuit court’s decision not to dismiss Kaiser was based solely on Kaiser’s statement that he could set aside his opinion, and the court’s erroneous belief that it had to ‘believe his response.’ On examination of the record, we conclude as a matter of law that a reasonable judge can reach only one conclusion; that is that the juror was objectively biased.”); Walker v. State, 262 Ga. 694, 696, 424 S.E.2d 782, 784 (1993) (“[T]he court asked the juror if he could lay aside his ‘feelings for the victim's family’ and his ‘acquaintances with the people in the District Attorney’s office’ and decide the case based on the evidence presented at trial. The juror at first answered, ‘I think I could,’ but when the trial court suggested, ‘you’ve got to be more reassuring than that,’ the juror stated: ‘I could.’ Based on that answer, the trial court denied appellant’s challenge for cause. . . . ¶ Here, the juror himself was hesitant to say he could decide the case. . . . ¶ Here, the juror himself was hesitant to say he could decide the case.
impartially, doing so only after the court told him he would have to be ‘more reassuring.’ We agree with the defendant that this admonition was more an ‘instruct[ion] on the desired answer’ than a neutral attempt to determine the juror’s impartiality. ¶ Given the juror’s close relationship to the trial judge, the district attorney, the latter’s staff, law enforcement officers and the victim’s family, his hauntingly similar experience with a member of his family being killed in a robbery of a grocery store, and his admitted bias in favor of the state, the defendant’s challenge for cause should have been granted.”; Matarranz v. State, 133 So. 3d 473, 490 (Fla. 2013) (“Any lawyer who has spent time in our courtrooms, whether civil or criminal, has experienced the frustration of prospective jurors expressing extreme bias against his or her client and then recanting upon expert questioning by the opposition, which generates such embarrassment as to produce a socially and politically correct recantation. When a juror expresses his or her unease and reservations based upon actual life experiences, as opposed to stating such attitudes in response to vague or academic questioning, it is not appropriate for the trial court to attempt to ‘rehabilitate’ a juror into rejection of those expressions . . . .”); Patrick T. Barone & Michael B. Skinner, Breaking the Spell of the Magic Question During Voir Dire, 39-Mar The Champion 22 (March 2015). See also the following paragraph.

(iv) “Such fixed opinions that [the juror can] . . . not judge impartially the guilt of the defendant.” Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025, 1035 (1984). “[D]ue process alone has long demanded that, if a jury is to be provided the defendant, regardless of whether the Sixth Amendment requires it, the jury must stand impartial and indifferent to the extent commanded by the Sixth Amendment.” Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719, 727 (1992). See also §§ 21.01, 21.03(a) supra. This constitutional standard is somewhat more favorable to the accused than the concept of express bias as the latter concept is applied in a number of jurisdictions because a “juror’s assurances that he [or she] is equal to [the] . . . task [of laying aside his or her previously-formed opinions and rendering a verdict based solely on the law and the evidence] cannot be dispositive of the accused’s rights, and it remains open to the defendant to demonstrate ‘the actual existence of such an opinion in the mind of the juror as will raise the presumption of partiality.’” Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794, 800 (1975) (dictum); see Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, 724, 728 (1961); Williams v. True, 39 Fed. Appx. 830 (4th Cir. 2002); compare Smith v. Phillips, 455 U.S. 209 (1982). “[A]dverse pretrial publicity can create such a presumption of prejudice in a community that the jurors’ claims that they can be impartial should not be believed.” Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. at 1031 (dictum); cf. Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 U.S. 560, 570-72 (1986) (dictum).

Extrajudicial exposure of potential jurors to powerful evidence of the respondent’s guilt can have a similar effect. Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723 (1963). “The constitutional standard [is] that a juror is impartial only if he [or she] can lay aside his [or her] opinion and render a verdict based on the evidence presented in court.” Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. at 1037 n.12. If the juror swears on voir dire that s/he can, the issue of his or her credibility – that is, the question “should the juror’s protestation of impartiality [be] . . . believed” – must be resolved by a factual finding of the court. Id. at 1036.

(v) Knowledge of the factual circumstances giving rise to the delinquency charge being tried. See, e.g., Titus v. State, 963 P.2d 258, 262-63 (Alaska 1998) (“We agree with the majority view that pre-existing knowledge about the case or the defendant can constitute extraneous prejudicial information . . . .” . . . Because not all jurors will have access to specific facts about the crime and the defendant’s connection thereto, those who purport to have such information may be believed without debate, even if their information is inaccurate. Permitting juries to convict defendants when they have considered such extra-record information would undermine interests in both fairness and accuracy by robbing the defendant of the chance to contest such evidence. We therefore conclude that a distinction must be made between a juror’s general background knowledge about the defendant or the charge and a juror’s knowledge about specific facts relating to the alleged crime and the defendant’s involvement in it.”).

(vi) Any state of mind that makes it impossible for the juror to follow the court’s instructions and to decide the case according to the law. A prospective juror who is unable or unwilling to comply with the substantive legal rules bearing on the case or with the procedural rules governing its trial is challengeable for cause. E.g., Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 595-97 (1978); Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. at 729, 738-39. The latter rules include the presumption of innocence and the principle that the prosecution bears the burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. See §§ 32.01, 36.06 infra. Some venirepersons who have formed opinions that the respondent is guilty but who escape a challenge for cause on grounds of express bias because they profess to be able to disregard those opinions can be gotten to admit on voir dire that they would require evidence to change their opinions; and this admission renders them vulnerable to a challenge for cause on the ground that they cannot abide by the presumption of innocence. See, e.g., Glover v. State, 248 Ark. 1260, 1263-68, 455 S.W.2d 670, 672-75 (1970).

When inquiry discloses grounds requiring that a prospective juror be discharged for cause, s/he may be excluded by the court sua sponte, or s/he may be challenged by the prosecutor or defense counsel. Technically, the number of challenges for cause that counsel may make is unlimited; each challenge must be tested by the court for its legal validity and sustained if valid, regardless of how many other challenges for cause counsel has made. But see § 28.03(d) infra.

Ross v. Oklahoma, supra, holds that if the accused uses a peremptory challenge (see the following section) to remove a juror whom the trial judge erroneously declined to excuse for cause, that erroneous ruling is forfeited as a basis for appellate reversal. A number of state courts reject this result as a state-law matter. E.g., Matarranz v. State, 133 So. 3d at 482-84; State v. Wacaser, 794 S.W.2d 190 (Mo. 1990); Johnson v. State, 43 S.W.3d 1 (Tex. Crim App. 2001) (en banc); cf. Boggs v. State, 667 So.2d 765 (Fla. 1996). In these States, the error is preserved if the accused (a) objects to the denial of the challenge for cause, (b) exhausts all of his or her peremptory challenges, (c) requests additional peremptory challenges, and (d) objects to the denial of that request. (In some of these jurisdictions, it is also necessary to raise this claim of error – like all other claims of pretrial and trial error – in a motion for a new trial, in order to preserve it for appellate review.)

§ 28.03(b) Peremptory Challenges

The prosecution and the defense each has a limited number of peremptory challenges specified by law (ordinarily more in felony than in misdemeanor cases). It is by the exercise of these peremptory challenges (“strikes”) that counsel usually goes about trying to get the sort of jury s/he wants. S/he pursues the same ends, of course, by unearthing good legal grounds to challenge for cause a juror whom s/he does not like or by declining to challenge a juror, obviously challengeable for cause, whom s/he does like. But challenges for cause are of limited utility in this regard; peremptories are counsel’s major tool for shaping the character of the jury.

Except when the peremptories appear to be employed in a discriminatory manner to exclude certain cognizable groups, a peremptory challenge can be made by the prosecutor or defense counsel for any reason whatsoever, and the attorney cannot be required to give a justification or explanation. Under Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), and its progeny, defense counsel can object to a prosecutor’s use of peremptories to exclude “racial minorities” (Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. 231, 235 (2005)) or women (J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127 (1994)), and, at least arguably, can oppose the systematic exclusion of other cognizable groups as well (see NJP Litigation Consulting (Elissa Krauss & Sonia Chopra, eds.), Jurywork: Systematic Techniques § 4:14 (2d ed. 2012-13); People v. Bridgeforth, 28 N.Y.3d 567, 571-72, 69 N.E.3d 611, 613-14, 46 N.Y.S.3d 824, 826-27 (2016) (New York’s high court holds that “under this State’s Constitution and Civil Rights Law, [skin] color is a classification upon which a Batson challenge may be lodged,” and the defendant made “a prima facie showing of discrimination when he challenged the prosecutor’s use of peremptory strikes to exclude dark-colored women”; “Discrimination on the basis of one’s skin color – or colorism – has been well researched and analyzed, demonstrating that ‘not all colors (or tones) are equal’ . . . . Persons with similar skin tones are often perceived to be of a certain race and discriminated against as a result, even if they are of a different race or ethnicity. That is why color must be distinguished from race.”)). The accused can invoke the Batson doctrine even if s/he is not a member of the excluded group. Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400 (1991). Defense counsel’s peremptory challenges are also subject to Batson objection by the prosecutor, at least insofar as they appear to be aimed at excluding racial minorities. See Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42 (1992). But see Sells v. State, 109 A.3d 568, 581-82 (Del. 2015) (“[B]ecause African Americans like Sells are members of a minority group in Kent County, the pattern of peremptory strikes against only Caucasian members of the venire may provide less of an inference of discrimination. If a super-majority of the venire is Caucasian, a pattern of striking white jurors is less telling evidence that race was a factor, because the mathematical odds would be that most potential jurors questioned for the parties to strike would be Caucasian. Thus, trial courts should be cautious about inhibiting the use of peremptory strikes by the accused except after careful application of Batson. Because here there was an insufficient basis for the trial court’s conclusion that there was a ‘pattern’ of discrimination, prejudice must be presumed and a new trial is required.”); People v. Wilson, 23 A.D.3d 682, 682, 806 N.Y.S.2d 671, 672 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2005) (rejecting the prosecution’s Batson challenge to defense counsel’s peremptory strikes of four prospective jurors, the court explains that defense counsel presented the “nonpretextual reason” that “the prospective jurors were victims of crimes,” and there is “‘a rational basis for the suspicion that a crime victim might be less sympathetic to an accused criminal than would a person who has never been victimized by crime’”).

Under Batson, defense counsel can make out a prima facie case of discriminatory jury selection by showing that the prosecutor has exercised peremptories to exclude members of an “arguably targeted class” (Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. at 239) and that the numbers of group members excluded or other circumstances raise an inference that the prosecutor is challenging these persons on account of their membership in that group. The burden on defense counsel at this first step in the process of applying Batson – commonly called Batson’s “three-step inquiry” (Rice v. Collins, 546 U.S. 333, 338 (2006); Foster v. Chatman, 136 S. Ct. 1737, 1747 (2016); Williams v. Louisiana, 136 S. Ct. 2156, at 2156 (2016) (concurring opinion of Justice Ginsburg)) or Batson’s “burden-shifting framework” (Johnson v. California, 545 U.S. 162, 170 (2005)) – is simply to present enough evidence of various sorts so that “the sum of the proffered facts gives ‘rise to an inference of discriminatory purpose’” (id. at 169) – an inference “that discrimination may have occurred” (id. at 173). It is not necessary for the defense to show that “it is more likely than not . . . [that the prosecutor’s] peremptory challenges, if unexplained, were based on impermissible group bias.”” Id. at 168. See also Madison v. Commissioner, Ala. Dept. of Corrections, 677 F.3d 1333, 1338-39 (11th Cir. 2012) (“Madison argues that the Court of Criminal Appeals unreasonably applied clearly established federal law because the court used the wrong standard for establishing a prima facie case when it required Madison to establish ‘purposeful racial discrimination’ rather than to provide sufficient support for an inference of discrimination. We agree that requiring Madison to ‘establish[ ] purposeful discrimination’ is the wrong standard to apply for the first step of Batson, which only requires Madison to produce sufficient ‘facts and any other relevant circumstances’ that ‘raise an inference . . . of purposeful discrimination.’’” ¶ “Madison presented to the Alabama courts several relevant circumstances that in total were sufficient to support an inference of discrimination. . . . In addition to pointing out that the prosecutor used a number of his strikes against a variety of black jurors, Madison noted: (1) the failure of the prosecutor to ask questions to three of the challenged jurors, . . . (2) the case’s racially sensitive subject matter, . . . and (3) the district attorney’s office’s prior discrimination in jury selection, occurring both in Madison’s first trial and in other state cases.”). Compare City of Seattle v. Erickson, 188 Wash. 2d 721, 398 P.3d 1124 (2017) (construing the state constitution’s equal protection clause to “hold that the peremptory strike of a juror who is the only member of a cognizable racial group on a jury panel constitutes a prima facie showing of racial motivation. The trial court must ask for a race-neutral reason from the striking party and then determine, based on the facts and surrounding circumstances, whether the strike was driven by racial animus.” (id. at 736, 398 P.3d at 1132); the court also follows “[s]everal state and federal jurisdictions” in “allow[ing] Batson challenges even after a jury has been selected and sworn in.” (Id. at 728, 398 P.3d at 1128.).)

“‘Once the defendant makes [such] a prima facie showing, the burden shifts to the State to come forward with a neutral explanation for challenging . . . jurors’ within [the] . . . arguably targeted class . . . [and to] ‘give a clear and reasonably specific explanation of . . . [the prosecutor’s] legitimate reasons for exercising the [peremptory] challeng[e].’” Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. at 239, quoting Batson, 476 U.S. at 97, 98 n.20. After the prosecutor has stated his or her reasons for challenging the jurors in the targeted class whom s/he has excused, “the court must . . . determine whether the defendant has carried his burden of proving purposeful discrimination. . . . This final step involves evaluating ‘the persuasiveness of the justification’ proffered by the prosecutor, but ‘the ultimate burden of persuasion regarding racial motivation rests with, and never shifts from, the opponent of the strike.’” Rice v. Collins, 546 U.S. at 338, quoting Purkett v. Elem, 514 U.S. 765, 768 (1995) (per curiam); Davis v. Ayala, 135 S. Ct. 2187, 2199-2200 (2015). See also, e.g., Rice v. White, 660 F.3d 242 (6th Cir. 2011); Adkins v. Warden, 710 F.3d 1241, 1255-58 (11th Cir. 2013); Harris v. Hardy, 680 F.3d 942, 952-66 (7th Cir. 2012); Ali v. Hickman, 584 F.3d 1174, 1192-96 (9th Cir. 2009).

In urging that a prosecutor’s proffered race-neutral reasons for excusing jurors of the targeted class should not be credited, defense counsel would do well to note and argue that (1) the characteristics which the prosecutor claims explain his or her peremptory challenges of jurors belonging to the targeted class are shared by jurors who do not belong to the targeted class and who have not been peremptorily challenged by the prosecutor (see, e.g., Foster v. Chatman, 136 S. Ct. at 1750-51, 1752-53; Snyder v. Louisiana, 552 U.S. 472, 483-84 (2008); Adkins v. Warden, 710 F.3d 1241 at 1255-58), and/or (2) the existence of those characteristics was elicited by prosecutorial voir dire examination of jurors who belong to the targeted class, and the prosecutor has not questioned jurors who do not belong to the targeted class in ways calculated to elicit the existence of the characteristics (Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. at 244-45), and/or (3) jurors in the targeted class were disproportionately often questioned in ways calculated to evoke responses that would make them challengeable (see, e.g., Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. at 255-63), and/or (4) jurors who were struck possessed characteristics that would ordinarily have made them favorable to the prosecution, were it not for their race (see, e.g., Foster v. Chatman, 136 S. Ct. at 1750-51; Ali v. Hickman, 584 F.3d at 1185-86, 1188-89) and/or (5) the prosecutor’s stated justifications for striking jurors referred to concerns that could have been explored by “follow-up questions” but the prosecutor did not ask them (Ali v. Hickman, 584 F.3d at 1188; see also Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. at 244-46). Compare Miller-El v. Cockrell, 537 U.S. 322, 343 (2003), with Davis v. Ayala, 135 S. Ct. at 2200-01. And see, e.g., United States v. Atkins, 843 F.3d 625, 636, 637-38 (6th Cir. 2016) (the prosecutor’s claimed justifications for striking an African American venireperson – that “he had changed jobs four months prior and had eight children” – are found by the court to have been “pretexts for racial discrimination” because: “First, a comparative juror analysis shows that the government did not express concerns about the ability of similarly-situated white jurors to focus throughout the trial despite their large number of children and inconsistent work history. . . . Second, the government failed to ask any questions of Mr. Dandridge – or any other juror – about the impact his large family and recent career change would have on his ability to focus at trial. . . . Finally, read in context, the government’s explanations ‘reek[ ] of afterthought’ and suggest a lack of reasoned consideration in striking [the venireperson”]; Castellanos v. Small, 766 F.3d 1137, 1148-49 (9th Cir. 2014) (the prosecutor’s claim that he peremptorily struck a Hispanic female venireperson because “‘she didn’t have any children . . . [and] [t]he victim here is going to be a child testifying’” was “‘belied by the record,’” which showed that the venirewoman responded that “‘she had two adult children’” and the prosecutor even “‘asked about the occupations of her adult children, and she answered,’” and is further refuted by “[a] side-by-side comparison” of this venirewoman with three other venirepersons who had no children but “were ultimately permitted to serve on the jury,” as was a venireperson who “‘didn’t even answer the question about whether he had adult children.’”); People v. Bell, 126 A.D.3d 718, 719-20, 5 N.Y.S.3d 227, 229-30 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015) (reversing a conviction on Batson grounds because “the facially race-neutral reasons proffered by the prosecutor for the use of peremptory challenges against . . . two prospective jurors were pretextual”: the prosecutor asserted that she struck one prospective juror “because of a concern that his position as a church deacon would make it difficult for him to sit in judgment of another individual” but “[t]he prosecutor did not offer any explanation for how employment as a church deacon related to the factual circumstances of the case or qualifications to serve as a juror”; the prosecutor defended her other peremptory strike by saying that the African-American venireperson was “‘shaking his head in agreement’ with a white juror, who was explaining the trouble she would have in reaching a verdict and ‘deciding the outcome of someone else’s life,’” but the African-American venireperson “indicated that he could convict if the prosecution proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt” and was struck by the prosecutor anyway even though the prosecutor did not use a peremptory challenge to strike “the white juror who actually stated that she would have trouble ‘deciding the outcome of someone else’s life.’”). See also Conner v. State, 327 P.3d 503, 509-10 (Nev. 2014) (reversing a conviction on Batson grounds because the prosecutor’s claimed reasons for striking the “prospective juror were belied by the record [of the witness’s actual answers in voir dire],” and “[a] race-neutral explanation that is belied by the record is evidence of purposeful discrimination”; also, the trial court “failed to meet its step-three obligations” by denying defense counsel “an opportunity to respond to the[ ] [prosecutor’s] new explanations” for striking the prospective jurors; a trial court cannot conduct “the sensitive inquiry into all the relevant circumstances required by Batson and its progeny” unless the judge affords defense counsel “the opportunity to meet his burden by responding to the individual race-neutral explanations proffered by the State.”); Foster v. Chatman, 136 S. Ct. at 1752-53 (“‘credibility can be measured by, among other factors, . . . how reasonable, or how improbable, the [State’s] explanations are’”). If the judge concludes that the prosecutor has acted with a purpose to prune the jury of members of the targeted class as such, the judge must either discharge the venire and begin anew with another panel or reinstate the challenged jurors. See Batson, 476 U.S. at 96-100 & n.24. See, e.g., Drain v. Woods, 595 Fed. Appx. 558, 580-81 (6th Cir. 2014) (trial judge’s response to the “acknowledged Batson violations” – “allow[ing] voir dire to proceed with the sole requirement that the prosecutor request permission from the court before using any more peremptory challenges against black jurors” – was “plainly inadequate to cure the Batson violation”; if “the improperly struck jurors” were not “available to be reinstated on the jury,” “the only remaining remedy for the Batson violation would be to discharge the entire venire and start the process anew.”). See generally NJP Litigation Consulting, Jurywork: Systematic Techniques, supra, ch. 4 ("Batson and the Discriminatory Use of Peremptory Challenges in the 21st Century”).

“[T]he Constitution forbids striking even a single prospective juror for a discriminatory purpose.” Snyder v. Louisiana, 552 U.S. at 478. See id. at 477-78 (“Petitioner centers his Batson claim on the prosecution’s strikes of two black jurors, Jeffrey Brooks and Elaine Scott. Because we find that the trial court committed clear error in overruling petitioner’s Batson objection with respect to Mr. Brooks, we have no need to consider petitioner’s claim regarding Ms. Scott.”). Accord, Foster v. Chatman, 136 S. Ct. at 1747 (dictum); Lark v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 566 Fed. Appx. 161, 161 (3d Cir. 2014) ("[R]elief must be granted under Batson when even one black person is excluded [from the jury] for racially motivated reasons”).

In some jurisdictions the trial court has discretion to grant one or both parties additional peremptory challenges, beyond the number ordinarily fixed by law or practice. The request for additional peremptories may be made before or during the voir dire. It may be made after counsel has exhausted all of his or her allotted peremptories; but the wiser course for counsel who wants to delay the request until late in the game is to make it when s/he has still has one peremptory remaining, so that s/he can decide advisedly whether to use that last peremptory. The most persuasive argument that counsel can make in support of a request for additional peremptories is that prejudicial pretrial publicity or community hostility to the respondent will make the empaneling of a fair and impartial jury difficult and that, although the most obviously and naively prejudiced venirepersons will be detectable and excludable through challenges for cause on grounds of bias, subtle biases will persist that the allowance of additional peremptories may help to eliminate. This is the theoretical justification for peremptory challenges (although, of course, it is not their principal strategic use), and it can be cited to the court when asking for more of them, along with passages such as those quoted in § 20.03(b), relating to the “affirmative constitutional duty [of a trial judge] to minimize the effects of prejudicial pretrial publicity” (Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 378 (1979)). See also § 21.03(a) supra.

“[P]eremptory challenges . . . are a means to achieve the end of an impartial jury.” Ross v.
548, 554 (1984) (“[d]emonstrated bias in the responses to questions on voir dire may result in a juror being excused for cause; hints of bias not sufficient to warrant challenge for cause may assist parties in exercising their peremptory challenges”); cf. Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501, 510 n.9 (1984) (“[t]he [voir dire] process is to ensure a fair impartial jury, not a favorable one”). When counsel has made a reasonably strong showing of prejudicial publicity or community hostility on a motion for a change of venue (see § 20.03(b) supra) or for a continuance (see § 15.02 concluding paragraph supra) but those motions have been denied, s/he is in an especially favorable position to request additional peremptory challenges; and some judges will be particularly disposed to allow them in this situation, if only as a consolation prize. But counsel should be clear, in making the request, that it is not a substitute for the earlier venue-change or continuance motion and that s/he reserves the client’s rights to contend on a new-trial motion (§ 37.02(a) infra), on appeal, and in postconviction proceedings, that the denial of the motion was prejudicial error.

§ 28.03(c) Variations in Voir Dire Procedure; Sorts of Voir Dire Questions Allowed

Beyond the generalities noted thus far, it is difficult to describe voir dire procedure except as it is practiced in a particular court. Its variations are extreme. In some jurisdictions the judge conducts the voir dire questioning, while in others the attorneys do. In some jurisdictions the entire panel is questioned collectively, challenges for cause are made, and then 12 are placed in the box and peremptories are exercised; in other jurisdictions each individual juror is questioned, and then either challenged (for cause or peremptorily) or accepted; in still others, a group of 12 is questioned, challenges are made to these 12, and then new panelists are brought in – and questioned and challenged – as replacements for the original jurors who were struck for cause or peremptorily.

Whether the questioning is done by the court or by counsel, the jurisdictions vary widely regarding the kinds of questions that are permitted. Indeed, the very purpose of voir dire interrogation of prospective jurors is differently conceived in different jurisdictions. Some hold that its sole legitimate function is to discover grounds of challenge for cause; only questions going to matters that might provide these grounds may be asked; and any enlightenment given by the answers that enhances counsel’s judgment on the intelligent exercise of peremptory challenges is at best a by-product and often one suspiciously regarded. Other jurisdictions unashamedly recognize that a legitimate purpose of the questioning is to enable counsel to find out the sort of person the prospective juror is in order to determine whether or not to strike the juror peremptorily. Local doctrines must be consulted in drafting voir dire questions, since in jurisdictions that subscribe to the first of these two positions every inquiry must be framed in a fashion that relates, at least verbally, to some arguable ground of challenge for cause.

This is no longer as severe a restriction as it once was. One of the most salutary effects of the Supreme Court’s decisions holding that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires trial by an “impartial jury” is the recognition that a challenge for cause can be supported by a showing of actual prejudice or bias of any sort – “actual predisposition against” the accused (Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794, 800 n.4 (1975) (dictum)) – whether or not it falls within the strict category of express bias traditionally recognized by state law (that is, a fixed opinion of guilt which the juror will not swear s/he can put out of account. And the constitutional right to exclude jurors who are not impartial implies an ancillary right to have an adequate inquiry conducted during voir dire examination for the purpose of discovering constitutionally disqualifying prejudice or bias. For example, Ham v. South Carolina, 409 U.S. 524 (1973), held that it was constitutional error to refuse to question prospective jurors concerning possible racial bias in a case in which “under all of the circumstances presented there was a constitutionally significant likelihood that, absent questioning about racial prejudice, the jurors would not be as ‘indifferent as [they stand] unsworne’” (Ristaino v. Ross, 424 U.S. 589, 596 (1976) (dictum)). Accord, Turner v. Murray, 476 U.S. 28, 31-36 (1986) (an African-American defendant charged with the murder of a white victim is constitutionally entitled to have questions on the issue of racial bias put to jurors who will make a discretionary capital sentencing decision: “[b]ecause of the range of discretion entrusted to a jury in a capital sentencing hearing, there is a unique opportunity for racial prejudice to operate but remain undetected.” (id. at 35). Cf. Berthiaume v. Smith, 875 F.3d 1354, 1359 (11th Cir. 2017) (in a civil rights action by an arrestee alleging excessive force, false arrest, and related claims, the plaintiff was entitled to have prospective jurors questioned on voir dire as to whether they harbored prejudice against gays: “the district court here did not ask any questions to determine whether any of the jurors might harbor prejudices against Berthiaume based on his sexual orientation. Nor were the district court’s general inquiries regarding the jurors’ ability to be impartial and its instruction that jurors not be prejudiced against witnesses based on the witnesses’ backgrounds sufficient to reach the important concerns highlighted by Berthiaume’s proposed inquiry because the general inquiries were broadly framed and not calculated to reveal latent prejudice.”). Both the Ham opinion (409 U.S. at 528) and Nebraska Press Assn. v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), imply that a respondent has a right to “searching questioning of prospective jurors . . . to screen out those with fixed opinions as to guilt or innocence” (id. at 564) whenever substantial pretrial publicity may have caused such opinions to form. See also Hughes v. State, 490 A.2d 1034 (Del. 1985). However, Ristaino v. Ross, supra, makes it plain that the Constitution imposes only minimal restrictions upon the broad discretion of trial judges in conducting voir dire examination because “the State’s obligation to the defendant to impanel an impartial jury generally can be satisfied by less than an inquiry into a specific prejudice feared by the defendant” (424 U.S. at 595). See also Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182 (1981); Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358, 385-99 (2010).

In appropriate situations, counsel can – and should – push back against judicial limitations upon voir dire and assert a right to conduct a voir dire that is as thorough as is needed to identify challenges for cause. See generally Ann M. Roan, Reclaiming Voir Dire, 37-JUL THE CHAMPION 22 (July 2013); Matthew Rubenstein, Overview of the Colorado Method of Capital Voir Dire, 34-NOV THE CHAMPION 18 (November 2010). But counsel will often find that s/he is more likely to obtain some latitude on voir dire by beseeching the favorable exercise of the trial judge’s discretion than by irritating the judge with a demand that particular lines of inquiry be allowed as a matter of right. Reasons that a trial judge might find persuasive as the basis for permitting wide-ranging voir dire examination are set forth in Barbara Allen Babcock, Voir Dire: Preserving “Its Wonderful Power,” 27 STAN. L. REV. 545 (1975); but these are probably best advanced in terms of appeals to the judge’s sense of fairness, with only sufficient mention of Professor Babcock’s constitutional contentions to preserve a footing in the record for a possible claim of error on appeal.

There is some nice rhetoric in Supreme Court decisions that can be quoted in urging a trial judge to allow extensive and probing voir dire questioning by the defense. “Voir dire plays a critical function in assuring the criminal defendant that his Sixth Amendment right to an impartial jury will be honored. Without an adequate voir dire the trial judge’s responsibility to remove prospective jurors who will not be able impartially to follow the court’s instructions and evaluate the evidence cannot be fulfilled.” Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. at 188 (plurality opinion). See also Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1, 15 (1986); McDonough Power Equipment, Inc. v. Greenwood, 464 U.S. 548, 554 (1984); but see Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501, 510 n.9 (1984). And “our criminal justice system permits, and even encourages, trial judges to be overcautious in ensuring that a defendant will receive a fair trial” (Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368, 379 n.6 (1979)).

§ 28.03(d) Strategic Considerations in Exercising Challenges for Cause and Peremptories

The clear technical distinction between challenges for cause and peremptory challenges sometimes blurs a bit in practice. Most grounds of challenges for cause involve subtle assessments of the challenged venireperson’s verbal responses and demeanor by the trial judge, and virtually all of them are subject to “a broad discretion” on the part of the trial judge. Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. at 429, quoting Dennis v. United States, 339 U.S. 162, 168 (1950). Early in the voir dire many trial judges are prone to exercise their discretion and to resolve close questions of fact and law in favor of allowing a challenge for cause to any venireperson whose suitability is marginal, but they become increasingly loth to sustain challenges for cause as the panel is progressively depleted, because they are losing patience or are anxious to fill the jury without the bother of calling in another whole panel.

This tendency has tactical implications for defense counsel. First, particularly early in the voir dire, s/he should not hesitate to make challenges for cause in close cases. S/he should try to exclude as many undesired jurors as possible through challenges for cause, so as to husband the respondent’s allotment of peremptories. Second, under voir dire procedures that permit the questioning of an entire panel or box of venirepersons before challenges to any of them, counsel should ordinarily make his or her weakest challenges for cause early and save the strongest ones for the end. This will maximize the likelihood of prevailing on both and will also increase the likelihood that if the judge denies any of counsel’s challenges for cause, s/he will err reversibly. (The judge cannot justify the improper denial of a challenge for cause on the ground that s/he was unduly charitable in his or her rulings on earlier challenges. See Gray v. Mississippi, 481 U.S. 648, 658 (1987).) Of course, counsel cannot afford the luxury of this tactic if the venirepersons most clearly subject to challenge for cause are true horrors whom s/he wants to be sure to eliminate and if they exceed the number of peremptory challenges s/he has.

§ 28.04 DEFENSIVE FUNCTIONS OF THE VOIR DIRE; PREPARED QUESTIONS; AUTHORITIES

The principal uses to which counsel can effectively put the voir dire are these:

(1) Discovering factual grounds to challenge individual jurors for cause (see § 28.03(a) supra; § 28.05 infra).

(2) Making a record to support appellate and postconviction claims of error in the denial of earlier challenges to the venire (see §§ 20.03(b), 21.03, 28.03(b) concluding paragraph supra), motions for a change of venue on grounds of prejudicial publicity, community hostility, and similar biasing circumstances (see § 20.03(b) supra), or motions for a continuance on the latter grounds (see § 15.02 concluding paragraph supra).

(3) Sounding out the temper and attitudes of individual jurors to determine whether they should be struck peremptorily (see § 28.05 infra).

(4) Driving home to the jury certain principles that are vital to the defensive case (see § 28.06 infra).

(5) Disarming “surprise” prosecution evidence and taking the sting out of prejudicial disclosures that will be made at the trial (see § 28.07 infra).

(6) Establishing a good relationship with the jurors and explaining to them things counsel is going to do that they may misunderstand and dislike (see § 28.08 infra).

Because of the extraordinary variety of local voir dire procedures, detailed discussion of the means for pursuing these objectives is not practical in this Manual. Counsel should consult Jeffrey T. Frederick, Mastering Voir Dire and Jury Selection: Gain an Edge in Questioning and Selecting Your Jury (4th ed. 2018); and Jeffrey T. Frederick, Mastering Voir Dire and Jury Selection: Supplemental Juror Questionnaires (2018); NJP Litigation Consulting (Elissa Krauss & Sonia Chopra, eds.), Jurywork: Systematic Techniques chs. 2-4, 17-18 (2d ed. 2012-13); Ann Fagan Ginger, Jury Selection in Criminal Trials – New Techniques and Concepts (1975); Irving Goldstein & Fred Lane, Goldstein Trial Technique §§ 9.21-9.86 (2d ed. 1969); Charles
At the outset it may be said that it is generally a good idea for defense counsel to prepare a list of voir dire questions in advance of trial. It is wise to write out each question on a separate file card and to make three identical sets of the cards. One set is for counsel’s own use. The second is either for submission to the court in jurisdictions in which the judge conducts voir dire interrogation or for filing of the appropriate cards to protect the record if counsel is permitted to interrogate the jurors personally but certain inquiries are disallowed by the court. The third set enables counsel to hand selected cards to the prosecutor for examination in the event of legal argument or negotiation about particular questions. Counsel will find that the pretrial drafting of voir dire questions makes it easier at the voir dire itself to concentrate attention on the important business of observing the prospective jurors. If any of the draft questions embodies assertions of legal principles that are not obvious, counsel will also save fumbling and possible embarrassment by having notes of citations to support the principles.

§ 28.05 QUESTIONS TESTING THE ATTITUDES OF JURORS TO LAY A BASIS OF CHALLENGE FOR CAUSE OR TO INFORM THE EXERCISE OF PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES

These questions must be tailored in large part to the particular case and to local doctrinal restrictions on the scope of voir dire questioning. An important consideration in drafting questions is whether the law in counsel’s jurisdiction requires that all questions asked on voir dire be justified by pertinency to a possible ground of challenge for cause or whether a broader range of inquiry is permitted. Even where questions are required “to go to cause,” however, counsel can often defend a question as seeking information that would open up a line of circumstantial proof of the basis for a challenge for cause: “Relevant voir dire questions . . . need not be framed exclusively in the language of the controlling appellate opinion” or statute defining the grounds for a challenge for cause. Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412, 433-34 (1985).

The following are some standard questions:

1. Are you related to, or are you friendly with, or do you have any close acquaintanceship with, anyone in the District Attorney’s [Corporation Counsel’s] Office?

2. How about police officers – anyone in the Police Department here in the city? Other police officers anywhere? Law enforcement officers of any sort, such as federal revenue agents or military police or security guards?

3. Have you ever had close relations with anyone in any of those categories?

4. Have you yourself ever been a police officer or a military police officer or an employee of any law enforcement agency? Ever had any responsibilities for industrial or physical plant
(5) Would you tend to believe the testimony of a police officer, just because s/he is a police officer, more than that of another witness?

(6) Have you or has any member of your family ever been the victim of a crime? [Follow-up questions should elicit the nature of the crime, the circumstances, and the juror’s reactions to the experience.] (If counsel has reason to believe that questions such as this one and number (7) may be embarrassing to a juror or jurors, counsel should request that voir dire on these subjects be conducted individually through one of the procedures suggested in connection with question (13) infra.)

(7) Have you or has any member of your family ever been a complainant or a witness in a criminal case? [Similar follow-up questions should be asked.]

(8) Have you ever served on a jury in a delinquency case? In an adult criminal case? In a civil case? [Similar follow-up questions should be asked.]

(9) Do you think that anything in your earlier experiences as a juror might affect your ability to serve as a juror in the present case with complete impartiality and with no predispositions for or against my client?

(10) Had you ever read or heard anything about this case before you came into the courtroom today?

(11) Had you read anything about it in the newspapers or on the internet? [To be asked only if counsel knows that there was significantly prejudicial publicity.] Or heard about it on the radio or TV? [Same.] Or heard about it through the social media or a website or a blog? [Same.]

(12) [If yes:] What [newspaper/radio program/TV program/website/blog/form of social media], do you remember? [Same.]

(13) What did you [read] [hear] about the case? [To be asked only if the previously accepted jurors and the remaining unquestioned panelists are sequestered.] (Even though sequestration is not generally in effect throughout the voir dire, counsel may ask that particular, potentially prejudicial questions such as this one be asked of the venireperson in the judge’s chambers or that the other prospective jurors be excluded – or even that the courtroom be cleared – while this specific line of questioning is pursued. Cf. Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501, 511-12 (1984); and see the admonition to defense counsel in Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794, 800 n.3 (1975), mentioned in the concluding paragraph of § 33.4.2.1 supra.)
(14) Did that mention my client’s name or anything about him or her? [Same.]

(15) Would what you read [heard] make it any the more likely, in your mind, that my client has committed [is guilty of] the crime with which s/he is charged here?

(16) If you were to sit as a juror in this case, do you think that what you read [heard] would have any effect upon your attitude with regard to whether my client was guilty or innocent of the crime with which s/he is charged here?

(17) When you read [heard] that, did it cause you to form in your own mind any opinions concerning whether s/he was probably guilty or innocent?

(18) What was that opinion?

(19) Of course, there’s been no evidence presented here in court yet, but [in light of what you’ve read or heard about this case so far] [in light of that newspaper/radio program/TV program/website/blog/social media story], would it take some evidence to change the opinion? (Arguably, a prospective juror’s answer that it would require some evidence to change his or her opinion that the respondent is guilty supports a challenge for cause. See § 28.03(a) subdivision (vi) supra.)

(20) [If the juror indicates that s/he has read or heard any newspaper/radio program/TV program/website/blog/social media story relating to the case:] Have you discussed that story with anyone?

(21) Have you discussed this case with anyone?

(22) Do you remember what you said? [To be asked only if the previously accepted jurors and the remaining unquestioned panelists are sequestered.]

(23) Did you say that my client was innocent or that s/he was guilty, something about whether s/he did it or not? (A previously expressed opinion of guilt is sufficient in some jurisdictions to disqualify a panelist for cause. See, e.g., Stevens v. State, 94 Okla. Crim. 216, 232 P.2d 949 (1951); cf. State v. Nett, 207 W.Va. 410, 414, 533 S.E.2d 43, 47 (2000) (“At the turn of the last century this Court held that ¶ ‘[w]hen a juror on his voir dire admits that he has formed and expressed an opinion of the guilt or innocence of the accused, and expresses any degree of doubt as to whether such previously formed opinion would affect his judgment in arriving at a just and proper verdict in the case, it is error to admit him on the panel.’’”).

(24) Did the person you were talking with say anything you recall about [the story] [the case]?

(25) Do you remember what they said? [To be asked only if the previously accepted jurors and the remaining unquestioned panelists are sequestered.]

(26) My client is charged with the crime of [murder]. Would the fact that s/he is charged with [murder], rather than with some other crime, make it seem more likely to you that s/he is guilty?

(27) Now, you know, of course, that you will be asked to return a verdict of guilty or not guilty in this case. If the court instructs you that you cannot return a guilty verdict unless you find that the respondent’s guilt is proved beyond a reasonable doubt, would you be able to follow that instruction?

(28) So if you heard all the evidence and you thought that the respondent was probably guilty – you weren’t convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that s/he was guilty but you thought the evidence showed that s/he probably was guilty – would you be able to return a verdict of not guilty in this case?

(29) Would it bother you or weigh on your conscience to return a verdict of not guilty when you thought probably s/he was guilty?

(30) Would the fact that my client is [a member of a certain racial or ethnic group] and the complainant in this case is [a member of a different racial or ethnic group] affect your judgment or your ability to decide this case in any way? (It is obviously preferable to ask more subtle questions probing possible racial prejudice if local practice allows them. But often it does not, and this form of inquiry is all that is permitted. One approach to the subject, which defense counsel can usually get away with, even in the most illiberal jurisdictions, is to ask at the beginning of the examination, following question (1) supra: “Now, this [murder] is supposed to have taken place near [naming a recognizable intersection or landmark in the neighborhood].” Or: “[Mr.] [Ms.] ____________ , the person who was killed, lived [or, alternatively, “The respondent lives”] near ____________.” “Do you know where that is?” “Have you had any occasion to be in that area?” Biased jurors will frequently give a telltale response in describing or responding to the mention of a ghetto or low-income neighborhood, although these questions themselves can be justified by counsel as the lead-in to a line of questioning aimed at determining whether the juror is disqualified by reason of personal knowledge of the offense or of the parties.)

(31) Would there be any inconvenience to you if this case ran late and we had to stay over late here some day?

§ 28.06 DRIVING HOME PRINCIPLES VITAL TO THE DEFENSE CASE

Voir dire presents an excellent chance to describe to the jurors the few most basic and important principles on which the defensive theory of the case rests, to explore the meaning of those principles, and to obtain the assent of the jurors to them. The principles should be stated both in the orthodox terms that the court will use in its charge and in more immediate, striking formulations that communicate the orthodox terms forcefully and make the prospective juror think about them. In this way the judge’s charge will echo what counsel has told the jury at the beginning of the case and vindicate and reinforce it.

Thus, for example, counsel might begin by asking a juror whether the juror could follow an instruction by the court to find the respondent not guilty of assault with intent to kill if the prosecution failed to prove that the respondent actually intended to kill. Then counsel might ask:

(1) “So, if the court were to charge you that in order to convict my client, you would have to be convinced that s/he actually intended to kill [Mr.] [Ms.] X – that she wanted [Mr.] [Ms.] X to die and intended when s/he shot to take [Mr.] [Ms.] X’s life away – you would follow that instruction?”

(2) “Now, if my client were to testify that s/he did not know the gun was loaded and you believed that – you believed s/he did not know it was loaded – although you thought it was terribly careless not to know that and it was reckless of my client to wave that gun around, s/he shouldn’t have done something dangerous like that, but you believed she did not know it was loaded, you would acquit my client of assault with intent to kill, even though s/he did wave the gun around carelessly and shot somebody with it?”

(3) “So you could follow [His] [Her] Honor’s charge that you have to find an actual intent to kill before you can convict, and you would say ‘not guilty’ of assault with intent to kill even if you found that my client was careless and reckless and recklessly shot someone, not knowing that the gun was loaded?”

Questions (28) and (29) in § 28.05 supra are a similar reformulation of the concept that the prosecution has the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. By securing the jurors’ commitment to these propositions, counsel lays the foundation for a closing argument which reminds the jurors that they have all sworn they could do the difficult job demanded of them in this case, namely, to hold the prosecution to its burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and to return a verdict of acquittal even though they believe that the client probably is guilty if they cannot say that his or her guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt.

The circumstances of particular cases and counsel’s theory of the defense will identify the basic principles that counsel wants to underscore to the jury in this fashion. How much jury-educating counsel will be permitted to undertake will vary from judge to judge. A helpful quotation when the prosecutor objects that counsel’s questioning amounts to argumentation rather than bias-testing is this passage in State v. Moore, 122 N.J. 420, 446, 585 A.2d 864, 877 (1991): “In a sense, voir dire acts as a discovery tool. It is like a conversation in which the parties are trying to reveal the source of any such attitudes without manipulation or delay of the trial. However, in order for that discovery procedure to be effective, potential jurors need to have some basic comprehension about what their legal duties as jurors will be. In that sense, voir dire can act as a teaching tool. When necessary, courts can use voir dire as a way of educating potential jurors to the ‘legal requirements’ of their responsibilities as jurors.”

§ 28.07 DISARMING SURPRISE PROSECUTION EVIDENCE AND PREJUDICIAL DISCLOSURES

When the prosecution is going to get a certain shock value out of particular aspects of its proof or when highly prejudicial specific facts are inevitably going to be brought out at trial, counsel should disclose them to the prospective jurors on voir dire. This serves the double function of lessening their impact when the evidence is received and of allowing counsel to observe each juror’s reaction to the damning item.

“Now, if my client’s own brother were to testify against [him] [her] at this trial, if [his] [her] own brother were to give evidence against [him] [her], would that affect your ability to give my client a fair trial?”

§ 28.08 ESTABLISHING A GOOD RELATIONSHIP WITH THE JURORS, EXPLORING THEIR BACKGROUNDS AND THINKING PATTERNS, AND FOREWARNING THEM OF CONDUCT BY COUNSEL THAT THEY MAY NOT LIKE

The voir dire is counsel’s first contact with the jurors, and counsel must use it to make friends. If possible, s/he should call each prospective juror by name. It is usually good practice to begin the examination of each juror with a number of questions about the juror’s general background, such as:

(1) Where do you live, [Mr.] [Ms.] Jones?
(2) Have you lived here in [city] all your life?
(3) Do you have family here?
(4) [And are your children still in school?]
(5) Could you tell us, please, where you were born and raised?
(6) And where did you go to school?
(7) Are you presently employed, [Mr.] [Ms.] Jones?
(8) Where do you work?
(9) What sort of work is it that you do there?
(10) Could you describe the nature of that job – what it is you do as [“an assistant to the director”; “an employment counselor”; or whatever job title the juror has given, if his or her answer to question (9) is nothing more than an unilluminating title].

Questions of this type manifest an interest in the juror as a person and can be asked in a manner that makes counsel likeable as a person – as someone who is fond of kids, for example. Many of the questions are open-ended in the sense that they cannot be answered simply “yes” or “no” but require the juror to frame answers in the juror’s own words; others of the questions leave the juror the option of a yes-or-no answer or a more elaborate response. The way in which the juror responds to these questions can tell counsel a good deal about the juror’s intelligence, quickness of understanding, patterns of language and thought, cultural background, self-confidence or nervousness, decisiveness or indecisiveness, eagerness to please or recalcitrance. For that reason, open-ended questions should be used as much as possible throughout the voir dire, but they are particularly easy to fashion and likely to be effective in the area of the juror’s own background. Counsel cannot, for example, ask a juror open-ended questions about the beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard or about the juror’s attitude toward the credibility of police officers (see § 28.05 supra). These questions would be both objectionable (since the juror is not required or supposed to know the legal rules governing burden of proof or the evaluation of testimony; the juror is merely required to be willing to follow the court’s instructions on those subjects) and potentially embarrassing (since a juror who is asked a legal question to which s/he does not know the answer will feel put down). On the other hand, jurors are obviously most knowledgeable and therefore most at ease on the topic of their own backgrounds.

A few jurors may be inclined to resent background questions as prying, but counsel can ordinarily avert any negative reaction of this nature by opening a voir dire examination with the following preliminary inquiries:

(1) Good morning, [Mr.] [Ms.] Jones. At this point in the proceedings it is the responsibility of the prosecuting attorney and me to ask certain questions of each individual person on the jury panel for the purpose of selecting an appropriate jury to sit in this case. We are not singling you out for questioning but will be asking questions of each person who is called as a possible juror. Is that all right?

(2) We have to ask each person some questions about his or her attitudes and background. We are not doing this to pry into your personal life or to snoop around in your privacy but only for the purpose of selecting an appropriate jury for this case. Would it be okay if I asked you some questions?

(3) Would you be willing to listen to these questions and to answer fully and freely any question that I ask you that does not seem to you to be too personal?

(4) And if I should ask you a question that seems to you too personal, would you be willing to tell me so, and maybe I can find some way to skip over the answer to that particular question?

(5) And if, not knowing you at all, I should happen to ask a question that comes across as too personal, you wouldn’t hold that against my client, would you?

This line of questions exemplifies a kind of questioning that counsel will also want to use in other areas of voir dire examination, in order to inform the jurors of things that counsel is going to do at trial that they may not like and to explain those things in a manner that makes them least objectionable. For example, “Do you think that you could be fair and impartial in considering the possibility that a child witness, like any other witness, might be mistaken in some part of his or her testimony?” “Certainly, no one likes to see a lawyer cross-examining a very young child or asking questions that may embarrass the child if the child is wrong. But you will understand, won’t you, that I am obliged to cross-examine witnesses, even if they are very young children, to see if they may be mistaken?” “And if I do cross-examine a child witness, would you hold that against my client?”

Among the things counsel will do in almost every trial that need to be explained to the jury are:

1. peremptorily challenging prospective jurors on the voir dire (in most jurisdictions, jurors congregate for periods of weeks and make friends with fellow jurors; as a result they may be offended when counsel strikes another panelist);

2. objecting to evidence at trial;

3. cross-examining the complaining witness (or any sympathetic witness); and

4. failing to extract a dramatic courtroom confession from the prosecution’s star witness that s/he is really guilty of the crime with which the respondent is charged, as defense lawyers sometimes do on T.V.

If a juror emits negative vibrations when forewarned of anything that counsel is going to do or of any damaging aspects of the prosecution’s case (see § 28.07 supra) or if a juror is captious or hostile on the voir dire, counsel should not argue with the juror. Counsel should be nice to the juror (for the sake of the other jurors) and strike him or her quickly. Or in cases in which the jurors are not sequestered, counsel may want to use a juror of this sort, after deciding to strike him or her, as an opportunity to pursue the essentially pedagogic questioning described in § 28.06 supra.

§ 28.09 SELECTING JURORS

This is so largely an intuitive art that there is little safe to say about it. Apart from displays of hostility by a juror or specific factors in a juror’s background that might predispose the juror against the respondent, counsel should be guided by the nature of his or her defense. If the defense, for example, requires conceptual thinking, counsel will want to be alert to strike unintelligent jurors. Ordinarily heterogeneity on the jury is desirable. Counsel should also give some credence to his or her instincts. All other things being equivocal, s/he may properly be governed by whether s/he likes a prospective juror. At this point, counsel is emotionally attuned to his or her own defense, and counsel will have subtle reactions of dislike to jurors on the basis of half-perceived, but often relatively reliable, signs that the juror is dangerous. In any event, the more counsel likes a jury, the better counsel will project to it.

Counsel should usually give the client the opportunity to advise counsel of any prospective jurors.
that she does not like and should strike those jurors unless there is a strong reason not to. Considering how unscientific voir dire is and considering that the respondent has experience in knowing who will dislike or fear him or her, the client is as likely to be right about whom to select or reject as is counsel. And because it is the respondent’s liberty that is at stake, counsel ordinarily should give the respondent a veto over the persons who will sit in judgment on him or her.
Chapter 29

Opening Statements

§ 29.01 OPENING STATEMENTS GENERALLY

Immediately after the attorneys announce that they are ready to begin trial and before the first witness is called, the prosecuting and defense attorneys (in that order) are permitted to make opening statements, sometimes called opening arguments or opening speeches.

In many jurisdictions the only recognized function of the opening statement is to assist the jury (or the court, in a bench trial) to follow the evidence with greater understanding, by being advised in advance how the testimony of each witness and the function of each exhibit fits into the whole case or the overall theory of the party who presents it. Counsel are accordingly expected to confine their opening statements to (1) outlining the substance of their respective cases; (2) naming their witnesses and summarizing the testimony of each; (3) enumerating the pieces of physical evidence or other exhibits that they will introduce and explaining what each is designed to show; and (4) relating each witness and piece of evidence to the theory of counsel’s case (a process in which counsel are permitted to “state” but not to “argue” the inferences that they will subsequently ask the jury or the court to draw from the testimony and exhibits). See, e.g., United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600, 612-13 (1976) (concurring opinion of Chief Justice Burger), quoted with approval in Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497, 513 n.32 (1978) (dictum).

In other jurisdictions considerably more argumentative opening statements are permitted. In still others, the law is not clear regarding the precise function of the opening statement, and individual judges vary in the latitude they allow counsel.

As a practical matter, the trial judge’s disposition is crucial in every jurisdiction because the line between describing a case and arguing it is inevitably fuzzy, and any good lawyer will attempt to use his or her first speech to the jury (or the court) to create a favorable impression. Nevertheless, counsel needs to ascertain before trial – both by legal research and by inquiry of local practitioners – whether the jurisdiction and the particular judge insist upon the narrower, “descriptive” form of opening statement or will tolerate a broader measure of argumentation and rhetoric. This is important both in planning the opening statement of the defense and in framing objections during the opening statement for the prosecution.

§ 29.02 THE OPENING STATEMENT FOR THE PROSECUTION

Counsel must be alert to stop the prosecutor from referring to inadmissible evidence in the prosecution’s opening statement. If the probable-cause hearing, pretrial investigation, or discovery has indicated any material prosecution testimony or evidence to which the defense is prepared to object on substantial grounds, defense counsel should raise the matter with the judge.
before the prosecutor’s opening statement. In a jury trial, this should be done outside the hearing of the jury, either at the bench or while the jury is out of the courtroom. Counsel should explain the nature of the evidence and the respondent’s objections to it, and counsel should ask that the prosecutor be prohibited from referring to this evidence in opening. In a bench trial, counsel should take the additional precaution of asking that, to the extent practicable, discussion of his or her objections be conducted without the prosecutor’s relating the substance of the evidence, so as to avoid the judge’s hearing it before ruling on its admissibility. Thus, for example, the parties can usually argue and the judge can rule on the prosecutor’s right to present an out-of-court statement within the dying-declaration exception to the hearsay rule without discussing the contents of the statement; and they can almost always resolve the defense’s chain-of-custody objection to a writing (cf. § 8.18 supra) or the defense’s Melendez-Diaz objection to a forensicscience report (see § 30.04(c) infra) without reference to the contents of the documents.

In Frazier v. Cupp, 394 U.S. 731 (1969), the Supreme Court held that a defendant was not constitutionally entitled to a mistrial when the prosecutor made a reference in opening to evidence that the prosecutor “reasonably expected to produce” (id. at 736) but that, as it turned out later, the prosecutor was unable to produce. Advance objection by defense counsel should dispel the reasonableness of the prosecutor’s expectation that s/he will be permitted to introduce inadmissible evidence. If the judge expresses reluctance to “edit” the prosecutor’s opening – as some judges will – counsel should point out that the precautionary restraint which s/he is requesting is nothing more than a safeguard against the risk of a mistrial which will be in no one’s interest: The mistrial remedy will be obligatory if the prosecutor’s opening adverts to damaging information that is later ruled inadmissible. See, e.g., United States v. Millan, 817 F.
Supp. 1086, 1088-89 & n.2 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (granting defendants’ motion for a mistrial principally because “during opening arguments, the Government told the jury that ‘the evidence will show’ that [Investigator] Robles played a pivotal role in four undercover purchases of heroin” and the Government “intimat[ed] that Robles was a reliable, credible witness,” even though the Government “should have been aware of the problems with its opening argument” because Robles himself was being investigated for “narcotics trafficking”; the Government “took no steps to resolve the predicament before the jury was empaneled,” and ultimately informed the court that “Robles will not be called as a witness at trial”; “At a minimum, the Government should have brought the allegations against Robles . . . to the Court’s attention so that the matter could have been resolved before opening arguments, thus, avoiding the necessity for a mistrial.”); conviction and remanding for a new trial because “the prosecutor’s opening statement . . .
informed the jurors they would receive evidence from an individual who never testified”; “at the time the opening was delivered there was considerable reason to doubt whether Watkins would testify,” and “[n]o one doubted then – or now – that without Watkins much of what the prosecutor asserted during her opening could not be proven.”). See generally AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, Standard 3-6.5(d) (4th ed. 2015) (“When the prosecutor has reason to believe that a portion of the opening statement may be objectionable, the prosecutor should raise that point with defense counsel and, if necessary, the court, in advance.
Similarly, visual aids or exhibits that the prosecutor intends to use during opening statement should be shown to defense counsel in advance.”).

878

Counsel also should listen for and object to any overly eloquent or emotional opening arguments by the prosecutor (unless s/he prefers to treat them as “opening the door” and to respond in kind), on the ground that they exceed the proper scope of opening statement and are “argumentative.” If the law or the judge allows the prosecutor to make a relatively argumentative opening, defense counsel may nevertheless wish to object to particularly dramatic flourishes or heavy sales pitches. See, e.g., United States v. Somers, 496 F.2d 723, 737 & n.26 (3d Cir. 1974) (“although the Assistant United States Attorney paid lip service to the legitimate purpose of an opening, . . . he nevertheless departed from that objective by studding his opening with overly-dramatic, unnecessary characterizations”); Commonwealth v. Culver, 51 A.3d 866, 874-76 (Pa. Super. 2012) (prosecutor’s “‘yelling and menacing as he repeatedly put his finger in the faces of the Defendant and defense counsel’” and engaging in other “animated and intimidating behavior during the opening and closing statements” contributed to the need for a mistrial, and “could alone serve to justify the granting of a new trial”; “At best, such behaviors demonstrate a lack of professionalism in the courtroom. At worst, they could be interpreted as intentional conduct intended to inflame the passions of the jury or to instigate a reaction from the defendant or his counsel. What is clear is that such behavior has no part in the rational, logical, and contemplative evaluation of the evidence that should occur during a criminal trial. ¶ The deprivation of an individual’s liberty should never turn upon the theatrical presentation of arguments or evidence, the volume and tone of an advocate’s voice, or due to physical acts of intimidation. That such behavior occurred in front of a jury only serves to increase its potential prejudicial effect. While we might presume that a trial judge could resist the prejudicial effect of such theatrics, especially where the trial judge had prior experience with a particularly dramatic attorney, we cannot assume the same when a case is tried before a jury. A jury might well become distracted from their task by the theatrics of an over-zealous prosecutor.”). See generally ABA STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, supra, Standard 3-6.5(c) (“The prosecutor’s opening statement should be made without expressions of personal opinion, vouching for witnesses, inappropriate appeals to emotion or personal attacks on opposing counsel”). In a jury trial, if counsel’s objection is overruled, counsel may wish to ask in the alternative that the judge remind the jury that the statements of counsel are not evidence, and that the jury should keep an open mind and form no impressions about the case until they have heard the evidence that the witnesses will give. (If the prosecutor has been histrionic, counsel can also request that the judge tell the jury that the court is confident the jurors will not be swayed by theatrics on the part of the lawyers but will decide the case solely on the basis of the jury’s appraisal of the evidence that will later be presented.)

§ 29.03 THE OPENING FOR THE DEFENSE

29.03(a) The Opening Statement for the Defense in a Jury Trial

Counsel will need to think carefully about how general or specific the defense opening should be. There are various reasons why counsel might prefer to refrain from addressing the facts in detail and instead to give a very general opening statement. A general opening of this sort might focus on:

(1) the prosecution’s burden of proof,
(2) the importance of the jurors’ keeping an open mind until they have heard all the evidence,
(3) the gravity of what is at stake for the respondent at the trial, and
(4) the weighty responsibility of the jurors in deciding the fate of another human being, and might conclude simply by

(5) thanking the jurors in advance for their serious and impartial consideration of the case.

The considerations militating in favor of such a general opening include: (i) the danger of committing the defense to a particular tack when counsel cannot be certain what turns the prosecution’s evidence may take or what specific openings for rebuttal it will leave – or when the ultimate decision whether to present any defense evidence at all will turn on how persuasive the prosecution’s case-in-chief ends up being; (ii) a tactical concern about tipping off the prosecution to the defense’s intended evidence and strategies, thereby making it possible for the prosecution to tailor its case-in-chief to counter the defense’s plans; and (iii) the need to guard against overstatement of the defense case, which could reflect badly on the respondent and undermine any merit the defense evidence may possess (see, e.g., Boyd v. United States, 473 A.2d 828, 833-34 (D.C. 1984) (rejecting a defense challenge to the prosecutor’s “not[ing] [in closing argument] the dearth of evidence supporting three facts which defense counsel had earlier asserted” in opening statement)).

Of course, a detailed opening has substantial countervailing benefits. This is a crucial opportunity for counsel to present the defense’s theory of the case to the jury in the form of a compelling narrative, priming the jury to view the prosecution’s evidence with a critical eye and to appreciate how all of the points that counsel will make in cross-examinations of prosecution witnesses fit into a larger story that the defense is telling at trial. A detailed opening also enables counsel to engage more effectively with the jury in the way that storytellers do with an audience. Although counsel will already have had at least some opportunity to interact with the jury during voir dire, and although even a general defense opening does allow counsel to set a tone that engages the jurors’ attention and trust, there is often no substitute for a detailed, vivid opening in which counsel speaks to the jury about the heart of the case and helps the jury see the world from the defense’s perspective. Finally, if (as is usually the case), the prosecution presents a detailed opening, counsel’s failure to respond in kind may leave some jurors feeling like counsel has no effective rejoinders. (Of course, a general opening can explain that the defense is not commenting on the evidence at this point because the prosecution bears the burden of proof – and counsel can use voir dire to pave the way for an explanation of this sort (see § 28.08 supra) – but some jurors nonetheless may regard a general defense opening as a sign of weakness.)

In some circumstances, it may be possible to reap many of the benefits of a specific opening without incurring its potential costs by deferring the defense opening statement until after the close of the prosecutor’s case. Most jurisdictions permit defense counsel – either as a matter of right (see, e.g., Rodriguez v. State, 109 A.3d 1075, 1080 n.12 (Del. 2015); Hampton v. United States, 269 A.2d 441, 443 (D.C. 1970) (dictum)) or in the discretion of the trial judge (see, e.g., State v. Gumm, 73 Ohio St. 3d 413, 431, 653 N.E.2d 253, 269 (1995)) – to “reserve” opening until the beginning of the defense case, after the prosecution “rests.” But even where this option is available, defense counsel is often better off giving his or her opening statement immediately after the prosecutor’s, to avoid the adverse psychological effect upon the jury of hearing only the prosecutor’s side of the case at the outset. Standard 4-7.5(a) of the American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice (4th ed. 2015) puts the matter this way:

“Defense counsel should be aware of the importance of an opening statement and, except in unusual cases, give an opening statement immediately after the prosecution’s, before the presentation of evidence begins. Any decision to defer the opening statement should be fully discussed with the client, and a record of the reasons for such decision should be made for the file.”

Our own view is that there are more reasons and occasions for deferring the defense opening statement than this “unusual cases” formula suggests, but that the remainder of Standard 4-7.5(a) has got it exactly right.

When presenting a specific opening statement, counsel will want to craft it in a way that takes full advantage of the opportunities for effective storytelling. Prior to trial, counsel presumably will have used his or her theory of the case to develop a central narrative or story that s/he intends to present to the jury at trial. See § 6.06 supra. The opening statement allows defense counsel to introduce the jury to each of the central elements of the story: its characters, actions, settings, instruments, and motivations. By invoking available scripts in the jury’s repertoire of stock scripts, counsel can prime the jury to view all of the upcoming testimony through a defense-friendly narrative. See §§ 6.06(b), 6.06(d) supra. See also Philip N. Meyer, Storytelling for Lawyers (2014).

There are a number of rhetorical devices that can be useful in attaining these goals. Defense opening statements usually should have a theme. They should strike a simple, clear, dramatic note, summing up the defense theory in a single image – or in a set of short, strongly connected phrases – that the jury or the judge will not forget and that will shape their perception and evaluation of the evidence. For example:

You will see that the prosecution’s case depends on Mr. Jones having three legs. The complaining witness had a bear hug on one of them, and Mr. Jones was standing on the second when he supposedly kicked the complaining witness.
But unless the assumed time of entry is right, the whole investigation you will hear so much about was wrong: They questioned the wrong shift of employees at the gas station, they identified and traced the wrong car, and they caught the wrong man.

Rhetorical questions often offer a useful vehicle for prompting the jury to view the prosecution’s case with skepticism and to watch for specific problems in particular prosecution witnesses’ accounts. As suggested in § 6.06(b) supra, the opening statement may be an ideal opportunity to explicitly (or, if that cannot be done, at least implicitly) allude to a well-known book or film or TV series that will cause the jury to favor the defense’s story and/or to be critical of the prosecution’s.

29.03(b) The Defense Opening in a Bench Trial

In some jurisdictions it is customary for both sides to waive opening statement in a bench trial. This custom probably is based upon the assumption that judges know enough law to be able to deduce the prosecution’s and respondent’s theories of the case from the presentation of the evidence without the benefit of opening statements. Where this is the custom, it is usually advisable to comply. In a bench trial, much depends upon maintaining the good will of the judge. If the accepted practice is to waive opening and the prosecutor has followed this practice, the judge may well be irritated by what s/he views as defense counsel’s insistence on wasting the court’s time.

In some cases, however, it is crucial to alert the judge to the defense theory of the case before the judge hears the prosecution’s witnesses so that s/he will have that alternative perspective in mind while listening to the prosecution’s testimony. This is particularly true in cases in which the defense theory will not emerge clearly during cross-examination of the prosecutor’s witnesses and will first become evident from defense testimony. In these cases counsel should courteously but firmly insist upon his or her right to present an opening, explaining that s/he intends to be brief. If the local custom is such that an opening is truly an extraordinary event in a bench trial, counsel should consider adding that s/he understands that openings are unusual but that the case is itself so unusual that an opening is essential. (Of course, counsel will then have to deliver on the promise to demonstrate that the case is, in fact, an extraordinary one.)

The suggestions offered in the preceding section for a defense opening in a jury trial largely apply to bench trials as well. But, in a bench trial, it is usually ill-advised to present an opening statement that merely recites general doctrines like the prosecution’s burden of proof, because the judge will probably resent counsel’s presuming to lecture the court about the basics of criminal law. Accordingly, in cases in which counsel cannot afford to be committed to a particular theory at the beginning of the trial, it is usually advisable to reserve opening until after the conclusion of the prosecution’s case-in-chief.
In a co-respondent trial, each respondent has the right to present an opening statement. In such trials, counsel will need to be alert to the risk that a co-respondent’s lawyer may say something in opening that could prejudice counsel’s client. Counsel should speak with the lawyer[s] for the co-respondent[s] before trial to find out whether this is likely to be a problem. If that turns out to be the case, counsel should seek to reach an accommodation that will fulfill the objectives of the other lawyer[s] without harming counsel’s client. Should that prove to be impossible, counsel should raise the matter with the judge before opening statements begin (and, in a jury trial, outside the presence of the jury). Cf. § 29.02 supra. If the conflict is very severe, counsel may need to seek a severance. See § 18.10(c) supra. In a jury trial, if such a motion for severance is denied or if counsel does not pursue this remedy, counsel may wish to seek a cautionary jury instruction.

In a joint trial in which counsel and the attorney[s] for the co-respondent[s] are presenting a united front, the defense can maximize its advantage by having one (or more) defense attorney[s] deliver an opening statement after the prosecutor’s opening, and the other defense attorney[s] deliver an opening statement at the commencement of the defense case. Many judges will allow this procedure, since the cases have been joined for the prosecutor’s and the court’s convenience, and the joinder should not prejudice the defense attorneys’ prerogative to make separate decisions about when they wish to present their opening statements.
Chapter 30

Evidentiary Issues That Are Likely To Arise at Trial

§ 30.01 APPLICABILITY OF THE RULES OF EVIDENCE

In In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), the Supreme Court condemned the use of hearsay in delinquency trials, observing that “[n]o reason is suggested or appears for a different rule in respect of sworn testimony in juvenile courts than in adult tribunals.” Id. at 56. The Gault opinion referred with approval to juvenile justice standards that “state that testimony should be under oath and that only competent, material and relevant evidence under rules applicable to civil cases should be admitted in evidence.” Id. at 56-57 (citing the Children’s Bureau’s Standards for Juvenile and Family Courts).

Ordinarily, evidentiary issues are raised during trial by means of objections, motions to strike testimony, and motions for a mistrial. These procedures are discussed in Chapter 34.

When the evidence in question is extremely prejudicial, the normal processes for objecting to evidence will be inadequate. References to the existence of the evidence and discussions of its admissibility will jaundice the trier of fact. Section 30.02(a) discusses techniques for litigating the admissibility of highly prejudicial evidence out of earshot of the trier in bench and jury trials. Section 30.02(b) discusses stipulations, which can be used to exclude prejudicial evidence and can also be used to obviate the need to seek out and present witnesses on technical or routine matters that the prosecution is prepared to concede. Section 30.02(c) then discusses the option of “stipulated trials,” a procedure in which the entire trial is conducted on the basis of prior transcripts, stipulations, or both.

§ 30.02(a) Procedures for Litigating Evidentiary Issues Out of Earshot of the Trier of Fact

§ 30.02(a)(1) Bench Trials

Unlike jury trials, in which the division of responsibilities between judge and jury facilitates a resolution of sensitive evidentiary issues outside the hearing of the trier of fact, bench trials involve a trier who is also the arbiter of evidentiary issues. Even when evidence is excluded, the judge will ordinarily hear it in the course of determining its admissibility. Although all judges profess to ignore excluded evidence in deciding guilt or innocence, inevitably the evidence affects the judge’s thinking. The problem is complicated by the unwillingness of most judges to grant a recusal motion after hearing highly prejudicial evidence, see § 20.05 supra, and by the risk that a request for recusal may irk the judge, see § 20.07 supra.

If counsel knows in advance of a bench trial – from defense investigation, discovery, or prior hearings in the case – that the prosecution intends to offer certain highly prejudicial and objectionable evidence, counsel should consider litigating the admissibility of the evidence before trial by making a motion in limine and requesting that the motion be heard by a judge other than the one who will preside over the trial. See § 7.03(c) supra. (Of course, this approach should not be used if the judge who would rule on the pretrial motion is highly likely to deny it and if the judge who will preside over the trial would at least attempt to exclude the evidence from his or her decisionmaking in the event that s/he holds it inadmissible.) When employing this procedure, counsel needs to take into account that the judge who will preside over the trial may resent the implication that s/he would consider prejudicial information s/he has excluded. Accordingly, counsel should stress that the motion in limine is being made merely as a precautionary measure to avert the possibility that inadmissible evidence might affect the judge unconsciously at trial. See § 20.07 supra. In addition, counsel may wish to point out that the motion procedure conserves judicial resources by obviating any need for a later request for recusal. In framing the motion and in arguing it, counsel will have to avoid revealing the nature of the inadmissible evidence and will need to be alert to object if the prosecutor begins to describe the evidence.

If counsel was unaware of the prejudicial evidence before trial or was otherwise unable to make a pretrial motion in limine, s/he might consider the alternative procedure of asking the trial judge to refer counsel’s objections to another judge for argument and resolution. This is an uncommon procedure, but it can be proposed to the judge as a highly practical one. Brief recesses of bench trials for many reasons of administrative convenience are commonplace, and counsel can urge that a recess to permit another judge to hear defense objections to particularly prejudicial items of prosecutorial evidence would not delay the trial unduly. Indeed, a special recess may not be necessary: The prosecution can proceed with other evidence, temporarily withholding the challenged item, until the next regularly scheduled recess; and during that recess the parties can arrange – with the trial judge’s approval – to present the matter expeditiously to another judge.

Counsel also might consider making use of the anticipatory objection procedure described in § 34.04 infra and the voir dire procedure described in § 34.05. Although these procedures are particularly well-suited for the jury trial context as mechanisms for averting disclosure of inadmissible evidence to the jury, they may also serve useful functions in a bench trial.

§ 30.02(a)(2) Jury Trials

One of the most difficult – and crucial – aspects of making objections at a jury trial is the need to guard against the jury’s hearing objectionable evidence before counsel can secure a ruling from the judge to exclude it. This can happen in any number of ways. Even if counsel objects to the prosecutor’s question before the witness starts to answer it, the jury often will be able to deduce what the answer probably would have been. Once counsel objects, the prosecutor may respond in a way that tips off the jury to what the challenged evidence is. If counsel and/or the prosecutor engage in a colloquy with the judge in open court about counsel’s objection, much may be revealed to the jury even if both lawyers and the judge are taking pains to avoid disclosing the content of the challenged testimony.

As § 7.03(c) supra discussed, counsel can use a pretrial motion in limine to secure a ruling from the judge, in advance of trial, that certain evidence the prosecution intends to use at trial is inadmissible and/or that certain arguments the prosecution might be disposed to make in opening statement or closing argument will not be permitted. A pretrial ruling of this sort ensures that the jury will not hear the impermissible evidence or argument. In the event that the excluded evidence leaks out anyway as a result of something the prosecutor or a prosecution witness says or does, counsel is in a good position to obtain a mistrial. See § 34.11 infra.

If counsel has reason to believe (due to defense investigation, the probable-cause hearing, discovery, or a pretrial suppression hearing) that the prosecution will attempt to introduce objectionable evidence through a particular witness, and if counsel has not raised the issue with the judge prior to the commencement of the trial – perhaps because counsel did not know about the issue at that time, or because counsel decided that the considerations canvassed in § 7.03 made a pretrial adjudication of the issue less advantageous to the defense than its adjudication during evidence-taking at trial, or because counsel felt that his or her position on the issue would be strongest after the judge had heard the parties’ opening statements and/or certain other prosecution testimony – counsel can guard against the risk of jury exposure to the objectionable evidence by making an anticipatory objection when the witness is first called to the stand or when the prosecutor begins any line of questioning that may lead to the objectionable matter. See § 34.04 infra.

If objectionable matters arise at trial that counsel was not able to forestall with one of the foregoing devices – because, for example, counsel had no basis for anticipating that a prosecutor would ask a certain objectionable question or that a witness would respond with an objectionable answer – counsel can use a sidebar conference to ensure that discussions of the admissibility of the potentially prejudicial evidence do not take place within the hearing of the jury. Upon objecting, counsel can request that the court hear the objection at the bench (“at sidebar”). If the design of the courtroom makes it possible for the jurors to hear bench conferences, counsel should ask that the jury be excused during argument and decision of counsel’s objection. However, most judges will not tolerate frequent requests to excuse the jury, and counsel must limit these requests to situations in which a revelation of the evidence to which s/he is objecting would bias jurors badly against the respondent or the defense theory of the case. Counsel should, in any event, make the requests at sidebar, not in open court, because the jurors are likely to be irked at the party responsible for making them suffer the inconvenience of traipsing in and out of the courtroom and the boredom of waiting out the resolution of a bench conference. To a somewhat lesser extent, they may be irritated by extended bench conferences even when the jury remains in the courtroom.

When preliminary questions of fact bear upon the admissibility of an item of evidence, the trial judge ordinarily decides those questions, even at a jury trial. During the presentation of testimony on these preliminary factual questions (usually called voir dire examination), the jury is often, although not invariably, excused, either on the court’s initiative or at the request of counsel for one of the parties. See § 34.05 infra. In most situations in which the voir dire examination is occasioned by a defense objection to any significant piece of prosecution evidence, counsel should ask (at sidebar) that the jury be excused. This is usually a matter committed to the discretion of the trial judge. However, in jurisdictions where suppression issues are raised at trial rather than by pretrial motions, see § 22.01 supra, the respondent has a constitutional right to demand a hearing out of the presence of the jury on the admissibility of a confession challenged under federal constitutional exclusionary principles, see Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964); Sims v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 538 (1967), and doubtless also upon any defense objection to evidence on the ground that it was obtained by an unconstitutional search and seizure or other violation of constitutional guarantees enforced by an exclusionary rule.

§ 30.02(a)(3) Preparing To Use the Procedures

To make effective use of the procedures described in the preceding two sections, counsel should review his or her case file before trial and identify every item of prosecution evidence to which s/he plans to object. On the basis of the information available to counsel – from discovery, prior hearings, and investigation – counsel should anticipate through which prosecution witnesses, and at what points in the testimony of each, the objectionable items are likely to be elicited. S/he should then plan out a comprehensive strategy of trial objections, deciding which ones to make in the ordinary fashion – by objecting and stating the grounds of objection in open court when the evidence is first offered by the prosecutor – and which ones to raise earlier in a witness’s examination or even at the outset of trial, which ones to raise at sidebar, and on which ones to request still more unusual procedures, such as excusing the jury from the courtroom during evidentiary arguments or voir dire, or requiring the prosecutor to argue the admissibility of evidence without disclosing its substance in a bench trial.

These decisions must be made on the basis of a comparative assessment of:

(A) the harm that each item of objectionable evidence will do if the trier of fact hears about it;

(B) the likelihood of counsel’s winning his or her objection to each item;

(C) the extent to which there is a precedent or compelling logical justification for the use of special procedures to litigate the objections to each item; and

(D) the relative priority of litigating one or another of counsel’s potential objections through the use of these special procedures.

A comprehensive strategy is important because of most judges’ very limited patience with requests for unusual or time-consuming trial procedures: Counsel cannot expect to have more than a few of these requests granted in any trial, and s/he should save them for the points at which they will do the most good.

§ 30.02(b) Stipulations

Counsel should always keep in mind the possibility of offering to stipulate to matters that the prosecutor can amply prove.

Stipulations are particularly advisable when there is a risk that the prosecution’s proof will incidentally introduce some prejudicial matter. For example, counsel should consider stipulating (1) the fact of death in a homicide case, to avoid gruesome photographs and medical testimony (see, e.g., Jessica M. Salerno, Seeing Red: Disgust Reactions to Gruesome Photographs in Color (but not in Black and White) Increase Convictions, Psychology, Public Policy, and Law (March 30, 2017), available from APA PsycNET, at http://psycnet.apa.org/psycarticles/2017-14290-001); (2) the identity of a stolen object, to avoid its identification by a sympathetic theft complainant who has no other testimony pertinent to the case; (3) the authenticity of prosecution exhibits, to avoid chain-of-custody testimony resulting in a parade of police witnesses testifying with crackerjack efficiency that may appear to characterize the entire police investigation; and (4) the qualifications of prosecution experts, if they are impressive.

Stipulations can also be used to improve counsel’s position on certain evidentiary objections. For example, when counsel objects to an item of prosecution evidence on the ground that its prejudicial impact substantially outweighs its probative value (see § 30.03 infra), counsel can reduce its probative value by announcing that s/he will stipulate the fact which the item is being offered to prove. See, e.g., Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997); People v. Walker, 211 Ill. 2d 317, 328-43, 812 N.E.2d 339, 345-53, 285 Ill. Dec. 519, 525-33 (2004); State v. Alvarez, 318 N.J. Super. 137, 150-54, 723 A.2d 91, 97-99 (1999).

Obtaining the prosecutor’s stipulation to factual elements in the defense case will enable counsel to save the time and trouble of seeking out, preparing, and examining witnesses on incontestable points. Cf. § 30.04(b)(2) concluding paragraph supra. For example, if the prosecutor is willing to stipulate to the accuracy and authenticity of defense counsel’s transcript of a police radio communications tape, counsel can forgo testimony by the police communications personnel who recorded the tape and by the individual who transcribed it. Counsel does well to seek stipulations to the admissibility of items of defense evidence (see, e.g., Pittman by Hamilton v. County of Madison, Illinois, 863 F.3d 734 (7th Cir. 2017)) unless, by so doing, s/he is likely to alert the prosecutor to potential objections that the prosecutor is otherwise likely to overlook. When a prosecutor who is cooperative in matters of this kind requests reciprocal stipulations to incontrovertible or unimportant points in the prosecution’s case or to the admissibility of unobjectionable items of prosecution evidence, counsel should ordinarily agree, both in order to maintain the prosecutor’s cooperation and in order to avoid irritating the judge by appearing to be wasting the court’s time in taking testimony on facts that could have been stipulated.

§ 30.02(c)  Stipulated Trials

Counsel may, on occasion, wish to waive a full evidentiary trial and to submit the case to the court on an agreed statement of facts or on the police report or on the transcript of the probable-cause hearing or of a pretrial hearing on a motion to suppress. This procedure is called a “stipulated trial” in some jurisdictions, a “trial on a case-stated basis” in others.

The procedure is useful in cases in which there is no real factual dispute and the only matters in controversy are legal – the interpretation of an unclear rule of law or the application of an established rule to a novel set of facts. Thus, for example, in a case in which both parties agree that the respondent cursed at a police officer who was engaged in his or her official duties but the parties disagree about whether these facts make out the crime of obstruction of governmental administration, counsel might offer to stipulate the facts and argue only the legal issue. The judge will ordinarily appreciate the time and trouble saved and may reflect his or her appreciation at disposition in the event that the respondent is convicted.

In jurisdictions in which a pretrial suppression ruling cannot be reviewed on appeal following the accused’s entry of a guilty plea, see §§ 14.10, 22.07 supra, the stipulated trial procedure may offer advantages comparable to those of a guilty plea while preserving the respondent’s right to appellate review of the suppression ruling. Because the stipulated trial process saves the prosecutor’s and the judge’s time, the prosecutor will often be amenable to offering sentencing concessions similar to those s/he would make in exchange for a guilty plea (prosecutorial support for a disposition of probation, or whatever), and the judge will tend to be more lenient at disposition. Yet because the stipulated trial is technically a “trial,” any errors in the pretrial suppression ruling are preserved for appeal.

There may be additional reasons for the stipulated trial procedure in particular cases. A police report may contain inadmissible matter favorable to the respondent or may reflect the investigating officer’s sympathy for the respondent; the transcript of a probable-cause hearing may contain similarly inadmissible defense matter or a fatal defect in the prosecution testimony. When stipulating to trial on a prior transcript, counsel should make clear whether the parties are agreeing that the court may consider everything in the transcript or only the evidence presented there that would be admissible under the evidentiary rules applicable at trial. Cf. Moore v. United States, 429 U.S. 20 (1976) (per curiam).

§ 30.03 RELEVANCE; PROBATIVE WEIGHT VERSUS PREJUDICE

The initial inquiry with respect to the admissibility of any piece of evidence is its relevance (that is, pertinency to the issues) and its materiality (that is, the weight of its probative contribution to resolution of the issues).

§ 30.03(a) Relevance Generally

The Federal Rules of Evidence contain the following definition of “relevant evidence,” which is echoed in many state statutes and local rules: “Evidence is relevant if: (a) it has any tendency to make a fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence; and (b) the fact is of consequence in determining the action” (Fed. Rule Evid. 401).
The application of this rule to a particular item of evidence requires two inquiries:

First, it is necessary to identify what facts (often called “factual propositions”) are “of consequence to the determination of the action” (that is, to the decision of the issues framed for trial). This inquiry is technically known as an inquiry into “materiality,” and the factual propositions identified are known as “material facts.” The process of identifying them begins with an analysis of the pleadings – that is, in a delinquency case, the Petition and the respondent’s plea – in the light of the rules of substantive law defining the elements of the offenses charged and the defenses asserted. (If the substantive rules are disputed, the judge will have to resolve the dispute in order to identify the material facts in issue.) The process then takes account of the impact of any pretrial proceedings or earlier trial proceedings upon the issues framed by the pleadings.

Second, it is necessary to inquire whether the particular item of evidence has probative force in regard to any material fact – that is, whether it has a logical tendency to establish or negate the truth of such a fact. Federal Rule 401(a) sets a relatively low threshold for the amount of probative force which is required to make an item of evidence relevant: “any tendency to make a [material] fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence” (emphasis added). See, e.g., State v. Sparks, 336 Or. 298, 307, 83 P.3d 304, 310 (2004); State v. Richardson, 210 Wis. 2d 694, 707, 563 N.W.2d 899, 904 (1997). In answering this question for the purpose of ruling on an objection that a particular item of evidence is irrelevant, the judge is not supposed to consider the credibility (that is, the believability) of the item. As a practical matter, this means that any item of “direct evidence” (that is, any statement by a witness that s/he did or observed something that constitutes a material fact) is per se relevant. In regard to items of “indirect” or “circumstantial” evidence, the judge must accept the credibility of the item and inquire only whether there is some logically reasonable chain of inference or characterization that connects it with a material factual proposition. The chain needs not be air-tight or conclusive. “‘[I]t is universally recognized that evidence, to be relevant to an inquiry, need not conclusively prove the ultimate fact in issue, but only have “any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.”’” New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325, 345 (1985), quoting Fed. Rule Evid. 401.” McKoy v. North Carolina, 494 U.S. 433, 439 (1990).

The requirement of relevancy is not applied with mechanistic rigor to every isolated factual detail. Details which in themselves lack a strictly logical connection to any material factual proposition are nonetheless ordinarily held to be relevant as “background” or “context” if they set the scene for some other relevant fact – if they situate a relevant fact in its chronological or causal or narrative setting, make it more intelligible, give it the texture and color and drama of life – provided that they do not run on too long or stray too far afield, and that they do not pose a danger of laying affirmatively improper matter before the jury. See Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172, 186-90 (1997).

§ 30.03(b) Arguments for Applying the Relevance Rule in a Manner that Respects the Special Position and Needs of the Defense in a Delinquency Trial

In delinquency trials – as in adult criminal trials – the accused is often given the benefit of the doubt on close questions whether to admit or to exclude evidence. That is particularly true with regard to the admissibility of evidence proffered by the defense. See, e.g., Wilson v. State, 971 So. 2d 963, 965 (Fla. App. 2008). Counsel should urge the judge that it would not be fair if the respondent were deprived of the chance to tell his or her story because of a close call on the question of relevance. Counsel can also point out that the judge’s exercise of his or her discretion in favor of admissibility would avoid a possible conflict between state evidentiary rules and the federal constitutional right to present defensive evidence (see § 33.04 infra). This Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment right has been held to invalidate overly rigid state-law bars to the presentation of an accused’s version of the facts. Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973); Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979) (per curiam); Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986); Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987); Lunbery v. Hornbeak, 605 F.3d 754, 760-62 (9th Cir. 2010); Cudjo v. Ayers, 698 F.3d 752, 754-55, 762-68 (9th Cir. 2012).

§ 30.03(c)  Probative Weight Versus Prejudice

The trial judge has broad discretion to balance the probative weight of proffered evidence against its possible prejudicial impact. If evidence is very prejudicial, the judge may exclude it although it is probative and otherwise admissible within technical evidentiary rules. See, e.g., Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 127 (1974); United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45, 54 (1984); Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172, 180-85 (1997); Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. at 689-90 (dictum). Defense counsel should be quick to invoke this discretion against potentially misleading, inflammatory, or emotion-rousing prosecution evidence. See, e.g., United States v. Hale, 422 U.S. 171, 173, 180 (1975); United States v. Morgan, 786 F.3d 227, 232-33 (2d Cir. 2015); United States v. Vallejo, 237 F.3d 1008, 1017, as amended by 246 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2001) (“Agent Ajioka’s testimony concerning the structure and modus operandi of drug trafficking organizations was not relevant to the Government’s case against Vallejo. Nor was it needed to assist the jury’s understanding of a complex criminal case. Agent Ajioka testified to the different roles played by various members of drug trafficking organizations, and although he did not cast Vallejo in a particular role, the implication of his testimony was that Vallejo had knowledge of how the entire organization operated, and thus knew he was carrying the drugs. To admit this testimony on the issue of knowledge, the only issue in the case, was unfairly prejudicial, and an abuse of discretion under Rule 403.”); State v. Acker, 871 N.W.2d 603 (N.D. 2015) (reversing an aggravated-assault conviction because the trial judge failed to conduct a proper analysis of the probative/prejudice balance before allowing the prosecution to impeach the defendant with his prior conviction of a sex offense); State v. Brumbach, 273 Or. App. 552, 359 P.3d 490 (2015) (reversing a sexual abuse conviction because the trial judge failed to perform a probative/prejudice-balance analysis before allowing the prosecution to present evidence of the defendant’s commission of similar sexual offenses against the same child and other children); cf. Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231, 240-41 (1980).
The prosecution’s ability to invoke the probative/prejudice balance as a ground for excluding defense evidence is limited by the respondent’s federal constitutional rights to confrontation (see Blackston v. Rapelje, 780 F.3d 340, 357 (6th Cir. 2015), summarized in § 30.04(c) seventh paragraph infra) and to present a defense (see Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988), summarized in § 39.1 infra).

§ 30.04 HEARSAY AND CONFRONTATION

§ 30.04(a) Introduction: The Relationship Between Hearsay and Confrontation Clause Issues

Hearsay is traditionally defined as evidence of “‘a statement made out of court, the statement being offered as an assertion to show the truth of matters asserted therein, and thus resting for its value upon the credibility of the out-of-court asserter.’” Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530, 543 n.4 (1986) (quoting McCormick on Evidence § 246, p. 584 (2d ed. [Cleary] 1972)). The rules of evidence or appellate precedents in every State exclude hearsay generally but provide numerous, varying, and often complex exceptions to the ban.

In addition to these common-law hearsay rules, the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment, which is applicable to state trials through its incorporation into the Fourteenth Amendment, see Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400 (1965); Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415 (1965), bans prosecutorial proof of certain out-of-court statements in adult criminal trials. See, e.g., Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004); Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813 (2006); Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 557 U.S. 305, 324, 329 (2009);. The same confrontational protections are required in juvenile delinquency trials by the juvenile respondent’s due process right to a fair trial. See In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 56-57 (1967).

The restrictions established by the constitutional right are not necessarily coincident with the hearsay doctrine of any particular jurisdiction. See Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. at 50-51. Evidence admissible within a hearsay exception or loophole may violate the right to confrontation. Id. at 51. Conversely, an out-of-court statement that is “a good candidate for exclusion under [a jurisdiction’s] hearsay rules” will not invariably be subject to exclusion on federal Confrontation Clause grounds. Id.

When objecting to an attempt by a prosecutor to introduce an out-of-court statement, counsel should always clearly state whether the objection is based on the hearsay rule or the Confrontation Clause or both. In the event of a conviction, the failure to specify the grounds for the objection could result in a ruling on appeal that counsel failed to preserve the claim s/he intended to make. See, e.g., People v. Goldstein, 6 N.Y.3d 119, 126, 843 N.E.2d 727, 731-32, 810 N.Y.S.2d 100, 104-05 (2005) (declining to reach a hearsay issue because the defense only raised a Confrontation Clause challenge); People v. Lopez, 25 A.D.3d 385, 386, 808 N.Y.S.2d 648, 649 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2006) (defense counsel’s objection on hearsay grounds was insufficient to preserve a Confrontation Clause claim).
It is particularly important, whenever possible, to base an objection on the Confrontation Clause (in conjunction with a hearsay objection, where applicable). Counsel can thereby preserve a federal claim for postconviction review by the federal courts if it is rejected by the state courts. See §§ 39.02(a), 39.03(b) infra. Also, by invoking the Sixth Amendment Confrontation-Clause right, counsel can justify objections to many items of prosecution evidence that have traditionally been admissible under settled local hearsay doctrines. Because the federal caselaw was radically transformed in the wake of the Supreme Court’s 2004 Crawford decision, and will not shake down in detail for decades (see, e.g., the exegetic struggles reflected in Taylor v. State, 226 Md. App. 317, 130 A.3d 509 (2016)) – and because most state trial judges will be relatively unfamiliar with the voluminous, convoluted body of post-Crawford appellate caselaw – a judge who is not eager to undertake legal research or to risk reversible error may be inclined to give the defense the benefit of the doubt when ruling on Sixth Amendment objections. And, finally, unlike hearsay objections, Confrontation Clause objections invoke a source of law – the constitutional guarantee to criminal defendants and juvenile respondents of a right to confront their accusers – which applies only to the prosecution’s evidence, so they are less likely than hearsay objections to backfire and obstruct the presentation of the defense case.

When raising a Confrontation Clause claim, counsel should explicitly cite the state constitution in addition to the federal Sixth Amendment, so as to preserve a claim that the state constitutional confrontation right is broader than the federal. Cf. People v. Clay, 88 A.D.2d 14, 26-27, 926 N.Y.S.2d 598, 608-09 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2011) (rejecting a Confrontation Clause claim on federal constitutional grounds and then declining to consider whether a different result should be reached under the state constitution because “appellant does not argue that the State Constitution is more protective of the right of confrontation than the Federal Constitution”); State v. Moore, 334 Or. 328, 49 P.3d 785 (2002) (invoking the Oregon constitution and rejecting the U.S. Supreme Court’s pre-Crawford Sixth Amendment caselaw in requiring a declarant’s unavailability as a condition of admission of excited-utterance testimony); State v. McGriff, 76 Hawai’i 148, 156, 871 P.2d 782, 790 (1994) (under the Hawai’i Constitution “we have parted ways with the United States Supreme Court which has held [in its pre-Crawford decisions] that the sixth amendment confrontation clause does not necessitate a showing of unavailability for evidence falling within certain hearsay exceptions”).

§ 30.04(b) Hearsay

The hearsay rule says, generally, that a witness is not permitted to recount a statement made by anyone other than the witness – or, in a stricter version, a statement made by anybody, including the witness (except a statement that the witness has made earlier “while testifying at the current trial or hearing” (see Fed. Rule Evid. 801(c)(1)) – for the purpose of proving “the truth of the matter asserted in the statement” (Fed. Rule Evid. 801(c)(2)). “Statements” include oral and written utterances and communicative gestures. See id., Rule 801(a). The aim of the hearsay rule is to forbid the testimonial use of statements that are not made under oath, under the trier’s scrutiny and subject to cross examination. For this purpose, “testimonial use” means any use which depends upon crediting the assertions of the “declarant” (i.e., “the person who made the statement” (id., Rule 801(b))) as though the declarant were a witness, so that their capacity to prove a relevant fact stands or falls on the declarant’s believability. Statements offered for any other purpose than to prove the truth of the matter stated are not hearsay.

The hearsay rule is riddled with exceptions. Most of these are tailored to situations in which either (1) the circumstances under which some type of out-of-court statement is made are regarded as furnishing sufficient assurance of reliability so that the risks involved in admitting evidence without the ordinary safeguards of in-court presentation under oath and subject to plenary cross-examination are not exorbitant; or (2) other safeguards are thought to be available as substitutes for the ordinary ones; or (3) exclusion of the particular type of out-of-court statement would deprive the judicial process of a species of needed information for which there is no adequate substitute, and this consideration is thought to outweigh the risks of unreliability; or (4) there are thought to exist some assurances of reliability or some safeguards against undetectable unreliability (although these are not as effective as in categories (1) and (2) above), and there is some substantial need for the information which a particular type of out-of-court statement is uniquely able to supply (although the need is not as great as in category (3) above), so that, on balance of these considerations, exclusion would be inappropriate. The various hearsay exceptions developed by the common law for these reasons have been codified (and in some instances recast) in Federal Rules of Evidence 803 and 804. In many States, a statute or local rule essentially tracks the Federal Rules in defining the hearsay rule and its exceptions.

§ 30.04(b)(1) Defense Objection to Prosecution Evidence as Hearsay

The purpose and effect of the hearsay exceptions are to admit statements which are hearsay, to be used as such. But a hearsay statement is admissible within one of these exceptions only if and after evidence has been presented that establishes to the judge’s satisfaction the existence of each and every factual circumstance defined by the applicable subdivision of the rule as an element of the exception. In other words, a foundation must be laid for the admission of the statement by convincing the court to find as a fact that all of the conditions required by the terms of the exception have been met. Thus, if the prosecution is seeking to admit an out-of-court statement pursuant to an exception to the hearsay rule, counsel can insist that the prosecution present evidence which establishes such a foundation, and counsel can insist that the trial judge make a factual finding of the existence of all of the foundational elements. See, e.g., Tyrrell v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 97 N.Y.2d 650, 652, 762 N.E.2d 921, 922, 737 N.Y.S.2d 43, 44 (2001) (the trial court’s introduction of a hearsay statement as a spontaneous declaration and res gestae on the ground that “there was ‘no evidence to suggest that the statement was anything other than a spontaneous declaration’” had the effect of “improperly shift[ing] the burden of establishing the exception to the hearsay rule”); People v. Cummings, 31 N.Y.3d 204, 207, 212, 99 N.E.3d 877, 879-80, 883, 75 N.Y.S.3d 484 (2018) (the trial court improperly applied the “excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule” to grant the prosecution’s request to admit a 911 call recording in which an “unidentified speaker” in “the background can be faintly heard saying, ‘Yo, it was Twanek, man! It was Twanek, man!’”; “Because there is no evidence from which a reasonable inference can be drawn that the declarant personally observed the incident, admission of the statement heard in the background of the 911 call was error.”); see also id. at 214-16, 99 N.E.3d at 885-86 (Rivera, J., concurring) (raising the question whether the “excited utterance” exception to the hearsay rule “should be rejected whole cloth” “in light of advances in psychology and neuroscience that demonstrate an individual's inability to accurately recall facts when experiencing trauma, and, in turn, to create falsehoods immediately,” and discussing caselaw and legal scholarship that support the “cabin[ing], if not outright abandon[ment], [of] the exception”).

If the prosecution seeks to overcome a hearsay objection by asserting that a statement is not being offered “for the truth of the matter asserted” and thus is not “hearsay,” counsel may be able to counter that the court should find that, notwithstanding the prosecutor’s argument, the way in which the prosecution intends to use the statement at trial actually is for the truth. See, e.g., People v. Goldstein, 6 N.Y.3d at 127-28, 843 N.E.2d at 732-33, 810 N.Y.S.2d at 105-06 (although the prosecution claimed that statements at issue “were not offered to prove the[ir] truth,” the prosecution “obviously wanted and expected the jury to take the statements as true” and therefore the statements should be deemed as actually being “offered for their truth, and . . . [therefore] hearsay”).

If the court finds that the prosecution genuinely is seeking to use the out-of-court statement for a non-truth-showing purpose – or if counsel chooses not to challenge the prosecutor’s claimed intention in this regard – counsel can nonetheless argue against the admission of the statement on the grounds that (1) the facts which the prosecution claims are inferable from the making of the statement without regard to its truth are themselves irrelevant (see § 30.03(a) supra) or (2) that the probative value of those facts is substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice to the respondent, including the prejudice that will result if the statement is considered for its truth (see § 30.03(b) supra).

Of course, these various arguments should be made only if the defense would benefit from excluding the statement. If it would further the defense’s interest to have the statement in evidence, counsel presumably will forgo all such objections, allow the statement to be admitted, and then use it to advance the defense’s overall narrative and/or to undermine the prosecution’s.

For discussion of the hearsay exception for co-conspirators’ statements, see § 30.06(a) infra.

§ 30.04(b)(2) Anticipating Prosecution Objections to Defense Evidence as Hearsay

Whenever defense counsel wishes to present evidence of an out-of-court statement, s/he needs to anticipate a hearsay objection. The proffer of any hard-copy or electronic document or the enunciation of any sentence in the testimony of a defense witness that begins “He said” or “She said” may well draw a knee-jerk hearsay objection from the prosecutor or a knee-jerk exclusionary ruling (even without a prosecutorial objection) by the judge. Counsel must plan to get past this hurdle.

If the evidence comes squarely within the scope of a conventional hearsay exception – such as, for example, the business-records exception (see, e.g., Fed. Rule Evid. 803(6)) – counsel’s first and easiest route around the hurdle is to ask the prosecutor to stipulate to its admissibility. Most prosecutors will do so; and, if they do not, counsel can raise the matter at a pretrial conference with some confidence that the judge will be displeased by this wasteful stonewalling. See § 27.10 supra. Before going the stipulation route, however, defense counsel should consider whether s/he would gain some persuasive benefit from going through the motions of laying the foundation for the hearsay exception by the testimony of a witness or witnesses. If, for example, the witness who can be called to establish the elements of the business-records exception comes across as a model of crackerjack efficiency, his or her technical “foundation” testimony may also lend credibility to the contents of the record s/he produces.

If a stipulation is tactically unwise or is unobtainable, counsel must decide whether to attempt to get past the hearsay-objection hurdle by (1) taking the position that the out-of-court statement is not hearsay (because not offered for the truth), or (2) taking the position that the out-of-court statement is admissible within a hearsay exception, or (3) taking both positions. If s/he opts to take both positions, s/he should ordinarily respond to a prosecution objection by arguing position number (1) first and then proceeding on to position number (2). (By the time a lawyer has finished making a hearsay-exception argument, it will be obvious to the judge that counsel wants to get some truth-showing benefit from the evidence, and it will then not be easy to persuade the judge that counsel’s not-for-the-truth arguments are genuine.) If position number (1) fails, position number (2) may save the day; and if position number (1) succeeds, position number (2) may broaden counsel’s right to reason from the evidence in closing argument. (Should counsel prevail only on position number (1), the prosecution will be entitled in a jury trial to a jury instruction that the evidence is not to be considered for its truth.)

To prepare to defend position (1), counsel will need to go through an exhaustive analysis of (a) what ultimate facts are material (see § 30.03(a) third paragraph supra), and (b) what logical lines of reasoning could allow those facts to be inferred from the making or existence of the out-of-court statement without regard to its truth. Take this example: Counsel’s client, Daniel, is charged with the theft of money which was kept in a jar behind a stack of canned goods on a shelf in the convenience store where Daniel worked the afternoon shift as a counter attendant. The store-owner, who had not had occasion to go to the jar for several days, discovered it missing one morning. Neither the jar nor the money has been recovered. The prosecution’s case relies on the theory that Daniel was the only person other than the store-owner who knew that money was hidden in the store, plus the testimony of another employee, Willem, who worked the night shift. Willem will testify for the prosecution that Daniel had complained to Willem about “working seven days a week for piss-poor pay” and then bragged that he, Daniel, had “taught the cheapskate a lesson.” Counsel’s defense theory is that Willem was the real thief. Counsel wants to call a delivery-truck driver who made periodic evening stops at the store, to testify that, a few days before the theft, Willem told Driver that Daniel had told Willem that “the old man has got a wad of cash stashed somewhere in the store.” Counsel’s response to the prosecution’s hearsay objection is that this conversation is not being offered for the truth but (i) to discredit Willem’s testimony for bias, since Willem can escape suspicion himself by putting Daniel in the frame (cf.
Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988)); (ii) to show that Willem was as likely as Daniel to have stolen the money, since both had equal means and opportunity (cf. Holmes v. South Carolina, 547 U.S. 319 (2006)); and (iii) to defeat the prosecution’s premise that no one other than the store owner and Daniel knew about the cache of money in the store – since Willem had not only evinced such knowledge but shared it with a casual acquaintance and was no less likely to have talked about it to other people as well. As these contentions suggest, two of the most commonly available routes around a hearsay objection are “state of mind” arguments: – that the mere making of the statement (without considering whether it is true) furnishes circumstantial evidence of the existence of relevant knowledge, motive, intention or bias on the part of either the out-of-court speaker or those to whom s/he spoke.

To prepare to defend position (2) – that an out-of-court statement comes within a hearsay exception – counsel will need to drill a foundation witness to cover systematically all of the factual elements needed to bring the exception into play. To activate the business-records exception, for example, a defense witness will have to testify that: (i) s/he is the custodian of a set of records (ii) kept by a regularly conducted business or other organization, (iii) which maintains such records in the regular course of its activities, and (iv) that the particular record proffered was created and kept pursuant to that regular practice; and (v) was made at or near the time of the event or condition recorded, (vi) by a person with knowledge of the event or condition or from information transmitted by such a person. (Counsel may have to prove some of these elements circumstantially. Where – as is common – the original maker of a record is unavailable or has no recollection of making that particular record, elements (v) and (vi) can be established by having a witness who is familiar with the organization’s general record-making and record-filing procedures testify that records of this kind: (A) are made in the first instance contemporaneously with the occurrences recorded, and (B) only by individuals with personal knowledge or a first-hand report of those occurrences, and (C) are inscribed in a particular, conventional form, and (D) are retained in a particular form and location; and that (E) this record was retrieved from the usual location of such records and that (F) it displays the characteristic form of those records.) The need to attend to minutiae in foundation-laying means that, if counsel wants to produce an efficient-looking, non-boring performance, witness rehearsal is crucial. See § 10.09(c) supra.

§ 30.04(c) The Confrontation Clause

The Supreme Court has emphasized that a primary goal of the Confrontation Clause is not simply to “ensure reliability of [the prosecution’s] evidence” but to “command[ ] . . . that reliability be assessed in a particular manner: by testing in the crucible of cross-examination” (Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 61 (2004)). See also United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, Prior to the Crawford decision, Confrontation Clause claims were governed by a standard established in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), which permitted the admission of prosecution evidence that was not subject to cross-examination if the proffered evidence fell within a “‘firmly rooted hearsay exception’” or was shown to bear “‘particularized guarantees of trustworthiness’” (Crawford, 541 U.S. at 60 (quoting Roberts, 448 U.S. at 66)). In Crawford, the Court rejected this approach, explaining that “reliability” and “trustworthiness” cannot be the benchmarks of compliance with the Confrontation Clause because “we do not think the Framers meant to leave the Sixth Amendment’s protection to the vagaries of the rules of evidence, much less to amorphous notions of ‘reliability’” (541 U.S. at 61). Crawford’s new Sixth Amendment touchstone is a purportedly straightforward, bright-line rule barring prosecution evidence of any out-of-court “testimonial statement” unless (1) the declarant is “unavailable to testify” at trial, and (2) the defendant or juvenile respondent has had an adequate “prior opportunity for cross-examination” of the declarant (id. at 54; see also id. at 58, 59 & n.9, 68).

Although the Supreme Court has not as yet “spell[ed] out a comprehensive definition of [the term] ‘testimonial’” (id. at 68; see also id. at 68 n.10 (acknowledging that “our refusal to articulate a comprehensive definition in this case will cause interim uncertainty”)), the Court has made clear that the category of “testimonial statements” is a broad one, encompassing at least the following: testimony in a formal proceeding, such as “at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a former trial” (id. at 68); affidavits prepared for litigation (see id. at 51-52; see also, e.g., United States v. Duron-Caldera, 737 F.3d 988, 993-96 (5th Cir. 2013)); forensic analysis reports (such as, for example, a report in a drug sale or possession case that shows that “material seized by the police and connected to the defendant was [a controlled substance]”), at least where “the analysts’ [written] statements . . . [were] prepared specifically for use at . . . trial” (Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 557 U.S. 305, 324, 329 (2009)); statements made to the police by a suspect in the course of police interrogation (Crawford, 541 U.S. at 52-53, 68-69); and (except in circumstances explained in the second paragraph after this one) statements made to the police by a civilian witness at the scene of a crime, when the police arrive to investigate shortly after the crime was reported (see Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813, 829-32 (2006); Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. 344, 355-59 (2011) (dictum)). See also Commonwealth v. Brown, 2018 WL 2452643, at *9 (Pa. June 1, 2018) (dictum) (“Pennsylvania law requires the preparation of autopsy reports in all cases of sudden, violent, and suspicious deaths, or deaths by other than natural causes, and in such cases, the autopsy and subsequent report are designed to determine whether the death occurred as the result of a criminal act. . . . Moreover, the law requires the coroner or medical examiner charged with conducting and reporting the results of such autopsies to consult and advise the local district attorney to the extent practicable. . . . Accordingly, we determine the primary purpose for preparation of an autopsy report under these circumstances is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to a later criminal prosecution and that any person creating the report would reasonably believe it would be available for use at a later criminal trial. Thus, we conclude the autopsy report in this case was testimonial.”); Lambert v. Warden Greene SCI, 861 F.3d 459, 470 (3d Cir. 2017) (the prosecution’s use against Lambert of statements which Lambert’s co-defendant made to his defense psychiatrist prior to trial and which the psychiatrist recounted at trial in the co-defendant’s defense case, were “testimonial” for Confrontation Clause purposes even though the statements “were not made with the primary purpose of creating evidence for the prosecution” and were not “made with the intent to accuse”; “in the context of the joint trial, Lambert needs only to show that . . . [the co-defendant’s] statements to [the psychiatrist] . . . were made with the primary purpose of substituting for his in-court testimony about the crime”); State v. Swaney, 787 N.W.2d 541, 554 (Minn. 2010) (the Confrontation Clause applies not only to out-of-court statements of the nontestifying declarant but also to any “testimony that inescapably implies a nontestifying witness’s testimonial hearsay statement”); United States v. Charles, 722 F.3d 1319, 1320-21, 1330-31 (11th Cir. 2013) (the Confrontation Clause was violated by the admission of a Customs and Border Protection (CBP) officer’s “testimony of the interpreter’s statements of what [defendant] Charles said where Charles had no opportunity to cross-examine the interpreter” who “translated Charles’s Creole language statements into English during the CBP officer’s interrogation of Charles”).

The Supreme Court has “repeatedly reserved” the question “whether statements to persons other than law enforcement officers are subject to the Confrontation Clause” (Ohio v. Clark, 135 S. Ct. 2173, 2181 (2015); Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. at 357 n.3), although it has observed that “at least some statements to individuals who are not law enforcement officers could conceivably raise confrontation concerns” and it has therefore “decline[d] to adopt a categorical rule excluding them from the Sixth Amendment’s reach” (Ohio v. Clark, 135 S. Ct. at 2181). The Clark case says “[n]evertheless, [that] such statements are much less likely to be testimonial than statements to law enforcement officers” (id.), and it upholds the admission of out-of-court statements of a three-year-old child to his public-school teachers, identifying the defendant as his sexual abuser, on the ground that “neither the child nor his teachers had the primary purpose of assisting in . . . [a criminal] prosecution” (id. at 2177). “When . . . [the] teachers noticed . . . [the child’s] injuries, they rightly became worried that the 3-year-old was the victim of serious violence. Because the teachers needed to know whether it was safe to release . . . [him] to his guardian at the end of the day, they needed to determine who might be abusing the child.” Id. at 2181.

Thus far, the Court has definitively classified only one type of statement as falling outside the category of “testimonial” statements: “[s]tatements . . . made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency” (Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. at 822). See also id. (“Statements . . . are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution.”); Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. at 358 (“When, as in Davis v. Washington, the primary purpose of an interrogation is to respond to an ‘ongoing emergency,’ its purpose is not to create a record for trial and thus is not within the scope of the [Confrontation] Clause”). The judicial assessment of the “‘primary purpose of the interrogation’” should be made by “objectively evaluating the statements and actions of the parties to the encounter, in light of the circumstances in which the interrogation occurs” (Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. at 370). “[T]he existence vel non of an ongoing emergency” at the time of the police questioning is not “dispositive of the testimonial inquiry”; “whether an ongoing emergency exists is simply one factor” (id. at 366); but it is “among the most important circumstances informing the ‘primary purpose’ of an interrogation” (id. at 361) because “statements made to assist police in addressing an ongoing emergency presumably lack the testimonial purpose that would subject them to the requirement of confrontation” (id. at 370). “[T]he existence and duration of an emergency depend on the type and scope of danger posed to the victim, the police, and the public.” Id. at 370-71. Compare Davis, 547 U.S. at 827-28 (holding that a portion of a civilian witness’s statements to a 911 operator during the course of a 911 telephone call was nontestimonial because “the circumstances of . . . [the complainant’s] interrogation [by the 911 operator] objectively indicate . . . [that the interrogation’s] primary purpose was to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency,” in that the complainant “was speaking about events as they were actually happening, rather than ‘describ[ing] past events’”; “any reasonable listener would recognize that [the complainant] . . . was facing an ongoing emergency”; the complainant’s “call was plainly a call for help against bona fide physical threat”; “the nature of what was asked and answered . . . viewed objectively, was such that the elicited statements were necessary to be able to resolve the present emergency, rather than simply to learn . . . what had happened in the past”; and the complainant’s “frantic answers were provided over the phone, in an environment that was not tranquil, or even (as far as any reasonable 911 operator could make out) safe.”), with id. at 829-30 (holding, in the companion case of Hammon v. Indiana, that an in-person statement to the police by the complainant in a domestic disturbance at her home was “testimonial” because “[t]here was no emergency in progress”; the officer “was not seeking to determine (as in [the companion case,] Davis) ‘what is happening,’ but rather ‘what happened’”; and the statement “recounted, in response to police questioning, how potentially criminal past events began and progressed.”), and with Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. at 371-78 (a mortally wounded shooting victim’s statement to the police, in which the victim identified the shooter and described the location of the shooting, was not “testimonial” because “the circumstances of the encounter [between the victim and the police] as well as the statements and actions of [the victim] and the police objectively indicate that the ‘primary purpose of the interrogation’” was “‘to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency’”: “there was an ongoing emergency here where an armed shooter, whose motive for and location after the shooting were unknown, had mortally wounded [the victim] within a few blocks and a few minutes of the location where the police found [the victim]”; the victim’s “encounter with the police and all of the statements he made during that interaction occurred within the first few minutes of the police officers’ arrival and well before they secured the scene of the shooting – the shooter’s last known location”; the victim was “lying in a gas station parking lot bleeding from a mortal gunshot wound to his abdomen” and “[h]is answers to the police officers’ questions were punctuated with questions about when emergency medical services would arrive,” and thus it cannot be said that “a person in [his] situation would have had a ‘primary purpose’ ‘to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution’”; the questions asked by the officers were “the exact type of questions necessary to . . . solicit[ ] the information necessary to enable them ‘to meet an ongoing emergency’”; and “[n]othing in [the victim’s] responses indicated to the police that, contrary to their expectation upon responding to a call reporting a shooting, there was no emergency or that a prior emergency had ended.”), and with Ohio v. Clark, 135 S. Ct. at 2181-82 (where, as summarized in the preceding paragraph, “the immediate concern was to protect a vulnerable child who needed help. . . . As in [Michigan v.] Bryant, the emergency in this case was ongoing, and the circumstances were not entirely clear. . . . [The child]’s teachers were not sure who had abused him or how best to secure his safety. Nor were they sure whether any other children might be at risk. As a result, their questions and . . . [the child]’s answers were primarily aimed at identifying and ending the threat. . . [by] identify[ing] the abuser in order to protect the victim from future attacks. . . . There is no indication that the primary purpose of the conversation was to gather evidence for . . . [the defendant’s] prosecution. On the contrary, it is clear that the first objective was to protect . . . [the child].”)

901

See, e.g., McCarley v. Kelly, 801 F.3d 652, 664-65 (6th Cir. 2015) (out-of-court statements by the murder victim’s three-year-old son to a child psychologist, which were made during clinical interviews, were “testimonial” because “they were deliberately elicited in an interrogation-like atmosphere absent an ongoing emergency and used to prove past events in a later criminal prosecution”: “Because Dr. Lord was questioning D.P. about the night of his mother’s murder and reporting everything D.P. said that might be relevant to the investigation back to Lt. Karabatsos, Dr. Lord was acting more as a police interrogator than a child psychologist engaged in private counseling.”; “D.P.’s statements to Dr. Lord occurred long after – ten days, to be precise – any emergency situation had passed.”; “The lieutenant unambiguously stated that his ‘main concern’ and the ‘main reason’ for D.P.’s sessions with Dr. Lord ‘was to try to get the information’ that police personnel could not elicit from D.P. – including the identity of the suspects – so that Lt. Karabatsos ‘could use it in [his] investigation.’”); State in the Interest of J.A., 195 N.J. 324, 329, 347, 348, 949 A.2d 790, 792, 803, 804 (2008) (statements by a witness to a police officer, “describing a robbery committed ten minutes earlier and his pursuit of the robbers,” were “testimonial” and admitted in violation of the Confrontation Clause because “a declarant’s narrative to a law enforcement officer about a crime, which once completed has ended any ‘imminent danger’ to the declarant or some other identifiable person, is testimonial”). “In addition to the circumstances in which an encounter occurs, the statements and actions of both the declarant and interrogators provide objective evidence of the primary purpose of the interrogation. . . . Th[is] combined approach [of “account[ing] for both the declarant and the interrogator”] . . . ameliorates problems that could arise from looking solely to one participant. Predominant among these is the problem of mixed motives on the part of both interrogators and declarants.” Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. at 367-68. See, e.g., id. at 375 (neither the police nor the declarant “had a ‘primary purpose’ ‘to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution’”); Ohio v. Clark, 135 S. Ct. at 2177. The Supreme Court has cautioned that even when a 911 call or in-person conversation with the police “begins as an interrogation to determine the need for emergency assistance” and is therefore initially nontestimonial, the exchange with the police can “‘evolve into testimonial statements,’ . . . once that purpose [of dealing with the emergency] has been achieved” (Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. at 828). See also id. at 828-29 (“[i]t could readily be maintained that” portions of the 911 call that followed the portion the Court classified as nontestimonial should be deemed “testimonial” because they followed the point at which “the emergency appears to have ended” and involved “a battery of questions” by the 911 operator). Thus, the Court has recognized that it may sometimes be necessary for judges to use an “in limine procedure . . . to redact or exclude the portions of any statement that have become testimonial, as . . . [judges] do, for example, with unduly prejudicial portions of otherwise admissible evidence” (id. at 829). Regarding in limine procedures and redaction, see §§ 7.03, 27.12(c), 30.02(a), 30.02(b) supra.

In dicta, the Court has identified some other types of statements that may be non-testimonial for purposes of Crawford:

- “Business and public records . . . created for the administration of an entity’s affairs and not for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact at trial” may be non-testimonial (Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 557 U.S. 305, 324 (2009) (dictum)). See also id. at 311 n.1; Crawford, 541 U.S. at 56. But the Court has made clear that a “business or official record[ ]” is “testimonial” if it was “prepared specifically for use at . . . trial” – as is the case, for example, when the prosecution seeks to “prove its case via ex parte out-of-court affidavits” of forensic analysts (Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 557 U.S. at 324, 329). Accord, Bullcoming v. New Mexico, 564 U.S. 647, 652 (2011) (the Confrontation Clause prevents the prosecution from “introduc[ing] a forensic laboratory report containing a testimonial certification – made for the purpose of proving a particular fact – through the in-court testimony of a scientist who did not sign the certification or perform or observe the test reported in the certification”; “[t]he accused’s right is to be confronted with the analyst who made the certification, unless that analyst is unavailable at trial, and the accused had an opportunity, pretrial, to cross-examine that particular scientist.”); Bullcoming v. New Mexico, 564 U.S. 647, 652 (2011) (the Confrontation Clause prevents the prosecution from “introduc[ing] a forensic laboratory report containing a testimonial certification – made for the purpose of proving a particular fact – through the in-court testimony of a scientist who did not sign the certification or perform or observe the test reported in the certification”; “[t]he accused’s right is to be confronted with the analyst who made the certification, unless that analyst is unavailable at trial, and the accused had an opportunity, pretrial, to cross-examine that particular scientist.”); Martin v. State, 60 A.3d 1100, 1102-09 (Del. 2013); State v. Navarette, 294 P.3d 435, 436 (N.M. 2013). Compare Williams v. Illinois, 567 U.S. 50 (2012) (affirming a lower court’s rejection of a Confrontation Clause challenge to the admission of a testifying expert witness’s reference to information in a forensic report prepared by a different, non-testifying expert, but announcing this ruling without attaining a majority on the rationale: a plurality opinion, authored by Justice Alito and joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Kennedy and Breyer, concluded that there was no Confrontation Clause violation because the “report itself was neither admitted into evidence nor shown to the [judicial] factfinder” in the bench trial (id. at 62); the testifying expert “did not quote or read from the report” or “identify it as the source of any of the opinions she expressed” (id.); and the judicial fact-finder could be relied upon to understand that the statement could not be “consider[ed] . . . for its truth” (id. at 79); a dissenting opinion by Justice Kagan, joined by Justices Scalia, Ginsburg and Sotomayor, concluded that the challenged statement “went to its truth” and therefore was inadmissible (see id. at 126); Justice Thomas, who concurred in the plurality’s judgment, thereby providing a fifth vote for affirming the lower court’s ruling, stated that he “share[d] the dissent’s view” that the “statements were introduced for their truth” (id. at 103, 109); he apparently agreed, also, that testimonial statements introduced for their truth are constitutionally barred at a bench trial (id. at 106 n.1), but he nonetheless joined the plurality in affirming the conviction because of his view that unsworn forensic reports like the one at issue in Williams “lack[ ] the requisite ‘formality and solemnity’ to be considered “‘testimonial’” for purposes of the Confrontation Clause.” (id. at 103), with United States v. James, 712 F.3d 79, 94-96, 99, 102 (2d Cir. 2013) (concluding that “[n]o single rationale disposing of the Williams case enjoys the support of a majority of the Justices” and therefore it is necessary to view Williams as “confined to the particular set of facts presented in that case” and to continue to “rely on Supreme Court precedent before Williams”; the court of appeals applies the pre-Williams rule to hold that autopsy and toxicology reports that were challenged on Confrontation Clause grounds were not “testimonial” because they were “not prepared primarily to create a record for use at a criminal trial.”), and Jenkins v. United States, 75 A.3d 174 (D.C. 2013) (agreeing with the Second Circuit that “the splintered decision in Williams, which failed to produce a common view shared by at least five Justices, creates no new rule of law that we can apply in this case” (id. at 176) and that it is therefore necessary to continue to follow “pre-Williams precedent in the Supreme Court and in our own jurisdiction” (id. at 189); the D.C. Court of Appeals applies its pre-Williams precedent to hold that the trial court violated the Confrontation Clause by “permit[ting] the government to present the entirety of its DNA evidence through the testimony of a single expert witness (id. at 176) – a “forensic examiner” in the “FBI DNA Analysis Unit” who “does not perform the tests on the biological material himself but, rather, is assisted by [b]iologists or technicians who actually perform the hands-on part of the testing” or ‘DNA typing’ in the laboratory” (id. at 190) – “without making available for cross-examination the laboratory analysts who performed the underlying serological and DNA laboratory work” (id. at 176), where the “serology and DNA testing was conducted for the primary purpose of establishing some fact relevant to a later criminal prosecution.” (id. at 191)). See also United States v. Duron-Caldera, 737 F.3d at 994 n.4 (“In Williams, there is no common denominator between the plurality opinion and Justice Thomas’s concurring opinion. Neither of these opinions can be viewed as a logical subset of the other . . . As Williams does not yield a ‘narrowest’ holding that enjoys the support of five Justices, it does not provide a controlling rule useful to resolving this case.”); Commonwealth v. Tassone, 468 Mass. 391, 392, 399-402, 11 N.E.3d 67, 68, 72-75 (2014) (applying the State’s “common law of evidence” to hold that “an opinion regarding the results of DNA testing is admissible only where the defendant has a meaningful opportunity to cross-examine the expert witness about the reliability of the underlying data produced by such testing,” and that “[h]ere, the defendant was deprived of a meaningful opportunity for such cross-examination because the analysts who generated the DNA profiles through DNA testing did not testify at trial, and the expert witness who offered the opinion of a match had no affiliation with the laboratory that tested the crime scene sample.”).

“[A] clerk’s certificate authenticating an official record – or a copy thereof – for use as evidence” may be non-testimonial, but “a clerk’s certificate attesting to the fact that the clerk had searched for a particular relevant record and failed to find it . . . [in a case in which the defendant’s] guilt depend[s] on the nonexistence of the record for which the clerk searched” is testimonial (Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 557 U.S. at 322-23). See also United States v. Martinez-Rios, 595 F.3d 581, 585-86 (5th Cir. 2010); State v.

- Statements by a co-conspirator made during and in furtherance of the conspiracy may be non-testimonial. See Crawford, 541 U.S. at 56; see also id. at 58 (discussing Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987)). See also § 30.06(a) infra.

- Some “dying declarations” may be non-testimonial. Compare Crawford, 541 U.S. at 56 n.6 (“many dying declarations may not be testimonial”) with Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. at 395-96 (Justice Ginsburg, dissenting) (“Were the issue properly tendered here, I would take up the question whether the exception for dying declarations survives our recent Confrontation Clause decisions.”). But see, e.g., United States v. Mayhew, 380 F. Supp. 2d 961, 965 & n.5 (S.D. Ohio 2005) (rejecting the prosecution’s argument that “dying declarations are an exception to the Confrontation Clause”).

Like the hearsay rule, “[t]he Confrontation Clause prohibits an out-of-court statement only if it is admitted for its truth” (Woods v. Etherton, 136 S. Ct. 1149, 1152 (2016)). In cases in which the prosecution seeks to evade the protections of the Clause by asserting that a statement is not being offered “for the truth of the matter asserted,” the defense often will be able to challenge the validity of that claim. See, e.g., People v. Hopson, 3 Cal. 5th 424, 425-26, 433-34, 396 P.3d 1054, 1056, 1061, 219 Cal. Rptr. 3d 717, 719, 725 (2017) (the prosecutor’s introduction into evidence of an out-of-court statement, purportedly for a non-truth purpose, violated the Confrontation Clause because “the jury was never informed of the limited nonhearsay purpose for which . . . [the out-of-court statement] was ostensibly admitted, and, critically, the prosecution did not use . . . [the out-of-court statement] for any such limited purpose” and instead used it “for its truth”); People v. Goldstein, 6 N.Y.3d 119, 127-28, 843 N.E.2d 727, 732-33, 810 N.Y.S.2d 100, 105-06 (2005) (rejecting the prosecution’s argument that the Confrontation Clause did not apply to a prosecution psychiatrist’s testimony about hearsay statements underlying her diagnosis which “were not offered to establish their truth” and were offered merely to “help the jury in evaluating . . . [the psychiatrist’s] opinion”: “Since the prosecution’s goal was to buttress . . . [the psychiatrist’s] opinion, the prosecution obviously wanted and expected the jury to take the statements as true,” and therefore the statements must be deemed to have been offered for the truth.). See also Lambert v. Warden Greene SCI, 861 F.3d 459, 470 (3d Cir. 2017) (“Because the[ ] [challenged out-of-court] statements were testimonial, we next determine if the prosecution used them for the truth asserted therein . . . . In making this determination, we are not to accept the prosecution’s ‘not-for-truth’ rationale at face value, but instead must determine if there is a “‘legitimate, non hearsay purpose,’” Williams [v. Illinois], 132 S. Ct. at 2257 (Thomas, J., concurring) . . . (emphasis in text), by ‘thoroughly examin[ing] the use of the out-of-court [statements] and the efficacy of a limiting instruction.’”); United States v. Nelson, 725 F.3d 615, 620 (6th Cir. 2013) (rejecting the government’s argument, in the context of a non-constitutional hearsay issue, that the content of a 911 call was “offered not for the truth of the matter asserted, but rather to show why the officers acted as they did”: “[c]ontrary to the Government’s position, the police officers’ testimony about the 911 call . . . was effectively offered to prove the truth of the statements made” and was “thereby inadmissible” under Fed. Rule Evid. 802.). Even if the judge accepts the prosecution’s characterization of the statement as not being offered for the “truth of the matter asserted,” defense counsel may be able to lodge a follow-up objection to the proffered evidence on the ground that the non-truth purpose for which the prosecution is seeking to admit the evidence is irrelevant or that the probative value of the evidence for that purpose is substantially outweighed by the prejudicial risk that the trier will impermissibly credit the evidence for its truth (see §§ 30.03(a), 30.03(c), 30.04(b)(1) third paragraph supra).

If the statement the prosecution seeks to admit is a “testimonial” statement by an unavailable witness that is offered “for the truth of the matter,” then Crawford requires its exclusion unless the defense has had an adequate “prior opportunity for cross-examination” (Crawford, 541 U.S. at 68). In cases in which there was a probable-cause hearing and defense counsel cross-examined the now-unavailable prosecution witness at that hearing, the prosecutor may claim that the defense has had the requisite prior opportunity for cross-examination of the witness. But Crawford presupposes an adequate opportunity to “test” the reliability of a witness’s account in the “crucible of cross-examination” (see id. at 61), and usually probable-cause hearings are too limited in scope and depth to substitute for a full-blown, wide-ranging cross-examination at trial. See, e.g., People v. Fry, 92 P.3d 970, 972 (Colo. 2004); State v. Nofoa, 135 Hawai‘i 220, 230-34, 349 P.3d 327, 337-41 (2015); People v. Torres, 2012 IL 111302, 962 N.E.2d 919, 932-34, 357 Ill. Dec. 18, 31-33 (2012); State v. Stuart, 279 Wis. 2d 659, 672-76, 695 N.W.2d 259, 265-67 (2005). Cf. Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. at 546 n.6 (the State’s argument that the accused “was afforded an opportunity to cross-examine [the author of the out-of-court statement] . . . during the suppression hearing” and that this opportunity satisfied the Confrontation Clause is rejected by the Court because the limited nature of the inquiry at a suppression hearing precluded an “opportunity for cross-examination sufficient to satisfy the demands of the Confrontation Clause”); and see Corona v. State, 64 So. 3d 1232, 1241 (Fla. 2011) (discovery depositions, available to the defense in criminal cases under state rules, “do not meet Crawford’s cross-examination requirement” of “afford[ing] [the accused] an adequate opportunity to cross-examine the . . . declarant” because, inter alia, such depositions are “‘not designed as an opportunity to engage in adversarial testing of the evidence against the defendant,’” and they are admissible at trial solely “‘for purposes of impeachment’” and not as “‘substantive evidence’”); Blackston v. Rapelje, 780 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2015) (the defendant’s first conviction was vacated and he was retried. “Before the second trial was held, two of the state’s key witnesses recanted their testimony. Because those witnesses were later determined to be unavailable at the new trial, the court ordered their earlier testimony read to the jury, while at the same time denying Blackston the right to impeach their testimony with evidence of their subsequent recantations.” Id. at 344. “The Michigan Supreme Court found, and the state argues, that Simpson and Zantello were confronted adequately at the first trial and that further impeachment based on the recantations would be ‘largely cumulative.’ . . . ¶ We conclude that the difference between the recantations and the impeachment at the first trial was one of kind, not degree, and that the state court was objectively unreasonable in concluding otherwise.” Id. at 354-55. “Finally, whether or not the state courts were justified in some ‘skeptic[ism]’ of Zantello’s and Simpson’s reliability, it was plainly a misapplication of Rule 403 [the applicable probative/prejudice balance rule (see § 30.03(c) supra)] to prevent the jury from hearing the recantations on that basis. The Confrontation Clause . . . applies regardless of whether the judge is swayed personally by the material’s substantive persuasiveness. Nor are mere reliability concerns under Rule 403 the sort of ‘paramount’ state interests that would allow the exclusion of evidence, let alone trump a defendant’s confrontation rights.” Id. at 357).
“engag[ed] in conduct designed to prevent the witness from testifying” and with the express “intent[ion] to prevent [the] . . . witness from testifying” (id. at 358-59, 368). See also, e.g., People v. Burns, 494 Mich. 104, 115-17, 832 N.W.2d 738, 745-46 (2013) (evidence that the defendant “instructed” his infant daughter “‘not to tell’ anyone [about the alleged abuse] and warned her that if she told, she would ‘get in trouble’” did not justify a finding of forfeiture of the Confrontation Clause by wrongdoing because the “defendant’s contemporaneous statements to CB are as consistent with the inference that defendant’s intention was that the alleged abuse go undiscovered as they are with an inference that defendant specifically intended to prevent CB from testifying”). Many jurisdictions have established standards for determining whether an accused’s actions in procuring the absence of a prosecution witness should be deemed to forfeit the protections of the jurisdiction’s hearsay rule, but often these standards address only the hearsay rule and do not address the distinct question of what standards and procedures govern a claim of forfeiture under the Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause. See, e.g., United States v. Scott, 284 F.3d 758, 762 (7th Cir. 2002).

A few lower courts have permitted the introduction of an out-of-court statement, notwithstanding a Confrontation Clause violation, if “the defendant opened the door to the admission of limited testimonial statements as necessary to clarify, rebut, or complete a particular issue, such as questions concerning the adequacy of a police investigation.” People v. Hopson, 3 Cal. 5th at 440, 396 P.3d at 1065, 219 Cal. Rptr. at 730 (dictum). See id. at 440-42, 396 P.3d at 1065-67, 219 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 730-32 (surveying caselaw on the issue). But those courts that have adopted such “an opening the door exception to the confrontation right have recognized it must be a limited one, lest the exception swallow the usual confrontation rule” (id. at 439, 396 P.3d at 1065, 219 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 730). See id. at 442, 396 P.3d at 1067, 219 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 732 (describing rulings to this effect in other jurisdictions and holding that “[s]imilarly, here, if the [prosecution’s] goal [in introducing a confession by a non-testifying co-perpetrator] were simply to correct an incomplete and misleading impression [by the defendant in her testimony] that . . . [the co-perpetrator’s] statements to defendant were the only statements that . . . [he] made about the crime, it would have sufficed to confirm that . . . [the co-perpetrator] later gave police a statement, ‘without the need to go into the damning details’ of what he said.”).

Crawford’s prohibition against the admission of out-of-court, inculpatory, testimonial statements is not limited to cases in which the prosecution offers the text of the statement verbatim. Testimony paraphrasing the statement, describing its contents, characterizing its purport, or otherwise conveying to the trier of fact the incriminating thrust of the statement also violates a respondent’s Confrontation Clause rights under Crawford. See, e.g., Ocampo v. Vail, 649 F.3d 1098, 1108-13 (9th Cir. 2011) and cases cited (“Our conclusion is that before Crawford it was clearly established that testimony from which one could determine the critical content of the out-of-court statement was sufficient to trigger Confrontation Clause concerns, and that, far from undermining that standard, Crawford established principles with which that aspect of the pre-Crawford Confrontation Clause jurisprudence are fully consistent.” Id. at 1108. “[I]t would be an unreasonable application of the core Confrontation Clause principle underlying Crawford to allow police officers to testify to the substance of an unavailable witness’s testimonial statements as long as they do so descriptively rather than verbatim or in detail.” Id. at 1109.); State v. Swaney, 787 N.W.2d 541, 554 (Minn. 2010) (the Confrontation Clause applies not only to out-of-court statements of the nontestifying declarant but also to any “testimony that inescapably implies a nontestifying witness’s testimonial hearsay statement”).

§ 30.05 COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES

Delinquency cases often arise out of altercations between children. The complainant or witnesses to the offense may be so young that their competency to testify comes into question. “A number of States . . . mandate by statute that a trial judge assess a child’s competency to testify on the basis of specified requirements. These usually include a determination that the child is capable of expression, is capable of understanding the duty to tell the truth, and is capable of receiving just impressions of the facts about which he or she is called to testify.” Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. 730, 742 n.12 (1987) (citing to representative statutes). “Some States explicitly allow children to testify without requiring a prior competency qualification, while others simply provide that all persons, including children, are deemed competent unless otherwise limited by statute.” Id.

Most States that provide for competency inquiries follow the general rule that “‘[t]here is no precise age which determines the question of competency [and that] . . . [t]his depends on the capacity and intelligence of the child, his appreciation of the difference between truth and falsehood, as well as of his duty to tell the former.’” Id. at 741 n.11 (quoting Wheeler v. United States, 159 U.S. 523, 524 (1895)). Some States, however, specify that children below a certain age are presumptively incompetent. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 343.1(2) (2018) (“[a] witness less than nine years old may not testify under oath unless the court is satisfied that he or she understands the nature of an oath”); People v. Carrington, 18 Misc.3d 1147(A), 859 N.Y.S.2d 897, 2008 WL 650055, at *8 (N.Y. Cty. Court, Westchester Cty. 2008) (granting the defendant’s motion to dismiss the indictment because the court finds, “[b]ased upon an in-camera review of the grand jury minutes, the child’s videotaped testimony, court file, motion papers and case law, . . . that the prosecutor improperly allowed the seven (7) year old child [witness] to testify as if under oath” and “there is no other corroborating evidence, on this record, that was presented to the Grand Jury”).

The inquiry into competency usually takes the form of a voir dire, conducted when the child witness takes the stand (in some jurisdictions after the child has been administered the oath, in other jurisdictions as a prerequisite for the administration of the oath). If the child is a witness whom the prosecution seeks to present at trial, the qualifying questions are asked by either the prosecutor or the judge, and defense counsel is afforded the opportunity to cross-examine; if the child is a defense witness, either defense counsel or the judge will ask the qualifying questions, and the prosecutor will be allowed to cross-examine. “Children often are asked their names, where they go to school, how old they are, whether they know who the judge is, whether they know what a lie is, and whether they know what happens when one tells a lie.” Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. at 741. See also Harris v. Thompson, 698 F.3d 609, 640-43 (7th Cir. 2012) (recognizing that in cases in which the defense plans to present a child witness who will be subject to a competency inquiry, defense counsel’s preparation for the competency hearing should include at least the following: “[i]nterviewing . . . [the child witness] in advance . . . to familiarize . . . [the child] with the types of questions he would be asked” at the hearing; “anticipat[ing] the State’s approach in challenging competency”; and “developing a rapport with an understandably nervous and reticent child”).

In a jury trial, when defense counsel plans to challenge the competency of a child witness called by the prosecution, counsel should request that the voir dire on competency be held out of the presence of the jury. This request should be made at a pretrial conference or at the outset of the trial, before the jurors are brought in. See §§ 27.10, 29.02. Jurors will not take well to watching a defense attorney interrogate a child and succeed in excluding his or her testimony.

In cross-examining a child witness on voir dire for the purpose of showing that the witness is not competent to testify, counsel should consider exploring the following lines of cross-examination: (a) whether the child has told lies to his or her parent or other relatives or friends without the other individual ever finding out that s/he told a lie (this question can serve as a lead-in to the ultimate inquiry whether the child understands that lying is wrong; if the ultimate question is asked without a run-up, it is likely to get a canned affirmative answer); (b) if the child is very young, whether s/he believes that certain cartoon characters s/he watches on television are “real”; (c) what grade level s/he is in at school, whether s/he is in special education, and what types of grades s/he receives (for the purpose of arguing that the witness’s educational deficits impair his or her competency to testify to a greater extent than his or her age alone would); and (d) whether the child has been coached by the prosecutor on what to say in the competency inquiry. See, e.g., In re J.M., 2006 WL 649627, at *5 (Ohio App. March 16, 2006) (the trial court abused its discretion by deeming the 12-year-old complainant to be competent to testify, based on routine voir dire questions and without thoroughly “delving . . . into the key issue of competency,” despite “indications that [the witness] was in special education classes, that she had and continued to have imaginary friends, that she had at least one past diagnosis of schizophrenia, and that her ability to recollect even routine information such as the day, month, and year was severely limited”); cf. Perry v. Commonwealth, 390 S.W.3d 122, 127-28 (Ky. 2013) (the trial court violated “due process and fundamental fairness” by denying the defense’s motion for “an independent psychological evaluation” of the child complainant, which “raised the issue of [the child complainant’s] competency to testify in light of possible mental problems and effects of the psychotropic drugs he was taking” and “argued that [the child complainant] did not know the difference between truth and a lie”).

§ 30.06 CO-RESPONDENTS’, CO-CONSPIRATORS’, AND OTHER ACCOMPlices’ STATEMENTS

§ 30.06(a) Admissibility of Co-conspirators’ Declarations

Section 30.04(c) supra explained the general operation of the hearsay rule and its exceptions. A hearsay exception that is frequently invoked in criminal trials and sometimes in delinquency trials is a particularized version of the rule admitting out-of-court declarations of a party’s agent against the party. For purposes of this rule, co-conspirators are treated as mutual agents, and declarations made by one conspirator in furtherance of the conspiracy are admissible against others. In most jurisdictions the principle is applied to admit these hearsay declarations once a prima facie showing of conspiracy is made, whether or not conspiracy has been formally charged against the defendant or respondent. As noted in § 30.04(c) fifth paragraph supra, the Supreme Court has not yet resolved the question of whether statements by a co-conspirator made during and in furtherance of the conspiracy are non-testimonial and thus outside the ambit of Confrontation Clause protections. See Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 56 (2004); see also id. at 58 (discussing Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987)).

When dealing with a prosecutor’s invocation of the special rules for co-conspirators’ declarations, counsel should keep in mind that:

(1) A condition of the admissibility of a co-conspirator’s declaration is that a prima facie showing of conspiracy has been made. It is not sufficient that the declarant and respondent are each charged as principals to the same offense. Conspiratorial agreement must appear. E.g., People v. Bac Tran, 80 N.Y.2d 170, 603 N.E.2d 950, 589 N.Y.S.2d 845 (1992); Jenkins v. United States, 80 A.3d 978 (D.C. 2013).

(2) The co-conspirator’s declarations are admissible only if made within the duration of the conspiracy. Arrest of a conspirator is ordinarily viewed as terminating the conspiracy, or at least the arrested conspirator’s part in it, for this purpose. The frequently heard prosecutorial contention that a criminal conspiracy implies a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal the crime and that the latter endures the dissolution of the former upon completion of the criminal exercise or apprehension of the conspirator has been rejected in federal criminal trials by the Supreme Court. Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440 (1949). Although the Court refused in Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74 (1970), to constitutionalize the Krulewitch rule as an inflexible canon of Sixth Amendment Confrontation law, the Dutton decision is badly muddled by multiple opinions and multiple grounds, leaving open the strong possibility that at least some of the more extreme extensions of the States’ “co-conspirator” doctrines will be held unconstitutional. A dicitum in Bourjaily v. United States, supra, glosses Dutton as permitting post-arrest co-conspirators’ declarations only upon a showing of particularized “indicia of reliability.” See Bourjaily, 483 U.S. at 183 (characterizing Dutton as holding that a “reliability inquiry [is] required where [the state] evidentiary rule deviates from [the] common-law approach, admitting co-conspirators’ hearsay statements made after termination of [the] conspiracy”). And the reasoning of United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986), plainly implies that the co-conspirator’s unavailability at the time of trial must be shown as well. The States obviously cannot be free to treat the suppositious “concealment phase” of a conspiracy as continuing through the time of trial (although its logic goes that far), since this would nullify the holdings of Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968), and Roberts v. Russell, 392 U.S. 293 (1968), and of Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530 (1986) (discussed in § 18.10(a) supra, and in § 30.06(b) infra). It remains to be seen where the constitutional line will be drawn between Dutton and Bruton. Crawford’s reinvention of Sixth Amendment Confrontation jurisprudence is a wild card in this calculus. See § 30.04(c) supra. In the meantime the very uncertainty of that line provides a persuasive argument that the state courts should adopt the safe and readily administrable Krulewitch rule – that all postarrest declarations of a conspirator are inadmissible against co-conspirators – as a matter of state law. See, e.g., State v. Rivenbark, 311 Md. 147, 152-60, 533 A.2d 271, 273-77 (1987).

Even if made during the conspiracy, a declaration is inadmissible unless made to further the aims of the conspiracy. The rule of thumb, used by a number of trial judges, that admits any statement of a conspirator before dissolution of the conspiracy is erroneous. Co-conspirators’ statements are admissible only “when made in the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy,” Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. at 183 (emphasis added). See, e.g., State v. Anders, 331 S.C. 474, 503 S.E.2d 443 (1998).

§ 30.06(b) Admissibility of Co-respondents’ Declarations at a Joint Trial

Section 18.10(a) supra describes the Bruton doctrine, which governs adult criminal cases in which the prosecution offers evidence of a co-defendant’s out-of-court statements implicating the defendant. As explained there, in any trial in which the co-defendant will not testify, Bruton effectuates the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to confront and cross-examine the co-defendant as a declarant by requiring either severance of the co-defendant’s trial or redaction of the statements to eliminate any reference to the defendant. As § 18.10(a) further explains, some state courts have held that the Bruton rule does not apply in juvenile delinquency bench trials. Such rulings typically are based on the rationale that a judicial trier of fact is capable of applying the co-respondent’s confession solely to the determination of the co-respondent’s guilt. But Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530 (1986), provides a basis for challenging that premise and urging that Bruton should extend to bench trials. See, again, section 18.10(a).

If the judge at a joint bench trial does permit the introduction of a co-respondent’s statement implicating the respondent, it is clear that any “use [of the] hearsay evidence as substantive evidence against the [respondent]” (Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. at 542) would violate the respondent’s constitutional right to confrontation. Id. at 542-46. See, e.g., In re Appeal No. 977 from Circuit Court of Baltimore County, 22 Md. App. 511, 323 A.2d 663 (1974); In the Matter of Quinton A., 49 N.Y.2d 328, 338-39, 402 N.E.2d 126, 131-32, 425 N.Y.S.2d 788, 793-94 (1980); W.B. v. State, 356 So. 2d 884 (Fla. App. 1978). As the Court explained in Lee v. Illinois, in ruling that the use of a co-defendant’s statement to convict the defendant in a bench trial violated this Sixth Amendment right, “a codefendant’s confession is presumptively unreliable as to the passages detailing the defendant’s conduct or culpability because those passages may well be the product of the codefendant’s desire to shift or spread blame, curry favor, avenge himself, or divert attention to another.” 476 U.S. at 545. See also Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116, 127-28, 131-34 (1999) (plurality opinion). Moreover, since the portions of the co-respondent’s statement implicating the respondent cannot be used as substantive evidence against the respondent and have little probative value in establishing the co-respondent’s guilt, counsel can argue that these “presumptively unreliable . . . passages” \( (\text{Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. at 545}) \) should be excluded from evidence altogether. Counsel can argue that, notwithstanding the judge’s capacity to disregard this evidence in deciding the respondent’s guilt, such redaction is a reasonable prophylactic measure to prevent even the possibility of prejudice to the respondent. See §§ 30.02(a)(1), 30.03 \text{ supra}; see also § 20.05 \text{ supra}.

(If the prosecution seeks to introduce an out-of-court statement by an accomplice who is \textit{not} being tried jointly with the respondent and who is not testifying at trial, the statement will ordinarily be barred by both local hearsay rules and the Confrontation Clause (see §§ 30.04(b), 30.04(c) \text{ supra}) unless it comes within the exception for co-conspirators’ statements made during and in furtherance of the conspiracy (see § 30.06(a) \text{ supra}).

In cases in which an accomplice testifies for the prosecution, there are no hearsay or confrontation problems because the accomplice is available for cross-examination by the respondent’s attorney. There are, however, state-law doctrines prohibiting conviction of a respondent solely on the basis of the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. See § 35.04 subdivision (ii) \textit{infra}. In a case in which a co-defendant pleads guilty during the trial and then is called to the witness stand by the prosecution to testify against the defendant, counsel should request that the judge impose whatever limitations on the testimony are needed to exclude information the former co-defendant may have learned as a result of joint defense planning, and counsel also should seek whatever jury instructions are needed to guard against prejudice from the former co-defendant’s guilty plea and change of status. \textit{See United States v. Barret, 848 F.3d 524, 533-34 \text{(2d Cir. 2017).}}

\section*{§ 30.07 ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE OF CONVICTIONS, OTHER CRIMES, OR [BAD] ACTS BY THE RESPONDENT OR A WITNESS FOR THE PROSECUTION OR DEFENSE}

\subsection*{§ 30.07(a) Proof of Character, Propensity, Other Crimes or [Bad] Acts of the Respondent in the Prosecution’s Case-in-Chief}

Immemorial Anglo-American common-law practice forbids the prosecution to present evidence of a criminal defendant’s or juvenile respondent’s character, reputation, or predisposition as the basis for an inference that s/he committed the offense for which s/he is presently being tried. That prohibition continues in virtually all jurisdictions today. \textit{Fed. Rule Evid. 404(a)(1) illustrates its prevalent formulation: “Evidence of a person's character or character trait is not admissible to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character or trait.”}

A parallel, pervasive prohibition has long forbidden proof of a respondent’s prior convictions or of his or her commission of criminal or other “bad” acts distinct from the present charge for the purpose of demonstrating the likelihood that s/he committed the present charge. The latter rule is often described as having “exceptions” – as allowing, for example, proof of the respondent’s identity as the perpetrator of the presently-charged offense by evidence that s/he committed criminal acts with a similar, signature modus operandi on other occasions. This conceptualization of the subject in terms of “exceptions” to a general rule prohibiting “other crime/other [bad]-act” evidence generally is good news for the defense if counsel can get the judge to buy it. But a more accurate analysis of the doctrine in most jurisdictions is that the rule prohibits prosecution evidence of a respondent’s other crimes and bad behavior only when that evidence is offered for the sole purpose of showing that the respondent is predisposed by character to commit a crime like the present one; and that the point of the “exceptions” is that such evidence is admissible for any other purpose for which it is relevant (subject to limitations described in the following paragraphs). Fed. Rule Evid. 404(b) (2018) illustrates the usual shape of this evidentiary restriction:

“Rule 404 Crimes, Wrongs, or Other Acts.

“(1) Prohibited Uses. Evidence of a crime, wrong, or other act is not admissible to prove a person’s character in order to show that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character.

“(2) Permitted Uses . . . . This evidence may be admissible for another purpose, such as proving motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, absence of mistake, or lack of accident.”

See also Edward J. Imwinkelried, Criminal Minds: The Need to Refine the Application of the Doctrine of Objective Chances as a Justification for Introducing Uncharged Misconduct Evidence to Prove Intent, UC Davis Legal Studies Research Paper No. 502 (2016), available from The Social Science Research Network Electronic Paper Collection, at http://ssrn.com/abstract=2833016. The reason why we have bracketed the word “bad” in the preceding section titles and text is that, although that adjective or one of its synonyms was traditionally included in the statement of the common-law precept and is often thought by judges to be one of the precept’s doctrinal elements, contemporary evidence rules like Rule 404(b)(1) explicitly refer to any “other act” – bad, good, or indifferent: – anything, in other words, that is not encompassed in the scenario comprising the present criminal charge, its setting, or its background. Two additional changes in the traditional treatment of this subject were introduced by federal and state legislation and rules revisions beginning in the 1990’s and are now widespread: First, a genuine exception to the prohibition of other-crime evidence to show propensity or predisposition was created for designated sex crimes (particularly sexual offenses against children). See, e.g., Fed. Rule Evid. 413(a), 414(a) (2018). Second, in cases in which other-crime-and-[bad]-act evidence is made admissible, the prosecution is often required to serve pretrial notice of such evidence on the defense (routinely or in response to a defense request). See, e.g., Fed. Rule Evid. 404(b)(2), 413(b), 414(b) (2018). The precise terms of these changes vary from State to State, as do the procedures which have evolved to permit defendants and juvenile respondents to enforce the applicable restrictions on the prosecution’s use of “other crime/other [bad]-act” evidence. Particularly where pretrial notice of such evidence is required, courts are increasingly coming to entertain defense motions in limine seeking to exclude or limit such evidence. See §§ 7.03, 30.02(a)(1), 30.03(a)(2) supra. Local practice must be consulted.

The courts are usually fairly vigilant to enforce whatever restrictions local law imposes on the use of “other crime/other [bad]-act” evidence – and to exclude altogether proof of bad character traits through evidence of reputation or proof of criminal propensity through diagnostic or anecdotal evidence – because all jurisdictions recognize the historicity and fundamental principle of the rule “disallow[ing] resort by the prosecution to any kind of evidence of a defendant’s evil character to establish a probability of his guilt” (Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948)). See, e.g., Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172, 180-82 (1997); United State v. Wells, 879 F.3d 900, 914, 917 (9th Cir. 2017) (the admission of the testimony of a forensic psychologist tendered as an expert in “‘targeted, intended workplace multiple-homicide violence’” as the basis for “invit[ing] the jury to find a ‘fit’ between . . . [the expert’s] criminal profile [testimony purporting to describe “the personality and other psychological characteristics of those who commit these types of crimes”] and the lay witnesses’ testimony concerning . . . [the defendant’s] own character traits” was reversible error; this testimony constituted forbidden bad-character evidence under Federal Evidence Rule 404(a)(1); the court reviews the state and federal caselaw rigorously limiting the admissibility of criminal-profile evidence to circumstances in which it is not used to show propensity); Jackson v. State, 166 So. 3d 195, 198-99 (Fla. App. 2015); Amey v. State, 331 Ga. App. 244, 248-54, 770 S.E.2d 321, 326-29 (2015); People v. Ullah, 216 Mich. App. 669, 550 N.W.2d 568 (1995); State v. Hembree, 368 N.C. 2, 13-14, 770 S.E.2d 77, 85 (2015); State v. Jones, 450 S.W.3d 866, 890-91 (Tenn. 2014); State v. Thomas, 152 Ohio St. 3d 15, 26, 92 N.E.3d 821, 831 (2017) (plurality opinion) (“the trial court committed plain error in admitting evidence that Thomas owned other knives unrelated to the murder. This evidence painted Thomas as someone with bad character and allowed the jury to convict him on the basis that he acted in conformity with it, violating Evid.R. 404(B).”); cf. State v. Plain, 898 N.W.2d 801, 822, 826-27 (Iowa 2017) (the prosecution introduced a redacted recording of a 911 call made during the criminal incident containing statements that the defendant “was wearing a GPS monitoring device and was not afraid to go ‘back to prison’”; defense counsel, who had listened to the tape before trial but failed to object to these statements, listened again that evening, noted the statements and moved for a mistrial the next day; the Iowa Supreme Court holds the evidence inadmissible but finds that under the circumstances a curative instruction that in “the 911 recording, there may have been references to a GPS monitoring device and/or time spent in prison . . . [and t]he jury is to disregard any [such] statement[s]” was a sufficient corrective to obviate the need for a mistrial.); and see McKinney v. Rees, 993 F.2d 1378, 1385 (9th Cir. 1993) (holding that admission of propensity evidence in a state murder trial violated federal constitutional Due Process: “[T]he evidence in this case is emotionally charged. The prosecution used evidence of the Gerber knife, which could not possibly have been used to commit the murder, to help paint a picture of a young man with a fascination with knives and with a commando lifestyle. The prosecutor raised the issue on cross-examination of why McKinney had purchased a knife with a black blade, asking him whether it was because such knives are favored by commandos because they do not reflect light. The jury was offered the image of a man with a knife collection, who sat in his dormitory room sharpening knives, scratching morbid inscriptions on the wall, and occasionally venturing forth in camouflage with a knife strapped to his body. This evidence, as discussed above, was not relevant to the questions before the jury. It served only to prey on the emotions of the jury, to lead them to mistrust McKinney, and to believe more easily that he was the type of son who would kill his mother in her sleep without much apparent motive."). And even when the “other crimes” evidence falls within one of the technically admissible categories, it is still subject to exclusion in the discretion of the trial judge if its prejudicial impact outweighs its probative value (see § 30.03(c) supra).

E.g., United States v. Scott, 677 F.3d 72, 74, 81, 82, 84 (2d Cir. 2012) (the trial court abused its discretion and committed reversible error by permitting the prosecution to introduce “testimony from two police detectives that they were familiar with . . . [the defendant] and had spoken to him on numerous occasions prior to his arrest in the instant case”: identity was not “an issue in dispute,” especially where it was conceded by defense counsel in opening statement, and “what little probative value this testimony may have had was substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice” in that the jury would likely “assume that the defendant’s lengthy and numerous contacts with the police were . . . related to his bad character and criminal propensity.”); State v. Brumbach, 273 Or. App. 552, 359 P.3d 490 (2015), summarized in § 30.03(c) supra; People v. Robinson, 68 N.Y.2d 541, 549, 503 N.E.2d 485, 490, 510 N.Y.S.2d 837, 842 (1986) (“[p]rejudice involves both the nature of the crime, for the more heinous the uncharged crime, the more likely that jurors will be swayed by it, and the difficulty faced by the defendant in seeking to rebut the inference which the uncharged crime evidence brings into play”); Campbell v. United States, 450 A.2d 428, 430 (D.C. 1982).

If defense counsel elects to present character witnesses, this will ordinarily be deemed to open the door to the prosecution’s proof of bad character in rebuttal. See § 33.17 subdivision (4)(a) infra; see also §§ 30.07(b), 33.06 subdivision (J), 33.09(a) infra. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 344.1(2). But any attempt by the prosecutor to introduce “other crime/other [bad]-act” evidence in the prosecution’s case-in-chief should be resisted under the principles of the preceding paragraph. Counsel can cite the very strong language found in a number of judicial opinions to the effect that the exclusion of such evidence is “one of the most fundamental notions known to our law” (United States v. Beno, 324 F.2d 582, 587 (2d Cir. 1963); see, e.g., Ali v. United States, 520 A.2d 306, 309-10 (D.C. 1987)), arising “out of the fundamental demand for justice and fairness which lies at the basis of our jurisprudence” (Lovely v. United States, 169 F.2d 386, 389 (4th Cir. 1948); see State v. Melcher, 140 N.H. 823, 830, 678 A.2d 146, 151 (1996)). And see Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. at 475-76 (“Courts that follow the common-law tradition almost unanimously have come to disallow resort by the prosecution to any kind of evidence of a defendant’s evil character to establish a probability of his guilt. . . . The overriding policy of excluding such evidence, despite its admitted probative value, is the practical experience that its disallowance tends to prevent confusion of issues, unfair surprise and undue prejudice.”); State v. McCarthy, 156 Vt. 148, 155, 589 A.2d 869, 873 (1991) (“Evidence of uncharged crime creates a ‘grave danger of prejudice,’ . . . such that it is ‘the most prejudicial evidence imaginable against an accused’); McKinney v. Rees, 993 F.2d at 1381 (“The rule against using character evidence to show behavior in conformance therewith, or propensity, is one such historically grounded rule of evidence [i.e., one of the “rules [that] are historically grounded rights of our system, developed to safeguard men from dubious and unjust convictions, with resulting forfeitures of life, liberty and property”’ (quoting Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 174 (1949)]. It has persisted since at least 1684 to the present, and is now established not only in the California and federal evidence rules, but in the evidence rules of thirty-seven other states and in the common-law precedents of the remaining twelve states and the District of Columbia.”). Counsel also can draw upon caselaw which, in some jurisdictions, requires that the prosecution prove any admissible “other crimes” by a specified quantum of evidence. See, e.g., Ali v. United States, 520 A.2d at 310 n.4 (in order to use “other crimes” evidence, the prosecution must present, at a pretrial hearing, clear and convincing evidence that the accused committed the other crime); *Tenn. Rule Evid. 404(b)(3) (same quantum).

Defense counsel who is representing a respondent with a record of prior arrests or convictions must be constantly on guard throughout the trial to avoid the accidental exposure of that record to the trier of fact. Numerous documents that may be offered as prosecution exhibits for other purposes – e.g., comparison fingerprint cards; photographs of the respondent at the time of arrest – may contain notations of the respondent’s record. Counsel should inspect each exhibit carefully and take the time to read it as soon as it is marked for identification, before it is discussed or displayed in open court. S/he should be sure to look at the back of every exhibit. If matter relating to inadmissible arrests or convictions appears on an otherwise admissible exhibit, counsel should suggest some means of reproducing the exhibit without the prejudicial matter. In a jury trial, these suggestions should be made at the bench, outside the earshot of the jury; and, if extended discussion of the suggestion is likely, counsel should request that admission of the exhibit be postponed until the matter can be taken up in camera during a lunch break or other normal recess in the trial. (Protracted sidebar discussions of an exhibit while the jury is present in the courtroom with nothing to do but speculate about what’s going on will often lead some jurors to guess that the defense is hiding something from them.) In a bench trial, counsel should first attempt to arrange a sanitized reproduction of the exhibit by agreement with the prosecutor before the exhibit is shown to the judge. If the prosecutor does not agree to this, counsel should then ask the court to order the exclusion and excision of the inadmissible matter without inspecting it, so as to avoid possible prejudice. In jurisdictions in which the court file (which judges often peruse during the trial) normally contains papers showing the respondent’s prior record or is marked in some manner to cross-reference the respondent’s other cases, counsel should examine the file carefully before trial and, if necessary, ask that the judge in a bench trial refrain from viewing the file in order to avoid exposure to inadmissible evidence.

§ 30.07(b) Proof of the Respondent’s Prior Convictions or Prior [Bad] Acts for Impeachment or in Rebuttal

In adult criminal trials the standard rule is that a defendant who testifies may be impeached with certain prior convictions. Ordinarily, any conviction of a felony or crimen falsi can be used for this purpose, but some jurisdictions disallow convictions that are more than a specified number of years old or allow these “stale” convictions only under designated circumstances (for example, when the nature of the crime makes them particularly probative of lack of credibility). Some jurisdictions also allow adult criminal defendants to be impeached with “prior [bad] acts” that did not result in a criminal conviction if (1) these acts are probative of the veracity of the defendant and (2) their probative value outweighs their prejudice to the defendant. The proper method of impeachment is usually for the prosecutor to ask the defendant on cross-examination whether s/he was convicted of a specified crime or whether s/he did a specified [bad] act on a specified date. If s/he denies the conviction or act or says that s/he does not remember, the prosecutor can subsequently introduce a certified judgment of conviction in rebuttal but, in most jurisdictions, cannot introduce independent evidence of [bad] acts that were not reduced to conviction. It is not a condition of this kind of cross-examination that the prosecutor be able to prove the prior conviction or prior [bad] act by competent evidence apart from the defendant’s answers on cross. Rather, the prosecutor is permitted to ask the questions whenever s/he can satisfy the judge that s/he has a good-faith basis for believing that the defendant suffered the convictions or committed the acts. But see People v. Cantave, 21 N.Y.3d 374, 377, 380, 993 N.E.2d 1257, 1260, 1262, 971 N.Y.S.2d 237, 239, 241 (2013) (the Fifth Amendment prohibition against a prosecutor’s questioning a testifying defendant about a pending criminal charge for the purpose of impeaching credibility also bars the prosecution from cross-examining a testifying defendant who has “a conviction pending appeal” about “the underlying facts of that conviction” until “direct appeal has been exhausted”).

In most States, a juvenile delinquency adjudication cannot be used to impeach either a defendant in a criminal trial or a juvenile respondent in a delinquency trial. This result is dictated in some States by statutes prohibiting the use of a juvenile adjudication in any subsequent proceeding (see, e.g., Moore v. State, 333 So. 2d 165 (Ala. Crim. App. 1976)); in other States it is produced by statutes or caselaw excluding juvenile adjudications from the category of “convictions” that are admissible for impeachment (see, e.g., FED. RULE EVID. 609(d)(2); People v. Massie, 137 Ill. App. 3d 723, 484 N.E.2d 1213, 92 Ill. Dec. 358 (1985); People v. Peele, 12 N.Y.2d 890, 188 N.E.2d 265, 237 N.Y.S.2d 999 (1963); State in the Interest of K.P., 167 N.J. Super. 290, 400 A.2d 840 (1979); State v. Matthews, 6 Wash. App. 201, 492 P.2d 1076 (1971)); and in still other States, it is a reflection of a general evidentiary rule of confidentiality of juvenile adjudications.

Some jurisdictions, however, deem juvenile adjudications to be admissible for impeachment just as adult convictions are (see, e.g., State v. Mallory, 270 S.C. 519, 242 S.E.2d 693 (1978)), at least when the proceeding in which they are offered into evidence is a delinquency trial closed to the public (In the Matter of the Welfare of C.D.L., 306 N.W.2d 819 (Minn. 1981); but see In the Matter of the Welfare of S.S.E., 629 N.W.2d 456, 459-60 (Minn. App. 2001)). In addition, even in jurisdictions that generally prohibit the use of juvenile adjudications, they may be used in certain circumstances. Some jurisdictions view the accused’s presentation of good-character evidence (see §§ 33.17-33.20 infra) as opening the door to the prosecution’s questioning of the character witnesses about the accused’s otherwise inadmissible prior adjudications of delinquency, insofar as these are pertinent to the character trait that the accused has put in issue. See, e.g., Wilburn v. State, 289 Ark. 224, 711 S.W.2d 760 (1986); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 344.1(2) (2013). And in some jurisdictions that allow impeachment with “prior bad acts,” the prior bad acts underlying juvenile adjudications may be admissible for impeachment even though the adjudications themselves are not. See, e.g., People v. Greer, 42 N.Y.2d 170, 176, 366 N.E.2d 273, 277, 397 N.Y.S.2d 613, 617 (1977).

Prior arrests cannot be used to impeach the accused in either a criminal or juvenile delinquency trial. Unlike convictions, arrests do not tend to show guilt, and they are not admissible for any purpose that requires reasoning from the arrest to guilt of the offense for which the arrest was made. People v. Cook, 37 N.Y.2d 591, 596, 338 N.E.2d 619, 621, 376 N.Y.S.2d 110, 113-14 (1975) (“Impeachment of a witness by evidence or inquiry as to prior arrests or charges is clearly improper. The mere fact that a person has been previously charged or accused has no probative value. There is absolutely no logical connection between a prior unproven charge and that witness’ [sic] credibility.”). See, e.g., People v. Anderson, 20 Cal. 3d 647, 574 P.2d 1235, 143 Cal.Rptr. 88 (1978); People v. Brown, 61 Ill. App. 3d 180, 377 N.E.2d 1201, 18 Ill. Dec. 565 (1978); Commonwealth v. Levene, 492 Pa. 287, 290-91, 424 A.2d 865, 866 (1980); Powell v. State, 673 S.W.2d 403 (Tex. App. 1984). However, if the accused on direct examination volunteers that s/he has never been arrested – or testifies that s/he “has never been in trouble with the law,” or makes similar claims – this testimony may open the door to impeachment by prior arrests (e.g., State v. Thomas, 878 S.W.2d 76 (Mo. App. 1994); see § 33.09(a) infra), to the extent (but only to the extent) that they controvert these protestations (see Modeste v. State, 760 So. 2d 1078 (Fla. App. 2000); People v. Brown, 61 Ill. App. 3d at 184, 377 N.E.2d at 1203-04, 18 Ill. Dec. at 567-68; West v. State, 169 S.W.3d 275, 278-79 (Tex. App. 2005) (dictum)).

§ 30.07(c) Defense Impeachment of Prosecution Witnesses with Prior Convictions or Prior [Bad] Acts

State evidentiary rules and the confrontation clauses of the state and federal constitutions give the respondent a right to impeach a prosecution witness with the witness’s adult convictions pertinent to lack of veracity:

“‘Our cases construing the [confrontation] clause [of the Sixth Amendment] hold that a primary interest secured by it is the right of cross-examination.’ . . . Subject always to the broad discretion of a trial judge to preclude repetitive and unduly harassing interrogation, the cross-examiner is not only permitted to delve into the witness’ [sic] story to test the witness’ [sic] perceptions and memory, but the cross-examiner has traditionally been allowed to impeach, i.e., discredit, the witness. One way of discrediting the witness is to introduce evidence of a prior criminal conviction of that witness. By so doing the cross-examiner intends to afford the jury [or the judge in a bench trial] a basis to infer that the witness’ [sic] character is such that he would be less likely than the average trustworthy citizen to be truthful in his testimony.” (Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 315-16 (1974).)

See also, e.g., Slovik v. Yates, 556 F.3d 747, 752-54 (9th Cir. 2009); Vasquez v. Jones, 496 F.3d 564, 570-74 (6th Cir. 2007).
Juvenile adjudications of a prosecution witness (whether that witness is presently an adult or still a juvenile) are ordinarily barred from impeachment use by the sorts of exclusionary provisions described in § 30.07(b) supra. But these provisions must give way to the accused’s constitutional rights to confrontation in certain cases. In Davis v. Alaska, supra, the Supreme Court held that the defense was entitled to use a juvenile witness’s prior adjudication, for which he was on probation at the time he implicated the defendant, to cross-examine on the subject of bias – specifically, to show that the witness’s probationary status gave him reason to make a false identification in order to avoid antagonizing the authorities and jeopardizing the continuation of his probation. The Court explained that “[t]he State’s policy interest in protecting the confidentiality of a juvenile offender’s record cannot require yielding of so vital a constitutional right as the effective cross-examination for bias of an adverse witness” (415 U.S. at 320).

“Whatever temporary embarrassment might result to [the witness] . . . or his family by disclosure of his juvenile record . . . is outweighed by [the accused’s] . . . right to probe into the influence of possible bias in the testimony of a crucial identification witness.” Id. at 319. See also, e.g., In re Douglas L., 625 A.2d 1357 (R.I. 1993).

The Davis decision was explicitly limited to the use of juvenile adjudications that showed bias. However, several lower courts have applied Davis’s logic to permit impeachment of prosecution witnesses with prior juvenile adjudications that reflect adversely on the witness’s general credibility. See, e.g., Tabron v. United States, 444 A.2d 942, 943 (D.C. 1982) (if impeachment of a witness’s general credibility is “likely to be material to the outcome of the trial”); State v. Deffenbaugh, 217 Kan. 469, 472-74, 536 P.2d 1030, 1034 (1975) (if the juvenile adjudication is for an offense involving dishonesty or false statement); State v. Hillard, 421 So. 2d 220 (La. 1982) (if the court determines, on a case-by-case basis, that the accused’s right to confrontation outweighs the state’s policy of confidentiality).

Fed. Rule Evid. 608(b) and parallel provisions in States that have followed the lead of the Federal Rules permit a cross-examiner to inquire into “specific instances of a witness’s conduct . . . if they are probative of the [witness’s] character for . . . untruthfulness,” but forbid extrinsic evidence of such incidents. Counsel can argue that the federal and state constitutional rights to confrontation also entitle the defense to cross-examine a prosecution witness with respect to any prior [bad] acts (whether committed as an adult or juvenile) that tend to show the witness’s general untrustworthiness. See, e.g., People v. Smith, 27 N.Y.3d 652, 659, 666, 669, 57 N.E.3d 53, 57, 62, 64, 36 N.Y.S.3d 861, 865, 870, 872 (2016) (the trial judges in cases that were joined on appeal abused their discretion by precluding defense counsel from using the State’s “prior bad acts” rule to (in one case) “question Detective Sanchez regarding a lawsuit in which he and the rest of the narcotics field team involved in this case were sued in federal court for civil rights violations” in an unrelated civil suit alleging false arrest, excessive force, and fabrication of evidence, and (in another case) to cross-examine “Detective Rivera about . . . prior false arrests based upon the specific allegations of . . . [an unrelated] federal lawsuit”; “law enforcement witnesses should be treated in the same manner as any other prosecution witness for purposes of cross-examination.”); People v. Batista, 113 A.D.2d 890, 493 N.Y.S.2d 608 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1985) (the trial court erred in precluding the defense from impeaching a prosecution witness with his illegal gambling activities and failure to carry a green card). See also United States v. Woodard, 699 F.3d 1188, 1192, 1195-97 (10th Cir. 2012) (the trial court violated the defendant’s right to confrontation by preventing defense counsel from questioning a state Motor Transportation Division inspector about “a prior determination made by a different federal district judge [at a suppression hearing] that the MTD inspector was not credible”); United States v. White, 692 F.3d 235, 248-51 (2d Cir. 2012) (the trial court improperly prevented defense counsel from cross-examining a police officer about his testimony at a suppression hearing in an unrelated case that resulted in the judge’s “unequivocally discredit[ing] . . . [the officer’s] testimony”). And certainly the defense can impeach with any prior [bad] acts or pending charges that tend to show bias on the part of a witness. See, e.g., Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673 (1986) (the trial court’s refusal to permit cross-examination of a prosecution witness about the terms of an agreement under which a drunk driving charge against him was dismissed in exchange for his promise to speak to the prosecutor about the crime for which the defendant was on trial violated the defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to confrontation); Brinson v. Walker, 547 F.3d 387, 390, 394-95 (2d Cir. 2008) (the trial judge violated the Confrontation Clause by preventing defense counsel from cross-examining the complainant “on whether he was fired from his job at . . . [a restaurant] for refusing to serve black patrons,” information which defense counsel sought to elicit to support a defense theory that the complainant’s “accusation [that he had been robbed by the defendant] was a deliberate lie, motivated by . . . [the complainant’s] racial hatred of black people”); Bentley v. State, 930 A.2d 866, 869, 871-72, 874-75 (Del. 2007) (the trial court violated the defendant’s rights to confrontation and to a fair trial by upholding a prosecution witness’s assertion of her Fifth Amendment privilege and precluding defense counsel from cross-examining the witness, who had pending drug charges, about the witness’s prior drug use, which defense counsel sought to elicit to “cast into doubt . . . [the witness’s] ability to perceive or remember” and to “establish bias or motive for the changes in her testimony”; the state could have avoided “[t]he substantial danger of prejudice from the preclusion of cross examination . . . [by seeking] use immunity for [the witness’s] testimony.”); Longus v. United States, 52 A.3d 836, 851-54 (D.C. 2012) (the trial court improperly prevented defense counsel from cross-examining a police detective about two theories of potential bias: questioning to show that the detective “was under investigation by the U.S. Attorney for witness coaching,” which “provided a motive for the detective to want to curry favor with the government”; and questioning “to show his ‘corruption’ through evidence that Detective Brown had . . . engaged in witness tampering in the . . . [other] case”); Washington v. United States, 461 A.2d 1037, 1038 (D.C. 1983) (even in the absence of a testimonial arrangement between the witness and the prosecutor, a pending charge against the witness may be used to show bias in the form of the witness’s “harbor[ing] a hope of better treatment if he testified as he did”); State v. Clark, 364 S.W.3d 540, 544-45 (Mo. 2012) (defense counsel was entitled to cross-examine a prosecution witness about having pled guilty to unrelated charges and his hope that “he would reap a benefit” from testifying for the state even though there was no plea agreement to that effect; the witness’s “belief that his testimony would have a favorable effect on future sentencing may have been mistaken or speculative, but what is important is what he believed.”); cf. Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. at 319-20.
For additional discussion of these forms of impeachment, see § 37.11 infra.

§ 30.07(d) Defense Evidence of Prior Convictions or Prior [Bad] Acts of the Complainant or Other Participants in the Criminal Episode

The defense can prove any convictions or [bad] acts of any person that are otherwise relevant to the respondent’s theory of the case, such as a complainant’s prior assaults in a case in which the respondent asserts self-defense and seeks to use the complainant’s violent history to show that s/he was the aggressor or to show the reasonableness of the respondent’s fear. See, e.g., McBride v. United States, 441 A.2d 644 (D.C. 1982); see also People v. Petty, 7 N.Y.3d 277, 285, 852 N.E.2d 1155, 1161, 819 N.Y.S.2d 684, 689-90 (2006) (in a self-defense case, the defendant can introduce “evidence of a deceased victim’s prior threats against defendant . . . to prove that the victim was the initial aggressor, whether or not such threats . . . [were] communicated to defendant,” because “such threats may indicate an intent to act upon them, thereby creating a probability that the deceased victim has in fact acted upon them as the initial aggressor”).

§ 30.07(e) Prosecutorial Impeachment of Defense Witnesses with Prior Convictions or Prior [Bad] Acts

The same principles that permit the defense to impeach prosecution witnesses with prior adult convictions and [bad] acts (see § 30.07(c)) entitle the prosecution to impeach defense witnesses with prior adult convictions and, in some jurisdictions, with prior [bad] acts. But see State v. Scott, 229 N.J. 469, 163 A.3d 325 (2017) (prosecution evidence that the defendant’s mother, testifying as a defense witness, had lied to police on two previous occasions to assist her son in evading prosecution inadmissible to impeach her; the court rejects the state’s argument that this evidence went to “bias”; it holds, instead, that the evidence constituted an impermissible means of proving character for untruthfulness and that it was substantially more prejudicial than probative).

As § 30.07(b) supra explains, the vast majority of jurisdictions prohibit prosecutorial impeachment of an accused with prior juvenile adjudications. Some courts have, however, relied upon the rationale of Davis v. Alaska to permit the prosecution to impeach other defense witnesses with their prior juvenile adjudications. See People v. Puente, 98 Ill. App. 3d 936, 424 N.E.2d 775, 54 Ill. Dec. 25 (1981) (superseded by statute, see In re K.D., 279 Ill App. 3d 1020, 1024, 666 N.E.2d 29, 32, 216 Ill. Dec. 861, 864 (1996)); State v. Wilkins, 215 Kan. 145, 523 P.2d 728 (1974). This extrapolation from Davis is inconsistent with Davis’s holding and logic: Davis was predicated upon the accused’s Sixth Amendment right to confrontation, and the prosecution has no constitutional right to confrontation. See, e.g., State v. Thomas, 536 S.W.2d 529, 531 (Mo. App. 1976); Commonwealth v. Slaughter, 482 Pa. 538, 552, 394 A.2d 453, 460 (1978). Accordingly, the interests in confidentiality that Alaska advanced in Davis as a basis for excluding juvenile adjudications should ordinarily preclude the prosecution from impeaching a defense witness with prior juvenile adjudications. See Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. at 319 (“The State argues that exposure of a juvenile’s record of delinquency would likely cause impairment of rehabilitative goals of the juvenile correctional procedures. This exposure, it is argued, might encourage the juvenile offender to commit further acts of delinquency, or cause the juvenile offender to lose employment opportunities or otherwise suffer unnecessarily for his youthful transgression.”).
Chapter 31

Handling Prosecution Witnesses

§ 31.01 CROSS-EXAMINING PROSECUTION WITNESSES – GENERALLY

§ 31.01(a) The Right to Cross-Examine; Bases for Objecting to Judicial Curtailment of Cross-examination

Specifically, “a criminal defendant [or juvenile respondent] states a violation of the Confrontation Clause by showing that he [or she] was prohibited from engaging in otherwise appropriate cross-examination designed to show a prototypical form of bias on the part of the witness, and thereby ’to expose to the jury [or the judge in a bench trial] the facts from which jurors [or a judicial trier of fact] . . . could appropriately draw inferences relating to the reliability of the witness’” (Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 680 (1986) (dictum), quoting Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. at 318). See, e.g., Ortiz v. Yates, 704 F.3d 1026, 1034-40 (9th Cir. 2012). “Bias is a term used in the ‘common law of evidence’ to describe the relationship between a party and a witness which might lead the witness to slant, unconsciously or otherwise, his testimony in favor or against a party [sic]. Bias may be induced by a witness’ [sic] like, dislike, or fear of a party, or by the witness’ [sic] self-interest. Proof of bias is almost always relevant because the jury [or the judge in a bench trial], as finder of fact and weigher of credibility, has historically been entitled to assess all evidence which might bear on the accuracy and truth of a witness’ [sic] testimony.”
United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45, 52 (1984). See, e.g., Nappi v. Yelich, 793 F.3d 246, 248, 253 (2d Cir. 2015) (the trial court violated the Confrontation Clause by precluding defense counsel from cross-examining the accused’s wife about her romantic relationship with another man to show that the wife had “a motive to implicate Nappi in the illegal possession of a weapon—which she knew was a violation of his parole”); Henry v. State, 123 So. 3d 1167 (Fla App. 2013) (“In a proffer, the defense sought to cross-examine the victim to establish that (1) he was charged with aggravated stalking; (2) the charge was a third-degree felony; (3) the maximum penalty for a third-degree felony is five years in prison; (4) the victim received 18 months on probation pursuant to his plea bargain; (5) the victim was arrested on December 6, 2005; and (6) the victim remained in jail from the time of his arrest until he entered his plea in mid-January of 2006. The prosecutor objected to the proposed cross-examination on the grounds that it was ‘improper impeachment,’ and that the victim’s crime was ‘not a conviction’ or a ‘crime of dishonesty.’ The trial court sustained the objection and prohibited the testimony.” Id. at 1168. “‘A well recognized area of cross examination is how pending criminal charges may have influenced a witness’ [sic] cooperation with the state and the content of in-court statements.” Id. at 1170. “Here, the victim testified that he had pending, unrelated charges which were resolved without any deal to testify in this case. However, the jury was not required to accept the victim’s characterization of the resolution of his pending case. The defendant was entitled to ask the victim about the six areas of cross-examination identified above to evaluate the victim’s credibility.” Id.). And the Sixth Amendment right of cross-examination extends not only to questions calling for answers that directly show bias but also to questions that could open up a line of further examination ultimately showing bias. Smith v. Illinois, 390 U.S. at 750-51.

§ 31.01(b) Deciding Whether to Cross-Examine; The Possible Goals of Cross-examination

Cross-examination should not be undertaken without good reason. Most of what most witnesses testify is both unimportant and unassailable. Cross-examination on this material can only undermine the first point and underline the second in the eyes of the judge or jury. Unless counsel has a specific, affirmative goal that can realistically be achieved by cross-examination, the better course is to forego cross-examining.

Depending on the nature of the case and what was elicited on direct examination, counsel might pursue one or more of the following goals in cross-examining a prosecution witness:

1. To demonstrate the possibility of error or inaccuracy in:
   a. perception by the witness;
   b. interpretation by the witness of what s/he perceived;
   c. memory of the witness;

925
(d) judgment, estimation, or opinion by the witness;

(e) articulation by the witness, in his or her testimony on direct examination.

Cross-examination may undertake to establish the existence of one or more of these factors (e.g., limited opportunity to observe, or poor conditions for observation, by the witness; inattentiveness by the witness; “set” or bias on the part of the witness; prior or subsequent experiences by the witness which s/he may have confused with the occasion that s/he is purporting to narrate) by:

(i) getting the witness to admit the relevant facts (e.g., to state that s/he was paying attention to something else at the time when s/he purports to have observed certain details), or

(ii) getting the witness to admit other facts from which the relevant facts can be inferred (e.g., to state that something else was going on to which an ordinary person in the witness’s situation would have been paying attention instead of attending to the details which the witness purports to have observed), or

(iii) getting the witness to deny the relevant facts incredibly (e.g., to state that s/he was not attending to something else, when this statement is likely to be disbelieved by the trier of fact because, inter alia, it is belied by his or her demeanor in uttering the denial on the witness stand; or it is belied by his or her earlier statements or behavior which the cross-examiner can prove through or independently of the witness; or it is belied by the level of detail with which the witness is presently able to recount aspects of the situation that s/he denies were the focus of his or her attention; or it is belied by the trier’s conceptions that, in common human experience, no one situated like the witness could fail to focus attention on those aspects), or

(iv) getting the witness to demonstrate the relevant facts by his or her present performance (e.g., to describe in microscopic detail the “something else” to which s/he therefore must have been closely attending), or

(v) more than one of these means.

Errors or inaccuracies may also be suggested indirectly, without pinpointing any specific factor that may have caused them, or even the specific area (e.g., perception versus memory) in which they are operating. Take for example a prosecution witness who testifies on direct examination that at a particular time and place (which happen to have been five minutes before the commission of a crime, and in its near vicinity), s/he saw a youth whom s/he identifies as the respondent walking down the street wearing tan trousers (which, as it happens, the perpetrator of the crime was wearing, according to the victim’s account). On cross-examination, this witness might be asked whether the youth s/he saw was wearing a jacket, what kind, what color; whether he was wearing a shirt, what kind, what color; what sort of footgear did he have; how was he wearing his hair, etc. – details which, from the perspective of an observer in the witness’s situation, would occupy equal prominence with the tan pants that the witness purports to have seen and to recall. If s/he cannot recount other details of equal prominence, the trier of fact may well become skeptical of the tan-pants story; if s/he can, the cumulation of such details may enable counsel to argue to the jury or judge the incredibility of a witness who professes to have made and memorized a minute inspection of a passing stranger that s/he had no particular reason to scrutinize so closely. (The argument would not be viable, and the line of cross could be quite dangerous, in the case of a witness who did have a reason to scrutinize the stranger – for example, s/he saw him running from the crime scene after a hue and cry had been raised.)

(2) To demonstrate that the witness’s testimony on direct examination was unfair or misleading.

If cross-examination elicits facts omitted on direct which manifestly qualify or alter the significance of the facts to which the witness testified on direct, the result may be more than a mere neutralization of the direct. By portraying the direct as misleading, counsel has acquired grounds to argue in closing that the witness or the prosecutor (or both) were “telling a half-truth,” or “covering up awkward facts,” or “trying to conceal whatever didn’t fit their version of the story.” The credibility gap thus created may spread to other features of the witness’s testimony or of the prosecutor’s case.

(3) To demonstrate the possibility that the witness is lying.

In the case of the ordinary witness, this is exceedingly difficult. Particularly if the witness is at all personable, it will be easier to persuade the jury or judge that the witness is honestly and reasonably mistaken than that s/he is indefensibly reckless or unconsciously biased, and it will be easier to persuade the jury or judge of either of these latter things than that the witness is intentionally lying. However, some witnesses (e.g., an accomplice who testifies for the prosecution, admitting the crime and saying that the respondent participated in planning and committing it) cannot plausibly be mistaken if they are truthful: They must be challenged as liars or not at all. Usually, the challenge can succeed only if both motivation to lie and some other indication of untruthfulness (e.g., a prior inconsistent statement of the witness; discrepancies between the witness’s story and other evidence; shiftless demeanor) are shown; and cross-examination must be directed to making these showings. Because an unsuccessful attempt to brand a witness as a liar can alienate the jury or judge – in direct proportion to the likeability of the witness – the effort should not be made without strong ammunition that promises a reasonable prospect of success.

(4) To make the witness unattractive.
This is often easier than making the witness out to be a liar. The jury or judge may discredit a witness whom it perceives as having bad judgment, and it may identify bad judgment with cockiness, pig-headedness, self-righteousness, egotism, inconsiderateness, meanness, pettiness, snoopiness, gossipiness, and a host of other major and minor vices, including simply acting, talking or thinking like someone whom the jurors would not want their son or daughter to marry. Unattractive traits of a witness may be brought out on cross either by enticing the witness to display them on the stand or by eliciting from the witness facts about what s/he did or said in connection with the subject matter of his or her testimony that manifests the traits.

(5) To confine the reach of the witness’s testimony on direct.

This goal includes both (a) establishing explicitly the limits of assertions made by the witness on direct, so that s/he will not appear to be saying more than s/he has said, and (b) establishing facts that impede the drawing of inferences unfavorable to counsel’s case from what the witness has said on direct.

(a) Q. “You testified on direct examination that you arrived at approximately 8:00 p.m., is that correct?
A. “Yes.
Q. “You did not testify that it was exactly 8:00 p.m., right?
A. “It was about 8:00 p.m.
(b) Q. “You did not consult your watch at the time you arrived?
A. “No.
Q. “You had no reason to attend to the exact time of your arrival, did you?
A. “Not really.
Q. “The first occasion on which you had a reason to focus on the question of the time of your arrival is when the detective asked you about it, correct?
A. “Well, you mean specifically? I guess that’s right.”

(6) To elicit information that (a) affirmatively supports the defense’s case, or (b) is inconsistent with, and thereby discredits, other evidence presented in the prosecutor’s case.

Subspecies (a) is particularly useful when counsel can get it. To be able to argue to the jury or judge that “even the prosecution’s witnesses admit that [a fact favorable to the defense] is true” can add considerable persuasiveness to the defense case. Subspecies (b) plays the prosecutor’s witnesses off against one another: “They can’t both be right,” counsel can argue in closing.

§ 31.01(c) Avoiding the Most Common Pitfalls of Cross-examination

Before beginning cross-examination, counsel should give careful thought to the areas that s/he had best stay out of as well as to the areas that s/he wants to go into. S/he should review the elements of the offense and the overall state of the prosecutor’s record on those elements, so as to avoid the cardinal sin of helping the prosecution by filling in the missing links in its case. Counsel should keep in mind that by touching any particular subject on cross, s/he will open the door to redirect examination by the prosecutor on that subject, with the danger that the prosecution will improve its case. Conversely, subjects “beyond the scope of cross” may not ordinarily be taken up on redirect; and although trial judges have discretion to relieve a party of the rigor of this rule, most judges are more inclined to enforce the rule strictly than to relax it.

§ 31.01(d) Framing Cross-examination Questions for Maximum Effectiveness

Leading questions are permitted on cross-examination and are a particularly useful tool: Not only can they be used to pin a witness down to specifics and to keep the witness from straying into areas that counsel does not want to open up, but they can also be used to obtain admissions of facts stated in the terms most favorable to the respondent’s theory of the case. The standard form of cross-examination question for these purposes is a declarative statement followed by “isn’t that true?” or an equivalent phrase. For example:

“The man who robbed you approached you from the direction of the gas station, isn’t that true?”

“When you first saw him, he was between you and the gas station, right?”

“In reporting the robbery to the police, you said that you could not tell whether the man had come out of the gas station parking area or out of the vacant lot next door, didn’t you?”

“At the time you first saw him, he was far enough from the gas station so that you could not tell whether he had been on the station’s property, is that correct?”

“From your location, all of the gas station lights were behind him, weren’t they?”

“And looking at him come toward you, you were facing directly into the lights at the gas station, weren’t you?”

The aim in fashioning questions of this sort is to phrase the facts as strongly in favor of the defense as is possible without running a serious risk that the witness will give a credible “no” answer. Thus the final question in the preceding series is preferable to “Looking at him come toward you, you were facing the lights at the gas station, weren’t you?” because the latter formulation is unnecessarily weak. On the other hand, “the lights of the gas station were in your eyes, weren’t they?” would be overly risky; and even “you were looking directly into the lights” is not as safe as “you were facing directly into the lights.”

The preceding series also exemplifies the often profitable technique of using “probe” questions to lock the witness into a position in which s/he must give the desired answer to a “payload” question or, alternatively, to forewarn counsel that the payload question should not be asked. A negative answer to any of the questions before the last one would have permitted and advised the cross-examiner to drop the entire line without embarrassment or risk of a damaging backfire, whereas affirmative answers to all of them made it almost impossible for the witness to avoid giving an affirmative answer to the final question.

§ 31.02 POLICE WITNESSES

Counsel should keep in mind that policing is a highly rule-bound profession.
Departmental regulations flourish, governing many aspects of police work and surrounding them with detailed codes of shall’s and shall not’s that are often utterly impractical for the officer in the field to obey. At the police academy and in police manuals, officers are taught “the way” to do this or that. The approved procedure remains in their minds as “the way” to do it, even though in practice they soon develop shortcuts that deviate dramatically from that procedure. As a result, police officers frequently fail to do all of the things that it is possible for defense counsel to show on cross-examination were required or expected of them. They are constantly neglecting to file prescribed reports, leaving items uncompleted in the filling out of reports, departing from specified investigative procedures, and so forth. (For example, it seems virtually impossible to train police not to pick up a gun found at the scene of a crime to check whether it is loaded, although the gun may have latent fingerprints on it.)

Thus a relatively productive way to impeach the testimony of a police officer is to set the officer up as an expert in criminal investigation by eliciting the officer’s testimony that s/he is one; then to lead the officer into agreeing that certain specified methods described by counsel are proper (or, better still, required by local police regulations) in gathering evidence to be used at trial or in recording observations or the progress of an investigation; then to retrace the officer’s direct-examination testimony in detail to demonstrate that s/he deviated substantially from the specified methods, that s/he failed to take various steps which they call for, and that much of the officer’s testimony was not written into his or her report at the time of the incident, despite the fact that s/he handles hundreds of cases and intends to use his or her notes to refresh his or her recollection for trial. Counsel will find it helpful to peruse local police instructional manuals, teaching materials used at the local police academy or training center, and standard police texts on criminal investigation to help identify points of error in police techniques.

Police investigation ordinarily proceeds through a sequence of stages that represent a commonplace form of inductive reasoning. Beginning with the first pieces of information they receive, the police begin to generate hypotheses – more or less consciously – about what happened, how, and who did what. As additional information is received, it is used to modify or reaffirm the initial hypothesis, and at some point the police decide that they know enough to reach a conclusion about the facts of the case. They embody this conclusion in whatever charge or charges they lodge, and – unless they are subsequently asked by a prosecutor to do additional investigation, or unless they are subsequently told additional “facts” by a prosecutor or another prosecution investigator – the facts that they have charged become The Truth in their view. This process is susceptible to distortion through the human propensity for tunnel vision (a/k/a confirmation bias): An initial, premature hypothesis solidifies too soon and colors all information subsequently received, so that any information which confirms the hypothesis is uncritically believed, while any information that would disconfirm the hypothesis is ignored or discredited. Police investigation is peculiarly susceptible to this kind of warping for two basic reasons. First, a police investigator does not merely receive successive increments of information; s/he actively seeks it out; and the kinds of information that s/he seeks, the sources to which s/he goes for it, and the questions by which s/he elicits it are all products of his or her initial hypothesis. See, e.g., Humbert v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore City, 866 F.3d 546 (4th Cir. 2017). Second, police are almost always overworked and always feel they are; so the temptation to follow the mental line of least resistance and to reach a speedy conclusion is peculiarly difficult to resist. See, e.g., Mark Godsey, Blind Injustice: A Former Prosecutor Exposes the Psychology and Politics of Wrongful Convictions 5-6, 54-58, 76, 98-112, 143-151, 170-212 (2017).

Defense counsel can sometimes use a three-step cross-examination process to convince a judge or jury that this warped process underlies the prosecution’s case:

Step one. Counsel asks the primary police witness to describe in detail the first pieces of information s/he received about the case. Counsel continues to elicit the successive pieces of information that the officer received, in the sequence in which s/he received them, by asking “What was the next piece of information you received?” or an equivalent question. At the point at which counsel believes that the police officer initially zeroed in on [a theory of what happened] or [an identification of the perp], counsel asks: “At this point in time, it did not appear to you that [e.g., “the burglar had entered through the window”] or [“this defendant was the shooter”], isn’t that correct?” Because the question seems to be aimed at discrediting the officer’s eventual conclusion (incriminating the defendant) as a bit of latter-day speculation unsupported by the information acquired while the criminal events were still fresh, the officer will frequently insist that s/he did believe at this early investigative stage that [the crime was committed in the way in which the prosecution’s trial theory portrays it] or [the defendant was the perp], or [whatever self-fulfilling prophesy defense counsel has chosen to establish]. See § 24.4.3, discussing the use of false leads in cross-examination. Counsel appears to accept this answer and continues to ask a series of “What was the next piece of information you received” and “When did you receive that information” questions – stopping just short of the point at which the police information would probably appear to the trier of fact to make out a pretty convincing prosecution case.

Step two. Counsel returns to the beginning of the police investigation and asks about every piece of information that the officer received which was not followed up and which might have led to developing a different theory of what happened or a different conclusion about who was the perp. Counsel establishes in detail what each piece of information was and exactly when it was received. Counsel stops this line of examination at the same chronological point as the step-one line.
Step three. Counsel then goes back and asks an identical triad of questions about each piece of information that the officer has mentioned at step two: “You said that you received [information item X] at [date/time], right?” “Did you conduct any investigation following up on [information item X]?” “Did you ask any other investigator to follow up on [information item X]?” This line of questions avoids asking any “why” questions that would enable the officer to explain his or her investigative decisions. It simply lays the factual foundation for counsel to argue in closing that this is a case in which tunnel-vision/confirmation-bias processes led to a misguided prosecution.

To conduct this line of cross-examination safely and effectively, defense counsel needs to have collected and analyzed all of the police reports in the case (see, e.g., §§ 9.17-9.18, 9.20, 18.5,18.7.3 subdivision (2) supra) and also to have used any available pretrial procedures or hearings to obtain a detailed preview of how the officer will respond to counsel’s planned questions regarding the contents and timing of each piece of information (see, e.g., §§ 11.8.2-11.8.4, 11.8.6-11.8.7, 24.2, 24.4.2-24.4.4 supra).

It is sometimes tempting to try to show that the police have it in for the respondent or are picking on the respondent, but the effort to do so out of the mouths of the police almost never succeeds. In no event should counsel ask a police officer “What attracted your attention to the respondent?” or similar questions. The reply is guaranteed to elicit the police officer’s experience with the respondent’s prior criminal acts and may also elicit damaging rumor. (If police witnesses volunteer prejudicial prior-crime or prior-arrest evidence, as they will frequently seek some pretext to do, a motion for a mistrial is in order. See State v. Acker, 133 Hawai‘i 253, 279, 327 P.3d 931, 957 (2014) (dictum) (“the deliberate and unresponsive injection by prosecution witnesses of irrelevant references to prior arrests, convictions, or imprisonment may generate insurmountable prejudice to the cause of an accused” . . . [and] constitute an ‘evidential harpoon’ requiring a mistrial” (quoting State v. Kahinu, 53 Hawai‘i 536, 549, 498 P.2d 635, 643 (1972)); see id. at 548-49, 498 P.2d at 643-44 and cases cited; cf. Bowen v. Eyman, 324 F. Supp. 339 (D. Ariz. 1970).)

In general, cross-examination of police witnesses should be very specific, calling for short factual answers and giving the witness no leeway to stray. Counsel should ask: “When you first caught sight of the man, what clothing did you observe that he was wearing?” not “What was the man you saw wearing?” (because the latter question will elicit a minute description of everything that the officer observed about the man’s clothing during his first sighting or at any later time); “What specifically did you see Pat do next?” not “What happened next?”; “What words did Susan use in telling you about the shooter’s statement?” not “What did Susan tell you the shooter said?” If a police officer begins to describe what Pat did next by saying “Pat appeared to be . . .” – or begins to describe Susan’s communication by saying “She indicated that . . .” – counsel should immediately interrupt and ask the judge to instruct the witness to answer the question, not to state his or her opinion. And counsel should never ask why a police officer did something. Counsel should ask only what the police officer did and the factual circumstances under which s/he did it. Counsel can argue in closing argument that the police officer did it for the wrong reasons if that is a permissible inference from the officer’s actions in the circumstances. But trying to elicit a police officer’s reasons from the officer’s own mouth will get counsel nothing except self-serving protestations of angelic good faith, coupled with everything damning to the respondent that the officer can think of.

Prosecutors frequently attempt to elicit opinion testimony from police witnesses on matters such as the paraphernalia and indicia of gang-related activity, the meaning of certain words in drug-trade jargon, and the association between possession of certain objects and the commission of crimes (for example, that particular kinds of tools are commonly used by chop shop operators). Objections that can be made to testimony of this kind are discussed in Joëlle Anne Moreno, What Happens When Dirty Harry Becomes an (Expert) Witness for the Prosecution?, 79 Tul. L. Rev. 1, 30 (2004); and see, e.g., United States v. Hampton, 718 F.3d 978 (D.C. Cir. 2013). Because it is ordinarily the case that police officers who will testify at trial have also appeared as prosecution witnesses in earlier proceedings (at the preliminary examination or at suppression hearings) or in earlier trials arising out of the same incident or similar incidents – or that they have executed affidavits (as the basis for warrants or for a Gerstein probable-cause determination (see §§ 11.2 – 11.3 supra)) – defense counsel can often anticipate what objectionable testimony to expect from particular police witnesses. Counsel should review available transcript material and affidavits and should ordinarily use the techniques discussed in § 17.5.3 supra and § 40.4 infra to prevent the prosecutor from starting down lines of examination that are likely to elicit inadmissible and damaging testimony of this sort.

§ 31.03 ACCOMPLICES TURNED STATE’S EVIDENCE

When accomplices turn state’s evidence and testify for the prosecution, their testimony is usually damning. Ordinarily, the surest way to undermine an accomplice’s testimony is to show that s/he has some motive for fabricating. Standard techniques are to demonstrate (a) the consideration s/he is getting or expecting to get from the prosecution for testifying (see Moore v. Secretary Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 640 Fed. Appx. 159 (3d Cir. 2016); and see the following paragraph); (b) his or her prior criminal record or bad character for truthfulness or both, within the limits allowed by local law and constitutional doctrines (see § 30.07(c) supra; §§ 31.11-31.12 infra); (c) the inconsistent story that s/he told (accomplices almost always do) when first taken into custody, denying any complicity in these crimes (see § 31.10 supra); and/or (d) any reasons s/he has for “harbor[ing] animosity towards the [respondent]” (cf. Lloyd v. State, 909 So. 2d 580, 581 (Fla. App. 2005); State v. Ofield, 635 S.W.2d 73, 75 (Mo. App. 1982)).

An accomplice should ordinarily be asked whether charges against him or her have been filed; if so, whether they have been dropped or reduced and whether s/he is aware of any discussions that have been had regarding the possible dropping or reduction of those charges or regarding the sentence s/he might receive. See, e.g., State v. Summers, 506 S.W.2d 67, 71 (Mo. App. 1974) (defense counsel should have been permitted to ask an accomplice, testifying as a prosecution witness, “‘how many burglaries have you participated in?’” because this question “constituted a foundation to subsequently show that the witness had been promised consideration or leniency by the state concerning other burglaries in return for his cooperation in the instant case, likewise bearing on the witness’ [sic] credibility”); Parker v. State, 657 S.W.2d 137 (Tex. Crim App. 1983). (If the accomplice lies, the prosecutor is constitutionally obliged to disclose the truth or suffer the invalidation of the respondent’s conviction when the deal with the accomplice is kept and the truth is discovered. Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959); Giglio v. United States, 415 U.S. 449 (1974) (per curiam); Jenkins v. Artuz, 294 F.3d 284 (2d Cir. 2002); Hawkins v. United States, 324 F.2d 873 (5th Cir. 1963); see Ring v. United States, 419 U.S. 18 (1974) (per curiam). If a respondent is convicted at a trial at which an accomplice has testified for the prosecution and has denied making any deal with the authorities in exchange for his or her testimony, counsel should keep a close eye on the disposition of the charges against the accomplice – which are usually left pending until after s/he has testified and then fairly promptly disposed of – so that counsel can make a new trial motion on Napue grounds as soon as evidence of a Napue violation appears.) Stressing the maximum penalties to which the accomplice could have been sentenced had there been no deal is one way to impress upon a jury (or a judge in a bench trial) why someone in the accomplice’s predicament would lie. See, e.g., Henry v. State, 123 So. 3d 1167 (Fla App. 2013), summarized in § 31.01(a) third paragraph supra. Even in the absence of a provable testimonial agreement between the turncoat accomplice and the prosecutor, defense counsel may ask the accomplice whether it is not true that s/he has been charged with designated offenses and that those charges have not yet been resolved (see Washington v. United States, 461 A.2d 1037 (D.C. 1983)), so as to lay the foundation for arguing in closing that the witness “harbor[ed] a hope of better treatment if he testified as he did” (id. at 1038)). See also, e.g., State v. Clark, 364 S.W.3d 540, 544-45 (Mo. 2012) (defense counsel was entitled to cross-examine a prosecution witness about having pleaded guilty to unrelated charges and his hope that “he would reap a benefit” from testifying for the state even though there was no plea agreement to that effect; the witness’s “belief that his testimony would have a favorable effect on future sentencing may have been mistaken or speculative, but what is important is what he believed.”).

One caution should be observed in exploring the background of relations between an accomplice and the respondent in an effort to show personal animosity. If counsel’s interview of the client reveals that the client and the accomplice know each other primarily through their commission together of crimes in addition to the one for which the respondent is presently being tried, counsel should ordinarily refrain from cross-examining the accomplice about his or her feelings toward the respondent, in order to avoid the risk of eliciting otherwise inadmissible “other crimes” evidence (see § 30.07(a) supra). Sometimes it will be sufficient to phrase questions carefully and to instruct the witness to answer certain of them yes or no. But this is risky and should not be undertaken unless counsel has first requested and obtained from the court (a) an admonition to the witness not to go beyond yes-or-no answers to these questions on cross, and (b) a ruling in limine precluding the prosecution from asking the witness on redirect any questions that will bring out the respondent’s participation in other crimes (see §§ 7.03(c), 30.02(a)(1), 30.02(a)(2) supra).
§ 31.04 COMPLAINANTS IN THEFT CASES

Many complainants who are victims of theft have no personal knowledge of the accused. Their only function is to identify the stolen items as those that were taken from them. If the item is unique, no cross-examination is ordinarily warranted. See § 31.01(b) supra. Indeed, if the complainant is particularly vulnerable or personable, a stipulation is usually advisable. See § 30.02(b) supra. If the item is a standard model, the complainant should be examined cordially about the basis for his or her claim that s/he recognizes this particular item as the one stolen. Were there others like it at the source from which s/he purchased it? Has s/he seen others like it for sale or in the possession of family members or friends? This is all the cross-examination that is needed to lay the foundation for counsel’s closing argument that the object in question is no different than those that can be found anywhere, by the hundreds.

§ 31.05 COMPLAINANTS WHO IDENTIFY THE RESPONDENT, AND OTHER IDENTIFICATION WITNESSES

Frequently an identification of the respondent as the perpetrator is made by a complainant or eyewitness who did not know the perpetrator and viewed him or her only momentarily. The in-court identification usually follows an out-of-court identification in a pretrial show-up, lineup, or photographic identification procedure. Chapter 25 supra describes the various constitutional and state-law challenges that can be made to testimony concerning out-of-court identifications as well as to in-court identifications that are tainted by an earlier, improper out-of-court identification process or that are otherwise unreliable. As explained in Chapters 22 and 25, many jurisdictions provide for a pretrial evidentiary hearing on a motion to suppress identification testimony, at which counsel can cross-examine the police officer who conducted the identification procedure and often the complainant or eyewitness who identified the respondent. And where a tendered identification witness has made no pretrial identification of the defendant, counsel can request a screening hearing to determine the admissibility of a first-time in-court identification. See § 25.05(a) supra. Thus, by the time of the trial, counsel will frequently have had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the identifying witness and will know which cross-examination questions work and which do not. See §§ 22.02, 22.04(b), 22.04(c) supra.

Complainants who were victimized while confronting their assailant and who identify the respondent are best examined with an emphasis on the speed of the transaction, any bad lighting and obstructions to vision, the lack of opportunity to observe carefully under the circumstances, and the fear that they were feeling at the time and that impeded detached and accurate appreciation of events or attention to the features of the assailant. See § 31.01(b), subdivision (1) supra. See, e.g., People v. Bailey, 102 A.D.3d 701, 702, 958 N.Y.S.2d 173, 175 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013). It should be brought out that the complainant never saw the assailant before the few seconds or minutes in question and (if this is so) has not seen the assailant since. The complainant may be portrayed as one who is willing to risk an innocent person’s conviction on false self-confidence in a stressful spur-of-the-moment impression.
Any discrepancies between the respondent’s appearance at trial and the description of the assailant given to the police by the complainant should be brought out. This can best be done by (a) asking whether the complainant described the assailant to the police; (b) asking on how many occasions descriptions were given; (c) asking what those descriptions were; (d) reading the description in the police report, unless the complainant relates it accurately, and asking whether that is not more like it; (e) exploring all details of discrepancy; and (f) asking whether the complainant’s recollection was not better immediately after the offense than it is now. Omission in the original description of salient characteristics of the respondent is significant. See, e.g., People v. Greene, 110 A.D.3d 827, 828-29, 973 N.Y.S.2d 239, 241 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013) (dictum) (defense counsel should have been permitted to cross-examine an eyewitness about the omission of a physical characteristic in his initial description of the perpetrator: the witness, who testified at trial that the defendant’s “‘squinting, ‘partly closed’ left eye” was “a significant factor in his identifying the defendant as the assailant,” could properly be impeached on the ground of the “omission of this observation of the assailant’s appearance when he described the assailant to the police.”).

Even if a motion to suppress identification testimony has been litigated and denied, counsel is entitled to present a misidentification defense at trial and, in support of that defense, to explore at trial any suggestive police behavior that might have contributed to a misidentification. Sales v. Harris, 675 F.2d 532, 539-40 (2d Cir. 1982) (the trial judge erred by instructing the jury, on the basis of a pretrial suppression ruling, that photographic identification procedures were nonsuggestive as a matter of law); cf. Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986) (an accused’s constitutional right to present a defense entitles the accused to adduce evidence at trial that his or her confession was coerced even though that issue was resolved against the accused in a pretrial suppression hearing); and see People v. Santiago, 17 N.Y.3d 661, 672-73, 958 N.E.2d 874, 883-84, 934 N.Y.S.2d 746, 754-55 (2011) (the trial court abused its discretion and committed reversible error by denying a defense request to call an expert witness to testify at a jury trial regarding the reliability of eyewitness identifications). If the complainant identified the respondent in a lineup or other police-staged confrontation, emphasis should be placed on (1) any circumstances in the identification situation that tended to single out, or “finger,” the respondent (Was the respondent exhibited to the complainant alone? If in a lineup, was s/he dressed unlike the others? How much did the others resemble the respondent in gross characteristics?); and (2) any circumstances pointing to police persuasion or suggestion. It is fruitful to explore everything said by the police to the complainant prior to, or at the time of, the identification. But this can be safely done only if counsel knows from the pretrial suppression hearing or a voir dire hearing that questions on this subject will not elicit damaging answers (e.g., that the respondent had been convicted for earlier similar offenses).

Authorities and sources of information useful in challenging the reliability of eyewitness identifications are collected in §§ 25.03, 11.01(a) subdivision 13, 11.01(b) third paragraph supra and in Dennis v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 834 F.3d 263, 314-45 (3d Cir. 2016) (en banc) (McKee, C.J., concurring); see also § 6.02(b) fourth and fifth paragraphs supra. 936
§ 31.06 THE COMPLAINANT IN A RAPE OR OTHER SEXUAL OFFENSE

When cross-examining a complainant in a sex-offense prosecution, counsel should ordinarily adopt as solicitous and kindly a manner as possible. This is not merely a matter of showing consideration for an individual who has been traumatized; the factfinder (whether judge or jury) is likely to feel sympathy for the complainant, so that a belligerent or bantering tone on counsel’s part will probably arouse the judge’s or jury’s ire. This is especially true when the complainant is a child. See § 31.08 infra.

The traditional defense technique of showing the victim’s prior sexual history and lack of chastity has been prohibited or limited in numerous jurisdictions by statutes, court rules, and appellate decisions usually called generically “rape shield laws.” See, e.g., Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145, 146-47 (1991); I. Bennett Capers, Real Women, Real Rape, 60 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 826 (2013), and sources cited. Even where the technique remains available, it is likely to backfire with judges and jurors who subscribe to the now-largely-accepted view that prior sexual history has nothing to do with whether one has or has not been raped. See, e.g., McLean v. United States, 377 A.2d 74 (D.C. 1977) (upholding a trial judge’s exclusion of evidence of the complainant’s reputation for unchastity and prior sexual relations with persons other than the accused because this evidence was insufficiently probative of consent). Some uses of evidence of a rape complainant’s sexual behavior on occasions other than the one at issue are permissible and may be persuasive. Compare State v. Lavalleur, 289 Neb. 102, 108, 111, 853 N.W.2d 203, 210, 212 (2014) (“Nebraska’s rape shield statute,” which “bars ‘[e]vidence offered to prove that any victim engaged in other sexual behavior’ and ‘[e]vidence offered to prove any victim’s sexual predisposition,’” did not apply to defense counsel’s intended cross-examination of the complainant about her “romantic relationship . . . with another woman” in order to “establish that [complainant] M.J. had a motive to falsify her accounting of the events”); State v. Montoya, 333 P.3d 935, 937, 944 (N.M. 2014) (the rape shield law did not bar defense counsel’s intended cross-examination of the complainant about her past sexual relationship with the defendant: “Defendant does not argue that because of ‘make-up sex’ in that past, Victim must have intended consensual ‘make-up sex’ on this occasion. Defendant’s theory goes not to Victim’s propensity or her state of mind; it goes solely to his own thinking (specific intent) in light of an alleged pattern of conduct and understanding between the two parties in the context of allegedly similar circumstances. Defendant was free to point out that once he realized that the facts and circumstances were not similar to a pattern of ‘make-up sex,’ his sexual advances ceased.” Id. at 944. “The rape shield law should not serve to protect the prosecution and its characterization of a case, especially when . . . concerns regarding Victim’s embarrassment and harassment are minimal.” Id.). Local precedents and practice should be consulted.

There are essentially three defenses in rape cases: (i) misidentification; (ii) fabrication; and (iii) consent.

In cases in which the defense is misidentification, counsel should cross-examine the complainant on the factors that prevented the complainant from getting a good look at the assailant: it was dark out; the complainant’s face was covered; the assailant’s face was covered; the complainant was so terrified as to be unable to focus meaningfully on the perpetrator’s face; and so forth. See § 31.05 supra and the cross-references there. Whenever a misidentification defense is presented, it is extremely important that counsel speak with the prosecution’s DNA and serology experts (see §§ 6.02(b), last two paragraphs, 11.02 supra) and consider retaining defense experts as consultants and potential expert witnesses (see Chapter 11).

In cases in which the defense is fabrication (either that there was no sexual act at all or that the complainant is deliberately blaming the respondent for a sexual act committed by someone else), counsel will have to establish that the complainant bears a severe enough bias or grudge against the respondent to motivate a false charge of this magnitude. See Sussman v. Jenkins, 636 F.3d 329, 358-59 (7th Cir. 2011).

In cases in which the defense is consent (or, more precisely, in which counsel plans to argue that the prosecution has not proved the element of lack of consent beyond a reasonable doubt), counsel should stress any objective manifestations of consent – words spoken by the complainant or acts committed by the complainant that are consistent with consent. Unused opportunities for escape or outcry should also be brought out.

If the respondent is charged with a sexual offense against a minor, the applicable statute or caselaw usually specifies that consent is not a defense. Accordingly, the cross-examination will need to pursue any available evidence of fabrication or misidentification. See also § 31.08 infra.

§ 31.07 THE MUTUAL ASSAULT COMPLAINANT

In assault cases arising out of fights, cross-examination should emphasize the aggressiveness of the complainant. If the complainant can be made, while being cross-examined, to express hostility to the respondent or counsel, that sort of display is useful. Sometimes it can be elicited by a slightly abrasive or sarcastic manner of examination.

When favorable, the comparative size of the complainant and respondent, any disparity in their weapons, and any disproportion in the numbers of their allies should be developed. The complainant’s ability to avoid the affray should also be developed, especially in cases involving charges of assault and battery on police officers. A police officer with a nearby radio to call for assistance, a partner to help quiet a situation, and training in handling arrests and disturbances should rarely have to resort to much physical force to control a juvenile. This can be pointed out in closing argument if the underlying facts are elicited on cross-examination. Counsel should remember that juries seldom apply the technical rules of self-defense in mutual assault cases and are rather prone to balance the equities and vote for the underdog.

§ 31.08 THE CHILD COMPLAINANT OR WITNESS
The subject of children’s competency to testify is covered in § 30.05 supra.

In cross-examining child witnesses, counsel must treat them with the consideration that counsel would want to have extended to his or her own child, since the factfinder (whether jury or judge) will resent any treatment harsher than that which they would want extended to their children. Moreover, gentle methods and a considerate tone are most likely to win the confidence of the child and to establish that counsel is not the child’s enemy. If the child witness responds to counsel’s solicitous manner with recalcitrance or belligerence, then the factfinder will tolerate counsel’s employment of a somewhat more aggressive manner.

Any young child’s testimony can be attacked in one of two ways. If it is detailed, it smacks of something “pat” or “rehearsed,” and counsel should stress the extent of the child’s pretrial discussions of the case with parents, police, social workers, therapists, and the prosecutor. If it is sketchy, that should be emphasized in order to depict the child as one whose vagueness demonstrates a general unreliability arising from a failure to appreciate the significance of the whole matter. There is a considerable body of empirical literature examining factors that may affect the accuracy and reliability of children’s testimony, including various forms of investigative interrogation, pretrial coaching and in-court question construction. Cross-examiners can benefit from consulting this literature. See, e.g., Stacia N. Stolzenberg, Kelly McWilliams & Thomas D. Lyon, Ask Versus Tell: Potential Confusion When Child Witnesses Are Questioned About Conversations (forthcoming, in the Journal of Experimental Psychology: Applied) (2017) [SSRN-id2970165.pdf] and sources cited.

§ 31.09 PROSECUTION EXPERTS

Cross-examining an expert witness is ordinarily a difficult and risky business. Most experts who testify are also expert testifiers, and counsel who attacks them needlessly does so at the peril of being made to look like a knave or a fool. In a jury trial especially, these appearances can prove far more harmful to the respondent’s case than is the substance of the expert’s testimony.

The general procedure for qualifying a witness as an expert is discussed in § 33.12 infra. When the prosecution calls a witness whom defense counsel anticipates that the prosecutor will attempt to qualify as an expert, counsel should consider whether to stipulate to the witness’s qualifications. See § 30.02(b) supra. A stipulation will render unnecessary the standard qualifying routine (see § 33.12(a)) which – in addition to serving its technical function of bringing the rules of expert testimony into play – may make the witness come across as impressive and thereby enhance his or her persuasiveness to the trier of fact. If counsel’s appraisal of the witness’s credentials and demeanor suggest that this is the case, a stipulation is usually wise. If the witness’s technical qualifications are doubtful or if his or her exposition of them is likely to appear self-touting, pompous, or otherwise unattractive, counsel should usually let the prosecutor proceed with the qualifying routine. In a jury trial, counsel should come to the bench (see § 30.02(a)(2) supra) to make whatever objections and arguments s/he may have regarding a prosecution expert’s qualifications; and if counsel chooses to cross-examine the witness as a basis for those objections, s/he should ask that the jury be sent out during this examination (see §§ 30.02(a)(2), 30.02(a)(3) supra, 34.05 infra). With the jury excluded, counsel can also undertake to challenge traditional standards for qualifying experts in any particular field – contending, for example that qualification must be based upon demonstrated proficiency rather than mere credentials (see Brandon L. Garrett & Gregory Mitchell, The Proficiency of Experts, Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) (discussed in § 39.15 infra) and of the legal community’s increasing skepticism regarding the reliability of many sorts of conventional forensic-science evidence (see the next-to-last paragraph of this section). In the event that the witness is permitted to testify as an expert, counsel may later want to point out any weaknesses in the expert’s credentials or experience as grounds for disparaging his or her observations and conclusions; and counsel will not want the jury to hear this aspect of closing argument as a rehash of a mid-trial open-court colloquy in which counsel made similar points to which the judge responded by ruling the witness a qualified expert. (Jurors are unlikely to understand that the credentials for expert qualification are minimal and that the judge’s ruling does not constitute an endorsement of an expert’s worth.) When defense investigation has disclosed potentially fatal defects in a prosecution expert’s qualifications, a pretrial motion in limine to preclude his or her testimony may be in order. See §§ 7.03(c), 30.02(a)(1), 30.02(a)(2) supra. However, counsel should keep in mind that it is often a better defense strategy to permit the prosecution to go to trial with a dubiously qualified expert – and to use the expert’s lack of qualifications as a ground (among others) for asking the trier of fact to discredit his or her opinions – than to unhorse a prosecution expert before trial and alert the prosecutor to the need to retain a more persuasive one.

Counsel should ask that the prosecution state specifically in what field it seeks to have a witness qualified as an expert, and should ask the judge to include a specification of the field of expertise in any ruling qualifying an expert. Whether through carelessness or craftiness, prosecution experts often offer opinions that exceed the bounds of their field of qualification.
Counsel wants to be in a position to object to these. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Montavo, 439 Pa. Super. 216, 223, 653 A.2d 700, 703-04 (1995) (“Trooper Bozich should not have been allowed to testify concerning a matter which was beyond the scope of his qualification as an expert and which was not beyond the ken of lay jurors. Accordingly, we reverse and remand for a new trial because of the severely prejudicial effect of permitting the arresting officer to state expressly that he was convinced that appellant was involved in narcotics trafficking.”); Gabaree
v. Steele, 792 F.3d 991, 998, 1000 (8th Cir. 2015) (“we do not think it reasonable not to object when an expert witness tells the jury he believed the girls were truthful when speaking with a different doctor. Dr. Kelly’s testimony, in fact, was inadmissible bolstering of other witnesses (the girls) and, as the state court recognized, should have been excluded after a proper objection.

¶ Dr. Sisk testified that Gabaree, if he was following the beliefs he expressed to Dr. Sisk, was ‘probably abusing or neglecting the children,’ including by using them to meet his sexual needs.
Like Dr. Kelly’s testimony, Dr. Sisk’s opinion improperly concluded for the jury that Gabaree had acted on his expressed beliefs and sexually abused his children. His testimony, with proper objection, would have been excluded. ¶ This testimony improperly drew a conclusion about Gabaree’s actions that was the jury’s to make.”); Commonwealth v. Horne, 476 Mass. 222, 222-30, 66 N.E.3d 633, 634-40 (2017) (a Boston police officer, who was certified as an expert on “several aspects of street-level narcotics activity,” improperly testified about “the typical physical characteristics of crack cocaine addicts” – in support of the prosecution’s strategy of “proving that since the defendant did not match the physical characteristics of a drug addict, he must be a drug dealer” – which constituted impermissible “negative profiling testimony,” giving “rise to a substantial risk of a miscarriage of justice” and requiring reversal of the conviction); cf. Venalonzo v. People, 388 P.3d 868, 881 (Colo. 2017) (allowing a forensic interviewer in a child abuse case to testify as a lay witness that the complainant’s behavior was similar to that of other abused children was reversible error, both because it bolstered the complainant’s testimony and because it constituted inadmissible opinion evidence in the absence of qualification of the interviewer as an expert; “the prosecution’s failure to disclose the interviewer as an expert witness prejudiced Venalonzo because the interviewer’s specialized experience, combined with her use of technical terms, imbued her testimony with an air of expertise and may have led the jury to credit her assessment of the children’s credibility over other evidence in the case. If Venalonzo had had the benefit of pretrial disclosure of the interviewer’s expert testimony and the bases for her opinions, then he would have had “the opportunity to evaluate the testimony in advance of trial or to obtain his own expert witness.”’’); United States v. Natal, 849 F.3d 530, 533-34, 536-37 (2d Cir. 2017) (per curiam) (the district court erred in allowing the prosecution to present lay testimony by “an employee of the Sprint Nextel wireless communication company” on “how cell phone towers operate”; the aspects of cell tower operations about which the Sprint Nextel employee testified “constitute[d] . . . expert testimony” and therefore could not “be introduced through a lay witness”).

In general, an expert should not be cross-examined at any length unless s/he has substantially contributed to the prosecution’s case or hurt the defense. Experts whose testimony supports minor or technical prosecution points may be passed without cross-examination or asked a few questions designed to demonstrate the narrow scope of their testimony (see § 31.01(b) supra).

An expert whose testimony is significantly damaging must usually be cross-examined, but it is often wiser to attack him or her on some narrow point on which s/he is particularly vulnerable – and subsequently to urge in closing argument that the expert’s failure on this point demonstrates ineptitude or carelessness that makes the expert’s other views unworthy of credence – than to attack the expert broadside in the cross-examination itself. Cf. John T. Philipsborn, Feature: When Fine Print Matters; Reviewing Mental Health Assessment and Testing-Related Literature and Test Manuals is a Key to Effectively Preparing and Examining Mental Health Experts, 37-FEB THE CHAMPION 40 (February 2013). When there are no demonstrable flaws in the expert’s methodology or reasoning, cross-examination should ordinarily be limited to asking whether the expert’s conclusions are not simply his or her opinions and whether they do not depend on fact A or fact B, which the expert has been told by others in the course of his or her investigations or which s/he has been asked to assume hypothetically in court. Rebuttal evidence can then be addressed to specifics – to showing that fact A or B may not be true or that the witness’s expert opinion differs from that of equally reputable experts.

An expert is frequently best cross-examined by confronting him or her with the fact that s/he differs from another expert and asking for an explanation of the disagreement. S/he will tend to do one of three things, all helpful to the cross-examiner: (a) display dogmatism by asserting that s/he is right; (b) display indecisiveness by admitting that it is a matter of a reasonable difference of opinion; or (c) attempt a technical resolution of the conflict and so lose the understanding of the factfinder (whether jury or judge).

Preparation for cross-examination of an expert imperatively requires that counsel (a) obtain the expert’s report or the substance of the expert’s testimony by pretrial investigation or discovery (see §§ 9.07(c) subdivision 3, 11.02 supra); (b) obtain the original materials which the expert examined or analyzed (see §§ 9.07(c) subdivision 1); (c) obtain the expert’s c.v. (see § 11.02); and (d) consult with a defense expert who can help counsel to (i) understand what the prosecution expert is saying, (ii) find holes in it, and (iii) identify recognized standard texts containing assertions of opinion inconsistent with those of the prosecution expert (see §§ 11.01(b), 12.08 supra). Relevant texts include those focused on the particular scientific field in which the prosecution expert is purportedly qualified and also texts relating to general standards for forensic testimony (see, e.g., David H. Kaye, Hypothesis Testing in Law and Forensic Science: A Memorandum, 130 Harv. L. Rev. Forum 127 (2017); Andrew Sulner, Critical Issues Affecting the Reliability and Admissibility of Handwriting Identification Opinion Evidence – How They Have Been Addressed (or Not) Since the 2009 NAS Report, and How They Should Be Addressed Going Forward: A Document Examiner Tells All, 48 Seton Hall L. Rev. 631 (2018); William C. Thompson, How Should Forensic Scientists Present Source Conclusions?, 48 Seton Hall L. Rev. 773 (2018); Michael J. Saks, The Disregarded Necessity: Validity Testing of Forensic Feature-Comparison Techniques, 48 Seton Hall L. Rev. 733 (2018)).

Armed with an inconsistent statement in a reputable textbook, counsel should ask the prosecution expert: (1) whether s/he recognizes the text as a reputable standard work; (2) whether s/he has read it; and (3) whether s/he consulted it in preparing his or her testimony for trial. [If s/he has read, or if s/he has used, the book, s/he should be asked: (4) whether it supports the opinion that s/he has given.] S/he should then be read specific passages from the text and asked to answer, with a yes or no: (5) whether s/he agrees with the statement just read; (6) whether it supports the opinion to which s/he has testified; and (7) whether it is not, in fact, inconsistent with the opinion to which s/he has testified. (In jury trials, it is especially important to press for a yes-or-no concession of inconsistency, since the jury will understand this response but may not understand the expert’s direct examination. If the prosecutor objects to the forcing of the witness to answer yes or no, counsel should remind the court that the prosecutor will have an ample opportunity to let the witness explain on redirect.)

If no standard texts can be found on which to base this sort of examination, conflicting opinions can be brought in by asking whether, if another reputable expert had made a study of the matter and concluded that . . . [describing the conclusion of the defense expert], the witness would think that such a conclusion was beyond the range of reasonable expert judgment. If the prosecutor objects that the question lacks foundation, counsel should offer to connect it up or, alternatively, ask for leave to recall the prosecution’s expert for cross-examination following testimony by the defense expert.

Counsel should have the defense expert in court throughout the testimony of the prosecution expert (see §§ 11.01(b), 12.08(b), 27.11 second paragraph supra) and, at the conclusion of the latter’s direct examination, should request a recess to confer with the defense expert in order to prepare for cross. (In jury trials this request should be made at the bench so that if the defense expert is unable to discern any openings for productive cross-examination, it will not appear to the jury that the defense expert has been consulted and has given the prosecution’s expert a clean bill of health.) After conferring with the defense expert, counsel should decide whether points of vulnerability in the testimony of the prosecution expert are best assailed by (1) cross-examining the prosecution expert or (2) having the defense expert do a book review of the prosecution expert’s testimony when the defense expert testifies or (3) arguing in closing argument that the conclusions of the prosecution expert rest upon incorrect or unproved factual assumptions or upon illogical reasoning or (4) arguing in closing that the expert’s basic methodology – or his or her entire field of purported expertise – is too untested or too unreliable for credence or (5) more than one of these methods.

Studies evaluating forensic-science techniques can be located through, e.g., The Wrongful Convictions Blog, http://wrongfulconvictionsblog.org/category/junk-science/, and The Innocence Project Website, http://www.innocenceproject.org/causes-wrongful-conviction/unvalidated-or-improper-forensic-science. Media exposés of crime-lab scandals and anecdotes about erroneous convictions based on spurious scientific evidence have made judges and juries increasingly skeptical about the validity of prosecution expert testimony. Conversely, the glamorous high-tech CSI shows that dominate TV drama have set a high standard for forensic-science performers. These development can favor the defense in either of two ways. Defense expert testimony book-reviewing the prosecution’s scientific case (questioning the performance of the prosecution experts in the particular case at bar or more generally debunking the sub-field of forensic scientific involved) may play well with triers of fact. And even without presenting defense evidence, counsel may be able to shake a trier’s confidence in the prosecution’s scientific proof by advertising in argument to well-advertised miscarriages of justice based on similar sorts of proof, or by suggesting that the prosecution’s experts fell far short of the exacting standards that the trier is entitled to demand in these days of scientific sophistication.

Counsel should not routinely cross-examine on every point of a prosecution expert’s testimony that counsel intends to dispute. Often, a critical review of the prosecution expert’s reasoning by the defense expert, or even a critical review by defense counsel in closing argument, invoking the common sense of the factfinder to reveal the shortcomings of the prosecution expert’s reasoning, will be more effective than attempting to obtain concessions of error from a hostile expert witness on cross.

§ 31.10 IMPEACHING PROSECUTION WITNESSES WITH THEIR PRIOR INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS

One of the most convincing ways of impeaching any witness is by confronting him or her with a prior inconsistent statement. This is permissible in all jurisdictions. See, e.g., United States
v. Mergen, 764 F.3d 199, 206-07 (2d Cir. 2014); Mendenhall v. State, 18 So. 3d 915 (Miss. App. 2009). In many cases counsel will have prior statements by a prosecution witness – either because a written or an oral statement was taken by the police or prosecuting authorities and has been turned over to defense counsel by the prosecution (see §§ 9.07(c), 27.12(a)(1) supra) or because a defense investigator has interviewed the witness and obtained either a written or an oral statement (see § 8.12 supra). A prosecution witness can be impeached with a prior inconsistent statement by asking the following series of questions:

1. “Now, on direct examination, you stated that . . . [repeating the statement verbatim]?”
2. “Have you ever given [or told] anyone a different version of that event [or “those facts” or “that description of the mugger” or “who spoke first” or whatever]?”
3. “You did discuss the matter with Officer X [or “You did testify at the preliminary hearing in this case” . . . or whatever]. did you not?”
4. “That was on . . . [date] at . . . [place]?”
5. “Was anyone else present, do you remember?”
6. “Do you remember that Y was there at that time?”
7. “Did you make a statement at that time relating to the event [or “the facts” or whatever] that was the subject of your testimony on direct examination in which you said . . . [repeating the statement verbatim]?”
8. “Was the statement you made on . . . [date] honest and truthful, so far as you know?”
9. “Your memory would have been fresher then than it is now, would it not?”

[In the case of an oral statement]:

10a “And at that time, did you not say . . . [reciting the inconsistent statement]?”

[In the case of a written statement]:

10b “Was that statement written down, do you know?”
11 “Who wrote it down?”
12 “And did you read the statement that Z wrote down?”
13 “Did it accurately record what you said at that time?”
14 [If the statement is signed]: “Did you sign the statement?”

Counsel should now have the statement marked as an exhibit for identification.

15 “I show you the document marked defense exhibit number 1 for identification. What is that document, if you know?”
16 “Is that the statement which you made on . . . [date] and which Z wrote down?”
17 [If the statement is signed]: “Directing your attention to page 2 of defense exhibit number 1 for identification, at the bottom of the page: Is that your signature?”
(18) “Directing your attention to page 2, line 7, did you not state at that time, quote . . . [reading inconsistent statement], end quote?”

The following questions should be asked only if it is clear that the witness will not be able to reconcile the two statements or to explain the earlier one away persuasively:

(19) “The statement I have just read, which you made on . . . [date], was not the same as your testimony on direct examination here in court today, was it?”
(20) “Was the statement that you made on . . . [date] a lie?”
(21) “Were you hiding something or trying to cover something up when you made it?”
(22) “Then your testimony on direct examination has changed from your earlier truthful statement on this subject, hasn’t it?”

[If counsel wants to take up additional inconsistencies]:

(23) “Now was there anything else in your testimony on direct examination that was not accurate?”
(24) “Was there anything else that was inconsistent with your statement on . . . [date]?”

Counsel should now repeat questions (18)-(22) for each inconsistency, omitting questions (19)-(21) if the witness is personable or if the inconsistency is subtle.

In the federal courts (see Fed. Rule Evid. 613(a)) and in some state jurisdictions, it is permissible to cross-examine a witness concerning prior inconsistent statements without showing or disclosing the statement to the witness. Where this is allowed, it may be more effective for counsel to paraphrase than to quote the prior statement, particularly when a quick-minded witness assisted by the exact text could seize upon details to reconcile it with his or her present testimony.

Counsel should ordinarily not impeach a witness with prior statements unless the statements clearly contradict points of some importance in the witness’s testimony. Confronting a witness with hypertechnical or trivial inconsistencies appears to be mere carping and usually does more harm to counsel’s credibility than to the witness’s. The principal exception to this rule is the case in which there are numerous minor inconsistencies in the prior statement or statements of a witness who could not be honestly mistaken (such as an accomplice turned state’s evidence) and whom counsel is therefore attempting to portray as a deliberate liar.

If a prosecution witness admits having made a prior inconsistent statement, no additional (“extrinsic”) evidence on the subject is permitted. See, e.g., Aikins v. State, 256 Ind. 671, 271 N.E.2d 418 (1971). Traditionally, if a witness denies having made a prior statement and if the statement is “non-collateral” (or, in some jurisdictions, “material”), counsel is permitted to present extrinsic evidence in the defense case to prove that the witness did make the statement. Compare State v. Valentine, 240 Conn. 395, 397-405, 692 A.2d 727, 730-34 (1997), and Pearce
v. State, 880 So. 2d 561, 568-70 (Fla. 2004) (dictum), and People v. Collins, 145 A.D.3d 1479, 1480, 44 N.Y.S.3d 830, 832 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2016), with State v. Walsh, 731 A.2d 696, 698 (R.I. 1999). The Federal Evidence Rules and the rules in many States that have followed the lead of the Federal Rules eliminate the requirement that the prior statement be “non-collateral.” FED. RULE EVID. 613(b) provides: “Extrinsic evidence of a witness’s prior inconsistent statement is admissible only if the witness is given an opportunity to explain or deny the statement and an adverse party is given an opportunity to examine the witness about it, or if justice so requires.” A prior oral statement may be proved by the testimony of anyone who heard it. See, e.g., Elmer v. State, 114 So. 3d 198 (Fla. App. 2012); State v. Fossick, 333 S.C. 66, 508 S.E.2d 32 (1998) (dictum). A prior written statement may be admitted as an exhibit upon proper authentication by anyone who wrote it or saw it written or heard the witness acknowledge it as his or her statement.

If a witness professes not to remember having made a prior statement (rather than expressly denying the statement), the jurisdictions differ on whether the statement can be proved extrinsically. Ordinarily, counsel should respond to protestations of lack of memory by questioning the witness in detail about the circumstances surrounding the witness’s making of the statement: “Do you remember that X was there at the time?” “This was down in the jail, in the second floor cellblock, do you remember?” “Do you remember that you said . . . [repeating the statement in detail]?” Some jurisdictions permit counsel to hand the witness a prior written statement and ask the witness if that refreshes his or her recollection, even though the document itself is not technically admissible.

§ 31.11 IMPEACHING PROSECUTION WITNESSES WITH THEIR PRIOR CONVICTIONS AND PRIOR [BAD] ACTS

As explained in § 27.12(a)(2) supra, some jurisdictions require that the prosecution turn over to defense counsel the judgments of conviction of each prosecution witness who has a prior criminal record, or at least inform defense counsel about the prior convictions so that counsel can obtain a certified copy of the judgments from the convicting court. Counsel should request discovery of such criminal records – and of information regarding any pending charges or investigations implicating every prosecution witness – even in jurisdictions that do not expressly require this disclosure. Because Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 315-16 (1974), and cognate cases cited in § 30.07(c) supra entitle the respondent to use these materials for impeachment, they come within the Due Process disclosure requirements of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963). See, e.g., Weary v. Cain, 136 S. Ct. 1002, 1006-07 (2016) (per curiam) (“the rule stated in Brady applies to evidence undermining witness credibility”); section 9.09(a) supra. To the extent described in § 30.07(c) supra, the defense is also entitled to obtain from the prosecutor, and to use for impeachment, information regarding any prior juvenile adjudications of prosecution witnesses, and any [bad] acts bearing on bias (see, e.g., Lobato v. State, 120 Nev. 512, 96 P.3d 765 (2004)), or lack of veracity that the witness committed as an adult or as a juvenile (see, e.g., Bennett v. United States, 763 A.2d 1117 (D.C. 2000); Thomas v. State, 422 Md. 67, 29 A.3d 286 (2011)). And see Taylor v. State, 407 Md. 137, 963 A.2d 197 (2009) (holding that where the prosecution had presented hearsay testimony of the complainant in a prosecution for sexual assault of a 15-year old, the defendant had the right to present extrinsic evidence of the boy’s lying to his father about his sexual experiences on earlier occasions, to impeach the admissible hearsay).

To impeach a witness with a prior conviction, counsel should ask:

“Are you the Joseph B. Smith who was convicted of the crime of burglary on May 14, 2018, in the Circuit Court for X County in the State of Y?”

If the witness admits the prior conviction, it neither needs to be nor may be proved extrinsically as well. If s/he denies the conviction, it may be proved by extrinsic evidence. A conviction is ordinarily proved by a certified record of the judgment and through identification of the witness as the convicted person by the testimony of a participant in his or her trial. (Some States accept identity of names as sufficient.)

If the witness does not deny the prior conviction but merely professes not to remember it, the jurisdictions differ on whether the defense is entitled to present extrinsic proof. In any event, counsel can and should question the witness in detail about the circumstances surrounding the conviction and – unless the facts of the crime were less damning than its name – about the underlying events on which the conviction was based. Although these underlying events are ordinarily not admissible if the witness either admits or denies the prior conviction, they are a proper subject of cross-examination of a witness who claims not to remember a prior conviction, provided that counsel frames the cross-examination as an effort to jog the witness’s memory. (For example, “Would it refresh your recollection to know that the conviction I am asking you about was for beating John Doe with a tire iron?”) Some courts will also permit counsel to hand the witness a certified copy of the judgment of conviction and to ask the witness if it refreshes his or her recollection, even though the document itself cannot be offered into evidence unless the witness denies the conviction. (When handing the document to the witness, counsel can ask, “Would it refresh your memory of this particular conviction if I show you a certified copy of the judgment of the Circuit Court for X County in the State of Y, convicting Joseph B. Smith of the crime of burglary on May 14, 2018?”) Where the factual details of the witness’s conduct underlying a prior conviction or the specifics of a “bad” act admissible for impeachment are significantly more probative of bias or of lack of veracity than the name of the crime or generic description of the “bad act” alone, the constitutional right to confrontation would seem to entitle the respondent to elicit the minutiae. See Longus v. United States, 52 A.3d 836, 853-54 (D.C. 2012) (“[T]he trial court’s ruling was based on the erroneous belief that cross-examination about the fact of a pending investigation, without allowing defense counsel to probe into and present extrinsic evidence of the underlying facts, satisfied appellant’s right under the Sixth Amendment to expose all of Detective Brown’s potential biases relevant to his testimony in appellant’s trial. This cross-examination was probative. It would have permitted the jury reasonably to infer not only that Detective Brown was motivated to curry favor with the government because he was under criminal investigation, but also that he was not a trustworthy witness as shown by his prior corrupt behavior in the Club U homicide investigation. . . . [D]efense counsel ‘was entitled to impeach [the detective’s] credibility with both the fact and the subject matter of the investigation.’”).

Of course, it is impermissible to engage in this kind of examination unless the questions have a basis in fact, and counsel should be prepared to explain that basis to the court on request. However, the facts relied upon to supply the basis for cross-examining do not need to be provable by legally admissible evidence. See, e.g., Thomas v. State, 422 Md. at 76-79, 29 A.3d at 290-92.

§ 31.12 IMPEACHING WITNESSES WITH THEIR REPUTATION FOR DISHONESTY

Extrinsic evidence of a witness’s general lack of veracity – commonly in the form of “testimony about the witness’s reputation for having a character for . . . untruthfulness, or by testimony in the form of an opinion about that character” – is ordinarily admissible for impeachment (see, e.g., Fed. Rule Evid. 608(a); People v. Fernandez, 17 N.Y.3d 70, 76-78, 950 N.E.2d 126, 130-32, 926 N.Y.S.2d 390, 394-96 (2011)), although local rules relating to this sort of evidence differ and should be consulted. Usually, it is profitless to attack a prosecution witness by this route unless (1) the prosecution witness is critical to the prosecution’s case and is uncorroborated on essential points and (2) the defense can present several witnesses – themselves reasonably attractive – to testify to the bad character of the prosecution witness.

§ 31.13 THE PROSECUTOR’S TENDER OF A WITNESS TO AVOID A MISSING WITNESS INFERENCE

Some prosecutors guard against a missing witness inference or instruction (see § 10.08 supra) by tendering to defense counsel at trial witnesses whom the prosecution is not going to call. If counsel has not previously interviewed the witness and unless it is clear that what the witness knows is insignificant, counsel should request a continuance that is adequate to interview the witness privately. Thereafter, counsel may call the witness as a defense witness or may ask leave of court to call him or her as a hostile witness or may request that the court call him or her as a court witness. (See § 33.25 infra.)

The latter two procedures are particularly important in jurisdictions that follow the common-law rule forbidding a party to lead or impeach the party’s own witnesses. A witness who is found by the court to be “hostile” to the party wishing to present the witness’s testimony may be called for questioning as though s/he were on cross-examination and may be impeached by the calling party; and a court witness is called for cross-examination and is subject to impeachment by both parties.

Hostility (that is, adversity to the calling party’s interests) must be demonstrated in order to support a request that a witness be called as hostile. Jurisdictions and individual judges vary considerably regarding the kind of showing of hostility that they require. But defense counsel can often obtain some relaxation of the respondent’s burden by citing Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), which holds that the federal Constitution forbids a State to couple rigorous “hostility” requirements with rigid prohibitions against impeaching one’s own witness, so as to deprive the accused of any fair opportunity to present vital defensive evidence. See § 33.04 infra; and cf. Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979) (per curiam).

Sometimes prosecutors tender a witness in open court, announcing that they are not calling him or her because the witness’s testimony would be “cumulative.” Counsel may want to respond by moving for a mistrial on the ground that the prosecutor is seeking to bolster the prosecution’s case unfairly by asserting that s/he has unpresented evidence which confirms the testimony of the witnesses whom s/he did present. (By analogy, a prosecutor’s assertion that “information not presented to the jury supports . . . [a prosecution] witness’s testimony” has consistently been held improper (United States v. Hermanek, 289 F.3d 1076, 1098 (9th Cir. 2002) (dictum); State v. Ish, 170 Wash. 2d 189, 196, 241 P.3d 389, 392-93 (2010) (dictum); see also Commonwealth v. Brooks, 362 Pa. Super. 236, 238, 523 A.2d 1169, 1170 (1987) (“The prosecutor may not argue facts outside the record ‘unless such facts are matter of common public knowledge based on ordinary human experience or matters of which the court may take judicial notice.’”); § 36.11 infra.) In this situation, a refusal by the court to designate the witness as a court witness and allow the defense to question him or her in cross-examination mode, at the least, is an apparent denial of the right to confrontation. See § 31.01(a) supra.

In a jury trial, if the prosecutor tenders a witness in front of the jury, counsel should approach the bench and request that the jury go out. If counsel wants a recess to interview the witness, counsel should ask that the jury be excused without being told the purpose of the recess, so that the defense will not be prejudiced if counsel decides not to call the witness. After counsel has spoken with the witness and if counsel is not going to call the witness, counsel may want to move for a mistrial on the grounds mentioned in the preceding paragraph. Alternatively, it may be sufficient (depending on the witness’s relation to the case as shown in other testimony) to ask the court to charge the jury when it returns that:

> Just before the recess there was mention of a possible witness, a [Mr.] [Ms.] ______. The Court and counsel have discussed the matter, and it appears that neither the prosecution nor the defense sees any need for this witness’s testimony. I instruct you that you should not infer anything from the fact that the witness was not called and you should not hold that fact against either party or consider it in your deliberations because both sides are agreed that this witness has no information which would be helpful to the jurors’ understanding of the case.

Or counsel may prefer simply to announce to the court on the jury’s return that if the prosecutor is not going to vouch for the credibility of this witness, the defense certainly does not want to hear the witness.

§ 31.14 PROSECUTION CLAIM OF SURPRISE
 Sometimes a prosecutor will elicit nothing incriminating from a witness and will claim “surprise” in order to impeach the witness with a prior statement that is incriminating. Cf. § 33.24 infra. The prior statement is theoretically being used to “neutralize” or discredit the witness’s present testimony but is, in fact, the prosecutor’s method of introducing inadmissible hearsay.

If the witness in his or her direct testimony has simply refused to answer or has said s/he does not remember, or if the witness has given no testimony affirmatively damaging to the prosecution’s case, counsel should resist any attempt to impeach the witness with a prior statement on the grounds (a) that there is nothing to neutralize or to impeach (see, e.g., People v. Villegas, 222 Ill.App.3d 546, 552-54, 584 N.E.2d 248, 253-54, 165 Ill. Dec. 69, 74-75 (1991) (dictum)), and (b) that the admission of the prior statement will violate the respondent’s constitutional right of confrontation (see Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415 (1965)).

If the witness has damaged the prosecution, counsel should request leave to voir dire the witness (in a jury trial, out of the presence of the jury), before the claim of “surprise” is allowed. Counsel should then attempt to establish that the witness has indicated in some way to the prosecutor, before being called, either that s/he did not wish to testify for the prosecution or that s/he would not testify consistently with his or her prior statement or that s/he was going to give testimony of the sort which s/he did, in fact, give. Unless the prosecutor was, in reality, surprised, the prosecutor should not be permitted to claim surprise. See, e.g., King v. State, 994 So. 2d 890, 896-98 (Miss. App. 2008); State v. Cope, 309 N.C. 47, 305 S.E.2d 676 (1983). If the prosecution is given inconsistent stories by a witness prior to trial, it has a way of getting every legitimate benefit of the witness’s possibly favorable testimony, without calling the witness in such a manner as to deprive the respondent of a fair trial and of the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation (see § 31.01(a) supra). The prosecution can call the witness out of the presence of the jury and examine him or her. If the witness testifies favorably to the prosecution, there will be no problem; the prosecutor can then proceed to take the witness’s testimony in open court. If the witness does not give the testimony the prosecutor wants, the prosecutor should not put the witness on the stand in the jury’s presence, and there will be no occasion of “surprise” or for impeachment. Counsel should insist that this is the proper method of proceeding for a prosecutor who has any inkling that a witness will not give favorable testimony (see State v. Guido, 40 N.J. 191, 199-200, 191 A.2d 45, 50 (1963); cf. State v. McDonald, 312 N.C. 264, 269-70, 321 S.E.2d 849, 852 (1984)), and that a prosecutor who fails to follow it is not entitled to claim “surprise.”
Chapter 32

Motion for Acquittal (The “Prima Facie Motion”)

§ 32.01 THE MOTION FOR ACQUITTAL

At the close of the prosecution’s case, it is routine for defense counsel to move for a judgment of acquittal. (Terminology differs among jurisdictions. The motion is sometimes called a “motion to dismiss,” a “prima facie motion,” a “motion for a directed verdict” or a “demurrer to the evidence.”) But cf. Evans v. Michigan, 568 U.S. 313, 329 (2013) (dictum) (“Nothing obligates a jurisdiction to afford its trial courts the power to grant a midtrial acquittal, and at least two States disallow the practice. See Nev. Rev. Stat. § 175.381(1) (2011); State v. Parfait, 96,1814 (La.App. 1 Cir. 05/09/97), 693 So. 2d 1232, 1242.”).

The motion for acquittal tests the legal sufficiency of the prosecution’s evidence to sustain a verdict; that is, it asks the question whether a reasonable juror (or a reasonable judge in a bench trial), crediting the prosecution’s testimony and drawing all rational inferences in the prosecution’s favor, could find every element of the charge proved beyond a reasonable doubt. See, e.g., Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 16-17 (1978); Musacchio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 709, 715 (2016) (“Sufficiency review essentially addresses whether ‘the government’s case was so lacking that it should not have even been submitted to the jury.’ . . . The reviewing court considers only the ‘legal’ question ‘whether, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt.’”). More detailed discussion of this standard and its applications is found in §§ 35.01-35.06 infra.

The Supreme Court held in In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970), “that the Constitution requires proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt” (Cool v. United States, 409 U.S. 100, 104 (1972)), in state as well as federal prosecutions and in juvenile as well as adult criminal trials. See also Ivan V. v. City of New York, 407 U.S. 203 (1972); Hurst v. Florida, 136 S. Ct. 616, 621 (2016) (“The Sixth Amendment . . . ‘right to . . . trial, by an impartial jury. . . .’ . . . , in conjunction with the Due Process Clause, requires that each element of a crime be proved to a jury beyond a reasonable doubt”). As a consequence, the constitutionally required standard for assessing the sufficiency of the prosecution’s evidence is “whether, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt” (Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319 (1979) (emphasis omitted)). See Pilon v. Bordenkircher, 444 U.S. 1 (1979) (per curiam); Tanner v. Yukins, 867 F.3d 661 (6th Cir. 2017); Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31, 41, 45 (1982) (dictum). See also McDaniel v. Brown, 558 U.S. 120, 131 (2010) (per curiam) (“reversal for insufficiency of the evidence [under Jackson v. Virginia, supra] is in effect a determination that the government’s case against the defendant was so lacking that the trial court should have entered a judgment of acquittal”).
Counsel should never neglect to make a motion for acquittal at the close of the prosecution’s evidence. Many courts will not entertain a motion for a judgment of acquittal at the close of all the evidence (see §§ 35.01, 36.01 infra) if such a motion was not first made before the presentation of defense evidence. And, in many jurisdictions, unless a motion for acquittal has been entertained and denied on the merits, the sufficiency of the evidence to support an adjudication of delinquency cannot be raised on an appeal.

The applicable state or local rule or caselaw may require that counsel specify the grounds for dismissal of counts or of the entire charging paper. Counsel’s failure to identify a particular ground may be treated on appeal as a waiver of the claim. See, e.g., Davis v. United States, 367 A.2d 1254, 1269 (D.C. 1976); People v. Santos, 86 N.Y.2d 869, 658 N.E.2d 1041, 635 N.Y.S.2d 168 (1995). But see State v. Lopez, 907 N.W.2d 112 (Iowa 2018) (reversing a conviction on the ground of ineffective assistance of counsel where a defense attorney’s stated grounds in moving for acquittal failed to include a valid contention that the defendant’s conduct did not come within the terms of the statute defining the crime with which he was charged).

In arguing the motion in a bench trial, defense counsel should try to engage the judge in dialogue rather than to indulge in formal exhortation. The judge may deny the motion, but what s/he says may give an indication of how s/he views the prosecution’s proof and therefore of the points to which defense testimony can most profitably be directed.

In a jury trial it is advisable to make the motion for acquittal out of earshot of the jury, since there may be some adverse effect of having the jury hear the judge deny a defense contention that the prosecution’s case is insufficient. If a recess is going to be called at about this time, counsel can make the motion after the jury has gone out. If not, counsel should ask leave to approach the bench and should make the motion at sidebar.

§ 32.02 RESERVING RULING ON THE MOTION; “HOLDING OPEN”

Some judges will attempt to reserve ruling until the close of the case. Judges are particularly likely to employ such a practice in a bench trial. If a judge expresses an inclination to reserve ruling on the motion, counsel should politely, but firmly, insist on getting a ruling before counsel has to decide whether to present any defense evidence. Counsel should point out that the deferral of a ruling until the close of the case would deny the respondent his or her right, central to the accusatorial system and protected by the constitutional Privilege against Self-incrimination (see Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972)), to have a judicial determination of the legal sufficiency of the prosecutor’s case before the respondent is obliged to put in a defense. Because any evidence that the respondent presents may be used against him or her to produce a guilty verdict and sustain it against a motion for acquittal at the close of all the evidence (see, e.g., Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462, 472 (2005) (describing state rules to this effect)), a court’s refusal to rule on such a motion before the defense elects to present evidence constitutes compelled self-incrimination – precisely the evil against which the Privilege is directed. See, e.g., State v. Smith, 675 P.2d 521, 523-24 (Utah 1983) (the trial court erred in “reserv[ing] its decision until after the defendant presented his evidence, and then den[y]ing the motion. We think that the defendant was entitled to a ruling before he commenced his own case in chief, and it was error for the trial court to have refused to rule promptly.”; the state statute authorizing a motion for a directed verdict in a criminal proceeding “is founded on the basic concept that a defendant need not adduce any evidence in his defense unless the prosecution first adduces believable evidence of all the elements of the crime charged. Only then should the defendant be put to his proof.”). Cf. Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. at 471-72 (stating, in the context of a double jeopardy claim, that a rule that would permit a trial judge to grant a motion for acquittal on one or more counts at the close of the prosecution’s case and then to reconsider that ruling after “the trial has proceeded to the defendant’s presentation of his case” on the remaining counts would create the “possibility of prejudice” by potentially “induc[ing] a defendant to present a defense to the undismissed charges when he would be better advised to stand silent”); R.J.W. v. State, 910 So. 2d 357, 360-61 (Fla. App. 2005) (applying Smith v. Massachusetts, supra, in a delinquency case to hold that the judge, who had granted the defense’s motion for dismissal at the conclusion of the State’s case, violated the Double Jeopardy Clause by thereafter allowing the State to re-open its case and present additional evidence). Compare Jackson v. United States, 250 F.2d 897, 901 (5th Cir. 1958) (construing the then-existing version of Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 29 to preclude trial judges from “reserv[ing] a ruling on a motion for acquittal . . . at the close of the Government’s case,” and explaining that otherwise the defendant would be “force[d] . . . to an election between resting and being deprived of the benefit of the motion” because “[t]he introduction of evidence after the denial of a motion made at the close of the prosecution’s case waives any error in the denial of the motion”), with Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 29(b) (as amended in 1994 to “permit[ ] the reservation of a motion for a judgment of acquittal made at the close of the government’s case” (Advisory Committee Notes to Rule 29) and to specify that “[i]f the court reserves decision, it must decide the motion on the basis of the evidence at the time the ruling was reserved” (Rule 29(b)).

Occasionally the prosecutor will ask the court to “hold open” the prosecution’s case-in-chief because some exhibit has to be tidied up before it can be put in or because some witness on a formal point has been delayed or for some other reason of convenience. The excuse generally sounds sensible, and the suggestion that the case be held open is beguiling from the point of view of practicality if a continuance can be avoided by this apparently simple device. But the effect of the device may be far from simple in a close case, and “holding open” should be resisted on the ground that the presumption of innocence comports “the right of the accused to ‘remain inactive and secure, until the prosecution has taken up its burden and produced evidence and effected persuasion . . . .’” (Taylor v. Kentucky, 436 U.S. 478, 484 n.12 (1978); Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 533 (1979) (dictum)). See the discussion of Brooks v. Tennessee, supra, in § 9.12 penultimate paragraph supra.

§ 32.03 DISMISSAL OF SOME COUNTS OR OFFENSES

The court may grant a judgment of acquittal on some counts of a multi-count Petition and deny it on others. It may order an acquittal on the charge made in the charging paper but deny it for some lesser included offense. See §§ 36.01, 36.05 infra.

In a jury trial, if the motion is granted in part, counsel should ordinarily ask the court to so inform the jury before the presentation of any defense evidence. This avoids the adverse psychological set that some jurors may develop if they perceive that the defense is not responding to one of the prosecutor’s contentions – a psychological block that may persist even when the jury learns, at the end of the whole case, that that contention will not be submitted to the jury. If the jurors are already negotiating their verdict (as juries do from time to time during breaks in the trial, notwithstanding the judicial admonition not to discuss the case), informing them that a particular charge has been dismissed also avoids the possibility that a pro-defense juror will compromise when there is nothing to compromise about.
Chapter 33

Presenting the Case for the Defense

Part A. General Aspects of the Defense Case

§ 33.01 THE DECISION WHETHER TO PRESENT DEFENSE EVIDENCE

In most trials it is not until the conclusion of the prosecution’s case-in-chief and the court’s denial of respondent’s motion for acquittal (see Chapter 32 supra) that counsel makes the final decision whether to present defense evidence. Of course, a tentative plan of the defense case has to be thoroughly worked out before trial; this is necessary for the adequate preparation of potential defense witnesses; the proposed defense testimony will also guide counsel’s opening statement, if any, and counsel’s cross-examination and objections during the prosecution’s case-in-chief. But, except in a case in which it is plain from the outset that defense testimony is inevitable, counsel should design any opening statement and any other proceedings that s/he conducts before the end of the prosecution’s case in such a way as to leave open the question whether the defense will present evidence.

That question has to be decided at last when the court overrules the motion for acquittal following the prosecution’s case-in-chief. There are few generalities of any use to a defense lawyer at this point. Obviously, the weaker the prosecution’s case, the more difficult is the choice, since defense testimony may supply deficiencies in the prosecution’s evidence and bolster unconvincing aspects. How much it will tend to do so must be appraised by counsel. (In an assault case in which the identification testimony is flimsy, for example, an effective alibi would probably tip the scales in favor of acquittal; conversely, the presentation of a self-defense claim would fill the gap in the prosecution’s case by conceding that the respondent was the perpetrator.) In this regard counsel must remember that the prosecutor is going to have the opportunity to cross-examine the defense witnesses; that the prosecutor can lead them and hence push them around somewhat; and that – particularly in jurisdictions where “wide-open” cross-examination is permitted (that is, cross-examination going beyond the subject matter of the direct and touching anything pertinent to the case) – counsel may have a good deal to worry about from his or her own erstwhile supporters.

In making the decision, counsel also needs to evaluate the possible impact of the presentation of defensive evidence on the disposition of the case if the respondent is convicted. Defensive evidence that is favorable on the guilt question must nevertheless be scrutinized for its potential impact on punishment. Counsel must assess the risk that if the respondent takes the stand and denies guilt, the judge may view this testimony as perjurious and may impose a harsher sentence on that account.

Another factor to consider is the rule of practice in some localities that gives the prosecutor an opportunity for rebuttal closing argument if, but only if, the defense presents evidence. See § 36.10 infra.

Beyond this, the only broad principle that is of much use is that generally no defensive evidence is better than unconvincing defensive evidence – from the point of view both of verdict and of sentence.

§ 33.02 PLANNING AND PRESENTING THE TESTIMONY OF DEFENSE WITNESSES

§ 33.02(a) Order of Defense Witnesses

If the respondent testifies and other defense testimony is also presented, it is usually wise to have the respondent testify last. In this way the respondent has the opportunity to observe the whole proceeding, to reconcile any inconsistencies in the testimony, to avoid the pitfalls of other witnesses, and to fill in any gaps in the defense case. See § 10.10 supra.

The principle is not inflexible, of course, and particular reasons may be found to deviate from it. Because the Supreme Court has held that a prosecutor can, in closing argument, “call the jury’s attention to the fact that . . . [an accused who testifies last] had the opportunity to hear all other witnesses testify and to tailor his testimony accordingly,” Portuondo v. Agard, 529 U.S. 61, 63 (2000), it may be advisable to avert such an argument by calling the respondent earlier in the defense case in situations in which counsel has reason to fear that the factfinder may be swayed by a claim of tailoring. But see § 10.10 supra (citing caselaw that rejects the rule of Portuondo v. Agard on state constitutional grounds). Another scenario in which counsel may prefer to diverge from the general practice of calling the respondent last is when the defense presents expert testimony and the expert’s opinion will be based in part on facts to be established at trial by the respondent. In such a case, the respondent should ordinarily precede the expert. On request, the court will release an expert from the ban of the rule on witnesses. See § 27.11 supra. Sometimes a savvy defense expert will do a better job of connecting the pieces of the defense case into a coherently organized logical demonstration or a dramatic human story than the respondent could do. See § 12.08(a) concluding paragraph supra. A mental health expert, for example, can construct an affecting picture of the respondent’s emotional difficulties out of details about the respondent’s life experiences and feelings which, if recounted by the respondent, would come across as maudlin or melodramatic.

Other witnesses should testify in the order most conducive to logical presentation of the facts. Of course, their convenience also must be considered if the trial is protracted and if one day is better for them than another. But orderly presentation of the defense has to take priority over witness convenience except in cases of exceptional hardship or when the quality of the witness’s testimony will be affected by forcing him or her to testify at the desirable moment in the trial rather than at a time s/he prefers. Interspersing one type of witness with another destroys the continuity of the defense and may so confuse the factfinder that the factfinder will give up any attempt to follow or understand the proceedings.
Trial judges have considerable discretion to control the order of testimony. See, e.g., Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 410-11 (1988) (dictum). However, this discretion is not unlimited, and attempts by the trial judge to force counsel to present the defense case in an ineffective fashion (for example, by calling witnesses to suit the judge’s convenience rather than in the order chosen by counsel) should be resisted, citing the respondent’s rights under the Compulsory Process Clause of the Sixth Amendment (see Taylor, 484 U.S. at 407-09), and under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment (see § 9.09(b)(4) supra). “[T]he Constitution guarantees criminal defendants ‘a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense.’” Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 690 (1986). See § 33.04 infra. And the Supreme Court has specifically held (on self-incrimination and right-to-counsel grounds) that the accused cannot constitutionally be required to testify before his or her other witnesses. Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972), discussed in §§ 9.12 penultimate paragraph, 10.10 supra.

§ 33.02(b) Determining and Distributing the Content of Witnesses’ Testimony

The principal facts that counsel will want to establish through the testimony of any particular defense witness are dictated by counsel’s overall theory of defense and by counsel’s tactical decisions about which points to make by eliciting testimony (and from which witnesses) and which to make by means of arguments and/or jury instructions. Evidence, argument and instructions are distinct means for presenting defense contentions; in some cases, they provide alternative ways to make the identical point; and when this is the case, defense counsel must consider which of the means – or which combination of them – will be most effective. For example, defense counsel challenging a cross-racial identification might choose to present expert testimony regarding the unreliability of such identifications (see §§ 11.01(a), subdivision 13, 11.01(b) penultimate paragraph supra), or to make the point in closing argument (see Smith v. State, 388 Md. 468, 880 A.2d 288 (2005)), or to request a jury instruction on the subject (see, e.g., Commonwealth v. Bastaldo, 472 Mass. 16, 18, 32 N.E.3d 873, 877 (2015)), or all of the above. And see, e.g., People v. Love, 56 Cal. 2d 720, 730, 366 P.2d 33, 38, 16 Cal. Rptr. 777, 782 (1961) (collecting authorities to document the proposition that lawyers in closing argument “may state matters not in evidence that are common knowledge, or are illustrations drawn from common experience, history, or literature”). Each means has its own benefits and drawbacks to be taken into account in counsel’s case planning.

Some matters, of course – including, crucially, the events and circumstances surrounding the criminal incident being tried – can only be presented through evidence: the testimony of witnesses; documentary evidence; exhibits of physical objects or electronic data. Within this constraint, counsel may or may not have options about how to present the defense case – whether to rely on a record or to present live testimony (or both) to prove fact X; whether to call one witness or another (or both) to recount event Y. See, e.g., §§ 10.01, 10.13 supra. These are crucial choices, to be made within the framework of the defense theory of the case (see § 6.02 supra) and the narrative which counsel has constructed to make that theory persuasive (see § 6.06 supra).
Additional planning is required to shape the examination of each individual witness. That planning is the subject of the following sections.

§ 33.02(b)(1) The Level of Detail of the Testimony

Counsel must consider how much detail s/he wants to elicit from the witness. The rules requiring personal knowledge and forbidding conclusionary testimony must be taken into account. Nonetheless, those rules will ordinarily leave substantial leeway for any given witness to testify in terms of greater generalization on the one hand or greater concreteness on the other. Some stories, and some storytellers, are more powerful and less vulnerable to cross-examination if they are kept at a high level of generality. Others gain strength from particularization. The trick is to find the most persuasive degree of specificity for each witness.

Tradeoffs are usually involved in this decision. Details can be vivid, dramatic, compelling, where abstractions are not. But details can also be boring and can divert the trier of fact (whether a jury or a judge in a bench trial) from the important points in one’s case. They can appear sensationalistic and arouse resentment instead of sympathy. A visibly exhaustive recitation of details can convey to the trier of fact the favorable impression that it is getting the whole story, not a version edited and manicured by counsel. But visible exhaustiveness also aids the prosecutor to cross-examine more effectively: It gives the prosecutor more specifics to work with, and it relieves the prosecutor of the inhibiting fear that, by probing, s/he may bring out additional details hurtful to his or her position.

§ 33.02(b)(2) Saving Favorable Material for Cross and Redirect

Another important tactical decision is whether the direct examination of the witness should elicit all of the information in the witness’s possession that counsel would like the trier of fact to hear. Sometimes, it may be preferable to hold back a portion of this favorable material for development on cross or redirect.

Occasionally, counsel may even choose to present a manifestly unsupported statement by the witness on direct, in the expectation that the prosecutor will be lured into demanding support for it during cross-examination. If the prosecutor falls for the lure, and the witness comes forth with strong material on cross to back up the statement, the result is to bolster the witness’s testimony on the specific point more dramatically than if the supportive material had been developed at the outset. In addition, the prosecutor, once burned, may be scared away from probing into other potential weaknesses of the direct (including some real ones), and the trier of fact may be left with the impression that the witness is similarly capable of backing up everything s/he has said on direct.

The risks of this mousetrap tactic are obvious. If the prosecutor does not take the bait, the supportive material cannot later be brought out on redirect, which is confined to the scope of the cross. The trier of fact may disbelieve the witness’s unsupported statement, and the prosecutor can harp upon its apparent baselessness in closing argument, perhaps even urging that this statement demonstrates premature or poor judgment on the part of the witness generally. Also, if the prosecutor takes the bait but the material first elicited on cross strikes the trier of fact as something which a forthright witness would naturally have included in his or her story on direct, the trier of fact may view it as defensive rationalization, a dubious afterthought, or even a complete fabrication, and may tag the witness as a partisan or a perjurer.

The milder version of the mousetrap tactic – presenting a solidly documented story on direct but holding back some additional corroborating matter for cross or redirect – is less risky. Nevertheless, it does entail some risks. If the prosecutor does not get into the area of the reserved matter, it will never come out, and counsel may have overestimated the persuasiveness of his or her case without it. Even if the reserved matter does come out on cross or redirect, it may be less convincing there than if it had been massed and integrated with the rest of the witness’s testimony concerning the same subject on direct. Still and all, saving at least some material for backup on cross is often wise (assuming, of course, that the witness can present the necessary critical mass on direct without it), so as to convey to both the trier of fact and the prosecutor that counsel has not completely drained the reservoir, but has substantial unused power in reserve.

§ 33.02(b)(3) Bringing out Unfavorable Material on Direct

Where a witness possesses information unfavorable to the defense case, or information that undercuts to some extent the thrust or credibility of the witness’s favorable testimony, should this material be brought out on direct or left to the prosecutor’s cross-examination? Again, complex judgments are involved.

Eliciting the unfavorable matter on direct can sometimes take a part of the sting out of it. At the least, counsel avoids the appearance that s/he or the witness tried to cover it up, to present a misleadingly incomplete story. (Broaching the subject on direct may also make the trier of fact impatient with the prosecutor for harping on it: Since defense counsel’s direct examination fronted right up with it, why is the prosecution’s cross-examination belaboring the point?) If the witness can provide some explanation or rebuttal of the unfavorable matter, it may be better to present the explanation or rebuttal simultaneously with the matter itself in a comprehensive direct examination, rather than to let the unfavorable matter be brought out alone on cross, with the explanation or rebuttal delayed until redirect. (If the witness volunteers the explanation or rebuttal on cross, it may sound particularly defensive.) Even where there is no explanation or rebuttal, counsel’s direct examination may manage to confine the significance of the unfavorable matter by setting it within the framework of the witness’s entire story, so that the trier of fact and the prosecutor are less likely to inflate it out of proportion than if it appeared in isolation on cross. On direct, counsel controls the context, and the witness controls the language, in which the unfavorable matter is revealed. On cross, the prosecutor controls both, and, by making effective use of the cross-examiner’s right to ask leading questions, s/he may cast the matter in the most damaging form possible.
Conversely, if counsel does not elicit the matter on direct, it may never come out: The prosecutor may overlook it. By bringing it out on direct, counsel invites and legitimates the prosecutor’s reliance on it in cross; by seeming sensitive on the subject, counsel may appear to concede its harmfulness to the defense case. The unfavorable matter and the explanations or rebuttals of it may break up the flow of the direct, and may prevent the trier of fact from forming favorable first impressions. Also it is important to keep in mind that the explanations and rebuttals will themselves be subject to cross. If the whole unfavorable topic is omitted from the direct, the prosecutor may remain uncertain whether and what explanations and rebuttals are lurking; this uncertainty may cause him or her to cross-examine more gingerly or less advisedly than if the explanations and rebuttals were advanced on direct – or even to forgo cross-examination on the topic entirely. And if s/he does cross-examine on the topic, the explanations and rebuttals may be more memorable and less vulnerable coming on re-direct, particularly in courts where the judge is grudging about allowing any or much re-cross-examination.

Generalizations are hazardous here. No single factor compels or precludes the tactical decision to bring out unfavorable material on direct, but the following considerations do militate toward bringing it out: (i) counsel knows that the prosecutor is aware of the material; or the material is such that it is very likely to come out on cross even if the witness’s direct examination is pared to the minimum essential content; (ii) the material is important, so that it will not be plausible for counsel to dismiss it summarily on redirect or in closing; (iii) the available explanations and rebuttals of the material are not logically compelling; and (iv) the prosecutor is probably aware of their nature and limitations.

§ 33.02(b)(4) Rounding Out the Testimony

Beyond the core of factual information which counsel needs to elicit from the witness and the detailing and preemptive matters just discussed, counsel should consider whether additional admissible information would help to make the witness’s testimony hang together. Such material may be:

(1) Material that gives the witness’s testimony internal coherence. Counsel will ordinarily want the testimony of each witness, like the case as a whole, to be intelligible, credible, and free of distracting loose ends. S/he may therefore want to elicit on direct examination facts that (a) situate the witness’s observations and actions within the frame of a logical cause-and-effect sequence, a pattern of events that will resonate with the trier of fact’s expectations about everyday life, or a recognizable stock story (see § 6.06 supra); (b) provide enough specifics about the time-and-place of the witness’s observations and actions to fit them clearly into the larger picture of what-happened that will emerge from the prosecution and defense evidence as a whole; and (c) paint the witness’s experience of the key happenings with the colors of life.

(2) Facts that personalize and humanize the witness. Counsel should consider whether and what biographical facts about the witness may assist the trier of fact to empathize with him or her as a human being, and will convey the impression of this human being that counsel wants the trier of fact to form. Making the witness likeable is, of course, more important when the witness is the respondent himself or herself or a person closely connected with him or her, but it helps in the case of any witness. The evidentiary rule against bolstering the credibility of an unimpeached witness restricts the amount of background material that counsel can present (see, Dep’t 2008)), but such matters as the witness’s address and how long s/he has lived there; his or her age and family status; and brief sketches of his or her educational history and work history are usually permitted. Counsel can select from these areas whatever biographical data is likely to resonate favorably with the trier of fact and can present it by a brief series of “introductory” questions immediately after the witness has stated his or her name. Counsel should not overdo it – or do it with every witness – lest this kind of testimony grow tedious. It is important to size up each witness and his or her role in the case, and to be selective in the choice of biographical facts.

(3) Facts that resolve dissonances between the testimony of the witness and other aspects of the defense case, or meet any contradictory evidence which the prosecution (or a co-respondent) has offered or is likely to offer. If the witness will testify to facts that may appear inconsistent with other facts in counsel’s case, counsel should consider whether and how to attempt to reconcile the inconsistencies. The stories of all of the defense witnesses need not fit together perfectly – indeed, they may appear to be too pat if they do – but significant discrepancies should be explained to the extent possible. If the prosecutor’s evidence (or that of a jointly-tried co-respondent) will be inconsistent with the witness’s testimony on any point, counsel must decide whether to attempt reconciliation or attempt to win a credibility fight. Either approach may require the eliciting of additional facts.

§ 33.02(c) Structuring the Flow of the Witness’s Testimony

The problem of designing a sequence for the examination of any individual witness involves some of the same concerns mentioned in § 33.02(a) supra in connection with the overall order of witnesses. Organization of the testimony along lines that make it easy for the trier of fact to follow, understand, and remember is particularly important. Counsel should view the direct examination as the unfolding of a logically compelling narrative or exposition – the telling of a good story – and experiment with the various ways in which the story might be told.

Tracing what happened in chronological order is often easiest for both the witness and the trier of fact, because that is the order in which events are normally experienced. But other forms of organization should be considered, such as the flashback sequence (presenting major happenings first, then developing the background which explains them), the mystery sequence (presenting the story with a missing piece, then filling in the missing piece), deductive or illustrative sequences (moving from specifics to generalizations or vice versa), and topical sequences (taking first everything that relates to one subject, then everything that relates to another). Particularly where the witness’s testimony does not consist of a series of events of a sort that the trier of fact might experience in real life, one of the latter sequences may be preferable to straightforward chronology.
Where possible, the order of direct examination should encourage the trier of fact to think ahead down the lines of logic of the witness’s story, instead of being dragged along behind the witness. If the direct examination first establishes all of the premises of a syllogism (and the mode of reasoning, when it is not obvious) and then elicits the conclusion, the trier of fact is likely to think that the conclusion makes sense because it jibes with the trier’s expectations. A jury or judge will be more willing to accept counsel’s reasoning because they have performed it themselves, and their predictions from it have panned out.

§ 33.02(d) Drafting Direct Examination Questions

Composing direct examination questions is a fine art. There are no recipes. But there are some general considerations that are useful to keep in mind.

(1) Questions should be as short and straightforward as possible. Subordinate clauses and other convolutions of sentence structure should be avoided. They often lose the witness or the jury, and they may make questions sound objectionably compound. Unnecessary negative constructions should be avoided. They smell leading, and a “yes” answer is ambiguous.

(2) Brevity should not, however, be purchased at the cost of clarity. “When did \( X \) happen in relation to \( Y \)?” is clearer than “When did \( X \) happen?” Cryptic references should be avoided.

(3) Simple interrogative sentences are the basic tool of direct examination (“Who . . . ?” “What . . . ?” “Where . . . ?” “When . . . ?” “How . . . ?” “Did s/he . . . ?” “Is there . . . ?”). But other forms of inquiry are often appropriate, and counsel should develop a repertory of these to use from time to time. Varying the form of one’s direct examination questions avoids monotony and makes the examination more conversational and less inquisitorial. Indirect forms of questioning are often a useful way to focus the witness on the specific answer that is wanted, without triggering a “leading” objection. They can also help counsel project a no-nonsense, matter-of-fact image that is often the best posture in the courtroom: the image of a lawyer who knows the facts and whose questions are designed simply to assist the witness to present those facts. Jurors may distrust an attorney who invariably asks questions which seem to imply that s/he does not know the answers, when it is obvious that s/he does. Thus, questions in forms like “Please tell the jury what you saw first when you turned the corner” or “Please describe the clothing of the man you saw [running from the body on the ground]” can be alternated with simple interrogative forms like “How far were you from the man when you first saw him?”

(4) Questions should be framed so that they will flow logically from the witness’s preceding answers. Examinations quickly become stilted and uninteresting, and may become confusing, if the attorney’s questions proceed doggedly along their own tack, ignoring the witness’s answers.

(5) Simple words should be used whenever possible. Counsel should never forget that s/he is not only thoroughly familiar with the facts of the case but has heard this witness’s story before. The trier of fact is way behind on both counts. Counsel should therefore keep things simple without, of course, appearing to talk down to jurors.

(6) Counsel should not lead the witness any more than is absolutely necessary, even when leading questions are not technically objectionable. Except where there are strong affirmative reasons for leading, counsel should frame the direct examination questions so that they define the boundaries of the information wanted, but not the content of the information that lies within those boundaries. The witness should tell the story in his or her own words. Counsel should be sure to include questions that call for answers which are more than just a few words. However, at the very beginning of the examination, it is usually best to have a set of questions which can be answered with very few words and almost no thought. This gives the witness a chance to settle down and overcome his or her initial nervousness. Biographical information is usually a good subject for these questions, since the witness hardly needs to think at all to say where s/he is employed, his or her job title or line of work, how long s/he has worked in his or her current position, what employment s/he had before this one, etc.

(7) Questions that present the witness with imprecise instructions should be scrupulously avoided. For example, counsel would not want to ask questions like: “What are your duties generally?” “Tell us in detail what s/he did next.” “Please describe that procedure briefly.” These instructions are seldom effective instruments of witness control. (How brief is “briefly”?) Worse, they subject the witness to a test that it is almost impossible to pass. No description is brief enough to meet every one of the twelve jurors’ conceptions of “briefly.” And if the witness does pass the test, s/he has thereby won the dubious distinction of being regarded as obedient to the directions of the lawyer who called him or her to the witness stand. The effective way to regulate the amount of detail in an answer is to go over the question and the answer with the witness during pretrial interviewing, and work out what the answer should contain. Then counsel can ask the question in court without the “briefly,” “generally,” or other prompter’s cues.

(8) Counsel should avoid framing questions so as to invite answers which will make the witness vulnerable on cross. “Tell us exactly what that procedure involves.” “How long did that take, precisely?” “Tell us everything you remember that s/he said.” “What does that operation consist of?” Such questions set the witness up for an ostensible profession of exactitude or exhaustiveness that any good cross-examiner can puncture. Counsel’s job on direct is to expose the witness as little as possible while getting out the information needed.

(9) In addition to drafting a complete direct examination, counsel should give some thought to drafting sequences of questions covering subjects for redirect. After counsel has put the witness through a dry run of cross examination, it should be possible to identify potential areas of redirect. These include not only rehabilitation but retaliation. When there is testimony that counsel would like to elicit from a witness but can find no way to make admissible on direct, counsel should consider the various ways in which a cross-examiner might open the door to the admission of the testimony on redirect; prepare lines of redirect examination designed to fit through these openings; then, at trial, listen for the openings during cross, and go through them
§ 33.02(e) Conducting Direct Examination

The most difficult thing for direct examiners to learn to do well is to listen to the witness’s answers. Many lawyers are so concerned with asking good questions that, as soon as one question is out of their mouths, they turn their full attention to formulating the next, and they tune out the witness’s answer. But good questions do not win cases; good answers do. Counsel should attend carefully to what the witness is saying, and make sure the witness answers the question, and answers it as fully as counsel intends. If s/he does not, counsel should ask the necessary follow-up question or questions.

In determining whether to ask a follow-up question, counsel should, however, be reasonable in his or her expectations. If the witness has given substantially everything that counsel is after, counsel should not ask follow-up questions seeking to remedy unimportant omissions. The more minor an omission, the more difficult it will be to frame a non-leading follow-up question to correct it, and the more likely it will be that the witness will not understand what the follow-up question is asking unless it is leading. Follow-up questions in this situation – particularly a series of “anything else” questions or slightly varying versions of the same question asked with increasingly apparent frustration – will merely confuse the witness and leave the trier of fact thinking that whatever counsel is unsuccessfully trying to pry out of the witness is more important than it is. Counsel should avoid a narrow-minded fixation upon getting the exact words s/he expected; it is sufficient if the witness has given their practical equivalents.

When the witness does provide precisely the words that counsel was hoping to get, counsel should not use the T.V. lawyer’s gimmick of repeating them for emphasis. This is an obvious cheap trick that turns off juries. Counsel should not say “thank you,” nod at the witness, or breathe an audible sigh of relief. Counsel should not do anything that might cause the trier of fact to believe there was ever any doubt that the witness would give that good answer.

With rare exceptions, counsel should do nothing during the examination of a witness other than to ask questions and listen hard to the answers. In an unusual pinch, counsel can make short statements to the witness which are not questions, so long as they do not assert facts. (For example, if a witness is visibly shaky, counsel might say: “Please take as much time as you want before answering, Mr. Jones. There’s no rush. We all understand that being a witness isn’t easy.” Or, if the witness is talking too fast, counsel can say: “Please take it a little more slowly, Mr. Jones. We want to make sure that the jury hears everything you are saying.”) And of course counsel can make appropriate statements for the record, for example noting that counsel is handing the witness an exhibit. But it is best that counsel keep his or her own activity level down as much as possible, so as not to distract the jury from paying full attention to the witness.
As discussed in § 27.12(a)(1) supra, many jurisdictions permit the defense to obtain from the prosecution, either at the commencement of the trial or at the conclusion of the prosecutor’s direct examination of each witness, copies of prior statements made by prosecution witnesses relating to the subject matter of their testimony. Some jurisdictions also give the prosecutor the right to obtain from defense counsel copies of prior statements of a defense witness relating to the witness’s testimony. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 331.4(2)(a) (2018). The timing of the defense disclosure obligation ordinarily parallels that of the prosecutor: In jurisdictions that require the prosecutor to turn over prosecution witnesses’ statements at the commencement of the trial, the defense is required to produce defense witnesses’ statements at the commencement of the defense case, see, e.g., id.; in jurisdictions that call for prosecutorial disclosure at the conclusion of each witness’s direct examination, the same practice governs defense disclosure.

In United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975), the Supreme Court sustained the power of a federal trial judge, in the judge’s discretion, to require disclosure to the prosecution of portions of a pretrial statement given to defense counsel by a witness (a defense investigator, in the Nobles case itself) who has testified for the defense. See also Corbitt v. New Jersey, 439 U.S. 212, 219 n.8 (1978) (dictum); Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988) (by implication). The Nobles Court’s discussion of the Fifth and Sixth Amendment implications of this kind of disclosure suggests that it is subject to a number of constitutional limitations.

First, in concluding that the disclosure in Nobles did not violate the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination (see § 9.12 supra), the Court emphasized that the statements which were ordered to be disclosed were not statements of the accused and did not contain any information conveyed by the accused to defense counsel or to the defense investigator. See 422 U.S. at 234. Thus, as is generally recognized by jurisdictions that provide for disclosure of defense witnesses’ statements, the respondent’s own statements are exempt from disclosure requirements. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 331.4(2)(a) (2018).

Second, in concluding that the compelled disclosure in Nobles did not violate any defense privilege under the “work product” doctrine or the Sixth Amendment (see § 9.13 supra), the Court stressed Nobles’ waiver of those privileges “by electing to present the investigator as a witness.” 422 U.S. at 239. The Court recognized that defense “[c]ounsel necessarily makes use throughout trial of the notes, documents, and other internal materials prepared to present adequately his client’s case, and often relies on them in examining witnesses. When so used, there normally is no waiver. [With regard to the broad “work product” protection extended to counsel’s own notes of oral statements of witnesses, see the subsequent decision in Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383, 399-402 (1981).] But where, as here, counsel attempts to make a testimonial use of these materials,” they are subject to discovery in the trial court’s discretion. Nobles, 422 U.S. at 239 n.14. That discretion was not abused in Nobles because the “court authorized no general ‘fishing expedition’ into the defense files or indeed even into the defense investigator’s report. Cf. United States v. Wright, . . . 489 F.2d 1181 ([D.C. Cir.] 1973). Rather, its considered ruling was quite limited in scope, opening to prosecution scrutiny only the portion of the statement that related to the testimony the defense witness would offer. The court further afforded [the defendant] . . . the maximum opportunity to assist in avoiding unwarranted disclosure or to exercise an informed choice to call for the investigator’s testimony and thereby open his report to examination.” 422 U.S. at 240-41.

In jurisdictions which have not enacted legislation providing for disclosure of defense witnesses’ prior statements to the prosecution, counsel can argue that procedural innovations of this sort should not be made judicially, without legislative authorization. See § 9.11 supra. (That argument was not made, and therefore not passed upon, in Nobles.) If the argument is unavailable or fails, the “limited and conditional nature” of the discovery allowed in Nobles, 422 U.S. at 240 n.15, should be emphasized in resisting prosecutorial requests for any broader disclosure. See § 9.12 supra. In jurisdictions where statutes or court rules do require defense disclosure, the breadth or timing of the requirement may be assailable under the Fifth Amendment (see id.) or the Sixth (see Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972), discussed in §§ 9.12, 10.10 supra).

§ 33.04 CHALLENGING RULES AND PRACTICES THAT INHIBIT THE PRESENTATION OF DEFENSE EVIDENCE; THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO PRESENT A DEFENSE

“Whether rooted directly in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, . . . or in the Compulsory Process or Confrontation clauses of the Sixth Amendment, . . . the Constitution guarantees criminal defendants [and juvenile respondents] ‘a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense.’” Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 690 (1986). As the Court made clear in Crane, the constitutional right to present a defense operates as a limitation upon state evidentiary rules and courtroom practices that unduly restrict the presentation of defensive proof. Although “the Constitution leaves to . . . [trial] judges . . . ‘wide latitude’ to exclude evidence that is ‘repetitive . . ., only marginally relevant’ or poses an undue risk of ‘harassment, prejudice, [or] confusion of the issues’ [and the Court has] . . . never questioned the power of States to exclude evidence through the application of evidentiary rules that themselves serve the interests of fairness and reliability, . . . an essential component of procedural fairness is an opportunity to be heard [and] . . . [t]hat opportunity would be an empty one if the state were permitted to exclude competent, reliable evidence . . . when such evidence is central to the [accused’s] . . . claim of innocence. In the absence of any valid state justification, exclusion of this kind of exculpatory evidence deprives [the accused] . . . of the basic right to have the prosecutor’s case encounter and ‘survive the crucible of meaningful adversarial testing.”’ Id. at 689-91.

The federal constitutional right to present a defense has been held to forbid the exclusion of important defense evidence through the application of state evidentiary rules that are “arbitrary or disproportionate to the purposes they are designed to serve,” Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44, 56 (1987) (invalidating a State’s categorical ban of hypnotically refreshed testimony as applied to a criminal defendant); Holmes v. South Carolina, 547 U.S. 319, 321, 325-26 (2006) (invalidating “an evidence rule under which the defendant may not introduce proof of third-party guilt if the prosecution has introduced forensic evidence that, if believed, strongly supports a guilty verdict”), or are “applied mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice,” Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973) (reversing a criminal conviction because the state courts had applied a combination of standard hearsay principles and rules against impeaching one’s own witness to curtail the defendant’s efforts to prove that another man had confessed to the crime with which the defendant was charged); accord, Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979) (per curiam); Kubsch v. Neal, 838 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2016) (en banc). See also Cudjo v. Ayers, 698 F.3d 752, 754-55, 762-68 (9th Cir. 2012); United States v. White, 692 F.3d 235, 246-48 (2d Cir. 2012); Lunbery v. Hornbeak, 605 F.3d 754, 760-62 (9th Cir. 2010); Commonwealth v. Drayton, 473 Mass. 23, 33-40, 38 N.E.3d 247, 256-61 (2015). The right may also override state procedural rules purporting to foreclose an accused’s proof of facts that would seriously undermine the force of the prosecution’s evidence of guilt, Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. at 689-91 (invalidating a state practice that forbade a defendant whose confession had been held voluntary on a pretrial suppression motion from presenting evidence of involuntariness to the jury in an effort to discredit the confession), and it may restrict even the ordinary discretion of trial judges (see § 30.03(c) supra) to exclude evidence that they find substantially more prejudicial than probative, cf. Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988) (per curiam) (holding that a rape defendant’s Sixth Amendment right to confrontation was violated when his attorney was forbidden to show by cross-examining the complainant that she was cohabiting with the prosecution witness to whom she had made her first complaint of the rape; this evidence would have bolstered the defendant’s “theory of the case . . . that . . . [the complainant] concocted the rape story to protect her relationship with . . . [the witness], who would have grown suspicious upon seeing her disembark from . . . [a car] in which she was riding with the defendant.”, id. at 230, and the state courts were constitutionally obliged to admit it despite their finding that its prejudicial impact outweighed its probative value.). In addition, the right may provide a basis for challenging various practices by which judges and prosecutors harass or intimidate defense witnesses, see Webb v. Texas, 409 U.S. 95 (1972) (reversing a criminal conviction because the trial judge had frightened off a proffered defense witness by singling him out for threatening reminders that lying under oath would subject him to a perjury prosecution), and practices that inappropriately depreciate the consideration to be given to defense evidence, see Cool v. United States, 409 U.S. 100 (1972) (condemning an “accomplice” instruction that told the jury that a defense witness was not to be credited unless found believable beyond a reasonable doubt). See also, e.g., United States v. Murray, 736 F.3d 652, 653-54 (2d Cir. 2013) (the trial judge’s denial of defense counsel’s request to present “surrebuttal evidence to counter evidence introduced by the government on rebuttal” violated the defendant’s “right to present a meaningful defense”); People v. Oddone, 22 N.Y.3d 369, 377, 3 N.E.3d 1160, 1164-65, 980 N.Y.S.2d 912, 916-17 (2013) (the trial judge committed reversible error by refusing to allow defense counsel to refresh the recollection of a defense witness with a prior statement: even if the trial judge had been right to view this as impeaching one’s own witness in violation of a local rule of evidence, “technical limitations on the impeachement of witnesses must sometimes give way, in a criminal case, to a defendant’s right to a fair trial.” (citing Chambers v. Mississippi, supra)).

Doubtless, a respondent’s federal constitutional right to present defensive evidence is limited to evidence of demonstrable materiality. See Nevada v. Jackson, 569 U.S. 505 (2013) ("Only rarely have we held that the right to present a complete defense was violated by the exclusion of defense evidence under a state rule of evidence" (id. at 509); “. . . this Court has never held that the Confrontation Clause entitles a criminal defendant to introduce extrinsic evidence for impeachment purposes” (id. at 512)). Counsel who invokes the right must be prepared to make an appropriate proffer demonstrating that the evidence s/he seeks to introduce is important to the defense. See Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. at 690-91; cf. United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303, 316-17 (1998); United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858, 866-72 (1982). See also, e.g., People v. DiPippo, 27 N.Y.3d 127, 50 N.E.3d 888, 31 N.Y.S.3d 421 (2016). But whenever this can be done, counsel should not hesitate to rely upon Crane and the other Supreme Court cases cited in the preceding paragraph to argue (1) that the trial judge should exercise his or her state-law discretion in favor of the admissibility of evidence proffered by the defense if the question of admissibility is at all close because “[f]ew rights are more fundamental than that of an accused to present witnesses in his own defense,” Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. at 302, and a right of this importance should not be jeopardized on doubtful grounds; and (2) that if the judge does exclude the respondent’s proffered evidence, s/he will be violating the respondent’s federally guaranteed “‘right to put before a jury evidence that might influence the determination of guilt,’” Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 408 (1988) (dictum), quoting Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 56 (1987) (dictum). See Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 19 (1967).

Part B. Testimony by the Respondent

§ 33.05 THE RESPONDENT’S RIGHT NOT TO TESTIFY

The respondent has a right not to take the stand, whether or not s/he presents other evidence in his or her defense. This is the effect of the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination, Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972); Carter v. Kentucky, 450 U.S. 288 (1981), which is “applicable in the case of juveniles as it is with respect to adults.” In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 55 (1967).

If the respondent fails to testify, the prosecutor may not comment on the failure (nor may the judge make such a comment to the jury in a jury trial), other than to state that the respondent has the right not to testify and that no inferences can be drawn from the respondent’s failure to take the stand. Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965); Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. 333, 336-39 (1978); Carter v. Kentucky, 450 U.S. at 297-301 (dictum); United States v. Robinson, 485 U.S. 25, 32-33 (1988) (dictum); and see White v. Woodall, 134 S. Ct. 1697, 1702 (2014) (dictum); Gongora v. Thaler, 710 F.3d 267 (5th Cir. 2013). In many courts the prosecutor will, however, be permitted to get away with asserting during closing argument that the prosecution’s case is “unrebutted” or that “no one has denied” the testimony of prosecution witnesses or that “the respondent has not challenged” key features of the prosecution’s evidence. This sort of “general” comment is ordinarily held not to infringe the privilege, although some cases can be cited for the proposition that it is unconstitutional, at least when the accused is the only person who could rebut the prosecution’s evidence or deny its accusations, see Desmond v. United States, 345 F.2d 225 (1st Cir. 1965); United States v. Flannery, 451 F.2d 880 (1st Cir. 1971); United States v. Handman, 447 F.2d 853 (7th Cir. 1971); Lent v. Wells, 861 F.2d 972 (6th Cir. 1988). The Supreme Court of the United States has not spoken authoritatively on the issue. Compare United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499, 512-16 (1983) (concurring opinion of Justice Stevens, upholding such a prosecutorial comment), with id. at 506 n.4 (majority opinion, leaving the question undecided); and see Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 594-95 (1978) (sustaining a “prosecutor’s repeated references in his closing remarks to the State’s evidence as ‘unrefuted’ and ‘uncontradicted’ because defense counsel had “clearly focused the jury’s attention on [the defendant’s] . . . silence” and “the prosecutor’s closing remarks added nothing to the impression that had already been created by Lockett’s refusal to testify after the jury had been promised a defense by her lawyer and told that Lockett would take the stand”).

969

In a jury trial, most judges will give defense counsel the option whether or not the jury should be instructed expressly concerning the respondent’s right not to testify and the impermissibility of adverse inferences. (The Supreme Court has acknowledged that this practice “may be wise,” Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. at 340, while declining to hold that the Constitution forbids a trial judge to give the cautionary instruction over defense objection, id. at 340-41. If defense counsel requests the instruction, it is required by the Fifth Amendment. Carter v. Kentucky, 450 U.S. at 295-305; James v. Kentucky, 466 U.S. 341 (1984).) In most cases it is probably best for counsel to ask for the instruction.

§ 33.06 CONSIDERATIONS AFFECTING THE DECISION WHETHER THE RESPONDENT SHOULD TESTIFY

The decision whether to put the respondent on the stand is a crucial one. Generalities are largely illusory, but the following factors might be considered:

(A) The desirability of having the respondent appear to “come clean.” It is widely agreed among criminal lawyers of experience that an accused’s failure to take the stand is often construed by the trier of fact as an indication that the respondent is hiding something – hence that s/he has something to hide. This is perhaps more inevitable with juries than with judges, but it is true of both. Therefore, in most cases in which a respondent can tell a plausible exculpatory story, the respondent probably ought to testify unless there are strong affirmative reasons why s/he should not.

(B) Whether the respondent has something to say that is legally and factually supportive of the theory of the defense.

(C) Whether what s/he has to say can be shown by other witnesses.

(D) Whether what s/he has to say and the way s/he says it are credible. Both the inherent plausibility of the respondent’s story and the respondent’s demeanor are important. Demeanor includes not only the respondent’s apparent honesty and sincerity (or their opposites) but also intelligence and articulateness. The prosecutor will be up for cross-examination of the respondent and may confuse a respondent who is not quick-witted and able to express himself or herself well. It is vital that the respondent not be disbelieved. More is involved than the obvious proposition that disbelieved testimony does no good. Many judges impose a harsher sentence (some even ordering incarceration when they otherwise would have granted probation) to penalize a respondent for what the judge concludes was perjurious testimony. (Doubts about the constitutionality of this practice were laid to rest in United States v. Grayson, 438 U.S. 41 (1978). A defendant’s failure to testify, on the other hand, cannot be penalized by a harsher sentence (see § 15.5, last paragraph supra), at least in theory (cf. § 15.5, second paragraph supra).)

(E) Whether the respondent is likeable or distasteful, sympathetic or obnoxious. Defense counsel should try to step out of role and take a fresh look at the respondent as the respondent has appeared to the factfinder throughout the trial up to this point. Does s/he make a better impression if s/he keeps quiet or if s/he talks?

(F) Whether the respondent has a prior record that can be brought out for impeachment if s/he testifies. As explained in § 30.07(b) supra, the large majority of States prohibit the prosecutor from impeaching the respondent with evidence that s/he has been adjudicated a delinquent in the past, but some States permit such impeachment, and some others permit the prosecutor to impeach the respondent with the “prior [bad] acts” underlying the adjudications. (Since the form of the prosecutor’s cross-examination question in the latter jurisdictions is not “were you adjudicated a delinquent for having done [the act]?” but rather “did you do [the act]?” the respondent is free to say “no” if that is the truth, even if s/he was wrongfully convicted of the prior offense. The prosecutor then is barred from introducing extrinsic evidence to the contrary. See § 30.07(b) supra. However, if the offense is one to which the respondent pleaded guilty, it is ordinarily advisable for the respondent to admit commission of the act because some judges might view a denial as “opening the door” to proof of the respondent’s previous inconsistent admission and, in any event, the prosecutor certainly could bring up at disposition what appears to be a perjurious change of position.) In jurisdictions that permit such impeachment, counsel should carefully review the respondent’s record with him or her to ensure that s/he does not respond to a question about prior adjudications or bad acts by saying “I don’t remember” – an answer which, although it may be true, will brand the respondent as either a liar or a habitual criminal in the eyes of the judge or jury.

(G) Whether the respondent has made a prior statement that the prosecutor has and with which the respondent can be impeached. Prior inconsistent statements of a respondent are admissible to impeach his or her trial testimony. E.g., Anderson v. Charles, 447 U.S. 404 (1980) (per curiam). The prosecutor will not invariably use in the prosecution’s case-in-chief every incriminating admission that s/he has. Particularly if the respondent has made some sort of admission followed by a full confession, the prosecutor may hold back the admission. Then, if the respondent testifies, the prosecutor can confront the respondent with the admission on cross-examination – thus introducing additional incriminating evidence in the midst of the defense case – and can also end the trial on a strong note by calling an officer to recount the admission in rebuttal. See § 10.10 supra; § 33.09(a) infra. A respondent’s prior admissions cannot be used for impeachment if they were involuntary [§ 24.03 supra] (see Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978)), or if they were compelled under an immunity grant (see New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450 (1979)), but they can be used for impeachment if they were voluntary even though they may have been obtained in violation of the rules of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966) [§ 24.07 supra] (see Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971); Oregon v. Hass, 420 U.S. 714 (1975)) or the Sixth Amendment [§ 24.13 supra] (see Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586 (2009)) or the Fourth Amendment [§ 24.19 supra] (see United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980)). See also § 24.23 supra. And although the prosecution is not permitted to present in its case-in-chief the transcribed testimony of the respondent on a motion to suppress, see Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968), the question has been pointedly reserved by the Supreme Court whether the accused’s suppression-hearing testimony can be used to impeach his or her trial testimony to the extent that the two are inconsistent. United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83, 93-94 (1980). The likelihood is that the ultimate authoritative disposition of this issue will be in favor of allowing the prosecution to use the suppression-hearing transcript to impeach. See id. at 94 n.9. But cf. Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968), and Lujan v. Garcia, 734 F.3d 917, 924-30 (9th Cir. 2013), summarized in § 24.20(b) penultimate paragraph supra.

(H) Whether there is some other incriminating evidence, inadmissible in the prosecution’s case-in-chief because illegally obtained, that may be used in rebuttal if the respondent testifies. Evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment may be used to impeach or rebut the testimony of a juvenile respondent who elects to take the stand at trial if the illegally obtained evidence is inconsistent with any of the respondent’s “statements on direct examination [or] . . . his answers to questions put to him on cross-examination that are plainly within the scope of the [respondent’s] . . . direct examination.” United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620, 627 (1980). The only limitations on the prosecutor’s right to use unconstitutionally seized evidence for impeachment are that the evidence must be “reliable,” id. (dictum), see § 33.09(a) infra, and that the prosecutor may not use it to impeach a respondent’s testimony given in response to cross-examination “having too tenuous a connection with any subject opened upon direct examination . . .,” 446 U.S. at 625, explaining Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20, 35 (1925). The test of cross-examination that is not “too tenuous” is variously described in the Havens opinion as “proper cross-examination reasonably suggested by the [accused’s] . . . direct examination,” 446 U.S. at 627, and as “questions [that] would have been suggested to a reasonably competent cross-examiner by [the accused’s] . . . direct testimony,” id. at 626. Cf. United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 240 (1975) (defining the scope of proper cross-examination, in another context, as extending to “matters reasonably related to those brought out in direct examination”).

(I) Whether evidence of the respondent’s pretrial silence in the face of accusation is available and admissible to impeach the respondent. In some cases, the prosecution can use the respondent’s pretrial silence against him or her. For example, the prosecution may seek to impeach the respondent with his or her failure to report to the police what s/he now claims was a justifiable homicide or assault, or with his or her failure to volunteer an exculpatory story when questioned by the police or others about events surrounding the offense, or with his or her failure to respond by denials when accused by the police or others. As § 24.24 explains, Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976), prohibits the prosecution from using an accused’s silence following arrest and the administration of Miranda warnings to impeach a testifying defendant or juvenile respondent, but the United States Supreme Court’s post-Doyle decisions have found this rule to be inapplicable when the prosecution seeks to impeach a testifying defendant or respondent with pre-arrest silence (Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231, 239-40 (1980)) or with post-arrest silence when no Miranda warnings were given (Fletcher v. Weir, 455 U.S. 603, 606-07 (1982) (per curiam)). The concluding paragraph of § 24.24 cites state-court decisions rejecting Jenkins and Fletcher as a matter of state constitutional or evidentiary law; counsel must research the subject locally. In cases in which the federal constitutional and state-law rules discussed in § 24.24 would bar the prosecution from introducing evidence of an accused’s silence in its case-in-chief (a question complicated by Salinas v. Texas, 570 U.S. 178 (2013), discussed in the seventh and eighth paragraphs of § 24.24) but would allow the prosecution to use such silence to impeach an accused who takes the witness stand, the decision whether to put the respondent on the stand must take into account the risk of opening the door to harmful evidence that the prosecutor could not otherwise introduce at trial.

(I) Whether there is other potentially damaging impeaching matter available to the prosecutor and whether prejudicial matters in the respondent’s background are likely to be brought out on cross-examination. Like other witnesses, a respondent may be impeached by showing his or her bad reputation for truth and veracity. See § 31.12 supra. This does not mean that the respondent’s general bad character can be shown, and counsel should object if the prosecutor sets out to examine the respondent on various assorted misdeeds and so forth. Counsel must be especially alert while the prosecutor is cross-examining the respondent. Some apparently innocuous questions can be damaging: For example, the normally uncontroversial question “what grade are you in?” is problematic when the respondent’s answer is so inconsistent with his or her age that it makes it obvious s/he has been repeatedly left back, presumably because of truancy or lengthy periods of suspension from school. The difficulty of objecting to these questions without prejudice will create problems if a respondent with a disreputable life style testifies.

(K) Whether cross-examination of the respondent is likely to supply deficiencies or bolster weaknesses in the prosecution’s case-in-chief. See § 33.01 supra. The breadth of allowable cross-examination should be considered. See § 33.09(a) infra.

§ 33.07 EFFECT OF THE RESPONDENT’S CHOICE

Counsel should weigh these considerations and decide in the first instance whether s/he thinks that the respondent ought to testify. That decision, with its reasons, should be explained to the respondent. See, e.g., Casiano-Jiménez v. United States, 817 F.3d 816, 821 (1st Cir. 2016) (defense counsel violated the guarantee of effective assistance of counsel by failing to tell the defendant, “in words or substance, that he had a right to testify” and failing “to obtain his informed consent to remaining silent” at trial; “There must be a focused discussion between lawyer and client, and that discussion must – at a bare minimum – enable the defendant to make an informed decision about whether to take the stand.”). Counsel may properly urge the respondent that it is unwise or dangerous for the respondent to take the stand. When the unwisdom or the danger appears strong, counsel’s urging may and should be strenuous. Counsel should always outline clearly to the respondent the hazards of testifying (whether or not counsel wants to put the respondent on). Counsel may properly urge the respondent that it is unwise or dangerous for the respondent to take the stand. When the unwisdom or the danger appears strong, counsel’s urging may and should be strenuous. Counsel should always outline clearly to the respondent the hazards of testifying (whether or not counsel wants to put the respondent on). But if this fails to daunt the respondent and if counsel’s advice against testifying fails to persuade the respondent, then counsel has little choice but to put the respondent on the stand. See Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745, 751, 753 n.6 (1983) (dictum); Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 187 (2004) (dictum). See also United States v. Gillenwater, 717 F.3d 1070, 1077-79 (9th Cir. 2013); People v. Morgan, 149 A.D.3d 1148, 1152-54, 51 N.Y.S.3d 218, 223-25 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2017); McCoy v. Louisiana, 138 S. Ct. 1500, 1508 (2018) (dictum). In these unhappy situations, counsel should (1) prepare the respondent’s testimony thoroughly (see § 10.10 supra) for maximum damage control; (2) reserve the defense opening statement (see § 29.03(a) paragraph 3 supra) and avoid any other indication, prior to the close of the prosecution’s case, that the defense will call the respondent as a witness (see, e.g., § 27.13 supra), and (3) re-raise with the respondent, after the prosecution rests, whether s/he remains hell-bent to testify.

§ 33.08 PRESENTING DIRECT TESTIMONY OF THE RESPONDENT

Direct examination of the respondent should be concise and orderly but should not abbreviate the respondent’s testimony or give short shrift to details that are of any real consequence. The respondent’s testimony is a central event at the trial, and it ordinarily ought not be rushed or made to seem less than full.

As a general matter, questions should call for discursive or explanatory answers rather than mere “yes” and “no” responses and should give the respondent apparent freedom to do the talking. It is important that the respondent appear to want to tell his or her story and that the story appear to be the respondent’s, not counsel’s. The respondent should not be tightly restricted by short-answer questions that make him or her look like s/he is saying only what counsel wants to present. The more articulate, personable, and sympathetic s/he is, the more leeway s/he should be given to project his or her own image.

On the other hand, the scope of direct examination must be limited so as to avoid opening up areas in which damaging cross-examination can be pursued. Counsel should anticipate likely points of prejudicial cross-examination (see § 33.06 supra; § 33.09(a) infra) and should advise the respondent, and structure the direct examination, to keep away from matters that will open the door to them. In particular, the respondent should be warned that, both on direct and cross-examination, s/he must avoid broad protestations of innocence – “I’ve never been in trouble in my life,” “I don’t even know what marijuana smells like,” “I would never do anything like that” – since these protestations may be treated by the court as raising the issue of character and opening the door to prosecutorial proof of bad character (see § 33.17 infra).

When counsel’s theory of defense is misidentification or some other ground for doubting that the respondent was involved in any way in the criminal episode, counsel should ask the respondent point-blank, at some point in the direct examination, whether s/he committed the crime(s) with which s/he is charged. The formal denial has become such a standard part of the direct examination of adult defendants in criminal trials and juvenile respondents in delinquency trials that a judge sitting as trier of fact in a bench trial may view its omission as peculiar and possibly even suspicious. In jury trials, even though the jurors have no similar knowledge of courtroom conventions, they will probably have a common-sense expectation that any innocent person who is haled into court on a criminal or delinquency charge and who testifies in his or her own behalf would explicitly deny guilt.

Defense lawyers differ about whether the formal denial is more effective at the beginning of a direct examination or at the end. The rationale for placing it at the beginning is that it enables the respondent to make a good impression by coming on strong and clear, and it also helps to structure the respondent’s testimony by announcing the defense theory of the case up front and thereby assisting the trier of fact to appreciate the significance of the respondent’s factual story when the respondent goes on to relate it in detail. The rationale for placing it last is that in a bench trial, the judge may view himself or herself as so sophisticated a factfinder that s/he will resent the attorney’s commencing with formal denials rather than going directly to the hard facts; and in both bench and jury trials, a formal denial can provide a very strong conclusion to the respondent’s testimony.

The formal denial would usually be framed along the following lines:

Q. Now, Richard, you have heard the testimony of the prosecution witnesses, and you know what you are charged with. I want you to look at [His] [Her] Honor [and the ladies and gentlemen of the jury] and tell [him] [her] [them] whether you are guilty of this crime that you are charged with here today?

A. No.

Q. Did you [summarizing the key facts of the crime, such as “rob Mr. John Jones on September 19, 2018, and steal $350.00 from him”]?

A. No, I did not.

In cases where the defense theory is that the actions charged as criminal were innocent or justifiable, modified versions of the classic denial are appropriate. On a claim of mistake, for example:

Q. Please tell the jury this, Alex: When you picked up the cell phone, did you intend to steal it?
A. No.
Q. Why did you pick it up?
A. I thought it was mine. It looked like mine.

Or on a self-defense claim:

Q. Please tell the jury this, Alex: In the fight between you and Mr. Jones, did you throw the first punch?
A. No. He did.
Q. Why did you hit him?
A. He started slugging me and I tried to make him stop.

§ 33.09 CROSS-EXAMINATION AND IMPEACHMENT OF THE RESPONDENT

§ 33.09(a) The Basic Rules Governing the Prosecution’s Cross-examination and Impeachment of the Respondent

The prosecutor is usually given rather broad latitude to cross-examine the respondent and is frequently allowed to go somewhat beyond the scope of the direct examination even in jurisdictions that would forbid cross-examination of this breadth in the case of other witnesses. Although counsel should object to any potentially damaging cross-examination that falls outside the scope of the direct (see, e.g., Fed. Rule Evid. 611(b) (“Cross-examination should not go beyond the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the witness’s credibility”)), s/he should not be surprised to see the objection overruled in the exercise of the trial judge’s discretion.

On the other hand, attempts by the prosecutor to open up the respondent’s background generally or to expose particularly prejudicial matters – gang associations, drug use, and so forth – are blatantly impermissible and should be vigorously opposed. See, e.g., United States v. Romo, 669 F.2d 285 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Dickens, 775 F.2d 1056 (9th Cir. 1985); Hosford v. State, 525 So. 2d 789, 790-92 (Miss. 1988). Counsel should point out to the court that what is at issue here is not merely the scope of cross-examination but the fundamental principle that the prosecution may not present evidence of the respondent’s character unless the respondent opens the character issue, and then only according to tightly restricted modes of proof. See § 30.07(a), (b) supra; § 33.17 infra. Counsel should invoke the respondent’s federal and state constitutional privileges against self-incrimination in objecting to any cross-examination that is not “reasonably related to those [matters] brought out in direct examination” (United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225, 240 (1975) (dictum)), because the privileges are not waived concerning this material (see § 9.12 second paragraph supra), and the very fact that the prosecutor is seeking to elicit it before the trier of fact establishes its incriminating character. See also Blanks v. State, 406 Md. 526, 540-41, 544, 959 A.2d 1180, 1188, 1190 (2008) (the prosecutor violated the attorney-client privilege by cross-examining the defendant about “when and what [he] . . . had discussed with his attorney about his relationship with the murder victim,” purportedly in response to defendant’s statement on direct examination that he had told only his father about his relationship with the victim). In a jury trial, counsel’s objections to the prosecution’s cross-examination of the respondent – together with counsel’s explanation of the grounds for those objections – should be made at sidebar. See §§ 30.02(a)(2) supra, 34.03 infra.

Although the range allowed in cross-examination of a respondent may be broader than ordinary, the ordinary rule prevails that the respondent may not be impeached by extrinsic evidence on collateral matters – that is, those which the prosecution could not prove in its case-in-chief (see § 31.10 penultimate paragraph supra).

Section 30.07(b) supra describes the general rule prohibiting the prosecutor from using a respondent’s prior juvenile adjudications to impeach the respondent, and the exceptions to this general rule that are recognized in some jurisdictions.

A respondent’s prior inconsistent statements are subject to the general bar against impeachment with extrinsic evidence on collateral matters. The prosecutor may ask the respondent on cross-examination whether s/he did or did not say X or Y on a specified previous occasion, if X or Y is inconsistent with the respondent’s testimony on direct examination; but statements X or Y may not be proved extrinsically unless their contents are noncollateral. See generally § 31.10 supra.

There are some additional restrictions on both cross-examination and extrinsic evidence relating to a respondent’s prior inconsistent statements:

(1) Neither is permissible, in the event of a defense objection, unless the prosecutor satisfies the court that there is a basis in fact for believing that the respondent did make each statement asked about. See, e.g., People v. Williams, 204 Ill. 2d 191, 208-14, 788 N.E.2d 1126, 1137-41, 273 Ill. Dec. 250, 261-65 (2003); cf. Flowers v. State, 842 So. 2d 531, 550-53 (Miss. 2003).

(2) Neither is permissible unless the testimony that the prosecution is proposing to impeach was given by the respondent on direct examination or on cross-examination that is within the scope of the direct. The prosecutor cannot invoke the prior-inconsistent-statement rationale to justify impeaching the respondent’s answers to questions that the prosecutor has “‘smuggled in’” by broader cross-examination (United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. at 625, 626 (dictum)).

(3) A respondent’s prior inconsistent statements may not be used for impeachment if they were involuntary under the standards summarized in § 24.03 supra (see Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385, 397-98, 402 (1978)) or obtained in violation of the respondent’s constitutional privilege against self-incrimination (New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450, 458-60 (1979); People v. Pokovich, 39 Cal. 4th 1240, 141 P.3d 267, 48 Cal. Rptr.3d 158 (2006)) or made pursuant to procedures that invested them with a privilege against disclosure (State v. Hook, 356 S.C. 421, 590 S.E.2d 25 (2003)).

(4) It can be argued that a respondent’s prior inconsistent statements may not be used for impeachment if they are lacking in reliability or trustworthiness. The argument rests on negative language in United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980), and in Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971), and Oregon v. Hass, 420 U.S. 714 (1975), that may or may not be pregnant. (The axiom that pregnancy is an either/or proposition does not apply to Supreme Court opinions.) As indicated in § 33.06 subdivision (H) supra, the Havens case holds that matters which would be inadmissible in the prosecution’s case-in-chief because they are the tainted fruits of a Fourth Amendment violation may nonetheless be used to impeach the accused’s trial testimony. In announcing this ruling, the Court says that a defendant’s “prior inconsistent utterances [and] . . . other reliable evidence” may be used for impeachment (446 U.S. at 627). As indicated in § 33.06 subdivision (G) supra, the Harris and Hass cases hold that a defendant’s prior inconsistent statements taken in violation of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), may be used for impeachment. In announcing these rulings, Harris says – and Hass repeats – that “[i]t does not follow from Miranda that evidence inadmissible against an accused in the prosecution’s case in chief is barred for all purposes, provided of course that the trustworthiness of the evidence satisfies legal standards” (Harris, 401 U.S. at 224; Hass, 420 U.S. at 722; emphasis added). The Hass opinion goes on to say that “[i]f, in a given case, the officer’s conduct amounts to an abuse, that case, like those involving coercion or duress, may be taken care of when it arises measured by the traditional standards for evaluating voluntariness and trustworthiness” (id. at 723). The meaning of the “reliable evidence” language in Havens and the “trustworthiness” language in Harris and Hass is conspicuously obscure. It cannot plausibly be read as meaning nothing more than that an inconsistent statement used for impeachment must be voluntary (the holding of Mincey, supra) because (a) it is hornbook law that the federal standard of involuntariness is not equivalent to “reliability” or “trustworthiness” (see Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534, 544-45 (1961); Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, 376-77 (1964)), and (b) the Harris and Hass language repeatedly casts “voluntariness” and “trustworthiness” in the conjunctive. Defense counsel therefore has a degree of leeway at present to argue that “trustworthiness” and “reliability” mean whatever they need to mean in order to take the factual scenario of counsel’s case outside the ambit of Havens, Harris, and Hass. A strong argument could be made, for example, that the kind of trickery-induced statements discussed by Judge Posner in Aleman v. Village of Hanover Park, 662 F.3d 897, 906-07 (7th Cir. 2011) [§ 24.04(d) penultimate paragraph supra] should be inadmissible for impeachment. It is true that Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586 (2009) (holding statements obtained in violation of the Sixth Amendment rule of Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964) [§ 24.13 supra] admissible for impeachment) declares broadly that “the game of excluding tainted evidence for impeachment purposes is not worth the candle [because the] . . . interests safeguarded by such exclusion are ‘outweighed by the need to prevent perjury and to assure the integrity of the trial process’” (id. at 593). But reading Ventris as a ruling that anti-perjury concerns trump all others and license impeachment even with materials of seriously questionable probative value would be inconsistent with the square holding of Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976), noted in the following subparagraph.

(5) Impeachment by instances of silence in the face of arrest or out-of-court accusation is discussed in §§ 24.24 and 33.06 subdivision (I) supra. Essentially, a respondent’s postarrest silence after receiving Miranda warnings is inadmissible to impeach his or her trial testimony (Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976)), but other instances of prearrest or postarrest silence may be admissible so far as the federal Constitution is concerned. Counsel can and should invoke state constitutional guarantees and state-law evidentiary principles as grounds for prohibiting the latter kinds of impeachment. See §§ 7.09 and 24.24 supra.

(6) The extent to which the prosecution is permitted to impeach a respondent with his or her prior inconsistent testimony given at a suppression hearing or similar voir dire proceeding is presently unsettled. See § 33.06 subdivision (G) supra.

§ 33.09(b) Orders Barring Counsel’s Consultation with the Respondent in Contemplation of Cross-examination

Some judges will instruct counsel not to confer with their witnesses during recesses between direct and cross-examination or during recesses called while the witness is testifying on cross-examination. The constitutionality of these prohibitions as applied to the respondent depends on the length of the recess and on whether the recess falls at a time when the respondent and counsel have any trial-related matters to discuss other than the respondent’s ongoing testimony. “[T]he testifying . . . respondent] does not have a constitutional right to advice” concerning the subject of his or her testimony (Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. 272, 284 (1989)), but s/he does have a “right to unrestricted access to his lawyer for advice on a variety of trial-related matters . . . in the context of a long recess,” even though the recess occurs while s/he is on the witness stand (id., explaining Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976)). See § 27.02 concluding paragraph supra. If a recess exceeds 15 or 20 minutes, an order forbidding communication between the respondent and his or her attorney is problematic under the Geders and Perry cases, and counsel should object to it as an infringement of the respondent’s state and federal constitutional rights to the effective assistance of counsel.

§ 33.10 CORROBORATION OF THE RESPONDENT

It is vital to corroborate the respondent on every point on which corroboration is possible.
Nothing should be left to rest on the respondent’s unsupported testimony if there is any extrinsic proof of substance to support it. In particular, when the physical characteristics of sites or things are of any significance to the respondent’s testimony and can be proved by such relatively incontrovertible proof as photographs or demonstrative evidence, this should be done. The time when the respondent left school should be corroborated by attendance sheets; the time when s/he left work by his or her timecard; the weather, by Weather Bureau records. Every matter in which the respondent is supported by proof which the trier of fact will find believable has a capacity to spread and envelop the respondent’s testimony with an atmosphere of veracity. The respondent needs this badly, since any respondent’s testimony is suspect for obvious self-interest.

The necessary qualification of this principle is that if no corroboration can be made of significant aspects of the respondent’s story that would be corroborable if true, no corroboration should be offered of less significant items. It had better appear to the trier that counsel is slipshod than that counsel is diligent but does not have a case.

Part C. Expert Witnesses

§ 33.11 RULES GOVERNING EXPERT TESTIMONY

In States in which the admissibility of evidence is regulated by statutes or a set of rules, there is often a section or group of sections that governs expert testimony. In States that have not codified this aspect of the law of evidence or adopted a set of rules of evidence, local caselaw commonly prescribes the standards for presenting expert testimony.

Until the Supreme Court’s decision in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993), the standard for admission of expert testimony in the federal courts and in the vast majority of States was the so-called “Frye test,” drawn from Frye v. United States, 293 F. 1013, 1014 (D.C. Cir. 1923). Under the Frye test, scientific evidence (or, more precisely, scientific evidence of a novel type) was admissible only if the scientific technique was “sufficiently established in the particular field in which it belongs.” Id. at 1014. See Daubert, 509 U.S. at 585-86 & n.4 (discussing the Frye test). In Daubert, the Court established a new standard for the federal courts, interpreting the Federal Rules of Evidence to provide that the admission of “novel scientific evidence at trial” (id. at 585) turns upon a trial judge’s finding that the “scientific knowledge” to which “the expert is proposing to testify . . . will assist the trier of fact to understand or determine a fact in issue” (id. at 592). The Court explained that the question to be addressed by the trial judge “entails a preliminary assessment of whether the reasoning or methodology underlying the testimony is scientifically valid and of whether that reasoning or methodology properly can be applied to the facts in issue.” Id. at 593. Emphasizing that “[m]any factors will bear on the inquiry, and we do not presume to set out a definitive checklist or test” (id.), the Court made the following “general observations” (id.):

“Ordinarily, a key question to be answered in determining whether a theory or technique is scientific knowledge that will assist the trier of fact will be whether it can be (and has been) tested. . . . ¶ Another pertinent consideration is whether the theory or technique has been subjected to peer review and publication. . . . ¶ Additionally, in the case of a particular scientific technique, the court ordinarily should consider the known or potential rate of error, . . . and the existence and maintenance of standards controlling the technique’s operation . . . . ¶ Finally, ‘general acceptance’ can yet have a bearing on the inquiry. A ‘reliability assessment does not require, although it does permit, explicit identification of a relevant scientific community and an express determination of a particular degree of acceptance within that community.’ ¶ The inquiry envisioned by [Federal] Rule [of Evidence] 702 is, we emphasize, a flexible one. Its overarching subject is the scientific validity and thus the evidentiary relevance and reliability – of the principles that underlie a proposed submission. The focus, of course, must be solely on principles and methodology, not on the conclusions that they generate.” (Id. at 593-95.)

In Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137 (1999), the Court held that “Daubert’s general holding – setting forth the trial judge’s general ‘gatekeeping’ obligation [under the Federal Rules of Evidence] – applies not only to testimony based on ‘scientific’ knowledge, but also to testimony based on ‘technical’ and ‘other specialized’ knowledge.” Id. at 141. The Court reiterated in Kumho that “the test of reliability is ‘flexible,’ and Daubert’s list of specific factors neither necessarily nor exclusively applies to all experts or in every case.” Id.

When preparing to present an expert witness for the defense or to cross-examine a prosecution expert, counsel should critically review any potentially applicable evidentiary requirements in the jurisdiction’s statutes, rules or caselaw. Even when local practice treats certain rules of expert evidence as well-accepted, counsel should consider the possibility that a novel challenge could produce a different rule. Daubert not only changed the basic doctrinal principles in the expert-evidence sector; it inaugurated a new regime of judicial receptivity to rethinking old principles. And see, e.g., People v. Goldstein, 6 N.Y.3d 119, 126-29, 843 N.E.2d 727, 731-34, 810 N.Y.S.2d 100, 104-07 (2005) (questioning the parties’ assumption at trial and on appeal that the established evidence doctrines which authorize a prosecution psychiatrist to render an opinion based on hearsay also permit the psychiatrist to testify to the underlying hearsay statements on which the opinion was based; noting that “[w]e have found no New York case addressing the question of when a party offering a psychiatrist’s opinion . . . may present, through the expert, otherwise inadmissible information on which the expert relied”; observing that the federal rule of evidence on this subject was amended in 2000, and that, because the parties did not raise the issue, “[w]e are not called upon to decide here, and do not decide, whether the New York rule is the same as, or less or more restrictive than, this federal rule”; and ultimately holding that the underlying hearsay statements were inadmissible under a wholly distinct and adequately preserved claim that they violated the defendant’s Confrontation Clause rights under the doctrines set forth in § 30.04 supra.).

§ 33.12 QUALIFICATION OF THE EXPERT

§ 33.12(a) Subjects to Cover in Qualifying an Expert

Before an expert witness is competent to give an opinion, s/he must be qualified to the satisfaction of the court. There are no categorical standards of qualification; the matter is left essentially to the trial judge’s discretion. If the expert’s profession is licensed by the state, it is obviously desirable that s/he meet state standards for licensing. Most judges are not very exacting about the qualifications they demand. Counsel’s examination of a defense expert to establish his or her qualifications to testify is therefore usually less a matter of boosting the witness over a preliminary barrier than a matter of using the barrier as a justification for demonstrating how high the witness can jump – that is, of making him or her look impressive or endearing from the get-go. Eminence in the field will often impress the trier of fact, but many juries (and even many judges) prefer hometown experts and find Marcus Welby look-alikes more persuasive than Nobel Laureates. Counsel should talk with practitioners in the field to get a sense of the credentials that are generally regarded as prestigious within the particular specialty: handwriting experts, for example, usually become such by experience more than by formal training. A present or prior position with a law enforcement agency enhances the appearance of dispassion of the expert. In the same vein, counsel is ordinarily permitted to bring out, where applicable, the fact that an expert who has testified in other delinquency or criminal cases has predominately testified for the prosecution.

To qualify an expert, the following questions may be asked:
(1) Please state your name for the record.
(2) What is your profession [employment]?
(3) Would you tell the court, please, what is the subject matter of that profession [work]? [Counsel and the expert should have rehearsed a short, general, nontechnical description.]

[(4)] Do you specialize within the field?
[(5)] What is your specialty?
[(6)] And what is that concerned with? [Again, only a brief description is wanted.]
(7) Where are you employed? [or: Do you hold any particular job or position in your field? What is that job [position]?

(8) With respect to your formal education, would you state what colleges and universities you attended, if any, and what degrees you may have received?
(9) Was that degree in any specialized field?
(10) And what field was that?
[(11)] Are you licensed as a . . . in the State of . . . ?
[(12)] How long have you been licensed?]
[(13)] Have you been in practice all that time?]
[(14)] Are you also certified as a specialist in the field of . . . ?
[(15)] What does certification of that kind involve?]
[(16)] And how long have you been so certified?]
(17) Would you tell us, please, what positions you have held since the completion of your formal education and the number of years in each?
(18) What are the duties and functions of your present position, please?
(19) How long have you held that position?

[(20) With respect to any particularly relevant work experiences:] Now, you said that for . . . years you were at . . . . Would you tell us what you did there, and what professional experience you had?
(21) In the course of your work, have you had occasion to conduct examinations of . . . [stating the kind of examination involved in this case]?
(22) How many such examinations would you say you have conducted?
[(23) And have you also done any teaching in the field of . . . ?]
[(24) When and where was that done?]
[(25) Have you published any works [that appeared in professional journals] in the field of . . . ?]
(26) Would you state the titles of a few of those works, please?[The witness should be instructed to respond with a few titles that are the most pertinent to the subject matter of his or her testimony in the case.]
(27) Are you a member of any professional associations? Do you hold any special positions in those associations? What are the positions that you hold?] [(28) Have you received any prizes and awards in the field? (The witness should be instructed to answer this question with a simple “yes” rather than going on to rattle off his or her prizes and awards. Modesty is becoming and is cost-free here, since counsel can then proceed to ask:) Would you please tell the court what those prizes and awards were and what they were for?]

[(29) Dr. . . . , have you ever previously testified as an expert witness in court?]

(30) On how many occasions, if you remember? [If the witness has previously testified for the prosecution in an impressive percentage of cases: How many of those were in delinquency cases? How many were in criminal cases? Of the times you have testified in delinquency or criminal cases, how many times did you testify for the prosecution?]

[(31) And have you also been appointed by the court to testify [or, serve] as a neutral and impartial expert witness [in delinquency [or criminal] cases]?]

If the court please, I ask the court to accept Dr. . . . as a qualified expert in the field of . . .

§ 33.12(b) Stipulating the Qualifications of the Expert

If the defense expert is known to the prosecution, the prosecutor will often offer to stipulate that s/he is qualified to testify as an expert. A stipulation makes the preceding routine unnecessary but thereby forfeits the opportunity to use it as a display piece. Counsel has a right to decline the stipulation and to make his or her record. Generally, it is advisable not to agree to stipulate to the witness’s qualifications unless (a) there is some doubt whether s/he will qualify as an expert, or (b) the witness’s qualifications are less impressive than those of the prosecution’s expert, or (c) the qualifications of the experts for both sides are equally impressive, and the prosecution has agreed to stipulate to the qualification of both witnesses.

§ 33.13 GENERAL STRUCTURE OF THE EXPERT’S TESTIMONY

An expert gives opinion testimony. S/he describes the studies s/he has performed, the conditions under which they were performed, and the reliability of the studies under these conditions. After describing the data that s/he has examined or observed, s/he must be asked whether s/he has formed an opinion, based upon these data, concerning a legally relevant issue. (For example: “Based upon the examinations of Ruth Jones [the respondent] that you have described, have you formed an opinion with regard to whether Ruth was capable or incapable of forming an intent to kill during the late evening of October 1?”) Upon the expert’s affirmative answer to this question, s/he may be asked what the opinion is. To be admissible, the opinion usually must be of “reasonable certainty.”

After the expert has stated his or her opinion, s/he should be asked to explain the reasoning that led to it. This portion of the expert’s testimony should ordinarily emphasize each item of factual information that supports his or her ultimate conclusion and also indicate that s/he has considered every item of factual information in the case that might tend to cut against his or her conclusion. S/he can deal best with the latter facts by either (1) describing how they can be reconciled with his or her conclusion if they can or (2) admitting that they cut against his or her conclusion and explaining why s/he gives greater weight to other facts that support his or her conclusion. Either sort of testimony tends to be more convincing on direct examination than on The direct examination of the expert should be concise. If at any time the witness uses technical terms, s/he should be asked to explain them. Expert testimony must be carefully prepared to assure that the witness will speak to the level of understanding of the trier of fact. During dry runs of the expert’s testimony, counsel should point out to the expert the terms and concepts that will need explanation in everyday language. The expert should have formulated these explanations to the satisfaction of counsel before coming to court. An expert should never be put in the position of having to coin a definition for the first time on the stand. S/he is not necessarily used to explaining his or her specialty in terms that are not its own, and the explanation may make things even less clear.

Counsel’s questioning of an expert at trial should show the expertise of the witness, not that of counsel. Simple questions drawing on the experience and knowledge of the expert and calling for full answers will impress upon the trier of fact that the witness possesses the knowledge and understanding necessary to testify authoritatively in his or her specialty.

§ 33.14 HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS

When an expert’s opinion is required to be based on facts in addition to those of which s/he has personal knowledge or knowledge gained through his or her professional investigation of the matters at issue in the trial, s/he may testify in response to a hypothetical question of counsel that asks the expert to assume the requisite facts. These facts, of course, must be established by independent proof. It is obviously not necessary that the hypothetical question include all of the facts of record, but it is necessary that all of the facts which it does include be facts that could be found on the basis of the record. As a practical matter counsel should include as much of the evidence as s/he can without making the question tediously long; if s/he does not, the expert will likely be asked on cross-examination whether his or her opinion would change if each of the omitted facts were added – one by one. Even if s/he says that the opinion would not change, s/he is cast in the posture of appearing to explain away matters and to defend his or her opinion more than is desirable.

The form of the hypothetical question normally is “Now, I ask you to assume the following set of facts to be true and correct: [stating facts]. Assuming those facts to be true and correct, can you express an opinion with reasonable certainty as an expert whether [stating the problem]?” Following an affirmative answer to this question, counsel asks: “What is that opinion?” When the opinion is given, counsel asks for an explanation of the reasoning on which it is based. This much is technically necessary. The following dialogue is not, but it will add a good deal to the expert’s explanation of the basis for his or her opinion:

Q. Now, Dr. . . ., I have just asked you to assume certain facts, which I related in detail, and to give the court your opinion based upon them. When I recited those facts, was that the first time that they had been brought to your attention?
A. It was not.

Q. When were those facts previously brought to your attention?

A. Several weeks ago, you gave me a statement of the same set of facts in writing and asked me to assume that they were true and to study them and formulate an opinion based on them.

Q. [After marking document as a defense exhibit for identification:] I show you this document, marked Respondent’s Exhibit No. 1 for identification. Do you recognize that document?

A. I do.

Q. And what is it?

A. That is the statement of facts that you gave me several weeks ago, to which I just referred.

Q. Will you read that, please, to yourself and tell the court whether the statement of facts there is identical with the facts which I asked you to assume this afternoon.

A. It is.

Q. What did you do with this statement when I gave it to you?

A. I studied it carefully. I considered the facts that you had stated there, and, as you asked, I formulated an opinion on the basis of those facts.

Q. And was that opinion the one which you have given in court this afternoon?

A. Yes.

Q. Was the opinion you have given in court formed for the first time today?

A. Oh, no. It was based on a quite careful study and consideration of those facts, which I had had for several weeks.

Counsel: I ask that Respondent’s Exhibit No. 1 be admitted into evidence. The witness has stated that these facts on which he [she] based his [her] opinion are the same as those which I asked him [her] to assume today. [In a jury trial: I think there is no need to have the jury see that if they do not want to, but they should have it available to examine if they wish.]
§ 33.15 THE EXPERT’S REPORT

Whether a defense expert testifies in response to a hypothetical question or entirely on the basis of facts gathered in his or her investigation of the case, s/he should ordinarily submit a signed and dated written report to counsel in advance of trial. Such a report entails the danger that it may be discoverable by the prosecution under certain circumstances, but its value to the defense usually outweighs that danger if counsel advises the expert closely in the preparation of the report so as to assure that nothing potentially damaging creeps into it through inadvertence. See § 11.04(b)(1) supra.

Most courts will permit counsel to examine the witness by use of the report. Counsel should have five copies at trial: one for counsel’s own use, one for the witness, one for the court, one for the prosecutor, and one for formal admission into evidence. Counsel should:

   (1) Mark the report as an exhibit for identification,
   (2) Hand it to the witness, ask leave of the court to hand it up to the judge, and hand a copy to the prosecutor, and
   (3) Ask the witness to identify the exhibit. (The basic form of examination for identifying a document is illustrated in the third and fourth pair of Q’s and A’s in the concluding script in § 33.14 supra. In the present setting, the witness’s scripted answer to question number 4 will presumably be something like “That is a report I prepared at your request regarding my study of this case.”

Counsel may then direct the witness’s attention to anything in the report, by page and paragraph number, that may prove useful in organizing the examination. This device is particularly desirable if there are matters such as charts, graphs, and diagrams; numerical equations; collections of numbers tabulating data; and so forth, on which the witness bases his or her reasoning or which explicate his or her analysis. In a bench trial, directing the witness’s attention (and thereby the court’s attention) to the page on which each matter of this sort appears will suffice to enable the judge to follow the train of the testimony. In a jury trial the charts, graphs, diagrams, or figures should be reproduced on large graph paper or in electronic format for display or projection to the jury (see §§ 10.13, 10.15 supra), and the witness should identify the enlargement displayed as identical to the one in his or her report.

At the close of the direct examination, counsel should ask that the report be admitted as substantive evidence, stating that it exemplifies the testimony of the witness and that the witness will, of course, be subject to cross-examination on anything in it. In a bench trial, many courts will receive it, and the judge will find it useful, as a concise summary of the expert’s reasoning, in evaluating the evidence. Incidentally, counsel is guaranteed, in this fashion, against any negligent omission in the trial examination. The report should be prepared with great care, of course, and may go through several drafts with counsel’s criticism. In a jury trial, it is less likely to be received, but it will have served the functions of (a) allowing the witness to testify with an organizing outline of his or her own design in hand and (b) impressing the jury with the expert’s
§ 33.16 PREPARING THE EXPERT FOR CROSS-EXAMINATION

In preparing an expert to testify at trial, counsel should have been careful to give the expert literally all the facts at counsel’s disposal without editing or screening. Some of the facts may be unimportant, but it is for the witness to make this judgment on the basis of his or her expert knowledge, not for counsel. Important or unimportant, the prosecutor may well confront the witness with any particular fact on cross-examination at the trial, and the witness should not be left in the graceless posture of having to make a pressured latter-day judgment about its importance vel non.

When facts are contested, counsel should fully inform the expert concerning the prosecutor’s version of the facts as well as the defense version. It is predictable that the prosecutor will ask the expert at trial whether his or her opinion would change if $x$ fact were changed or if $y$ fact were changed. Counsel should have asked the expert these questions on dry-run examinations, and the expert should have a ready answer at trial.

Counsel should also explain to the expert the process of impeachment by the use of standard or reputable texts (see § 31.09 seventh and eighth paragraphs supra) and should have the expert identify for counsel the texts most likely to be used by the prosecutor. Counsel and the expert should go through these together, anticipating the sorts of questions that might be based on them.

Finally, counsel should take the expert through a detailed review of his or her pretrial report and should conduct a mock cross-examination to identify any vulnerabilities in it and to hammer out the best way to deal with each of them.

Part D. Character Witnesses

§ 33.17 RULES GOVERNING THE PRESENTATION OF CHARACTER TESTIMONY

The rules governing proof of character in a criminal or delinquency case are complex and not very sensible. Subject to local variation, they may be summarized as follows:

1) The prosecution cannot open the issue of character. That is, it may not present evidence when the sole purpose of that evidence is to show that the respondent is a bad person and for that reason is probably guilty of this offense. See § 30.07(a) supra.

2) The defense can, however, elect to make an issue of character by proving that the respondent is a good person and, accordingly, is probably not guilty of the offense.
(3) Defense evidence of good character is restricted, both in regard to subject and in regard to permissible form:

(i) The defense must address its character evidence to specific traits called in question by the charge against the respondent. It could appropriately prove the trait of honesty in defense of a prosecution for fraud but not for assault and battery. It might prove the traits of ‘peace and good order’ against assault and battery but not fraud.

(ii) These traits must be proved by a time-honored ritual. The witnesses called to prove them may testify only about the respondent’s reputation for these traits in a community where the respondent lives or is known. The witnesses may not testify about their own opinions of the respondent or about any specific good deeds or acts of the respondent’s that exemplify the character trait in question. What is called ‘character evidence’ is thus essentially reputation evidence. (Fed. Rule Evid. 803(21) (2018) and its state counterparts provide that “[a] reputation among a person’s associates or in the community concerning the person’s character” is admissible hearsay. The traditional limitation of proof-of-character to reputation evidence has been relaxed to some extent under the Federal Rules and in States that have adopted this feature of Fed. Rule Evid. 405 (2018) (“Methods of Proving Character”). Rule 405 currently provides:

“(a) By Reputation or Opinion. When evidence of a person’s character or character trait is admissible, it may be proved by testimony about the person’s reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination of the character witness, the court may allow an inquiry into relevant specific instances of the person’s conduct.

“(b) By Specific Instances of Conduct. When a person’s character or character trait is an essential element of a charge, claim, or defense, the character or trait may also be proved by relevant specific instances of the person’s conduct.”

(4) In rebuttal, the prosecution may do two things:

(a) It may cross-examine the respondent’s character witnesses. Since they have purported to testify about the respondent’s general community repute, they may be asked about any bad rumors concerning the respondent that they may have heard. In this context some jurisdictions suspend the usual rule barring the introduction of a respondent’s prior juvenile adjudications and even the universal rule excluding evidence of a respondent’s prior arrests, and permit the prosecution to ask defense character witnesses on cross-examination whether the witness has heard that the respondent was arrested or adjudicated a delinquent or did a specified evil deed on a specified date. See Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948). However, the trial judge has discretion to preclude inquiry into particular prior adjudications or disreputable acts on a finding that their disclosure would be substantially more prejudicial than probative (see § 30.03(c) supra), and there are appellate cases holding that the admission of inquiries into stale or especially inflammatory priors is a reversible abuse of discretion. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Feliz, 2015 WL 9320079 (Pa. Super. 2015).

(b) The prosecution may also present evidence independent of the defense character witnesses. It may prove that the respondent’s reputation for the trait in question is bad. Traditionally, it may prove adverse rumor and nothing else. (However, that restriction has been loosened in federal trials by the provisions of Federal Evidence Rule 405 quoted in subsection (3)(b) supra and in some States. This aspect of Rule 405 is less widely copied statewise than much else in the Federal Rules.)

§ 33.18 QUALIFICATIONS AND FORM OF EXAMINATION OF CHARACTER WITNESSES

The following are the traditional qualifications for a character witness:

(a) That the witness knows the respondent.

(b) That the witness is familiar with some community where the respondent is well known (neighborhood, school, work, church) and where, if the respondent had bad character in the dimension to which the witness speaks, the respondent’s bad character would be known.

(c) That the witness has discussed the respondent with other people on numerous occasions. (If s/he cannot say “more than a half-dozen,” s/he will probably not be permitted to testify in many localities.)

(d) That those conversations have related to the character trait in question, which is germane to the offense with which the respondent is charged.

These qualifications, together with the very small amount of substantive evidence that the witness is permitted to give, are elicited by a set of standard questions, which differ somewhat on a local basis but generally run as follows:
§ 33.19 CHOICE OF THE CHARACTER WITNESS

In a bench trial in a delinquency case, character testimony provides an invaluable opportunity to convey certain important messages to the judge. Many judges assume that any child who has been charged with a delinquency offense, whose case was not diverted by the prosecutor or the probation office, probably is so unruly at school or has such a long record that s/he needs court intervention. Judges who subscribe to this view may be prone, consciously or unconsciously, to return a conviction in order to ensure that the respondent receives the rehabilitative services which the judge (correctly or incorrectly) assumes that the respondent needs.

Through careful selection of character witnesses, counsel can correct these negative assumptions. If a teacher or guidance counselor from the respondent’s school testifies, even if s/he testifies only to the limited information permitted from character witnesses, the judge will infer that the teacher’s willingness to come to court on the respondent’s behalf signifies that the respondent is a good student (with all that that implies: good attendance, good behavior, and good grades). The presentation of an employer or athletic coach or community center counselor will inform the judge that the respondent is involved in beneficial activities outside of school and thus may not need court intervention. Finally, in jurisdictions that allow the prosecutor to cross-examine character witnesses about the respondent’s juvenile adjudications, the prosecutor’s failure to do so will alert the judge to the fact that the respondent has no prior record. It should be noted that, in many jurisdictions, these favorable aspects of the respondent’s character and record can also be presented to a judicial trier of fact through a motion for diversion. See Chapter 19.

In a jury trial the trier of fact will be far less sophisticated about the implications of the character witnesses for the respondent’s general adjustment at school, at home, and in the community. To jurors a character witness’s real significance is as a presence standing up for the respondent – someone who has enough faith in the respondent to vouch for him or her. The witness is not permitted to say this, but s/he can look it. Character witnesses must be expressive. They, more than other witnesses, must be sympathetic. Prestige is desirable, but it must be coupled with likeableness.

There should be at least two character witnesses, preferably three or four. Individuality of character and some differences of types among the witnesses are desirable if the factfinder is not to be bored with the routine patter of the examination.

§ 33.20 PREPARATION OF THE CHARACTER WITNESS

Preparation of character witnesses is more important than it might seem in light of the flimsiness of the testimony they are allowed to give. Good preparation has several aspects:

The nature of the reputation testimony that the witness is being asked to give must be made clear to him or her. Some witnesses cannot seem to get straight that they are not being asked for their personal evaluation or opinion of the respondent. Precisely because the evidentiary rule is arbitrary and rather senseless, it must be carefully explained to the witness. The response of the inadequately prepared character witness – “Have I heard? I know the respondent. S/he’s as honest as the day is long . . .” – is usually good for some courtroom humor but does the respondent no good. The witness simply gets into a wrangle with the judge, and the value of the exercise is lost.

Counsel must be sure that the witness has had enough contacts with people who know the respondent and that s/he has heard the respondent talked about sufficiently often so that s/he will qualify as a character witness. It is vital to direct the witness’s attention to this subject and to the fact that it is going to be asked about in court. Many witnesses who have actually had sufficient contact with the respondent will appear not to have had it if they are not prepared for the standard cross-examination on voir dire. The prosecutor will ask the character witness, first, to limit himself or herself to the precise character trait s/he is speaking about – “honesty” – and to tell the court the names of some people with whom s/he has discussed that trait of the respondent, and how it came to be discussed. This will not be easy for the unprepared witness because, thinking under pressure, s/he is likely to give narrow range to the concept of “honesty” and also be trying to remember specific occasions on which explicit conversational reference was made to this trait – which will probably have been few. The witness will therefore falter somewhat.

The prosecutor will then move in with the question on precisely how many occasions the witness can recall discussing this specific trait of the respondent’s. Thinking literally and having been once stung, the witness will estimate conservatively. Not aware that s/he is likely to be disqualified if s/he answers that s/he has discussed the trait infrequently, the witness will say “three or four times, maybe, that I recall” and thus put himself or herself out of court.
There is no need for this problem to arise. Counsel must make the witness understand that people talk about “honesty” under many other names when they talk about the respondent and also when they act toward the respondent in ways that express confidence and trust. Counsel should elicit specific instances from the witness and give the witness confidence that s/he is on sound ground in recalling that the general sense of the community is that the respondent is honest. If the witness is left with the recollection of a half-dozen names with which to respond to the prosecutor’s question to name names, s/he will be all right. It is usually understandable that s/he will have forgotten the names of another half-dozen persons with whom s/he has discussed the respondent or whom s/he has heard discuss the respondent, and s/he should be encouraged to say this when the prosecutor pushes him or her on cross if s/he believes that it is true. The important thing is that s/he does not fluster and that s/he continues to assert with confidence the fact that s/he has discussed the respondent’s honesty often.

If the respondent has a record and the jurisdiction is one in which the prosecutor is allowed to bring that record out on cross-examination of defense character witnesses, then a character defense is very risky and unlikely to succeed. Should such a defense be put on, the witnesses must be prepared for the questions (1) whether they have heard about each of respondent’s arrests and adjudications and (2) whether each arrest or adjudication, if it happened, would change the witness’s view of the respondent’s character. (The latter question is allowed in many jurisdictions, although the witness is not supposed to be testifying about his or her own view of the respondent. The theory is that the question tests the witness’s standards for “honesty” and so forth.) Witnesses should be selected who answer both questions “no,” the first with indignation and the second with conviction. Since “have you heard” means “have you heard in the community,” there may be no problem in defense counsel’s informing the witness of the respondent’s record in the course of trial preparation, but the question is a sensitive one.

Even in jurisdictions that allow the prosecutor to bring out the respondent’s prior record in cross-examining character witnesses, counsel has a valid ground of objection to questions about arrests or adjudications if: (a) the arrest or adjudication does not bear upon the specific character trait to which the witness has testified (see, e.g., State v. Watson, 321 Md. 47, 580 A.2d 1067 (1990); People v. Pratt, 759 P.2d 676, 683 (Colo. 1988)), or (b) the prosecutor has no sound basis in fact for asserting that there was an arrest or adjudication (see, e.g., id. at 683-86; State v. Banjoman, 178 W. Va. 311, 318-20, 359 S.E.2d 331, 338-40 (1987) (dictum); cf. Barker v. State, 52 Ark. App. 248, 916 S.W.2d 775 (1996); § 33.09(a) subdivision (1) supra). In addition, the trial judge may, in his or her discretion, disallow questions about some or all prior arrests or adjudications as incommensurately prejudicial. See § 30.03 supra. In jury trials, counsel should request at sidebar that the prosecutor identify the arrests and adjudications that s/he intends to use so that the judge can rule on their admissibility and can exercise this discretion before the jury hears any questions about the respondent’s prior record.

§ 33.21 EXPERT EVIDENCE OF EXCULPATORY PERSONALITY TRAITS; DIMINISHED CAPACITY
In addition to lay reputation testimony, some jurisdictions permit expert testimony in support of a defense theory that the psychological traits of the respondent would make it unlikely for him or her to have committed the crime. This sort of testimony has been received particularly in the area of sex crimes, when the accused is charged with a pedophilic offense and has sought to prove by psychiatric evidence that his or her personality is inconsistent with this type of offense, or when the accused is charged with homosexual rape and offers psychiatric evidence that his or her sexual orientation is exclusively heterosexual, or vice versa. A showing might also be attempted, for example, in a homicide case involving extreme violence that the respondent was a passive type incapable of such violence.

This sort of evidence, going to show that the respondent did not do the act charged, should be distinguished from psychiatric or psychological evidence proffered to support the defense sometimes called partial responsibility or diminished capacity. The latter is presented when specific intent or some other precise mental state is an element of a crime: The defense expert is called to testify that the accused could not or did not form such an intent or such a mental state by reason of mental illness or other incapacitating factors. See, e.g., United States v. Brawner, 471 F.2d. 969, 998-1002 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (en banc), and cases cited. While more than half of the States permit persons who are charged with crimes defined in terms of subjective mental elements to adduce expert testimony for this purpose, many other States do not; and the Supreme Court of the United States has held that nothing in the federal Constitution requires a State to admit such “diminished capacity” evidence. Clark v. Arizona, 548 U.S. 735 (2006). But see id. at 756-65, reserving the question whether, if the prosecution asks the trier of fact to draw a specific factual inference from the accused’s behavior (for example, that the accused drove around during pre-dawn hours with his car radio blaring for the purpose of stimulating a 911 call that would lure a police office into an ambush), the accused would have a federal due process right to respond with expert mental-health evidence that made this inference less likely (for example, that the accused suffers from schizophrenia, experiences auditory hallucinations, and plays his car radio at high volume to drown them out); compare id at 781-801 (Justice Kennedy, writing for three dissenting Justices and answering the latter question in the affirmative).

The recognition of expert character evidence has thus far been limited to a few jurisdictions, although that of “partial responsibility” has been relatively widespread. See generally American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice, Commentary to Standard 7-6.2 (1989) (Criminal Justice Mental Health Standards: “Admissibility of Other Evidence of Mental Condition”). Resourceful counsel should keep both of them in mind.

Part E. Other Defense Witnesses and Other Aspects of the Defense Case

§ 33.22 ALIBI WITNESSES

The key to establishing credible alibi testimony is to have the witness relate why s/he remembers being with the respondent at a specific time and at a specific place. Counsel should lead up to the date of the alibi by developing the relationship between the respondent and the witness and eliciting the times during the course of a week or a month (or within the appropriate pattern of their relationship) that they see each other. Counsel may then move to the month of the crime, pinpoint something unusual or significant that happened during that month, and then focus on the day of the crime, relating the date and the time to the significant happening just described and to the pattern of the witness’s daily routine or relationship with the respondent. The nub of the matter is to prove convincingly that the witness can and does remember that particular day and time and could not be mistaken on it. Reference to the weather (which counsel can establish independently by United States Weather Bureau records admissible as business entries), television programs (provable independently by station records), and regular school or work hours (provable by school records, timecards, and other business records) is useful in fixing dates and times with certainty and apparent extrinsic corroboration.

In cases in which the witness remembers the respondent’s clothing, and especially when s/he can cite a good reason for remembering it, counsel will usually want to elicit a description of the clothing that the respondent was wearing when the witness saw him or her – assuming, of course, that this differs from the perpetrator’s clothing as described by prosecution witnesses. However, this should not be done when it would seem unrealistic for someone in the witness’s position to recall the respondent’s attire.

When preparing alibi witnesses, counsel should caution them not to claim to remember things they have forgotten. A standard prosecutorial tactic is to cross-examine alibi witnesses about wholly insignificant details, such as what the witness ate for breakfast or lunch or the precise time of irrelevant events that were not memorable. If the witness professes to have a superhuman memory of these details, the witness’s credibility will be impaired not only with regard to the details but also with regard to the substance of the alibi.

§ 33.23 WITNESSES WHO ARE ALLEGED ACCOMPliceS

In the unusual case (see § 10.12 supra) when a witness who is an accomplice of the respondent under the prosecution’s theory testifies for the defense, counsel should bring out (a) the lack of opportunity for the respondent to coerce the accomplice to testify favorably, (b) the lack of any other motive for the accomplice’s favorable testimony, and (c) the potential benefits to the accomplice if s/he testifies against the respondent. These are principally matters to be stressed in closing argument, but they can be argued only if a testimonial basis is laid for arguing them. In some jurisdictions, a respondent is permitted to call an accomplice or other alleged perpetrator to the stand for the purpose of requiring him or her to claim the Privilege Against Self-Incrimination in front of the trier of fact, provided that the respondent has laid a foundation for this tactic by evidence indicating the witness’s possible guilt. See State v. Whitt, 220 W. Va. 685, 688-89, 696, 649 S.E.2d 258, 260-61, 269 (2007) (trial court violated the defendant’s state constitutional right to compulsory process by preventing the defendant from calling an alleged accomplice to the witness stand for the purpose of having her assert a Fifth Amendment privilege in front of the jury: although state law ordinarily precludes a party from calling a witness to the stand “solely for the purpose of exercising his or her Fifth Amendment privilege,” an exception applies “where a defendant in a criminal case seeks to call a witness to the stand who intends to invoke his or her Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and the defendant has presented sufficient evidence to demonstrate the possible guilt of the witness for the crime the defendant is charged with committing.”).

§ 33.24 SURPRISE BY A DEFENSE WITNESS

A defense case that appears beautiful in prospect may be marred by unexpected testimony of a defense witness. The best safeguard against this occurrence is careful preparation and the taking of detailed pretrial statements from witnesses. See § 8.12(a) supra. Whether statements should be taken in writing or orally involves a tradeoff. Written statements are usually more effective in impeaching a turncoat witness, but they are also more susceptible to discovery by the prosecution. See § 8.10 supra. The judgment should be made by counsel after considering both the sensitivity of the particular witness’s information and the likelihood that s/he will change a favorable story that s/he has given counsel before trial. If counsel opts to take oral rather than written statements from witnesses, counsel should make detailed notes of the statements in a form that maximizes their “work product” insulation against discovery. See §§ 5.05, 8.10, 9.13 supra.

Whenever counsel has reason to suspect that a witness is unstable or untrustworthy or may have had second thoughts or may have changed his or her story since counsel took a pretrial statement, counsel should question the witness again in the few hours preceding trial. This can be done without alarming or offending the witness – or making the witness’s trial testimony go stale – by asking the witness several specific questions about details that go to the heart of his or her story, purportedly for counsel’s clarification.

If, notwithstanding all precautions, the witness turns around at trial and presents testimony damaging to the defense, counsel should inform the court that counsel has been surprised by the testimony of the witness and should request permission to impeach the witness. (In jury trials this request should be made at sidebar, and counsel should request that the jury be excused during any colloquy or voir dire on the issue.) In some jurisdictions counsel’s representation that s/he has been surprised is sufficient to justify a judicial ruling permitting counsel to impeach his or her own witness. In other jurisdictions counsel will need to make an evidentiary showing of surprise. To do this, counsel should proceed as follows:

1. Ask the witness whether the witness did not make a statement concerning this case to counsel (or to counsel’s investigator) on x date at A place.
2. Ask the witness whether s/he did not at that time sign (or correct or approve) a written statement relating to the case.
3. Mark the statement as an exhibit for identification.
4. Hand it to the witness.
5. Ask the witness whether s/he recognizes the document.
6. Ask the witness whether it is not the statement that the witness gave counsel on x
(7) Read to the witness the portions of the statement that are inconsistent with the witness’s trial testimony and ask the witness whether those are not the witness’s statements.

(8) Ask the witness whether the witness has not seen counsel on y date and on z date since giving the statement to counsel on x date.

(9) Ask the witness whether they did not discuss the case on y date and on z date.

(10) Ask whether, in fact, they did not discuss the case this morning just before trial.

(11) Ask whether on any of those occasions the witness informed counsel that s/he was going to change his or her story from that in the written statement made on x date.

If the witness denies making the statement, counsel should represent to the court that counsel (or counsel’s investigator) did take the statement from the witness, and counsel should offer to testify (or offer to call the investigator to testify) regarding the taking of the statement from the witness. Counsel should, in this representation or testimony, authenticate the statement as that given by the witness on x date. Counsel should then offer the statement in evidence.

In the case of an oral statement, of course, items (2) through (7) supra are omitted and replaced by counsel’s narration to the witness of the witness’s words on x date; and counsel’s or the investigator’s representation or testimony must establish the content of the witness’s oral statement.

Once the judge determines that counsel has made an adequate showing of surprise, counsel will be permitted to impeach the witness with the prior statement. Of course, if the trial is a bench trial and if counsel has conducted the full line of questioning just described, the trier of fact will already have heard the impeachment. Accordingly, counsel can offer to forgo taking up the court’s time by repeating the line of inquiry if the court prefers simply to treat the testimony of the witness on voir dire as if it had been taken also on the general issue (that is, on the question of the respondent’s guilt or innocence) and to treat the witness’s prior statement as admitted for impeachment on the general issue. In a jury trial, counsel will have to repeat the entire set of questions before the jury when it returns to the courtroom, and then pass or read the prior statement to the jury.

§ 33.25 COURT WITNESSES AND HOSTILE WITNESSES

The court has discretion to call witnesses sua sponte when the parties have not called them and the testimony indicates that they may have information desirable for the just disposition of the case. The discretion is broad: A trial judge will virtually never be reversed for calling a witness (so long as its examination of the witness is fair and not slanted) or for failing to call one.

Counsel for either side may request that a witness be called as a court witness when the other side has not called the witness and the requesting party is unwilling to accept whatever “vouching-for” responsibility local evidentiary law imposes upon a party calling a witness as his or her own. Court witnesses may be examined as on cross-examination by both parties and impeached by both. See, e.g., Fed. Rule Evid. 614(a).

Counsel may also request leave of court to call a witness who is shown to be hostile for examination as on cross-examination and subject to impeachment. See, e.g., Fed. Rule Evid.
611(c); United States v. Duncan, 712 F. Supp. 124, 126-27 (S.D. Ohio 1988). Here again, the trial judge has considerable discretion but it is not unlimited. See, e.g., United States v. Bryant, 461 F.2d 912, 916-19 (6th Cir. 1972). The refusal to permit defense counsel to call and examine persons as hostile witnesses (or “adverse witnesses,” in the terminology of some jurisdictions) can be challenged as an abuse of discretion as a matter of state evidentiary law (State v. Perolis, 183 W. Va. 686, 687-89, 398 S.E.2d 512, 513-15 (1990)), and, in some circumstances, as a violation of the state and federal constitutional guarantees of the right to confrontation (see

The importance of the court-witness and hostile-witness procedures varies greatly from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, depending upon the restrictions to which a party is subject in leading and impeaching his or her own witnesses. When these restrictions are significant, counsel should take the position that all complainants, relatives of complainants, and all police, including informers, “special agents” and other police spies, are per se hostile to the defense. See, e.g., official or other investigating agent (regardless of whether he or she be a local, state or federal officer) may qualify as a witness identified with an adverse party in an action brought by the Government against criminal defendants, absent a positive showing by the Government that the witness is not hostile, biased or so identified with the adverse party that the presumption of hostility which is the cornerstone of Fed. R. Evid. 611(c) should not be indulged. Therefore, Defendants’ Motion to Invoke Rule 611(c) in direct examination of police officers and government agents is granted.”); Clingan v. United States, 400 F.2d 849, 851 (5th Cir. 1968) (“Generally, the determination of whether a witness is adverse is discretionary. . . . But when a paid government informer or one acting in concert with law enforcement officers refuses to be interviewed by defendant’s attorneys concerning the facts and circumstances surrounding the alleged crime and the government informer has previously discussed his testimony with the prosecution, we believe that a sufficient showing of prejudice to . . . [defendant’s] case has been made to permit . . . [defendant’s] attorneys to call these witnesses as adverse witnesses. Adversity need not be established only by the demeanor of the witness on the stand where the witness shows an unwillingness to testify except by an order of the Court. A sufficient showing of adversity is made where the witness’ interest is on the side of the prosecution to such an extent that he is unlikely to give a true account of the transaction.”). As for other witnesses, counsel may profitably attempt to demonstrate (a) personal animosity against the respondent, (b) an extrajudicial statement of the witness incriminating the respondent or (c) a refusal to talk to defense counsel, coupled with some signs of animosity. These and other matters should be developed by examination of the witness (which, in jury trials, should be conducted in the absence of the jury). Most courts will allow counsel to ask the witness leading questions for the purpose of attempting to show his or her hostility. When the witness denies facts that, if admitted, would make the witness hostile, counsel is usually allowed to prove them extrinsically.
Chapter 34

Objections to Evidence; Motions for Mistrial; Proffers; Rulings on Evidentiary Questions

§ 34.01 OBJECTIONS AND MOTIONS TO STRIKE; MAKING A RECORD

Except in unusual circumstances, a claim of error in the admission of evidence will not be entertained on a postverdict motion for a new trial or on appeal or in postconviction proceedings unless an objection to the evidence was made and overruled at the time of its introduction. See, e.g., Wainwright v. Sykes, 433 U.S. 72 (1977). Accordingly, if counsel wants to preserve a claim of error, s/he should be sure that the record clearly shows (a) that counsel did object and (b) the grounds for the objection (“hearsay” or “violates the right to confrontation” or whatever; specificity is indispensable in order to preserve claims for appellate review (see, e.g., Betterman v. Montana, 136 S. Ct. 1609, 1612 (2016)); and (c) the legal source that grounds the objection (“violates the state and federal constitutional confrontation clauses”; see § 7.09 supra) and (d) that the court did rule on counsel’s objection dispositively and unfavorably.

Sometimes the judge will simply shake his or her head in negation. This doesn’t do it. If the objection is worth preserving for appeal, counsel has got to politely but firmly get an audible ruling for the record. “I’m sorry, your Honor, but I’m not sure that the [court reporter] [recorder] caught your Honor’s ruling overruling my objection” will usually do the job. In some jurisdictions it is also necessary for counsel to note a formal exception to the unfavorable ruling.

Judges will sometimes respond to counsel’s objections with comments like: “Well, let’s see where that is going [for a little longer]” or (in a jury trial) “I’ll take care of that in my instructions to the jury.” These are not categorical rulings on the objection; they are evasions or postponements of any ruling. If counsel wants to stand on the objection, (a) s/he must ask the court whether the court has overruled counsel’s objection at this point; (b) s/he must get a verbal answer from the judge; and (c) s/he must note an exception in jurisdictions where exceptions are required. Counsel must also renew the objection later if the prosecution continues down the same line. Similarly, if the judge states that s/he will take an evidentiary objection “under advisement” and thereafter ignores it, counsel will need to politely insist at the close of the prosecution’s case and again at the close of all the evidence that the judge rule on the reserved question.

Judges may reply to an objection by admitting evidence contingently, for example, subject to “connecting up.” Counsel must later move to strike when the contingency fails, for example, when the evidence is not connected up.

Each time an objectionable item is proved, it ordinarily must be objected to. If the prosecution presents testimony of three witnesses on the same point, counsel must object to all three. Failure to object anew every time defeats all claims of error in the admission of the evidence, even though counsel may have properly objected once or twice.
If evidence is admitted either before an objection can be made or before the court has ruled on the objection, counsel should object (or repeat his or her objection), then move to strike the evidence. In a jury trial, counsel will also need to ask the judge to instruct the jury to disregard the stricken evidence. This will protect counsel’s record if the judge overrules the objection. But it will do relatively little good if the judge sustains the objection, since jurors are not really likely to disregard anything that they have heard. If the evidence is at all harmful, therefore, counsel should consider a motion for a mistrial. See § 34.11 infra.

The trial transcript will reflect only what the court reporter hears or the recording apparatus captures. Counsel must therefore make his or her objections – and obtain the court’s rulings on them – audibly and explicitly. Often, in the heat of the trial, the judge will see that counsel is rising to object and will rule on the objection before counsel begins to speak. Whether or not counsel gets to say anything, the court may overrule counsel by a shake of the head or by waving counsel down or by saying something ambiguous, like “Go on.” Numberless viable appellate claims have been lost on account of such rulings. If something of the sort happens, counsel should say, “If the Court please, I would like to state for the record the grounds of the respondent’s objection to this evidence and to have the record reflect that the objection has been overruled.” Then the grounds of objection should be stated.

In jury trials, counsel also must make sure that any colloquy at a sidebar conference is being recorded by the court reporter. Counsel should tell the reporter before trial that counsel assumes all sidebar discussion will be recorded unless the judge expressly orders the discussion “off the record.” If the reporter does not agree, counsel should make this arrangement with the court. Thereafter, whenever counsel approaches the bench, s/he should watch to see that the reporter comes, too; and until the reporter is within hearing distance, counsel should not start talking and should stop the judge or prosecutor from talking by pointing out that the reporter is not yet there. Any objection or ruling made during “off the record” conferences should be repeated for the record after their conclusion.

§ 34.02 TIME OF OBJECTION; QUIETING THE WITNESS

Objections to evidence must be made immediately after the question that calls for an inadmissible answer. If the witness begins to answer the question after the objection and before the court has ruled, counsel should gesture to the witness to stop and should immediately interrupt the witness by stating respectfully but loudly that an objection has been made.

Witnesses sometimes need repeated reminding that they cannot answer a question to which an objection has been made unless the court overrules the objection. If a prosecution witness appears stubborn on the subject, a request should be made to the judge to admonish the witness to that effect. A motion for a mistrial may be appropriate if the witness has made an inadmissible disclosure and its prejudicial impact is considerable. See § 34.11 infra.

Counsel may sometimes find self-help measures justified, particularly when a police witness persists in ignoring defense objections. A request to the judge to admonish the witness in this situation may be coupled with the observation in open court: “This officer has testified here many times, Your Honor, and s/he knows better than that.”

§ 34.03 STATEMENT OF THE BASIS FOR OBJECTIONS; ARGUMENT ON EVIDENTIARY POINTS

Counsel should always state the grounds, and all of the grounds, for objecting to an item of evidence. This does not mean that the grounds for an objection must be stated in the same breath with the objection itself. To the contrary, unless local practice or the particular presiding judge requires that the reasons for objecting be stated contemporaneously with the objection – or unless the judge is one of those who makes instant rulings on objections and then resents counsel’s stating the grounds of objection for the record – it is usually better for counsel to object simply by saying, “Objection, Your Honor” and then to pause before stating the grounds. There are two reasons for this. First, judges will often sustain an objection on grounds other than those which counsel had in mind and would have stated. Second, the delay gives counsel an added moment or two to come up with the name or names of the objection or objections s/he wants to make.

The risk of delay, of course, is that the judge may rule before counsel has had a chance to influence the ruling by a persuasive statement of the grounds of objection. But most judges who do not perceive the grounds of objection will ask counsel what the objection is before ruling. If counsel still has not come up with the name of the objection by this time, s/he should start talking in nontechnical terms about whatever it is that bothers counsel in regard to the evidence to which s/he is objecting. Usually, the name of the objection will come to mind in a moment, when counsel starts describing what s/he senses to be wrong, in a commonsense way, with the evidence. For example: “Objection, Your Honor. . . . The prosecutor is putting words in the witness’s mouth instead of letting the witness testify in [his] [her] own words – it’s leading.” Or: “Objection, Your Honor. . . . There hasn’t been any testimony that this witness saw the respondent arrive at the bar, so the witness can’t be asked what time the respondent arrived – no personal knowledge.”

In most jurisdictions, it is not obligatory for counsel to come up with the technical label of the objection – “leading,” “no personal knowledge” – although it helps. Counsel should use the technical terminology as soon as it comes to mind. But if it fails to come to mind quickly, counsel should make his or her point in concrete, descriptive language.

If the judge overrules counsel’s objection before counsel states the grounds for it, counsel should ask respectfully, “May I state the grounds of that objection for the record, Your Honor?” Counsel has a right to state the grounds, in order to protect the record for appeal. S/he has no right to argue to the trial judge an objection that the judge has already overruled, and s/he should not appear to be doing that. If, however, the grounds that counsel states “for the record” – ostensibly to preserve the objection for appeal – convince the trial judge that counsel’s objection has merit, most judges (or at least most judges whom counsel could have won over by an earlier statement of the grounds) will reverse their rulings. In any event, before the testimony resumes, counsel must state all available grounds for the objection, in order to preserve them for appeal.

When making an objection in a jury trial, counsel should consider whether the statement of grounds for the objection and any argument of evidentiary questions that the judge invites or permits should be presented within or without the hearing of the jury. If counsel’s argument includes matters that s/he wishes the jury to hear and if the prosecutor’s responsive argument is not likely to contain matters that counsel does not want the jury to hear, the obvious choice is open court. Open court is appropriate, for example, when the prosecution has launched into a line of proof to which counsel objects on grounds that it lacks probative value rather than on some formalistic or exclusionary ground. Suppose that the prosecutor has established that the respondent was arrested and now asks the arresting officer whether the respondent had any money in his or her possession at the time of the arrest. Counsel may want to say: “I object, Your Honor, on the ground that it has not been shown that the amount of money taken from this complainant – 20 dollars – was an amount the respondent would not normally have of [his] [her] own money or that the bills taken from the complainant were unusual in any way. The question is irrelevant. It has absolutely nothing to do with this case.” Objections that would reveal the existence of damaging prosecution evidence – or that are likely to lead to colloquies or arguments that will – should be made at sidebar. If counsel requests a sidebar conference but the judge refuses to let counsel come to the bench, counsel should state preliminarily that the grounds for his or her objection will be prejudicial (without saying to whom they will be prejudicial) if described from counsel table. If the judge persists in refusing a sidebar, counsel should state his or her objection in technical terms that will identify the grounds for the record without telling the jury more than is absolutely necessary (“the right to confrontation”; “the Privilege”; “Rule 403”). Objections of this sort will probably preserve points if the record is clear that counsel was previously refused leave to come to the bench, since that refusal has put counsel in a difficult predicament. Nevertheless, to be on the safe side, on the next occasion when the jury is out of the courtroom, counsel should ask leave “to amplify for the record the grounds of the objection that I could not develop fully in the jury’s presence” and should then dictate the grounds to the court reporter. With adequate trial preparation and advance planning, counsel will find that s/he can usually state the reasons for most objections in a formally adequate but popularly unilluminating phrase or two in open court, when this seems wise.

§ 34.04 ANTICIPATORY OBJECTIONS

As discussed in § 30.02(a)(2) supra, if counsel knows from defense investigation, discovery, or prior hearings that the prosecutor will attempt to introduce objectionable evidence through a particular witness, counsel should consider making an anticipatory objection when the witness is first called to the stand or when the prosecutor begins any line of questioning that may lead to the objectionable matter. Study of the transcripts of the probable-cause hearing, of any evidentiary motions hearings that have been held in the respondent’s case, and of any evidentiary proceedings that have been held in the cases of co-respondents or adult defendants charged in connection with the same episode will aid counsel to forecast by what witnesses, and often at what point in the witness’s testimony, the prosecutor is starting down a trail that will lead to the challengeable item. See § 4.36 supra. An indigent respondent’s right to obtain transcripts of pretrial proceedings without charge is discussed in §§ 4.31(d), 4.37 supra.

Anticipatory objections are particularly useful in a jury trial because they serve to keep the trier of fact entirely unaware of the existence and nature of inadmissible pieces of evidence. When appropriate, counsel can ask the court to instruct a witness (or to direct the prosecutor to instruct the witness) not to go into certain matters or not to mention specified items or subjects in front of the jury.

In a bench trial, counsel may be able to persuade the judge to rule on the admissibility of a certain type of evidence (such as “other crimes” evidence, see § 30.07(a) supra) generically, without hearing the contents of the evidence that the prosecutor is seeking to adduce. In support of this procedure, counsel can point out that whenever it is feasible, it meets the prosecution’s need for an evidentiary ruling without exposing the respondent to the prejudice inherent in a factfinder’s hearing inadmissible evidence. See § 20.05 supra. If the prosecutor insists upon relating the contents of the evidence to the judge, counsel can suggest that this is a tactic designed to convey inadmissible evidence to the factfinder even if it is excluded and that the court should not countenance such an improper ploy.

§ 34.05 VOIR DIRE OF A WITNESS

Some objections to the admissibility of evidence require a preliminary determination of fact by the trial judge. For example, if counsel objects to a photograph or diagram of the scene of the crime on the ground that it does not fairly and accurately represent the scene, a ruling on the objection requires a preliminary factual determination whether the photograph or diagram is a fair and accurate representation. As explained in § 30.02(a)(2) supra, counsel can request a voir dire examination of a prosecution witness on the preliminary question of fact, cross-examining the witness about the specific issue raised and obtaining a ruling on that issue before the witness continues with his or her direct examination.

The voir dire procedure is primarily useful in jury trials, in which defense counsel can use it to (a) close off objectionable lines of inquiry before they get the jury guessing, (b) test and refine lines of potential cross-examination that might be risky if counsel pursued them in open court without knowing beforehand what the witness’s answers would be, and (c) break up the flow of the prosecution’s case.

The voir dire procedure may be useful occasionally in a bench trial, even when it does not prevent the trial judge from hearing the objectionable matter. For example, some issues raised on voir dire may require the testimony of more than a single witness to resolve, and defense counsel’s invocation of the voir dire procedure may cause the prosecutor to present during the voir dire witnesses that s/he intended to reserve for later in the trial, thereby giving the defense information it would not otherwise have had for use in cross-examining the earlier prosecution witnesses. Voir dire examination also enables counsel to ensure that inadmissible material will not make its way into the record as a legitimate basis for the judge’s verdict and for appellate consideration on review of the sufficiency of the evidence.

§ 34.06 CONTINUING OBJECTIONS

If a series of questions on a specific topic or if a number of similar questions on similar subjects is obviously going to be asked by the prosecutor and the whole line of questioning is objectionable, counsel should object when the first question is asked. If the court overrules the objection, counsel may ask the court to register a continuing objection to further testimony on the same topic or to further questions of the same kind. In this way counsel can protect the record without having to object after every question that is asked. Counsel should be sure the record reflects that the court granted counsel’s request for a continuing objection if it did. If counsel says s/he would like to enter a continuing objection to X and the judge says, “Denied,” it is unclear whether the court has agreed to the continuing objection and overruled it on the merits or has insisted that counsel pursue specific objections. Counsel should respectfully ask for clarification.

§ 34.07 DECIDING WHETHER TO OBJECT

When a prosecutor asks an objectionable question or proffers an exhibit that is arguably inadmissible, or when a prosecution witness begins to give an arguably inadmissible answer, counsel has to make a very quick decision whether or not to object. The speed with which this decision must be made puts a premium upon obtaining adequate pretrial discovery of the prosecutor’s case, anticipating the evidence which s/he will present, identifying potentially inadmissible evidence or lines of examination, and considering before trial both (a) whether at each foreseeable point it is tactically best to object or not to object, and (b) what objection to make, and how to word and support it, if counsel decides to object. Of course, even with the best preparation, counsel can seldom anticipate every occasion for objection that will arise during a trial, and counsel will have to make spur-of-the-moment judgments. But the fewer of these, the better; and, when counsel must make them, the more s/he has pre-planned how to handle other similar potential objections, the better. See § 30.02(a)(3) supra.

Counsel should never object merely because the particular question, testimony, exhibit, or practice is objectionable. Objections should only be made if there is an affirmative tactical reason to object. This is especially the case in a jury trial. Jurors generally do not like to have evidence kept from them; they are likely to view evidentiary objections as technicalities; and they may view the lawyer who makes them as an obstructionist, attempting to conceal factual weaknesses in his or her case by standing on technicalities. This consideration should not be overblown. It does not justify passing up objections which counsel has a substantial affirmative reason to make. Jurors will expect and can tolerate some objections in any trial. But their impatience with perceived obstructionism does caution against objecting without a solid tactical reason.
The next two subsections identify the most common tactical considerations weighing in favor of making an objection (§ 34.07(a)) and against (§ 34.07(b)). Section 34.07(c) describes an approach counsel can use in a jury trial to avert or reduce the jury’s irritation with defense objections.

§ 34.07(a) Tactical Reasons for Objections

The tactical reasons for making an objection include:

1. The expected evidence will establish a fact or create an atmosphere damaging to the defense case and probably cannot be elicited if the objection is sustained. Objections to the form of questions (e.g., “compound,” “no predicate”) are seldom warranted on this ground, because the prosecutor can usually reframe the question and obtain the identical information. Moreover, such objections are particularly likely to strike jurors as hypertechnical. Objections of this sort may also backfire by improving the prosecutor’s direct or redirect examination. Testimony elicited by leading questions is, for instance, often less persuasive than testimony in which the witness appears to be telling his or her own story. “Leading” objections may therefore simply produce more convincing testimony. On the other hand, a “leading” objection is tactically advised if the words which the direct examiner is putting into the witness’s mouth are significantly more damaging to the defense case than the words the witness would probably say if s/he were not led.

Even where an objection would exclude a piece of evidence completely (e.g., “irrelevant,” “calls for speculation”), it is not worth making unless the piece of evidence will have substantial clout on some seriously controverted issue. However, if counsel cannot deduce what evidence an objectionable question is seeking to elicit, an objection probably is in order. Sharks may lurk in unknown waters.

2. The objection is legally strong, but is reasonably likely to be overruled, so as to provide counsel with a claim of reversible error on appeal. The significance of this consideration is obviously directly proportioned to the probability that the trial is likely to end in a conviction.

3. It appears that the prosecutor and the witness are following a pat routine, and objections may disrupt it. If the witness has been drilled to testify according to a script, objections which force the prosecutor to deviate from the script may disorient the witness or the prosecutor or both, and result in less effective testimony. Counsel therefore should watch for signs of scripting: e.g., the witness is having no trouble understanding obscure or ambiguous questions; s/he is immediately answering questions that should take thought to answer; the prosecutor is reading his or her questions, although they follow logically from the witness’s preceding answers. If counsel wants to disorganize a well-rehearsed duet of this sort, a blitz of available objections may be advisable.

4. The objection will point up some unfairness or discreditable tactic of the prosecutor.
E.g.: “Objection, Your Honor – counsel is misstating the record.” “Objection, Your Honor – leading. The question forces the witness to make an either/or choice, but there are more than those two possibilities.”

(5) The objection will serve as an intelligence-gathering device. An objection of irrelevancy, for instance, may cause the judge to ask the prosecutor, “Where is this going?” The prosecutor’s response may provide counsel with valuable information. An irrelevancy objection to a prosecutor’s question on cross-examination may also help the defense witness understand what is happening and avoid a trap. But, when making an objection of this sort in a jury trial, counsel needs to guard against the prosecutor’s stating the grounds in front of the jury and thereby jaundicing the jurors. Thus, counsel will usually want to request that the prosecutor state the grounds at sidebar.

(6) The objection will set a precedent for similar objections that counsel plans to make later. Particularly where the application of evidentiary rules depends upon matters of degree or is subject to judicial discretion, every trial tends to develop its own conventions. If leading or other objectionable forms of questions are tolerated without objection at the outset, they can come to be accepted as a part of the standard operating procedure of this trial; and subsequent objections to them may be viewed by the judge as off-base, and overruled. If counsel foresees that s/he will need to rely later upon an evidentiary rule to exclude harmful material, s/he may want to object to earlier violations of the rule that would be harmless in themselves.

(7) In a jury trial: The objection will mask from the jury the significance of later objections. If a lawyer is largely inactive throughout the first half of the trial and then begins to make vociferous objections, the jurors may ask themselves, “What is s/he struggling so hard to keep from us, all of a sudden?” Sometimes the context will enable them to guess the answer to this question with distressing accuracy, or even cause them to exaggerate it. Earlier objections of the same sort or a few objections of other sorts at points when the testimony is not touching upon visibly sensitive subjects can provide camouflage against this danger. In a choice of evils, it may be better for a lawyer to look like a general obstructionist than for the lawyer’s case to look like it is hurting badly at a peculiarly crucial juncture.

(8) When the prosecutor is cross-examining the respondent or a defense witness in a particularly intimidating or harassing manner, counsel may wish to object in order to reduce the pressure on the witness or at least give the witness a momentary breather. But counsel does not want to appear overly protective of his or her witnesses, particularly the respondent, lest the jury or the judge think that counsel is worried that the witness may sink himself or herself if rattled. If counsel believes that the witness can weather the cross-examiner’s objectionable questions without serious discomfort, counsel should ordinarily forego objecting. Again, however, in a choice of evils, it may be preferable to look protective rather than permit a witness to be goaded or browbeaten.

§ 34.07(b) Tactical Reasons for Foregoing an Objection
Even in the scenarios described in the preceding subsection, there may be countervailing considerations that militate against making an objection. These include:

(1) If the objectionable evidence is received, it will open the door to cross-examination or to rebuttal evidence, otherwise inadmissible, that will bolster the defense case.

(2) Counsel can use the objectionable evidence effectively to discredit the witness or the prosecutor. For example, if the prosecutor asks for a conclusion of the witness that is both objectionable and demonstrably baseless, counsel may wish to forego an objection, allow the testimony to come in, and then argue to the jury (or the judge in a bench trial) that it shows such bad judgment on the part of the witness as to cast doubt upon other (more damaging) points in the witness’s testimony. Or counsel may pass up an available “speculation” objection in order to cite the objectionable answer in closing argument to the jury or the judge as support for an argument that the prosecutor’s entire case is built upon guesswork and wild imagination.

(3) The content of the objectionable evidence supports the defense’s case. Although an item of evidence may favor the prosecution on one issue, it may help the defense even more on some other issue on which counsel would not be able to elicit any evidence or evidence that is as useful as what the present witness would say. Judgment in this situation requires a carefully calibrated weighing of potential harms against potential benefits.

(4) Counsel has similar examination tactics or evidence coming up in his or her own witness examinations, so counsel wants to avoid the risk of setting a precedent for excluding such matters. Successful objection to a particular kind of evidence proffered by the prosecutor strongly invites and legitimates the prosecutor’s making the same objection to any later, similar evidence of counsel’s. Counsel’s failure to object does not guarantee that the prosecutor won’t, but it does (i) avoid alerting the prosecutor to a ground of objection that s/he would not otherwise have in mind, and (ii) decrease the likelihood that the prosecutor’s objection will be sustained if made (by opting out of the live-by-the-sword/die-by-the-sword game that many trial judges are inclined to play), and (iii) set the stage for making the prosecutor’s objection appear to the jury or the judge to be unfair or hypertechnical. (If the prosecutor does object, counsel’s reply to the objection can include the observation that “this is no more hearsay than the testimony s/he elicited from Officer Jones as to what people told Officer Jones, Your Honor.” This is not a compelling argument under the technical rules of evidence, but many judges and jurors supplement those rules with the Rule of Geese and Ganders.)

(5) The evidence to which counsel is objecting – or hints of it – will probably get before the trier of fact in some other way, and an objection will underline it for emphasis or look particularly defensive.

In a jury trial, counsel must also consider how likely it is that an objection, if made for one or more of the reasons identified in § 34.07(a) supra, would be overruled, and the effect that this would have on the jury. Unsuccessful objections are particularly likely to convey the appearance of obstructionism, reinforced by the jury’s learning immediately what counsel was trying to keep from it. Moreover, the judge’s overruling of counsel’s objection may (i) give the jury the impression that counsel is legally inept, ill-prepared, or getting chided by the judge for trying to do something improper; (ii) lead the jury to believe incorrectly that by overruling the objection, the judge is vouching for the worth of the evidence to which counsel objected; and (iii) prejudice counsel’s chances of winning subsequent objections, by causing the judge to conclude that counsel’s grip of the law of evidence or his or her judgment is poor, or to view counsel as a nuisance. However, in a case in which the charge being tried is sufficiently serious so that an appeal from conviction would be realistically in the cards, counsel who believes that an appellate court is reasonably likely to find a particular piece of evidence inadmissible and damaging should not forego objecting simply because the trial judge is likely to overrule the objection and the jury may take umbrage. See Stone v. State, 419 S.C. 370, 384-87, 798 S.E.2d 561, 568-70 (2017) (dictum).

§ 34.07(c) Averting or Reducing the Risk in a Jury Trial that the Jury Will Be Irritated by Defense Objections

In some trials, the cost-benefit analysis described in the preceding sections may lead counsel to object frequently – because of the potentially damaging nature of numerous pieces of dubiously admissible prosecution evidence, or the predictably over-aggressive style of the prosecutor, or the anticipated virulence of one or more of the prosecutor’s witnesses. Counsel who foresees this prospect should take steps in a jury trial to forestall any bad impression that incessant defense objections may make on the jury. Voir dire offers a useful opportunity for doing this. During voir dire, counsel can ask the prospective jurors:

1. “Now, [Mr.] [Ms.] _____, I want to ask you whether you will think it wrong of me – and whether you will hold it against me or against my client – if I make objections during the trial to items of evidence offered by the prosecutor that I believe are not legally admissible in evidence?”

2. “You understand, then, that that is what I am supposed to do and that the only way in which [His] [Her] Honor can decide what is proper evidence for the jury to receive under the rules of evidence is if I make objections during the trial to items of evidence offered by the prosecutor that I believe are not legally admissible in evidence?”

3. “And I hope you understand that I am far from perfect and that sometimes I will be mistaken about the rules of evidence, and [His] [Her] Honor will overrule my objection. Would you hold that against me or my client if I made objections and [His] [Her] Honor decided that I was not correct and overruled my objections and admitted the evidence that I was objecting to?”

4. “So you have no quarrel with the idea that I might make an objection that I thought was a proper objection that I had to make, even though the judge might later find that I was wrong and might rule against that objection?”
Some such way of implanting in the jury’s mind the propriety of counsel’s making objections, even when the judge overrules them, helps to prepare the jurors to accept what might otherwise seem to be legalistic quibbling and attempted obstruction of legitimate evidence of guilt. See § 28.08 supra.

§ 34.08 MOTIONS TO STRIKE

Since it is not always convenient for the prosecution to prove things in a logical sequence, evidence is often admitted over defense objection, subject to “connecting up” or to a later showing of relevance. If the evidence is not connected up or shown to be relevant after the full development of the prosecution’s case, counsel must move to strike it. A motion to strike is also proper if any line of testimony turns out to be inadmissible, although no objections were made when the testimony began because of appearances at that time that the testimony was unexceptionable. In addition, the court ordinarily has discretion to strike testimony to which counsel should have made but did not make timely objection. In a jury trial, counsel should follow up the granting of a motion to strike with a request that the jurors be instructed to disregard the stricken evidence.

Whether in a bench trial or in a jury trial, a motion to strike is often a futile gesture, since, even if the motion is granted, the factfinder has heard the excluded evidence (and, in a jury trial, few jurors are capable of obeying an admonition to close their ears post hoc). The motion to strike is nonetheless important because it serves to sift evidence on which a verdict can be based from that which, although introduced, cannot be used to support a verdict. In a close case, elimination of the stricken evidence may leave the prosecutor with too little to survive a motion for acquittal (see §§ 35.03-35.05 infra). And in a bench trial, counsel may be fortunate enough to be before a judge who has enough self-discipline to put the stricken evidence out of bounds in making his or her final call on the issue of guilt or innocence. In any event, a motion to strike is necessary to prune the record in anticipation of appeal, where more judges are more likely to be self-disciplined in adjudicating a claim of insufficiency of the prosecution’s case to sustain a conviction.

§ 34.09 OBJECTION TO IMPROPER CONDUCT OF THE PROSECUTOR OR JUDGE

If the prosecutor or the judge makes some improper physical gesture or says something in an objectionable tone of voice, defense counsel may be advised to place this on record. Sometimes, although rarely, an appeal can be supported on this ground; more frequently, prosecutorial and judicial reluctance to see the record go up may be reflected in a lighter than usual sentence, intended to discourage appeal.

Remarks and actions of the prosecutor should be noted immediately by announcing, “If the court please, I would like to note for the record that the prosecutor has just . . . .” Counsel should describe the objectionable actions with great particularity, state the prejudicial effect that these actions will have on the defense, and request appropriate relief (for example, a mistrial (see § 34.11 infra, corrective instructions to the jury, or an admonition to the prosecutor not to repeat the offensive behavior). See also § 34.10 last paragraph infra.

1010

Objections to the conduct of the trial judge must obviously be made sparingly and with considerable deference, at sidebar, and only if counsel is sure of his or her ground. For a roster of the varieties of objectionable judicial behavior, see People v. Stevens, 498 Mich. 162, 869 N.W.2d 233 (2015), quoted in § 20.05 concluding paragraph supra. Although courtesy and temperance in the phrasing of counsel’s objections are wise, the accurate, detailed description of even egregious misbehavior by the judge is appropriate. See Holt v. Virginia, 381 U.S. 131 (1965).

§ 34.10 PROFFERS ON OBJECTIONS TO DEFENSE EVIDENCE

When the prosecution objects to a question asked of a witness by defense counsel or to the introduction of any other evidence that defense counsel has offered and when the contents and significance of the evidence are not completely obvious, counsel should ask leave of the court to make a proffer before the court rules on the objection.

If leave is granted, counsel should state:

(1) The witness’s expected answer or the contents of the proposed evidence;
(2) The ultimate facts which counsel asserts that the evidence will tend to prove; and
(3) The issue or issues in the case to which those facts are relevant.

Counsel should also state his or her position on the rule or doctrine of evidence involved. If a prosecutorial objection is sustained before counsel has had a chance to make a proffer, counsel should ask leave to come to the bench for a proffer (or an “avowal” as it is called in some jurisdictions). The defense has a categorical right to make a proffer, and appellate cases can be found which hold that a trial judge’s denial of that right is per se reversible error requiring a new trial. See, e.g., Perkins v. Commonwealth, 834 S.W.2d 182 (Ky. App. 1992). Counsel’s proffer should ordinarily be specific and detailed, since on an appeal counsel will have to convince an appellate court not merely that the trial judge erred in excluding the evidence (see, e.g., Skipper v. South Carolina, 476 U.S. 1, 4-6 (1986))) but also that the error was prejudicial – that is, that the excluded evidence might have resulted in a verdict in favor of the defense, see Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38, 42 (1984). Despite the doctrinal formulations used to define “harmless error” in a given jurisdiction, many appellate judges simply will not vote to reverse a criminal conviction or a delinquency adjudication unless the improperly excluded evidence appears both important and credible.

If the trial judge refuses to permit a proffer, counsel should reduce the proffer to writing at the first opportunity (that is, ordinarily, at the next trial recess) and request leave to put it into the record. If no opportunity occurs before verdict, counsel should write up the proffer as an appendix to a postverdict motion for a new trial. In the event of an appeal, counsel should designate the proffer for inclusion in the clerk’s record (or the pleading/motions/exhibit file) that is transmitted to the appellate court.

In the case of documentary and real evidence, counsel will have marked his or her exhibits for identification before offering them. If they are excluded, counsel should request that they be filed and retained by the clerk of court (or take similar appropriate steps dictated by local practice) to assure that the excluded exhibits go up with the record on appeal.

In a jury trial, if counsel finds that the prosecutor is couching objections to defense evidence in the form of denigrating or belittling remarks in the presence of the jury, counsel may appropriately ask the court at sidebar to instruct the prosecutor to refrain from making mid-trial arguments to the jury. The prosecutor will, of course, be permitted to get away with some of this, as will defense counsel. See § 34.03 supra. The judge will usually exercise a measure of control, however, and in an extreme case, a mistrial motion may be in order. See § 34.11 infra. Counsel may prefer to resort to self-help here by treating the prosecutor’s remarks as an opening of argument and by replying. The reply might well include a paraphrase of the language sometimes found in appellate opinions (if counsel is fortunate enough to have such an opinion in counsel’s jurisdiction) that when a respondent is on trial, with his or her liberty at stake, s/he should be given every latitude in presenting evidence of innocence and that it is fundamentally unfair to deny an accused person this opportunity. The constitutional decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States noted in § 33.04 supra contain good language. The Court has written, for example, that “the Constitution guarantees criminal defendants ‘a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense’” (Holmes v. South Carolina, 547 U.S. 319, 324 (2006)), that “the hearsay rule may not be applied mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice” (Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973)); and that it is constitutional error to refuse the accused the opportunity to present “evidence . . . central to the . . . claim of innocence” (Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 690 (1986)). See also Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 19 (1967) (“the right to present the defendant’s version of the facts as well as the prosecution’s to the jury so it may decide where the truth lies . . . is a fundamental element of due process of law”).

§ 34.11 MOTION FOR A MISTRIAL

§ 34.11(a) Grounds for a Mistrial

The most common ground for a mistrial is that an error has occurred that cannot be cured by any remedial action of the parties or the court. Situations of this kind include the prosecutor’s making improper arguments or eliciting inadmissible evidence so prejudicial that the factfinder is irremediably biased; an hysterical display by a witness; or a prejudicial out-of-court communication between a witness and a juror, or between the prosecutor and the judge. In most jurisdictions there is an elaborate body of caselaw dealing with the question of what kinds of errors in the admission of evidence and what improper matters in the conduct of counsel, the witnesses, the court, and the jury in a jury-tried case are curable by instructions and which require mistrial.
In addition to trial errors and to events during trial (such as the exposure of jurors to prejudicial publicity) that make a fair conclusion of the trial unlikely, counsel may appropriately urge as the basis for a mistrial any circumstance that makes it difficult or inappropriate to go on with the trial. In jury trials an occurrence such as counsel’s illness, illness of the respondent, sudden unavailability of a defense witness, or the prosecutor’s disclosure of new information necessitating additional defense investigation will warrant a mistrial if a continuance is impracticable because the anticipated delay is longer than the time during which the jury can reasonably be held over. (In bench trials these kinds of problems are ordinarily handled by a continuance.)

§ 34.11(b) The Limited Availability of the Mistrial Remedy in Bench Trials

It is very rare for a judge in a bench trial to grant a motion for a mistrial. Even when grossly prejudicial evidence is elicited or other egregious errors occur, the judge is likely to respond to a motion for a mistrial by declaring that s/he will ignore the inadmissible evidence or other improper matters and will decide the case solely on the proper facts of record.

Nevertheless, there are some circumstances under which the defense can obtain a mistrial even in a nonjury case. The categories of highly prejudicial occurrences mentioned in the third paragraph of § 20.05 supra as warranting recusal of a judge should also furnish grounds for a mistrial. Thus, for example, if the prosecutor introduces inadmissible evidence of the respondent’s prior record and this is particularly damning, a mistrial may be granted.

In moving for a mistrial in a bench case, counsel must be sensitive to the risk of irritating the judge by implying that s/he lacks the self-control to do what judges are presumed to be capable of doing – maintaining impartiality in the face of inadmissible evidence. Whenever possible, the mistrial motion should be couched in terms of a potential for unconscious influence on any reasonable mind or in terms of the appearance of impropriety if the trial continues to judgment. See § 20.07 supra.

§ 34.11(c) Deciding Whether To Request a Mistrial; Procedures for Moving for a Mistrial

Whether to move for a mistrial is a strategic matter. Counsel must keep in mind (a) how the present trial appears to be going – that is, the probability of a favorable verdict; (b) whether trial errors have already been committed to which counsel has reserved appropriate objections, whether they are likely to result in a reversal of any conviction on an appeal, and the costs (in delay, expense, and so forth) of appeal; (c) the costs (in delay, expense, and so forth) of a new trial following a mistrial at this point; and (d) the likely strengths of the parties at a new trial, which will frequently be different from their relative strengths at this trial because of (1) the discovery that this trial has given each party of the other’s case, (2) the extent to which each party has learned to try his or her case better in trying it, (3) the nailing down of witness testimony in the present trial transcript, which can be used for impeachment at a new trial, (4) the possibility of a different trial judge, and so on.

If counsel decides to move for a mistrial, it is essential that counsel move quickly, making the motion as soon as the error of which counsel complains occurs or is disclosed and sufficient prejudice appears to justify the motion. This is an area in which courts are very strict in finding waiver by inaction. Frequently attorneys make objections without moving for a mistrial. Then in argument on posttrial motions for a new trial, they will argue that each of their overruled objections in and of itself, and all cumulatively, caused such prejudice that a new trial is warranted. Both trial and appellate courts look on these tactics with a jaundiced eye, opining that if counsel feels an error is so prejudicial that it cannot be cured, s/he must move for a mistrial at that time rather than gamble for a favorable verdict before complaining.

A motion for a mistrial is made by declaring orally that counsel is moving for a mistrial and stating the grounds. In some jurisdictions motions for a mistrial in a jury trial are denominated “motions for the withdrawal of a juror,” a phrase deriving from the common-law notion that if a juror withdraws from the jury, there remain too few jurors to decide the issues lawfully and the case must be retried before a new jury.

A motion for a mistrial should be preceded by an objection to the admission of the prejudicial and inadmissible evidence or to the prejudicial misconduct on which the mistrial motion is based. Counsel needs not rely solely on that error, however. S/he can strengthen the equities of his or her claim that a mistrial is warranted and can improve the record for appeal if s/he announces that the motion is based not only on this present error but also on the previous errors of which s/he has complained, whose cumulative impact is now such that the respondent will be denied a fair trial if this trial continues. After denial of a first motion for a mistrial, subsequent motions may be made by announcing that counsel is “renewing” his or her motion for a mistrial, based upon the total impact on the trial of the errors that were previously made the basis for the motion and of the additional errors of which counsel now complains. Denial of a mistrial motion is appropriately assigned as the basis for a new trial motion after verdict, under most local practice. In many jurisdictions it must be so assigned in order to preserve the contention for appeal.

§ 34.11(d) Double Jeopardy Implications of a Mistrial

§ 34.11(d)(1) Defense Motions for a Mistrial

A respondent who moves for a mistrial waives any claim that a retrial would place him or her twice in jeopardy in violation of common-law and constitutional double jeopardy doctrines, United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600 (1976), “so long as the Government did not deliberately seek to provoke the mistrial request,” United States v. DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. 117, 130 (1980) (dictum). See Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667, 675-79 (1982). Defense mistrial motions should therefore be accompanied by the statement that the respondent “has been put in the position where [s/he] can no longer obtain a fair trial by reason of the prosecutor’s conduct [the court’s rulings]”; and, after the motion has been granted, defense counsel should ask the judge to make a finding on the record that it was intentionally provoked by the prosecution if the judge appears to be sufficiently irritated by the prosecution’s conduct so that this judge is more likely to make such a finding than the judge who would later sit on a dismissal motion prior to a new trial. In litigating the issue of prosecutorial intent, either on a request that the original trial judge make such a finding or on a motion to dismiss the prosecution prior to retrial (see § 17.08 supra), defense counsel should first ask the court to infer “provoking” intent from the nature of the prosecutor’s conduct – that is, from the fact that it was blatant or reprehensible or repeated. See State v. Parker, 391 S.C. 606, 614-15, 707 S.E.2d 799, 803 (2011); Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. at 675 (dictum) (“[i]nferring the existence or nonexistence of intent from objective facts and circumstances is a familiar process in our criminal justice system”). Counsel should note that counsel is willing to examine the prosecutor under oath if necessary but feels that it may not be necessary because the court can, in this case, infer the requisite intent from the record of the first trial. If the court declines to draw the inference, counsel should call the prosecutor to the stand and ask leave to examine him or her as a hostile witness. See § 33.25 supra. Since the sorts of prosecutorial misconduct that result in mistrials are ordinarily so gross as to be the product of either abysmal ignorance of basic trial rules or malevolence, counsel should begin the examination by inquiring about the prosecutor’s legal training and experience and then proceed to question the prosecutor regarding his or her understanding of the rules that s/he violated. Thus, if the prosecutor does not wish to appear a fool, s/he may have little choice but to appear a knave. Counsel should object to, and preserve as claims of error, any rulings by the court refusing to allow counsel to examine the prosecutor, refusing to declare the prosecutor a hostile witness, or refusing to allow counsel to force the prosecutor to undergo a thorough and searching examination under oath. The Supreme Court of the United States has said that the accused’s double-jeopardy rights in this situation turn upon “a standard that examines the intent of the prosecutor,” Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. at 675, and counsel therefore has a right to litigate this issue, however painful it may be for all concerned.

§ 34.11(d)(2) Prosecutorial Motions for a Mistrial or Mistrials Declared by the Court Sua Sponte

A successful mistrial motion by the prosecution, or the court’s declaration of a mistrial sua sponte, over defense objection, creates complicated double jeopardy issues that the Supreme Court’s decisions have left singularly confused. The Court’s decision in United States v. Jorn, 400 U.S. 470 (1971), appears to hold that any mistrial declared without the accused’s acquiescence constitutionally bars retrial unless the termination of the first trial was compelled by an imperative need arising from circumstances that were not the prosecutor’s fault. Jorn thus takes a strict view of the traditional “manifest necessity” standard derived from United States v. Perez, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 579, 580 (1824). See also Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497, 505-06 (1978) (speaking of a “‘high degree’” of necessity).

However, the Court has not been consistently rigorous in applying the Perez standard. Compare Downum v. United States, 372 U.S. 734 (1963) (unexplained absence of a key prosecution witness does not make out “manifest necessity,” at least when the prosecutor has allowed the jury to be sworn even though the prosecutor knows at the time that service of a summons on the witness was not yet effected), with Illinois v. Somerville, 410 U.S. 458, 464 (1973) (“manifest necessity” is found when, after the swearing of the jury, the prosecutor notices a negligent omission of a vital allegation from the indictment – an omission that would require reversal of any conviction on appeal or postconviction proceedings; the Court explains that “the declaration of a mistrial on the basis of a rule or a defective procedure that would lend itself to prosecutorial manipulation would involve an entirely different question, cf. Downum v. United dissenting) (reviewing the Court’s double jeopardy caselaw on mistrials requested or provoked by the prosecution or declared by the court sua sponte).

Although the “manifest necessity” doctrine provides an unpredictable test at best, the declaration of a mistrial at the instance of anyone other than the defense obviously sets the stage for a strong double jeopardy claim. The prosecutor’s “burden of justifying the mistrial . . . is a heavy one” (Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. at 505 (dictum); see also id. at 507-09 & n.25, 514-16). “The [Fifth Amendment] policy of avoiding multiple trials has been regarded as so important that exceptions to the principle have been only grudgingly allowed,” Breed v. Jones, defense objection to preserve the claim is therefore advised in any case in which defense counsel does not feel that affirmative defensive interests are best served by acquiescence in a mistrial and a new trial.
Chapter 35

The Closing Stage of a Bench Trial:
Renewal of the Motion for Acquittal;
Closing Argument

§ 35.01 THE FUNCTIONS OF THE MOTION FOR ACQUITTAL AND CLOSING ARGUMENT IN A BENCH TRIAL; CONSOLIDATION OF THE MOTION AND CLOSING IN A SINGLE ARGUMENT

At the close of all the evidence, the respondent moves for a judgment of acquittal (or a "directed verdict of acquittal," as local practice may style it). This is a renewal of the motion previously made at the close of the prosecution’s case and raises the same legal issue. See Chapter 32. However, the issue is now decided on the basis of the evidence presented by both parties. See, e.g., United States v. Lawrence, 471 F.3d 135, 139-43 (D.C. Cir. 2006) (stating the general rule that “[i]f the defendant moves for a judgment of acquittal at the close of all the evidence, sufficiency claims must be evaluated in light of all the evidence, including any inculpatory evidence presented in the defense case,” but deeming that rule to be inapplicable because only the co-defendant in this joint trial presented evidence, and the co-defendant’s evidence cannot be considered “in evaluating the sufficiency of the evidence against the defendant”; accordingly, the determination of the defendant’s motion for acquittal can “take into account only the evidence presented in the government’s case-in-chief.”). The accused in a criminal or delinquency trial ordinarily must move for a directed verdict of acquittal at the close of all of the evidence or lose the right to challenge the sufficiency of the evidence by posttrial motion or on appeal; the accused’s motion for acquittal at the close of the prosecutor’s case ordinarily will not suffice to preserve the contention unless it is renewed after both sides have rested. See, e.g., United States v. Wahl, 290 F.3d 370, 287-89 (D.C. Cir. 2002) (stating the general rule that “if a defendant offers evidence in his own defense after a judge denies his Rule 29 motion [for acquittal at the close of the prosecution’s case], then the defendant waives his objection to the denial (absent manifest injustice) unless he renews his motion at the close of all the evidence,” but holding that no such waiver occurred in this case despite the failure to renew because the “district court in this case reserved Wahl’s motion at the close of the government’s case” and then the judge did, “in fact, rule on that motion absent a renewal of that motion at the close of all evidence by the defendant”; under these circumstances, the ruling on the motion for acquittal “should have been made solely on the evidence offered by the government.”).

In order to explain the respective functions of the motion for acquittal and closing argument in a bench trial, it is necessary to begin by describing their functions in a jury trial, in which the roles of factfinder and arbiter of legal issues are distinct. In a jury trial, the motion for acquittal is addressed to the judge as the arbiter of legal issues. It asks the judge to rule as a matter of law that the respondent cannot be convicted because, even crediting all of the prosecution’s evidence and drawing every reasonable inference from it in favor of the prosecution, no reasonable juror could find the respondent guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. In contrast, the closing argument to the jury asks the jurors to find as a matter of fact that the prosecution has not sustained its burden of proving the respondent guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

In a bench trial, in which both legal and factual determinations are made by the judge, the distinction between the motion for acquittal and the closing argument becomes blurred. And as a practical matter, judges often will not tolerate counsel’s wasting the court’s time by first arguing all of the facts in the context of a motion for a judgment of acquittal and then rearguing the facts in closing argument.

Accordingly, in many jurisdictions it is customary for the defense in a juvenile bench trial to consolidate its argument on the motion for acquittal with its closing argument. The sequence of arguments goes as follows:

(i) At the conclusion of the evidence (after the prosecution and defense have both “rested”), defense counsel renews his or her earlier motion for a judgment of acquittal and asks the court whether it wishes counsel to consolidate argument on the motion with closing argument, since they will address essentially the same facts and law.

(ii) When the court agrees, counsel presents an argument that analyzes the law and the facts, urging that the prosecution has not proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt.

(iii) The prosecution next presents a similarly consolidated argument, responding to the defense motion for acquittal and urging that the court should find the respondent guilty on the facts and the law.

(iv) Defense counsel replies to the prosecution’s closing argument. (When first proposing the consolidated procedure, counsel should elicit from the court an assurance that counsel will, indeed, be permitted to reply to the prosecution’s arguments. Counsel can point out that if the defense asserted its prerogative of making separate arguments on the motion and closing, the prosecutor would argue first (except in those rare jurisdictions where the defense always argues first in closing) and the defense would be entitled to reply to the prosecutor’s arguments.)

(v) In those jurisdictions where the prosecutor is normally permitted to reply to the defense closing, the prosecutor has the last word under the consolidated procedure as well.

If such a consolidated approach is not usually employed in counsel’s jurisdiction, and if using it would be advantageous, counsel can ask the court to allow it. Once counsel points out that this approach would be more efficient and would likely avoid the need for repetition of arguments, the judge is likely to go along.

If, however, a separation of the arguments would be advantageous to the defense, then counsel should suggest this sequence: (i) the defense makes and argues its motion and the prosecution replies; (ii) then the prosecution closes, the defense responds, and the prosecutor replies (except in the rare jurisdictions where the defense closes first).

A judge in a bench trial “is given great latitude in controlling the duration and limiting the scope of closing summations.” Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 862 (1975). That discretion is, however, circumscribed by the accused’s constitutional “right to be heard [through counsel] in summation of the evidence,” even in a bench trial. Id. at 864 (invalidating a state statute that empowered trial judges to refuse entirely to hear closing arguments in bench trials). See also, e.g., People v. Harris, 2018 WL 3117030, at *1 (N.Y. Ct. App. June 26, 2018) (the judge in a misdemeanor bench trial violated the defendant’s “right to counsel at the trial under the Sixth Amendment” by “den[ying] defense counsel the opportunity to present summation”); In the Matter of Shawn M., 105 Nev. 346, 348, 775 P.2d 700, 701 (1989) (per curiam) (applying Herring to hold that “the juvenile court’s outright refusal to hear closing argument constituted reversible error”; “presentation of closing argument by defense counsel based upon the evidence introduced at an adjudicatory hearing is an integral part of a juvenile’s right to effective assistance of counsel”). By implication, Herring requires trial judges to allow defense counsel to make a closing argument of sufficient scope to perform the functions that led the Court to recognize summation as a constitutional right: to “argue the inferences to be drawn from all the testimony, and point out the weaknesses of their adversaries’ positions.” Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. at 862.

A tactical issue that counsel must resolve in every case is whether to articulate the differences between the legal standards governing the motion for acquittal, on the one hand, and the determination of guilt or innocence, on the other (see § 35.03 infra), and then to address each standard in turn, or whether simply to address the facts of the case in a unified presentation. The key consideration here is the rule that a judge, in deciding a motion for acquittal, must credit all of the prosecution’s evidence and draw every reasonable inference from it in favor of the prosecution. In closing argument, by contrast, defense counsel is entitled to analyze the comparative credibility of defense and prosecution witnesses and to urge the court to find the prosecution’s evidence unpersuasive. As a rule of thumb, in cases in which the defense has some legal argument that demands acquittal even when all inferences favorable to the prosecution’s theory of the case have been indulged, it is advantageous for defense counsel to say so, because this enables the judge to acquit the respondent without resolving issues of credibility. In such cases counsel will ordinarily want to distinguish the two legal standards. If, on the other hand, the whole case boils down to a fact contest, counsel is usually better off simply addressing the facts without distinguishing between the legal standards applicable to the motion and to closing argument.

§ 35.02 GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE CONTENT OF THE
As indicated in § 27.04 supra, a judge will probably be more receptive to legal arguments than to purely factual arguments. Thus, for example, in an assault case in a jurisdiction where the prosecution must show a certain degree of injury in order to make out an aggravated form of assault, an argument that the requisite degree of injury has not been shown beyond a reasonable doubt (citing appellate caselaw that holds equivalent injuries insufficient) is more likely to prevail than a self-defense claim based upon the respondent’s testimony and disputed by the complainant’s. As mentioned in § 27.04(a), judges are prone to be skeptical of the testimony of the respondent and his or her family or friends (and, conversely, to credit the testimony of police officers uncritically).

Thus, as a general matter, counsel is wise to research each of the elements of the charged offense and to collect any caselaw defining those elements. Whenever the prosecution’s case is weak on one or more of the elements, counsel should parse the element, citing pertinent caselaw if there is any.

Counsel will often want to stress whatever burdens of proof the prosecution must satisfy, possibly also citing caselaw that describes the burdens in terms favorable to the defense. The central prosecutorial burden is, of course, the burden of proving each and every element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt (see § 35.03 infra); counsel should research and cite appellate decisions reversing convictions for insufficient evidence on facts similar to those of the respondent’s case. As noted in § 35.04 infra, many States impose special corroboration requirements on the prosecution in certain kinds of cases: They may, for example, forbid a conviction to be based solely on the respondent’s uncorroborated confession or the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. In some jurisdictions the respondent’s raising of particular defenses activates a prosecutorial burden to disprove those defenses beyond a reasonable doubt. See § 35.05 infra.

Counsel also should research and be prepared to invoke other evidentiary doctrines that may favor the defense in a particular case. For example, the “missing witness inference” described in § 10.08 supra can be cited in closing argument as one of the several factors raising a reasonable doubt.

Of course, the receptivity of judges to arguments based on legal doctrines similarly requires that counsel be prepared to rebut the prosecutor’s invocation of doctrines advantageous to the prosecution. In particular, counsel must become familiar with the roster of presumptions and inferences upon which the prosecutor can rely to prove factual propositions necessary for conviction. See § 35.06 infra.

If the judge begins to ask a question during argument, counsel should immediately shut up and listen for all s/he is worth. Questions from the bench provide invaluable discovery of what the judge is thinking, what is worrying the judge about the case. Counsel’s first and most important job is to answer the judge’s question as directly as possible. See § 16.07 supra. While doing this, counsel should be pondering: why is that question important to the judge? what are the premises and reasoning processes that make it a matter of consequence? Counsel’s second job is to speak to those premises and those reasoning processes. If possible, counsel should draw the judge into a dialogue that will give counsel maximum guidance about what tack s/he needs to take to satisfy the judge’s concerns. A good way to get a colloquy going is to ask the judge – after responding fully to his or her question – “Does that answer your Honor’s question?” Another useful device is pausing and allowing silence to gather for some moments after concluding each of counsel’s major points (preferably without looking flustered or at a loss for words). Just cool it. Judges, like Nature, abhor a vacuum, and are likely to fill it with a question or a revealing observation.

In some jurisdictions the defense is required to submit its motion for acquittal in writing. Usually, the requirement is applied very loosely, and a typed (or even handwritten) short motion will suffice. Whether counsel is practicing in such a jurisdiction or not, s/he should give serious thought to preparing a detailed legal memorandum when the defense turns upon a novel interpretation of the law. In this situation counsel can prepare the memorandum before trial, describing the applicable law but leaving the facts of the case for oral recitation after counsel has seen precisely how the facts emerged from the witnesses’ testimony. The memorandum can be handed up to the judge (and copies given to the prosecutor and the clerk) during counsel’s oral presentation. This ensures that the judge will have an adequate grounding to follow legal arguments that may not be easy to elucidate orally, and it also ensures that the record for appeal is clear with respect to those arguments. (Counsel should make sure that the courtroom clerk files the memorandum so that it becomes a part of the formal record for the latter purpose.) In cases in which counsel has not had a chance to prepare a memorandum in advance, s/he can ask leave of the court to submit a post-argument written memorandum. This procedure runs the risk, however, that the judge may deny counsel’s request and proceed directly to announce his or her verdict.

§ 35.03 THE LEGAL STANDARDS GOVERNING THE MOTION FOR ACQUITTAL AND THE DETERMINATION OF GUILT OR INNOCENCE

The prosecutor’s burden in a criminal case – to “prove every ingredient of an offense beyond a reasonable doubt” (Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 215 (1977) (dictum); see, e.g., Hurst v. Florida, 136 S. Ct. 616, 621 (2016); Reed v. Ross, 468 U.S. 1, 3-5 (1984), and cases cited) – governs the determination of guilt or innocence in a delinquency trial as well. In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970). As explained in § 35.02 supra, the prosecutor’s burden will often be a centerpiece of counsel’s closing argument.

The burden also shapes the standard by which the judge is required to test the prosecution’s proof in ruling on the motion for acquittal. The motion must be granted if no reasonable trier of fact could find that every element of the offense and the respondent’s identity as the perpetrator have been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. See Musacchio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 709, 715 (2016); see also United States v. Powell, 469 U.S. 57, 67 (1984) (dictum).
This is the test that has traditionally been employed in most jurisdictions. In Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307 (1979), the Supreme Court made clear that it is also the test required by the federal Constitution.

Because the prosecution has the burden of persuasion, the respondent is not required to submit any evidence to warrant an acquittal, or a directed verdict of acquittal. S/he is entitled to a directed verdict of acquittal unless, on the basis of all the evidence in the case, a reasonable mind could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the prosecution has proved each element of the offense and has identified the respondent as its perpetrator.

In some jurisdictions, however, venue needs not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. A respondent’s claim of improper venue must be raised by pretrial motion; if it is, the prosecution’s burden on the issue is a preponderance. See, e.g., State v. Mills, 354 Or. 350, 312 P.3d 515 (2013); State v. Dent, 123 Wash. 2d 467, 869 P.2d 392 (1994).

§ 35.04 INCREASED PROSECUTORIAL BURDEN IN SOME CASES; CORROBORATION REQUIREMENTS

In virtually every jurisdiction, there are statutory or common-law rules that increase the burden on the prosecutor in some sorts of cases.

In some jurisdictions, a statute or court rule or caselaw declares that certain kinds of evidence alone are insufficient to support a conviction and that the prosecution must also present “corroboration” of such evidence. The most common rules of this sort provide that:

1. An accused’s confession alone is not sufficient to support a conviction and must be corroborated by other evidence. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 344.2(3) (2018); PA. CONS. STAT. ANN. tit. 42, § 6338(b) (2018); TEX. FAM. CODE ANN. § 54.03(e) (2018); WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.140(8) (2018); In the Matter of R.A.B., 399 A.2d 81, 83 (D.C. 1979).

2. The uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice is not sufficient to support a conviction. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 343.2(1) (2018); TEX. FAM. CODE ANN. § 54.03(e) (2018); In re Dugan, 334 N.W.2d 300, 304 (Iowa 1983) (applying adult criminal court rule to delinquency cases); In re Anthony W., 388 Md. 251, 273, 879 A.2d 717, 728 (2005) (same); In the Matter of the Welfare of D.S., 306 N.W.2d 882, 883 (Minn. 1981) (same).

Another type of rule enhances the prosecution’s burden by requiring that the prosecution produce more than a single witness to prove guilt. Rules of this sort may apply to:

(i) Particular types of crimes. Common examples are the rule that, to support a conviction of perjury, the testimony of two witnesses or its equivalent must be shown (see, e.g., Mason v. State, 225 Md. App. 467, 126 A.3d 129 (2015) (dictum); Hall v. State, 751 So. 2d 1161 (Miss. 1999)), and the rule requiring that, in prosecutions for false pretenses, unwritten representations must be proven either by the testimony of two witnesses or by testimony of a single witness together with corroborating circumstances (see, e.g., CAL. PENAL CODE § 532(b); OKLA. STAT. ANN. tit. 22, § 743).

(ii) Particular types of witnesses. For example, the testimony of a minor child may be insufficient to support a conviction in certain types of cases. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 343.1(2)-(3) (2018) (if the court determines that a child witness who is less than nine years old is unable to “understand the nature of an oath” (see § 30.05 supra) but the court nonetheless allows the witness to testify by giving “unsworn evidence,” a “respondent may not be found to be delinquent solely upon [such] unsworn evidence”); Robinson v. United States, 357 A.2d 412, 415 (D.C. 1976) (“In a prosecution for taking indecent liberties with a minor child, corroboration of the complainant’s testimony by independent evidence is an indispensable prerequisite to conviction”).

(iii) Particular types of factual scenarios. See, e.g., People v. Delamorta, 18 N.Y.3d 107, 110, 960 N.E.2d 383, 385, 936 N.Y.S.2d 614, 616 (2011) (“Over a century ago, People v. Ledwon, 153 N.Y. 10, 46 N.E. 1046 (1897) established that a criminal conviction is not supported by legally sufficient evidence if the only evidence of guilt is supplied by a witness who offers inherently contradictory testimony about the defendant’s culpability”).

§ 35.05 “AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSES”

There is often considerable confusion in the jurisprudence on the subject of “affirmative defenses” – that is, factual contentions upon which the accused is said to have the burden of proof.

There are, to be sure, certain issues – involving “defenses” in the nature of confession and avoidance – on which the accused does have the burden of proof (usually by a preponderance of the evidence) under the law of some States. These include duress, see Dixon v. United States, 548 U.S. 1, 8 (2006), insanity (i.e., lack of criminal responsibility), see Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 202-06 (1977) (dictum); Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354, 368 n.17 (1983) (dictum); Clark v. Arizona, 548 U.S. 735, 768-69 (2006) (dictum); but see Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 3 n.2 (1978) (dictum) (federal practice), withdrawal from a criminal conspiracy, see Smith v. United States, 568 U.S. 106, 112-13 (2013) (federal practice), and (in some States) self-defense, see Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. 228 (1987); Hankerson v. North Carolina, 432 U.S. 233, 240 n.6 (1977) (dictum).

But in many jurisdictions the accused’s burden on issues such as insanity or self-defense is not the burden of persuasion; it is merely the burden of going forward. That is, unless the accused presents some evidence on the issue, the issue is not in the case; the prosecution may survive a motion for acquittal with no evidence at all addressed to the issue. Cf. Hankerson v. North Carolina, 432 U.S. at 237 n.3. If the accused does present “some evidence,” however, the issue is raised, and once it is raised, the prosecution must prove its case on the issue beyond a reasonable doubt, just as it must prove every element of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. See, e.g., Connolly v. Commonwealth, 377 Mass. 527, 387 N.E.2d 519 (1979) (self-defense in a murder prosecution); State v. McCullum, 98 Wash. 2d 484, 656 P.2d 1064 (1983) (self-defense in a murder prosecution); State v. Garcia, 18 P.3d 1123 (Utah App. 2001) (self-defense in a manslaughter prosecution); Speed v. United States, 562 A.2d 124 (D.C. 1989) (self-defense in a simple assault prosecution); State v. W.R. Jr., 181 Wash. 2d 757, 336 P.3d 1134 (2014) (consent in a forcible rape case). (The phrase “some evidence” commonly used to describe how much the accused must adduce to justify submission of an issue, has different meanings in different States. In some States it signifies enough evidence to support a finding; in others it signifies enough evidence to “warrant consideration” or to raise a reasonable doubt.)

Furthermore, there are numerous matters that are not “affirmative defenses” in any sense, analytic or operational, although they may look like it. An alibi, for example, is not a defense. It is simply one way in which the accused may seek to disprove – technically, to throw a reasonable doubt upon – the question of identity, on which the prosecution plainly has its normal burden. If alibi testimony suffices to create a reasonable doubt, the respondent is entitled to be found not guilty; and if it compels a reasonable doubt in a reasonable mind, the respondent is entitled to the granting of a motion for acquittal. The same is ordinarily true with respect to intoxication as a “defense” to a charge requiring proof of specific intent. And the prosecution’s burden is not lessened simply because the respondent relies upon certain sorts of evidence (such as accomplice testimony) for which strict evaluative standards (such as “care and caution”) are accepted. See Cool v. United States, 409 U.S. 100, 103-04 (1972).

Finally, the same defensive evidence or theory of the case may bear on two or more issues. For example, in a homicide case the fact that the deceased initiated the fight in which s/he was killed by the respondent may go both to refute the existence of “premeditation and deliberation,” an element of first-degree murder, and to establish self-defense, a justification. Even in jurisdictions where the respondent bears the burden of proof of the fact for the second purpose, s/he does not bear it for the first. See Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. at 233-34; Smith v. United States, 133 S. Ct. at 719 (if an affirmative defense “‘negate[s] an element of the crime,’” the “State is foreclosed from shifting the burden of proof to the defendant”).

The law on all of these subjects varies from State to State and is unsettled or in flux in many States. When it is not expressly governed by statute or a recent decision of the State’s highest court, counsel should be alert to challenge even long-accepted local usages making “affirmative defenses” out of issues that should not analytically be treated as such. In addition to arguments based upon state-law analyses, counsel can argue that the federal constitutional requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt (see § 35.03 supra) is offended by treating essential components of criminal liability as “affirmative defenses” so as to relieve the prosecution of the burden of proving them. Compare Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975), with Rivera v. Delaware, 429 U.S. 877 (1976) (per curiam); Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. at 210; Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. at 231-34; and Smith v. United States, 133 S. Ct. at 719-20. There are numerous issues here that are worth counsel’s while to research, raise, and preserve for appeal if they are not won at the trial level. See, e.g., Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270 (D.C. 2013) (D.C. statute making it “unlawful for a person to be voluntarily in a motor vehicle if that person knows that a firearm is in the vehicle, unless the firearm is being lawfully carried or lawfully transported” (id. at 274) – “even if the person has no connection to or control over the weapon and is not involved in any wrongdoing” (id. at 272) – unconstitutionally shifted “the burden of persuasion with respect to a critical component of the crime” (id. at 272-73) by providing that “[i]t shall be an affirmative defense to this offense, which the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant, upon learning that a firearm was in the vehicle, had the specific intent to immediately leave the vehicle, but did not have a reasonable opportunity under the circumstances to do so” (id. at 274); “the essence of the offense is the defendant’s voluntary presence in a vehicle after he learns that it contains a firearm” (id. at 272), and “because voluntary presence is an undisputed element of the offense . . . , the Due Process Clause forbids shifting the burden to the defendant to negate that element by proving that his presence was not voluntary.” (id. at 278-79)). In a bench trial, such issues are ordinarily raised by inclusion in counsel’s arguments on the motion for acquittal or in counsel’s closing argument. In a jury trial they may be raised either in argument on the motion for acquittal or by requests for jury charges. See § 36.06 infra.

§ 35.06 THE EFFECT OF INFERENCES AND PRESUMPTIONS

Another area of entrenched confusion that requires counsel’s study of local law and may reward counsel’s attack upon some aspects of it is the subject of inferences and presumptions.

As these terms are used by most writers on evidence, inferences and presumptions are descriptions of reasoning processes that lead from one factual proposition, A, to another proposition (factual or legal or both), B. The reasoning process tells how to get from A to B. Any given statute or common-law doctrine that prescribes the reasoning process may make the transition permissive or may make the transition mandatory; that is, it may tell triers of fact who have found A that the triers are permitted to go to B, or it may tell triers who have found A that they are required to go to B, under some or all circumstances.

§ 35.06(a) Inferences

An inference (more properly, a permissive inference) tells a trier that if A is established by the requisite quantum of proof, the trier may thereupon find B. The trier needs not find B, but s/he may. See, e.g., Lindsey v. Commonwealth, 293 Va. 1, 795 S.E.2d 311 (2017). This means, if B is an element of a crime, that the trier may, but needs not, rest a conviction (insofar as that element is concerned) upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of A. For example, statutes in some States provide that on the trial of a person for an intentional crime of violence, proof that the person was armed with an unlicensed handgun is prima facie evidence of intent to commit the violent crime. These statutes are ordinarily construed as creating a permissive inference. On proof that the accused carried an unlicensed gun, the trier of fact may find the requisite criminal intent and thereby may convict, but it is not required to do so.

The effect of a permissive inference on the respondent’s motion for acquittal is to require its denial if the prosecution proves fact A. Although the statute makes B criminal, the prosecution can survive a motion for acquittal by proving A. The permissive inference empowers a trier who has found A beyond a reasonable doubt to infer B and convict.

The term inference would also be used if the trier were permitted to find B beyond a reasonable doubt and to convict upon a finding that A was established by a preponderance of the evidence. Probably, statutes and common-law doctrines creating most permissive inferences do not intend to allow this. Thus, under the common form of unlicensed handgun statute mentioned earlier, it would probably be error for a judge to base a conviction of a crime of violence requiring specific intent upon a finding by a preponderance of the evidence that the respondent had an unlicensed gun. Unless the judge finds the fact of possession of an unlicensed gun beyond a reasonable doubt, s/he should not convict.

§ 35.06(b) Presumptions Generally

The term presumption is a mixed bag. Apart from the fact that it is often used improperly to denote permissive inferences as described in the preceding subsection, it has no uniform meaning. Writers on evidence often distinguish three kinds of presumptions: (i) presumptions that shift the burden of going forward (described in § 35.06(c) infra); (ii) presumptions that shift the burden of proof (§ 35.06(d) infra); and conclusive presumptions of law (§ 35.06(e) infra).

§ 35.06(c) Presumptions That Shift the Burden of Going Forward

In describing the trier’s reasoning process from A to B, a presumption that shifts the burden of going forward says that when the proponent of evidence proves A, the trier must find B unless the opposing party presents some evidence that B is not true. If the opponent presents some evidence that B is not true, the presumption ceases to have effect in the case, and the proponent can win only if s/he satisfies the jury that B is true according to the ordinary standard of proof. (Of course, the same basic fact A that gave rise to the presumption may also give rise to a permissive inference of B, but it may not.)

In a number of jurisdictions, for example, the presumption of malice from an intentional killing is this sort of presumption. If the prosecution satisfies the factfinder that there was an intentional killing and the accused does not come forward with some evidence of justification or mitigation, the factfinder must convict of murder. If the accused comes forward with some evidence, the prosecution resumes its burden of proving malice beyond a reasonable doubt. How much evidence constitutes “some” evidence appears to vary from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, and the standard is often unclear. Compare § 35.05 supra.

The reasoning involved in presumptions that shift the burden of going forward is, of course, generally similar to the reasoning described in § 35.05 relating to the burden of proof in some jurisdictions on such issues as self-defense and insanity. The accused must come forward with some evidence of insanity; if s/he does, the prosecution must prove sanity beyond a reasonable doubt. Indeed, the “presumption of sanity” is sometimes spoken of. But the “presumption of insanity” is not a presumption at all because it does not deal with the relations between two factual propositions. It states a rule that is uniformly applied, without the necessity of proof of any fact $A$. It is, in short, a burden-of-proof statement. See Clark v. Arizona, 548 U.S. 735, 766-69 (2006). So is the most celebrated presumption of them all, the “presumption of innocence.” See id. at 765-67; Taylor v. Kentucky, 436 U.S. 478, 483-84 n.12 (1978). The confusion about presumptions is only compounded by these uses of the term to describe burdens of proof. Cf. Lavine v. Milne, 424 U.S. 577, 584-85 (1976).

§ 35.06(d)  Presumptions That Shift the Burden of Proof

Under a presumption that shifts the burden of proof, the proponent of evidence, charged with the burden of proof of fact $B$, is entitled to win by proving fact $A$ unless his or her opponent disproves $B$. This was the effect of the presumption of malice in some States prior to Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975). In those States the jurors were charged that if they found that the accused had killed the deceased intentionally, they must convict unless the accused proved that the killing was justifiable or that some circumstance of mitigation existed.

This sort of presumption, like presumptions that shift the burden of going forward, may have differing effects, depending upon the extent (“the quantum”) of the burden that is shifted to the accused: proof by a preponderance, proof by clear and convincing evidence, and so forth.

To complicate complications, there is another frequently encountered set of doctrines that look like presumptions that shift the burden of proof but are not presumptions as the term is used here. These are the effect of common-law rules or statutes that relate to what a factfinder may do with certain “unexplained” conduct of the accused. For example, unexplained possession of recently stolen property is prima facie evidence of theft. Unexplained possession of narcotics is prima facie evidence of their illegal importation. Unexplained presence at the site of an illegal enterprise is prima facie evidence of operating it. Insofar as these statutes require “explanation” from the accused, they appear to be presumptions shifting the burden of proof. But they do not shift the burden of proof because, in each case, unexplained possession merely authorizes conviction and does not compel it. If the trier of fact finds unexplained possession of recently stolen property, for example, it may convict, but it is not required to convict. What is involved is a hybrid permissive inference (see § 35.06(a) supra) and presumption. The accused has the burden of persuasion of avoiding an inference.
§ 35.06(e)  Conclusive Presumptions of Law

The type of legal doctrine that is often called a “conclusive presumption of law” is really not a presumption at all. It functions in the manner of an outright rule of law. It says that when A is proved, B is treated as proved, and that is that. The statutory definition of the crime reads in terms of B, but A is the actual element of the crime for practical purposes.

This is the relationship between killing in the course of a felony and malice in most jurisdictions. Although the language of “presumption” is sometimes still used, it is clear that killing in the course of a felony is malicious killing and is murder. The factfinder needs find nothing more.

To say that operationally a “conclusive presumption” functions precisely in the nature of a legal rule substituting the basic fact for the presumed fact is not to say, however, that for all legal purposes a “conclusive presumption” is treated as equivalent to a legal rule which turns upon the basic fact. The two may be treated differently, for example, for the purpose of applying certain constitutional limitations upon “presumptions” (§ 35.06(f) infra). See the distinction of Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441 (1973), in Weinberger v. Salfi, 422 U.S. 749, 770-72 (1975); cf. Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1, 22-24 (1976).

§ 35.06(f)  Conclusion

The preceding discussion of inferences and presumptions has not been designed to explicate the law but to alert counsel to its complexity. The adjudication of delinquency cases involves a bewildering array of formalized inferences and presumptions (in the sense used here, meaning articulate legal doctrines of greater generality than the inferences drawn by a trier of fact in any particular case), most of which serve to get the prosecutor past a motion for acquittal. For listings, see 9 Wigmore, Evidence §§ 2499-2540 (James H. Chadbourn rev. 1981 & Supp.); 22 C.J.S. Criminal Law §§ 41-44 (2006 & Supp.); 22A C.J.S. Criminal Law §§ 954-971 (2006 & Supp.); 31A C.J.S. Evidence §§ 204-288 (2008 & Supp.). The statutes and judicial decisions that create or recognize them seldom say what kind of inferences or presumptions they are or prescribe their effects. General terms are used, such as “shall be presumed,” “shall be prima facie evidence,” “shall be presumptive evidence.” An inordinate number of rulings on motions for acquittal depend upon the construction of these general terms and may construe them incorrectly or at least challengeably.

For example, it is almost invariably assumed that any doctrine allowing the presumption of the elements of an offense in a criminal or delinquency case allows the prosecution to survive a motion for acquittal. This is not so, of course. If the presumption is of the kind that shifts the burden of going forward (see § 35.06(c) supra) and if it is not accompanied by a permissive inference (see § 35.06(a) supra) and if the respondent comes forward as required, the prosecution cannot make a submissible case on the presumption alone. And the Supreme Court of the United States has held that at least one statute providing that “presence . . . shall be deemed sufficient evidence to authorize conviction” does not mean what it says and does not invariably allow the prosecution to defeat a motion for acquittal solely by proof of presence. United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63, 68 (1965).

1028

§ 35.07 VARIANCE BETWEEN THE PROSECUTION’S PROOF AT TRIAL AND THE ALLEGATIONS OF THE PETITION

The prosecution’s proof may make out a sufficient case of violation of the offense charged but one that deviates considerably in factual detail from the allegations of the Petition. When this occurs, counsel should move for a judgment of acquittal on grounds of variance or, in the alternative, for a continuance adequate to permit the defense to meet the prosecutor’s unexpected proof. In most jurisdictions the motion for acquittal will be denied, and the prosecution will be permitted to amend the Petition, although the defense will often be granted the requested continuance to gather evidence to meet the prosecution’s new theory. Indeed, when the variance is so substantial that its effect is to deprive the respondent of “notice of the specific charge, and a chance to be heard in a trial of the issues raised by that charge,” Cole v. Arkansas, 333 U.S. 196, 201 (1948), a refusal to grant a defense continuance is assailable on federal constitutional grounds. See § 9.09(b)(2) supra.

In some jurisdictions the applicable statute or caselaw establishes limitations upon the prosecutor’s power to amend the Petition to adjust to variances in proof at trial. See, e.g., N.Y.
FAM. CT. ACT § 311.5 (2018) (although the prosecutor ordinarily may amend a Petition “before or during the fact-finding hearing . . . with respect to . . . variances from the proof relating to matters of form, time, place, names of persons, and the like” – such amendments giving rise to an automatic defense right to a continuance “necessary to accord the respondent an adequate opportunity to prepare his defense” – no amendment is permitted if it would “tend to prejudice the respondent on the merits” or if the amendment is sought for “the purpose of curing: (a) a failure to charge or state a crime; or (b) legal insufficiency of the factual allegations; or (c) a misjoinder of crimes”). Local practice must be consulted.

§ 35.08 REQUESTING FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW IN THE EVENT OF CONVICTION

When a judge convicts a respondent in a bench trial, counsel should consider asking the court to enter specific findings of fact and conclusions of law. Such a request is advised particularly in cases involving debatable questions of substantive law – concerning, for example, the construction of the statute under which the respondent is charged (compare § 36.06 infra) or the applicability or operation or constitutionality of standardized inferences and presumptions (see § 35.06 supra) – because a general finding of guilty will be sustained on appeal if there is sufficient evidence to support it under any available legal theory, whereas special findings enable the convicted respondent to obtain appellate review of the trial court’s resolution of these contested legal issues. See, e.g., Petion v. State, 48 So. 3d 726, 737 (Fla. 2010) (the appellate court’s customary presumption that a “trial court judge [in a bench trial] rested its judgment on admissible evidence and disregarded inadmissible evidence” does not apply if the “record demonstrates that the presumption is rebutted through a specific finding of admissibility or another statement that demonstrates the trial court relied on the impermissible evidence”); cf. Moore v. United States, 429 U.S. 20 (1976) (per curiam). Special findings may also improve the respondent’s chances of succeeding on appeal on a contention of insufficiency of the evidence or on a contention that the conviction was the product of “arbitrariness that would undermine confidence in the quality of the judge’s conclusion” (cf. Harris v. Rivera, 454 U.S. 339, 346 (1981) (per curiam) (dictum)). See, e.g., Owens v. Duncan, 781 F.3d 360, 363-65 (7th Cir. 2015), cert. dismissed, 136 S. Ct. 651 (2016) (“The eyewitness identification . . . [presented by the prosecution at a bench trial] could, we assume despite the substantial doubts that have been raised concerning the reliability of eyewitness evidence . . ., have supported a finding beyond a reasonable doubt that Owens had murdered Nelson. But . . . at the end of the parties’ closing arguments the judge said: ‘I think all of the witnesses skirted the real issue. The issue to me was you have a seventeen year old youth on a bike who is a drug dealer [Nelson], who Larry Owens knew he was a drug dealer. Larry Owens wanted to knock him off. I think the State’s evidence has proved that fact. Finding of guilty of murder.’ ¶ That was all the judge said in explanation of his verdict, and it was nonsense. No evidence had been presented that Owens knew that Nelson was a drug dealer or that he wanted to kill him . . . or even knew him . . . . The judge . . . said nothing to suggest that he thought the real issue in the case was identification. If one may judge from what he said, which is the only evidence of what he thought, he thought that Owens’ knowledge that Nelson was a drug dealer was the fact that dispelled reasonable doubt of Owens’
We are mindful that only clearly established violations of a defendant’s constitutional rights permit us to reverse a state court decision challenged in a federal habeas corpus proceeding. . . . But there’s no question that the right to have one’s guilt or innocence adjudicated on the basis of evidence introduced at trial satisfies that exacting standard.”).

In deciding whether to ask for specific findings of fact and conclusions of law, counsel should keep in mind the risk that a judge who realizes s/he committed an error during the trial may try to cleanse the record by, for example, disavowing reliance on an item of improperly admitted evidence. See, e.g., People v. Pabon, 28 N.Y.3d 147, 157-58, 65 N.E.3d 688, 665-66, 42 N.Y.S.3d 659 (2016) (if an appellate court finds that a judge in a bench trial “erroneously allowed inadmissible evidence over proper objection,” an appellate court cannot find harmless error based upon a general rule that a judge in “a bench trial . . . may be presumed to rely only on admissible evidence” unless the judge makes an “on-the-record statement” that s/he was not factoring the inadmissible evidence into his or her verdict or provides some other “reliable indication that, notwithstanding the erroneous ruling, the judge knows that the evidence must be disregarded”; the Court of Appeals concludes that the judge’s improper admission of an “investigator’s opinion testimony that defendant lied to him during the interview” was harmless error because “the judge’s on-the-record statement that he was ‘not taking [the investigator’s] judgment’ provides sufficient assurance that he was not adopting the investigator’s assessment of defendant’s honesty.”).

Special findings should obviously not be requested in cases in which the trial judge is likely to find against the respondent on all of the alternative legal grounds that s/he can muster. In such cases, a general verdict is preferable. See Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945). Nor should special findings ordinarily be requested in cases in which counsel has preserved claims of error in the admission of apparently important pieces of prosecution evidence over defense objection, because the judge’s failure to rely on those particular pieces of evidence in specific findings of fact may lead an appellate court to find that their erroneous admission was harmless error.

If the respondent is acquitted by a judge following a bench trial, special findings should always be avoided. This is so because the prosecution may be permitted to appeal from a ruling in favor of the respondent that is based solely upon an assailable conclusion of law, whereas an appeal by the prosecution from a ruling in favor of the respondent based in any part upon factual findings would be barred by double jeopardy principles. See United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 96-97 & n.9 (1978) (dictum) (apparently endorsing the suggestion to this effect in United States v. Jenkins, 420 U.S. 358, 366-68 (1975), while overruling Jenkins on another point); see also Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462, 466-69 (2005); compare Sanabria v. United States, 437 U.S. 54, 63-73 (1978); Smalis v. Pennsylvania, 476 U.S. 140, 144-45 (1986); Lockhart v. Nelson, 488 U.S. 33, 39-40 (1988) (dictum); and State v. Sago, 2013 WL 1943006 (Minn. App. 2013) (distinguishing Lockhart).

Many juvenile court judges will be unfamiliar with the concept of special findings of fact.
Counsel will often be able to find statutes or caselaw prescribing the procedure in adult criminal bench trials, see, e.g., Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 23(c) (2018), which can be cited by analogy.
Chapter 36

The Closing Stage of a Jury Trial: Renewal of the Motion for Acquittal; Closing Argument; Jury Instructions; The Jury’s Deliberations and Verdict

Part A. The Renewed Motion for Judgment of Acquittal

§ 36.01 THE RENEewed MOTION FOR ACQUITTAL; PARTIAL DIRECTED VERDICTS

Chapter 35 described the nature and functions of the renewed motion for acquittal in a bench trial, together with various legal doctrines that bear upon the motion. Most of what was said about the latter doctrines there is also pertinent to jury trials. In a jury trial, however, the motion has heightened importance because it determines whether the case will go to the jury or be dismissed by the judge.

The judge may grant a motion for acquittal in whole or in part. S/he may dismiss counts of the Petition and submit others to the jury. S/he may grant an acquittal on the offense charged in the Petition and submit lesser included offenses to the jury. See § 36.05 infra.

Whereas defense argument on the motion for acquittal and closing argument are consolidated in a bench trial, they are, of course, separate in a jury trial. At the conclusion of all of the evidence (when both prosecution and defense have “rested”), defense counsel makes his or her renewed motion for acquittal, and the prosecutor responds. (Counsel should request that the jury be excused while the motion is made, argued, and ruled on, so that a denial of the motion does not convey to the jury the impression that the judge has ratified the sufficiency of the prosecution’s case.) If the judge denies the motion in whole or in part, the attorneys then submit requests for jury instructions (see § 36.02 infra) and thereafter make their closing arguments to the jury (see §§ 36.10-36.12 infra).

Part B. Requests for Jury Instructions

§ 36.02 THE CONFERENCE ON INSTRUCTIONS
In many jurisdictions it is customary or obligatory, prior to the lawyers’ closing arguments, for the judge to confer with the prosecutor and defense counsel to determine what the jury will be charged (or to “settle the instructions,” as it is often called). This may be done as a matter of routine, or counsel may have to request a conference if s/he wants one.

At the conference the judge may read to counsel, or allow counsel to read, part or all of what the judge proposes to instruct the jury. (Usually the “standard” parts of the charge will not be read or made available to counsel unless specifically requested. If counsel wants to see what the judge is going to charge about the role and obligations of jurors, the process of jury deliberation, the attitudes with which the jurors should approach their deliberations, proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and other “boilerplate” matters, counsel will have to ask explicitly to see these portions of the judge’s draft.) The judge will then entertain objections and proposed modifications and will rule on them.

Whether or not the judge is required to or does disclose his or her own draft jury charge, s/he will receive and rule upon proposed instructions by both parties (often called “requests for charge” or “prayers” or “points for charge”). See, e.g., Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 30 (if a party “request[s] in writing that the court instruct the jury on the law as specified in the request” (Rule 30(a)), “[t]he court must inform the parties before closing arguments how it intends to rule on the requested instructions” (Rule 30(b)); cf. People v. Clark, 453 Mich. 572, 589-91, 556 N.W.2d 820, 826-27 (1996) (reversing a conviction and remanding for a new trial because “the judge, after agreeing to a modified instruction, subsequently decided to charge the jury with the unmodified instruction after defense counsel relied on and conformed his closing arguments to the modified instruction”); “The rule that counsel be informed of the instructions to be given to the jury before closing arguments enables counsel to tailor arguments to the proper legal standards. If the instruction is changed after an attorney relies on it, it impairs not only the content and quality of the final argument, but the effectiveness of the representation as well.”); Ardoin v. Arnold, 653 Fed. Appx. 532, 534-35, 536 (9th Cir. 2016) (the trial court “violated Ardoin’s Sixth Amendment right to counsel during closing argument” by refusing to reopen closing arguments after authorizing the jury – during jury deliberations, in response to a question from the jury – to consider a felony murder theory that previously had applied only to Ardoin’s co-defendant, thereby depriving counsel for Ardoin of any “opportunity whatsoever to argue felony murder after learning that the jury could convict on that theory”). The parties’ requests for instructions are ordinarily required to be submitted to the court and opposing counsel, in writing, at a specified time (usually at the close of the evidence or at such other time as the trial judge orders). See, e.g., Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 30(a). They may or may not also be filed with the courtroom clerk, depending on local practice. In jurisdictions that have form books of approved jury instructions (sometimes called “pattern instructions”), counsel can simply request “Number 344” or “Number 344 as modified by . . . [specifying any desired changes].”

Oral requests for charge are permitted in some localities. However, even when they are permitted, counsel should ordinarily make his or her requests in writing. This enhances the likelihood that the judge will stick to counsel’s exact wording if the request is granted, and it assures an adequate record for appeal if the request is denied.

At the conference, the judge takes up each request for charge and rules on it, usually endorsing each request “allowed” (“granted”), “denied,” or “charged in substance” (“covered”). The last of these notations indicates that the judge accepts the principle of the requested instruction but has, or thinks s/he has, adequately dealt with the point in another portion of the draft charge.

Procedures for preserving objections to the court’s refusal to adopt proposed defense instructions vary. In some localities all written requests for charge are routinely made a part of the record that will go up on appeal; the judge’s endorsement of a request “denied” or “covered” suffices to preserve a claim of error in the refusal of that request. In other localities counsel must arrange specially with the clerk to file the defense requests that the judge has denied. Elsewhere, the judge dictates his or her rulings to the court reporter during or after the conference on instructions – or the entire conference is stenographically recorded – and counsel must object to each ruling as it is dictated or made. In some jurisdictions, counsel may have to incorporate the rulings in formal bills of exceptions. Alternatively or in addition, counsel may be required to specify each denial of a defense request for instructions as a separate claim of error in a postverdict motion for a new trial (see § 37.02(a) infra) in order to preserve the claim for appeal. Cf. People v. Fermin, 36 A.D.3d 934, 935, 828 N.Y.S.2d 546, 548 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2007) (“the defendant’s claim that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury as to justification pursuant to Penal Law § 35.15(2) [regarding the use of “deadly physical force in defense”] . . . is preserved for appellate review” even though defense counsel “specifically sought a justification charge pursuant to Penal Law § 35.05” [on “use of physical force”] because the trial court, “in making its ruling in terms pertinent to Penal Law 35.15(2), ‘expressly decided the question’ now raised on appeal in response to a ‘protest by a party’”).

In all of these regards, counsel should be sure s/he knows what local practice requires. If, as is commonplace, statutes and rules are silent on the operational details, counsel should seek advice from senior court clerks and from experienced defense attorneys whose practice includes appellate work.

§ 36.03 THE LORE OF CHARGING THE JURY

In addition to the substantive law on which the court will charge the jury and which is discussed at the conference on instructions, there is, in many jurisdictions, a more or less elaborate body of law on the subject of the judge’s charge itself – what it must contain, what it may contain, its form, and so forth – that counsel will want to have in mind.

Usually, there are a few matters concerning which the court is obliged on its own initiative to charge the jury and to charge the jury correctly. The failure of counsel to bring omissions or errors in these matters to the court’s attention is not fatal to a claim, on post-trial motions or appeal, that the charge was inadequate or erroneous. The matters whose omission or incorrectness may subsequently be noticed as “plain error in the charge” are commonly limited to
(1) the elements of the offense (see, e.g., Langford v. Warden, Ross Correctional Institution, 593 remand, 665 Fed. Appx. 388 (6th Cir. 2016) (the trial court’s failure to “instruct the jury that conviction as an accomplice, under Ohio law, requires that the defendant have the same intent as the principal” (id. at 428) violated the defendant’s constitutional “‘right to have a jury determine, beyond a reasonable doubt, his guilt of every element of the crime with which he is charged’” (id.
at 427), even though defense counsel did not object to the error despite having been speciﬁcally asked by the judge whether he “had any objections to the complicity section of the proposed jury instructions” (id. at 439 (Boggs, J., dissenting)), (2) the statement that the burden of proof is on the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt, and (3) a statement of the number of jurors who must agree to render a verdict. All other asserted imperfections must be objected to and any asserted omissions must be pointed out, with proposed language to cover the omitted point. See, e.g., 244 n.8 (1977) (dictum); cf. United States v. Frady, 456 U.S. 152 (1982); Engle v. Isaac, 456

The judge is ordinarily not required to give the charges requested by counsel in the precise language of the request, even though that language correctly states an applicable legal principle. The judge may cover the matter in his or her own language instead. But the jurisdictions diﬀer in this regard, as they do on the questions (1) whether the judge is forbidden to comment on the evidence in addition to stating the applicable legal principles – and, if so, what constitutes a forbidden “comment” (compare Gutierrez v. State, 177 So. 3d 226 (Fla. 2015), and State v. Girard, 34 Or. App. 85, 578 P.2d 415 (1978), and State v. Stukes, 416 S.C. 493, 499-500, 787 S.E.2d 480, 483 (2016), and State v. Levy, 156 Wash. 2d 709, 718-25, 132 P.3d 1076, 1080-84 (2006) (dictum), and State v. Nomura, 79 Hawai’i 413, 416-17, 903 P.2d 718, 721-22 (1995) (dictum), with State v. Hopkins, 108 Ariz. 210, 495 P.2d 440 (1972); and see § 36.13 infra; (2) to what extent and under what circumstances the judge is required to give instructions on the theory of the defense (see § 36.06, subdivision (6) infra); (3) whether the judge may refuse entirely to give a requested instruction because, although correct in its major outlines, it is incorrect on specific details or whether s/he has an obligation to give the substance of it, corrected as may be required to conform to law (compare Privette v. State, 320 Md. 738, 746-49, 580 A.2d 188, 192-93 (1990), and Thomas v. State, 67 P.3d 1199, 1202-03 (Wyo. 2003), with State v. Brazeal, 247 Or. 611, 431 P.2d 840 (1967)); (4) how exactly appellate courts will scrutinize particular passages in the charge for erroneous statements, as distinguished from reading the charge as a whole (for example, whether the judge who has given a general charge stating that the prosecution bears the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt may use the form “if you ﬁnd” in deﬁning the several elements of the offense rather than “if you ﬁnd beyond a reasonable doubt”), and so forth. These various local doctrines relating to the charge and to the process by which it is required to be drawn up will aﬀect the manner in which counsel proceeds at the conference on instructions, and counsel should go into the conference with an adequate grounding in them.
§ 36.04 GENERAL AREAS COVERED BY THE CHARGE

In general, the court’s charge will cover:

(1) The elements of the crime charged in the Petition (see § 36.06 subdivision (3) infra) and of all lesser included crimes (see § 36.05 infra).

(2) The elements of, or the legal principles necessary to evaluate, any defense theory (such as self-defense or entrapment) raised by the evidence (see § 36.06 subdivision (6) infra).

(3) The legal principles governing any factual and evidentiary issues presented by the case (such as the preconditions for finding a tacit admission; or the preconditions for basing a conviction of burglary or theft upon a finding of possession of recently stolen property (see, e.g., Walker v. State, 896 So. 2d 712 (Fla. 2005)).

(4) The number of jurors who must agree in order for the jury to return a verdict.

(5) The prosecution’s burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt; the meaning of the phrase “beyond a reasonable doubt”; the presumption of innocence; any special rules governing the prosecution’s burden (such as corroboration requirements); and the allocation and quantum of the burden of proof on subsidiary issues (see §§ 35.03-35.05 supra).

(6) Permissive inferences and presumptions bearing on the ultimate issues in the case (see § 35.06 supra). But see, e.g., Hall v. Haws, 861 F.3d 977, 980-81, 990 (9th Cir. 2017) (a standard state jury instruction “which allowed the jury to infer guilt of murder from evidence that defendants were in possession of recently stolen property plus slight corroborating evidence” violated the Due Process Clause because “the presumed fact does not follow from the facts established”).

(7) Permissive inferences and presumptions and other “fact-finding aids” relating to standard and recognized fashions of reasoning from the evidence (such as inferences from the failure of a party to call a witness (see § 10.08 supra); from a finding that a witness testified falsely in one particular (see, e.g., People v. Johnson, 225 A.D.2d 464, 639 N.Y.S.2d 802 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1996)); or from factual circumstances that the proof tends to show: flight of the respondent (see, e.g., Thompson v. State, 393 Md. 291, 901 A.2d 208 (2006)); concealment of evidence (e.g., Jarrett v. State, 220 Md. App. 571, 588-91, 104 A.3d 972, 982-84 (2014)); and so forth).

(8) Required or recommended ways of weighing particular sorts of testimony (such as the requirement that the testimony of an accomplice is to be received with caution... and scrutinized with care (see § 36.06 subdivision (2) infra).

(9) Limitations on the permissible use of certain items of evidence (such as the use of a testifying respondent’s prior adjudications or prior [bad] acts only for impeachment, not as the basis for inferring propensity (see §§ 30.07(a), (b) supra; § 36.06 subdivision (1) infra).

(10) Matters that are to be put out of account or not given described effects in the deliberations of the jury (such as the impermissibility of considering evidence that was struck, of drawing inferences from the respondent’s failure to testify, of speculating from objections that were sustained, of treating the statements of counsel as evidence, or of treating the Petition as evidence).

(11) The general role of the jury and the court (including the ultimate responsibility of the jury for fact-finding, the requirement that the jury follow the law charged by the court, and admonitions not to draw inferences from the court’s evidentiary rulings or rulings on motions for a directed verdict and not to speculate upon, or be influenced by, the judge’s attitudes toward the case).

(12) [In some jurisdictions] A summary of the evidence.

(13) [In some jurisdictions] An expression of opinion on the evidence.

(14) [In jurisdictions where juries fix the sentence for the offense in issue] The sentence options and the legal principles relating to the jury’s sentencing choice.

(15) Procedures that the jury should follow in the process of deliberation (choosing a foreperson, using exhibits, requesting supplemental instructions, separating, and so forth).

Counsel should have considered all of these areas prior to the conference on instructions and should be familiar with the governing principles and aware of what s/he wants to have charged – and not to have charged – in each area. S/he will be particularly responsible for charges on the defense theories and on principles of law relating to them and for charges on evidentiary matters. In cases in which the respondent did not testify at trial, counsel will probably be asked specifically whether s/he wants a charge on the impropriety of drawing any negative inferences from the respondent’s failure to testify. See § 33.05 supra.

§ 36.05 LESSER INCLUDED OFFENSES

It is especially important that counsel have a well-considered position on the submission of lesser included offenses. See, e.g., Crace v. Herzog, 798 F.3d 840, 843, 852-53 (9th Cir. 2015); McNeal v. State, 412 S.W.3d 886, 889-90, 893 (Mo. 2013). The general principle theoretically applicable here is that the court may (and ordinarily must, on request of counsel (see, e.g., Keeble v. United States, 412 U.S. 205, 208 (1973); Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S.
137, 153-54 (1977) (plurality opinion); State v. Locke, 90 S.W.3d 663 (Tenn. 2002); Sweed v.
State, 351 S.W.3d 63 (Tex. Crim. App. 2011); Thomas v. State, 67 P.3d at 1202-06)) submit to the jury any offenses that are lesser included offenses of the crime charged in the charging paper and upon which the evidence would support a conviction. See also, e.g., State v. Montgomery, 39
So. 3d 252 (Fla. 2010); compare Beck v. Alabama, 447 U.S. 625 (1980) (holding that a defendant has a federal constitutional right to the submission of an evidentially supported lesser offense in a capital case), and Williams v. Trammell, 539 Fed. Appx. 844 (10th Cir. 2013), with Schad v.
Arizona, 501 U.S. 624, 645-48 (1991) (rejecting a defendant’s contention “that the due process principles underlying Beck require that the jury in a capital case be instructed on every lesser included noncapital offense supported by the evidence, and that robbery was such an offense in this case” (id. at 646), and holding that instructions which gave the jury “the option of finding . . .
[the defendant] guilty of a [i.e., at least one] lesser included noncapital offense” (id.) “sufficed to ensure the verdict’s reliability” (id. at 648)), and Hopkins v. Reeves, 524 U.S. 88, 90-91 (1998) (holding that Beck does not require instructions on “offenses that are not lesser included offenses of the charged crime under state law”), and Hopper v. Evans, 456 U.S. 605 (1982) (distinguishing Beck because the Hopper record contained no evidence supporting conviction of a lesser offense), and Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447 (1984) (distinguishing Beck because in Spaziano the lesser offense was barred by a statute of limitations; in this situation the Court holds that the accused should be given the choice between waiving the statute or waiving the lesser-included-offense instruction. (id. at 456-57)).

A “lesser included offense” is an offense defined by law in such a manner that:

(1) Each of its elements is an element of the crime charged, and

(2) It has no elements that are not elements of the crime charged, and

(3) It lacks some element of the crime charged.

See, e.g., Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705, 717-19 (1989), and authorities cited; see also Carter v. United States, 530 U.S. 255, 260-61 (2000). Thus assault is a lesser included offense of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon; assault is also a lesser included offense of rape; but assault with a deadly weapon is not a lesser included offense of rape, even though, in fact, in a particular rape case the assailant may have been armed and may have committed an assault with a deadly weapon.

Difficult technical problems arise with regard to whether some lesser offenses are included in some greater ones, particularly if the lesser offense has an element that is not necessarily coincident with an element of the greater crime in all cases but inevitably is so in a subclass of cases (for example, the question whether unauthorized use of government property is a lesser included offense of grand larceny in a case in which the allegedly stolen item was government property). Difficult problems also arise with regard to whether the record will support a conviction on the lesser charge (for example, whether, when theft is shown and the only evidence of the value of the stolen item is the complainant’s generic description of it and his or her testimony that it was worth $110, the record will support a conviction of petty theft (theft of an item worth less than $100)).

Defense counsel will have considerable ground for legal contention on these issues. What is important for him or her to decide first is whether s/he wants a particular lesser included offense or any lesser included offenses submitted. The considerations are complex but boil down basically to the question whether counsel wishes to give the jury a compromise position. A jury faced with the alternatives of convicting on a serious crime or of acquitting may acquit, particularly if (a) the evidence is close or (b) the respondent is sympathetic or (c) there are extenuating circumstances or (d) the penalty for the offense charged seems incommensurately harsh. Given the option of conviction on a lesser charge, the jury may buy into the lesser conviction. If counsel senses that the jury is divided and that the stronger jurors favor the defense, counsel may well want to have the jury decide guilt or innocence of the offense charged on an all-or-nothing basis.

Counsel must take stock of the jurors and decide whether s/he wants to put them to the all-or-nothing choice. There are no general guidelines for this decision; it is a matter of the feel of the case and of the jury. If counsel decides that s/he does not want lesser charges given, s/he should resist them, arguing that they are not available in law or on the record. If s/he wants them, s/he should urge them and be prepared to submit instructions covering the elements of each one that s/he wants charged. As a practical matter, some judges will give considerable deference to the wishes of defense counsel and will not be strictly bound by the theoretical rules requiring the submission of lesser offenses. These judges feel that if counsel and the respondent want to put the jury to a yes-or-no decision on the major crime, they should generally be permitted to take that gamble. Similarly, many judges will submit lesser offenses, at counsel’s request, even though there is hardly arguable support for them in the record. A ubiquitous practice, for example, is to submit the lesser offense of second-degree murder in a first-degree prosecution based on the felony-murder theory, even though there is often not a shred of evidence upon which the mens rea of second-degree murder can be found.

There is a difference of opinion, among the jurisdictions, about whether the decision to request the submission of a lesser-included offense is a strategic decision to be made by defense counsel or the type of fundamental determination that is reserved for the respondent to make. Compare, e.g., People v. Colville, 20 N.Y.3d 20, 23, 979 N.E.2d 1125, 1126, 955 N.Y.S.2d 799, 800 (2012) (“the decision whether to seek a jury charge on lesser-included offenses is a matter of strategy and tactics which ultimately rests with defense counsel”; the conviction is reversed and the case is remanded for a new trial because the trial judge rejected defense counsel’s request for submission of lesser-included offenses, which was opposed by the defendant.), with People v. Brocksmith, 162 Ill. 2d 224, 229-30, 642 N.E.2d 1230, 1232-33, 205 Ill. Dec. 113, 115-16 (1994) (“we believe that the decision to tender a lesser included offense is analogous to the decision of what plea to enter, and that the two decisions should be treated the same. Because it is defendant’s decision whether to initially plead guilty to a lesser charge, it should also be defendant’s decision to submit an instruction on a lesser charge at the conclusion of the evidence.
In both instances the decisions directly relate to the potential loss of liberty on an initially uncharged offense.”; the conviction is reversed because “defense counsel, rather than defendant, made the ultimate decision to tender a lesser included offense instruction.”). Even if the decision is a strategic one for counsel to make, “[d]efense counsel undoubtedly has a duty to discuss potential strategies with the [respondent]” (Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175, 178 (2004)), and counsel should accord very great weight to the client’s view.

§ 36.06 DEFENSE REQUESTS FOR INSTRUCTIONS

The general theory of the defense determines what instructions counsel should request.
S/he should consider, among other possibilities, requests for charges:

(1) Limiting the use of items of prosecution evidence. For example, in jurisdictions that allow the prosecutor to impeach the respondent with prior adjudications or prior [bad] acts (see § 30.07(b) supra), counsel may request an instruction that evidence of the respondent’s prior adjudications or prior [bad] acts may be considered only insofar as the jury finds it relevant in assessing his or her credibility as a witness and may not be considered as bearing directly on the respondent’s guilt or innocence, because the law does not permit the speculation that a person may be more or less likely to have committed the present offense simply because s/he has or has not committed an offense at some earlier time. See § 30.07(a) supra. After the terminal period, insert the following: And in multiple-respondent trials, counsel may – and ordinarily must – request an instruction under Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968) (§ 23.9.1 supra), limiting any defendant’s incriminating statements to use against their maker, not the co-

(2) Depreciating the weight of categories or items of prosecution evidence. For example, counsel may request an instruction that the incriminating testimony of an alleged accomplice should be viewed with caution and suspicion. See, e.g., Wheeler v. State, 560 So. 2d 171 (Miss.
1990). Or, in a case involving an eyewitness identification, counsel can request “[e]yewitness-specific jury instructions . . . to warn the jury to take care in appraising Secretary, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 834 F.3d 263, 314-45 (3d Cir. 2016) (en banc) (McKee, C.J., concurring) (observing that “‘[j]urors seldom enter a courtroom with the knowledge that eyewitness identifications are unreliable,’” and “[t]herefore, thorough and appropriately focused jury instructions that reflect the scientific findings are critical to allowing jurors to discharge their solemn obligation to assess [such] evidence” (id. at 343); and documenting and analyzing factors that undermine the reliability of eyewitness identifications (see id. at 320-45)); Fiona Leverick, Jury Instructions on Eyewitness Identification Evidence: A Re-Evaluation, 49 CREIGHTON L. REV. 555, 586 (2016) (concluding that “jury instructions can be effective in educating jurors about the risks associated with eyewitness identification evidence and in evaluating such evidence sensitively” but that, “[i]n order to do so, . . . [such instructions] need: to be expressed in language that jurors can understand; to accurately reflect the relevant scientific evidence; to indicate to jurors why they are being given; and to be provided in writing (or in a suitable alternative form to those who have literacy difficulties)”; see also § 25.03 supra (listing useful reference sources on recurring problems in eyewitness identification procedures, and citing judicial opinions that require variously specified jury instructions in cases involving eyewitness identification testimony, including instructions on the special fallibility of cross-racial identifications).

(3) Listing the elements of the offense charged (and of any lesser included offense submitted) in a form that emphasizes that the elements are distinct and that the jury must find each and every element separately. See, e.g., Riley v. McDaniel, 786 F.3d 719, 723-24 (9th Cir. 2015) (the defendant was denied due process by a jury “instruction [which] defined deliberation as a part of premeditation, rather than as a separate element” where “Nevada first-degree murder law did indeed contain three separate mens rea elements”); Langford v. Warden, Ross Correctional Institution, 593 Fed. Appx. 422 (6th Cir. 2014), subsequent history in 665 Fed. Appx. 388 (6th Cir. 2016) (“The Constitution gives a criminal defendant the right to have a jury determine, beyond a reasonable doubt, his guilt of every element of the crime with which he is charged.”) 593 Fed. Appx. at 427. “[T]he trial court did not instruct the jury that conviction as an accomplice, under Ohio law, requires that the defendant have the same intent as the principal. As the magistrate judge correctly reasoned, this violated Supreme Court law.” Id. at 427.; Bennett v. Superintendent Graterford SCI, 886 F.3d 268, 284-85, 289 (3d Cir. 2018) (jury instructions on conspiracy and accomplice liability permitted the jury to convict an accessory before the fact of first-degree murder without himself having had an intent to kill – the mens rea for murder one under Pennsylvania law; because “the Constitution requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every element necessary to constitute the crime,” the trial court’s failure to inform the jury of the intent-to-kill requirement “relieved the Commonwealth of its burden of proving . . . specific intent . . . , in violation of [the accessory’s] right to due process under the United States Constitution”). Counsel may also request an instruction stating the rule that the jury may consider only the offenses charged in the Petition and its lesser included offenses (see State v. Hicks, 768 S.E.2d 373 (N.C. App. 2015); cf. Cole v. Arkansas, 333 U.S. 196 (1948)).

(4) Stating the general burden of proof and burdens on subsidiary issues favorably to the defense. The two authoritative formulations of the constitutionally requisite standard for conviction are: (a) that an accused may not be convicted “‘except upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged’” (Cage v. Louisiana, 498 U.S. 39 [at 39] (1990), quoting In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 364 (1970)); and (b) that the law “ requires that each element of a crime be proved to a jury beyond a reasonable doubt” (Hurst v. Florida, 136 S. Ct. 616, 621 (2016)). Because the first formulation focuses on “facts” and the second on “elements,” counsel can request that each be stated separately. (Beyond emphasizing that the two requirements are distinct, their statement in separate sentences provides the benefit of repetition of the core phrase, “beyond a reasonable doubt.” The value of repetition in persuasion has been recognized for a couple of thousand years at least. See [CICERO], Useful elaborations of the beyond-a-reasonable doubt standard which counsel should consider include:

(i) “In civil cases, it is only necessary to prove that a fact is more likely true than not or that its truth is highly probable. In delinquency cases such as this, the state’s proof must be more powerful than that. It must be beyond a reasonable doubt.” See, e.g., State v. Portillo, 182 Ariz. 592, 596, 898 P.2d 970, 974 (1995), relying on the widely influential Instruction 21 in Federal Judicial Center, Pattern Criminal Jury Instructions 28 (1987).

(ii) “A reasonable doubt does not mean a doubt for which you have to give a specific reason.” See e.g., State v. Medina, 147 N.J. 43, 52-53, 685 A.2d 1242, 1246-47 (1996); State v. Hudson, 286 N.J. Super. 149, 153, 668 A.2d 457, 458 (1995) (“a reasonable doubt may be one that defies the jury’s ability to express or articulate the reasons for it”).

(iii) “A reasonable doubt may arise simply because you believe that the prosecution’s evidence has failed to exclude every fair and rational hypothesis except that of guilt.” See, e.g., State v. Cervantes, 87 Wash. App. 440, 448, 942 P.2d 382, 385 (1997).

(iv) “The respondent is presumed innocent and this presumption stays with the respondent through each stage of the trial unless it has been overcome by the evidence to the exclusion of and beyond a reasonable doubt. A reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the respondent may arise from the evidence, from conflicting evidence or from the lack of evidence on the part of the prosecution.” Cf. Fla. Standard Jury Instructions in Criminal Cases 3.7 [modified in light of State v. Boyken, 217 N.W.2d 218, 219 (Iowa 1974)].

(vi) “A reasonable doubt is any lack of certainty that a reasonable person could have based upon any shortcoming or questionable aspect of the prosecution’s evidence.
Because the respondent is presumed to be innocent, [he] [she] does not have to present any evidence. [But when the respondent does present evidence, as in this case, a reasonable doubt may also arise from any genuine question which that evidence raises as to the respondent’s guilt.]”

(6) Explaining the legal principles underlying defense contentions. For example, counsel may request an instruction that evidence of intoxication was admitted as bearing upon the question whether the respondent could and did form the requisite intent for the crime; that the specific intent to kill [or to steal, or whatever] is an element of the crime which must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt; that the respondent can no more be found guilty of the crime if the jury has a reasonable doubt concerning his or her intent than if it has a reasonable doubt whether s/he did the act of killing [or of taking money, or whatever]; and that if, by reason of the evidence presented regarding the respondent’s intoxication, the jury has a reasonable doubt with regard to whether the respondent formed the required intent, the jury must acquit the respondent. Whenever the theory of the defense requires the jury to apply legal principles that are not subsumed within the elements of the crime charged, instructions spelling out those principles are necessary. “As a general proposition a defendant is entitled to an instruction as to any recognized defense for which there exists evidence sufficient for a reasonable jury to find in his favor.” Mathews v. United States, 485 U.S. 58, 63 (1988). See also, e.g., Elvik v. Baker, 612 Fed. Appx. 412, 414-15 (9th Cir. 2015), vacated & remanded, 136 S. Ct. 1196 (2016), rea’d on remand, 660 Fed. Appx. 538 (9th Cir. 2016); Harris v. Alexander, 548 F.3d 200, 205-06 (2d Cir. 2008); Peterson v. State, 24 So. 3d 686, 689-90 (Fla. App. 2009); General v. State, 367 Md. 475, 789 A.2d 102 (2002); State v. Lockwood, 43 Or. App. 639, 643-46, 603 P.2d 1231, 1234-35 (1979); Miller v. State, 815 S.W.2d 582, 585 (Tex. Crim. App. 1991); State v. White, 142 Ohio St. 3d 277, 290, 29 N.E.3d 939, 952 (2015) (“A trial court has broad discretion to decide how to fashion jury instructions, but it must ‘fully and completely give the jury all instructions which are relevant and necessary for the jury to weigh the evidence and discharge its duty as the fact finder.’ . . . We require a jury instruction to present a correct, pertinent statement of the law that is appropriate to the facts. . . . ¶ Here, it is not disputed that White used deadly force in the line of duty, and therefore the jury charge should have been tailored to instruct the jury on when a police officer is justified in using deadly force.”); Jackson v. United States, 645 A.2d 1099, 1101 (D.C. 1994) (“[i]t is well settled that ‘[a]s a general proposition a defendant is entitled to an instruction as to any recognized defense for which there exists evidence sufficient for a reasonable jury to find in his favor’”) (dictum). Cf. Baer v. Neal, 879 F.3d 769, 781 (7th Cir. 2018) (“Evidence of Baer’s mental health and drug use were intertwined as the cornerstone of Baer’s defense, and defense counsel’s sole strategy for avoiding a death sentence was ensuring that the jury considered and gave effect to Baer’s mental health and intoxication evidence. . . . Baer’s trial counsel . . . [rendered ineffective assistance by failing] to object to instructions that effectively blocked consideration of this crucial mitigating evidence.).

(7) Instructing the jury not to consider matters that occurred during trial and that the jury may be disposed to hold against the respondent. For example, counsel may request an instruction that the jury is not to infer guilt from the respondent’s failure to take the stand. The defense appears to have an unqualified federal constitutional right to an instruction on this subject. Carter v. Kentucky, 450 U.S. 288 (1981); James v. Kentucky, 466 U.S. 341 (1984); White v. Woodall, 134 S. Ct. 1697, 1702 (2014) (dictum); see § 33.05 supra.

Attention should also be paid to the possibility of a missing-witness instruction (see § 10.08 supra) and to the matter of lesser included offenses, discussed in § 36.05 supra.

Whether counsel’s proposed charges should be conservative (stating the law as counsel knows s/he can clearly satisfy the court it is) or venturesome (embodying debatable defense theories) depends in part on whether, under local practice, a judge may refuse entirely to charge on a given subject simply because the specific instruction requested by defense counsel does not state the law correctly. See § 36.03 third paragraph, subdivision (3) supra. When local law permits a judge thus to deny the whole of any requested instruction that is incorrect in part, counsel who wants to press a venturesome point should prepare alternative proposed charges, clearly designated as such, for submission seriatim. The alternatives should be cross-referenced and should specify the order of counsel’s preference among them so that s/he can claim error in the failure to give a more favorable one even though a less favorable alternative which s/he proposed was given.

For example, counsel might submit proposed instructions designated Respondent’s Requests for Instruction Number 3, Number 3-A, and Number 3-B. Number 3 would tell the jury that the respondent cannot be convicted of assaulting an officer unless s/he actually knew that the person whom s/he assaulted was an officer. Number 3-A would tell the jury that the respondent cannot be convicted of assaulting an officer unless s/he actually knew or was grossly reckless in failing to know that the person whom s/he assaulted was an officer, and it would contain at the top the notation: “If the Court refuses Respondent’s Request for Instruction Number 3, respondent objects to that refusal and, without waiving that objection, requests that the Court instruct as follows.” Number 3-B (telling the jury that the respondent cannot be convicted of assaulting an officer unless s/he actually knew or unless a reasonable person in the respondent’s situation would have known that the individual s/he assaulted was an officer) would bear a similar notation at the top in reference to Number 3-A.

If local practice allows, counsel should delay submitting Number 3-A until after the judge has refused Number 3 and should delay submitting Number 3-B until after the judge has refused Number 3-A. Judges given several alternative formulations at the outset may choose one that is less favorable to counsel than the one that the judge would have accepted if s/he had not been advised of the alternatives that were going to follow. If local practice requires the advance submission of all requests for instructions, then Request Number 3 in the preceding series would bear at the bottom the notation: “If this Request Number 3 is given, Respondent’s Requests for Instruction Numbers 3-A and 3-B should not be given” and so forth.

Like defense evidence, defense instructions should ordinarily be selective and should avoid raising too many issues for jury consumption. They should focus squarely on the defense theory of the case. They should state the rules of law underlying that theory clearly and succinctly, in terms that counsel will be able to pick up and use in his or her closing argument.

The requests to charge should not be argumentative. An easy way to connect the applicable law to the facts without being argumentative is to frame each instruction in the form of a hypothetical syllogism: “If you find \( A \) and if you find \( B \), then you must return a verdict of not guilty [or “then you should consider \( C \)”]” – and adding definitions of \( A \) and \( B \) if necessary. There must, of course, be some support in the record for each finding hypothesized, and counsel should be prepared to tell the court what it is.

The drafting of proposed instructions usually warrants counsel’s care, and often considerable creativity. Counsel should remember that it is through his or her proposed instructions that s/he has the opportunity to present the principal legal issues in the case – matters of statutory construction, matters of first impression relating to the requisite mens rea of offenses, and so forth. It is also at this point that counsel principally exercises a “law-testing” or “law-making” role – for example, by challenging accepted definitions of the crime charged. Finally, the erroneous refusal of the trial court to give requested instructions is a fertile field for error and reversal. Although it is not counsel’s job to “plant” error, it is decisively counsel’s job to press every legitimate legal claim the client has and to insist that the client not be convicted except at a trial at which those claims have been decided correctly.

§ 36.07 PREPARING AND PRESENTING THE DEFENSE REQUESTS FOR CHARGE

As indicated in the third paragraph of § 36.02 supra, requests for charge are ordinarily required to be given to the court in writing at the conclusion of the evidence, just before the lawyers make their closing arguments to the jury. If at all possible, counsel should prepare the requests before the end of the last witness’s testimony, so as to avoid being caught in a last-minute rush that will make careful drafting impossible. Since the judge’s decision to grant or deny the requests will ordinarily have to be made on the spot, with no time for real research, counsel should bring to court suitably highlighted photocopies of any statutory texts and judicial opinions that s/he can find to support each request. When counsel has not had an opportunity to prepare his or her requests for charge in advance or when additional points come to mind in the closing minutes of the evidentiary trial, counsel should write out the requests in longhand on a legal pad for submission to the court or type them electronically. If there is no natural break (such as a lunch break) in the proceedings between the conclusion of testimony and the commencement of closing arguments and counsel does not have his or her requests for charge completed, s/he should ask for a recess to draft them.

Counsel’s requests for instructions should ordinarily not be submitted until the latest possible moment required by local rules or the trial judge’s order. If, as is common, the local rules provide that the parties’ requests must be submitted “at the close of the evidence” or at such time as the judge requires, counsel should urge the judge not to call for submissions before the prosecution has rested its evidentiary case. Giving the prosecutor detailed elucidation of defense theories or points of law while there is still time to address prosecution evidence to them is bad business.

§ 36.08 LEARNING WHAT THE COURT PLANS TO CHARGE

One important function of the conference on instructions, from the viewpoint of the defense, is the opportunity it affords to learn what the court will charge. This will be important in planning counsel’s closing argument.

As indicated in § 36.02 supra, some judges will routinely disclose everything of substance that they expect to charge, and in a number of jurisdictions they are required by law to do so. With other judges, counsel may have to inquire specifically what the court intends to charge on each particular point. With still others it is necessary to infer the court’s intentions from discussion of the parties’ requests to charge; thus, counsel’s arguments concerning those requests may have to be pursued in a way that furthers this end.

§ 36.09 OBJECTIONS TO THE COURT’S CHARGE

Local practice may require that all objections to the court’s proposed charge be noted at the time of the conference on instructions or may require that objections be noted after the court completes its charge to the jury. Sometimes objection at both times is required. Counsel should be familiar with the requirements.

Part C. Closing Argument

§ 36.10 CLOSING ARGUMENT GENERALLY
As a general matter, the closing arguments of the attorneys recapitulate the theories of each party and attempt to justify the inferences and conclusions that each feels should be drawn from the evidence. In almost all jurisdictions the prosecutor argues first and defense counsel second. In some jurisdictions the prosecutor is always permitted to rebut and thereby have the last word; in other jurisdictions the prosecutor is permitted to rebut only if the defense has presented evidence. Some judges will permit surrebuttal argument by the defense when the prosecutor has obviously sandbagged and reserved most of his or her substantive arguments for rebuttal so as to deprive defense counsel of the opportunity to respond to those arguments.

Counsel should be sure that s/he is familiar with the local rules concerning the order of closing. The shaping of the closing argument for the defense depends critically on whether the prosecutor will or will not have an opportunity for reply.

Closing arguments in a jury trial are radically different from those in a bench trial as described in Chapter 35. Because juries are far less capable than judges of understanding legal doctrines and because jurors tend to be more receptive than judges to factual and common-sense arguments, the defense closing in a jury trial has to stress the facts and avoid lengthy discussion of legal doctrines. See § 36.12 infra. The jury’s susceptibility to inflammatory arguments also requires that counsel be alert to object to prosecutorial references to prejudicial matters and appeals to the jurors’ emotions. See § 36.11 infra.

§ 36.11 THE PROSECUTOR’S CLOSING

§ 36.11(a) Content of the Prosecutor’s Closing; Impermissible Areas and Arguments

The prosecutor’s closing argument will typically emphasize the enormity of the crime, the indisputable character of the prosecution’s evidence (the efficiency of the investigating officers, the expertise of the prosecution’s experts, the objectivity of its public-spirited eyewitnesses, and so forth), the incredibility and self-serving quality of the defense evidence, and – to the extent possible within the limits of the rule forbidding direct allusion to the respondent’s character unless the respondent has opened that issue (see §§ 30.07(a), 33.17 supra) – the shabby nature of the respondent and defense witnesses.

The courts have repeatedly held (and counsel will likely be able to find caselaw within his or her jurisdiction holding) that:

(1) The prosecutor must not “misstate the evidence in the record, or argue inferences that the prosecutor knows have no good-faith support in the record” (AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, Standard 3-6.8(a) (4th ed. 2015)). See, e.g., Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 85-89 (1935) (“The prosecuting attorney’s argument to the jury was undignified and intemperate, containing improper insinuations and assertions calculated to mislead the jury.”); the prosecutor “is the representative not of an ordinary party to a controversy, but of a sovereignty whose obligation . . . in a criminal prosecution is not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done”; although the prosecutor “may strike hard blows, he is not at liberty to strike foul ones. It is as much his duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction as it is to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one”; “It is fair to say that the average jury, in a greater or less degree, has confidence that these obligations, which so plainly rest upon the prosecuting attorney, will be faithfully observed. Consequently, improper suggestions, insinuations, and, especially, assertions of personal knowledge, are apt to carry much weight against the accused when they should properly carry none.”); Russell v. United States, 701 A.2d 1093, 1099 (D.C. 1997) (the prosecutor’s argument “that Russell aided and abetted Hahn in setting the three fires, including the one on October 14 which led to Russell’s conviction,” even though “there was not one shred of evidence before the jury connecting Hahn in any way with any of those fires,” required reversal despite defense counsel’s failure to object; “the trial court committed plain error by failing to intervene sua sponte and correct the prosecutor’s egregious misstatements of the evidence.”); People v. Benitez, 120 A.D.3d 705, 706-07, 991 N.Y.S.2d 133, 134-35 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2014) (the prosecutor, in referring to a tip that initiated the police investigation, “strongly implied that whoever had provided the tip had implicated the defendant,” thereby improperly “suggest[ing] to the jury, in this one-witness identification case, that the complainant was not the only person who had implicated the defendant in the commission of the robbery”; conviction reversed: “a new trial is necessary.”).

(2) The prosecutor must not misstate the law. See, e.g., Deck v. Jenkins, 814 F.3d 954, 963, 985, 986 (9th Cir. 2016) (the prosecutor’s rebuttal closing argument violated due process by misstating the state law of attempt in a way that “negated an essential element of attempt” and thereby “lowered the prosecution’s burden of proof”).

(3) The prosecutor must “scrupulously avoid any reference to a . . . [respondent’s] decision not to testify” (ABA STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, supra, Standard 3-6.8(a)). See, e.g., Gongora v. Thaler, 710 F.3d 267, 275-83 (5th Cir. 2013) (per curiam) (the prosecutor’s closing argument violated the defendant’s right to a fair trial by “repeatedly refer[ing] to Gongora’s failure to testify”: “the prosecutor made a series of at least five comments referring to Gongora’s silence as he argued to the jury that Gongora was the shooter,” asking the jury repeatedly “‘who you would expect to hear from.’”); Girts v. Yanai, 501 F.3d 743, 748, 755-56, 760 (6th Cir. 2007) (the prosecutor improperly commented on the defendant’s failure to testify by, inter alia, stating that “‘[t]here has been no evidence offered to say these people [prosecution witnesses] are incorrect,’” and that “‘there is only one person that can tell you how . . . [cyanide] was introduced [into the deceased’s system], and that’s the defendant’”); Ben-Yisrayl v. Davis, 431 F.3d 1043, 1049-53 (7th Cir. 2005) (the prosecutor’s statement “‘Let the Defendant tell you,’” which was “directed at Ben-Yisrayl individually” and was not merely an “‘invit[ation] to defense counsel to explain, in its closing argument,’” constituted an improper “suggestion to infer guilt from the defendant’s silence”). See also § 33.05 supra.

(4) The prosecutor must not “argue in terms of counsel’s personal opinion,” or “imply special or secret knowledge of the truth or of witness credibility” (ABA STANDARDS FOR Criminal Justice, supra, Standard 3-6.8(b)). See, e.g., United States v. Young, 470 U.S. 1, 7-8 (1985) (dictum) (“Prosecutors sometimes breach their duty to refrain from overzealous conduct by commenting on the defendant’s guilt and offering unsolicited personal views on the evidence.”); Newlon v. Armontout, 885 F.2d 1328, 1335-38 (8th Cir. 1989) (the prosecutor’s closing argument in the penalty phase of a capital trial violated due process by, inter alia, “express[ing] . . . [the prosecutor’s] personal belief in the propriety of the death sentence and impl[ying] that he had special knowledge outside the record,” and by “emphasiz[ing] his position of authority as prosecuting attorney of St. Louis County”); Shurn v. Delo, 177 F.3d 662, 667 (8th Cir. 1999) (the prosecutor’s closing argument in the penalty phase of a capital trial violated due process by, inter alia, “emphasiz[ing] his position of authority and express[ing] his personal opinion on the propriety of the death sentence”); State v. Walker, 182 Wash. 2d 463, 468, 477-78, 341 P.3d 976, 979, 985 (2015) (the prosecutor committed “egregious misconduct” by using a PowerPoint presentation in closing argument that, inter alia, “repeatedly expressed the prosecutor’s personal opinion on guilt – over 100 of its approximately 250 slides were headed with the words ‘DEFENDANT WALKER GUILTY OF PREMEDITATED MURDER,’ and one slide showed Walker’s booking photograph altered with the words ‘GUILTY BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT,’ which were superimposed over his face in bold red letters.”). See also State v. Salas, 408 P.3d 383, 391-92 (Wash. App. 2018) (“The prosecutor in the present case did not make the mistake of superimposing the word ‘guilty’ over a photograph of the defendant or modifying exhibits with superimposed text. The State defends the slides on the basis that the photographs had all been admitted as exhibits and the captions contained information elicited from the witnesses. ¶ But under Walker . . . , the potential prejudice of a slide presentation does not arise solely from the alteration of exhibits. The broader proposition is that slide shows may not be used to inflame passion and prejudice.” ¶ The captions reinforce the visual contrast. They evoke high school stereotypes. Lopez was a musician, whereas Salas played football and was once in a fight club. Which type of person was more likely to initiate a fight? Salas was an outdoorsman, while Lopez was a customer service representative. Which type of person was more likely to use a knife? ¶ A rule of thumb for using PowerPoint is ‘If you can’t say it, don’t display it.”); United States v. Weatherspoon, 410 F.3d 1142, 1146-49 (9th Cir. 2005) (the prosecutor’s repeated statements during closing argument that police officers and other prosecution witnesses “‘told the truth’” constituted impermissible personal “vouch[ing] for the credibility of [the] witnesses”; “Vouching of that sort is dangerous precisely because a jury ‘may be inclined to give weight to the prosecutor’s opinion in assessing the credibility of witnesses, instead of making the independent judgment of credibility to which the defendant is entitled’”; “Although to be sure no lawyer, either public or private, should lay his or her own credibility on the line by expressing his or her own opinion about a witness’ [sic] believability, the difference is that a private lawyer’s impropriety in that respect carries no implication of official governmental support.”); People v. Casiano, 148 A.D.3d 1044, 1045, 50 N.Y.S.3d 439, 441 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017) (the prosecutor “engaged in improper conduct” during closing argument by “vouch[ing] for the credibility of the People’s witnesses with regard to significant aspects of the People’s case by asserting, inter alia, that ‘the witnesses who came before you provided truthful testimony that makes sense,’ that they gave the ‘kind of truthful and credible testimony that you can rely on,’ and that one witness had ‘no reason . . . to be anything but truthful with the 911 operator’); State v. Albino, 312 Conn. 763, 779-80, 97 A.3d 478, 490 (2014) (dictum) (“In . . . direct examination, the prosecutor made statements reiterating that the state had not promised Ayala anything in exchange for his testimony and that Ayala was free to change his story. . . . Then, in closing argument, the prosecutor stated: ‘[T]he state’s not promising anything to . . . Ayala and he made that clear to you, and we make it clear to the jury.’ (Emphasis added.) ¶ Because the prosecutor effectively testified to the state’s lack of any promises to Ayala in the guise of questioning, such statements were improper.”); State v. Ish, 170 Wash. 2d 189, 196, 241 P.3d 389, 392-93 (2010) (dictum) (“Improper vouching generally occurs (1) if the prosecutor expresses his or her personal belief as to the veracity of the witness or (2) if the prosecutor indicates that evidence not presented at trial supports the witness’s testimony”); Black v. State, 2017 Wyo. 135, 405 P.3d 1045, 1055 (2017) (the prosecutor committed misconduct “when he vouched for the skill of the investigating officers. During closing, the prosecutor stated: ‘I have been stunned by the police work here. I used to be in Cheyenne, the police work that this detective has done has been as complete as anything I’ve ever seen. . . .’ [and asserted] that a particular officer involved with the investigation was ‘good’ and that . . . ‘[the lead detective] has done unbelievable police work.’”).

(5) The prosecutor “should make only those arguments that are consistent with the trier’s duty to decide the case on the evidence” (ABA STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, supra, Standard 3-6.8(c)). See, e.g., Simpson v. Warren, 475 Fed. Appx. 51, 64 (6th Cir. 2012) (the prosecutor improperly sought to “inflame the jury’s passions” by “twice stat[ing] [in closing argument] that ‘dump[ing]’ and ‘throw[ing]’ Officer Weston’s ‘dead body’ before the jury should not be a prerequisite to convicting” the defendant of a charge of assault with intent to commit murder of the officer, who “was not only [still] alive, but testified at . . . [the defendant’s] trial”); State v. Albino, 312 Conn. at 774-75, 97 A.3d at 486-87 (dictum) (“gratuitous comments about the defendant ‘executing’ Rivera and committing ‘murder in cold blood’ were improper, considering that the defendant’s evidence was deemed sufficient to warrant jury instructions on lesser included offenses inconsistent with a wholly unprovoked act of brutality that has been deemed by courts to justify the use of such terms. ¶ In addition, we see no connection between the issues in the present case and the prosecutor’s comment regarding ‘the indignity of death’ when showing the jury Rivera’s autopsy photograph. Because the lack of dignity in Rivera’s appearance has no relevance to the issues in the present case, this statement would seem calculated solely to appeal to the jurors’ emotions.”); United States v. Weatherspoon, 410 F.3d at 1149-50 (the prosecutor’s statements in rebuttal argument encouraging the jury to return “a conviction to protect other individuals in the community,” thereby speaking to “the potential social ramifications of the jury’s reaching a guilty verdict” rather than seeking a guilty verdict based exclusively on the evidence at trial, “were clearly designed to encourage the jury to enter a verdict on the basis of emotion rather than fact” and, “[a]s such, . . . were clearly irrelevant and improper”); McGriff v. United States, 705 A.2d 282, 288-89 (D.C. 1997) (it was improper for the prosecutor to argue to the jury that “‘through your verdict you can send them [the defendants] that message that you will not stand for this and that you will not tolerate this in your community’”; “‘This court has stated repeatedly that an attorney must not ask a jury to ‘send a message’ to anyone. . . . Juries are not in the message-sending business. Their sole duty is to return a verdict based on the facts before them. Urging a jury to ‘send a message’ is impermissible because it implies that there is a reason to find the defendant guilty other than what the evidence has shown.”); People v. Casiano, 148 A.D.3d at 1045, 50 N.Y.S.3d at 441 (“In describing a complainant [in closing argument], the prosecutor [improperly] asserted that he was ‘exactly what you hoped to see from someone who had troubles with the law in their youth,’ but had ‘changed [his] life’ and now worked at an organization that helps ‘low-income people [obtain] health care,’ which was a clear attempt to appeal to the sympathy of the jury”). See also Bennett v. Stirling, 842 F.3d 319 (4th Cir. 2016) (the prosecutor’s closing argument in a capital sentencing hearing “was suffused with racially coded references to a degree that made a fair proceeding impossible” (id. at 321); “[T]he remarks challenged here were unmistakably calculated to inflame racial fears and apprehensions on the part of the jury . . . . The comments plugged into potent symbols of racial prejudice, encouraging the jury to fear Bennett or regard him as less human on account of his race . . . .”); State v. Ceballos, 266 Conn. 364, 832 A.2d 14 (2003) (reviewing the case law condemning religion-based arguments by prosecutors). Compare Baer v. Neal, 879 F.3d 769, 788 (7th Cir. 2018) (finding defense counsel ineffective for failing to object to improper prosecutorial arguments: “[Prosecutor] Cummings’s misstatements were prolific and harmful to Baer’s case, yet Baer’s trial counsel failed to object at every opportunity. Cummings’s comments began in voir dire, where his comments conditioned jurors to believe that Baer was a liar, that mental illness was a ‘copout’ and ‘defense,’ that Baer should not receive a GBMI conviction because he appreciated the wrongfulness of his actions (improperly using the insanity defense standard), life without parole was at a high risk of providing release, and the Clark family wanted a death sentence. All these comments were made before the jury heard any evidence in Baer’s case. Then, at the close of the penalty phase, Cummings again injected inflammatory comments and facts not in evidence, including remarks about Cummings’s mother’s prostitution, people being laid off to afford the state’s pursuit of the death penalty, and Baer’s crime being worse than any of the prior 125 murders Cummings had heard of in his career in law enforcement. Each of these comments made by Cummings carried the weight and authority of the state.”) with Darden v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 168, 179-80 & n.12 (1986) (although the prosecutors “made several offensive comments reflecting an emotional reaction to the case,” which “undoubtedly were improper,” these comments did not “‘so infect[ ] the trial with unfairness as to make the resulting conviction a denial of due process,’” given that the “prosecutors’ argument did not manipulate or misstate the evidence, nor did it implicate other specific rights of the accused such as the right to counsel or the right to remain silent”; “[m]uch of the objectionable content was invited by or was responsive to the opening summation of the defense”; “[t]he trial court instructed the jurors several times that their decision was to be made on the basis of the evidence alone, and that the arguments of counsel were not evidence”; “[t]he weight of the evidence against [the defendant] . . . was heavy”; and “[d]efense counsel were able to use the opportunity for rebuttal very effectively, turning much of the prosecutors’ closing argument against them by placing many of the prosecutors’ comments and actions in a light that was more likely to engender strong disapproval than result in inflamed passions against” the defendant.);

(6) The prosecutor must not disparage the respondent’s character in ways that violate the rules governing other-crimes evidence (see § 30.07(a), (b)) supra or the rules governing rebuttal to good-character evidence introduced by the defense (see § 33.17) supra. See, e.g., Gumm v. Mitchell, 775 F.3d 345, 381-85 (6th Cir. 2014) (the prosecutor committed misconduct in rebuttal closing argument “by using highly inflammatory and prejudicial evidence, much of which was known to be of questionable reliability, to assert that . . . [the defendant] had a propensity to commit the acts in question” and by “portraying [the defendant] . . . as a sexual deviant whose character aligned with the crimes in this case”); Simpson v. Warren, 475 Fed. Appx. at 62, 64 (the prosecutor improperly encouraged the jury to consider the defendant’s “‘bad character as a thumb on the scale in favor of a finding of guilt’” by arguing, in a trial for assault with intent to commit murder and gun possession, that the apparently “‘nice looking fellow’” whom the jury was seeing in the courtroom was actually “‘the type of man who knows about all of this ammunition and guns, that hangs out with Hughes and Sharp and Smith, the type of man that carries this gun . . . and points it and shoots it,’” and by using other-crimes evidence introduced at trial to argue that the “‘total picture . . . makes out a person who, but for a bad aim, could very well be before you as a killer’”). Disparaging legitimate trial conduct by defense counsel is also forbidden. See People v. Casiano, 148 A.D.3d at 1046, 50 N.Y.S.3d at 441 (the prosecutor’s closing argument impermissibly “denigrated the defense and undermined the defendant’s right to confront witnesses by implying that the complainants were victims of an overly long cross-examination and that one was a ‘saint’ for answering so many questions”); State v. Albino, 312 Conn. at 776-78, 97 A.3d at 487-89 (dictum) (comments in which “the prosecutor analogized the defense strategy to an octopus’ defense mechanism of shooting ink into the water, thus muddying the water so the octopus can escape” and “refer[ing] to the defense strategy as a ‘shotgun approach. You shoot it against the wall and you hope that something will stick.’” were improper).

§ 36.11(b) Objecting to Improper Arguments by the Prosecutor

Some judges consider it a matter of courtesy for opposing counsel not to interrupt one another’s closing arguments to the jury by making objections in media res. If this is a matter of the individual judge’s courtroom etiquette rather than a documentable jurisdiction-wide rule, counsel should elicit the judge’s statement on the record that s/he wants objections to opposing counsel’s argument to be withheld until the argument is finished. In the absence of such a statement, an appellate court may treat counsel’s post-argument objections as untimely.

Even where this courtesy is expected, counsel should not hesitate to interrupt the prosecutor’s argument by objecting if the prosecutor plainly goes beyond allowable bounds – for example, by disparaging the respondent’s character when no good-character defense has been presented; by arguing from struck evidence or from facts outside the record; by asserting the prosecutor’s personal belief in the respondent’s guilt; or by implying that there is additional incriminating evidence against the respondent that the prosecutor has not bothered to present. See § 36.11(a) supra. Less egregious improprieties should be noted down on counsel’s pad or computer. After the prosecutor has concluded, counsel should approach the bench, describe each impropriety, object to each, and request corrective instructions.

In other localities, contemporaneous objection to improper argument is accepted or required. Counsel should be prompt to make it.

Sometimes counsel will wish to let objectionable arguments go without objection so as to treat them as opening the door to rebuttal. But in considering this tactic s/he must keep in mind who has the last word. See § 36.10 supra. When the prosecutor has made a number of factually unsupportable statements, it is often effective for counsel in his or her own closing argument to demonstrate that each of these is belied by the record, then to use the misstatements to portray the prosecution theory as, part and parcel, made up out of whole cloth.

§ 36.12 DEFENSE ARGUMENT

§ 36.12(a) General Considerations

The defense closing argument is the place for counsel to connect everything that has happened during the trial and to weave it into the story that presents the respondent’s theory of the case. Counsel presumably will have developed that story line prior to trial and used it to guide all of counsel’s actions throughout the trial: – conducting the voir dire; opening statement; objections; cross-examination of prosecution witnesses; and the presentation of any defense witnesses and exhibits. See Chapter 6. Closing argument provides the opportunity to drive home the messages counsel has been sending throughout the trial. Sometimes that will best be done with explicit, linear, logical reasoning, but often it will be more effective to use rhetorical and narrative devices that shape the jurors’ thinking in a subtler manner. Counsel will want to think carefully about the best macrostructure, verbal formulations, and metaphors, along with a host of other factors that go into effective storytelling in closing argument. See generally Anthony G. Amsterdam & Randy Hertz, An Analysis of Closing Arguments to a Jury, 37 N.Y. L. SCH. L. REV. 55 (1992); PHILIP N. MEYER, STORYTELLING FOR LAWYERS (2014).

In general, defense counsel should focus on arguments that will make the jury affirmatively want to acquit the respondent. When possible, counsel should attempt to persuade the jury that the respondent is innocent – unjustly accused; a victim of circumstances or of the complainant’s malevolence or of police ineptitude; someone entitled to vindication. However, arguments demonstrating innocence should always be combined with a reminder to the jury that it needs not find that the defense has proven the respondent innocent, merely that the prosecution has failed to prove the respondent guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

The heaviness of the prosecutor’s burden is often the most important factor favoring the defense, and in these cases it is crucial for counsel to convey it to the jury. Unfortunately, “reasonable doubt” is also one of the most difficult concepts for a juror to understand. Counsel can help to explain the concept by describing the rationale for the prosecutor’s burden: that the law cannot tolerate the risk of error or mistake in a decision that can affect an individual’s life or liberty; therefore, the law has established an extremely high standard of certainty which the prosecution must satisfy. Counsel can also link the concept of reasonable doubt to the gravity of the jury’s task when sitting in judgment on a fellow human being, and can emphasize the seriousness of the jury’s decision by pointing out that once the jurors have given their verdict, it will be too late for second thoughts and doubts that may occur later, when the jurors think back about what they have done. See also § 36.06 subdivision (4) supra.

§ 36.12(b) Structure and Content of the Defense Argument

The following points should be considered for inclusion in counsel’s closing. In the order in which they are set out below, they provide the logical structure for an argument that gathers momentum.

(1) An expression of appreciation for the attention and interest of the jurors throughout the trial, and a recognition that jury service is not convenient.

(2) The assertion that the only reason for calling the jurors away from their own affairs and making them sit through a delinquency trial is the vital importance of seeking the judgment of twelve impartial and responsible members of the community when there are questions of fact to be resolved in a delinquency case that could have extremely serious consequences for the life or liberty of a fellow human being.

(3) The assertion that the law recognizes both the difficulty and the importance of that judgment by requiring that the guilt of the accused be proved by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt and to the moral satisfaction of every juror; that because there should not be any risk of error or mistake in convicting someone of a crime [even when appearances may be against him or her], the law insists that every juror must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that no mistake is being made.

(4) A succinct summary of the substantive legal rules governing the offenses charged and the defenses presented and, in particular, governing the theory of the defense. (This should ordinarily be preceded by the phrase “As [His] [Her] Honor will tell you in instructing you on the law after the prosecutor and I have completed our arguments” or some equivalent recognition that the jury is expected to get its legal education from the court. Defense counsel is not supposed to instruct the jury on the law but is, of course, permitted to outline the legal principles on which s/he will rely. Ordinarily s/he should do this – even when the law is relatively simple and has been covered unobjectionably by the prosecutor – because counsel does not want it to appear that the defense is less well situated than the prosecutor to draw support for its position from the law.
Counsel’s statement of the legal rules should track as closely as possible the verbal formulations that counsel expects the judge to charge. Counsel’s aim in proposing jury instructions and in attempting to learn in advance exactly what the judge will say to the jury (see §§ 36.02, 36.08 supra) was to enable counsel to lay out the law in terms that will be recognizably endorsed by the court’s jury charge.)

(5) A statement of the specific, critical questions that the jury must decide, in light of the law and the evidence. (This may boil down to the credibility of one witness or to the reasonableness of one inference – wherever the defense is strongest. It is usually best to reduce the number and complexity of issues on which the jury will focus, unless the defense is relatively weak on all issues.)

(6) A statement of the answers that the defense is confident the jury will find in considering those questions when it scrutinizes the evidence critically during its deliberations.

(7) A dissection of the prosecution evidence at its weakest points (or of the prosecutor’s summary of it if that is as, or more, vulnerable), and a summary of the defense evidence (if there was any), connecting the pieces of defense evidence together and stating what they combine to show. (An important judgment call, which must be made on the facts of each case, is whether counsel should (a) focus discussion of the evidence on the prosecution’s theory and use defense evidence solely to poke holes in that theory; (b) focus discussion of the evidence on the defense theory and criticize the prosecution’s evidence as insufficient to overcome that theory; or (c) invite an explicit comparison of the prosecution’s theory of the case with the defense theory and argue that the defense theory is more plausible.)

(8) A criticism of the logic or fairness of the prosecutor’s summary (if this has not been done in connection with the preceding item).

(9) A prediction of the points that the prosecutor will probably make in rebuttal and a statement of the reasons why they should not be viewed as persuasive. (In this connection it is usually helpful to point out that the prosecutor is given the last word under the rules of procedure and that defense counsel will have no chance to reply. The prosecutor should be made to appear unfair insofar as s/he abuses this favorable position to partisan advantage.)

§ 36.12(c) Techniques to Consider Using in Closing Argument

In structuring final argument, counsel should be selective in the choice of materials so that his or her reasoning is easy to follow. A shotgun approach in final argument should be avoided. Useful devices in argument include:

(1) Defining reasonable doubt, giving a hypothetical situation from everyday life (“If the man across the street came over and said he saw your child throw a brick through his window and that your child should be punished, and maybe the man’s wife also said that she saw your child throw the brick, but your child denied doing it, and then a neighbor down the block said he saw the person who threw the brick and it didn’t look like your child, it looked like the Jones kid . . . .”), and then identifying the weak points in the prosecution’s case and the strong points in the defense case that combine to compel a reasonable doubt.

(2) Stressing the heavy burden of proof that the prosecution bears in criminal and delinquency cases and comparing it to the lesser burden in a civil case. (For example: “A party who brings a civil claim into court only needs to carry the ball over the 50-yard line, but the prosecutor in a criminal or delinquency case has to carry it all the way down the field and over the goal line.”) See § 36.06 subdivision (4) supra.

(3) Using common, daily experiences to support factual arguments by analogy.

(4) Emphasizing the technical, dryly logical, many-step nature of the prosecution’s case, as opposed to the immediacy and common-sense position of the defense. (The prosecution’s case ordinarily is more complex than a good defense because the prosecutor needs to win on more points.)

(5) Quoting verbatim from the prosecutor’s closing argument and pointing out exaggerations and unsupported assertions.

(6) Quoting legal rules in the same language that the court will use in its charge and showing how these rules support the defense position.

The devices may be used in varying combinations, depending upon the evidence, but the case is rare in which all of them could be put together effectively.

§ 36.12(d)  Limits on Defense Argument

There are, of course, limits to permissible defense argument, just as there are limits to permissible prosecutorial argument. Defense counsel is usually forbidden to rely upon facts that have no basis in the evidence, to urge the jury to disregard the law, to mention matters (such as the sentence facing the respondent if convicted) which it is improper under local practice for the jury to consider, and to express a personal opinion of the client’s innocence or of the mendacity of prosecution witnesses. The relevant rules vary considerably from state to state.

Nevertheless, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments guarantee the accused “a right to be heard [through counsel] in summation of the evidence” (Herring v. New York, 422 U.S. 853, 864 (1975) (invalidating a state statute that empowered trial judges to refuse entirely to hear closing arguments in nonjury trials)). This decision necessarily implies that state law limitations on defense summation are subject to federal constitutional review. The Herring opinion emphasizes that the “presiding judge . . . is given great latitude in controlling the duration and limiting the scope of closing summations” (422 U.S. at 862); but plainly that latitude does not extend to the imposition of restrictions upon counsel which would frustrate the basic functions of summation that led the Supreme Court to recognize it as a constitutional right: to “argue the inferences to be drawn from all the testimony, and point out the weaknesses of their adversaries’ positions” (id.) Counsel who find themselves thus frustrated should reserve objections on Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment grounds as well as on the ground that the court has abused its discretion under state law.

§ 36.12(e) Wrapping Up

The last sentences of the defense closing argument should be the crest of the speech, after which counsel should quickly express confidence that the jury will see the logic of the respondent’s position, thank the jurors for their considerate attention, and stop. Stopping promptly after delivering the thrust of an argument leaves the prosecutor little time to collect his or her thoughts and to frame a strong rebuttal.

Part D. The Judge’s Charge to the Jury

§ 36.13 TAKING OBJECTIONS TO THE COURT’S CHARGE

Whether or not the court’s charge has been thoroughly picked over at a conference on instructions (see § 36.02 supra), and whether or not counsel entered objections to it in the course of that conference (see id. penultimate paragraph and § 36.09 supra), counsel must give it careful attention as it is delivered. What is clear when written may not sound clear when spoken. Even if the judge has agreed to give certain instructions requested by the defense and appears simply to be reading them to the jury, counsel cannot afford to relax. Judges sometimes slip or ad lib, and counsel must be alert to object if the judge does not follow the script. If the judge offsets a defense instruction by charging an inconsistent or countervailing principle or theory elsewhere in the charge – as is quite common – counsel should object to the offsetting portion of the charge. See Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307, 322-25 (1985); Cabana v. Bullock, 474 U.S. 376, 383-84 n.2 (1986).

Various kinds of restrictions imposed on the charge in many jurisdictions are noted in § 36.03 supra or can be extrapolated from §§ 36.04-36.06. These should be researched under local law and kept in mind.

Even jurisdictions that permit the judge to comment on the evidence impose some limitations on his or her power to do so in ways that are likely to overbear the independence of the jury as the ultimate trier of fact or to sway the jury’s judgment by misstating how the jurors should or may evaluate particular evidentiary matters. See, e.g., Quercia v. United States, 289 U.S. 466 (1933); Wheeler v. United States, 930 A.2d 232 (D.C. 2007); State v. Hernandez, 218 Conn. 458, 590 A.2d 112 (1991) (although “[a] trial court has broad discretion to comment on the evidence adduced in a criminal trial” (218 Conn. at 461, 590 A.2d at 114) “the one-sided rendition of the case given by the court was prejudicially unfair” (id. at 465, 590 A.2d at 115), requiring that the conviction be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial: the trial judge “extensively detailed the state’s claims and its evidence in support thereof, and little or no reference was made to the defendant’s exculpatory evidence and his theory of defense” (id. at 465, 590 A.2d at 115); “despite the court’s disclaimers, . . . the jury was likely to have interpreted the partisan rehearsal of the case as an indication that the court in this ‘simple case’ believed that the defendant’s claims and evidence, seemingly not worthy of comment, likewise were not worthy of consideration.” (id. at 465, 590 A.2d at 115)); cf. State v. J.S., 222 N.J. Super. 247, 255-57, 536 A.2d 769, 773-74 (1988). Counsel might do well to clock how much time the judge spends summarizing the prosecutor’s case and how much time the judge devotes to the defense. This is a helpful bit of raw data that can be used if counsel decides to approach the bench at the end of the charge and request additional instructions on some aspects of the defense case.

If the judge expresses an opinion on issues of credibility and guilt (as s/he is permitted to do in some jurisdictions), counsel should note the exact phrasing. When comment of this sort is allowed, it is nevertheless required to be qualified so as to leave clear that these issues are ultimately for the jury. The accused “is entitled to have the credibility of his testimony, or that of witnesses called on his behalf, judged by the jury.” United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 415 (1980) (dictum). A fortiori, a jury instruction that relieves the prosecution from the burden of proving an element of its case by telling the jurors that the element has been established as a matter of law is constitutionally impermissible. See, e.g., Powell v. Galaza, 328 F.3d 558 (9th Cir. 2003).

When the judge has completed his or her charge, s/he will ask whether counsel has any objections. (If the judge neglects to ask and counsel has objections, counsel should request leave to come to sidebar. Some fair opportunity must be given to the parties to record objections to the court’s charge out of the hearing of the jury. See Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 132 (1974) (dictum).) In most jurisdictions objections to the charge as given must be made at the bench at this time, before the jury goes out, or they are lost. See, e.g., Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 30(d). Counsel should state with particularity the portions of the judge’s charge to which s/he objects and all of the legal grounds of objection to each of them, and s/he should be sure that the proceedings at the bench are being recorded.

Even if the court’s instructions include some misstatement that is harmful to the defense, counsel may not want the court to correct itself because that would once again draw the jury’s attention to an aspect of the case that counsel would just as soon have the jury forget. In these circumstances counsel should note this point on the record, explain that the defense has already been prejudiced either way, and let the court cut the Gordian Knot if it chooses. The judge will predictably insist that counsel take a position: “Do you or don’t you want additional instruction on the subject?” Counsel should then choose whichever appears to be the lesser evil, but should state that the chosen alternative is an insufficient corrective and that s/he is preserving for consideration on post-trial motions and on appeal the contention that the court’s initial instructions were erroneous and prejudicial and that the defense should not be put to the forced choice between leaving the error unremedied and endorsing a purported remedy that will exacerbate the problem.

Should counsel have some objection to the court’s demeanor in presenting the charge, counsel must describe the offending behavior in concrete detail. Obviously, this should be done only in extreme cases.

Counsel should always state specifically every objection s/he may have to the charge rather than taking a “general exception.” If a general exception or no exception is taken to the charge, the charge will be upheld unless there was “plain error.” See § 36.03 supra.

In addition to, or instead of, objecting to any portion of the charge as erroneous, counsel may request additional instructions amplifying or clarifying those given. Trial judges often grant these requests in their discretion, even though there was nothing objectionable in the original charge.

Part E. The Jury’s Deliberations and Verdict

§ 36.14 CONDUCT OF THE JURY DURING DELIBERATIONS

In many jurisdictions, once the jury’s deliberations have begun, the jurors are not permitted to separate until a verdict has been reached. If a verdict cannot be reached before a normal mealtime or day’s end, deliberations may be stopped with the permission of the court, and the jury will be fed or housed under the supervision of court attendants. Although the jury is kept together during these recesses, it is not permitted to deliberate outside the jury room. There is a movement among the States to relax the requirement of sequestration during deliberations in noncapital cases (compare Fla. Rule Crim. Proc. 3.370(b), promulgated by Amendment to Rules of Criminal Procedure – Rule 3.370(b), 596 So. 2d 1036 (Fla. 1992), with Livingston v. State, 458 So. 2d 1241, 1244 (Fla. 1990)); but whereas sequestration of the jury prior to the submission of the case is an increasingly rare practice (see § 27.05(a)(1) supra), post-submission sequestration remains widespread. See Allan E. Korpela, Annot., Separation of jury in criminal case after submission of cause – modern cases, 72 A.L.R.3d 248 (1976 & Cum. Supp.). Some States that continue to require it do give the trial judge discretion to permit the jurors to go home overnight or to separate briefly for other purposes if the accused waives the right to keep the jury cloistered. See, e.g., Pope v. State, 669 So. 2d 1241, 1244 (Fla. 1990). Unless counsel has reason to worry that jurors released from confinement will be exposed to prejudicial media or social-media material or to blandishments by pro-conviction family members and acquaintances, s/he should ordinarily agree to separation of the jury. When jurors have been deliberating for a substantial length of time without returning to court, they are probably at loggerheads to some extent; a hung jury is ordinarily a significant defense victory; and captive jurors are under pressure from each other and their own everyday needs to reach a unanimous verdict.

In some jurisdictions the jury is routinely given a written copy of the court’s charge to take into the jury room; in others this procedure is permitted in the court’s discretion; elsewhere it is not permitted at all. The jurisdictions also vary on whether exhibits are sent out with the jury routinely, may be delivered to the jury room if specially requested by the jurors, or may not go to the jury room under any circumstances. See generally American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice, Commentary to Standard 15-5.1 (3d ed. 1996) (“Materials to Jury Room”). Cf. State v. Hines, 173 Wis. 2d 850, 496 N.W.2d 720 (1993) (reversing a conviction because the trial judge permitted a police report to be sent to the jury room at the request of the jurors (who had previously advised the court by eight successive notes that they could not reach a verdict) over defense counsel’s objection that the report contained inadmissible hearsay: “A trial court’s decision whether to send exhibits to the jury during deliberations is guided by three considerations: (1) whether the exhibit will aid the jury in proper consideration of the case; (2) whether a party will be unduly prejudiced by submission of the exhibit; and (3) whether the exhibit could be subjected to improper use by the jury. State v. Jensen, 147 Wis. 2d 240, 260, 432 N.W.2d 913, 921-22 (1988). ¶ The trial court erred when it did not consider these three factors before sending the exhibit to the jury” (173 Wis. 2d at 860, 496 N.W.2d at 724)).

Some courts allow the jurors during trial to take notes for use during their deliberations; others do not. See generally American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice, Commentary to Standard 15-3.5 (3d ed. 1996) (“Note Taking by Jurors”).

During their deliberations, jurors are forbidden to receive extra-record information or materials regarding the case under consideration. “Private communications, possibly prejudicial, between jurors and third persons, or witnesses, or the officer in charge, are absolutely forbidden, and invalidate the verdict, at least unless their harmlessness is made to appear.” Mattox v. United States, 146 U.S. 140 150 (1892). If counsel has a basis for believing that any juror may have been exposed to a violation of this prohibition, counsel should consider requesting a hearing at the earliest opportunity – whether before or after verdict, as soon as the ground for counsel’s belief arises – to explore whether a motion for a mistrial or (after verdict) for a new trial on the ground of jury contamination is advisable. See, e.g., Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363 (1966); Godoy v. Spearman, 861 F.3d 956 (9th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (defense counsel’s motion for a new trial – which “alleged that a juror (Juror 10) had communicated about the case while it was ongoing with a ‘Judge up North,’” and which was supported by “an uncontroverted declaration from alternate juror ‘N.L.,’ [who stated that] Juror 10 ‘kept continuous communication’ with the ‘judge friend’ ‘about the case’ and passed the judge’s responses on to the rest of the jury” (id. at 958) – should have resulted in the trial court’s presuming prejudice and conducting an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the state could show that the contact was actually harmless); Tarango v. McDaniel, 837 F.3d 936, 939-40 (9th Cir. 2016) (“[A] police vehicle followed Juror No. 2, a known holdout against a guilty verdict, for approximately seven miles, on the second day of deliberations, in a highly publicized trial involving multiple police victims. . . . ¶ We hold that the Nevada Supreme Court’s decision was contrary to Mattox . . . because the court improperly limited its inquiry to whether the external contact amounted to a ‘communication’ and did not investigate the prejudicial effect of the police tail. . . . Because the trial court prevented Tarango from offering certain evidence to demonstrate prejudice, we remand for an evidentiary hearing and further fact finding.”); Hall v. Zenk, 692 F.3d 793 (7th Cir. 2012); Barnes v. Joyner, 751 F.3d 229 (4th Cir. 2014); cf. Remmer v. United States, 347 U.S. 227 (1954); Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466 (1965). See also §§ 27.02 second paragraph, 27.05(a)(2) concluding paragraph supra. Similar procedures should be used if counsel learns about jury misconduct of the sort discussed in § 27.05(a)(2) first paragraph supra.

Following a verdict convicting the respondent on all charges, a new trial motion on grounds of jury contamination or misconduct will ordinarily be advised if there is any factual basis for it, because there is seldom any downside. If counsel learns about possible jury contamination or misconduct before verdict, on the other hand, a tactical calculus will have to inform the decision whether to move for a mistrial. Counsel needs to consider the factual and legal strengths of the claim for a mistrial that might be established at a hearing, the likelihood that the respondent will do better before a new jury than before the present jury on the record to date, and the possibility that a hearing directed at the jurors’ behavior will itself embarrass or anger them, particularly if it is impossible to conduct the hearing without revealing to the juror[s] that its impetus was a defense claim of jury misbehavior.

If the jury, after a period of deliberation, is irreconcilably divided, it is supposed to report that fact to the court. The court in its discretion may discharge the jurors or have them return to the jury room for further deliberations.

§ 36.15 JURY REQUESTS FOR SUPPLEMENTAL INFORMATION OR INSTRUCTIONS

After a jury has retired to deliberate, it may request leave of the court to return to the courtroom for a re-reading of a portion of the testimony, or for renewed examination of exhibits, or for a repetition of part or all of the court’s charge, or for further instructions on questions of law. See generally AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, STANDARDS FOR CRIMINAL JUSTICE, Commentary to Standard 15-5.2 (3d ed. 1996) (“Jury Request to Review Testimony”). The court, in its discretion, grants or denies these requests. In some jurisdictions any supplemental instructions given by the court are required to be restricted to the questions the jury has asked. See generally id., Commentary to Standard 15-5.3 (“Additional Instructions”).

Supplemental instructions are given in open court in the presence of counsel and the respondent. They are subject to the same requirements of fairness and legal adequacy as the main charge (see §§ 36.03-36.06, 36.13 supra; and see, e.g., Ardoin v. Arnold, 653 Fed. Appx. 532, 534-35, 536 (9th Cir. 2016) (summarized in § 36.02 third paragraph supra); People v. Telesford, 149 A.D.3d 170, 176-83, 49 N.Y.S.3d 414, 420-25 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2017), and counsel may object to them at sidebar after they are given. In addition to – or in lieu of – objecting, counsel may ask that additional clarifying or qualifying instructions be given. Similarly, if the jury requests a re-reading of part of the testimony, counsel may object or may ask that additional parts of the testimony be re-read. The same discretion is ordinarily afforded to the court, and the same options are ordinarily available to counsel, if the jury requests that exhibits not previously sent to the jury room be shown to them or sent out with them. Whenever a jury interrupts its deliberations to make some request of the court, counsel should be trying to fathom what the request suggests about the directions of the jury’s thinking, and counsel should respond with whatever objections or proposals for giving the jurors additional information seem likely to steer that thinking into productive defense channels.

The judge is ordinarily forbidden to send supplemental instructions or other communications or materials out to the jury, in either written or oral form, through the medium of a bailiff or other messenger. See § 27.02 second paragraph supra. The only allowable response to a jury’s request for information of any sort is to bring the jurors back into open court and deal with the matter in the presence of the respondent and counsel. In some jurisdictions this rule is so strict that it is held reversible error for a court to convey to the jury out of the presence of the parties even a brief note refusing the jury’s request for additional instructions.

Since counsel’s presence will be promptly required if the jury asks for supplemental instructions or for the reading of testimony or if the jury reports itself deadlocked, counsel should either stay in the courtroom or tell the courtroom clerk where counsel can be reached while the jury is out. Counsel should never be more than a few minutes from the courtroom without obtaining prior permission of the court. Tardiness in returning to deal with any matters that arise during the jury’s deliberations will incur the judge’s wrath.

§ 36.16 INABILITY OF THE JURY TO AGREE; THE “DYNAMITE CHARGE”

If the jury has deliberated for a considerable time and has reached no agreement, the court may call it back to the jury box and inquire about the prospects of its reaching a verdict. The judge usually asks the foreperson to state, without revealing the current vote or majority position of the jury, whether further deliberations appear likely to produce agreement or whether the jury seems firmly deadlocked. The court may also give the jury additional instructions, although no request is made by the jury for them. The jurisdictions vary widely with regard to the amount of pressure that the judge may apply to the jury at this point by way of instructions admonishing the jurors to give consideration to the reasonable views of others, and so forth. See generally American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice, Commentary to Standard 15-5.4 (3d ed. 1996) (“Length of Deliberations; Deadlocked Jury”).

The so-called “dynamite charge,” or Allen charge (after Allen v. United States, 164 U.S. 492 (1896)), is still permissible in many jurisdictions, although a number of appellate courts have come to condemn it as too strong. See generally the ABA Standards Commentary just cited; Wayne F. Foster, Annot., Instructions Urging Dissenting Jurors in State Criminal Case to Give Due Consideration to Opinion of Majority (Allen Charge) – Modern Cases, 97 A.L.R.3d 96 (1980 & Supp.). If the judge’s charge prods the jury heavily to reach a verdict and if counsel guesses that the majority of the jurors are inclined to convict, counsel should object to the charge – noting with specificity any especially coercive language (compare Jenkins v. United States, 380 U.S. 445 (1965) (per curiam), and United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 462 (1978), with Lowenfield v. Phelps, 484 U.S. 231, 237-41 (1988)) – on the ground that its effect is to deprive the respondent of the right to an “uncoerced verdict” (id. at 241 (dictum)), and thus of the respondent’s statutory right to jury trial, see § 21.01 supra, and due process right to “accurate factfinding,” McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528, 543 (1971) (plurality opinion); see § 21.01 supra. See, e.g., Smith v. Curry, 580 F.3d 1071, 1080 (9th Cir. 2009) (“An analysis of the Supreme Court’s decisions, dating back to 1896, requires us to conclude that the California Court of Appeal’s approval of the instruction in this case, directing the jurors to the evidence the judge believed supported conviction, and went into the forbidden territory of coercing a particular verdict on the basis of the judge’s selective view of the evidence”); United States v. Haynes, 729 F.3d 178, 193-94 (2d Cir. 2013) (“the modified Allen charge . . . was coercive in the circumstances and context in which it was given” because “the Court had already given a modified Allen charge” and “[r]epeating a modified Allen charge . . . could reasonably be perceived by the jurors as the Court communicating its insistence on the jury reaching a unanimous verdict”; the court’s statement that it “believe[d] that the jury would ‘arrive at a just verdict’ on Monday” could have been viewed by a reasonable juror “as lending the Court’s authority to the incorrect and coercive proposition that the only just result was a verdict”; and the judge did not give a “balancing, cautionary instruction that no juror should give up conscientiously held beliefs.

§ 36.17 MISTRIAL FOR FAILURE TO AGREE

If the court is satisfied that the jurors are unable to agree after reasonable deliberations, it may declare a mistrial and discharge the jury. Should the respondent not object to the mistrial, s/he can be tried again on the same charge. If a mistrial is declared over the objection of the respondent, s/he may challenge the propriety of the court’s action by pleading former jeopardy against a new trial. See § 17.08 supra. The validity of the double jeopardy claim will hinge on whether the court abused its considerable discretion in declaring the mistrial. See § 34.11(d)(2) supra. In United States v. Perez, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 579 (1824), the seminal case allowing retrial after the declaration of a mistrial for failure of the jury to agree, the Court cautioned that trial judges’ power to discharge the jury on this account is not unlimited. “They are to exercise a sound discretion on the subject; and . . . the power ought to be used with the greatest caution, under urgent circumstances, and for very plain and obvious causes.” Id. at 580. See United States v. Razmilovic, 507 F.3d 130 (2d Cir. 2007) (double jeopardy barred a retrial where the trial judge abused his discretion in finding prematurely that the jury was hung: “The discretion afforded a trial judge in declaring a mistrial is, of course, not boundless.” Id. at 137. “We . . . turn to the record to determine if it supports the trial judge’s conclusion that he was confronted with a genuinely deadlocked jury and, therefore, that there was a manifest necessity to declare a mistrial.” Id. “[W]e are not persuaded that the jury was genuinely deadlocked when the trial court declared a mistrial. The single piece of evidence in the record that supports the trial judge’s conclusion is the twenty-nine-word note from the jury that it was ‘at a deadlock’ and had ‘exhausted all [its] options.’ The trial judge did not discuss the extent of the deadlock referred to in the note with the members of the jury and did not ask them whether there was any chance that further deliberations might produce a verdict.” Id. at 139.); and see United States v. Castellanos, 478 F.2d 749, 752 (2d Cir. 1973) (“Had Castellanos here claimed that one or both of the mistrials were improperly declared, his double jeopardy claim would be within the analytical framework of the ‘manifest necessity’ formulation. Perez warns that such mistrials should be declared only ‘with the greatest caution . . . .’ . . . . If it appeared here that there was no ‘manifest necessity’ for the mistrials – that the trial judge acted too quickly, or that it seemed that the jury was not really deadlocked – we might well be able to hold that the Double Jeopardy Clause barred retrial.”); McDaniels v. Warden Cambridge Springs SCI, 700 Fed. Appx. 119, 121 (3d Cir. 2017) (criticizing a “trial judge [who] failed to step back and take the time necessary to ‘scrupulous[ly]’ consider whether ‘manifest necessity’ required the declaration of a mistrial” when confronted with reports from the jury which clearly indicated some inability to agree upon a verdict but left unclear whether the disagreement applied to all degrees of the offense charged).

§ 36.18 RETURN OF THE VERDICT; POLLING

The jury usually returns its verdict, that is, its finding of guilt or innocence, by the announcement of its foreperson in open court in the presence of counsel and respondent. Local practice may also call for the foreperson to endorse the verdict on the Petition, or the foreperson or all the jurors may be required to sign written verdict forms that have been sent out with the jury.

If the verdict is not guilty, the trial is concluded, the jury is dismissed, and the respondent is discharged. If the verdict is guilty, the prosecutor ordinarily requests that it be recorded. Before it is recorded, defense counsel usually has the right to poll each juror on each count of the Petition.

The crier or clerk of court commonly conducts the poll of the jury. Each count is read to each juror, and the juror is asked to state his or her verdict on it. In complicated cases involving multiple charges, defense counsel should request at sidebar that when polling the jurors, the crier should read the counts in a different order from the order in which they were originally submitted to the jury. Counsel should impress upon the court that s/he is not using this procedure as a stratagem but is requesting it because it is a more accurate method of polling than the normal one of reading all the counts in order. The latter procedure lends itself to a rote response by the jurors.

The jury is only polled on those counts on which counsel requests a poll. The poll of a jury can be interrupted by counsel’s stating that s/he is satisfied that the jury has agreed as the foreperson stated. Polling is then halted, and the verdict is recorded.

In most jurisdictions, logically inconsistent jury verdicts do not entitle an accused to a new trial or other relief as a matter of right. See, e.g., United States v. Powell, 469 U.S. 57 (1984). Compare People v. DeLee, 24 N.Y.3d 603, 608-11, 26 N.E.3d 210, 213-15, 2 N.Y.S.2d 382, 385-87 (2014) (“New York’s repugnancy jurisprudence,” which “affords defendants greater protection than the Federal Constitution requires,” provides for the alternative remedies of dismissal of the repugnant count (where the nature of the repugnancy signifies that “the jury has actually found that the defendant did not commit an essential element [of the repugnant charge], whether it be one element or all’”) or affording leave to the prosecution to initiate a new prosecution of the repugnant charge by indictment or information (“where a repugnant charge was the result, not of irrationality, but mercy”)). Even in those jurisdictions that do not provide for a remedy as a matter of right, the inconsistency of verdicts may be considered by the trial judge in exercising his or her discretion to grant a new trial in the interests of justice (see § 37.02(d) infra); and counsel who requests a new trial on this ground should urge that the jury’s conviction on counts that should not logically have been treated differently from other counts on which the jury acquitted demonstrates jury confusion, the marginal nature of the prosecution’s proof of guilt, or both.
Chapter 37

Postverdict Proceedings

§ 37.01 SCHEDULING THE DISPOSITION DATE; RESPONDENT’S DETENTION STATUS PENDING DISPOSITION

If the respondent is convicted, ordinarily the court will schedule a date for a dispositional hearing and will order the probation department to investigate the respondent’s background and prepare a report for the court’s consideration at the hearing. (This is usually called a “pre-sentence report,” “investigation and report,” or “social study.”) If the respondent is not detained pending disposition, the disposition date will be scheduled so as to give the probation department the amount of time it needs for preparation of its report—four to eight weeks in most jurisdictions. If the respondent is detained, most jurisdictions provide (by statute, court rule, or custom) for an accelerated probation investigation, and the disposition date is usually within two or three weeks. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 350.1 (2018) (disposition within 10 days if respondent is detained; within 50 days if not detained).

When the offense was relatively minor and the respondent’s prior record is not very bad, the prosecutor will often be willing to join in—or at least not oppose—a defense request to waive preparation of a pre-sentence report and for entry of an immediate disposition (see § 14.06(c)(1) supra) of probation or perhaps even a “conditional discharge” (see § 38.03(c) infra). Usually, it is in the respondent’s interest to seize the opportunity for an immediate disposition rather than take the risk that the pre-sentence report will turn up some unfavorable aspect of the respondent’s background (such as school problems that defense counsel does not know about) or indications of the respondent’s bad character (which might be simply the respondent’s “bad attitude” during the pre-sentence interview) that might lead the judge to order incarceration. The exception to this general rule is the case in which counsel’s own investigation of the child’s background and school records leaves counsel confident that the pre-sentence report will be exemplary and the juvenile code provides a basis for dismissing a Petition after conviction on the ground that the respondent is not in need of supervision, treatment, or confinement. See §§ 37.02(e), 38.17(a), 38.19 infra.

Occasionally it will be the prosecutor who requests an immediate disposition when counsel wants time to prepare for the dispositional hearing. In this situation counsel should invoke the respondent’s federal and state constitutional rights to due process and effective assistance of counsel. See § 15.02 supra.

In cases in which the disposition is not immediate, the judge ordinarily has discretion to reconsider the respondent’s detention status pending disposition. Nonetheless, in most locales it is customary simply to continue the respondent’s pretrial detention status until disposition. In jurisdictions in which reconsideration of detention is commonplace, counsel will need to be prepared to argue against detaining a previously released respondent during the pre-disposition period. The arguments are generally the same as those that would be made at a pretrial detention hearing (see §§ 4.17, 4.20-4.21 supra) with three exceptions: Counsel can obviously no longer insist that the respondent be presumed innocent of the pending charge; both the prosecutor and defense counsel will be able to draw upon the evidence that emerged at trial to support their respective positions; and defense counsel can cite the respondent’s favorable community adjustment during the pretrial period as a powerful argument against detention pending disposition.

In the case of a respondent who was detained pending trial, counsel should be alert to the possibility of seeking a reduced detention status (detention in a group home or outright release) if the respondent was convicted of a less serious offense than the Petition charged (in which case counsel can argue that the original order of detention was based on the seriousness of the top count of the Petition, of which the respondent has now been acquitted) or if the evidence that emerged at trial was not as egregious as the prosecutor claimed in seeking pretrial detention of the respondent.

§ 37.02 POST-TRIAL MOTIONS TO FILE IN CASES IN WHICH THE RESPONDENT WAS CONVICTED

Practice on post-trial motions is generally regulated by statutes or court rules, and these should be consulted. Some States have modeled their post-trial motions process upon the procedure in adult criminal cases, providing for motions for a new trial and requiring that such motions be filed within a specified time period after the finding of guilt. See, e.g., D.C. SUPER. CT. JUV. RULE 33 (2018) (motion for a new factfinding hearing within 7 days after finding of guilt except when the motion is based on newly discovered evidence, in which case the deadline is two years after judgment); FLA. RULE JUV. PROC. 8.130 (2018) (motion for rehearing within 10 days of entry of order); MINN. RULE JUV. DELINQUENCY PROC. 16.01 (2018) (motion for a new trial within 15 days after a finding that the allegations in the Petition are proved). Other jurisdictions provide in general terms for motions to modify or set aside an order of the court, see, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 778 (2018); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 355.1(1)(a) (2018); TENN. RULE JUV. PROC. 213 (2018), and these provisions are viewed as a substitute for the traditional remedy of moving for a new trial in an adult criminal case. See, e.g., In re Steven S., 91 Cal. App. 3d 604, 154 Cal. Rptr. 196 (1979) (trial court erred in denying defense counsel’s motion for a new trial because, although the juvenile code does not provide for new trial motions, counsel correctly invoked the respondent’s statutory right to modify or set aside an order of delinquency on the grounds of newly discovered evidence); cf. In re P.S.C., 143 Ga. App. 887, 240 S.E.2d 165 (1977) (juvenile code’s modification provision gave the trial judge authority to order rehearing in a proceeding to terminate parental rights).

Post-trial motions are usually required to be in writing. Even when they can be made orally, it is best to file them in writing to protect the record.

The most common grounds for moving for a new trial (or for moving to modify or set aside the order of delinquency) are (a) erroneous legal rulings in the pretrial proceedings or at trial; (b) lack of jurisdiction or other fundamental defects in the proceedings; (c) newly discovered evidence; and (d) insufficiency of the evidence or a verdict that is “against the weight of the evidence.” See, e.g., FLA. RULE JUV. PROC. 8.130(a) (2018). If, as in most jurisdictions, there is no juvenile caselaw on these grounds for a new trial, counsel will usually be able to find adult criminal caselaw that can be cited by analogy.

§ 37.02(a) Errors in the Pretrial Proceedings or the Trial

A new trial (or modification of the order of delinquency) can be requested on the grounds of legal errors in the pretrial proceedings or at trial.

Every point properly preserved by counsel at the pretrial and trial stages may be made the basis of a new-trial motion. With respect to both pretrial errors and trial errors, the motion for a new trial gives the court an opportunity to reconsider its rulings previously made throughout the proceeding. To prevail after verdict, however, the defense must show both that a pretrial or trial ruling was erroneous and that it was prejudicial – that is, that it probably affected the verdict. A less exacting showing of prejudice is required in the case of federal constitutional errors and, in some States, state constitutional errors. For these errors, a new trial must be granted unless the court is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the error was harmless. Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18 (1967); see, e.g., Yates v. Evatt, 500 U.S. 391 (1991); Sochor v. Florida, 504 U.S. 527, 540-41 (1992); Satterwhite v. Texas, 486 U.S. 249, 256-60 (1988).

Certain fundamental errors and defects not noticed prior to verdict will also ordinarily be considered and, on these points, evidence outside the record may be received. See, e.g., In the Matter of Glenn F., 117 A.D.2d 1013, 499 N.Y.S.2d 557 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 1986) (reversing an adjudication of delinquency and granting a new trial because the trial court failed to inquire whether the co-respondents knowingly and intelligently consented to joint representation by the same attorney; the new trial motion was supported by respondents’ demonstration of a significant possibility of conflict of interest). Claims in this category include: the absence of the respondent at any stage of the proceedings which s/he was entitled to attend (see § 27.01 supra); the absence of counsel and other violations of the right to counsel at any critical stage of the proceedings (see, e.g., §§ 43.03, 9.09(b)(1), 27.02 supra); and the prosecution’s use of perjured testimony, the suppression or nondisclosure of exculpatory evidence by the prosecutor or law-enforcement agents, intimidation of potential defense witnesses by the prosecutor or law-enforcement agents, and similar Due Process violations (see, e.g., §§ 8.13, 9.09(a), 9.09(b)(5), 9.09(b)(6), 31.03 supra). In a jury trial, a post-trial motion for a new trial might be based on – and evidence dehors the record could be taken – on a claim that the respondent was denied a fair trial by reason of impermissible influences upon the jury (see Remmer v. United States, 347 U.S. 227 (1954); Smith v. Phillips, 455 U.S. 209, 221 (1982) (dictum); Rushen v. Spain, 464 U.S. 114, 119-21 & n.5 (1983) (per curiam) (dictum); Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107, 117-20 (1987) (dictum)(dictum); Tarango v. McDaniel, 837 F.3d 936, 939-40 (9th Cir. 2016); and see Peña-Rodriguez v. Colorado, 137 S. Ct. 855 (2017) (explaining that although the pervasive evidentiary doctrine illustrated by Fed. Rule Evid. 606(b) and cases like Warger v. Shauers, 135 S. Ct. 521 (2014) establishes a general “no-impeachment rule,” prohibiting challenges to a jury verdict “based on the comments or conclusions [that jurors] . . . expressed during deliberations” (Peña-Rodriguez, 137 S. Ct. at 861), “the Sixth Amendment requires that the no-impeachment rule give way in order to permit the trial court to consider the evidence of . . . [a] juror’s statement and any resulting denial of the jury trial guarantee” in a case in which “a juror makes a clear statement that indicates he or she relied on racial stereotypes or animus to convict a criminal defendant” (id. at 869)); accord, Tharpe v. Sellers, 138 S. Ct. 545 (2018), because, e.g., the jury was exposed to extraneous influences, contacts, materials or information (see §§ 27.02 second paragraph, 27.05(a)(2), 36.14 fourth paragraph supra); there was misconduct on the part of the jurors themselves, either during their deliberations or at some earlier stage of the trial (see Peña-Rodriguez v. Colorado, 137 S. Ct. 855 (2017); Titus v. State, 963 P.2d 258 (Alaska 1998); see also § 27.05(a)(2) first paragraph supra; cf. Barral v. State, 131 Nev. Adv. Op. 52, 353 P.3d 1197 (2015) (holding that a failure to administer the oath to prospective jurors before voir dire constitutes structural error requiring automatic reversal)); (iii) jurors gave false or misleading information bearing on their qualifications or impartiality during voir dire or earlier jury-selection proceedings (see Williams v. True, 39 Fed. Appx. 830 (4th Cir. 2002); State v. Ess, 453 S.W.3d 196 (Mo. 2015)). In some jurisdictions, counsel and defense investigators are forbidden to interview jurors after a trial in order to develop such grounds for a new-trial motion; in other jurisdictions, counsel and defense investigators are free to conduct such interviews without leave of court; in still other jurisdictions, leave of court must be sought before any juror interviewing.

In addition to considering the claims of record error and extra-record defects summarized in the preceding paragraphs, the trial judge commonly has discretion to notice lesser errors not properly preserved. But this discretion is absolute in the sense that if the trial judge declines to notice them, neither the errors nor the judge’s refusal to hear them may be made the basis for appeal (except to the extent that a showing of arbitrary exercise of this discretion may open federal constitutional errors to review).

§ 37.02(b)  Jurisdictional and Other Fundamental Errors

The respondent is clearly entitled to the setting aside of the adjudication if: (i) the court had no jurisdiction, (ii) the charging paper failed to charge an offense, or (iii) the statute on which the prosecution was founded is unconstitutional.

§ 37.02(c)  Newly Discovered Evidence

In many jurisdictions, the time for a motion for a new trial on grounds of newly discovered evidence is longer than that for other new-trial motions. E.g., compare Fed. Rule Crim. Pro. 33(b)(1) (three-year deadline for filing a motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence) with id., Rule 33(b)(2) (14-day deadline for filing a motion for a new trial on grounds other than newly discovered evidence).
There are two time-honored tests for the sufficiency of a claim of newly discovered evidence:

(i) The first, often quoted from Larrison v. United States, 24 F.2d 82 (7th Cir. 1928), applies in recantation cases and other cases in which the adult defendant or juvenile respondent contends that a prosecution witness gave false testimony at the trial. The so-called Larrison rule requires a new trial if the court is reasonably well satisfied that the testimony given by a material prosecution witness was false, that without it the jury might have reached a different conclusion, and that the defendant or respondent either discovered the falsity of the testimony after trial or was surprised by it and unable to meet it at trial. See, e.g., United States v. Roberts, 262 F.3d 286, 293-94 (4th Cir. 2001); Durham v. State, 35 A.3d 418 (Table), 2012 WL 11617 (Del. 2012); State v. Ellington, 151 Idaho 53, 72-73, 253 P.3d 727, 746-47 (2011); Martin v. State, 865 N.W.2d 282, 290 (Minn. 2015). Compare United States v. Mitrione, 357 F.3d 712, 718 (7th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 543 U.S. 1097 (2005) (“Today, we overrule Larrison and adopt the reasonable probability test. . . . In order to win a new trial based on a claim that a government witness committed perjury, assuming as in this case that the government did not knowingly present the false testimony, defendants will have to prove the same things they are required to prove when moving for a new trial for other reasons.”), with United States v. Willis, 257 F.3d 636, 642-43 (6th Cir. 2001) (reaffirming that a circuit rule which was based on Larrison is “the appropriate test to apply . . . where a material witness testifying on behalf of the government later recants his trial testimony”).

(ii) The second test, derived from Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 511 (1851), applies in all other sorts of cases and requires (i) that the evidence relied on have come to the defendant’s or respondent’s attention since verdict, (ii) that it was not for want of due diligence that the defendant or respondent did not learn of it earlier, (iii) that it is so material that it would probably produce a different verdict on a new trial, and (iv) that it is not merely cumulative or impeaching (a requirement usually stated as independent of the materiality requirement, for reasons that are not apparent). See, e.g., United States v. Moore, 709 F.3d 287, 290-92, 293-94 (4th Cir. 2013) (the trial court abused its discretion in denying a new-trial motion based on newly discovered evidence that arrest photographs of an individual – whom the defense “pointed the finger at . . . as the more likely assailant [in the charged carjacking]” – had been misdated, enabling the prosecution to argue that this individual’s hairstyle at the time of the crime differed from the description of the assailant, when in fact they were identical); People v. Bryant, 117 A.D.3d 1586, 1586-89, 986 N.Y.S.2d 287, 287-89 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dept. 2014) (the trial court erred in denying a new-trial motion based upon newly discovered evidence of “a neighbor [of the defendant] who observed the shooting,” and who said that the shooter was “not [the] defendant,” and that the defendant “was not present at the scene of the crime”). Local variations of these rules abound, and the case law should be consulted. Cf. United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 103-04, 110-13 (1976).

§ 37.02(d) Insufficiency of the Evidence or a Verdict “Against the Weight of the Evidence”

1071
When the trial was a jury trial, the defense can move to set aside the verdict on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. A post-trial motion for a judgment of acquittal on this ground raises the same issue as a pre-verdict motion for acquittal (see §§ 35.03, 36.01 supra) – whether a reasonable juror could find that the prosecution has proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt. The motion is seldom granted, for the obvious reason that the judge denied an identical motion before verdict and feels that his or her ruling at that time has been ratified by the jury’s verdict finding the accused guilty. (In some jurisdictions a post-trial motion for acquittal must nevertheless be made because it is the precondition for challenging the sufficiency of the evidence on appeal.)

Alternatively, the defense can request a new trial on the ground that the jury’s verdict is “against the weight of the evidence.” (In some jurisdictions the motion is styled a motion for a new trial “in the interests of justice.” In others it is styled a motion for a new trial “on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence.” In the latter jurisdictions the respondent may cite “insufficiency of the evidence” as a ground for a postverdict judgment of acquittal or as a ground for a new trial; the two kinds of relief are considered alternative remedies for the same defect.) New trials on this ground are far more commonly granted than are postverdict motions for acquittal. In ruling on a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is “against the weight of the evidence,” the judge is sometimes said to sit as a “thirteenth juror” – that is, to give expression to his or her own evaluation of the evidence. See, e.g., Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31, 40-45 (1982). Matters of credibility and the cogency of inferences from circumstantial evidence are to be appraised by the judge much as the judge would appraise them in a bench trial but with considerable deference to the jury’s determination. See, e.g., United States v. Olazabal, 610 Fed. Appx. 34, 36 (2d Cir. 2015) (the district court did not abuse its discretion in granting a new trial based upon the court’s finding that “the testimony of . . . the government’s primary witness[ ] was neither complete nor credible, while Olazabal’s testimony was, by contrast, more credible”; “the District Court was fully entitled to independently assess both the credibility of witnesses and other evidence in deciding the [Fed.] Rule [Crim. Pro.] 33 motion.”); United States v. Robinson, 430 F.3d 537, 543 (2d Cir. 2005) (“Given the numerous circumstances which seriously impeached Dubery’s identification of Robinson, particularly his having twice earlier told the police that he did not know who his assailant was and the fact that he never saw Robinson with the gun, together with the paucity of other evidence implicating Robinson in the shooting, we cannot say the court abused its discretion in granting a new trial”). Less deference needs to be given to the jury if some circumstance in the selection of the jurors or in their performance at trial or in the conduct of the trial or in the jury’s verdict (such as inconsistency in the disposition of various counts) suggests that the jury may have been affected by passion or prejudice or disabled from giving entirely impartial and dispassionate consideration to the evidence by some occurrence in the course of the proceedings which, although not amounting to legal error, may have prejudiced the respondent’s case. In some jurisdictions the “interest of justice” concept gives the trial judge relatively free rein to order a new trial whenever s/he is convinced that the present trial went seriously awry for any reason. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Powell, 527 Pa. 288, 293, 590 A.2d 1240, 1242 (1991) (“This concept of ‘interest of justice’ has . . . been historically recognized as a viable ground for granting a new trial in this Commonwealth. A trial court has an ‘immemorial right to grant a new trial, whenever, in its opinion, the justice of the particular case so requires.’); State v. Herndon, 215 S.W.3d 901, 907 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007) (‘[e]ven errors that would not inevitably require reversal on appeal may form the basis for the grant of a new trial, if the trial judge concludes that the proceeding has resulted in ‘a miscarriage of justice’’).

Exculpatory matters not in the trial record that fail to meet the ordinary standards required of newly discovered evidence when a motion for a new trial is made explicitly on the latter ground (see § 37.02(c) supra) may sometimes be considered, provided that the motion is filed within the deadline for an “interest of justice” motion rather than within the longer deadline for newly-discovered-evidence motions. See Brodie v. United States, 295 F.2d 157, 159-60 (D.C. Cir. 1961) (“[T]he result reached by the Municipal Court [denying a new trial] is perhaps traceable to counsel’s misapprehension of the relief available to his client. He moved for a new trial for newly discovered evidence which put on him the burden of showing his own diligence. Under Rule 33 Fed. R. Crim. P. . . . a motion made within five days of final judgment, as distinguished from one made later but within two years, empowers the trial court to ‘grant a new trial to a defendant if required in the interest of justice.’ As we see it, the trial court’s power with respect to a motion within five days is much broader than one made later than five days but within two years relying on newly discovered evidence. . . . Plainly a later motion properly puts the movant under a heavier burden for the passage of time inevitably ripens the finality of the judgment and increases the difficulties of again proving a case. But on a motion for a new trial made within five days ‘the court sits as a thirteenth juror,’ Barron & Holtzoff, Federal Practice & Procedure § 2281 (Rules ed. 1958), and the trial court has broader powers.’

A showing of previously unpresented exculpatory matter might also be a ground for seeking a new trial following conviction in a bench trial (where judges are unlikely to grant a motion for a new trial based on the insufficiency of the evidence since the judge has already found the evidence not merely technically sufficient but convincing). Other possible grounds for requesting a second look at the prosecution’s evidentiary case on a new-trial motion after a bench trial include (i) that the judge applied an erroneous standard in appraising the evidence (see, e.g., In the Matter of Louis S., 68 A.D.2d 854, 414 N.Y.S.2d 555 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1979)), or (ii) that the judge considered evidence that should have been excluded from the determination of guilt (see, e.g., Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530 (1986) (the judge in a bench trial improperly considered a co-defendant’s confession as substantive evidence against the defendant); In the Matter of Jose R., 35 A.D.2d 972, 317 N.Y.S.2d 933 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1970) (the judge in a juvenile delinquency bench trial erroneously considered statements of the juvenile respondent that should have been suppressed on Miranda grounds)). And in a close case in which the judge who presided over a bench trial is feeling some qualms about his or her decision to convict, a motion for a new trial will provide the opportunity to reconsider.

§ 37.02(e) Motion for Dismissal in the Interests of Justice

In some jurisdictions, a statute or rule or the caselaw provides for a defense motion to dismiss a delinquency petition in the “interests of justice” (or some equivalent term like “furtherance of justice” or “social reasons”) if the respondent is not in need of court supervision. In some of these jurisdictions, such relief can be sought even after a respondent has been convicted at trial or by means of a guilty plea. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 315.2 (2018) (authorizing dismissal of a delinquency petition “in the furtherance of justice,” “at any time subsequent to the filing of the petition,” upon the court’s finding that “dismissal is required as a matter of judicial discretion” in light of “the circumstances of the crime,” “the history, character and condition of the respondent,” other statutorily enumerated factors, and any “other relevant fact[s] indicating that a finding would serve no useful purpose”); State ex rel. Juvenile Department of Multnomah County v. Dreyer, 328 Or. 332, 334, 338, 341, 976 P.2d 1123, 1125-26, 1128 (1999) (a delinquency petition can be dismissed in the furtherance of justice after adjudication even though the applicable statute “does not itself grant juvenile courts the authority to dismiss a delinquency petition after adjudication, [because] the statute establishes that the legislature contemplated that petitions might be dismissed at that stage”). Often, if the respondent was technically guilty of the offense charged but the offense was very trivial – such as a theft or “robbery” of a bag of potato chips from another child during lunch recess at school – the judge will convict the respondent but then be amenable to an immediate motion to dismiss for social reasons, especially if the child has little or no prior record. Cf. In re Deborah C., 261 A.D.2d 138, 138-39, 689 N.Y.S.2d 485, 486-87 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1999) (on appeal of convictions at trial of criminal mischief, making graffiti and possession of graffiti instruments, and a disposition of probation for a term of 18 months, the appellate court sua sponte grants dismissal of the petition in the furtherance of justice because “this matter never should have reached the dispositional stage”: the basis for the convictions was the respondent’s “scratching her little brother’s name into a subway seat with a stone while accompanied by her mother and two other young children”; this was “respondent’s first brush with the law,” she had an “essentially good school record,” and “[t]he nature of the offense, which can be attributed more than anything to the mother’s lack of supervision on the subway, is such that respondent should not be stigmatized as a juvenile delinquent because of any shortcomings of her mother and the court’s unreasonable refusal to . . . refer this matter for adjustment.”).

§ 37.03 REQUESTING THE EXPUNGEMENT OR CORRECTION OF THE RESPONDENT’S RECORD AND THE REFUND OF FEES AND COSTS IN THE EVENT OF ACQUITTAL

In some jurisdictions a statute or court rule specifically provides that in cases in which the respondent is acquitted at trial or the Petition is withdrawn prior to trial, the court’s records concerning the case and all law enforcement records (arrest reports, fingerprint records, arrest photographs) compiled in connection with the respondent’s arrest shall be expunged, either automatically or upon the respondent’s motion. See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 46b-146 (2018) (“[w]henever a child is dismissed as not delinquent . . ., all police and court records pertaining to such charge shall be ordered erased immediately, without the filing of a petition”); OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 2151.358 (2018). Even when no statute or court rule of this sort exists, the defense can seek expungement in the exercise of the court’s general equitable powers, see,

Counsel should always request expungement because the veneer of confidentiality cloaking juvenile records is easily pierced. See In re Smith, 63 Misc. 2d at 200-02, 310 N.Y.S.2d at 619-22. If a motion for expungement is denied, counsel should request that the court at least (1) direct the prosecutor to take all necessary steps to assure that the fact of the respondent’s acquittal following this arrest is noted in the records of the police and other law enforcement agencies, and (2) order the clerk of court and the probation department to note the acquittal on all court and probation records relating to the case.

When a respondent has been required to pay court fees and costs, counsel should move that they be refunded following acquittal. See Nelson v. Colorado, 137 S. Ct. 1249 (2017) (“When a criminal conviction is invalidated by a reviewing court and no retrial will occur, . . . the State [is] obliged to refund fees, court costs, and restitution exacted from the defendant upon, and as a consequence of, the conviction” (id. at 1252); acquitted respondents “have an obvious interest in regaining the money” (id. at 1255), and the state “has no interest in withholding . . . money to which the State . . . has zero claim of right” (id. at 1257).).
Chapter 38

Dispositions

Part A. Overview of the Dispositional Stage and Dispositional Options

§ 38.01 THE UNIQUE NATURE OF SENTENCING IN JUVENILE COURT; OVERVIEW OF THE CHAPTER

It is at the dispositional phase that juvenile delinquency proceedings differ most strikingly from adult criminal proceedings. The dispositional process is the stage at which the attempt is made to provide individualized justice – the rationale of juvenile court. Lawyers who represent delinquents in juvenile court cannot do an effective job without recognizing the unique features of dispositional hearings and developing strategies to maximize the possibility of a favorable outcome at the dispositional hearing.

This chapter begins by describing the role of counsel at the dispositional phase of a delinquency case (§ 38.02). It discusses the unique features of the dispositional phase and the range of dispositions available in a delinquency case (§ 38.03), then describes the procedures prior to and at the dispositional hearing (§ 38.04). Sections 38.05-38.16 describe the various things counsel should do or consider doing in preparation for the dispositional hearing. Section 38.17 presents an argument for the right to an evidentiary dispositional hearing. Sections 38.18-38.24 deal with the conduct of evidentiary dispositional hearings. Sections 38.25-38.27 deal with the conduct of non-evidentiary hearings. Finally §§ 38.28-38.29 briefly discuss actions that counsel should consider taking after a final order of disposition has been entered. (Chapter 39 discusses in greater detail post-dispositional features of delinquency practice.)

§ 38.02 THE ROLE OF COUNSEL AT DISPOSITION

As explained in § 2.03 supra, the prevailing view of counsel’s role in a delinquency case before In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), was that counsel was free to substitute his or her own wishes for the objectives of the client. The result in the dispositional phase was that an attorney could defy his or her client’s wishes and seek incarceration of the client if counsel believed that this course of action best served the client’s needs. When Gault formalized the trial phase of a delinquency case and established fundamental rules for the relationship between counsel and client in that phase, the lessons it taught necessarily carried over to the dispositional phase. As recognized in the ethical standards governing representation in delinquency cases, the only legitimate post-Gault view of the attorney-client relationship at disposition is that the client defines the objectives of representation just as s/he does throughout the earlier stages of the case. The Juvenile Justice Standards of the Institute of Judicial Administration and the American Bar Association explain:

The role of counsel at disposition is essentially the same as at earlier stages of the proceeding: to advocate, within the bounds of the law, the best outcome available under the circumstances according to the client’s view of the matter. . . . Counsel may, of course, appropriately advise a client with respect to community or correctional-therapeutic services that may be of long-term benefit; where circumstances warrant, counsel may also urge the client to accept these services or programs as part of a dispositional plan. Discharge of this counseling function must, however, be distinguished from the actual decision, which is for the client to make. Once full advice is given, the lawyer’s own opinion of the client’s needs or interests is subordinated to the client’s definition of those interests, and the lawyer-client relationship generally demands that counsel advocate the client’s desires as strenuously as possible.

IJA-ABA Joint Commission on Juvenile Justice Standards, Standards Relating to Counsel for Private Parties, Commentary to Standard 9.3(a) (1980).

§ 38.03 THE DISPOSITIONAL OPTIONS AVAILABLE IN JUVENILE COURT

§ 38.03(a) Introduction

In virtually all jurisdictions the range of alternative dispositions available to the court is extremely broad. Even after an adjudication of delinquency based on a finding that the respondent committed a serious felony, the court is empowered to dismiss the case at the dispositional phase upon a showing that the respondent does not need any services and that dismissal is consistent with the best interests of both the respondent and the community. See, e.g., State ex rel. Juvenile Department of Multnomah County v. Dreyer, 328 Or. 332, 334, 338, 341 976 P.2d 1123, 1125-26, 1128 (1999). Of course, dismissal is rare in cases in which the respondent was convicted of a serious felony.

Far more common is a disposition that leaves the respondent in his or her own community on probation. Probation itself encompasses a range of alternatives. A judge may require as little as that the respondent live at home, attend school regularly, and meet regularly with a probation officer. Or the judge may insist that while living at home, the respondent attend a program in the community (such as out-patient therapy or vocational training after school) or that the respondent participate in a residential community-based program (such as a drug rehabilitation program).

The more severe dispositional alternatives, from the respondent’s point of view, involve placement out of the community. In some States the only placement available to a respondent who is removed from the community is in the state training school. In many States, however, there are various alternatives: group foster care; work camps; private residential programs with schooling; and the state training schools, which may range from minimum to maximum security facilities.

§ 38.03(b) The Judge’s Power To Order a Specific Program
In all jurisdictions judges have the power to order that, as a condition of probation, the respondent cooperate with a particular program. If the respondent fails to comply with the rules of the program, s/he will be in violation of probation. This type of conditional probation comes very close to placing the respondent with the program. However, it is not technically a placement. Depending on the jurisdiction, the judge may not have the power to place respondents with certain programs, or the program may not be required to accept the respondent into its care. By ordering probation conditioned upon the respondent’s compliance with the rules of the program, the court can remain within the limits of its power and keep the respondent in the community. In addition, in many jurisdictions, judges do have the power to place respondents in particular facilities, at least when the facility is willing to accept the placement.

§ 38.03(c) The Range of Dispositional Alternatives

In most jurisdictions there are no formulas requiring specific sentences for adjudications of delinquency based upon particular crimes. Typically, an adjudication for any offense exposes a juvenile to an indeterminate period of incarceration that can theoretically extend to the child’s age of majority, either through an initial indeterminate sentence until the child’s age of majority or through annual extensions until that age. Commonly, a sentence of incarceration cannot be based solely upon the fact that a delinquent was convicted of violating the penal law. Rather, incarceration can be ordered only if there is both a crime and a showing that the delinquent requires treatment which must be provided in a secure facility in order to satisfy the community’s needs for protection from the offender.

Conceptually, these are the factors that set juvenile court apart from adult criminal court. Though the statutory language may differ among jurisdictions, juvenile court judges typically are required to consider the individual needs and interests of the juvenile when fashioning a final order of disposition and to design an order that is the least drastic alternative consistent with the needs and best interests of the juvenile and the needs of society.

The range of dispositional alternatives and the judge’s discretion in choosing among them are both extraordinarily broad. The array of dispositions available in most jurisdictions includes, in order of increasing severity:

1. Outright dismissal of the case without retaining jurisdiction of any kind over the respondent. Dismissal may be ordered for many reasons, including a showing that the respondent does not need or would not benefit from court intervention.

2. Probation without verdict (called by different names in different jurisdictions, including “adjournment in contemplation of dismissal,” “diversion,” and “deferred entry of judgment”). Sentencing is delayed for a specified period of time (usually six months or one year), and if the respondent remains arrest-free and complies with other court-ordered conditions throughout that period, the case is dismissed (and in many jurisdictions all court records of the case are sealed). Court-ordered conditions frequently include the requirements that the respondent attend school regularly; participate in some sort of community-based program (e.g., counseling, or alcohol or drug treatment); engage in community service or provide restitution to the complainant; and meet on a periodic basis with a probation officer or other agency official. See § 19.01 supra. See also § 14.06(b) supra. But cf. United States v. Wolf Child, 699 F.3d 1082, 1087 (9th Cir. 2012) (sentencing court’s imposition of a supervised release condition prohibiting the defendant from “residing with or being in the company of any child under the age of 18, including his own daughters, and from socializing with or dating anybody with children under the age of 18, including his fiancée, . . . unless he had prior written approval from his probation officer” violated the “fundamental right to familial association,” which is a “particularly significant liberty interest”: the imposition of such a condition required at least “special findings on the record supported by evidence in the record, that the condition is necessary for deterrence, protection of the public, or rehabilitation, and that it involves no greater deprivation of liberty than reasonably necessary”).

3. Restitution. Many jurisdictions provide for restitution as a disposition, making it either an available condition of probation (among others) or an end in itself. Restitution typically involves the respondent’s paying compensation to a victim. The compensation can take the form of monetary payments – which may extend over a period of time – or can include community work service. In several jurisdictions the juvenile statute establishes an upper limit on the amount of monetary restitution that can be ordered, and some States restrict the use of the restitution option to cases in which the respondent is above a specified age at the time of the dispositional hearing. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 353.6(1) (2018) (fines may not exceed $1,500 and may be levied only when the juvenile is at least ten years old). Cf. In re Don Mc., 344 Md. 194, 196, 202, 686 A.2d 269, 270, 273 (1996) (the trial court “abused its discretion . . . when it awarded restitution without first considering the age and circumstances of the child and in ordering restitution without providing Petitioner’s mother a meaningful opportunity to be heard”: “The plain language of the statute clearly requires that the court must first consider the age and circumstances of the child.”).

Restitution orders are subject to federal constitutional restriction under the basic principles of Due Process and Equal Protection that prohibit the incarceration of indigents in default of fines they are unable to pay (see, e.g., Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395 (1971)). The Supreme Court precedent most closely addressing this restriction involved the revocation of an adult convict’s probation for failure to make court-ordered restitutionary payments (and to pay a fine) that were included as conditions in his probationary sentence. In this setting, the Court held that the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment require that the “sentencing court . . . inquire into the reasons for the failure to pay. . . . If the probationer could not pay despite sufficient bona fide efforts to acquire the resources to do so, the court must consider alternative measures of punishment other than imprisonment” (Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660, 672-73 (1983)). See also Black v. Romano, 471 U.S. at 614-15 (discussing Bearden). State-court decisions reach the same result through an abuse-of-discretion analysis. See, e.g., State v. Chelette, 558 So. 2d 770, 771-72 (La. App. 1990) (“Despite th[e] uncontradicted evidence of defendant’s indigent status, the trial judge found defendant was willfully avoiding his restitution obligations. We find this to be an abuse of the trial court’s discretion in that the evidence shows defendant has made bona fide attempts to seek the means by which he can pay the restitution.”); State v. Spare, 374 S.C. 264, 268-71, 647 S.E.2d 706, 708-09 (S.C. App. 2007) (“the circuit court judge abused his discretion in concluding that Spare’s failure to pay restitution was willful [and revoking probation on that ground]. Based on our review of the record, we believe the judge failed to make the requisite inquiry into Spare’s ability to pay, his reasons for failing to pay, and whether his failure to pay was willful. From all indications, Spare was making progress, albeit slow, toward paying his restitution obligation.”). And if revocation is an impermissible disposition in the case of an indigent probationer who fails to make restitution through circumstances beyond his or her control, then the initial imposition of a restitutionary condition on an involuntarily impecunious respondent must be equally impermissible.

4. Conditional discharge, also known as suspended judgment. This disposition is a cross between probation and adjournment in contemplation of dismissal. During the period of the suspended judgment, which often runs for one or two years, the respondent is expected to follow rules specified in the judgment. However, the respondent usually is not under direct supervision of a probation officer. At the completion of the period, the final order adjudicating the respondent a delinquent remains intact, unlike an adjournment in contemplation of dismissal.

5. Probation. This disposition – generally available to all respondents in all cases, regardless of the type of crime that the respondent was found to have committed – is the most common disposition used in juvenile court. The typical length of probation is one or two years, depending on the jurisdiction and the gravity of the offense. In some jurisdictions the order of probation is indeterminate and extends until the respondent reaches the age of adult court jurisdiction. It is a common but not invariable practice for probation orders to contain numerous conditions, including meeting monthly with a probation officer, remaining crime-free, avoiding all use and possession of drugs and alcoholic beverages, obeying a curfew, and attending school regularly. Although a court’s power to set conditions of probation is broad, there are at least some outer boundaries. See, e.g., United States v. Sandidge, 863 F.3d 755, 757-79 (7th Cir. 2017) (the court of appeals – which had previously ruled that the district court’s “special condition [of supervised release] prohibiting ‘mood-altering substances’ was impermissibly vague and overbroad,” and remanded the case to the district court for resentencing – holds that the “revised condition[ ] of supervised release,” imposed by the district court at resentencing, which prohibited the ‘excessive use of alcohol,’ defined [by the district court] as including ‘any use of alcohol that adversely affects [the] defendant’s employment, relationships, or ability to comply with the conditions of supervision’” is impermissibly vague because it “raises concerns about fair notice to defendants trying to comply and leaves room for arbitrary enforcement by supervising agents”; the court of appeals modifies the condition by inserting the “limiting” adverb “materially” before “affects.”); United States v. Sealed Juvenile, 781 F.3d 747, 756-57 (5th Cir. 2015) (probation condition requiring a 15-year-old who was convicted of abusive sexual contact with a child below the age of 12 to seek permission from his probation officer for accessing a computer or the Internet was “unreasonably restrictive” given that “access to computers and the Internet is essential to functioning in today’s society”; United States v. Malenya, 736 F.3d 554, 559-61 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (probation conditions prohibiting the “possess[ion] or use [of] a computer or . . . access to any on-line service without the prior approval of the United States Probation Office” violated the governing statute’s requirement that “conditions of supervised release . . . ‘involve[ ] no greater deprivation of liberty than is reasonably necessary’”; “We have often noted the ubiquity of computers in modern society and their essentialness for myriad types of employment. . . . A ban on computer and internet usage, qualified only by the possibility of probation office approval, is obviously a significant deprivation of liberty.”; “It is unclear if any computer or internet restriction could be justified in Malenya’s case, but the condition in its current form is surely a greater deprivation of liberty than is reasonably necessary to achieve the goals referenced in [the statute] . . . .”); Rechenski v. Williams, 622 F.3d 315, 320, 325-32 (3d Cir. 2010) (prison’s classification of a prisoner as a sex offender and recommendation that he be enrolled in a sex offender treatment program, even though he was “never charged with, nor convicted of, a sexual offense,” violated the due process clause); United States v. Green, 618 F.3d 120, 122-24 (2d Cir. 2010) (“A condition of supervised release must provide the probationer with conditions that ‘are sufficiently clear to inform him of what conduct will result in his being returned to prison’”; “it violates due process if ‘men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application.’”; “The condition of supervised release that prohibits Green from the ‘wearing of colors, insignia, or obtaining tattoos or burn marks (including branding and scars) relative to [criminal street] gangs’ . . . does not provide Green with sufficient notice of the prohibited conduct. The range of possible gang colors is vast and indeterminate.”); People v. Bryant, 10 Cal. App. 5th 396, 398, 404, 215 Cal. Rptr. 3d 740, 741, 746 (2017) (striking down a probation condition that “required Bryant to submit to searches of text messages, emails, and photographs on any cellular phone or other electronic device in his possession or residence”; the court explains that “there is no showing of any connection between Bryant’s use of a cellular phone and criminality, past or future. Bryant was convicted of possessing a concealed weapon in a vehicle. No cellular phone or electronic device was involved in the crime and there is no evidence that Bryant would use such devices to engage in future criminal activity. . . . Nor was there any showing as to how the search condition would reasonably prevent any future crime or aid in Bryant’s rehabilitation.”); In re Edward B., 10 Cal. App. 5th 1228, 1231, 1236, 217 Cal. Rptr. 3d 225, 228, 232 (2017) (invalidating a probation condition that prohibited the defendant from “associating with known gang members and gang associates”; the court explains that although “Edward is well advised to keep his distance from gang members and gang associates,” the record does not show “a reasonable connection between the condition and the offense or between the condition and future criminality. . . . Any connection between Edward’s offense [grand theft from the person] and gang activity is speculation. And in the absence of evidence of gang affiliation or association with gang members or risk of gang involvement on Edward’s part, the gang condition is not tailored to his future criminality.”); People v. Martin, 51 Cal. 4th 75, 82, 244 P.3d 496, 500, 119 Cal. Rptr. 3d 99, 104 (2010) (“when under a plea agreement a defendant pleads guilty to one or more charges in exchange for dismissal of one or more charges, the trial court cannot, in placing the defendant on probation, impose conditions that are based solely on the dismissed charge or charges unless the defendant agreed to them or unless there is a ‘transactional’ relationship between the charge or charges to which the defendant pled and the facts of the dismissed charge or charges”); State v. Doe, 149 Idaho 353, 360, 233 P.3d 1275, 1282 (2010) (magistrate judge’s order that juvenile respondent’s parents “undergo urinalysis testing as a condition of their daughter’s juvenile probation” “constituted a search under the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution that is presumptively invalid absent a warrant”); N.L. v. State, 989 N.E.2d 773, 776 (Ind. 2013) (“a juvenile may only be ordered to register as a sex offender if, after an evidentiary hearing, the trial court expressly finds by clear and convincing evidence that the juvenile is likely to commit another sex offense”). See also Packingham v. North Carolina, 137 S. Ct. 1730 (2017) (striking down, on First Amendment grounds, a state statute that made “it a felony for a registered sex offender to gain access to a number of websites, including commonplace social media websites like Facebook and Twitter” (id. at 1733); the Court explains that the statutory prohibition “from using these websites . . . bars access to what for many are the principal sources for knowing current events, checking ads for employment, speaking and listening in the modern public square, and otherwise exploring the vast realms of human thought and knowledge,” and that “[e]ven convicted criminals – and in some instances especially convicted criminals – might receive legitimate benefits from these means for access to the world of ideas, in particular if they seek to reform and to pursue lawful and rewarding lives.” (id. at 1737)); Paroline v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1710, 1726 (2014) (dictum) (restitution orders in criminal cases may come “within the purview of the Excessive Fines Clause”).

6. Prison without walls. A relatively new form of final order of disposition is to confine the respondent to his or her home, usually with the aid of electronic devices, for a specified period of time, such as weekends.

7. Placement in a group home. The least intrusive form of disposition that removes a respondent from his or her home is placement in a community-based group home. These placements often allow the respondent to attend his or her regular school and to remain in close proximity to family and friends. The group home may be state-run or may be operated by a private child-care agency.

8. Indeterminate placement in a private residential facility. There are many alternatives to state-run residential institutions. In every jurisdiction there exist first-rate private residential facilities that at least occasionally accept court-ordered placements of delinquents. Some jurisdictions also permit juveniles to be placed in out-of-state facilities. Private residential facilities usually have greater resources than their state-run counterparts; they are often able to provide the respondent with more help; the conditions under which residents live are usually less harsh and restrictive; and private facilities tend to keep juveniles in their care for less time (often under one year). Placements in private facilities typically are for indeterminate periods, leaving the time of release to the discretion of the administrators.

9. Indeterminate placement in a state-run non-secure or minimum security juvenile facility. In most jurisdictions a sentence of incarceration (called “placement” in some jurisdictions and “commitment” in others) is an indeterminate sentence limited, in theory, only by the respondent’s age of majority. In other jurisdictions it is an indeterminate sentence of up to 18 or 24 months that can, in theory, be extended annually until the respondent’s age of majority. Once the court has imposed the indeterminate sentence, custody of the respondent is transferred to the state agency that administers juvenile placement facilities. In most jurisdictions the agency thereafter determines the respondent’s release date on the basis of his or her behavior within the institution and his or her prior juvenile court record. In these jurisdictions the judge has no power over the length of sentence that the respondent actually receives. As a practical matter almost all incarcerated juveniles are released by the state-run facility within 12 or 18 months. All jurisdictions maintain a range of facilities from minimum to maximum security. In most jurisdictions the choice of facility to which the respondent will be sent rests with the agency administration. In some jurisdictions the sentencing judge can exercise some control over the choice of the facility.

1082

10. Indeterminate placement in a state-run secure or maximum security juvenile facility. Maximum security facilities constrain the respondent’s freedom of movement within the facility to a far greater degree than other facilities. Juveniles placed in maximum security facilities are also likely to remain incarcerated longer than juveniles kept in less secure facilities.

11. Determinate placement in a state-run juvenile facility. A few jurisdictions authorize or require that the respondent receive a determinate sentence or a placement in a facility for a mandatory minimum period of time. These sentences are usually reserved for juveniles who are adjudicated delinquent for committing very serious felonies or for juveniles who have an extensive record of delinquency adjudications. Determinate placements almost always are in maximum security facilities, at least for a portion of the placement period, after which a transfer to a less restrictive facility may be possible.

12. Incarceration in a state-run adult facility. In a few jurisdictions respondents adjudicated delinquent by the juvenile court may end up in adult prisons. This may occur either because the respondent is committed directly to the adult facility by the juvenile court or because the respondent is sentenced by the juvenile court to a term that extends beyond the age at which state-run juvenile facilities may no longer keep minors, and the respondent is transferred to prison upon reaching this maximum age.

§ 38.04 PROCEDURES PRIOR TO AND AT DISPOSITION

§ 38.04(a) The Role of the Probation Department; The Nature and Functions of the Pre-Sentence Report

In most jurisdictions once the respondent has been found to have committed a crime, the probation department will be directed to prepare and submit a report to the judge to be considered when the judge makes the final order of disposition. This report, sometimes called a “pre-sentence report,” an “investigation and report,” or a “social study,” usually will be written by a probation officer assigned to the case by the court or by the probation department. In some jurisdictions the prosecuting agency will recommend a disposition, either by itself or in addition to the probation department.

The probation officer’s report is frequently the most important influence at the dispositional hearing. It is a report on the crime and on the background of the respondent. The report will typically include a description of the facts of the present offense (and, in some jurisdictions, a “victim impact statement”); descriptions of the respondent’s prior record, of the respondent’s attendance and behavior at school, of the respondent’s conduct at home as described by the parent, and of the respondent’s use of alcohol or drugs; the probation officer’s assessment of whether the respondent is remorseful for having committed the crime (including observations about the respondent’s attitude and behavior since arrest); a description of all previous efforts to provide the respondent with services (including the respondent’s placement history and involvement in any community-based programs); a diagnosis of the respondent’s needs; and the probation officer’s recommendation of the most appropriate disposition for the respondent. Although the judge is not obliged to accept the recommendation of the probation department (or the prosecuting agency, if that agency is responsible for making a recommendation), a favorable recommendation is enormously helpful to the respondent, and an unfavorable recommendation is often difficult for the respondent to overcome.

§ 38.04(b) Other Diagnostic and Evaluative Material

In many jurisdictions it is common to order a mental health examination (which may consist of a psychological examination, a psychiatric examination, or both) whenever a placement is being considered. Typically, the mental health expert writes a report on the basis of a 30-to-45 minute interview of the respondent and a review of court-related information about the respondent. This report may be relied upon by the probation officer when making his or her dispositional recommendation, and the report itself is ordinarily submitted directly to the judge for consideration at the dispositional hearing. Reports by mental health experts frequently are also sent to agencies that may be considering accepting the respondent into their facilities.

Other tests, including medical and educational testing, may be ordered for the respondent. These would rarely be ordered without special reasons; often it is counsel for the respondent who requests additional tests.

§ 38.04(c) The Nature of the Dispositional Hearing

Depending on the jurisdiction, the dispositional hearing will be conducted either as a full evidentiary hearing with sworn testimony or as a non-evidentiary hearing similar in many respects to an adult sentencing hearing. In jurisdictions in which an evidentiary hearing is conducted, either the probation department or the prosecuting agency will begin the hearing by recommending a particular order of disposition and will then support that recommendation with evidence. In a non-evidentiary hearing the probation department or the prosecuting agency will submit a written or oral recommendation that it will support by argument but not necessarily by Part B. Preparing for Disposition

§ 38.05 COUNSELING THE RESPONDENT AND HIS OR HER PARENT AND ADVISING THEM HOW TO BEHAVE DURING THE DISPOSITIONAL PROCESS

§ 38.05(a) Counseling and Conferring with the Respondent

It is very important that counsel carefully and fully explain to the respondent the proceedings that follow an adjudication of delinquency. Respondents must be made aware of the possible dispositions that can be ordered and of the process by which the choice among them will be made. Counsel should emphasize the need to keep all appointments and to cooperate with the probation department.

Counsel should advise the respondent that everything s/he says to the probation officer and other court personnel who may interview him or her during the dispositional process will probably find its way into the probation report and will be used against the respondent if it is unfavorable. Respondents should be informed that probation officers are often interested in a respondent’s expression of remorse. Continued protestations of innocence or signs of arrogance or hostility toward the victim or the authorities can be extremely damaging. But cf. State v. Burgess, 156 N.H. 746, 759-60, 943 A.2d 727, 737-38 (2008) (“where a defendant maintains his innocence throughout the criminal process,” “denying a defendant leniency [at sentencing] simply because he fails to speak and express remorse [at sentencing] is equivalent to penalizing him for exercising his right to remain silent” to avoid “jeopardizing his post-trial rights,” and thus would violate state constitution’s Privilege Against Self-Incrimination); Johnson v. Fabian, 735 N.W.2d 295, 297, 310-12 (Minn. 2007) (“extension of . . . [prison] inmates’ periods of incarceration as a disciplinary sanction for refusal to admit or discuss the inmates’ crimes of conviction in a sex offender program” violates the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination if “a direct appeal of th[e] . . . conviction is pending, or as long as the time for direct appeal of that conviction has not expired” or if the admission would contradict the defendant’s testimony at trial and thereby expose the defendant to the risk of prosecution for perjury); State v. Washington, 832 N.W.2d 650, 652, 661-62 (Iowa 2013) (sentencing judge violated the defendant’s Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Self-Incrimination by imposing a term of community service far higher than what the State had recommended in the plea agreement after the defendant invoked his right to silence instead of answering the judge’s question whether the defendant “would be ‘clean or dirty’ if he took a drug test”). Both probation officers and mental health personnel are likely to inquire into other criminal activity by the respondent. Rarely will the respondent help himself or herself by informing those officials about crimes s/he has committed. Similarly, probation officers and mental health personnel routinely inquire about drug and alcohol use. The respondent should be made aware that admitting such use will often have a harmful effect upon the final disposition. In general, counsel wants to emphasize the enormous influence that the probation department’s recommendation can have on the judge, so as to put the respondent in the right frame of mind when s/he meets with the probation officer or other court personnel.

In addition to advising the respondent about the mechanics of the dispositional process, counsel must also discuss the likely outcome of the case and the goals that the defense should seek to attain at the dispositional stage. As at the trial stage, this does not mean merely asking the respondent, “What do you want?” Lawyers, possessed as they are with knowledge and experience of the system, must provide their clients with the information that the client needs in order to make intelligent decisions. Lawyers must tell their clients what lies ahead in the process, what are the realistic chances of success of various arguments, and what, in the lawyer’s opinion, will be the most effective argument to make. Lawyers also have an important function in helping the client to sort out and think through the client’s objectives. However, counseling of these kinds must be done in a way that minimizes the risk of the lawyer’s taking decision-making out of the client’s hands. Lawyers representing young people possess vast influence and can inadvertently (or deliberately) manipulate their clients toward the result the lawyer wants. It is important for counsel to recognize this reality and to make every effort not to control the respondent when giving advice.

After a first meeting or series of meetings to discuss dispositional alternatives with the respondent, counsel will begin taking steps to secure the disposition that the respondent seeks. However, there may come a time when it is apparent that the respondent’s preferred disposition is unobtainable. For example, the probation officer may oppose this disposition for reasons that are likely to prove persuasive to the court, and counsel may be finding it impossible to develop any credible dispositional plan that will meet the probation officer’s concerns. This impossibility is often the result of failure to locate a suitable facility into which the respondent can be placed or of failure to find sufficient support for the respondent in the community to enable counsel to develop a positive image of the respondent for sentencing purposes. In these situations counsel should meet again with the respondent and discuss probable outcomes of the case. After devoting substantial efforts to the preparation of the case for disposition, counsel is in a position to ask the respondent to reconsider his or her dispositional goals.

This process may lead the respondent to develop new goals. Often, juveniles are rejected from facilities or programs that are potential alternatives to state-run residential institutions only because the juvenile has neglected to keep an appointment for an admission interview or has displayed a bad attitude in the interview. Sometimes in the light of the awareness that a commitment to a state training school is virtually certain unless the respondent works hard to avoid it, s/he will cooperate in keeping appointments and will improve his or her attitudes when interviewing the personnel of any remaining alternative facilities which counsel may be able to identify.

§ 38.05(b) Discussions with the Respondent’s Parent or Guardian

It is also critically important to speak with the respondent’s parent before any meetings that the parent may have with the probation officer or other court personnel, such as mental health experts. Counsel should ascertain from the parent what disposition s/he hopes the court will order. Different strategies are required depending on the answer to this question.

If the parent desires the least restrictive disposition possible, then the parent is already allied with the respondent and counsel, and the parent can be made a full member of the team. In this situation counsel should give the parent the same advice that is recommended in § 38.05(a) supra. The parent should be informed of the harm that can be done by revealing any criminal activities, drug or alcohol use, serious misbehavior at home, or other bad conduct of the respondent to the probation officer and other court personnel unless the parent is sure that they are already aware of this information. The parent should be informed of the procedures that lie ahead in the dispositional process and of the importance of the respondent’s cooperating and maintaining good relations with the probation officer and other court personnel.

It is important for the parent to understand both the influence that the probation recommendation will likely have on the final outcome of the case and the influence that the parent can have on the recommendation made by the probation department. If the parent is properly instructed about the importance of cooperating with probation authorities, of demonstrating a concern for the respondent and a willingness to be attentive to the respondent’s needs, and of supporting the respondent by reporting favorable information about him or her, the parent is most likely to be an asset in obtaining a favorable disposition. In addition, the parent will be able to influence the respondent to cooperate during the dispositional process.

If the parent is not already on the respondent’s side but desires placement or some form of punishment for the respondent, counsel should not be quite as forthcoming with the parent and cannot treat the parent as an ally. But neither should counsel accept the parent’s goal on its face. Counsel is free to, and should make every effort to, persuade the parent to support the least restrictive disposition feasible. This can sometimes be accomplished by informing the parent of the many alternatives to placement available in the community and the many ways the respondent can be supervised and helped without the necessity of a placement out of the home. Counsel should also consider the strategies recommended in § 3.21 supra, which discusses ways to persuade parents to support the release of a respondent who is being held at the precinct. One effective strategy is to inform the parent about known abuses in juvenile facilities and the existence of any lawsuits brought by inmates or former inmates seeking redress for injuries they received while in placement. Counsel is acting responsibly by truthfully telling a parent negative information which the parent does not know so that the parent’s final view of what is the most appropriate disposition for his or her child is truly an informed decision.

§ 38.06 MEETING WITH PROBATION OFFICERS AND OTHER COURT PERSONNEL BEFORE THEY PREPARE DISPOSITIONAL REPORTS

Counsel should play an active role in the pre-dispositional process described in §§ 38.04(a)-38.04(b) supra. In many jurisdictions the individuals most likely to affect the final disposition are the probation officer and the psychiatrist or psychologist (if either or both of these types of mental health experts are used) who will evaluate the respondent and provide a recommendation and report to the court.

The probation officer will always meet with the respondent and his or her parent for a personal interview. This interview is often a major factor in the probation officer’s final recommendation. It can be very useful for counsel to meet with the probation officer before s/he conducts this interview. Counsel should bring to the probation officer’s attention all favorable information about the respondent that s/he likely does not know. Ideally, counsel may be able to influence the officer’s ultimate recommendation. Even if counsel has no new information, counsel may be able to get the probation officer to think about the respondent in a new light by informally advocating a favorable perspective (“Considering the problems this kid has had, I think s/he’s really made a terrific adjustment, don’t you?”).

Similarly, counsel should try to speak to the mental health expert who is scheduled to do an evaluation before s/he interviews the respondent. Much of an evaluating expert’s recommendation will be based on the expert’s interpretation of the respondent’s attitude during this 30-to-45-minute interview. It is a truism that one’s biases affect his or her judgment. If the only people with whom the evaluating expert has spoken before the interview are the prosecutor and the probation officer, there is a risk that the expert will have fixed negative ideas about the respondent which will color the evaluation process. Although counsel cannot completely avert the risk of negative bias, a meeting at which counsel reveals favorable things about the respondent before the expert first sees the respondent may be quite useful.

§ 38.07 DEALING WITH COURT MENTAL HEALTH PERSONNEL

As discussed in §§ 12.15(a) and 13.14 supra, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the Fifth Amendment forbids a state-hired psychiatrist to interview an accused person and obtain information to be used at a sentencing hearing unless the accused has validly waived his or her privilege against self-incrimination. Failure to give the accused a Miranda warning and to obtain a waiver of the right to remain silent renders the interview results inadmissible for Smith has been held to apply to juvenile court proceedings. See, e.g., In the Matter of the 1984); In the Matter of J.S.S., 20 S.W.2d 837, 844-47 (Tex. App. 2000); State v. Diaz-Cardona, respondent has the right to claim the Fifth Amendment and refuse to talk to a psychiatrist in any court-ordered mental examination if the results of the examination could be used to support a more restrictive disposition than the respondent might receive without them. The difficult question is whether counsel should advise a respondent to assert the Fifth Amendment privilege and decline to be interviewed by a state-hired expert in preparation for the dispositional hearing.

In some jurisdictions juvenile court judges routinely order a psychiatric or psychological examination or both whenever placement is likely. In other jurisdictions examinations are ordered only in special cases or on request of the respondent. Counsel should always inform the respondent of his or her right not to answer questions at any examination, but it may be poor advice to recommend that s/he exercise that right and remain silent.

In most jurisdictions neither the examination results nor any particular findings that might be based upon them are a precondition to imposing the maximum authorized sentence. The judge uses the examination results in deciding whether or not to impose a restrictive sentence, but s/he ordinarily has the power to impose the same sentence without any psychiatric or psychological results. In these circumstances it becomes a pertinent consideration that the respondent’s assertion of the right to remain silent will typically be seen by the judge as an indication of non-cooperation and evidence of a lack of contriteness. Although it would violate the Fifth Amendment for the probation officer, prosecutor, or judge explicitly to treat the invocation of a constitutional privilege as a ground for viewing the respondent negatively, many probation officers and judges will implicitly do so. Counsel may thus prefer to advise the respondent to cooperate fully with the state-hired expert. If counsel does give this advice, counsel should prepare the respondent thoroughly for the expert’s questions, informing the respondent that the expert often will be looking for expressions of contrition and remorse and that admissions to the expert of additional criminal activity, drug or alcohol use, or other misbehavior by the respondent may hurt the respondent unless these are already known to the authorities. See § 38.05(a) supra.

In jurisdictions in which specific findings that may be based upon an expert’s report are necessary to enhance a sentence, it may be beneficial to the respondent to remain silent during the expert’s examination. Even here, however, the respondent’s failure to cooperate may hurt. If the expert is unable to conduct an interview, s/he may not be able to submit a report or to testify at the dispositional hearing on the basis of direct impressions obtained during the examination. But s/he may nonetheless be able to submit a negative report based on the respondent’s history and background – information that the expert has received from the probation department and court records. Since the expert will almost certainly regard the respondent’s invocation of the Fifth Amendment as a sign of non-cooperation, the expert will hardly be in a favorable frame of mind when writing his or her report.

It is clear under Smith that the respondent may waive the Fifth Amendment privilege and agree to an examination. The waiver may be explicit, given in response to questions put by the expert. A waiver may also be inherent in a request by the respondent for an examination by a state-hired expert. In the wake of Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402 (1987), it is unclear whether the respondent’s request for a court-appointed defense expert under Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985) (see § 38.09 infra), constitutes a waiver of the privilege not to undergo examination by a state-hired expert. The analysis in § 12.15(a) supra supports the conclusion that merely requesting the expert is not a waiver and that the respondent would have to introduce evidence based on the defense expert’s examination or otherwise rely affirmatively upon the results of that examination in conducting the dispositional hearing in order for a court to find that the respondent has waived the Fifth Amendment privilege.

Many of the issues raised by Smith have not yet been settled as they apply to the dispositional phase of delinquency proceedings. In fact, many juvenile court personnel are unaware of Smith and its implications for juvenile court practice. For this reason, counsel may be able to take a wait-and-see approach. It is rare for a court-ordered expert to advise a respondent of any rights before or during an examination. The failure to obtain an explicit waiver of rights is a violation of Smith, and counsel may prefer to read the report before deciding whether to move to suppress it or whether to allow it to be used without objection at the dispositional hearing.

§ 38.08 OBTAINING A COPY OF THE PRE-SENTENCE REPORT AND OTHER REPORTS AND RECORDS FOR USE AT DISPOSITION

The most important document that will be considered by the judge at the dispositional hearing is the probation officer’s report, described in § 38.04(a) supra. It is critical that counsel obtain this report in advance of the dispositional hearing. Counsel should also make an effort to obtain any other reports about the respondent that are likely to be introduced at the hearing. See § 38.04(b) supra.

Several jurisdictions entitle the respondent to this information by statute. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 351.1(5)(a) (2018) (requiring all diagnostic assessments and probation investigation reports to be made available for copying and inspection at least five days before the dispositional hearing). In other jurisdictions case law recognizes a right to discovery of the information. See, e.g., J. B. v. State, 418 So. 2d 423 (Fla. App. 1982).

Even when the jurisdiction does not have a clear rule granting the respondent access to probation and other pre-dispositional reports, counsel should try to obtain them by informally asking the probation officer in charge of the case to share them. Many probation officers will give information to counsel informally. But there may be disadvantages to getting it this way. When a probation officer has shared information with counsel in contravention of law, the lawyer cannot reveal in court, without endangering his or her relationship with the probation officer, that s/he obtained the records prior to the hearing.

If counsel is unable to obtain the reports informally or thinks it unwise to do so, counsel should make a motion for an order of the court requiring their disclosure. The motion should include an argument that failure to disclose the reports to the defense before the hearing will violate the respondent’s right to effective assistance of counsel, since an essential part of that right is the capacity to prepare. See, e.g., In the Matter of Jose D., 66 N.Y.2d 638, 485 N.E.2d

1090
In addition, counsel should argue that allowing access to the reports before the hearing will promote judicial efficiency by avoiding the need for a continuance and a second hearing date if information revealed at the hearing surprises the defense. A motion is necessary in order to make an adequate record for appeal in the event of an unfavorable disposition in a case in which counsel was unable to obtain timely access to reports used in the dispositional process. See, e.g., J.B. v. State, 418 So. 2d at 424.

In addition to obtaining the reports, counsel should subpoena all records bearing on the respondent that counsel will want to examine in preparation for the hearing. School records, child care program records and other records relating to the respondent that counsel has not previously inspected should be obtained in advance of the hearing.

If the respondent is or has been in special education, counsel should seek to obtain all school records concerning the respondent’s placement in special education. These include the Individual Educational Placement (IEP) that must be developed for each student in special education and the clinical material developed for or by the Committee on Special Education, which is the entity that must recommend the particular educational placement appropriate for each student. These records are not necessarily kept in the local school attended by the respondent but may be in the district school building or some centralized facility. They often contain information about the respondent and his or her needs that is highly useful at the dispositional hearing.

Because the respondent’s educational records, unlike the mental health and probation reports prepared for the dispositional hearing, are not in the possession of court personnel, a motion is not the appropriate procedure for obtaining them. Rather, counsel should have the respondent and the parent(s) execute a release of the records (see § 5.11 supra) and should secure a subpoena duces tecum addressed to their custodians (see § 8.17 supra).

School records and reports prepared by probation officers, psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers form the basis for much of the information that will be before the court at the dispositional hearing. Counsel should review these materials with care, take notes on what is in them, and find out the meaning behind any term or diagnosis with which counsel is unfamiliar.

§ 38.09 SECURING PSYCHOLOGICAL EVALUATIONS AND OTHER ASSESSMENTS OF THE RESPONDENT

Planning and preparing for a possible dispositional hearing should begin when the lawyer first meets the respondent. As discussed in § 5.08 supra, information about the respondent’s social history – for example, whether s/he ever lived or was placed outside of his or her family’s home – is important to have at the outset of a case. This information will alert counsel to areas in which additional evaluative material would be useful in the event that the case ever reaches a dispositional hearing. By focusing early on the possibility of a future dispositional hearing, counsel is able to request the independent social history workups and psychological or Psychiatric evaluations that are often essential to counteract negative reports and assessments that are made by court personnel.

In preparation for the dispositional hearing, counsel may wish to have the respondent evaluated by a defense expert either to prove that the respondent has no need for supervision or (more often) to demonstrate with precision the particular needs that the respondent does have. If counsel lacks funds to hire an expert, s/he should request them from the court under Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985). See §§ 11.03(a), 13.06 supra. The utility of hiring a defense expert is that his or her evaluation is protected by the respondent’s attorney-client privilege, see, e.g., People v. Lines, 13 Cal. 3d 500, 507-16, 531 P.2d 793, 797-804, 119 Cal. Rptr. 225, 229-36 (1975), and counsel has the option of ignoring any unfavorable results without the prosecutor or the court learning about them. To preserve this option, counsel should be sure that both the motion for funds and counsel’s retainer agreement with the expert specify that the expert is being retained “as a defense consultant, to examine the respondent and advise counsel regarding the respondent’s mental state for the purpose of assisting counsel to prepare for the dispositional hearing and to present information at the hearing if this is warranted by the respondent’s needs.” In some jurisdictions, communications to and from an expert retained unconditionally to testify or to report to the court on the respondent’s behalf would not be protected by the privilege.

In selecting an expert for a particular case, counsel is well advised to consult other defense lawyers who have experience in juvenile court and, ideally, who are familiar with the judge before whom the respondent’s case is scheduled. Some judges are more or less impressed with specific fields of expertise, such as psychology or psychiatry, and more or less impressed with individual experts who have been to court in the past. Sometimes personnel of the probation department or the clerk’s office are able and willing to tell counsel the names of experts whom a particular judge repeatedly appoints as a court’s witness or consultant when a “neutral” or “impartial” expert is desired; these experts will obviously have a credibility edge with the judge; but counsel should check them out with experienced defense lawyers, if possible, because some of them may be unsympathetic to respondents or prone to recommend restrictive dispositions.

Counsel might also consider consulting a faculty member of a university psychiatry or psychology department to obtain a list of qualified experts. Depending on the purpose for the use of the expert, counsel may prefer a psychiatrist over a psychologist or vice versa. As noted in § 12.10 supra, as a general rule psychologists tend to go deeper into the respondent’s family history, social background, and emotional problems than many psychiatrists. However, this general rule should not dictate an undiscriminating preference for psychologists over psychiatrists. In certain cases a psychiatrist may be more useful to the defense, and in all cases the knowledge and experience of the particular expert should be considered. For example, when counsel wishes to develop evidence that the respondent has specific needs and that, in the light of those needs, a particular type of dispositional alternative or a particular placement is appropriate, the expert’s knowledge of available programs and their capacities to serve the respondent’s needs should be the most important criterion in selecting the expert.
When retaining an expert, counsel should explain to the expert precisely what counsel’s game plan is and what role counsel hopes the expert will be able to serve. Although the expert’s informed views after examining the respondent will refine this plan and may sometimes require its modification, counsel’s purposes in consulting the expert should nevertheless be made clear at the outset. An initial discussion of these purposes may lead counsel to conclude that the particular expert should not be retained. And if the expert is retained, s/he will be in the best position to assist the defense after being given a clear picture of what the defense is seeking to achieve in the dispositional phase.

§ 38.10 ENGAGING A SOCIAL WORKER

Often the most important resource for the respondent in developing a dispositional alternative that the court is likely to accept is a trained and knowledgeable social worker. The job requires an extensive knowledge of programs and services that few lawyers possess, and even for an unusually well-informed lawyer it is extremely time consuming without a social worker’s help. If counsel works in a public defender office that has social workers on its staff, counsel should request their assistance shortly after meeting with the client to discuss the disposition.

Counsel who is not so fortunate as to have recourse to a staff social worker should consider retaining one for the particular case. If counsel is assigned, s/he should consider making a motion for court funds to employ a social worker as a defense consultant. The motion should be supported by an affidavit explaining the reasons that counsel requires expert assistance. The same principles that warrant the allowance of funds to hire other experts, such as psychiatrists, apply to social workers. See §§ 11.03(a), 13.06, and 38.09 supra.

In some localities there are organizations dedicated to finding and developing alternatives to institutionalization or prison. If there is such an organization in the vicinity, it will probably be worth calling to find out whether it has a social worker on its staff who is able to become involved in the case or whether it can recommend a suitable social worker.

In a community in which the local public defender office has social workers on its staff, counsel may wish to request their assistance even if s/he is not affiliated with that office. At the least, these social workers may be willing to share their knowledge of available programs and of names and telephone numbers of people to call for information. Their tips can be extraordinarily helpful when counsel is not conversant with the full range of programs and services that might enter into a dispositional plan in any particular case.

§ 38.11 GATHERING MITIGATION WITNESSES, LETTERS OF SUPPORT, AND EXHIBITS

Counsel should endeavor to interview people who know the respondent and are in a position to testify to the respondent’s good character or capacity to benefit from a community-based program – teachers, social workers, program counselors, coaches, employers, ministers, adult friends, and neighbors. Those who have favorable things to say about the respondent and who are likely to make a good impression on the probation department and the court should be asked and assisted to write letters setting out their positive comments. These letters can first be drafted by counsel on the basis of counsel’s interview notes and then sent to the witness for review and further input. If the witness uses personal stationery, s/he should write the final version up on that; or if s/he uses business or official stationery, counsel or the witness should arrange to have the final version typed on the witness’s letterhead for the witness to sign. Whenever possible, counsel should assist the witness to shape the letter so that the witness’s contribution to the case fits into the overall pattern that counsel is attempting to develop for the court.

Occasionally, witnesses are reluctant to provide information or to have their views reduced to writing because of institutional prohibitions: for example, a teacher or a coach may be told by a principal that s/he cannot become involved. Counsel should speak directly with the official who has forbidden the witness to cooperate and, if this does not solve the problem, counsel should speak with the official’s hierarchical superior. Most officials will come around and permit an employee to cooperate once they are confronted by a lawyer who informs them in an amiable but obviously determined manner, first, that all that is required of the witness is the writing and signing of a letter, not losing a day of work by coming to court; second, that the witness’s information is important because the respondent’s liberty is at stake; and third, that counsel hopes it will not be necessary to call the court’s attention to the official’s interference with the collection of evidence needed in a judicial proceeding.

Letters of support can be extremely helpful to the respondent. Shared with the probation officer while s/he is still writing his or her report, they may acquaint the officer with favorable aspects of the respondent’s background and activities about which s/he was unaware and may make the difference between a recommendation of probation and a recommendation of placement. The letters may also be presented directly to the court either as formal exhibits offered in evidence at an evidentiary hearing (see § 38.22 infra) or as attachments to the respondent’s sentencing memorandum in a jurisdiction that conducts non-evidentiary dispositional hearings (see § 38.25 infra).

Counsel should collect other types of exhibits as well. School and institutional records (§ 38.08 supra) and, when appropriate, reports by a social worker (§ 38.10 supra), psychiatrist or psychologist (§ 38.09 supra) should be kept in the file for potential use as exhibits. Counsel should be creative in gathering exhibits. S/he should consider, for example, using trophies, honors, and awards that the respondent has won, team photographs and news photos or snapshots of the respondent in activities, certificates of academic or other achievement, and items the respondent has made that demonstrate his or her artistic talents. The idea is to present the respondent to the probation officer or judge in a different and more favorable light than that in which the respondent would appear if viewed only as a convicted delinquent.

§ 38.12 MEETING WITH PROBATION OFFICERS AND OTHER COURT

1094
PERSONNEL AFTER THEIR DISPOSITIONAL REPORTS ARE WRITTEN

In addition to meeting with the probation officer, court experts, and other evaluating personnel before their work is begun, counsel should try to meet with these individuals again after their reports are prepared but before the dispositional hearing. These meetings can serve several purposes. First, counsel may be able to persuade the individual to change an unfavorable recommendation in the light of events that have occurred since the writing of the report. Second, counsel may be able to learn what the recommendation will be, so as to prepare better for the hearing. Third, counsel may be able to learn the bases for the recommendation and, if it is unfavorable, begin to gather specific items of information needed to oppose it, either by refuting its bases or by diluting them with additional facts.

When a psychiatrist or psychologist has written a report that is likely to be important at the dispositional hearing, counsel’s meeting with the psychiatrist or psychologist can profitably focus on:

1. Clarifying any confusing information in the report;
2. Breaking down diagnoses into terms that counsel can understand;
3. Determining the bases upon which the report was formulated and its recommendation was made;
4. Determining whether community services would be appropriate to achieve the purposes of a recommended placement; and
5. Determining what, if any, additional information might have changed the recommendation.

In addition, counsel should seek to elicit facts relevant to the weight that ought to be given to the recommendation. These will assist counsel to prepare for cross-examination in jurisdictions in which the dispositional hearing is evidentiary; and the same facts will guide counsel’s preparation of written materials for submission to the court in jurisdictions in which the hearing is non-evidentiary. For these purposes counsel will need to uncover facts that are often not contained in the report. They include:

a. The qualifications of the expert (education and training, employment history, length of time at this particular job, length of time working with juveniles, and so forth).
b. The number and length of contacts that the expert had with the respondent.
c. The setting in which those contacts occurred (time of day, place, noise level, distractions, number of other people present, and so forth).
d. The quality of the contacts (respondent’s communicativeness or uncommunicativeness, rapport with the expert, and so forth).
e. The conduct of the interview (what questions were asked; what answers were given; what information was elicited; what diagnostic tests were used, if any; what knowledge about the respondent, if any, did the expert have before the interview, and so forth).

f. All other factual data that entered into the evaluation and the recommendation (with whom, if anyone, did the expert speak about the respondent; what records relating to the respondent, if any, did the expert examine; what information about the respondent did the expert gather; what family members, teachers, employers, neighbors, and counselors did the expert not consult; whether the expert visited the respondent’s home, and so forth).

§ 38.13 NEGOTIATING WITH THE PROSECUTOR OR PROBATION OFFICER

Working out an agreed disposition with the probation department or the prosecutor is often effective. Their agreement does not bind the judge but will usually be influential with him or her. Getting the respondent enrolled in a promising program before beginning discussions with probation officers and prosecutors can be an important factor in obtaining their agreement.

In many jurisdictions, if the prosecutor and defense counsel are agreed about the appropriate dispositional outcome, it is possible to present the matter to the court for an immediate disposition without any report or investigation by probation personnel. This approach is often worth pursuing, particularly in cases in which there is information about the respondent’s background that has not yet come to light and that is likely to make a negative impression on a judge or probation officer. Eliminating unnecessary inquiries into the respondent’s background avoids the risk that they will lead to unfavorable results.

§ 38.14 FINDING SUITABLE COMMUNITY-BASED OR RESIDENTIAL ALTERNATIVES TO INCARCERATION AND ARRANGING FOR THE RESPONDENT’S ADMISSION TO A PROGRAM PRIOR TO THE HEARING

If, on the basis of information obtained at the early stages of a case, counsel calculates that placement out of the home is a realistically possible final disposition, the best strategy available to the respondent may be to have begun a community-based treatment program before the dispositional stage is reached. This sometimes means that waiting until after trial to begin preparation for the dispositional hearing is waiting too long. It may foreclose the opportunity to make one of the strongest arguments that can be made at the dispositional phase of a delinquency proceeding – that since the time when the respondent committed the offense for which s/he has been adjudicated delinquent, s/he has been getting the help necessary to assure that the wrongdoing will not be repeated.

Judges are far more apt to accept the respondent’s recommendation for a disposition when the recommended disposition is already underway and has been working. Frequently, judges’ reluctance to use community-based programs arises from a lack of confidence that the respondent will attend or participate regularly or that the program will do any good. Predicting the future is always precarious. Counsel can reduce the judge’s resistance to betting on the respondent by eliminating as many unknown variables as possible. When the respondent is already in a program, it is possible to argue that experience to date demonstrates both the respondent’s willingness to attend this kind of program regularly and the program’s initial success in assisting the respondent to stay out of trouble. The risk involved in the tactic is the other side of the same coin. If court officials, such as probation officers, are aware of the respondent’s involvement in a community-based program while the delinquency case is going on, any failure of the respondent in the program is likely to come to their attention and if the probation department decides to recommend a placement out of the community, it will be able to refer to the respondent’s failure during the pendency of the case as evidence that a more restrictive alternative is required.

Counsel should, if possible, obtain the services of a social worker to assist in identifying suitable community-based programs and arranging the respondent’s admission into one of them. See § 38.10 supra. If counsel cannot get a social worker’s help even to the extent of giving counsel a list of possible programs or informational contacts, counsel may be able to obtain a list or pamphlet of programs in the community by asking the local United Way, other social agencies – especially those that work with adolescents – or the local welfare department. Counsel needs not become an expert in community programs in order to represent the respondent adequately at the dispositional stage. But basic knowledge of these programs – including who runs them, how adolescents get admitted to them, and what services they are able to provide – is essential; and if counsel cannot secure the assistance of a social worker, counsel will have to acquire that knowledge personally. It may be necessary to arrange an interview for the respondent with a particular program or even to accompany the respondent to the interview. Counsel should do as much as possible to ease the respondent’s task of gaining admission.

§ 38.15 TIMING OF THE HEARING: RIGHT TO A SPEEDY HEARING; DEFENSE MOTIONS FOR A CONTINUANCE

Many jurisdictions provide that dispositional hearings must be commenced or completed within a certain number of days after the fact-finding hearing is completed. It may not be in the interest of the respondent to insist upon the strict enforcement of this rule.

If the respondent is detained pending the dispositional hearing, there is obviously more reason to press the court to hold the hearing within the statutory period than if the respondent is at home. However, even when the respondent is detained, counsel’s insistence upon a speedy dispositional hearing can irritate the judge or cause the judge to order an unfavorable placement because of lack of time to think about or to arrange a better one. If there is some hope that the judge can be persuaded to place the respondent in a program which the respondent prefers, it may be best to wait until the judge is ready to make the preferred placement.

If the respondent is not detained pending the dispositional hearing, delay may or may not work to the respondent’s advantage. When disposition is delayed long enough for the respondent to prove that s/he can be maintained in the community without getting into further trouble, the probability of probation or even of a conditional discharge is increased. See e.g., In re Shannon
The risk is that the respondent will not stay out of trouble. If s/he is rearrested during the pendency of the dispositional hearing, the court may conclude that placement out of the community is necessary. Counsel should weigh the possible benefits and risks of delay on the basis of a realistic assessment of the respondent’s capabilities and attitude and should make the decision case by case.

If counsel is unhappy with the probation officer’s recommended disposition or anticipates an unsatisfactory order by the court, counsel may want to object to going forward with the dispositional hearing until all of the diagnostic reports required by statute or caselaw have been completed. If there are reports still to be made, it may be reversible error for the court to conduct the hearing without having the necessary reports in hand. See, e.g., In the Matter of Jose Luis Q., 64 A.D.2d 600, 408 N.Y.S.2d 510 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1978). An objection by counsel during the hearing may require a continuance until the reports are complete.

§ 38.16 SUBMITTING A SENTENCING MEMORANDUM PRIOR TO THE HEARING

§ 38.16(a) Reasons for Submitting a Sentencing Memorandum

In jurisdictions in which the dispositional hearing is non-evidentiary, the principal means by which the judge will receive facts and arguments bearing on disposition is through written submissions and through the oral arguments made at the hearing. The court will always have before it a written submission from the probation department. Counsel should almost always submit a sentencing memorandum for the respondent.

This memorandum serves several purposes. (1) It allows counsel to provide the court with extensive documentation and detailed arguments that the judge may lack the patience to listen to in oral form. If counsel has done a thorough job preparing for the dispositional hearing, there will probably be more relevant information to share with the court than the judge will allow counsel to describe orally. (2) A written submission enhances counsel’s ability to present the case for the respondent thoroughly and accurately, since counsel can edit and polish it. (3) A written report will usually be read by the judge earlier than the judge would have heard counsel’s oral arguments. It provides an opportunity to persuade the judge before s/he has assimilated the probation report or heard the prosecutor’s arguments. If counsel’s written submission makes a strongly favorable initial impression on the judge, the judge may retain that impression even after hearing countervailing arguments. (4) Finally, a well-written sentencing memorandum suggests a level of professional quality that will often work to the client’s advantage. The more care and effort counsel has put into preparation for the dispositional hearing, the more inclined the court will probably be to think that the respondent deserves a fair disposition.

Most of the same benefits flow from a sentencing memorandum in jurisdictions in which the dispositional hearing is evidentiary. Written presentation can organize material in a way that complements the more dramatic but less orderly effect of testimony and exhibits. In evidentiary-hearing jurisdictions, however, counsel may want to focus the memorandum on (a) summarizing and analyzing facts that are already known to the prosecutor (such as those developed at the adjudicative hearing) and documentary materials that are readily available to the prosecutor (such as the respondent’s juvenile court records) or contain no surprises, and (b) relating these facts and materials and the kinds of additional evidence that counsel will present at the dispositional hearing to counsel’s theory of why a particular disposition is appropriate or inappropriate. Counsel may not want to include in the memorandum specific factual details that will make the respondent’s evidentiary case boringly redundant of what the judge has previously read or will give the prosecutor a head start in preparing to rebut it.

§ 38.16(b) Writing the Sentencing Memorandum

A sentencing memorandum is ordinarily written either as a formal memorandum or as a letter to the court, depending on local custom and the particular judge’s preference. Whichever form the document takes, counsel can and usually should attach as many exhibits to the memorandum as are useful. Any type of attachment that is informative is appropriate. Attachments can include the various kinds of letters and exhibits suggested in § 38.11 supra—anything counsel has been able to gather that presents the respondent in a more favorable perspective than his or her delinquent acts alone provide. These attachments should be designed to humanize the respondent, to make the judge think well of the respondent, and to give the judge reasons to allow the respondent to continue to live in the community. Letters attesting to the respondent’s participation in after-school activities (or photographs or tangible products of the respondent’s participation in those activities), for example, can be very helpful. Once the judge knows that the respondent’s after-school hours are taken up in kinds of activities that strike the judge as wholesome or at least not dangerous, the respondent’s chance for a disposition of probation is increased.

Section 38.16(a) supra notes that a written submission has the advantage of providing the judge with more information than the judge would allow counsel to present orally. This does not mean that it is effective advocacy to write a voluminous sentencing memorandum. The memorandum’s value depends on the judge reading it. Different judges have differing degrees of toleration for lengthy reports. It is important for counsel to find out about the particular judge’s attitudes in this regard and to prepare the report with them in mind. Probation department personnel, defense lawyers who have practiced before the judge, and social workers assigned to juvenile cases by the local public defender office are useful sources of information. If counsel learns that the judge is likely to read everything in a respondent’s sentencing memorandum, counsel will ordinarily want to develop in detail all of the favorable facts s/he can muster about the respondent. If counsel learns that the judge will probably not read a lengthy memorandum, counsel should keep it short and should state succinctly at the beginning the reasons supporting counsel’s proposed disposition.

Some arguments about the factual details of the underlying offense are highly persuasive; others are not. If the respondent was a relatively passive participant in an offense committed principally by his or her companions, that is a helpful point to emphasize. If the companion(s) used a weapon but the respondent never had any weapon in his or her possession, that fact should also be emphasized. If the respondent was younger than the companions, their respective ages can be stressed in arguing that the respondent was influenced by a group of older youths (or adults) with whom s/he no longer associates. Arguments that may appear to make light of the offense should ordinarily be avoided. As mentioned in § 19.03(b) supra, counsel does not want to play into rejoinders by the prosecutor or the judge that counsel is inappropriately minimizing the gravity of the crime or the harm to the victim. However, if there was no physical injury to any victim and if the respondent committed no acts that were intended or likely to injure anyone physically, counsel can refer briefly to the fact that the offense was nonviolent in arguing that a disposition which leaves the respondent in the community is not unduly risky.

Often a respondent’s best dispositional argument is that restrictive forms of placement are unnecessary because the causes of the respondent’s wrongdoing have already been eliminated. To support this argument, counsel should present in the sentencing memorandum all the information s/he can acquire about changes in the respondent’s situation and habits since arrest, including involvement in after-school programs, good school attendance, new school or residence, and development of a new set of friends.

Certain cases lend themselves to an effective argument that the respondent’s arrest served as a catalyst in changing the respondent’s way of life and turning him or her around. Many juvenile court judges believe deeply in rehabilitation and can be persuaded that the respondent has learned an important lesson about the wrongfulness of engaging in criminal behavior. But cf. State v. Burgess, 156 N.H. 746, 759-60, 943 A.2d 727, 737-38 (2008) (discussed in § 38.05(a) supra); Johnson v. Fabian, 735 N.W.2d 295, 297, 310-12 (Minn. 2007) (discussed in § 38.05(a) supra). Once persuaded of that, they will favor a disposition no worse than probation. To persuade them, counsel will want to include in the sentencing memorandum both (1) objective evidence of improvement in the respondent’s behavior and (2) evidence that the respondent realizes s/he did wrong and is genuinely remorseful. The latter evidence may include quotations from the respondent or from people who have spoken with the respondent since arrest. See generally Martha Grace Duncan, “So Young and So Untender”: Remorseless Children and the Expectations of the Law, 102 COLUM. L. REV. 1469 (2002); Adam Saper, Juvenile Remorselessness: An Unconstitutional Sentencing Consideration, 38 N.Y.U. REV. L. & SOC. CHANGE 99 (2014).

§ 38.17 THE RIGHT TO AN EVIDENTIARY DISPOSITIONAL HEARING

To fashion a dispositional order in a juvenile case, the statutes of most jurisdictions require more information than that the respondent committed a particular crime. Facts about the respondent’s background and needs are also indispensable. In virtually all jurisdictions it is reversible error for the court to enter a final order of disposition without first receiving a complete probation investigation and report. See, e.g., E.C. v. State, 445 So. 2d 661 (Fla. App. 1984). The report is presented and its results are developed at the dispositional hearing.
§ 38.17(a)  Conceptual Underpinnings for a Dispositional Hearing

In many jurisdictions juvenile courts do not commonly conduct evidentiary dispositional hearings. If counsel nevertheless wants one, s/he should file a motion for an evidentiary hearing on the ground that the court’s statutory responsibilities and the due process clauses of the state and federal constitutions demand it. This and the following subsection develop the arguments that counsel can make for that result.

In juvenile court the trial can best be seen as the precondition to the dispositional hearing. A case cannot reach the dispositional phase unless and until a juvenile is adjudicated delinquent. In most jurisdictions proof that the juvenile committed acts constituting a violation of the penal law is sufficient to support an adjudication of delinquency. But more is needed before a final order of disposition may be entered. Additional facts must be found relating to the juvenile’s need for services or for the continuing jurisdiction of the court.

Moreover, in some States the finding of a violation of the law, though necessary, is not sufficient even to adjudge a child delinquent. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 352.1(1), (2) (2018). In these States the delinquency adjudication itself requires the additional finding of fact that the juvenile needs the care, discipline, or supervision of the state.

The necessity of additional findings of fact going beyond the fact that the respondent violated the law is what sharply distinguishes juvenile dispositional proceedings from adult criminal sentencing. A criminal conviction suffices, without more, to authorize the imposition of a criminal sentence; and although criminal sentencing judges often do (and are sometimes statutorily obliged to) make additional factual inquiries for the purpose of advising their choice among sentencing options, the result of these inquiries does not go to the heart of the court’s function in entering a final order, as it does in juvenile proceedings. Most juvenile court statutes express a benevolent, nonpunitive purpose underlyeing the existence of juvenile court. This purpose is designed to be met in the dispositional phase. In many jurisdictions it is required to be accommodated with the goal of protecting the community. But counsel can plausibly argue that the primary concern remains effectuation of the juvenile’s welfare, because it is that concern which justifies the separate existence of juvenile court in the first place.

To attend properly to that concern – and also to reconcile it properly with the community’s needs (which include not only security against the juvenile’s possible repetition of harmful conduct but also the more lasting benefit that the community acquires when a child who has gone astray is rehabilitated as a productive and law-abiding citizen) – the court must receive and evaluate factual information bearing on a broader range of considerations than the juvenile’s mere “guilt” or “innocence.” If the court does not obtain the information, it is not doing its basic job; and when the nature of the information is such that its reliability can best be assured by receiving and testing it at an evidentiary hearing, the holding of an evidentiary hearing is a necessary part of the court’s fulfillment of its statutory mission. In some States which do not expressly require a dispositional hearing by statute, courts have ruled that a hearing is nevertheless required because the failure to consider evidence of a child’s background, character, and environment as bearing on disposition is an abuse of discretion. See, e.g., Rathbone v. State, 448 So. 2d 85 (Fla. App. 1984); In re Wilkinson, 116 R.I. 163, 353 A.2d 199 (1976).

§ 38.17(b) The Constitutional Right to an Evidentiary Hearing

Even when an evidentiary hearing is not required by statute, counsel can argue that due process of law requires such a hearing. The Supreme Court in Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605 (1967), reviewed an adult criminal procedure through which a sentencing judge could enhance the sentence of a convicted defendant if the judge found, after conviction, that the defendant "constitutes a threat of bodily harm to members of the public, or is an habitual offender and mentally ill." Id. at 607. The decision whether or not to enhance a sentence was to be based upon a written psychiatric report. No hearing was held before the sentencing judge made the decision. The Supreme Court set aside a sentence enhanced by this procedure, holding that, because the sentencing court could not impose the higher sentence without making specific findings of fact adverse to the defendant, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment required that the defendant be given an opportunity to be present with counsel, to be heard, to be confronted with witnesses against him, to cross-examine, to offer evidence of his own, and to have findings made that were adequate for meaningful review on appeal. Id. at 610. See also § 13.04 supra, describing the basis for the settled rule that constitutional due process may require a hearing when state substantive law makes important consequences turn upon the establishment of particular facts, even though state procedural law does not demand that those facts be established at a hearing.

Whenever juvenile statutes or state caselaw require specific findings of fact adverse to the respondent before a final order of disposition may be entered, Specht supports the claim of a right to a hearing. Courts reaching this issue in juvenile proceedings have generally held that a juvenile is entitled to a hearing on the question of disposition. See People v. Superior Court of Los Angeles, 142 Cal. App. 3d 29, 190 Cal. Rptr. 721 (1983); Norwood v. City of Richmond, 203 Va. 886, 128 S.E.2d 425 (1962). As an appellate court in New York has said:

It requires no citation of authority to support the principle that even the worst malefactor under our system of jurisprudence must be given a fair trial in accordance with the Constitution and the statutes. Surely, no less consideration should be given to this cardinal principle because the person charged is under the age of 16.

Part C. Conducting An Evidentiary Hearing

§ 38.18 STRATEGIC REASONS FOR WAIVING THE RIGHT TO A HEARING

There are many cases in which insistence upon a formal dispositional hearing will not be in the respondent’s interest. Often, the best strategy in the dispositional phase is to attempt to convince the probation officer, the prosecutor, or both to recommend the disposition that the respondent wants. See § 38.13 supra. When this is achieved, there is no reason to insist upon a hearing; counsel can simply inform the court that counsel has no objection to the recommendation of the probation department or the prosecutor.

The more difficult cases are those in which the probation department’s recommendation is not what the respondent wants but is less restrictive than what the judge may order. In these cases counsel must weigh the benefits and risks of insisting on a formal hearing and opposing the recommended disposition. The likelihood of persuading the judge to order a more favorable disposition than was recommended has to be compared with the likelihood that the court will order a less favorable disposition than the recommendation. Counsel can often gain insight into these probabilities by speaking with other lawyers who have appeared before the judge. The prosecutor’s likely reaction to counsel’s insistence on a contested dispositional hearing should also be considered. Just as some judges and prosecutors may penalize a respondent for demanding a trial rather than accepting a guilty plea (see § 14.05 supra), some judges and prosecutors are prone to exact a toll if the respondent takes up their time by insisting on contested dispositional proceedings. Although they might have acquiesced in a recommended disposition if the respondent consented to it, they will seek a more restrictive disposition if the respondent opposes the recommendation. This does not mean that counsel should routinely advise the respondent to accept the recommended disposition. It does mean that counsel should not routinely advise respondents to oppose all recommended dispositions. The decision whether to advise the respondent to accept a proffered settlement in the dispositional phase is similar to the more familiar decision whether to advise the respondent to accept a plea bargain or go to trial, and it is similarly difficult. See §§ 14.03-14.12 supra.

§ 38.19 TECHNIQUES FOR CONDUCTING AN EVIDENTIARY DISPOSITIONAL HEARING

Counsel should develop a plan for how s/he wants the hearing structured and how s/he will go about trying to structure it that way. Often it is not easy to impose any sort of orderly structure on dispositional hearings because of the informality with which they have traditionally been conducted. In practice, judges and probation officers routinely assume that a juvenile who has been found to have engaged in criminal conduct perforce needs the discipline or protection of the court or is in need of supervision or confinement. As a result, the juvenile courts frequently conduct dispositional hearings as informal colloquies, and evidence concerning the needs of the juvenile is presented in an off-handed way. This makes it exceedingly difficult to create the kind of record that will support meaningful appellate review.

Statutes and caselaw permitting or requiring an evidentiary hearing obviously contemplate more than an informal colloquy, see § 38.17 supra; and counsel should consider whether it is to the respondent’s advantage to insist that the hearing be conducted in a more formal manner. Often, the respondent’s best chance of a favorable disposition lies in structuring the hearing to address in the proper order the questions that the hearing is designed to resolve. In most hearings held without a formalized structure, the question which the judge takes up first is the one that ought to come last: What final order of disposition is proposed? Very often, for example, the court will want to start by considering the recommendations made in conclusory diagnostic reports that advise a placement in a “structured” setting. But analysis of the kind of disposition that is appropriate should follow, not precede or substitute for, consideration of the respondent’s needs. Ordinarily, counsel’s task will be to try to focus the court’s attention on those needs rather than on placement.

Informal hearings usually begin by the probation officer reading aloud the recommendation for final disposition and possibly also summarizing or reading excerpts from the probation report. When, as is often the case, there is no probation officer at the hearing, the judge usually will review the written report. Counsel should make a motion to have the probation report marked as an exhibit and admitted into evidence. This makes the record clear for appeal purposes and implicitly reminds the judge that the proceeding is a formal factfinding hearing subject to appellate review. And after the probation officer’s report and any other evidence offered by the probation department and the prosecutor have been received, counsel should consider a motion to dismiss if the evidence is arguably too meager to justify a finding that the respondent has any need for the care or supervision of the state.

The point to press upon the court is that there are two related but separate questions to determine at the dispositional hearing: (1) Does the respondent need the “care, discipline or protection” of the state and, if so, (2) what final order of disposition should be entered. In some jurisdictions, if the answer to the first question is “no,” the respondent may not be adjudicated delinquent, and the case must be dismissed. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 352.1(2) (2018) (“If, on the conclusion of the dispositional hearing, the court determines that the respondent does not require supervision, treatment or confinement, the petition shall be dismissed.”); In the Matter of McP., 514 A.2d 446, 450 (D.C. 1986) (“While commission of a delinquent act creates a presumption that the juvenile is in need of care or rehabilitation, the juvenile may rebut that presumption at the dispositional hearing . . . If the juvenile does rebut the presumption, he or she is not in need of care or rehabilitation and thus, by definition, is not a delinquent child subject to disposition.”). In other jurisdictions a “no” answer precludes the court from ordering a restrictive placement. See § 38.17(a) supra. Only if the answer to the first question is “yes,” does the second question arise: Given that the respondent needs the care of the state, what type of care does s/he need? Thus, at the beginning of the dispositional hearing, the focus should be upon the particular problems of the child, his or her needs, and his or her background.

Ordinarily, counsel should insist that evidence be presented addressed specifically to the respondent’s need for care or supervision. When the only evidence before the court on this point is the underlying act which caused the respondent to be charged with delinquency, counsel should argue that the state has not made a sufficient showing that the respondent is in need of placement. See, e.g., In re B.C, 169 Ga. App. 200, 311 S.E.2d 857 (1983). If, for example, the respondent goes to school regularly, does well at school and at home, and has never been in trouble before, so that the criminal act which brought the case to court appears uncharacteristic, why does the child need the care or supervision of the state? It may well be reversible error in such a case to enter a final order of placement. But unless the record of the dispositional hearing makes clear that the final order was entered without the factual showing required by the statute governing dispositions, an appeal will not be successful.

If and after the needs of the respondent have been documented at the dispositional hearing, it is in order to consider a particular placement or disposition in the light of those specific needs. At this point counsel needs to be particularly creative. The most difficult job at a dispositional hearing is to connect the respondent’s specific treatment needs with the disposition that counsel is seeking and to show that those needs do not call for the more restrictive placement plan recommended by the probation officer.

As mentioned earlier in this section, very often the probation officer’s recommendation will be for a “structured” setting – a common euphemism for the state training school or the maximum security facility in the state. In these cases counsel may wish to shift the focus of the hearing to the facility and its inability to provide the services appropriate for the respondent. Unless counsel is already familiar with the recommended facility and prepared to document its shortcomings (see § 39.07 infra), s/he will have to request a continuance in order to investigate it. One reason that counsel should always obtain a copy of the pre-sentence report in advance of the dispositional hearing if possible (see § 38.08 supra) is that this will ensure adequate time to collect the necessary information about a recommended facility without depending on the court’s discretionary grant of a continuance.

Whether counsel investigates the recommended facility before the hearing or during a continuance, s/he may wish to have his or her own expert visit the facility so as to be able to testify in court about its capabilities and limitations. The issue at this stage of the hearing is whether the disposition recommended by the probation officer is “appropriate” within the meaning of the statute governing dispositional placements. It will not be an appropriate placement unless the recommended facility is realistically able to meet the specific needs of the respondent in the particular case. See, e.g., In the Matter of Jose B., 71 A.D.2d 551, 418 N.Y.S.2d 73 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1979).

§ 38.20 THE APPLICABILITY OF THE RULES OF EVIDENCE

In virtually every jurisdiction hearsay is admissible at the dispositional hearing. Most jurisdictions do not require that evidence proffered at the hearing meet the ordinary tests of legal admissibility (see § 30.01 supra) but require only that the evidence be relevant and material.

Although hearsay is not objectionable as such, counsel should be alert to the possibility of challenging certain hearsay evidence on the ground of unreliability. Information about the respondent which was obtained from unchecked sources of dubious accuracy – such as third-hand information (hearsay within hearsay) that has no identifiable, dependable source – may be challengeable on the ground that it lacks a sufficient degree of trustworthiness to be accepted into evidence. The use of grossly unreliable evidence in adult criminal sentencing has been held to violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Townsend v. Burke, 334 U.S. 736 (1948); cf. Johnson v. Mississippi, 486 U.S. 578 (1988), and counsel may want to backstop his or her common-law and statutory objections with references to the state and federal constitutional guarantees of due process. Often counsel will not be in a position to challenge the admissibility of evidence on these grounds without cross-examining or conducting voir dire to determine the source of the information; requests to question the authors of reports that contain unattributed or apparently unchecked hearsay can be supported by the assertion that questioning is necessary to permit adequate evaluation of the trustworthiness of second- or third-hand information. Cf. Smith
v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 129 (1968). Once counsel has demonstrated that neither the person offering the information nor the source of the information can attest to its reliability, counsel should argue that the information is inadmissible for lack of trustworthiness.

§ 38.21 CROSS-EXAMINING THE PROBATION OFFICER OR MENTAL HEALTH EXPERT PRESENTED BY THE PROSECUTION

If the probation officer or the expert who prepared a pre-sentence report and recommendation is not expected to be in court, counsel should consider seeking a subpoena for him or her in order to cross-examine. This should ordinarily be done when counsel has reason to believe that the report contains inaccurate information or is based on unreliable hearsay that might be discounted by the judge or when, as discussed in the next paragraph, a particular disposition is recommended which counsel believes is inappropriate to the respondent’s needs.

Often, of course, counsel will not choose to pursue the issue whether the respondent needs supervision; the respondent’s previous record may, for example, foreclose any colorable claim that no form of supervision is necessary. In these cases the attorney should focus on identifying the specific needs of the respondent. This can often be profitably done by cross-examination of the probation officer and the authors of any other diagnostic reports submitted to the judge. Counsel’s goal is to elicit a precise diagnosis of needs and a specific prescription of the necessary treatment for those needs. Then counsel can attack the recommended disposition as unlikely to provide the appropriate treatment.

The cross-examination can be conducted with any of several different strategies in mind.
If counsel wishes to reinforce the respondent’s need for treatment, the cross-examination should seek to cement the expert’s opinion that the respondent has particular needs which can be served by certain programs. Such a cross-examination can be very friendly; the expert is simply being used by the respondent’s attorney to emphasize facts that the expert concedes.

On the other hand, if counsel is aiming to oppose the expert’s recommendation on the ground that the expert did not know enough about the respondent to make a reliable recommendation or on the ground that the expert’s recommendation fails to connect the respondent’s needs with the recommended facility’s capacity to serve those needs, then the cross-examination may have to be more pointed. To discredit the expert’s conclusions by demonstrating a lack of sufficient knowledge of the respondent, counsel should develop all of the shortcomings in the witness’s contact with the respondent, including any inadequacy in the setting of the evaluative interview, limited time spent with the respondent, and failure to establish rapport during the interview. See § 38.12 \textit{supra}.

To discredit the expert’s recommendation on the ground that it is not responsive to the respondent’s treatment needs, counsel may be able to show in some cases that the expert has little or no information about the programs and services actually provided in the facility that s/he recommends and that the recommendation is based upon the professed or supposed objectives of the facility rather than upon its real performance. Or counsel may be able to show that the expert is not aware of the full range of programs available to meet the respondent’s treatment needs and, therefore, failed to consider alternatives that are superior to the expert’s recommendation.

The various techniques for cross-examining expert witnesses suggested in § 31.09 \textit{supra} are often useful in the present context. Particularly effective ways to attack a dispositional expert’s conclusions are to show, in an appropriate case:

1. That the expert met with the respondent for only a short time;
2. That the conditions surrounding the interview were not optimal;
3. That the expert did little or nothing to put the respondent at ease;
4. That the expert has little knowledge of the respondent’s family situation (for example, that s/he did not conduct home visits, interviewed only one family member, and so forth);
5. That the expert cannot identify any specific programs or services available in the facility s/he recommends that are suitable to the respondent’s special treatment needs; and
6. That the expert is not familiar with available community alternatives that might serve the respondent’s needs.

As the last two approaches imply, it is often productive to attack not only the expert’s opinion about the respondent but also the expert’s opinion about the efficacy (or relative efficacy) of the recommended placement. When counsel wishes to emphasize the inappropriateness of the ultimate recommendation in the light of the respondent’s needs, counsel should pin down the expert’s views of exactly what the respondent does need (asking, for example, whether psychotherapy is likely to be beneficial). Counsel can then elicit from the expert facts about the recommended placement facility – or about the particular facilities available to the court to provide the “structured” setting recommended by the expert – which demonstrate that these facilities do not provide services adequate to meet the respondent’s needs. For example, if the expert has admitted that the respondent needs psychotherapy, counsel can show that the facilities under consideration have such limited psychiatric staff that the psychiatrists at the facility do nothing more than interview all new inmates upon arrival for classification and administration purposes (a common phenomenon at training schools). If the expert is not familiar with the services in the facilities under consideration, counsel should nevertheless ask the expert about the operations of the facilities, in order to display the expert’s lack of knowledge so that counsel can argue that the expert’s recommendation was based on a false expectation of the facility’s capacity to treat a person with the respondent’s needs.

The expert can be cross-examined by using hypothetical questions in which counsel adds more details to facts that the expert had at the time of making the recommendation. Questions can be posed to show that the expert did not know certain facts or did not assume certain facts to be true. Questions can also be posed to demonstrate that the expert did assume certain facts about the respondent or the recommended facility to be true and based the final recommendation, in part, on those assumptions (which counsel is prepared to prove independently are inaccurate).

§ 38.22 PRESENTING DEFENSE EVIDENCE

In jurisdictions that allow the presentation of evidence at dispositional hearings, caselaw almost invariably supports the rule that the court may not curtail the reasonable efforts of the respondent’s lawyer to present relevant defense evidence. In re Michael C., 50 A.D.2d 757, 376 N.Y.S.2d 167 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1975). This evidence may consist of reports and letters, since hearsay is admissible in most jurisdictions. The evidence may consist of calling witnesses. Obvious witnesses to consider are the respondent and his or her parent[s]. See §§ 38.26-38.27 infra for a discussion of preparing respondents and parents to address the court at the dispositional hearing. In addition, counsel should consider calling any witness who can provide factual information that supports the respondent’s position on disposition, including: defense experts who have interviewed or evaluated the respondent; teachers; counselors; social workers; coaches; neighbors; and other adults whom the court is likely to credit.

Depending on the theory of the defense, the witnesses may be used to refute the conclusion that the respondent needs care and supervision, or the defense expert may be used to support a contention that the respondent’s needs can be adequately met by supervision in the community. If the focus of counsel’s theory is on the quality of services available in the facility or program recommended by the probation department or prosecutor, defense witnesses familiar with the facility’s or program’s capabilities and with the respondent’s needs can be called to demonstrate that the recommended placement will not meet those needs.

Counsel may wish to use witnesses who are able to testify to the respondent’s good character at home, in school, and in the community. Such individuals as teachers, religious counselors, employers, and neighbors who can testify to the respondent’s good deeds or reputation for being responsible, well-behaved, and respectful are appropriate witnesses. Because the rules of evidence are considerably relaxed at dispositional hearings, these witnesses will usually be permitted to state their own opinion about the respondent’s character in addition to the respondent’s reputation. Compare §§ 33.17-33.18 supra.

Counsel should consider introducing as exhibits any favorable reports that have been written by experts who have evaluated the respondent. Exhibits can also include letters of support from any of the people mentioned in this section who are in a position to say good things about the respondent. (In deciding whether to call any particular individual to testify in person or whether to present his or her favorable views of the respondent in written form, counsel should consider the extent of the individual’s knowledge of the respondent and the strength of the individual’s enthusiasm for the respondent. Compare § 19.04 supra. Other possible exhibits are discussed in §§ 38.11 and 38.16(b) supra.

   When counsel uses defense experts at the hearing, counsel should stress the quality and number of contacts between the expert and the respondent – if, as is common, they are clearly superior to those of the probation department’s expert – so that in closing, counsel can contrast the depth of the defense expert’s knowledge of the respondent with the superficiality of the probation department expert’s.

§ 38.23 PROPOSING A DISPOSITIONAL PLAN FOR THE DEFENSE

   If counsel is able to show that the facility recommended by the probation department is inappropriate for the respondent, the judge will want to explore the question of what disposition is appropriate. Counsel will have to do more than prove that the probation department’s recommendation is unsatisfactory; s/he will have to come up with a plan that is better. Once again, a defense expert may be very helpful. If a facility agreeable to the respondent can be located that will accept the respondent and that can be shown to best meet his or her needs, the chances of persuading the judge to place the respondent in that facility are optimal. (Of course, as already discussed, this strategy should not be used without the respondent’s consent.)

   In fashioning a dispositional plan and supporting theory for the defense, the best approach is to be creative. Precisely because there is little appellate law in the area of dispositional hearings and because the rules for juvenile court at this phase of the proceeding are supposed to be different from those of adult criminal court, lawyers are advised to think inventively and consider doing things that have not been tried before. See, e.g., State in the Interest of Irving, 434 So. 2d 543 (La. App. 1983) (upholding the trial court’s discretion to impose a condition of probation that respondent live with a relative in another State). This means not only expanding the range of evidence presented at the hearing (see § 38.11 supra) but also expanding the range of dispositions available for the court to consider. Judges often appreciate proposals that offer new ways to serve the judge’s dual goals of protecting the community and helping the respondent; many routes lead to these joint goals; unique proposals evolved out of the peculiar background and facts of each individual case should be explored. More than in any other area of juvenile court practice, counsel will find it effective to innovate boldly in preparing for a dispositional hearing.

   Creativity is particularly fruitful in devising conditions of probation. Many jurisdictions require that the court order the “least restrictive alternative” consistent with the respondent’s best interests and the protection of the community. See, e.g., N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 352.2(2) (2018); In the Interest of B.S., 192 Ill. App. 3d 886, 891, 549 N.E.2d 695, 698, 140 Ill. Dec. 44, 47 (1989); State in the Interest of Racine, 433 So. 2d 243 (La. App. 1983). In developing alternatives to incarceration, counsel will usually be able to identify a number of options that adequately protect the community. The following are some conditions of probation, among many, that counsel might consider proposing, depending on the facts and circumstances of the case: good school attendance; abstaining from certain conduct (such as associating with particular individuals or gangs); enrollment in a certain community-based program; keeping out of certain places; cooperating with specified individuals; making restitution; submitting a regular progress report.

There is, of course, a danger that counsel’s efforts in inventing conditions of probation in order to make community-based treatment appear palatable to the court will lead the court to place more restrictions on the respondent’s liberty than would have been imposed without counsel’s assistance. This danger has two components. First, the respondent may be subjected to greater restraints than the court would have thought of by itself. Second, the more conditions are imposed, the greater the risk will be that the respondent will violate one or more of them and thereby become subject to the filing of a petition to revoke probation. These dangers must be factored into the decision how aggressive counsel should be in proposing novel alternatives to placement.

§ 38.24 THE NEED FOR FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

It is important to have the judge state on the record the reasons for the final order of disposition. This not only improves the respondent’s record for appeal but gives counsel information making it easier to assess the probable success of an appeal. Many jurisdictions require that the court state the reasons for its dispositional order and the facts supporting those reasons on the record. See, e.g., N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 352.2(3) (2018). And, as noted in § 38.17(b) supra, one of the constitutional requirements for dispositional hearings derivable from Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605 (1967), is that “there must be findings adequate to make meaningful any appeal that is allowed.” Id. at 610. Appellate decisions support the view that if the dispositional hearing is handled correctly, the record should clearly reflect the special needs of the respondent and the reasons for the choice of the particular disposition ordered by the court. See, e.g., State in the Interest of George, 430 So 2d 289 (La. App. 1983). Counsel should request that the court make specific findings of fact on these issues. In any case in which the court places the respondent in a private residential facility or in a state-run non-secure or secure facility (see § 38.03(c) supra), counsel should also request that the court specify the educational, vocational, and other rehabilitative services that the facility must provide the respondent. See § 39.07 infra.

Finally, if counsel believes that the record fails to support the dispositional order, it is important to object to the order on the record, setting forth the basis for the objection.

Part D. Conducting a Non-Evidentiary Hearing

§ 38.25 TECHNIQUES FOR CONDUCTING A NON-EVIDENTIARY HEARING
In most jurisdictions that use the non-evidentiary hearing procedure, the persons present at the hearing will be the probation officer (or a representative from the probation department), the prosecutor, counsel for the respondent, the respondent, and his or her parent. Rarely are there any formal procedures for beginning the hearing. Many non-evidentiary hearings are merely pro forma appearances at which the court imposes a sentence to which all parties are agreed. See §§ 38.13, 38.18 supra. If the respondent does not oppose the disposition recommended by the probation department and if the prosecutor indicates that s/he also acquiesces in the recommendation, the hearing will likely last only a few minutes.

Non-evidentiary hearings commonly consist of a colloquy that most resembles a trial-level oral argument. The hearing is not regularized and few rules exist regarding the order or length of presentations. In some jurisdictions the first person to speak is ordinarily the probation officer, who recommends a particular disposition. In other jurisdictions there is an uncertain void at the beginning of the hearing that is filled by the first person who starts talking. Usually, counsel should start and fill this void. Counsel should begin the hearing by summarizing the case and emphasizing the critical issues on which counsel wishes to focus. Compare § 38.19 supra. Judges will often give clues about how carefully they have read the pre-sentence report and, depending on the judge’s familiarity with the case, counsel may choose to be more or less detailed.

In some cases the respondent does not oppose the probation department’s recommendation, but the prosecutor has not clearly indicated acceptance of the recommended disposition. In these cases counsel must try to steer the dispositional hearing by being the first to speak, summarizing the recommended disposition and the reasons for imposing it. Sometimes this take-charge approach can preempt the prosecutor from opposing the recommendation.

The court at a non-evidentiary dispositional hearing usually receives documentary evidence and oral argument. The documentary evidence ordinarily consists of the probation officer’s pre-sentence report and any other reports prepared for or by the probation department or the prosecutor, such as a mental health report. In addition, defense counsel is routinely permitted to submit a sentencing memorandum, which should set forth the respondent’s proposed disposition and the grounds and reasons supporting it. See § 38.16(b) supra.

Counsel should make certain that all documents read by the judge are marked for identification at the hearing. Counsel should also read all these reports carefully and object to the admission of any parts of them that s/he believes should be excluded. See § 38.20 supra. Counsel should introduce into evidence all reports prepared by the defense and any letters, evaluations, and other exhibits on which counsel intends to rely.

The principal feature of the non-evidentiary hearing will be counsel’s oral argument to the court supporting a particular order of disposition. This argument may be based on law – contending, for example, that in light of the respondent’s ties to the community and prior record, there is no statutory basis to enter any order of disposition other than probation – or it may be based on fact, or on a combination of law and facts.

The most difficult cases, of course, are those in which the respondent opposes the probation department’s recommended disposition. In these cases a key fact that counsel needs to know in order to determine how to proceed is the degree of familiarity that the judge already has with the written reports submitted before the hearing. Some judges will have read everything before the case is called. Some will have read nothing. Counsel should learn about the particular judge’s practices by asking experienced lawyers who have appeared before that judge in the past. Depending on the jurisdiction, counsel’s own sentencing memorandum may or may not have been submitted in advance of the hearing date.

Like any effective presentation, counsel’s oral argument should develop a theme and support it appropriately. Section 38.16(b) supra suggests that there are more and less persuasive points that counsel can make in supporting or opposing a particular disposition. Frequently, the most effective argument to make orally is that the respondent has learned an important lesson from his or her misconduct and has changed for the better since being arrested. Because judges have heard this argument so often in other cases, it is crucial to support the argument with facts. Counsel should be prepared to cite specifically the portions of all documents and exhibits that support counsel’s contentions.

If counsel has attached exhibits to the sentencing memorandum, see § 38.16(b) supra, counsel should make use of them in the oral presentation. If, for example, the respondent has produced works demonstrating artistic talent, counsel should have them in court so that s/he can display them during the presentation.

Even in jurisdictions that do not ordinarily conduct evidentiary hearings, there is the possibility of offering live testimony. It can be very effective strategy for counsel to bring witnesses to court and have them sit in the courtroom during the hearing. Once a witness is in court, counsel can ask the judge for permission for the witness to address the court; alternatively, counsel can inform the judge that the witness is present in case the judge would like to hear from him or her or has any questions to ask. Of course, the fact that people have bothered to show up in court at all, particularly in a jurisdiction in which it is uncommon to see witnesses at dispositional hearings, is likely to impact favorably on the judge. The more prestigious the witness, the more likely it is that the judge will display the courtesy of permitting the witness to speak.

If counsel’s strategy is to argue that a particular facility is a more appropriate placement than the one proposed by the probation department, bringing someone to court who is familiar with the facility is similarly effective. At the least, counsel should weave the person’s identity and expertise into the oral presentation and point to the individual when doing so in order to emphasize counsel’s preparedness for the hearing.
§ 38.26 WHAT THE RESPONDENT SHOULD SAY WHEN ADDRESSING THE COURT AT THE DISPOSITIONAL HEARING

As in adult criminal sentencing, juvenile court judges commonly give the respondent an opportunity to address the court. See In re Tavione H., 2016 WL 3129962, at *4 (Md. Ct. Special App. June 3, 2016) (dictum) (“While, of course, a juvenile court has wide discretion to control its docket, to limit the presentation of evidence and argument, and to avoid repetitive presentations, there are limits to this discretion. Thus, while the juvenile court may limit argument by the juvenile offender or the juvenile offender’s counsel, the court may not preclude it. . . . ¶ Juvenile offenders are often alienated from and may feel ignored by society. Reintegrating and helping them to ‘becom[e] responsible and productive members of society’ . . . is a key objective of the juvenile system. Society wants juvenile offenders to learn appropriate methods of interacting with the world, including appropriate interaction with and toward authority. Juvenile offenders must be counselled to be respectful toward the court. But the court must also be respectful toward the juvenile offenders. Silencing, or even appearing to silence juveniles, is inconsistent with our vision of the appropriate social interaction that the juvenile system should be modeling.”). In any event, this is a procedure that counsel would ordinarily want to request. It is important for counsel to prepare with the respondent what s/he will say and how to say it. Especially with inarticulate respondents, a brief statement is appropriate. The most important things for the respondent to say have to do with (1) the lesson(s) s/he learned from the wrongdoing, (2) his or her repentance for committing a crime, and (3) any constructive plans for the future. It is particularly crucial for the respondent to express remorse when the pre-sentence report states inaccurately that the respondent does not feel any remorse. But cf. State v. Burgess, 156 N.H. 746, 759-60, 943 A.2d 727, 737-38 (2008) (discussed in § 38.05(a) supra); Johnson v. Fabian, 735 N.W.2d 295, 297, 310-12 (Minn. 2007) (discussed in § 38.05(a) supra); State v. Washington, 832 N.W.2d 650, 652, 661-62 (Iowa 2013) (discussed in § 38.05(a) supra). If the respondent has spent some time in a detention facility, expressions of fear or of having learned that crime doesn’t pay are often things the judge wants to hear.

Although counsel should prepare the respondent to address the court, it is generally wise to let the respondent say pretty much what s/he wants to say, within reason. It is useful to have a dry-run rehearsal of what the respondent will say, but the statement should not be so rehearsed that it sounds canned.

Respondents who continue to deny any wrongdoing pose a difficult problem. In preparing them to address the judge at sentencing, counsel should advise them to talk about anything commendable that they are currently doing in the community (or, in the case of detained respondents, anything commendable that they were doing in the community before being detained or any programs in which they have successfully participated since being detained) and about realistic, constructive plans for the future. It is usually wise for the respondent to avoid any direct reference to the crime during his or her initial remarks. If the judge asks the respondent directly about the crime, it is, of course, necessary for the respondent to reply. Counsel should work with the respondent on a reply. Even when the respondent denies wrongdoing, it may be possible for the respondent to admit to an indiscretion of judgment, for example: (a) hanging out with the wrong crowd, (b) being out of his or her home at the wrong hours, or (c) being in the wrong part of town. These or any similarly worded expressions of regret can usefully split the difference between denying any responsibility for the crime (and thereby, in a bench trial, challenging the judge directly as factfinder) and insincerely admitting acts that the respondent, in fact, denies having committed.

Of course, there will be cases in which even this much concession is infeasible. If the respondent claims that s/he is a victim of mistaken identity and stands by the alibi defense that s/he presented at trial, there is not much s/he can say at the dispositional hearing about the crime itself. In these cases the respondent’s only practicable courses of action are to continue to assert innocence or to waive the right to address the court in person and rely solely on counsel’s presentation. The question whether the judge is permitted to attach adverse inferences or consequences to a respondent’s silence at a dispositional hearing – and, if so, what inferences and consequences are permissible – is a vexed question in the light of White v. Woodall, 134 S. Ct. 1697 (2014), which muddies the apparent implication of Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314 (1999), that a defendant cannot be penalized in any way for failing to address the court in a sentencing proceeding. In this state of the law, counsel should be alert to note anything said by the judge which suggests that he or she is penalizing the respondent for remaining silent; such comments are grist for appeal and other post-hearing challenges to an unfavorable disposition.

§ 38.27 WHAT THE PARENT SHOULD SAY WHEN ADDRESSING THE COURT

As explained in § 38.05(b) supra, counsel’s task in preparing a parent for the dispositional process and the dispositional hearing differs depending on what sentence the parent wants to see imposed. If the parent, as well as the respondent, desires the least restrictive sentence, then the parent should be prepared to address the court with an emphasis upon the positive things that s/he can say about the respondent. The parent is in the best position to tell the judge about the respondent’s attitude at home and his or her relationship with family members. When the parent has observed any favorable changes in the respondent’s behavior since coming to court, the parent should report those changes. If, for example, the respondent has stopped hanging out with an individual or a group of adolescents of whom the parent disapproved and whose influence was, in the parent’s opinion, partly responsible for the respondent’s criminal activity, the parent should be prepared to tell this to the judge. The parent can also inform the judge about any community activities, school programs, and church activities in which the respondent participates, emphasizing those activities that the respondent has taken up (or has taken more seriously) since his or her arrest. If the respondent has begun any treatment or community-based program since his or her arrest, the parent should be prepared to comment upon the program and its perceived beneficial effects on the respondent.

Finally, the parent should be prepared to tell the judge about any aspirations the parent has for the respondent, the love s/he feels for the respondent, and the efforts that the parent is willing to make to assure that the respondent will not get into trouble again in the future.
Part E. After the Hearing

§ 38.28 PRESERVING THE RIGHT TO APPEAL

Counsel’s job does not end when the court enters its final order in the case.

Counsel must review the dispositional order to determine whether there are any grounds for challenging it by a motion to vacate or for reconsideration or by appeal. Potential grounds include challenges to the substance of the order as legally unauthorized (for example, as imposing a custodial or probationary term in excess of that authorized by law, or as imposing unlawful conditions), contentions that factual findings contained in the dispositional order are not supported by the record (or are the product of mistakes not attributable to the respondent, which respondent should have an opportunity to address by additional information), and claims that the order violates applicable procedural rules (such as those enumerated in §§ 38.17, 39.17(B), 38.20, 38.22 and 38.24, or the constitutional rule against judicial vindictiveness in sentencing, see, e.g., Austin v. Plumley, 565 Fed. Appx. 175 (4th Cir. 2014) (analyzing and applying the complex doctrinal offshoots of North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969)).

The role of trial counsel also includes the responsibility to advise the respondent fully concerning his or her right to appeal. See Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 478-81 (2000) (defense counsel’s failure to consult with the client about the decision whether to appeal constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel whenever there are nonfrivolous grounds for appeal or the client has indicated any interest in taking an appeal); id. at 479 (recognizing that state law may “impose[ ] on trial counsel a per se duty to consult with defendants about the possibility of an appeal”); American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice, Standard 4-9.1(a)-(c) (4th ed. 2015) (“Standards for the Defense Function”) (“If a client is convicted, defense counsel should explain to the client the meaning and consequences of the court’s judgment and the client’s rights regarding appeal. Defense counsel should provide the client with counsel’s professional judgment as to whether there are meritorious grounds for appeal and the possible, and likely, results of an appeal. Defense counsel should also explain to the client the advantages and disadvantages of an appeal including the possibility that the government might cross-appeal, and the possibility that if the client prevails on appeal, a remand could result in a less favorable disposition. Counsel should also be familiar with, and discuss with the client, possible interactions with other post-conviction procedures such as habeas corpus rules and actions. . . . ¶ The ultimate decision whether to appeal should be the client’s. . . . ¶ Defense counsel should take whatever steps are necessary to protect the client’s rights of appeal, including filing a timely notice of appeal in the trial court, even if counsel does not expect to continue as counsel on appeal.”). See also § 39.02(c) infra (steps to take to preserve the client’s appellate remedies). Except when the respondent states explicitly that s/he does not wish to appeal or when s/he has another attorney retained or appointed for the appeal who explicitly informs counsel that the other attorney is taking the necessary steps to perfect appellate jurisdiction, counsel should take those steps within the times limited by statute or court rule. See § 39.02(c) infra.
§ 38.29 COUNSEL’S POST-DISPOSITIONAL ROLE

In non-evidentiary hearings as well as evidentiary hearings, counsel should request that a dispositional order of placement specify the types of rehabilitative services that the facility must provide the respondent. See § 38.24 supra. However, this alone will not ensure that the respondent actually receives the services. One of the most common and most frustrating aspects of the juvenile justice system is that carefully tailored court-ordered treatment programs for juveniles are not carried out by the institutions and agencies that are supposed to carry them out. Like any court order a juvenile court’s final order of disposition is not self-enforcing. If a juvenile has been placed in a particular facility in order to assure that s/he gets certain treatment, it is critical that someone follow up on the placement to determine whether or not that treatment is actually being given. See § 39.07 infra.

For this reason counsel should consider, whenever possible, remaining on the case even after the court enters its final order. If counsel abandons the respondent at this juncture, the respondent frequently will have no way to enforce post-dispositional rights. Of course, many court assignments to represent indigent respondents terminate upon the final order of disposition. Counsel who were so assigned may wish to request that the court enter an order expressly continuing their representation of the respondent into the placement phase of the proceeding.
Chapter 39

Appeal and Post-Disposition Proceedings

§ 39.01 SCOPE OF THE CHAPTER

The Manual is intended as an aid in representing alleged delinquents in the trial process; post-disposition proceedings are beyond its purview. The purpose of this chapter is merely to identify the principal corrective procedures that are available to the respondent following an unfavorable disposition (to obtain appellate or collateral review of the adjudication of delinquency; to modify or terminate a period of incarceration or to enforce the respondent’s right to treatment while in the institution; to seal or expunge records of the conviction after a certain period of time) and to sketch the nature of the principal proceedings that may be instituted against the respondent during the post-disposition period (revocations of probation and parole and extensions of a term of incarceration).

§ 39.02 APPELLATE REVIEW

§ 39.02(a) The Right To Appeal

Juvenile court statutes typically give the respondent a right to appeal an adjudication of delinquency. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. § 19-2-903(1) (2018); Ind. Code Ann. § 31-32-15-1 (2018); Tex. Fam. Code Ann. § 56.01 (2018). See also In the Interest of A.K., 825 N.W.2d 46, 49-52 (Iowa 2013) (notwithstanding the state legislature’s revision of the juvenile code to eliminate the requirement that “delinquency proceedings . . . be tried in equity,” which had been the basis for appellate review of delinquency adjudications “de novo, as in all equity cases,” the Iowa Supreme Court rejects the state’s argument for uniform standards of appellate review in juvenile and adult criminal cases, and instead preserves “our de novo standard of review of the sufficiency of the evidence for juvenile adjudications” because this higher standard for juvenile appeals appropriately recognizes the differences between juvenile and adult proceedings, including the lack of a jury trial right in juvenile delinquency cases). If a State allows appeals of criminal convictions, a juvenile respondent who is not given a statutory right to appeal may be able to contend that this disparate treatment violates the equal protection of the laws. See, e.g., In re Brown, 439 F.2d 47 (3d Cir. 1971); In the Matter of Arthur N., 36 Cal. App. 3d 935, 112 Cal. Rptr. 89 (1974).

The scope of appellate review encompasses, generally, all properly preserved claims of error in the pretrial and trial rulings of the judge, “plain” or fundamental errors even though not properly preserved (see, e.g., Henderson v. United States, 568 U.S. 266 (2013); Rosales-Mireles v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1897 (2018); United States v. Salas, 889 F.3d 681 (10th Cir. 2018)), and the sufficiency of the evidence to support an adjudication of delinquency, within the normal restrictions of appellate evidentiary review (see generally Jonathan H. Purver & Lawrence Taylor, Handling Criminal Appeals (1980 & Supp.)).
Following review by the highest court of a jurisdiction in which review may be had (compare Thompson v. City of Louisville, 362 U.S. 199 (1960), with Costarelli v. Massachusetts, 421 U.S. 193 (1975)) – or following the refusal of that court to review the case if its jurisdiction is discretionary (see, e.g., Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)) – any federal issues preserved throughout the trial and appellate proceedings may be presented to the Supreme Court of the United States. Ordinarily the appropriate method of review by the Supreme Court in criminal and juvenile delinquency cases is by writ of certiorari under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1) (governing federal prosecutions) or 28 U.S.C. § 1257(a) (governing state prosecutions). (The Supreme Court’s potentially relevant jurisdiction to issue original writs of habeas corpus, conferred by 28 U.S.C. § 2241(a), (c)(3), is essentially moribund, but not useless in truly extraordinary circumstances (see In re Shuttlesworth, 369 U.S. 35 (1962)).) Review by certiorari is discretionary with the Court. See generally Stephen M. Shapiro, Kenneth S. Geller, Timothy S. Bishop, Edward A. Hartnett & Dan Himmelfarb, Supreme Court Practice (10th ed. 2013).

§ 39.02(b) The Indigent Respondent’s Right to Counsel Upon Appeal; to a Trial Transcript for Use on Appeal; and to Waiver of Appellate Filing Fees

Whenever the State creates an appellate process for juvenile cases, an indigent respondent has a right to court-appointed counsel at least on the first appeal as of right, under the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. Halbert v. Michigan, 545 U.S. 605, 609, 621 (2005) (“in first appeals as of right, States must appoint counsel to represent indigent defendants”: “Navigating the appellate process without a lawyer’s assistance is a perilous endeavor for a layperson”); Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387, 393-94 (1985) (dictum), and cases cited; Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, 358 (1963); see also Reed v. Duter, 416 F.2d 744 (7th Cir. 1969); In the Interest of L.G.T., 216 So. 2d 54 (Fla. App. 1968); and compare Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722 (1991), with Martinez v. Ryan, 132 S. Ct. 1309 (2012). The right to counsel on appeal encompasses a due process right to effective performance by appellate counsel, whether court-appointed or retained. Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. at 396.

Some statutes explicitly provide for the preparation of a free transcript of the trial for use on appeal when the respondent is indigent. See, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 800(d) (2018). Even when this is not provided by statute, the Fourteenth Amendment requires that a State provide indigent criminal defendants and juvenile respondents with free transcripts on both direct and collateral criminal appeals (e.g., Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487 (1963); Long v. District Court, 385 U.S. 192 (1966); Gardner v. California, 393 U.S. 367 (1969); Williams v. Oklahoma City, 395 U.S. 458 (1969); Mayer v. City of Chicago, 404 U.S. 189 (1971); see also M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102, 107, 110-12 (1996) (discussing the Griffin-Mayer line of precedent); compare United States v. MacCollom, 426 U.S. 317 (1976), and that filing fees be waived in both appeals and collateral-attack proceedings (Burns v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 252 (1959); Smith v. Bennett, 365 U.S. 708 (1961); see also Halbert v. Michigan, 545 U.S. at 610-11; M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. at 111 & n.4).
§ 39.02(c)  The Need To Move Quickly To Preserve Appellate Remedies; First Steps

Rights may be lost if the steps required to perfect an appeal or other review proceeding are not taken within the times limited by law. The periods for taking those steps may run from verdict or from disposition or from judgment, depending on local statute or court rule. They ordinarily are not long. They may or may not be tolled pending resolution of timely posttrial motions (§ 37.02 supra), depending upon local practice. Counsel will want to proceed with dispatch in filing notices of appeal, presenting bills of exceptions, or otherwise complying with the requisites of statutes and court rules governing the manner in which appellate jurisdiction is perfected. In cases in which the respondent is indigent, counsel will ordinarily also have to file an application for leave to proceed in forma pauperis on appeal.

Counsel should arrange to obtain the trial transcript for use on appeal. If local practice does not provide for the filing of the transcript as a matter of course and if the respondent is indigent, counsel should move the trial court to order the transcript prepared at public expense. See § 39.02(b) supra. Upon receiving the transcript, counsel should check it for accuracy. Ordinarily court rules allow several days after filing of the transcript with the clerk of court for counsel to file proposed amendments to it or exceptions to its accuracy. Prodigious trial notes by counsel are a valuable aid in having the transcript corrected. There are often inadvertent errors in transcripts; there may even be intentional errors or omissions, since some judges’ stenographers take down what they know their judge meant to say rather than what the judge actually said, or they omit remarks made by the judge that they know the judge would not want in the record.

If the respondent has been ordered incarcerated, counsel should give consideration to the possibility of seeking his or her release pending appeal. In most jurisdictions the trial court has discretion to order a respondent released pending appeal, see, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 800(a) (2018); and in jurisdictions that permit bail for juveniles, the trial court usually has the option of allowing either release or bond pending appeal, see, e.g., TEX. FAM. CODE ANN. § 56.01(g) (2018); WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.230(5) (2018). A judge may be particularly amenable to releasing the respondent pending appeal in a case in which the conviction turned upon the resolution of a novel legal issue and the judge is uncertain about the validity of that resolution.

If counsel does not intend to represent an adjudicated respondent in appellate proceedings, counsel should promptly inform the respondent and his or her parent of (1) the respondent’s right to appellate review (including the right to proceed at state expense if the respondent cannot afford to pay filing fees, costs, or the price of a transcript (see § 39.02(b)); (2) the time within which any actions necessary to obtain appellate review must be taken and what those actions are; (3) the realistic likelihood of success in appellate review proceedings, as counsel sees it; (4) the fact that counsel will not be representing the respondent in appellate review proceedings; (5) the fact that other counsel can be retained by the respondent to represent him or her on appeal; (6) the fact that if the respondent cannot afford to retain other counsel, a lawyer will be appointed by the court to represent him or her in at least the first appellate review proceeding as of right (see id.); and (7) the actions that the client needs to take to obtain appointment of new counsel. Unless the respondent does not want to appeal or is able to obtain other representation immediately, counsel should take the steps necessary to perfect appellate jurisdiction within the required times. See Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 478-81 (2000) (defense counsel’s failure to consult with the client about the decision whether to appeal constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel whenever there are nonfrivolous grounds for appeal or the client has indicated any interest in taking an appeal); id. at 479 (recognizing that state law may “impose[ ] on trial counsel a per se duty to consult with defendants about the possibility of an appeal”); American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice, Standard 4-9.1(a)-(c) (4th ed. 2015). Counsel’s advice to the respondent and any action taken on the respondent’s behalf, together with the respondent’s expressed intention to appeal, not to appeal, or to seek other representation, should be memorialized in detail in a letter to the respondent. Counsel should keep a file copy of this letter, together with any explanatory notes or memoranda that are necessary to preserve a record of counsel’s judgments and reasoning in regard to an appeal.

§ 39.03 COLLATERAL REVIEW

§ 39.03(a) State Postconviction Remedies

Most States have established some form of procedure by which adult criminal convictions may be attacked following affirmance on direct review or expiration of the time for direct review. The procedure may involve the use of one of the traditional writs, such as habeas corpus or coram nobis, in common-law or statutory form (see, e.g., In re Figueroa, 4 Cal. 5th 576, 229 Cal. Rptr. 3d 673, 412 P.3d 356 (2018); Jones v. Medlin, 807 S.E.2d 849 (Ga. 2017)), or it may involve a modern postconviction hearing procedure prescribed by statute or rule of court. For a description and analysis of the evolving role of state postconviction procedures, see Lee Kovarsky, Structural Change in State Postconviction Review, 93 Notre Dame L. Rev. 443 (2017).

The vast majority of state courts have recognized that these adult collateral-review procedures are equally available to juveniles in delinquency cases. See, e.g., Sult v. Weber, 210 So. 2d 739, 749 ( Fla. App. 1968) (“[t]he motion for relief in the nature of coram nobis is available in the juvenile courts of this state . . . [even] without a declaratory rule authorizing it”); E.C. v. Virginia Dep’t of Juvenile Justice, 283 Va. 522, 529-30, 536-37, 722 S.E.2d 827, 830-31, 835 (2012) (lower court erred in dismissing the adjudicated delinquent’s petition for a writ of habeas corpus: the court had jurisdiction because “the petitioner was detained for purposes of habeas corpus when the petition was filed,” and “[t]hat jurisdiction did not end because E.C. was released from detention during the course of the proceeding”; E.C.’s release from confinement also did not render the state postconviction petition moot because he continues to be subject to collateral consequences of the adjudication, including a sex offender registration requirement, the risk of the adjudication’s serving as a predicate for enhanced sentencing in a future case, and limitations on future ownership and transportation of a firearm). Compare A.S. v. State, 923
State collateral-attack procedures are ordinarily limited to “fundamental” claims (that is, for the most part, constitutional claims) or claims whose presentation in the trial and direct-review proceedings was obstructed by the courts or prosecuting authorities or by circumstances beyond defense counsel’s control (such as the unavailability of the facts on which the contentions rest) or was excusably overlooked by defense counsel. The procedures typically call for an application for relief from the judgment to be made to a trial court (often the conviction court) in the first instance and allow appellate review of its disposition. Following the state appeal (or if no appellate process is available under the State’s postconviction procedure), the respondent may seek review of any federal questions by the Supreme Court of the United States, ordinarily on certiorari. In some jurisdictions the denial of a first postconviction petition does not act as res judicata to bar second and subsequent petitions, although doctrines of waiver or collateral estoppel may bar particular claims.

§ 39.03(b) Federal Habeas Corpus

A juvenile respondent who is adjudicated a delinquent in a state proceeding is also entitled to invoke federal habeas corpus remedies pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3) (2018) under the same circumstances as an adult criminal defendant. See, e.g., A.M. v. Butler, 360 F.3d 787 (7th Cir. 2004); United States ex rel. Murray v. Owens, 341 F. Supp. 722, 723 (S.D.N.Y. 1972), rev’d on other grounds, 465 F.2d 289 (2d Cir. 1972). Before resorting to federal habeas corpus, the respondent must “exhaust” all state remedies. 28 U.S.C. § 2254(b), (c) (2018). This requires that the respondent “give the state courts one full opportunity to resolve any constitutional issues by invoking one complete round of the State’s established appellate process,” including any discretionary appeals that are an “established part of the State’s appellate review process.” O’Sullivan v. Boerkel, 526 U.S. 838, 845 (1999). As a result of statutory changes effected by the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA), a federal habeas corpus petition in a non-capital case generally must be filed within one year from the date on which the judgment of conviction and sentence became final upon completion of direct review (including certiorari proceedings in the U.S. Supreme Court), 28 U.S.C. § 2244(d)(1) (2018), and federal habeas corpus relief generally will not be granted unless the state court’s adjudication of the claim was “contrary to . . . clearly established [Supreme Court] law” or “involved an unreasonable application of clearly established [Supreme Court] law” or “resulted in a decision that was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the State court proceeding,” 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1), (2) (2018).

Juveniles convicted of crimes in a federal court can utilize a postconviction remedy that is largely equivalent to the federal habeas corpus remedy available to state prisoners. The federal-prisoner remedy, which is authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 2255, is initiated by a motion to “vacate, set aside, or correct” a federal sentence. These motions are subject to AEDPA’s one-year statute of limitations as well as various other AEDPA provisions, but are not governed by the AEDPA standard for adjudicating the merits of a state-prisoner habeas corpus petition summarized in the last sentence of the preceding paragraph.

The rules governing the filing and litigation of federal habeas corpus petitions and federal-prisoner section 2255 motions are numerous and exceedingly complex. For a detailed guide to the rules and the strategic considerations that counsel should take into account at each of the stages of these processes, see RANDY HERTZ & JAMES S. LIEBMAN, FEDERAL HABEAS CORPUS PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE (7th ed. 2015).

§ 39.04 REVOCATION OF PROBATION

As explained in § 38.03(c) supra, an order of probation ordinarily contains a series of conditions requiring, for example, that the respondent abstain from further criminal conduct, attend school regularly, and meet periodically with a probation officer. If the respondent violates one or more of these conditions, his or her probation can be revoked, and s/he can be resentenced to incarceration (for a period up to the maximum term that could have been imposed at the original dispositional hearing) or to any other disposition that was available at the original dispositional hearing. (For a description of the range of dispositional alternatives, see § 38.03(c) supra.)

The jurisdictions differ in their procedures for revoking probation and in the frequency with which revocation is used. In some jurisdictions the probation department initiates a probation revocation proceeding by filing a notice of violation with the judge who entered the original order of probation, while in other jurisdictions the probation officer brings the violation to the attention of the juvenile prosecutor’s office, which then files a petition to revoke probation if it deems that measure appropriate. Some probation offices (or some individual probation officers) rigorously enforce all conditions and will seek revocation if the respondent merely misses some appointments with the probation officer, while other offices (or individual officers) overlook these “technical” violations and will seek revocation only if the respondent is arrested for a new offense while on probation.

It is advisable for counsel to check in periodically with the respondent and the probation officer, to keep tabs on the respondent’s adjustment. Often, a warning to a respondent who is straying will be sufficient to put the client back on the right track. And often counsel will be able to persuade a probation officer to refrain from filing revocation proceedings and to give the respondent another chance.

If a notice of violation is filed and revocation sought, the respondent has a due process right under Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973), to “two hearings, one a preliminary hearing at the time of his arrest and detention to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a violation of his . . . [probation] and the other a somewhat more comprehensive hearing prior to the making of the final revocation decision.” Id. at 781-82. “At the preliminary hearing, a probationer . . . is entitled to notice of the alleged violations of probation . . ., an opportunity to appear and to present evidence in his own behalf, a conditional right to confront adverse witnesses, an independent decisionmaker, and a written report of the hearing. . . . The final hearing is a less summary one because the decision under consideration is the ultimate decision to revoke rather than a mere determination of probable cause, but the ‘minimum requirements of due process’ include very similar elements: ¶ ‘(a) written notice of the claimed violations of [probation] . . .; (b) disclosure to the [probationer] . . . of evidence against him; (c) opportunity to be heard in person and to present witnesses and documentary evidence; (d) the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses (unless the hearing officer specifically finds good cause for not allowing confrontation); (e) a “neutral and detached” hearing body . . .; and (f) a written statement by the factfinders as to the evidence relied on and reasons for revoking [probation] . . . .’” Id. at 786 (quoting Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 489 (1972)). See also Black v. Romano, 471 U.S. 606, 611-12 (1985) (describing the requirements established in Gagnon, supra); United States v. Johnson, 710 F.3d 784, 788-89 (8th Cir. 2013) (the district court violated the defendant’s due process “‘right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses’” at a revocation hearing by relying on a police report – which contained the defendant’s confession to a new crime – without requiring that the prosecution at least provide an adequate explanation for its failure to present testimony by “the arresting officer, or another officer who was present when the confession was made”).

“[C]ounsel should be provided in cases where, after being informed of his right to request counsel, the probationer . . . makes such a request, based on a timely and colorable claim (i) that he has not committed the alleged violation of the conditions upon which he is at liberty; or (ii) that, even if the violation is a matter of public record or is uncontested, there are substantial reasons which justified or mitigated the violation and make revocation inappropriate, and that the reasons are complex or otherwise difficult to develop or present. In passing on a request for the appointment of counsel, the responsible agency also should consider, especially in doubtful cases, whether the probationer appears to be capable of speaking effectively for himself.” Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. at 790-91.

Some statutes and rules or the state cases construing them expand the panoply of safeguards required by the federal constitutional guarantee of due process. For example, while the Court in Gagnon treated the right to counsel as conditional and dependent upon the facts of the case, a number of jurisdictions confer an automatic entitlement to counsel at a probation revocation hearing. See, e.g., D.C. Super. Ct. Juv. Rule 32(i)(3) (2018); N.Y. Fam. Ct. Act § 360.3(4) (2018); K.E.S. v. State, 134 Ga. App. 843, 216 S.E.2d 670 (1975). And although some courts have held that the due process prescriptions of Gagnon permit revocation to be based upon the prosecutor’s proof of a violation by a mere preponderance of the evidence (see, e.g., In the Matter of Belcher, 143 Mich. App. 68, 371 N.W.2d 474 (1985), appeal denied, 424 Mich. 863 (1985); In the Matter of Gregory M., 131 Misc. 2d 942, 502 N.Y.S.2d 570 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1986); see also In re Eddie M., 31 Cal. 4th 480, 508, 73 P.3d 1115, 1132, 3 Cal. Rptr. 119, 140 (2003) (rejecting a due process challenge to a statute authorizing revocation of probation on a preponderance of the evidence for a “probation violation ‘not amounting to a crime’”)), several States require proof beyond a reasonable doubt (see, e.g., People ex rel. C.B., 196 Colo. 362, 585 P.2d 281 (1978); T.S.I. v. State, 139 Ga. App. 775, 229 S.E.2d 553 (1976); *cf D.C. Super. Ct. Juv. Rule 32(i)(3) (2018) (beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard applies to revocations based on a new crime; preponderance standard applies to revocations based on technical violations)) or the intermediate standard of clear and convincing evidence (see, e.g., In the Interest of C.E.E. v. Juvenile Officer, 727 S.W.2d 451 (Mo. App. 1987); but see C.L.B. v. Juvenile Officer, 22 S.W.2d 233, 239 (Mo. App. 2000) (if probation revocation proceeding is used as “a forum for an adjudication of guilt of an act which would be a crime if committed by an adult, with all the collateral consequences of a conviction of that offense,” then the “beyond a reasonable doubt standard” must be applied)).

When the request for revocation of probation is based upon the respondent’s alleged commission of a new crime, the respondent will usually also be charged with the new crime in a separate Petition. In jurisdictions where the prosecutor’s burden of proof at a probation revocation hearing is a preponderance of the evidence or clear and convincing evidence, counsel should attempt to delay the revocation hearing until after there has been a trial on the new Petition, so that the validity of the new charge is first tested at trial by a beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard. If the judge refuses to delay the revocation hearing and revokes probation on the basis of the new crime before it has been separately adjudicated and if the respondent is then acquitted of the crime at trial, counsel should petition for reinstatement of probation.

If the basis of the request for revocation is that the respondent missed appointments with a probation officer, counsel should prepare for the revocation hearing by talking with the respondent and his or her parent to determine whether the respondent had a good reason for missing the appointments and whether s/he attempted to notify the probation officer that s/he was unable to come to the meeting. Counsel should also talk with the probation officer before the hearing and should ascertain what efforts the probation officer made to contact the respondent after the missed appointment. Some judges will respond to an apparent lack of effort or concern on the probation officer’s part by giving the respondent another chance. Finally, counsel should discuss with the respondent and his or her parent any problems that have arisen with the probation officer and should explore the possibility that these reflect a personality conflict between the officer and either the respondent or the parent. If a personality conflict exists and if it contributed to the respondent’s failure to keep appointments, counsel can argue at the revocation hearing that the respondent should be permitted to remain on probation and that a different probation officer should be assigned to the case as a way of testing the respondent’s ability to adjust satisfactorily once this particular source of friction is eliminated.

Many other grounds for revocation of probation can be handled by devising a plan to correct the problematic aspects of the respondent’s behavior that led to the revocation request. Armed with a plan that shows promise, counsel can argue that the respondent should be kept on probation with the mandatory features of the plan added as new probation conditions. For example, if the request for revocation is based upon truancy or misconduct at school, counsel should determine whether the respondent’s current school placement is appropriate. If it is not, counsel should identify a more suitable placement. If the current placement is appropriate (or unavoidable), counsel might consider arranging after-school tutoring or counseling. Satisfactory attendance at the new school or participation in the new after-school program would then be made additional conditions of the respondent’s probation.

When the request for revocation is based upon alcohol or drug use, counsel should locate a good day-treatment program for substance abusers – or, if the respondent’s problems are too severe for day-treatment, a good residential program. The chances of avoiding probation revocation will be greatly increased if counsel can arrange to have the respondent enter the new program before the revocation hearing. Cf. § 38.14 supra. If a new program has been arranged and particularly if the respondent has already begun to participate in it, counsel may be able to persuade the probation officer or the prosecutor to withdraw the petition for revocation or at least to hold it in abeyance for a specified period in order to allow the new program time to work. Or counsel can urge the judge at the hearing to take the same wait-and-see approach – to continue the case for a sufficient time to “give the new program a fair chance.”

As noted in § 38.03(c) subdivision (3) supra, probation revocation for failure of a respondent to pay a fine or restitution is subject to the restriction imposed by Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660, 672-73 (1983), which requires that the “sentencing court . . . inquire into the reasons for the failure to pay. . . . If the probationer could not pay despite sufficient bona fide efforts to acquire the resources to do so, the court must consider alternative measures of punishment other than imprisonment.” See also, e.g., People in the Interest of C.J.W., 727 P.2d 870 (Colo. App. 1986); M.L. v. State, 838 N.E.2d 525, 529-30 (Ind. App. 2005); WASH. REV. CODE ANN. § 13.40.200(2) (2018); and see In re Timothy N., 216 Cal. App. 4th 725, 736-38, 157 Cal. Rptr. 3d 78, 86-88 (2014).

Counsel should be alert to the possibility that a probation condition whose violation is the subject of a probation revocation proceeding may itself be invalid – on the ground that it violated the federal or state constitutions or an applicable statute, rule, or regulation – and therefore cannot provide a valid basis for revocation of probation.

§ 39.05 REVOCATION OF PAROLE
A respondent who completes a period of incarceration and is then released on parole (called “aftercare” in some jurisdictions) is subject to the revocation of parole for violation of the conditions set by the administrative agency that oversees parole. (In various jurisdictions this agency may be named the “Division for Youth,” the “Youth Authority,” the “Department of Human Services,” and so forth.) If parole is revoked, the respondent is returned to incarceration for a term that differs among the jurisdictions. In some cases, statutes may authorize or require an extended period of parole supervision following reimprisonment. See, e.g., Johnson v. United States, 529 U.S. 694 (2000).

In some jurisdictions a statute or court rule specifies a maximum term. In other jurisdictions the respondent can be incarcerated for an indeterminate period, and the agency determines when release is appropriate. Technically, the indeterminate period of incarceration is limited by the date that the judge originally set at disposition as the end of the period of “commitment” or “placement,” but many jurisdictions allow the agency to petition the court for an extension of the original term. See § 39.06 infra. Moreover, in some jurisdictions, the original term of commitment or placement automatically extends until the youth has turned 18 or 21.

Many of the defense arguments and strategies suggested in § 39.04 for use in probation revocation hearings also apply to parole revocation hearings. This includes the possibility, mentioned in the last paragraph of § 39.04, of arguing that the condition whose alleged violation is the subject of the revocation proceeding was invalid. In localities where parole revocation hearings are conventionally held before a judge of the juvenile court rather than before the agency, there may be a statutory basis for arguing that only the agency has jurisdiction to conduct the hearing. See, e.g., In the Matter of J.M.W., 411 A.2d 345 (D.C. 1980). Of course, this argument should not be made unless counsel is confident that the respondent’s chances for avoiding parole revocation are better with an agency decisionmaker than with the judge. Generally, the respondent will fare better before a judge because the agency is likely to respect the parole officer’s recommendation of revocation. However, if the juvenile correctional facility is overcrowded, the respondent’s chances of escaping reincarceration may be better with an agency decisionmaker; the agencies are often more responsive to “bed pressure” than is the judiciary.
§ 39.06 EXTENSION OF A TERM OF INCARCERATION

In some jurisdictions a respondent who has been committed for a period of incarceration can be subjected to annual extensions of the commitment until the respondent turns 18 (or, in some jurisdictions, 21) on the grounds of additional need for rehabilitation or continuing need to protect the public. See, e.g., D.C. CODE ANN. § 16-2322(c) (2018); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 355.3 (2018). Cf. Kenniston v. Department of Youth Services, 453 Mass. 179, 180, 185, 187 & n.13, 900 N.E.2d 852, 855, 858, 860 & n.13 (2009) (statute authorizing “the continued commitment of a youth in the [Department of Youth Services’] custody for an additional three years after the youth’s eighteenth birthday if the department determines that the youth ‘would be physically dangerous to the public’” violates substantive due process because the statute “permits extended detention based solely on dangerousness, without any link to a mental condition or defect or an inability to control one’s behavior”; moreover, “the statutory requirement that a juvenile be found ‘physically dangerous’ is unconstitutionally vague” because the “language contains no indication of the nature and degree of dangerousness that would justify continued commitment, and offers the department no guidance on how to make such a determination,” which can be affected by “the differences in adolescent and adult decision-making and thought processes, and the additional difficulty these differences create for testing tools designed to assess an adolescent’s risk of future dangerousness’’; In the Matter of Michael J., 180 Misc. 2d 538, 540-41, 691 N.Y.S.2d 277, 278-79 (N.Y. Fam. Ct., Monroe Cty. 1999) (a respondent who is the subject of a proceeding for an extension of placement “retains certain due process protections, including the right to notice of the hearing” – and accordingly is entitled to a “clear statement[ ] as to the bases for the request to continue his placement” – and the rights to “be present with counsel and have an opportunity to refute the petition”); State in the Interest of J.J., 427 N.J. Super. 541, 557, 49 A.3d 877, 888 (2012) (when the State seeks to invoke a state statutory procedure for transferring an incarcerated juvenile over the age of 16 from a juvenile facility to an adult correctional facility based on a “‘threat[ ] to the public safety’” or other “security” needs, due process requires, “[a]t a minimum,” “written notice of the proposed transfer and the supporting factual basis, an impartial decision maker, an opportunity to be heard and to present opposition, some form of representation, . . . and written findings of fact supporting a decision to proceed with the transfer”); and see Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71 (1992); Kansas v. Crane, 534 U.S. 407 (2002). Practice differs widely among the jurisdictions with regard to how frequently the extension process is actually invoked. In some jurisdictions it is routinely used to extend the terms of large numbers of delinquents who are thought to need further rehabilitation. In other jurisdictions the authorities have reacted to chronic overcrowding in juvenile facilities by reserving the extension option for children who appear to be most severely in need of continued treatment or whose crime or behavior in the institution leads to their being branded as unusually dangerous.

In jurisdictions that permit extensions of a juvenile’s term of incarceration, the applicable statute or caselaw usually provides for a hearing at which the state must make a showing to justify the extension and the defense can rebut this showing. If the basis for the requested extension is a need for continued rehabilitative services, counsel should seek out appropriate community-based programs and argue that these are adequate to serve the respondent’s needs. See § 38.14 supra. Counsel should also thoroughly investigate the services that the respondent has been receiving in the institution. If they are inadequate or inappropriate, counsel can argue that the requested extension of incarceration is unjustifiable because the state has shown itself incapable of actually providing services suitable to the respondent’s needs. See § 39.07 infra.

§ 39.07 MONITORING CONDITIONS OF CONFINEMENT; SEEKING THE RELEASE OF A RESPONDENT WHO IS NOT RECEIVING APPROPRIATE TREATMENT

As explained in §§ 38.24 and 38.29 supra, counsel should ordinarily request that a disposition order placing a respondent in an institutional facility specify the educational, vocational, and other rehabilitative services that the facility must provide the respondent. After the respondent is in the institution, counsel should keep in touch with him or her and ascertain whether s/he is receiving the specified services. If s/he is not, counsel can usually correct the situation by telephoning the administrator of the facility, explaining the problem, and advising the administrator that counsel will seek judicial enforcement of the disposition order unless the services it calls for are initiated promptly. If this does not produce a satisfactory outcome, counsel can file a motion for an order to show cause why the agency should not be held in contempt for failing to honor the court’s disposition order.

When the reason for the failure to provide a respondent with the required services is that the facility lacks adequate resources (for example, in the case of a facility that cannot comply with an order for special education services because its teachers are not certified to teach special education or because it is understaffed), counsel may be able to persuade the court that the respondent should be released from incarceration. In many jurisdictions the juvenile code provides for modification or termination of a disposition of commitment, see, e.g., CAL. WELF. & INST. CODE § 778 (2018); D.C. CODE ANN. § 16-2324(a) (2018); N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT § 355.1(1)(b) (2018), and counsel can argue that this relief is appropriate when the facility is unable to provide the services that the judge found were needed and that the respondent’s commitment to the facility was intended to procure. The motion should assert that the respondent has a due process right to treatment and, where applicable, a statutory right to treatment under the state’s juvenile code. See, e.g., Nelson v. Heyne, 491 F.2d 352 (7th Cir. 1974); Alexander S. By and Through Bowers v. Boyd, 876 F. Supp. 773 (D. S.C. 1995); Pena v. New York State Division for Youth, 419 F. Supp. 203 (S.D.N.Y. 1976), approved in 708 F.2d 877 (2d Cir. 1983); but see Santana v. Collazo, 714 F.2d 1172 (1st Cir. 1983). See generally Paul Holland & Wallace J. Mlyniec, Whatever Happened to the Right to Treatment?: The Modern Quest for a Historical Promise, 68 TEMP. L. REV. 1791 (1995). If state law makes no provision for the modification or termination of commitment or if relief is not likely to be obtained through those procedures, counsel can file a petition for habeas corpus seeking the release of the respondent on the ground that the institution is violating his or her constitutional right to treatment. See Creek v. Stone, 379 F.2d 106, 109 (D.C. Cir. 1967) (recognizing that a juvenile respondent can petition for habeas relief on the ground that the conditions in the detention facility “vitiate the justification for confinement”).

1128
The information that counsel gathers by monitoring the services provided to clients also can be useful in other ways. If counsel uncovers fundamental deficiencies in the treatment services or living conditions at a particular facility, that data may provide the basis for a civil suit (which can take the form of a class action) to improve conditions in the facility. See generally Michael J. Dale, Representing the Child Client (2012). In addition, when counsel represents other clients at dispositional hearings, s/he can cite the weaknesses of the facility’s services in arguing against placement at the facility.

§ 39.08 SEALING AND EXPUNGEMENT OF CONVICTION RECORDS

Several States provide for “sealing” the records of a juvenile conviction after the respondent has attained the age of majority or after the respondent, although still a juvenile, has remained crime-free for a specified period of time. See, e.g., Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code § 781 (2018); D.C. Code Ann. § 16-2335 (2018); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2151.358 (2018). See generally Riya Saha Shah, Lauren Fine & Jamie Gullen, Juvenile Records: A National Review of State Laws on Confidentiality, Sealing and Expungement (Juvenile Law Center 2014). Some States also provide for expungement of conviction records after a certain length of time or upon the respondent’s attaining the age of majority. See, e.g., Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code §§ 826-826.5 (2018); Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 46b-146 (2018); In the Matter of the Petition of C.B., 122 P.3d 1065 (Colo. App. 2005); Nelson v. State, 120 Wash. App. 470, 85 P.3d 912 (2003). See generally Shah, Fine & Gullen, supra. Expungement is also an available remedy after a conviction has been vacated in collateral-review proceedings, including federal habeas. See, e.g., Gall v. Scroggy, 603 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 2010). (“Expungement” ordinarily entails the physical destruction of the records. “Sealed” records continue to be maintained but are placed in a separate file area rendered inaccessible except under specified extraordinary circumstances.) The sealing and expungement mechanisms may be automatic, or counsel may have to file a motion for a court order activating them. (See also § 37.03 supra, dealing with procedures for expunging court and police records in cases in which the respondent was acquitted at trial or in which the charges were dismissed without a trial.)
A Accomplices
admissions against penal interest, 8.15 arrest reports, obtaining, 8.19(a)(2) caution, client speaking with, 3.19(c) co-respondents. See Co-respondents corroboration requirements, 35.04
cross-examination, 31.03 discovery, statements of accomplices, 9.07(c) interviewing, 8.15
juveniles charged jointly with respondent.
See Co-respondents
Napue rule, 31.03
witnesses
generally, 18.10(b), 33.23
defense, 10.12, 33.23
prosecution, 8.11, 8.15, 10.12, 35.04
ACD, See Diversion Acquittal
collateral estoppel rule, 17.08(f) double jeopardy consequences, 17.08 expungement motions following, 37.03 motions for. See Acquittal motions prior acquittals, references to at Initial Hearing, 4.20 reprosecution following, 17.08(c) Acquittal motions
generally, 32.01-32.03, 35.01-35.07
bench trial, 32.01
bills of particulars, demurrers to, 9.07(a) burden of proof and, 32.01, 35.01, 35.03, 35.05 closing argument consolidated with, 35.01 corroboration requirements, 35.04 granting in part, 32.03, 36.01 holding open, 32.02
jury trial, 32.01, 32.03, 36.01 inferences, permissive, 35.06(a), (f) premises, 35.06(b)-(f) renewed motions, 35.01, 36.01 reserving ruling on, 32.02 standards governing, 32.01, 35.03 statute of limitations as grounds, 17.07 timing of, generally, 32.01, 35.01, 36.01 variance as grounds, 9.07(a), 35.07 written submission, 35.02
Acting out events. See Reenactments Adjournment
court hearing, of. See Continuances dismissal, in contemplation of. See Diversion Adjudications defense witnesses, prior juvenile adjudications of, 30.07(d) impeachment with prior juvenile adjudications, 30.07(b)-(d) prosecution witnesses, prior juvenile adjudications of, 30.07(c) reprosecution after setting aside, 17.08(d) respondents, prior juvenile adjudications of,
30.07(b)
setting aside, 17.08(d) transcript. See Transcription of proceedings Adjournment in Contemplation of Dismissal. See Diversion Admissions
adoptive admissions, 24.23 guilt, admission of. See Confessions; Guilty pleas plea colloquy, admission of guilt, 14.22(a), 14.23(b), 14.26(c)
tacit admissions, 3.19(b), 24.23
Admission to program or facility before dispositional hearing, 38.14
Adoptive admissions, generally, 24.23
Adult court suppression doctrines, generally, 24.02 Adult court, transfer or waiver to generally, 2.01(d), 13.01-13.19
adjudicatory hearing in juvenile court and, 13.17 advantages, generally, 13.01 appeal of decision, 13.19 burden and standard of proof, 13.12 consequences of, 13.02, 13.06(a) contracting for therapeutic treatment, 13.15 counsel, right to, 13.04, 13.18
criteria, 13.11 cross-examination at hearing, 13.05(a) defense evidence presented at hearing, 13.05(b) defense investigations, 13.03
double jeopardy, 13.17
evidentiary rules, 13.16 expert witnesses, 13.06
fingerprint records, 13.02 governmental interest, 13.06(b) hearing, rights at, 13.04, 13.05, 13.18
hearsay, 13.16
inconsistent statements later used, 13.14 indigent clients, 13.06 investigation, preparatory, 13.01-13.02 judge’s discretion, 13.04 mental health experts, 13.14 minimum age, 13.01, 13.13
Miranda rights, 13.14
negotiations with prosecutor, 13.03 notice of transfer hearings, 13.07 parents’ help in transfer hearings, 13.08 photographic records, 13.02 places of confinement, 13.01, 13.02 plea negotiations, 13.03
police reports, 13.08
preparation for transfer hearings, 13.02, 13.03, 13.07, 13.08 pretrial detention considerations, 13.02 private interest of the juvenile, 13.06(a) probability of conviction, 13.02 probation officer’s report, 13.08 prosecutorial discretion, 13.01, 13.03, 13.04 record of hearing, 13.10
recusal of trial judge who presided over hearing, 20.05 reliability of decision-making process, 13.06(c) school performance, 13.08 sentencing, 13.01, 13.02 social history reports, 13.08 specific serious crimes requiring, 13.01, 13.04, 13.13 statement of juvenile, 13.16 statement of reasons, generally, 13.18
stipulations, 13.13
strategy for transfer hearing, generally, 13.13 suppressible evidence, admissibility, 13.16 testimony of respondent, 13.14 waiver of transfer hearing, generally, 13.09

Adults
co-perpetrators with juveniles. See Accomplices prisons for adults. See Prisons and jails prosecution as adults. See Adult court, transfer or waiver to Adult prisons. See Prisons and jails Advancing date of pretrial hearing or trial, 15.01 Adverse witnesses
accomplices as, 8.11, 8.15, 10.12 adult co-perpetrators as, 8.11, 8.15 alternatives to signed statement, in interviewing, 8.12(d), 8.14 arrest as material witness, 10.02 colleague accompanying counsel to interview, 8.12(b), 8.14
co-respondents as, 8.11, 8.15
hostile witnesses. See Hostile witnesses impeachment of. See Impeachment of witnesses instructed to refuse to talk with defense, 8.11, 8.13
interviewing, 8.11, 8.12
note-taking during interview, 8.11, 8.12 oral ratification of statement contents, 8.12(d), 8.14 order requiring to speak with defense, 9.07(d) perjured testimony. See Perjury and falsehoods police officers as, 8.11, 8.14 rapport-building, 8.12(c), 8.13 technique for taking written statements, 8.12(c)

Affidavits bias, judicial, 20.06
continuances, defense, 15.02 evidentiary hearings compared, 7.07 motions practice, generally, 7.06, 7.07 probable cause for arrest, establishing, 3.03, 8.19(b)(2), 23.07 probable-cause hearings, 4.01, 4.07(b), 4.22, 4.28 search warrants, 8.19(b)(2), 23.07 subpoenas, service of, 10.06 warrants, supporting requests for arrest warrants, 3.03, 8.19(b)(2), 23.07 search warrants, 8.19(b)(2), 23.17

Affirmations, motions practice, 7.06
Affirmative defenses
generally, 35.05

Aftercare. See Probation and parole

Age requirements adult court transfers, 13.01, 13.13 crime, time of, 17.04(b) infancy defense. See Infancy defense juvenile court jurisdiction, generally, 17.04 petition, time of filing, 17.04(a), (b)

Alcohol and drugs client’s use interviewing client, 4.07(a), 5.13 pretrial detention basis, 4.19, 4.21(b)(4) probation revocation basis, 39.04 treatment programs for alcohol abuse, arranging, 38.14 community-based treatment programs, 38.03(a) detention hearings, 4.07(a), 4.19
intoxication affirmative defense, intoxication as, 35.05 voluntariness, effect on. See voluntariness, intoxication affecting, infra

Miranda rights waivers and, 24.10(a) pretrial detention, based on, 4.19, 4.21(b)(4) probation revocation, based on, 39.04 sobriety tests at roadblocks and checkpoints, 23.29 voluntariness, intoxication affecting Miranda waivers, 24.10(a) statement of respondent, 24.05(c)

Alford guilty pleas, 14.22(a) Alibi defense
generally, 33.22, 35.05
Alibi witnesses, 8.03, 33.22

Answers. See Petitions

Apartment complexes, searches in multi-family, 23.15(c)

Appeal and review generally, 2.01(h), 39.02(a) advising client about appeal, 38.28, 39.02 bench trials, requesting specific findings in, 35.08 collateral review generally, 39.03(a), (b) guilty plea, procedural errors, 14.31 counsel, right to, 39.02(b) dispositional hearings, 38.28
guilty pleas, generally, 14.10, 14.30–14.31 hearing officer’s findings, judge’s review of, 17.08(h) digents, 39.02(b) interlocutory review defense, review sought by, 7.03(a), 26.01, 26.02 motions practice and, 7.03(a), 26.01 prerogative writs, 26.01, 26.02 pretrial rulings, 26.01, 26.02 prosecution, review sought by, 22.07 motions practice and interlocutory review, 7.03(a), 26.01 new trial. See New trial, motions for prerogative writs, interlocutory review, 26.01, 26.02 procedures, generally, 38.28, 39.02(c) release pending appeal, 39.02(c) right to appeal, generally, 39.02(a) speed required, 39.02(c) suppression hearings, 22.07
Supreme Court review, 39.02(a), 39.03(a) trial transcript, 39.02(b), (c) waiving rights to appeal, guilty plea, 14.10

Appearance ticket, 3.10

Appointment of counsel. See Counsel, right to Arraignment generally, 4.12–4.14 counsel, attachment of right to, 4.03, 24.13(a) deadlines for motions, setting, 4.14 entry of plea, generally, 4.13 initial hearing, at, 4.03 speedy trial right, 15.04(c)

Arrest generally, 3.03, 23.04–23.14 booking documents generated by, obtaining, police practices following, generally, 3.04 et seq.

police encounters as arrests, 23.04–23.14 postarrest actions by attorney, 3.17 postarrest custodial procedure, 23.14 pretext for warrantless search, 23.07, 23.08(a) probable cause, 23.07
procedures followed, generally, 3.03–3.11, 23.14 refusal to listen to police or answer, 23.11(b) reports. See Arrest reports
refusal to listen to police or answer, 23.11(b)
reports. See Arrest reports

Attorney-client privilege
applicability before appointment, 3.29, 4.06 client interview, explanation during, 5.04(d), 5.11 conversations with “wanted” clients, 3.29 expert consultants, assuring coverage of, 12.09, 38.09 explanations to respondent, 4.07(c), 5.04(d) explanation to parent or respondent, 5.11 pre-hearing interviews, 4.06, 4.07(c)

Arrest reports expungement, 37.03
obtaining, 8.19(a)(2)
police procedures, preparation, 3.08

Arrest warrants, generally, 3.03, 23.07 defense obtaining, 8.19(b)(2), 23.07 police entry of premises pursuant to, 23.19
probable cause, 23.07

Arrest without warrant

generally, 23.07
probable cause, 3.03, 23.07 search, pretext for warrantless, 23.07, 23.08(a) “wanted” clients, 3.30

Artifice, statements obtained by, 24.04(d)
Artists’ renderings. See Diagrams or sketches

Assault and battery mutual assault complainant, cross-examination of, 31.07

Attachment, subpoenaed witnesses, 10.07

Attire. See Clothing of respondents

Attorney’s work product. See Work product doctrine

Attorney-client privilege
applicability before appointment, 3.29, 4.06

Bail

generally, 4.15, 4.27
alternative to pretrial detention, as, 4.21(e) arguments for low bail, 4.27(a)–(d) assisting those posting, 4.27(f) availability, generally, 4.15
bond providers, 4.27(d), (f)
cash bond, 4.27(d)
custody orders and, 4.26, 4.27(e) extensive, 4.15, 4.27(c) extradition orders and, 4.27(e) financial resources of family, 4.27(a) “hold orders” and, 4.27(c) demand clients, 4.27(a) information needed (from client and parent/guardian, 4.27(a) personal/guardian arrangements, 3.21 preventive detention and, 4.15, 4.27(b)

Bail

generally, 4.15, 4.27
alternative to pretrial detention, as, 4.21(e)
arguments for low bail, 4.27(a)–(d)
assisting those posting, 4.27(f)
availability, generally, 4.15
bond providers, 4.27(d), (f)
cash bond, 4.27(d)
custody orders and, 4.26, 4.27(e)
extensive, 4.15, 4.27(c)
extradition orders and, 4.27(e)
financial resources of family, 4.27(a) “hold orders” and, 4.27(c) demand clients, 4.27(a) information needed (from client and parent/guardian, 4.27(a) personal/guardian arrangements, 3.21
preventive detention and, 4.15, 4.27(b) procedure for posting, generally, 4.27(f) real property bond, 4.27(d) risk of flight, 4.27(a), (b) setting bail, standards for, 4.27(a), (b) stationhouse bail, 3.20, 3.30 surety bond, 4.27(d)
“wanted” clients, 3.29, 3.30, 3.32

Ballistics, reports, 8.19(a)(7)
Bargaining, plea See Guilty pleas “Bare bones” affidavits for search warrants, 23.17(a) Battery. See Assault and battery

Bench trials
acquittal motions, 32.01, 35.01, 35.03
Bruton rule, 18.10(a), (d)
closing arguments, 35.01–35.02 defense strategies and techniques, 27.04(b) described, 27.04(a) dismissal in, 17.08(c) election of, 21.02(a), (b) evidentiary issues, procedures for litigating, 30.02(a)(1) findings of fact and conclusions of law, request for, 35.08 jeopardy, attachment of, 17.08(b)(1) mistrial motions, 34.11(b) new trial, errors requiring, 37.02(a) opening statements, 29.03(b) physical restraints used during, 27.01 preliminary conference, 27.10 prior knowledge of the case, judge having, 20.05 recusal of judge, 20.04–20.07 reprosecution following acquittal, 17.08(c) severance of respondents, 18.10(a), (d) transcript, 27.09

Bench warrants material witness procedures, 10.02 subpoenaed witnesses who fail to appear, 10.07

Best interests of the child, 2.03
Bills in equity, 4.31(e)
Bills of particulars, 9.07(a), 17.03(c)
Binoculars and flashlights, automobile searches, stops, and impoundments, 23.16

Blood tests postarrest physical examinations, 23.14 sex offenses, 8.19(a)(7), 31.06
serology experts, 8.19(a)(7), 31.06
Blotter notations, police, 3.04, 8.19(a)(11)
Body searches and extractions, 23.12, 23.14
Bond providers, 4.27(d), (f)

Booking
arrest. See Arrest officer in charge of, 3.14 procedures, generally, 3.04, 3.08 reports, 8.19(a)(11)

Border searches, 23.29, 23.30
Buildings, entry or search of. See Searches and seizures

Briefs and memoranda “Brief bank,” 6.06
closing argument, 35.02
novel defense, 35.02 sentencing memorandum, 38.16(a), (b); 38.25
“Brief bank,” 6.06

Brutality of police. See Police brutality
Bruton rule, 18.10(a), (d)

Burden of going forward affirmative defenses, respondent’s burden as to, 35.05 presumptions, burden-shifting, 35.06(c) suppression hearings, 22.03(d)

Burden of proof
affirmative defenses, 35.05
beyond a reasonable doubt, 14.04(a), 35.03, 35.06(f), 36.12 closing arguments. See Closing arguments insanity defense, 35.05
jury instructions, 36.03, 36.04, 36.06
presumptions, burden shifting, 35.06(d) probation revocation hearings, 39.04 searches and seizures, prosecutorial burden to disprove taint, 23.38
suppression hearings, 22.03(d), 23.38

Buy reports, drug cases, 3.08, 8.19(a)(7)

C
Capacity, mental. See Competency or capacity

Case planning and preparation, generally, 6.01–6.07 defense theory of the case developing, 6.01, 6.02, 6.02(c) role of narrative theory in developing and using defense theory, 6.06 types of defense theories refuting prosecution’s assertion that crime was committed, 6.02(a) refuting prosecution’s assertion that defendant was perpetrator, 6.02(b) using to guide investigation, 6.02(d), 6.03 using to guide motions practice, 6.04 using to guide sentencing preparation, 6.05 using to guide trial preparation, 6.02(d) ensuring adequate preparation despite caseload pressures, 6.01

narrative theory
nature of narrative, 6.06(a), 6.06(c)
role in case planning, 6.06
special features in jury-trial setting, 6.06(d) structure and process of narrative, 6.06(c) uses of narrative in litigation, 6.06(b) time management, 6.07
Cash bond, 4.27(d)
“Cat out of the bag” doctrine, 24.19
Cellmates, caution against speaking with, 3.19(c)
Cell phones, 9.09(b)(6), 9.12, 23.08(b), 23.30 Certification for trial as adult. See Adult court, transfer or waiver to Certiorari, 39.02(a), 39.03(a) Change of venue. See Venue, change of Character evidence
generally, 33.17–33.21
choice of witnesses, 33.19
dispositional hearings, 38.22 expert character evidence, 33.21 form of examination of witnesses, 33.18 good character, issue of, 33.17 preparation of witnesses, 33.20 prior record and, 33.17, 33.20 qualifications of witnesses, 33.18 rebuttal, proof of bad character in. 30.07(a), (b); 33.08; 33.17
reputation for truth and veracity, respondent’s, 33.06
Charge to jury. See Jury trials Charges against respondent arraignment, notification of charges, 4.12 dismissal. See Dismissal joinder and severance of counts. See Joinder and severance papers charging respondent. See Petitions Charging papers. See Petitions Checklist, client interview, 5.13
Checkpoints, automobile stops, 23.29
Child interviews. See Client interviews Child witnesses competency, 30.05
cross-examination of, 31.08 impeachment with prior adjudications of delinquency, 30.07(b)-(d) Civil commitment incompetency finding, following, 12.18, 12.19(a)
isanity, following acquittal on grounds of, 12.23
Civilian clothing, right to be tried in, 27.01
Clerks, court. See Court clerks Client interviews
generally, 5.01–5.13
attorney-client privilege explained, 4.06, 4.07(c), 5.04(d), 5.11
bail hearings, information for, 4.27(a) business card given to client, 5.04(c) checklist, 5.13 conditions of client’s confinement, 5.09 conditions of interview, 4.06
continuances to allow, 4.06 decision-making responsibilities explained, 5.04(e)
detention hearing, information needed for,
4.07(a) developing relationship with client
generally, 5.03–5.05
dry run of cross-examination, 5.12 effective assistance of counsel, ground for requesting time to interview client, 4.06 facts of the offense discussed, 5.06, 5.07 fee-setting, 5.11
full-scale interview, 5.01
initial hearing
first meeting on day of, 4.05–4.07, 5.01 information needed for, 4.07 initial interview at police station, 3.22, 5.01 introductory phase, 5.03 mentally ill or intellectually disabled client, 12.01 model interview, 5.13
note-taking during, 5.05
parents and guardians presence or absence, 5.03(a), (b) further discussion with, 5.11 pre-detention interviews, 4.08 police brutality, about, 5.09 police station as site of, 3.22 pre-detention hearing interviews, 5.08 prehearing interviews attorney-client privilege, 4.06, 4.07(c) complainants, 4.07(b)
continuances to allow, 4.06 detention hearing, information needed for, 4.07(a) effective assistance of counsel, ground for requesting time to interview client, 4.06 information needed from client, 4.07 opportunity to conduct, 4.06 parents/guardians, 4.08 probable-cause hearing, information needed for, 4.07(b) preparation for, 5.02
probable-cause hearing, 4.07(b) relationship developing. See developing relationship during, supra established during interviews, 5.04(a), (b) release of records and information form, 5.11 roles of attorney and client explained, 5.04(e) social history discussed, 5.08 subsequent interviews, 5.12 suppression motion, facts needed for, 5.07 telephone conversations. See Telephone calls

Client’s testimony. See Respondents Closed containers, searches or seizures, 23.08(b), 23.15(d), 23.24–23.26

Closing arguments
acquittal motion consolidated with, 35.01 affirmative defenses, 35.05
bench trials, 35.01–35.02
burden of proof

generally, 35.02–35.05, 36.12
affirmative defenses, 35.05
prosecutor’s burden, 35.03–35.04; 35.06(c), (f); 36.12
corroboration requirements, use of, 35.04 defense arguments, 36.12
interruptions, 36.11 jury trials, 36.10–36.12
legal arguments in, 36.12
memoranda, 35.02
missing witness inference, use of, 35.02 objections to, 36.11 order of closing, 35.01, 36.10
presumptions and inferences, 35.02, 35.06
prosecutor’s closing, generally, 36.11 rebuttal and surrebuttal arguments, 36.10, 36.12 unsubstantiated allegations by prosecutor, 36.12

Closure of courtroom proceedings, 27.08

Clothing
perpetrator’s clothing, descriptions of, 8.19(a) respondent’s. See Clothing of respondents witness’s clothing, advice on, 10.09(b)

Clothing of respondents alibi witness testimony, 33.22 arrest, at time of, 5.07, 8.19(a)(4) civilian clothing, right to be tried in, 27.01 crime, at time of alibi witness testimony, 33.22 fabric analysis, police report on,
8.19(a)(7)

interviewing client about, 5.07 fabric analysis, police reports on, 8.19(a)(7) plea hearings, at, 14.23(d) trial, during, 10.11, 27.01, 27.05(b)

Co-defendants. See Adult co-perpetrators;
Co-respondents

Coercion, suppression of statements, 24.03–24.06 Collateral estoppel generally, 17.08(f)
by the defense against the prosecution, 17.08(f)
double jeopardy. See Double jeopardy opposing prosecutorial attempts to invoke, 17.08(f)

postconviction proceedings, in, 39.03(a) Collateral review. See Appeal and review
Commissioners. See Judges Commitment. See Placement
Common law doctrines, suppression of statements, 24.16
Community mental health centers, 12.03 Community-based programs
admission prior to dispositional hearing, 38.14
dispositional hearings, witnesses in, 38.11 dispositional option, 38.03(a), (c) dispositions

admission prior to dispositional hearing, 38.14
ordered as part of, 38.03 success in program as argument, 12.07, 38.14
group homes, 38.03(c) locating prior to dispositional hearing, 38.14 negotiations with prosecutor, suggesting programs in, 12.05, 14.16 ordered as part of disposition, 38.03 prehearing interviews, 4.07(a) probation revocation proceedings, strategy, 39.04
substance abuse programs, 39.04 success in program as argument, 12.07, 38.14

Competency or capacity diminished capacity defense, 12.06, 33.21 examinations. See Mental health Incompetency. See Incompetency to stand trial infancy defense, 17.04(b) insanity. See Insanity defense sanity. See Insanity defense; Mental health trial, competence to stand. See Incompetency to stand trial

voir dire, competency of witnesses, 30.05 witnesses, generally, 30.05

Complainant
anomalies in behavior of, 6.02(c) character of, discussions with prosecutor using, 9.06
child, 31.08 cross-examination of. See Cross-examination of witnesses defense theories, fabrication or mistake, 6.02(a) fabrication or mistake, testimony as, 6.02(a) identification testimony. See Identification evidence

injury to, described in police report, 8.19(a)(7) medical examination of, court ordered, 9.07(d) medical records of, obtaining, 8.19(a)(1), (c)(6) perjured testimony. See Perjury and falsehoods prior unfounded complaints, 9.06 probable-cause hearing, 4.07(b), 4.30

1281
psychiatric examination of, court ordered, 9.07(d) refusal to speak with defense, 8.13, 9.07(d) Complaint reports, 3.08, 8.03, 8.19(a)(1)
Composites of suspect, 8.19(a)(9), 9.07(c) Compulsory process constitutional right, 9.09(b)(4) co-respondent as witness, 18.10(b) discovery, 9.09(b)(4), (b)(7) right to present a defense, 9.09(b)(4), 33.04
subpoenas. See Subpoenas unfair balance of advantage favoring prosecution, 9.09(b)(7)
Conditional discharge, 37.01, 38.03(c)
Conditions of confinement, 3.22(b), 5.09, 23.14
Confessions
adult court suppression doctrines, applicability of, 24.02
Bruton doctrine, 18.10(a), (d); 30.06
“cat out of the bag” doctrine, 24.19
corpus delicti principle, 24.20
co-respondent’s, admissibility of, 18.10(a), (d); 30.06 corroboration requirement, 35.04
delay following arrest, statements taken during, 4.25, 24.15 discovery and investigation, 8.19(a)(6), 9.07(c) eavesdropping on conversation between respondent and counsel, 24.17 fabrication by police, 6.02(b)
Fourth Amendment violations, fruits of, 23.37, 24.18
fruits of prior constitutional violations, 23.37, 24.18, 24.19 illegal detention, made during, 24.15, 24.18 impeachment of respondent with, 24.22, 33.06, 33.09(a) interlocking, 18.10(a) interviewing clients about, 5.07, 5.09, 5.13 involuntary statements
generally, 24.03–24.06
burdens of production and persuasion, 22.03(d) characteristics of respondent relevant to, 24.05 coercion by police, 24.04 common law doctrine of involuntariness, 24.16 private citizens, statements coerced by, 24.06, 24.16 school officials, statements coerced by, 24.06 standard for assessing voluntariness, 24.03 joint trials, 18.08; 18.10(a), (d); 30.06 mentally ill or intellectually disabled respondents, 12.04, 24.05(b) Miranda doctrine
generally, 3.06, 3.19(f), 24.07–24.12
applicability, 24.08 assertions of Miranda rights, 24.11
burdens of production and persuasion, 22.03(d) custodial interrogation, as precondition for, 24.08 custody, definition of, 23.04(c), 24.08(a) interrogation, definition of, 24.08(b) juvenile’s ability to comprehend warnings, 24.10(b) knowing and intelligent waiver, 24.10(b) language used in warnings, 24.09 mental health examinations, 12.15(a), 13.14, 38.07 private citizens, interrogation by, 24.12 public safety exception, 24.07 school officials, interrogation by, 24.12 transfer to adult court, warning regarding, 24.09 silence, assertions of right to, 24.11(b) voluntariness of waiver, 24.10(a) waivers of rights, 24.10, 24.11 parent’s presence during interrogation constitutional requirements, 24.14(a) statutory requirements, 3.06, 24.14(b) prosecutorial proof of corpus delicti prior to using, 24.20 protecting arrested client against interrogation, 3.05; 3.08; 3.17; 3.19(b), (f); 3.20; 3.22; 3.23; 5.10 right to counsel, violations of generally, 24.13 critical stage, definition of, 24.13(a) deliberately elicited, definition of, 24.13(b) Massiah doctrine, 24.13
waivers of right to counsel, 24.13(c) statutory requirements for interrogation of juveniles, 3.06, 24.14(b), 24.15 suppression hearings, techniques. See Suppression hearings suppression of
generally, 24.01–24.19
adult court suppression doctrines, applicability of, 24.02
burdens of production and persuasion, 22.03(d) “cat out of the bag” doctrine, 24.19

delay following arrest, statements taken during, 4.25, 24.15
eavesdropping on conversation between respondent and counsel, 24.17

Fourth Amendment violations, fruits of, 23.37, 24.18
fruits of prior constitutional violations, 23.37, 24.18, 24.19

involuntary statements. See involuntary statements, supra Massiah doctrine. See right to counsel, violations of, supra

Miranda doctrine. See Miranda doctrine, supra parental presence, violations of right to, 24.14 right to counsel, violations of. See right to counsel, violations of, supra use of statements at trial circumstances under which statement was made, defense right to show, 24.21

corroboration requirement, 35.04
corpus delicti principle, 24.20 impeachment of respondent with pre- or post-arrest silence, 24.23, 33.06, 33.09(a) impeachment of respondent with suppressed statement, 24.22, 33.06, 33.09(a) trustworthiness, defense theories for challenging, 6.02(b), 24.21

Confidentiality

juvenile records, 14.07, 30.07(c), 37.03, 39.08 privileged conversations. See Privileges prosecution’s motion, on, 15.03–15.04, 22.03(a) right to counsel as ground for, 4.03, 4.06, 4.38, 9.09(b)(1), 15.02

Co-perpetrators

adult co-perpetrators. See Accomplices juvenile co-perpetrators jointly charged with respondent. See Co-respondents not jointly charged with respondent. See Accomplices

Coram nobis, writs of, 39.03(a)

Co-respondents

admissibility of statements implicating respondent, 18.10(a), (d); 30.06 admissions against penal interest, 8.15 adverse witnesses, as, 8.11, 8.15, 31.03 arrest reports for, obtaining, 8.19(a)(2) corroboration requirements, 30.06, 35.04 defense witnesses, as, 10.12, 18.10(b), 33.23 investigative interview of, 8.15 joinder of. See Joinder and severance plea bargain requiring information or testimony against, 14.18, 14.25 refuting testimony by, 6.02(b) severance of. See Joinder and severance state’s evidence, turned, 31.03 testimony of, 18.10(b), 30.06, 31.03, 33.23, 35.04
Corpus delicti principle, 24.20
Corroboration
  accomplice’s testimony, 30.06, 35.04 confession of respondent, 35.04
  jury instructions, 36.04
Costs. See Fees and costs Counsel, right to generally, 4.03, 9.09(b)(1)
adult court transfer or waiver hearings, 13.04, 13.18 appeal, indigents’ rights on, 39.02(b) appointment of counsel, 4.04 assertion of right, client in custody, 3.17; 3.19(b), (d), (f); 3.20; 5.10; 24.11(c) attachment, generally, 4.03, 24.13(a) confessions, 24.07–24.13
conflicts of interest, 4.04, 10.12 consultations with attorney during trial, 10.10, 27.02 continuances and, 4.06, 4.38, 15.02 detention hearings, 4.03
discovery rights and, 4.10, 9.09(b)(1)
dispositional hearings, 38.02 dispositions. See Dispositions effective assistance of counsel, 9.09(b)(1), 15.02 Escobedo doctrine, 24.13(a) identification procedures, 3.19(d), 3.20, 3.22, 5.10, 25.06 initial hearing, 4.03; 4.04; 4.31(b), (e) lineups, 3.19(d), 3.20, 3.22, 5.10, 25.06
Massiah doctrine, 24.13
Miranda doctrine, 3.06, 3.19(f), 24.07–24.12 preparation time, adequate, 4.06, 4.14, 4.38, 9.09(b)(1), 15.02 probable-cause hearings, 4.03, 4.31(b), (c) probation intake process, attorney’s role, 3.26–3.28
probation revocation hearings, 39.04 scheduling of trial and, 4.14
show-ups, 25.06
trial, 9.09(b)(1), 10.10, 27.02 trial date and, 14.14 waiver
  Massiah doctrine, 24.13
  Miranda doctrine, 24.07–24.12
pro se representation, 4.05 Counseling services client interviews, information sought, 4.07(a) dispositions in. See Community-based programs prehearing interviews, information sought,
  4.07(a)
Counts. See Joinder and severance; Petitions Court clerks court file, preparation of official, 3.12 records of client, prior, 4.10
Court commissioners. See Judges
Court liaison officers. See Probation and parole officers Court witnesses, generally, 33.25
Crime proceeds, seizure of, 14.07
Crime scene. See Scene of the crime Criminal intent. See Intent Cross-examination of witnesses
generally, 31.01–31.12
accomplices turned state’s evidence, 31.03 adult court transfer or waiver hearings, 13.05(a) avoiding common pitfalls of, 31.01(d) bias against respondent, 31.03 child complainant or witness, 31.08 confrontation clause, 31.01(a), 31.13 cumulative testimony, 31.13 deciding whether to cross-examine, 31.01(b) defense witnesses, preparation of generally, 10.09(d)
  alibi witnesses, 33.22
  character witnesses, 33.20
  expert witnesses, 33.16
  respondent, 5.12, 10.10
expert witnesses. See Experts framing cross questions, 31.01(c) goals of, 31.01(b)
hostile witnesses, 31.13
identification of stolen items, 31.04 identification witnesses, 31.05
impeachment. See Impeachment leading questions, 31.01(d) limiting or curtailing, 4.33, 31.01(a) mutual assault complainant, 31.07
Napue violation, 31.03 opening the door to redirect, 31.01(a) police witnesses, 31.02
preparing for expert cross-examination, 31.09 probable-cause hearings, 4.28, 4.31(e), 4.32, 4.33 prosecution witnesses, generally, 31.01–31.12 rape complainant, 31.06
respondent
  preparing respondents for, 5.12, 10.10 scope, allowable, 33.06, 33.09(a) sexual offense complainant, 31.06 suppression hearings, 22.02, 22.03(e), 22.04 theft complainants, 31.04
Curfew
  pretrial detention and, 4.07(a), 4.08, 4.11, 4.19, 4.21(b)(3)
  probation orders regarding, 38.03(c)
Curtilage of home, searches, 23.15(c) Custody evidence, chain of custody, 8.18 interrogation, custodial. See Miranda rights

Custody of respondent bail, custody orders and, 4.26, (a)(1), (a)(2); 4.27(e)

Miranda doctrine, custodial interrogation, 3.06, 3.19(f), 23.04(e), 24.08(a) postarrest custodial treatment, 3.03–3.12, 23.14 pretrial detention, selecting level, 4.21(e), 4.24 release to custody of parent or guardian, 3.10, 3.11, 3.21 state agency administering juvenile placement facilities, transfer to, 38.03(c) television calls, clients in police custody, 3.13–3.21, 3.23

D Dangerousness
civil commitment, basis for, 12.18-12.19, 12.23 incompetency to stand trial and, 12.18-12.19 insanity acquittal and, 12.23 mental health examination ordered, 12.11 pretrial detention, basis for, 3.10, 3.11, 3.24, 4.17, 4.21(b)-(d), 4.26(a)(1)

Dates. See Time and date
Daubert test for admissibility of expert testimony, 33.11
Day-of-trial continuance requests, 15.02
Deadlines. See Time and date
Defendant. See Respondent
Defenders, public, coping with caseloads of, 6.06
Defense investigation. See Investigation Defense motions. See Motions practice
Defenses
affirmative. See Affirmative defenses alibi. See Alibi defense diminished capacity, 12.06, 33.21
incompetency to stand trial. See Incompetency to stand trial infancy, 17.04(b)
insanity. See Insanity defense
intoxication, 35.05
misidentification, 31.05, 31.06 novel defense, memorandum on, 35.02 self-defense. See Self-defense sex offenses, 31.06

Defense theory of the case. See Theory of the case Definitions. See Words and phrases Demand rule, speedy trial right, 15.04(c) Demurrers evidence, to. See Acquittal motions Denial of charges, arraignment, 4.13
Depositions defense witnesses’ testimony, 10.02 prosecution witness’ deposition, 9.07(e) Derivative evidence principle, 23.37, 24.18
Desk officers, police, 3.14

Desks searched by school officials, 23.35
Destruction of evidence, motions for sanctions, 9.09(b)(6), (7)
Detention
adult jails and lock-ups, 4.18
arraignment, pending generally, 3.10-3.12
arrest. See Arrest detention facility officials’ decision, 3.11, 3.21, 3.24 police discretion, 3.10, 3.19(b) social factors, 3.10, 3.12, 3.24, 3.28
arrest. See Arrest
bail. See Bail disposition, pending, 37.01
facilities abuse of respondent in, remedies, 5.09
adult jails and lockups, 4.18 detention decisions by facility officials, 3.11, 3.24 home detention, 4.18, 4.21(e) inappropriateness of for respondent, as reason for release, 4.21(d)(2) non-secure detention, 4.18 private group homes, 4.21(e) records of, obtaining, 8.19(a)(11), 9.07(c) secure detention, 4.17, 4.18 shelter houses, 4.18, 4.21(e) guilty pleas and, 14.06(c)(3), 14.11 hearings. See Detention hearings lockups, pretrial detention in, 4.18
order, 4.24
plea hearing followed by delayed disposition, 14.26(d) pretrial. See trial, pending, infra prosecutorial agreement to support release, 14.06(c)(3) reduced detention status pending disposition, 37.01 secure detention facilities, 4.17, 4.18 speedy trial rights, effect of detention on, 15.04(a), (b) suppression of statements. See Confessions trial, pending

generally, 4.15-4.27
alternatives, 4.21(e) appearance for court hearings, custody orders resulting from non-appearance, 4.26(a)(2)
bail. See Bail changes in child’s life removing need for, 4.21(d)(1) community or counseling programs, 4.07(a), 4.21(b)(4)
curfews, 4.19, 4.21(b)(3) custody orders, 4.26(a)(1), (2) dangerousness and, 4.17; 4.21(b), (c) defense arguments for release, generally, 4.21 employment information and, 4.07(a), 4.09, 4.19 extradition orders, 4.26(b) family members and, 4.07(a), 4.09, 4.19 flight, risk of, 4.17, 4.21(a) frequency, 4.15 hearings. See Detention hearings immediate and urgent necessity for, 4.17 inappropriateness of facilities for respondent, 4.21(d)(2) investigation impeded by, 4.21(d)(3) joinder of charges and, 18.02 less restrictive alternatives, 4.17 level of custody, selecting, 4.21(e), 4.24 likelihood of flight and lack of dangerousness, relationship of standards, 4.07(a), 4.21 mitigating facts, 4.07(a) modification when prosecutor delays proceedings, 15.03 parents patriae doctrine and detention in adult facility, 4.18 parole or probation officers, 4.07(a), 4.09, 4.11 places of detention, 4.18 preventive detention, 4.15, 4.27(b) prior record and, 4.07(a), 4.10, 4.16, 4.21(b)(1) probable-cause hearing and, 4.22, 4.29, 4.32 probation intake process and, 3.12, 3.26 psychological problems, 4.21(b)(4) revocation of probation or parole on prior charge, 4.26(a)(3) scheduling of trial and, 4.14 school performance and, 4.07(a), 4.09, 4.19 speedy trial rights, effect on, 15.04(a), (b) standards governing, 4.17, 4.21
substance abuse and, 4.07(a), 4.19, 4.21(b)(4)

Detention hearings
generally, 4.01, 4.19-4.27
client interview prior to, 4.07(a), 5.08
defense arguments, 4.21
decisive impact of outcome, 4.16

Diminished capacity defense, 12.06, 33.21

Directed verdict, 32.01, 35.01, 35.03, 36.01

Diagrams or sketches defense diagrams, 8.19(c)(2) discovery motion, 9.07(c) police diagrams and sketches, 8.19(a)(9), 9.07(c) suppression hearing, use of diagram, 22.04(e)

Discovery
generally, 9.01-9.13
adult discovery rules, 9.01, 9.02 bill of particulars, 9.07(a) Brady doctrine, 9.09(a) compulsory process right and, 9.09(b)(4) conferences, 9.06 confrontation right and, 9.09(b)(3) constitutional bases for right of, generally, 9.09 deadline for filing motions, 4.14 defense position, generally, 9.02 defensive evidence, right to present and, depositions. See Depositions evidentiary hearings on motion for, 16.01

Fair notice of charges and, 9.09(b)(2)
“fishing expeditions,” 9.05, 9.08

FOILs, 9.07(f)
formal, 9.01, 9.07-9.13

Freedom of Information laws, 9.07(f) generalized motions, 9.07(c) governmental privilege, 9.10(c) in camera inspection before production, indigents, 9.09(b)(8) informal, 9.01, 9.03-9.06 informer’s privilege, 9.10(a) interrogatories. See Interrogatories interview notes or reports, 5.05, 8.10, 9.11, 27.12(b), 33.03 items to be produced, generally, 9.07(c) letters, 9.05
jurors, records of past, 21.04 medical or psychiatric examinations, 9.07(d) motions, generally, 4.14, 9.07 order requiring complainant or witness to speak with defense, 8.13, 8.14, 9.07(d) perjured testimony, prosecutorial presentation of, 9.09(b)(5) pre-existing writings, 9.12 pre-sentence reports, 38.08 pretrial conference, 27.10 probable-cause hearings and, 4.29, 4.32-4.34 prosecutorial, 8.10, 9.11-9.13, 27.12(b) prosecutorial suppression of evidence favorable to defense, 9.09(b)(6) reciprocity, 9.12
redaction of portions of document, 27.12(c) requests for production of documents. See Production of documents, requests for right to counsel and, 9.09(b)(1) right to discovery, generally, 9.01, 9.09 self-incrimination privilege and, 9.12 specificity of requests, 9.05, 9.08 statements of respondent, 9.07(c) statements of witnesses, 9.07(c); 9.09(a); 22.03(f); 27.12(a)(1), (b); 33.03 strategy, generally, 9.04, 9.08 suppression hearings, used in, 22.02, 22.04(b) trial, at, 27.12
unfair balance of advantage favoring prosecution, 9.09(b)(7)

Dispositions

acquittal, motion for. See Acquittal motions dismissed cases, references to in detention hearing, 4.20 dispositional stage, at, 37.02(e); 38.03(a), (c)
double jeopardy, 17.08
failure to charge a crime, 17.03
furtherance of justice, dismissal in the, 37.02(e) grounds, generally, 2.01(d), 17.01-17.08
interests of justice, dismissal in the, 37.02(e) jurisdiction, for lack of. See Jurisdiction of court justice, dismissal in the interests of, 37.02(e) limitations, statute of, 17.07
motions to dismiss
generally, 2.01(d), 4.23, 17.01-17.08
double jeopardy, 17.08
failure to charge a crime, 17.03 furtherance of justice, 27.02(e) jurisdiction, lack of. See Jurisdiction of court posttrial motions, 37.02(b), (e); 38.03(a), (c) speedy trial, for denial of, 15.04
venue, lack of, 17.05, 20.02 want of prosecution, 15.03
petition. See Petitions
posttrial motions, 37.02(b), (e); 38.03(a), (c) probation intake process and, 3.12
prosecution, by, 4.20 selective enforcement, on ground of, 17.01 social reasons, 37.02(e) speedy trial, for denial of, 15.04
venue, lack of, 17.05, 20.02
want of prosecution, 15.03

Dismissal

acquittal, motion for. See Acquittal motions dismissed cases, references to in detention hearing, 4.20
dispositional stage, at, 37.02(e); 38.03(a), (c)
double jeopardy, 17.08
failure to charge a crime, 17.03
furtherance of justice, dismissal in the, 37.02(e) grounds, generally, 2.01(d), 17.01-17.08
interests of justice, dismissal in the, 37.02(e) jurisdiction, for lack of. See Jurisdiction of court justice, dismissal in the interests of, 37.02(e) limitations, statute of, 17.07
defense, 38.09, 38.10, 38.14, 38.22
educational records, obtaining, 38.08 educational testing for, 38.04(b) exhibits for dispositional hearing, gathering, 38.08, 38.11 group home, placement in, 38.03(c) guilty pleas, obtaining favorable dispositions by. See Guilty pleas hearing character evidence, 38.22
cross-examining agency witnesses, 38.21 defense evidence, 38.22
defense recommendation, presenting, 38.23 evidentiary hearing, right to, 38.17
evidence, 38.11, 38.22
findings of fact and conclusions of law, 38.24 hearsay evidence, 38.20 motion for, 38.17(a) nature of, 38.04(c) parent of respondent addressing court at, 38.27 preparing for, 38.06, 38.08, 38.09, 38.11, 38.12, 38.14 respondent addressing court at, 38.26 rules of evidence, applicability of, 38.20 school records, obtaining, 38.08 scheduling, 37.01, 38.15 sentencing memorandum, 38.16
subpoenaing records for, 38.08 techniques for conducting, 38.19, 38.21-38.25
timing of, 38.01, 38.15
waiver of, strategic reasons for, 38.18
witnesses. 38.11, 38.21-38.22
incarceration in state-run adult facility, 38.03(c) judge’s power to order specific program, 38.03(b) extensive civil commitment, 38.23 letters of support, gathering, 38.11 medical testing, for use in selection of, 38.04(b) memorandum in support of particular disposition. See sentencing memorandum, infra mental health examination for, 38.04(b), 38.06-38.07, 38.09
mental health experts court mental health personnel, 38.04(b), 38.06-38.07, 38.12, 38.21 defense experts, 38.09
negotiated, 38.13
parent of respondent discharging hearing, addressing court at, 38.27 persuading to support least restrictive disposition, 38.05 placement facilities for, 38.03(c) modification or termination of, 39.07 monitoring conditions of confinement, 39.07 types of placement, 14.06(b), 38.03(c) pre-sentence report defense counsel’s meetings with report writer, 38.06, 38.12 description of, 14.06(c)(1), 38.04(a) meeting with report writer, preparing respondent for, 38.05(a) obtaining copy of, 38.08 preparation of, probation officer’s, 38.04 waiver of, pursuant to guilty plea. See Guilty pleas prison without walls, 38.03(c) probation, 38.03(c) probation officers
cross-examining at dispositional hearing, 38.21 defense counsel’s meeting with, 38.06, 38.12 negotiating with, 38.13 preparing respondent for meeting with, 38.05(a) pre-sentence report, 38.04(a), 38.08 role of, 37.01, 38.04(a), 38.19 probation without verdict, 14.06(b), 38.03(c) prosecutor, negotiating with, 38.13
respondent
discharging hearing, addressing court at, 38.26 explaining dispositional procedures to, 38.05 mental health examination, preparing for, 38.07 probation officer, preparing for meeting with, 38.05(a) restitution, 38.03(c)
school records, obtaining, 38.08 sentences, types of. See types of dispositions, infra sentencing memorandum form and content, 38.16(b) reasons for submitting, 38.16(a) social worker, obtaining assistance from, 38.10 suspended judgment, 38.03(c) timing of dispositional hearing, 37.01, 38.15

types of disposition adjournment in contemplation of dismissal, 14.06(b), 38.03(c)
conditional discharge, 38.03(c) dismissal of case, 37.02(e); 38.03(a), (c) diversion, 14.06(b), 19.01-19.06, 38.03
group home, placement in, 38.03(c) incarceration in state-run adult facility,
38.03(c)
placement. See placement, supra prison without walls, 38.03(c)
probation, 38.03(c) probation without verdict, 14.06(b), 38.03(c)
restitution, 38.03(c)
suspended judgment, 38.03(c) waiver of dispositional hearing, 38.18

Disqualification of judge. See Recusal or disqualification of judge
Diversion, 14.06(b), 19.01-19.06, 38.03(c) defense counsel’s responsibilities, 19.01 diversion plan, developing and implementing, 19.05
factors to cite in support of diversion circumstances of crime, 19.03(a) circumstances of respondent’s life, 19.03(b)
guilt and penitence, 19.06 motion for, 19.01
police discretion, 3.07, 3.19(b), 3.20
prior instances of, preventing references to, 4.20 prosecutorial consent, 19.03-19.04 if not required for diversion, 19.03 if required for diversion, 19.04 prosecutor’s discretion, invoking in first instance, 19.02 timing postconviction, 14.06(b), 19.01-19.06,
38.03(c)
pretrial, 19.01-19.06

Document requests. See Production of documents, requests for

Double jeopardy
generally, 17.08
adult court transfer hearings and, 13.17 attachment of jeopardy, 17.08(b)(1) collateral estoppel, 17.08(f) guilty pleas and, 14.12 hearing officer’s dismissal, de novo trial after,
17.08(b)
judge’s review of referee’s or hearing officer’s findings, 17.08(b) mistrials, implications of, 17.08(e), 34.11(d), 36.17
motion to dismiss petition due to, 17.01, 17.08 motions practice and, 7.03(b), 17.08 reprosecution, 17.08(a), (c)-(g) same offense, defined, 17.08(b)(2)

Dress. See Clothing of respondents

Driver license checks, traffic stops, 23.29
Drivers, search incident to arrest, 23.08(b), 23.26
“Dropse” fact pattern, 23.13

Drugs and drug abuse. See Alcohol and drugs

Due process defensive evidence, right to present, 9.09(b)(4), 33.04
delinquency proceedings, protections, 2.03, 21.01
destruction of evidence by prosecution, 8.13;
9.09(b)(6), (7)
discovery, right of, 9.09 expert assistance, state-paid, 11.03(a) indigents, 4.31(d), 8.04, 11.03(a) notice of charges, fair, 4.12, 9.09(b)(2) prosecutor’s instructions to witness not to talk to defense, 8.13
speedy trial, 15.04(b) unfair balance of advantage, 9.09(b)(7)

Duress, burden of proof, 35.05

Dwellings. See Homes and housing; Searches and seizures

E Eavesdropping on attorney-client communications, 3.19(a), 24.17
on conversations of confined client, 3.19(a), 3.19(c)
electronic, 24.19

Education. See Schools

Effective assistance of counsel. See Counsel, right to Electronic recording of interrogations, 24.18 of interviews by defense, 8.12(d)

Electronic surveillance generally, 23.02(c), 23.16, 24.17, 24.18 attorney-client conversations, 24.17 federal statutory regulation, 23.02(c), 24.17, 24.18
Fourth Amendment violations, 23.02(c), 23.16, 24.17, 24.18
Massiah doctrine, 24.13

Employers and employees character witnesses, employers as, 33.19 interviewing prior to detention hearing, 4.07(a), time clock cards, obtaining, for alibi defense, 8.19(c)(7)

Equal Protection bail, excessive, 4.27(c) counsel, court-appointed, 4.03, 39.02(b) discovery, right of, 9.09(b)(8) experts, state funding for, 8.04, 11.03(a) investigators, state funding for, 8.04 jury selection, exclusion of class, 21.03(a)-(b), 28.03(b) transcripts, public expense, 4.31(d), 4.37, 39.02(b)

Equity, bills in, 4.31(e)
Escobedo doctrine, right to counsel, 24.13(a) Estopel. See Waiver
Event reports. See Complaint reports Evidence
adult court rules, 30.01 bench trials, methods for litigating evidentiary issues, 30.02(a), (a)(1); 34.01-34.11 burden of going forward. See Burden of going forward burden of proof. See Burden of proof cost of custody, 8.18 dhesion. See Character evidence cospondent as witness. See Co-respondents constitutional right to present defense evidence, 9.09(b)(4), 33.04 defense acquisition of, 8.01-8.19 defense evidence deciding whether to present, 33.01 demonstrative, 10.13, 10.15 demurrer. See Acquittal motions derivative evidence, 23.37, 24.18 destruction by prosecution, 8.13; 9.09(b)(6), (7) discovery. See Discovery
dispositional hearings, 38.22
electronic, 10.13-10.15
exhibits. See Exhibits guilty pleas, admissibility of withdrawn or invalid, 14.29(c) hearsay. See Hearsay impeachment. See Impeachment insufficient evidence generally. See Acquittal motions new trial motion on grounds of, 37.02, 37.02(d) jury trials, methods for litigating evidentiary issues, 30.02(a), (a)(2); 34.01-34.11 motions in limine, 7.03(c), 30.02(a), 34.04 newly discovered, 37.02, 37.02(c) objections to. See Objections other crimes evidence, 30.07 perishable evidence, preserving, 8.03, 8.16 prejudicial impact of, 30.03 preliminary questions of fact bearing upon admissibility, 30.02(a)(2) prevention of evidence, 8.03, 8.18 prima facie evidence, 28.03(b), 35.06(d) probable-cause hearings, 4.31(c), 4.36 probative-prejudice balance, 30.03 proffers, 34.10
real authentication, 10.14(c) photographs of, 10.14(b) preparing and presenting, 10.13-10.14 preservation of, 8.16-8.19 tests on, 8.18
relevancy, 30.03
scientific testing of. See Scientific tests search and seizure issues. See Searches and seizures stipulations, 30.02(b) suppression of evidence defense motions for. See Confessions; Identification evidence; Searches and seizures
prosecutor, by, 8.13; 9.09(b)(6), (7) tainted evidence. See Searches and seizure transfer hearings, 13.05(b), 13.16 verdict against the weight of. 37.02(d) witnesses. See Witnesses Evidence hearings
generally, 16.01, 22.01-22.07
discovery motions. See Discovery motions practice. See Motions practice probable-cause hearings. See Probable-cause hearings prosecutor, ready to proceed. 15.03 severance motions. 16.01 suppression hearings. See Suppression hearings Examinations
mental. See Mental health physical. See Physical examinations witnesses. See Cross-examination; Direct examination; Objections; Witnesses Excessive force in making arrests, 23.07(d)
Exclusion of evidence. See Confessions; Identification evidence; Searches and seizures Exhibit file, 27.06
Exhibits dispositions, use in, 38.11, 38.16(b), 38.22, 38.25 file of, 27.06
gathering exhibits, preparation, 8.19, 38.11 real evidence, preserving, 8.18 sending out for jury deliberations, 36.14 sentencing memoranda, attachments, 38.16(b) trial preparation, 8.18, 8.19, 27.06

Experts
adult court transfer hearings, 13.06 attorney-client privilege, assuring coverage of expert consultants by, 12.09, 38.09
character evidence, 33.21
consultant to defense, 11.01(b), 11.04(a), 12.08(b)
cross-examination
generally, 31.09, 33.16, 38.21
defense experts, preparing, 11.04(b), 12.08-12.10, 33.16
hypothetical questions, 31.09, 38.21
prosecution experts dispositional hearing, at, 38.21
trial, at, 31.09
defense experts, 11.01-11.04, 33.11-33.16, 38.22-38.23
disposition conducting dispositional hearing defense expert, presenting, 38.22, 38.23
prosecution expert, cross-examining, 38.21
preparing for disposition court mental health experts, meeting with, 38.06, 38.12 defense mental health expert, retaining, 38.09
preparing client for mental health examination, 38.07 draft reports. See reports, infra functions in delinquency case, 11.01(b), 12.08
hypothetical questions
cross-examination of prosecution expert, 31.09, 38.21
direct examination of defense expert, 33.14
indigents, state funding for experts procedures for obtaining, 11.03(b), 12.09, 13.06
right to, 11.03(a), 13.06, 38.09
mental health. See Mental health experts oral reports by. See reports, infra order of defense witnesses, 33.02(a) preparing the defense case with, 11.04(a) preparing to testify, 11.04(b), 33.16 presenting direct examination, 33.13
prosecution experts, 31.09
psychiatrists and psychologists. See Mental health experts qualification, 33.12(a), 33.12(b) reports by, 11.04(b), 33.15 court mental health experts, obtaining reports for disposition, 38.08
defense experts draft reports, 11.04(b), 33.15 oral reports, 11.04(b) written reports, 11.04(b), 33.15 prosecution experts, obtaining reports by discovery, 9.07(c), 31.09 reputable texts, use of, in cross-examining, 31.09, 33.16
rule on witnesses, exemption for, 27.11, 31.09 selection, generally, 11.02 state funding for. See indigents, state funding for experts, supra stipulating qualifications, 33.12(b) structure of testimony, 33.13
subpoena of, 10.03
type of the defense explained to, 11.04(a) types of, generally, 11.01(a) written reports. See reports, supra Expungement motions, 37.03, 39.08
Extradition to another state bail and “hold” orders for, 4.27(c) pretrial detention and, 4.26(b) Eyewitnesses
cross-examination of, 31.05
impeachment, sources of materials for, 3.08, 6.02(c); 8.19(a)(1), (a)(5), (c)(3) suppression of testimony of. See Identification evidence

F
Fabrication defense, rape cases, 31.06
Facilities
adult. See Prisons and jails juvenile. See Detention; Placement Fair trial defense continuances, 15.02 prejudicial publicity and, 20.03(b)
public trial, 27.08
severance to call co-respondent as witness,
18.10(b)
speedy trial right and, 15.04(b) venue change required for, 20.03(b) False statements. See Perjury and falsehoods Family members. See Parents and guardian Fees and costs
counsel fees, setting during client interview, 5.11 court fees, proceeding without incurring. See In forma pauperis proceedings Felony cases arrest without warrant, 23.07 disposition, differences between felonies and misdeemors, 14.06(b), 38.03(c)

Fieldes, searches, 23.15(c)

Findings of fact and conclusions of law
bench trial, 35.08
suppression hearing, 22.06

Fines and forfeitures guilty plea, potential penalties, 14.06(a) forfeiture statutes, 14.07

Fingerprints and fingerprinting adult court prosecution, consideration in opposing waiver for, 13.02 arrest, taking after. See Arrest derivative evidence rule, 23.37 expungement or sealing of records, 3.09, 37.03, 39.08 prosecution experts, subpoenaing reports by, 8.19(a)(7) police reports, 8.19(a)(7) records adult court prosecution, considerations in opposing waiver for, 13.02 discovery, police reports, 8.19(a)(7) expungement or sealing, 3.09, 37.03, 39.08

police procedures, 3.09 suppression as fruits of unlawful detention or arrest, 23.37(e)

Fire officials, searches by, 23.20

Flashlights, automobile searches, stops, and impoundments, 23.16

Flight

arrest, stop, or frisk based upon, 23.11(b) bail, factors in setting, 4.27(a), (b) defense witnesses, failure to appear or flight of, 10.02, 10.07 risk of, as basis for pretrial detention, 4.17, 4.21(a)

Force, factor in voluntariness of statements, 24.04(a)

FOILS, 9.07(f)

Forensic evidence for defense, 11.01-11.04, 31.09, 33.02(a), 33.11-33.16 for prosecution, 31.09

unreliability, 31.09

Forfeiture of property. See Fines and forfeitures

Forms

confessions, forms and reports for, 8.19(a)(6) instructions to jury, form books, 36.02 petitions, short forms, 17.03(b)
release of records and information form, 5.11 verdict forms, written, 36.18

Freedom of Information laws, 9.07(f)

Frisk. See Searches and seizures

Fruits

“cat out of the bag” doctrine, 24.19
confessions and statements, 23.37(c), 23.38, 23.39, 24.18, 24.19

Fourth Amendment violations. See Searches and seizures identification evidence, 23.37, 23.38, 25.06, 25.07

Frye test for admissibility of expert testimony, 33.11
Furtherance of justice, dismissal in the, 37.02(e)
Furtive gestures, as basis for arrest, stop, or search, 23.11(c), 23.34
Future dangerousness. See Dangerousness

Gangs. See Youth gangs

Gerstein proffers, 4.28(a), 8.19(b)(3)

Gestures, furtive, as basis for arrest, stop, or search, 23.11(c), 23.34

Good order and peace, character evidence, 33.17
Governmental action, threats of, as coercing self-incrimination, 24.04(c)

Governmental privilege, in discovery, 9.10(c)
Grand jury transcripts, discovery of, 9.07(c)
Group foster care, 38.03(a) Group homes

placement in as disposition, 38.03(a), (c) pretrial detention in, 3.11, 4.07(a), 4.17, 4.21(e)

Guardian ad litem appointment, 2.03

Guardian and ward. See Parents and guardians

Guilty pleas

generally, 14.01-14.31
adult criminal cases compared, 14.01 advantages of. See sentencing advantages, infra advisability of

generally, 14.03-14.12
likelihood of winning trial, 14.04 potential disadvantages of plea. See disadvantages of, infra sentencing advantages of plea. See sentencing advantages of, infra when prosecution has undercharged, 14.12 when respondent detained pending trial, 14.11 advising client. See counseling client, infra Alford pleas, 14.22(a) appellates pre-plea errors, 14.10, 14.30 validity of plea, 14.30 arrangement, entry at, 4.13 client’s control over decision whether to plead guilty, 14.01, 14.12, 14.19, 14.23(a) collateral review, 14.31

colloquy, 14.23, 14.26(c) consolidation of charges for, 18.01, 18.02(h), 18.06 counseling client

generally, 14.19
advising client of risk of detention pending disposition, 14.23(c) counseling client about appearance and demeanor at plea hearing, 14.23(d) explaining relative roles of client and counsel, 14.19 preparing client for plea colloquy, 14.23 plea colloquy, 14.23, 14.26(c) plea hearing parties at, 14.26(a) plea colloquy, 14.26(c) preparing respondent for. See counseling client, supra preparing parent for plea hearing, 14.24 preparing for plea colloquy, 14.23 record of advice given to client, 14.21 unrealistically optimistic clients,

14.22(b)
delinquency cases compared with adult criminal cases, 14.01
detention
pending disposition, 14.23(c), 14.26(d) pending trial, 14.06(c)(3), 14.11, 14.26(d) advantages of guilty plea appeal, limitations upon, 14.10 civil disabilities, 14.07 employment, effects upon, 14.07 forfeiture of property, 14.07 immigration consequences, 14.07 occupational licenses, effects upon, 14.07 predicate for enhanced penalties for future offenses, 14.07 probation or parole revocation, 14.07 disposition, advantages of. See sentencing advantages of, infra diversion and. See sentencing advantages of, supra double jeopardy following, 14.12

“innocent” clients and Alford pleas, 14.22(a) negotiations with prosecutor
generally, 14.13-14.18
benefits the prosecutor can confer,
14.06(c), 14.16
conditional plea bargaining, 14.06(c)(2) conditions precedent of effective negotiation, 14.16
multiple charges, 18.01; 18.02(g), (h); 18.06 opening discussions with prosecutor, 14.14
plea agreement, drafting, 14.18 preparing for plea negotiations, 14.16 plea colloquy, 14.23, 14.26(d)

procedures, 14.26
responses of counsel if plea “breaks down,” 14.27 scheduling of, 14.25, 15.01
pre-sentence report proceeding to immediate disposition without, 14.06(c)(1), 14.26(d) procedure when case adjourned for pre-sentence report, 14.28 risk that judge will penalize respondent for opting for trial, 14.05

sentencing advantages generally, 14.01, 14.05, 14.06(a)- 14.06(c)(4)
advantages, types of, 14.06(b) analyzing sentencing advantages,
14.06(a)
mechanisms for obtaining, 14.06(c), 14.09 stipulated trial as alternative, 14.10, 30.02(c) termiology, 14.02 timing of plea, 14.06(c)(3), 14.09, 14.25, 15.01 withdrawal or vacating of plea invalid guilty plea, motion to vacate,
14.29(b)
prohibitions against evidentiary use of withdrawn or vacated plea in subsequent trial,
14.29(c)
valid guilty plea, motion to withdraw, 14.29(a)

Guns

ballistics. See Ballistics unlicensed handgun, inference from possession of, 35.06(a)

H

Habeas corpus, writs of generally, 39.03(b)
Habeas corpus ad testificandum, writs of, 10.03

Police delay in bringing accused to court or juvenile facility, 3.15

Post-adjudication remedy, 39.03

Preliminary detention period and, 4.25

Hair, samples, police reports on, 8.19(a)(7)

Handguns, inference from possession of unlicensed, 35.06(a)

Health

Mental. See Mental health

Physical. See Physical condition

Hearing officers, findings of and double jeopardy, 17.08(h)

Hearings

Adult court transfer hearings. See Adult court, transfer or waiver to arraignment. See Arraignment detention. See Detention

dispositional. See Dispositions evidentiary. See Evidentiary hearings guilty plea hearings. See Guilty pleas initial. See Initial hearings motions hearings, generally, 2.01(e), 16.01-16.07 preliminary hearings. See Probable-cause hearings pretrial. See Pretrial hearings probable-cause. See Probable-cause hearings suppression of evidence. See Suppression hearings transcripts. See Transcription of proceedings

Hearsay

Adult court transfer hearings, 13.16
Co-conspirator statements, 30.04
Co-respondent’s statements implicating respondent, 30.06 Confrontation Clause and, 30.04 defined, 30.04
dispositional hearings, 38.20
prior testimony, 30.04
prosecutor’s claim of surprise and, 31.14 suppression hearings, 22.03(a), (e)

Hold orders custody orders, 4.26(a)(1), (2); 4.27(e) extradition. See Extradition to another state

Homes and housing

detention. See Detention group homes. See Group homes private facilities. See Private residential facilities searches. See Searches and seizures

Honesty, character evidence, 33.17

Hospital records

Complainant’s records, 8.19(c)(6), 9.07(c)
Respondent’s records, 8.19(c)(5), 9.07(c), 12.03

Hostile witnesses

generally, 33.25
probable-cause hearings, 4.34
prosecutions tender of witness, 31.13

Hot pursuit, search without warrant, 23.19, 23.20

Housing. See Homes and housing

Hypothetical questions, expert witnesses, 31.09, 33.14, 38.21

I

Identification evidence

defenses at trial, 6.02(b), 25.08, 31.05 of defendant, in court for first time, 25.05(a) identification procedures advising client about, 3.19(d), 5.10 best practices, 3.6, 25.03 counsel’s attendance, 3.22 lineups, 25.01, 25.03(b) photographic identification procedures, 25.01, 25.03(c) right to counsel at, 3.19(d), 25.06 show-ups, 25.01, 25.03(a) identification witnesses cross-examining at trial, 31.05
interviewing, 3.22

Police reports, 8.19(a)(5)
suppression of
generally, 25.01-25.08
due process grounds, 25.02-25.05
Fourth Amendment violations, 23.37, 25.07 right to counsel, violations of, 25.06

Illegally seized property. See Searches and seizures

Illiterate respondents, suppression of statements, 24.05(b)

Illness
counsel’s or respondent’s illness, mistrial motion, 34.11(a) mental illness. See Mentally ill or intellectually disabled persons

Immigration consequences of delinquency adjudication, 14.07

Impeachment
court witnesses, 31.13, 33.25
hostile witnesses, 31.13, 33.25
own witness defense, by, 31.13, 33.24
prosecution, by, 31.14
prior convictions or prior bad acts, impeachment with generally, 30.07(b)-(d) defense witnesses, 10.01, 10.09(d), 30.07(d) prosecution witnesses, 27.12(a)(2), 30.07(c), 31.11 respondents, 30.07(b), 33.06 prior inconsistent statements, impeachment with defense witnesses, 4.35, 8.10, 9.13, 10.09(e), 27.12(b), 33.03
prosecution witnesses
generally, 31.10
accomplices, 31.03
obtaining prior statements for impeachment, 4.29; 4.32; 4.34;
8.11-8.15; 8.19(a), (b); 9.07(c);
22.02; 22.04(c), (d); 27.12(a)(1)
respondent
generally, 10.10, 33.06,
33.09(a) counsel’s interview notes, 5.05 pre- or post-arrest silence,
24.23, 33.06, 33.09(a) suppressed statements, 24.22, 33.06, 33.09(a) reputation for dishonesty impeaching prosecution witness with, 31.12
respondent impeached with,
33.06
Impoundment of vehicles. See Automobile stops, searches, and impoundments
In forma pauperis. See Indigents Incapacity, mental. See Competency or capacity Incarceration
Post-adjudication. See Placement pre-adjudication. See Detention Incident reports. See Complaint reports Incompetency diminished capacity defense, 12.06, 33.21 infancy defense, 14.04(b), 17.04(b) respondent, of. See Incompetency to stand trial; Infancy defense
witnesses, of. See Child witnesses Incompetency to stand trial
generally, 12.16-12.20
defense experts. See Mental health finding of, result of, 12.18 inadvisability of raising in delinquency case, 12.19
mental health examinations, 12.15(a), (b) procedures for raising and litigating claim, 12.04, 12.20
standard for determining, 12.17 Inconsistent statements, prior. See Impeachment Indigents bail and, 4.27(c) counsel, right to court appointment of appeals, 39.02(b)
initial hearing, 4.03

procedures for appointing, 4.04 trial and pretrial proceedings, 4.03 discovery in cases of, 9.09(b)(8)
expert witnesses procedures for obtaining, 11.01,
11.03(b), 12.09, 13.06
right to, 11.03(a), 13.06, 38.09
investigators, right to state funding for, 8.04 social workers, right to state funding for, 38.10 subpoenas in forma pauperis, 10.04, 10.05 transcripts, right to state funds for, 4.31(d), 4.37,
27.09, 39.02(b)
Infancy defense, 17.04(b)
Inferences. See Presumptions and inferences Informal discovery. See Discovery Informants. See Police; Searches and seizures
Informer’s privilege, 9.10(a)
Interests of justice, dismissal in the, 37.02(e)
Initial appearance. See Initial hearings Initial hearings
generally, 2.01(b), 4.01-4.38
appointment of counsel, 4.04
Arraignment, 4.03. 4.12-4.14
bail, 4.27
continuances, 4.06, 4.38 critical stage, Massiah doctrine, 24.13(a) detention hearings. See Detention hearings parent/guardian’s presence at, 4.12 pre-hearing interviews. See Interviews preparation for, 3.25, 4.06-4.11
pretrial detention. See Detention probable-cause hearings. See Probable-cause hearings
right to counsel, 4.03 time limit for holding hearing, 4.25
Initial pleadings. See Petitions Injured clients advice to police regarding, 3.20 interviewing client about custodial mistreatment, 5.09
medical records, 8.19(c)(5) telephone conversation with, 3.19(e) Innocence, presumption of generally, 35.03; 35.06(c), (f) acquittal motions and, 32.01-32.02 bail and, 4.15
closing argument, 35.02, 36.12
jury instructions, 36.04, 36.06
Insanity defense
generally, 12.21-12.24
burden of proof, 35.05, 35.06(c) deadline for giving notice of, 4.14, 9.11-9.12, 12.04
defense experts. See Mental health inadvisability of raising in delinquency case, 12.23 judicial interposition of, 12.24 presumption of sanity, 35.06(c) standard for, 12.22 Inspections
automobiles. See Automobile stops, searches, and impoundments searches, generally. See Searches and seizures Instructions to jury. See Jury trials Insufficient evidence. See Evidence Intake process, Probation department, 3.12, 3.26-3.28
Interlocutory appellate review. See Appeal and review Interpreters, at trial, for respondent, 27.01
Interrogation. See Arrest; Confessions
Interrogatories, 9.07(d)
Interstate Compact, 4.26(b)
Interviews
adverse witnesses. See Investigation client interview. See Client interviews defense witnesses. See Investigation investigative interviews of witnesses. See Investigation parent of the respondent attorney-client privilege, explaining, 5.11 convincing parent to consent to respondent’s pretrial release, 4.08 facts, interviewing about, 5.11
fee-setting, 5.11
initial hearing, before, 4.08 presence during interview of client, 5.03 telephone conversation with parent of newly arrested client, 3.13, 3.17, 3.19(f), 3.21, 3.23 release of information form, 5.11
Intoxication. See Alcohol and drugs Inventory search accused incident to arrest, of, 23.08(c) impounded automobile, of, 23.25 Investigation
generally, 8.01-8.19
adult court transfer or waiver hearing, for, 13.02, 13.03, 13.08 adverse witnesses, investigative interviews of
generally, 8.11
adult co-perpetrators, 8.15 instructed to refuse to talk with defense, 8.11, 8.13, 8.14, 9.07(d) juvenile co-respondents, 8.15 need for investigator or other observer at interview, 8.12(b), 8.14 police officers, 8.14
rapport-building, 8.12(c), 8.13
taking statement from adverse witness, 8.12, 8.14
client interview. See Client interviews defense theory of case, using to guide investigation, 6.02-6.03, 8.02 defense witnesses
generally, 8.09
need to avoid taking notes or statements in certain jurisdictions, 8.10 techniques for interviewing, 8.09 detention, investigative needs as grounds for release of respondent from, 4.21(d)(3) documents to obtain list of documents to obtain, 8.19 methods for obtaining, 8.17
timetable for obtaining, 8.16
guilty pleas obtaining information needed to assess, 14.03-14.12 preparing for plea bargaining, 14.16
interviews adverse witnesses. See adverse witnesses, supra client. See Client interviews defense witnesses. See defense witnesses, supra parent of respondent. See. Interviews investigators indigents, right to state funding, 8.04, 11.03 need for, in interviews of adverse witnesses, 8.12(b), 8.14 public defender offices, arranging investigative services for, 6.06 use of, 8.04
jury selection, investigation of prospective jurors, 21.04 materials to obtain list of materials to obtain, 8.19
methods for obtaining, 8.17-8.18
timetable for obtaining, 8.16 mentally ill or intellectually disabled respondents, 12.03, 12.08-12.10
police reports list of reports to obtain, 8.19
methods for obtaining, 8.17
timetable for obtaining, 8.16
reenactment of pertinent events, 8.05
real evidence
generally, 8.18
chain of custody, 8.18
methods for obtaining, 8.17-8.18
procedures for preserving, 8.18 types of real evidence to obtain, 8.19 scene of crime, inspecting, 8.05 statements, taking from adverse witnesses, 8.12, 8.14
subpoenas constitutional and statutory standards, 10.04-10.05
duces tecum, 8.17
indigents, right to process at public expense, 10.05 procedures, 10.03, 10.04, 10.06-10.07
theory of case, using to guide investigation, 6.02, 6.03, 8.02
timetable, 8.03, 8.16 transfer or waiver hearings, investigation to prepare for, 13.02, 13.03, 13.08 venue change, based on impediments to,
20.03(a) venue change motion, investigation for hearing on, 20.03(b) Involuntary statements. See Confessions
J Jails. See Prisons and jails
Jeopardy, prior. See Double jeopardy Joinder and severance charges or counts
    generally, 18.01-18.06
    consolidation, motions for, 18.06 deciding whether to oppose joinder of counts, 18.02 misjoinder, motions to challenge, 18.03-18.04
    severance, motions for, 18.05 evidentiary hearing on severance motion, 16.01 respondents
  generally, 18.07-18.11
  Bruton doctrine, 18.08(a), 18.10(a) consolidation, motions for, 18.11 deciding whether to oppose joint trial, 18.08
  misjoinder, motions to challenge, 18.09
  severance, motions for, 18.10
Joint trials, opening statements, 29.03(c) Judges bench trial. See Bench trials improper conduct, objections to, 34.09 recusal. See Recusal or disqualification of judge selection of judge to take guilty plea,
  14.06(c)(3), 14.09
Junk Science, 31.09
Juries. See Jury trials Jurisdiction of court
  age requirements, 17.04
  motions to set aside adjudication for lack of jurisdiction, 37.02(b) Jury trials
  closing arguments in, 36.10-36.12 defense strategies and techniques in, 27.05(b) deliberations of jury, 36.14-36.17 election or waiver of jury trial, 21.02 evidentiary issues, litigating out of earshot of jury, 30.02(a)(2) exhibits sent out with jury, 36.14 failure of jury to agree, 36.14-36.17 instructions to jury alternative proposed charges, 36.06 burden of proof, 36.04, 36.06
    conference on, 36.02, 36.08 defense requests for, 36.06, 36.07
    dynamite charge, 36.16
    lesser included offenses, 36.05
    missing witness instruction, 10.08, 36.06 objections to court’s charge, 36.09, 36.13 omissions or errors in, 36.03, 36.13 plain errors, 36.03, 36.13 preparing and presenting defense requests, 36.07 requests for charge, 36.02-36.09 respondent’s right not to testify, 33.05 rules governing, 36.03, 36.06 supplemental, during deliberations, 36.15 written, 36.14
  jeopardy, attachment of, 17.08(b)(1) judge’s communication with jurors outside of counsel’s presence, 27.02 jurors challenges to selection procedures, 21.03, 28.02 class, systematic exclusion of, 21.03(b), 28.02 investigation of prospective jurors, 21.04 prejudicial publicity and, 20.03(b), 28.03(a), 34.11(a) mistrial, grounds for, 34.11(a) motions challenging jury selection and handling, 21.03 polling, 36.18 right to jury trial, 21.01 sequestration, 27.05(a)(1), 36.14 unique aspects of, 27.05 venire challenges to, 21.03 investigation of, 21.04
      verdict, 36.18
voir dire examination of prospective jurors
generally, 28.01-28.09
Batson rule, 28.03(b) challenges for cause, 28.03(a), 28.05 defense uses of, 28.04 disarming surprise evidence and prejudicial disclosures, 28.07 educational uses of, 28.06 forewarning jurors of conduct by defense counsel that they may dislike, 28.08 peremptory challenges, 28.03(b), 28.05 picking jurors for the defense, 28.09 procedure, generally, 28.03 purpose of, 28.04
racial discrimination in prosecutor’s use of peremptory challenges,
28.03(b)
relationship established with jurors during, 28.08 selection of jurors, 28.09 waiver or election of jury trial, 21.02 witness’s out-of-court communication with juror, 34.11(a) Juvenile offenders prosecuted as adults. See Adult court, transfer or waiver to K
Knock and announce requirement, searches, 23.21
L
Laboratory reports, as Brady material, 9.09(a) Lack of jurisdiction. See Jurisdiction of court Larceny cases, cross-examination of complainants, 31.04
Lesser included offenses, 36.05
License checks at roadblocks and checkpoints, 23.29
Lie detector tests. See Polygraph tests
Lighting conditions, records of, 8.19(c)(3)
Limitation of actions. See Statutes of limitations Lineups and show-ups. See Identification evidence Locating arrested respondents, 3.03-3.12, 3.14, 3.20
Lockers searched by school officials, 23.35
Lockups, pretrial detention in, 4.18
Logbook, police, 3.04
M Mandamus, writs of interlocutory review by appellate court, 10.07, 26.01, 26.02 probable-cause hearings, review of rulings at,
4.31(e)
Maps as defense exhibits, preparing, 8.19(c)(2)
Massiah doctrine. See Confessions
Masters, judicial review of findings of, 17.08(b)
Material witness procedures, 9.07(d), 9.09(b)(7), 9.10(a), 10.02 Media coverage files and photos of news media, 8.19(c)(8) prejudicial publicity challenges for cause, basis for, 28.03(a) challenges to venire, basis for, 21.03(a) change of venue, basis for, 20.03(b) mistrial motion, 34.11(a) public trials, 27.08
Medical examinations. See Mental health; Physical examinations Medical records complainant’s records, 8.19(a)(1), (c)(6) discovery of, 9.07(c) respondent’s records, 8.19(c)(5), 12.03
Medical treatment, pretrial detainee’s right to, 3.5, 5.09
Memoranda. See Briefs and memoranda
Mental capacity. See Competency or capacity; Mental health Mental health complainant or prosecution witness, motion for psychiatric evaluation of, 9.07(d) court mental health personnel cross-examining at dispositional hearing, 38.21
defense counsel’s meetings with, 38.06, 38.12 examination of respondent, 38.04(b), 38.05(a), 38.06-38.07 defense mental health experts retaining for disposition, 12.07-12.08, 38.09, 38.22 retaining early in proceedings, 12.01, 12.08 retaining for hearing on transfer or waiver to adult court, 13.14 retaining for trial, 12.08-12.10 selecting expert, 11.02, 12.10 state funding for, 11.03(a), 12.09, 13.06, 38.09 diminished capacity, 12.06, 33.21
examinations
generally, 12.09, 12.11-12.15
defense arguments against, 12.12-12.14
defense requests for, 12.08-12.09, 38.09 disposition, examinations for, 38.04(b), 38.05(a), 38.06-38.07, 38.09 Fifth Amendment protections, 12.15(a), 13.14, 38.07 judicial power to order, 12.02, 12.11 procedural protections at, 12.15 records, 8.19(b)(4), 12.03, 38.11, 38.22 incompetency to stand trial. See Incompetency to stand trial insanity defense. See Insanity defense mentally ill or intellectually disabled clients confessions and statements by, 12.04,
12.10, 24.03, 24.05(b),
24.10(a), (b), 24.16
unique aspects of representing, 12.01-12.07
Miranda rights. See Confessions
Misidentification. See Identification evidence Mis joinder. See Joinder and severance Missing-witness doctrine
generally, 10.08
jury instruction on, 36.06 preparing to use against prosecution, 10.08(c) preventing use against defense, 10.08(b) prosecutor’s tender of witness to avoid, 31.13 Mistrial, motions for bench trials, 34.11(b) continuance impracticable, 34.11(a) double jeopardy implications, 17.08(e), 34.11(d), 36.17
grounds for, 34.11(a) jury unable to agree on verdict, 36.17 prejudicial impact of inadmissible disclosure, 34.02, 34.11(a), (c) procedures, 34.11(c) prosecutorial misconduct, 34.09, 34.11(a) reprosecution following, 17.08(e) strategy in requesting, 34.11(c) timing of, 34.11(c)
Moral turpitude, crimes of, as ground for deportation, 14.07
Motions practice
generally, 7.01-7.09
arguing motions, 16.03-16.07 filing of motions, procedural and tactical considerations
deadlines for filing, 2.01(e), 4.14, 7.05 deciding whether to litigate in motion or at trial, 7.03
oral and written motions, choosing between, 7.04 requirements for form and content, 7.06 hearings on motions generally, 2.01(e), 16.01
evidentiary hearings generally, 16.01 non-evidentiary motions arguments, 16.03-16.07
suppression hearings. See Suppression hearings
interlocutory review, 7.03(a), 26.01-26.02 types of motions to consider filing
generally, 7.02
acquittal, motions for. See Acquittal, motions for bill of particulars, motion for, 9.07(a) change of venue, motions for. See Venue, change of continuance, motions for. See Continuances
depositions, motion for leave to take,
9.07(e)
directed verdict, motions for See Acquittal, motions for discovery motions. See Discovery dismissal, motions for. See Dismissal double jeopardy, motions to dismiss on grounds of. See Double jeopardy
expungement, motions for, 37.03, 39.08 in limine motions, 7.03(e), 30.02(a), 34.04
jury selection, motions to challenge procedures for. See Jury trials mistrial, motions for. See Mistrial, motions for new trial, motions for. See New Trial, motions for Petition, challenges to. See Petitions recusal of judge, motions for. See Recusal or disqualification of judge severance of counts or respondents. See Joinder and severance
Speedy trial motions. See Speedy trial motions
state-paid assistance and process, motions for, 4.31(d), 4.37, 8.04,
9.09(b)(8), 10.04, 10.05,
11.03(a), 13.06, 27.09,
38.09-38.10, 39.02(b)
suppression motions. See Confessions;
Identification Evidence;
Searches and seizures
venue, motions for change of. See Venue, change of Motor vehicles and motorists See Automobile stops, searches, and impoundments

“Mug shots.” See Photographs
N Napue doctrine, 9.09(b)(5), 31.03
Narcotics cases reports, 3.08. 8.19(a)(7)
Narrative theory
nature of narrative, 6.06(a), 6.06(c)
role in case planning, 6.06
special features in jury-trial setting, 6.06(d)
structure and process of narrative, 6.06(c)
uses of narrative in litigation, 6.06(b)
Negotiations with prosecutor dismissal of case, regarding, 9.06 plea bargaining, 14.06(c)(1)-(3), 14.13-14.18 disposition, regarding, 38.13 transfer of respondent to adult court, regarding, 13.03
Neurologists, 12.10
New trial, motions for grounds for motion defects in charging paper, 37.02(b) errors in pretrial proceedings or at trial, 37.02(a) inconsistent verdicts, 36.18 insufficiency of evidence, 37.02(d) justice, interests of, 37.02(e) lack of jurisdiction, 37.02(b) Napue doctrine, 9.09(b)(5), 31.03
newly discovered evidence, 37.02(c) unconstitutionality of statute, 37.02(b) verdict against the weight of the evidence, 37.02(d) procedural requirements for motions, 37.02
Newly discovered evidence, motion for new trial, 37.02(c)
News media coverage. See Media coverage 911 calls, 8.19(a)(3)
No-knock search warrant, 23.21
Not guilty pleas, entry at arraignment, 4.13
Notice
  alibi defense, 4.14, 9.11-9.12
  fair notice, right to, 4.12, 9.09(b)(2) insanity defense, 4.14, 9.11-9.12, 12.04 notification of charges at arraignment, 4.12 variance between Petition and proof at trial, 35.07 Objections
  anticipatory objections, 34.04
  closing arguments, to, 36.11 contemporaneous. See Contemporaneous objection rules continuing, 34.06
  evidence, to, 30.02, 34.01-34.10
  judge’s conduct, to, 34.09 jury instructions, to, 36.09, 36.13 motions in limine, 7.03(c), 30.02(a), 34.04
  motions to strike, 34.08 opening statements, to, 29.02 prejudicial evidence, to, 30.02 proffer, when prosecutor objects to defense evidence, 34.10 prosecutor’s conduct, to, 34.09
  sidebar conferences, 30.02(a)(2), 34.01, 34.03-34.04, 34.09
Open fields, searches, 23.15(c)
Opening statements
generally, 29.01-29.03
argumentative, 29.01
defense
  bench trial, 29.03(b) jury trial, 29.03(a) objections to prosecution evidence before, 29.01
  prosecution, 29.02
  scope, permissible, 29.01 splitting between joined respondents, 29.03(c)
P
Parent-child privilege, 5.03(a)-(b)
Parents and guardians child and not parent as client, 2.03, 4.04, 5.03(b) conflict of parent’s with child’s interests, 4.04 consent to search of premises, 23.18(b) detention, role of parent in securing release of child, 3.21, 4.08 dispositions, role of parent, 38.05(b), 38.27 guardian ad litem. See Guardian ad litem guilty pleas, role of parent, 14.01, 14.20, 14.21, 14.24, 14.26(a), (c) interviewing, rights to parental notice and presence, 3.06, 24.14 interviewing client without parent present, 5.03 interviewing the parent. See Interviews parent-child privilege, 5.03(a)-(b) presence at court hearings, right to, 4.12, 14.26(a), 27.03 probation intake process, role of parent, 3.12, 3.26-3.28
  release of information form, 5.11 rights of child not waivable by, 2.03, 14.01 Parole. See Probation and Parole
Partial responsibility defense. See Diminished capacity defense
Particulars, bills of, 9.07(a), 17.03(c)
Peace and good order, character evidence, 33.17 Perjury and falsehoods burden of proof, 35.04
  fabrication as theory of defense generally, 6.02(a)-(b) rape cases, 31.06 reputation for dishonesty, impeachment with prosecution witnesses, 31.12
  respondent, 33.06
  respondent’s perjury as aggravating factor in disposition, 14.05 right against prosecutor’s presentation of, 9.09(b)(5) warrant affidavit, in, as invalidating warrant, 23.17(c) Permission. See Consent
Permissive inferences. See Presumptions and inferences Petitions amendment of petition to conform to proof, 35.07 bill of particulars, 9.07(a), 17.03(c) motions to dismiss
  generally, 2.01(d), 4.23, 17.01-17.08
double jeopardy, 17.08
  facial insufficiency, 17.03 failure to state an offense, 17.03 jurisdiction, lack of, 17.04 misjoinder of counts or respondents, 18.03, 18.09
  speedy trial, for denial of, 15.04 statute of limitations, 17.07 technical grounds for dismissal, 17.06 venue, improper, 17.05, 20.02
  want of prosecution, 15.03

Photographs, 3.09 arrest photographs
    expungement, 37.03, 39.08
    obtaining to prepare for trial, 8.19(a)(4)
    police procedures, 3.09
  “mug shots.” See arrest photographs, supra obtaining to prepare for trial, 8.19(a)(4), (a)(9), (c)(1), (c)(8), 9.07(c) physical injuries of client reporting police brutality, 5.09 suppression of photographic identification. See Identification evidence Phrases. See Words and phrases Physical examinations complainant, defense motions for physical examination of, 9.07(d)

  respondent
    arranging examination of respondent who reports police brutality, 5.09 constitutional limits on examinations by investigative officers, 23.14

Physical force, suppression of confessions or statements, 24.04, (a) Physical restraints used during trial, 27.01

Pleas arrainment, entry at, 4.12-4.14 guilty pleas. See Guilty pleas incompetency. See Incompetency to stand trial insanity. See Insanity defense special pleas, 4.13, 4.14

Police activities after arrest
  generally, 3.03-3.11
  identification procedures, 3.03, 3.05, 25.01
  interrogation, 3.05, 3.06, 3.08 physical examinations of respondent, 3.05, 23.14 blotter, 3.04, 3.08, 8.19(a)(11) brutality, 3.19(e), 5.09 commanding officers, 3.14, 3.18, 5.09 counsel’s dealings with, 3.14, 3.15, 3.17, 3.18, 3.20, 3.22, 3.23, 3.30, 3.32, 3.33, 8.14 departmental regulations, 8.19(a)(10), 31.02 discretion, 3.07, 3.10 interrogation See Arrest; Confessions log, 3.04
phone and radio communication tapes, discovery of, 8.19(a)(3) protecting arrested client abuse, from, 5.09
identification procedures, from, 3.05, 3.17, 3.19(d), 3.20, 3.22, 3.23, 5.10 interrogation, from, 3.05; 3.08; 3.17; 3.19(b), (f); 3.20; 3.22; 3.23; 5.10 regulations, 8.19(a)(10), 31.02 reports, 3.08, 8.03, 8.16-8.17, 8.19(a) restrictions upon activity
Due Process Clause, 8.14, 9.09(a), (b)(6), (b)(7); 23.14, 24.03-24.05 Fourth Amendment. See Searches and Plain feel doctrine, 23.10

Plain touch doctrine, 23.10
Plain view exception to warrant requirement, search and seizure, 23.12, 23.22(b)
Plea bargaining See Guilty pleas

Place or location crime, place of. See Scene of the crime trial. See Venue seizures
Fifth Amendment. See Confessions
Sixth Amendment. See Confessions; Identification evidence spies, 9.10(a), 10.08(c), 23.32, 24.13
witnesses
interviewing, 8.14
suppression hearing, cross-examining at, 6.02(c), 22.04(c), (e)
trial, cross-examining at, 31.02
Polygraph tests administration by police, constitutional limitations upon, 23.14
use by defense motions for diversion, 19.03(a) negotiations with prosecutor, 9.06
Poor persons. See Indigents Posttrial motions. See Expungement motions; New trial, motions for Powerpoint presentations, 36.11(a) Prejudicial publicity. See Media coverage
Preliminary hearings. See Probable-cause hearings
Prerogative writs, 26.01-26.02
Presence of respondents. See Respondents Presentence reports. See Dispositions; Guilty pleas Presumptions and inferences
generally, 35.06
constitutionality of, 35.06(f) definitions inferences, 35.06(a) presumptions, 35.06(b)-(e) innocence, presumption of. See Innocence, presumption of jury instructions, 36.04, 36.06
missing witness inference. See Missing witness document sanity, presumption of, 35.06(c) Pretext or sham police actions. See Searches and seizures
Pretrial conferences, 27.10
Pretrial detention. See Detention Pretrial hearings. See Detention hearings; Initial hearings; Motions practice; Probable-cause hearings; Suppression hearings Pretrial motions. See Motions practice Preventive detention. See Detention
Prima facie evidence, 28.03(b), 35.06(d)
Prima facie motions. See Acquittal, motions for Prior convictions or bad acts admissibility of evidence of, generally, 30.07(a) character evidence and, 30.07(a), 33.08, 33.17, 33.20
detention, consideration of, 4.07(a), 4.10, 4.16, 4.17, 4.19, 4.20, 4.21(b)(1) discovery of records of, 9.07(c), 27.12(a)(2) impeachment use. See Impeachment
Prior inconsistent statements. See Impeachment
Prior jeopardy. See Double jeopardy
Prior juvenile adjudications. See Prior crimes or offenses Prior statements inconsistent. See Prior inconsistent statements respondents’. See Statements witnesses’. See Statements
Prison without walls, 38.03(c)
Prisons and jails detention in adult jail, 4.18 incarceration in adult prison adult court, juveniles transferred to, 13.01, 13.02
juvenile court, juveniles prosecuted in,
38.03(c)
records, discovery of, 9.07(c)
Privacy, expectations of. See Searches and seizures Privileges
attorney-client. See Attorney-client privilege governmental privilege, in discovery, 9.10(c) informer’s privilege, 9.10(a) parent-child privilege, 5.03(a)-(b) self-incrimination privilege. See Self-incrimination, privilege against Probable cause finding of, as predicate for detention. See Probable-cause hearings search and seizure, for. See Searches and seizures
Probable-cause hearings
generally, 4.01, 4.28-4.38
adverse witnesses, calling, 4.34 affidavits as basis for probable-cause determination, 4.07(b), 4.22, 4.28(a) constitutional requirement of, 4.22, 4.28(a) continuances, 4.38
counsel at, right to, 4.31(b) cross-examining prosecution witnesses, 4.31(c), 4.32, 4.33
defensive conduct of, 4.29, 4.32-4.36 defense witnesses, 4.31(c), 4.34, 4.35 discovery, use for, 4.29, 4.32, 4.34 impeachment, cross-examining prosecution witnesses for, 4.29, 4.32 inadmissible evidence, objecting to, 4.36 preparation for, 4.07(b), 4.29 procedure, generally, 4.31(a) remedies for denial of rights at hearing, 4.31(e) right to probable-cause determination, 4.28 rights at hearing, 4.31(c) transcript, 4.31(d), 4.37, 8.19(b)(1)
waiver, 4.30
Probation and parole conditions, 14.06, 39.04
detention hearings
effects of respondent’s probation or parole status on detention determination, 4.26(a)(3) lobbying probation officer before hearing, 4.11 report of probation officer, obtaining, 4.11 role of probation officer at hearing, 4.19-4.20
dispositions conditions of probation, 38.03 counseling client and parent before meeting with probation officer, 38.05(a)-(b) cross-examining probation officer, 38.21 lobbying probation officer, 38.06, 38.12, 38.13 probation as disposition, 38.03(c) report of probation officer, obtaining, 38.08 role of probation officer, 38.04(a), 38.19, 38.25 intake process of Probation Department, 3.12, 3.26-3.28 monitoring client’s adjustment on, 39.04 revocation proceedings parole, 39.05
probation, 39.04
Proceeds of crime, forfeiture of, 14.07
Process. See Compulsory process Production of documents, requests for Profile, criminal, as evidence, 30.07(a), 31.09
Profiling on racial or ethnic grounds, 23.11(b), 23.28 Prohibition, writs of interlocutory review by appellate court, 26.01-26.02 probable-cause hearings, remedy for denial of rights at, 4.31(e) Promises of leniency, suppression of confessions or statements, 24.04(c)
Proof. See Evidence
Property seized illegally. See Searches and seizures Prosecution of case, dismissal for want of, 15.03 Prosecutors
adult court transfer or waiver to, role of prosecutor, 13.01, 13.03, 13.04
Brady doctrine, 9.09(a), 9.09(b)(6) discovery potential of discussions with, 9.06 improper argument by, 34.11(a), 36.11 instructing witnesses to refuse to talk with defense, 8.13, 9.09(b)(6) conduct by, 34.11(a), 36.11
Napue doctrine, 9.09(b)(5), 31.03 negotiations with. See Negotiations objections to unrecordable conduct by, 34.09 presenting perjured testimony, 9.09(b)(5) provoking defense mistrial motion, double jeopardy implications, 17.08(e), 34.11(d)(1) suppression of evidence favorable to defense, 9.09(b)(5), 9.09(b)(6) Pro se proceedings, and waiver of right to counsel, 4.05
Psychiatric and psychological examinations. See Mental health Psychiatrists and psychologists. See Mental health Public defenders’ caseloads, methods for coping with heavy, 6.06
Public trial, 27.08
Publicity. See Media coverage
Q
Qualification of expert witnesses, 33.12(a), 33.12(b)
Quash subpoena, motion to, 10.04
Quieting witness, objections to evidence, 34.02
R
Rape cases, generally, 31.06
Real evidence
generally, 8.18
chain of custody, 8.18
methods for obtaining, 8.17-8.18
procedure for preserving, 8.18
types of real evidence to obtain, 8.19
Real property bond as security for bail, 4.27(d)
Record of proceedings. See Transcription of proceedings Recording witness statements electronically, 8.12(d) Recusal or disqualification of judge
generally, 20.04-20.07
ground for, 20.05, 20.07 impartial judge, right to, 20.04
procedure, generally, 20.06
strategy, generally, 20.07
suppression hearing, trial judge presided over, 22.07 Redirect examination of witnesses rehabilitating witness impeached with prior conviction, 10.09(d) scope permitted, 31.01(a) Reenactments
defense investigations, 8.05
police investigations, 3.05
Referees, judicial review of findings, and double jeopardy, 17.08(h)
Reimbursement or restitution, 38.03(c), 39.04
Releases of Information, obtaining from client, 5.11, 38.08
Remand. See Detention
Reports. See Experts
Reprosecution. See Double jeopardy Reputation for dishonesty
impeaching prosecution witness with, 31.12
respondent impeached with, 33.06
Requests for jury instructions. See Jury trials Res judicata, successive post disposition proceedings not barred by, 39.03(a)
Respondent
clothing. See Clothing of respondents conferring with defense counsel during trial, 10.10, 27.02, 33.09(b) co-respondents. See Co-respondents dispositions, at. See Dispositions disruptive courtroom behavior, 27.01 dress for trial, 10.11, 27.01, 27.05(b) ilness of, as ground for mistrial, 34.11(a) indigent. See Indigents interpreter for. See Interpreters interviewing. See Client interviews official records pertaining to, discovery of, 9.07(c) physical restraints during trial, 27.01 preparation
dispositional proceedings, for, 38.05(a), 38.07, 38.26 plea hearing, for. See Guilty pleas trial, for, 10.10 presence of respondent suppression hearing, at, 22.03(b)
trial, at, 27.01
prior adjudications or prior bad acts of. See Impeachment; Prior convictions or bad acts records of respondent, 8.19(a)(2)-(7), (a)(11), (c)(3)-(4), (c)(7); 9.07(c); 38.08; 38.11 restraints on, in courtroom, 27.01 statements by, discovery of, 9.07(c) testimony of adult court transfer hearing, 13.14 considerations in having respondent testify, respondent’s choice, 33.06 corroborating, 33.10 cross-examination, 33.06, 33.09(a) direct examination, 33.08 dry run of testimony, 10.09-10.10 impeachment of. See Impeachment preparing to testify, 5.12, 10.09-10.10
right not to testify, 33.05 suppression hearing, 22.05(a) timing of testimony, 10.10, 33.02(a) Restitution, 38.03(c), 39.04
Review, appellate. See Appeal and review Revocation of probation. See Probation and parole Rights card, 3.22(b), 5.10
Right to counsel. See Counsel, right to Right-to-treatment doctrine, 13.15, 39.07
Risk of flight. See Detention Roadblocks, license checks, 23.29
Rule on witnesses, 22.03(c), 27.11, 31.09
S Sanity. See Incompetency to stand trial; Insanity defense; Mental health Scene of the crime defense photographs, diagrams, and maps, 8.19(c)(1), (2) inspection by counsel, personal, 8.05 police photographs and diagrams, 8.19(a)(9) police property reports, 8.19(a)(8) Scheduling trial. See Trial date Schools
School release, pretrial detention alternatives, 4.21(e) defense arguments based on respondent’s school performance detention hearings, 4.09; 4.17; 4.21(a), (b)(2)
dispositional hearings, 38.11, 38.22
motions for diversion, 19.03(b) motions to suppress statements, 8.19(c)(4), 24.05(b), 24.10(b) probation intake process, 3.28
probation revocation hearings, 39.04 transfer or waiver to adult court, 13.08 interrogation by school officials, 24.06, 24.12 performance in school. See defense arguments based on respondent’s school performance, supra records of respondent, obtaining detention hearing, for, 4.07(a), 4.09 disposition, for, 38.08, 38.11
Individual Educational Placement (IEP), 38.08 mentally ill or intellectually disabled clients, in cases of, 12.03 motion to suppress statements, for, 8.19(c)(4), 24.10(b) release executed by parent, 5.11, 28.08 trial, to support alibi defense for, 8.19(c)(7) school officials as defense witnesses character witnesses at trial, 33.19
dispositional hearing, 38.22 hearing on motion to suppress statements, 24.10(b) searches and seizures by school officials, 23.33-23.36

Scientific tests
cautions to client regarding, 3.19(d), 5.10 chain of custody of defense evidence, 8.18 defense discovery, 8.19(a)(7), 9.07(c), 9.09(b)(7)
defense experts
  physical evidence for testing by, submitting, 8.18 retaining, 6.02(b), 11.01-11.03 testimony of, presenting, 33.11-33.15 working with, 11.04, 33.16 defense theories in cases of prosecution based on scientific evidence, 6.02(b) monitoring police technicians, 3.22
police procedures, 3.05, 23.14
protecting arrested client against, 3.05; 3.17; 3.19(d), (f); 3.20; 3.22; 5.10
Sealing of juvenile records, 3.09, 39.08
Searches and seizures
  generally, 23.01-23.40
  abandoned objects, 23.13 arrest
    generally, 23.04-23.07
    arrest entry of premises, 23.19 defined, 23.04(d), 23.06 dispatch or bulletin as basis for, 23.31 failure to respond to inquiry as basis for, 23.11(b) flight as basis for, 23.11(b) furtive gestures as basis for, 23.11(c) high crime neighborhood as basis for, 23.11(a) informant’s tip as basis for, 23.32
    postarrest custodial treatment, 23.14 probable cause for, 23.07, 23.11 searches incident to arrest, 23.08, 23.26, 23.37(a) standards for obtaining arrest warrant, 23.07 standards for warrantless arrest, 23.07, 23.11 Terry stop distinguished, 23.04-23.06 arrest warrants
    police entry of premises pursuant to, 23.19 standards for issuance, 23.07 articulable suspicion, 23.04(c), 23.09, 23.10, 23.11 automobiles, search or seizure of
    generally, 23.23-23.30
    automobile exception to warrant requirement, 23.24 border searches, 23.29, 23.30
    containers in automobiles, seizures or searches of, 23.08(b), 23.24, 23.25, 23.26
    evidentiary searches, 23.24 impoundment, 23.24, 23.25 inventory searches, 23.08(c), 23.25 license checks at roadblocks and checkpoints, 23.29 plain view doctrine, 23.22(b) privacy expectation in, 23.23
    sobriety tests at roadblocks and checkpoints, 23.29
    Terry stops and attendant searches, 23.27
    traffic stops and attendant searches, 23.28-23.29
    Vehicle Identification Number (VIN) inspections, 23.23 binoculars and flashlights, 23.16
    body searches and extractions, 23.12, 23.14
    border searches, 23.29, 23.30 buildings, entry or search of knock and announce requirements, 23.21
      manner of entry, 23.21
      persons found on premises, detention and search of, 23.22(c) plain view doctrine, application, 23.22(b) protective sweep of premises, 23.22(d) rules governing, generally, 23.16-23.22 scope of search within, 23.17(g), 23.22(a) “search” defined, 23.16 search warrants, 23.17
      warrantless entries
        generally, 23.16, 23.18-23.20
        arrest entries, 23.19
        consent, 23.18
        exigent circumstances, 23.20
      confessions and statements as fruits of, 23.37, 24.18 consent
        third parties, authority to consent, 23.18(b) voluntariness of, 23.18(a) constitutional protections, overview of, 23.02 containers automobile, searches or seizures incident to search or seizure of, 23.08(b), 23.24, 23.25, 23.26 person, searches or seizures incident to search or seizure of the, 23.08(b), 23.12 privacy expectation in, 23.15(d) curtilage, 23.15(c)
derivative evidence principle, 23.37-23.40 “dropsie” cases, 23.13 electronic devices to extend senses, 23.02(c), 23.16
exigent circumstances, 23.19, 23.20
expectation of privacy
generally, 23.15(a) automatic standing, 23.15(e) automobiles, privacy expectation in, 23.23
containers, privacy expectation in, 23.15(d)
curtailage, 23.15(c) multifamily apartment complexes,
23.15(c)
open fields, 23.15(c)
premises, privacy expectation in,
23.15(b)
flashlights and binoculars, 23.16 frisks. See Terry stops and frisks, infra fruits of
generally, 23.37-23.40
confessions and statements as fruits,
23.37(c), 23.38, 23.39, 24.18, 24.19
derivative evidence principle, 23.27
identification evidence as fruits, 23.37, 23.38, 25.06, 25.07
taint, 23.17(d), 23.38-23.40 hot pursuit, 23.19, 23.20 identification evidence as fruits of, 23.37, 23.38, 25.06, 25.07
index of fact situations raising issues, 23.03 informants, 23.32
knock and announce requirements, 23.21
open fields, 23.15(c)
physical examinations, 23.14
plain view exception, 23.12, 23.13, 23.15(c), 23.16, 23.17(g), 23.20, 23.22(b) prenotexual activity by police, 23.06(d), 23.07,
23.08(a), 23.10, 23.25, 23.26, 23.28
privacy. See expectation of privacy, supra private individuals, searches by, 23.36 probable cause, 23.07, 23.11, 23.17 protecting arrested client against, 3.05; 3.17; 3.19(d), (f); 3.20; 3.22; 5.10 protective sweeps, 23.22(d) rebuttal of respondent’s testimony with illegally seized evidence, 33.06, 33.09(a) school searches and seizures
generally, 23.33-23.36, 24.06
Fourth Amendment protections in school setting, 23.33
lockers or desks, searches of, 23.35 school officials collaborating with police, 23.36
searches of the person, 23.34
search warrants
affidavits, 23.17(a), (c) bare bones affidavits, 23.17(a) deliberate falsehoods in affidavits,
23.17(c)
exceptions to requirement of, 23.16, 23.18-23.20
executing warrant, scope of search, 23.17(g)
impeaching affidavits, 23.17(c) known criminal averment, 23.17(a) magistrate, neutral and detached,
23.17(e)
manner of entry, 23.21
multiunit warrant applications, 23.17(b), (g)
no-knock warrant, 23.21 person issuing, 23.17(e) persons found on the premises, detention and search of,
23.22(c)
protective sweep of premises, 23.22(d)
reckless disregard for truth in affidavits,
23.17(c)
specificity of, 23.17(f) tainted evidence as basis for, 23.17(d), 23.40 standing. See expectation of privacy, supra state-law restrictions on searches and seizures, 7.09; 23.02(b), (c)
stop and frisk. See Terry stops and frisks, infra taint of unlawful search or seizure flagrancy of police conduct, 23.39 prosecutor’s burden of disproving, 23.38 subsequent police actions, 23.40 warrants based on tainted evidence,
23.17(d), 23.40
Terry stops and frisks failure to respond to inquiry as basis for,
23.11(b)
flight as basis for, 23.11(b) frisk, defined, 23.10
furtive gestures as basis for, 23.11(c)
high crime neighborhood as basis for,
23.11(a) informant’s tip as basis for, 23.32 standards for frisk, 23.04(c), 23.10 stop, defined, 23.04(c), 23.06 warrantless searches, general principles, 23.16 warrants. See arrest warrants; search warrants, supra
Searches incident to arrest, generally, 23.07, 23.08, 23.26
Selective enforcement, as ground for a motion to dismiss charges, 17.01
Self-defense, burden of proving, 35.05 Self-incrimination, privilege against confessions and statements. See Confessions defense discovery, lack of reciprocity argument and, 9.02 impeachment of respondent with statements taken in violation of, 33.06, 33.09(a) mental health examinations and, 12.15, 13.14, 38.07 prosecutorial discovery and, 9.12, 27.12(b) respondent’s right not to testify, 33.05, 36.04, 36.06(f) tests and examinations that elicit testimonial communications, 23.14 Sentencing. See Dispositions
Sequestering jury, 36.14
Sequestering witnesses, 22.03(c), 27.11, 31.09
Serology experts, 8.19(a)(7), 31.06
Service of process, 10.05-10.06
Severance. See Joinder and severance Sexual offenses blood tests, 8.19(a)(7), 31.06 cross-examination of complainant, 31.06
defenses, 31.06
exculpatory personality traits, 33.21 police reports, obtaining, 8.19(a)(7)
Shelter houses, 4.18, 4.21(e)
Show-ups. See Identification evidence
Sidebar conferences, 30.02(a)(2), 34.01, 34.03-34.04, 34.09
Silence in face of accusation, evidence of respondent’s, 3.19(b), 24.23, 33.06, 33.09(a) Site visits. See Scene of the crime Sketches. See Diagrams or sketches
Slating. See Booking Sobriety tests at roadblocks and checkpoints, 23.29
Social media, defense investigation, 8.16 evidence, authentication of materials, 10.14(c)
Social reasons, dismissal for, 37.02(e)
Social work and social workers mental health matters. See Mental health retaining to assist in preparation for disposition, 6.06, 38.10, 38.14
Special pleas, entry at arraignment, 4.13, 4.14
Speedy trial
generally, 15.01-15.04
constitutional speedy-trial rights and standards, 15.04(b) dispositional hearings, 38.15
motions
court dates, to advance, 15.01, 15.03, 15.04 dismiss, to, 15.03-15.04 forfeited, to treat issues as, 15.03 release respondent from detention, to, 15.03, 15.04(b) statutory speedy-trial rights and standards, 15.04(a) want of prosecution, dismissal for, 15.03
State constitutional guarantees, citing in motions, 7.09 Statements
discovery of. See Discovery impeachment with. See Impeachment suppression of. See Confessions; Searches and seizures Statutes of limitations, 17.07
Stipulated trials, 14.10, 30.02(c)
Stipulations
generally, 30.02
pretrial conferences, 27.10
qualifications of expert witnesses, 33.12(b) trials, stipulated, 14.10, 30.02(c) Stops. See Searches and seizures
Subpoenas
generally, 8.17, 10.02-10.08
constitutional and statutory standards, 10.04-10.05
defense witnesses, 10.02-10.03
duces tecum, 6.03, 8.17, 38.08
in forma puuperis, 10.04, 10.05 missing-witness inference and, 10.08 persons subject to, 10.03 physical evidence, 8.17 probable-cause hearings, right to compulsory process for, 4.31(c) procedures
obtaining, 10.04 serving and enforcing, 10.06-10.07 quashing, 10.04
right to compulsory process, 10.05 service of, 10.06
to social media providers, 8.16, 9.07(c)
Substance abuse. See Alcohol and drugs Successive prosecutions. See Double jeopardy Suppression hearings
generally, 22.01-22.07
appeal of judge’s ruling on motion
generally, 22.07
guilty plea, after, 14.10, 22.07 arguments on the motion, 22.06
burdens of production and persuasion, 22.03(d), 23.38 continuance request by prosecutor, 22.03(a) cross-examining prosecution witnesses, 22.03(e), 22.04 defense goals and strategies at, 22.02, 22.04, 22.05 defense witnesses, testimony by, 22.05 disclosure of informants’ names, 9.10(a), 23.32(e) discovery of prior statements of prosecution witnesses, 22.03(f) discovery, use of hearing for, 22.02, 22.04(b) findings of fact and conclusions of law, 22.06
hearsay, 22.03(e) informants’ names, disclosure of, 9.10(a), 23.32(e) laying foundation for impeachment of prosecution witnesses at trial, using hearing for, 22.02, 22.04(c) presence of respondent, waiving in identification suppression hearing, 22.03(b) prosecutor not ready to proceed, 22.03(a) recusal of trial judge who presided at, 22.07 re-opening, based on new facts emerging at trial, 22.07 respondent, testimony by, 22.05(a), 33.06, 33.09(a) rule on witnesses, 22.03(c)
timing of, 22.01
waiving respondent’s presence at identification suppression hearing, 22.03(b) witnesses, rule on, 22.03(c)

Suppression of evidence confessions, suppression of. See Confessions hearings on suppression motions. See Suppression hearings identification evidence, suppression of. See Identification evidence motions practice, procedural aspects of. See Motions practice; Suppression hearings prosecutor, by, 8.13; 9.09(b)(6), (b)(7) statements, suppression of. See Confessions tangible evidence, suppression of. See Searches and seizures

Supreme Court review, 39.02(a), 39.03(a)
See also Appeal and review

Surety bond as security, in bail, 4.27(d)

Surprise by and impeachment of own witness defense witnesses, 33.24
prosecution witnesses, 31.14

Surrender of ‘wanted’ clients, 3.29-3.33

Surveillance. See Electronic surveillance; Searches and seizures

Suspended judgments, 38.03(c)

T
Tacit admissions, 3.19(b), 24.23, 33.06, 33.09(a)

Taint of unlawful search or seizure. See Confessions; Identification evidence; Searches and seizures Tangible evidence, suppression of. See Searches and seizures

Tape recordings of 911 calls and police radio communications, 8.19(a)(3)

Teachers. See Schools

Telephone calls

arrest precinct station, to, 3.14, 3.17 detention facility officials, to, 3.17, 3.24, 5.09 detectives, to, 3.14, 3.20
initial hearing, before, 4.09 investigating officers, to, 3.17, 3.18, 3.20, 3.23, 3.30 locating respondent, 3.13-3.14, 3.20
parent of respondent initial call from, 3.13 follow-up calls to, 3.17, 3.21, 3.23, 3.25 placement facilities, administrators of, 39.07 police, to, keeping records of, 3.15 post-arrest period, 3.13-3.21, 3.23-3.25 privacy of conversation with respondent, 3.19(a) prosecutor’s staff, to, 3.14, 3.30 records of calls, 3.15 respondent in custody, 3.16-3.19
“wanted” clients, 3.29-3.31

Television publicity. See Media coverage

Terminology. See Words and phrases

Terry stops and frisks. See Searches and seizures

Testimony of witnesses. See Witnesses

Tests and testing lie detector. See Polygraph tests psychological tests adapted specifically to young children, 12.10 scientific. See Scientific tests sobriety tests at roadblocks and checkpoints, 23.29

Textbooks, use in cross-examination of expert, 31.09, 33.16

Theft cases, cross-examination of complainants, 31.04

Theory of the case
generally, 6.02-6.04
client, explaining theory to, 10.10 defense witnesses, explaining theory to, 10.09(a) expert witnesses, explaining theory to, 11.04(a) explaining theory of the case client, to, 10.10 defense witnesses, to, 10.09(a) expert witnesses, to, 11.04(a) formulating theory, 6.02
identification of respondent as perpetrator, typical theories for refuting, 6.02(b) inconsistent, as grounds for severance of co-respondents, 18.08(f), 18.10(c) jury instructions on, 36.03, 36.04, 36.06 prosecution’s assertion that crime was committed, typical theories for refuting, 6.02(a) using defense theory as guide
  dispositional hearings, 38.19, 38.21-38.23
  investigation, 6.02, 6.03, 8.02
  motions practice, 6.02(d), 6.03, 6.04, 22.02, 22.04 probable-cause hearings, 6.02(d) trial preparation, 6.02(d), 6.03

Time and date advancement of pretrial hearing or trial, 15.01 alibi notice, deadlines for filing, 4.14
  continuances. See Continuances crime, date of age of respondent at time, as jurisdictional requirement, 17.04 averment absent from petition, 17.03(b), 17.07 incompetency claim, timing of notice of, 12.04 insanity defense, timing of notice of, 12.04 juvenile court jurisdiction, ages for, 17.04 motions, deadlines for filing of, 4.14, 7.05, 17.01 plea hearings, timing of, 14.09, 14.25 speedy trial guarantees. See Speedy trial suppression hearings, timing of, 22.01, 25.01 statutes of limitations, 17.07
  trial. See Trial dates

Traffic stops. See Automobile stops, searches, and impoundments; Searches and seizures Training schools, state, 38.03(a), (c); 39.07

Transcripts accuracy, 39.02(c) appellate process, 39.02(b), (c) grand jury, discovery motion, 9.07(c) indigent respondents, 4.31(d), 4.37, 27.09, 39.02(b) preliminary hearings, 8.19(b)(1) probable-cause hearings, 4.31(d), 4.37, 8.19(b)(1) trials, 27.09

Transfers
  adult court, to. See Adult court, transfer or waiver to adult prison, transfer of adjudicated delinquent to, 38.03(c) juvenile detention facilities, abuse necessitating transfer, 5.09 venue, change of. See Change of venue

Trial
  generally, 2.01(f), 27.01-27.13
  bench trials. See Bench trials case-stated basis, trial on, 30.02(c) dates. See Trial dates detention pending trial. See Detention fair trial. See Fair trial folder or brief, preparation of, 27.06
  incompetency. See Incompetency to stand trial jury trials. See Jury trials new trial. See New trial, motions for opening statements. See Opening statements place or location. See Venue, change of; Venue requirements preparation for trial, generally, 6.01-6.06 pretrial detention. See Detention sidebar conference See Sidebar conferences transcript. See Transcripts trial folder (trial brief), 27.06

Trial dates
  generally, 4.14, 15.01, 15.03
  arraignment, setting at, 4.14
  continuances. See Continuances dismissal for want of prosecution, 15.03 motion to advance, 15.01 speedy trial. See Speedy trial

Trial folder (trial brief), 27.06
Trickery, statements obtained by, 24.04(d)
Truth serums, 23.14
Tunnel vision as defense theory challenging prosecution’s case, 6.02(a), 31.02

U
  Unconstitutional statute, grounds for setting aside adjudication, 37.02(b) Unconstitutionality of criminal statute, as ground for motion to dismiss charges, 14.29(b)

V
  Vacating plea. See Guilty pleas
  Variance between allegations or particulars and proof at trial, 9.07(a), 35.07
  Vehicle identification number (VIN) inspection, 23.23
  Vehicles. See Automobile stops, searches, and impoundments; Searches and seizures Venire. See Jury trials
  Venue, change of
    generally, 20.03
    affidavits, 16.01, 20.03(b) evidentiary hearings, 16.01, 20.03(b) fair trial grounds, 20.03(b) grounds for defense access to witnesses, 20.03(a) fair trial, 20.03(b) prejudicial publicity, 20.03(b) publicity, prejudicial, 20.03(b) witnesses, defense access to, 20.03(a) Venue requirements
  generally, 20.01-20.02
  failure of Petition to allege facts establishing venue, 17.05, 20.02 motion to dismiss for improper venue, 20.02

Verdict
  generally, 36.16-36.18
  acquittal. See Acquittal directed. See Directed verdict inability of jury to agree, 36.14-36.17 logically inconsistent verdicts, 36.18 new trial motion based on verdict against the weight of the evidence, 37.02(d) polling the jury, 36.18
  postverdict proceedings, 37.01-37.03
  recording, 36.18 return of, 36.18
  signed written verdict forms, 36.18

Victim impact statements, 14.06(c)(3), 38.04(a) VIN (vehicle identification number) inspection, 23.23

Voir dire examination of prospective jurors. See Jury trials examination of witnesses
    generally, 30.02(a)(2), 34.05
    challenging competency of child witnesses, 30.05 challenging prosecution's claim of surprise, 31.14 discovery potential of, 34.05 excluding jury during, 30.02(a)(2) eyewitness identification cases, 25.01 objections to evidence, 34.05 preliminary questions of fact, 30.02(a)(2), 34.05 suppression of evidence, 22.01, 25.01, 30.02(a)(2)

Voluntariness consent to search. See Searches and seizures statements. See Confessions waivers of Miranda rights. See Confessions

W Waiver
  arraignment, waiver of presence of parent/guardian, 4.12 counsel, right of. See Counsel, right to dispositional hearing, waiver of, 38.18 forfeiture of claims by failing to preserve them generally, 34.01, 36.03, 36.09, 39.03(a) grounds for relief from forfeiture, 7.05 guilty pleas explaining waivers of rights to client, 14.23(a) rights waived by, 14.10, 14.26(c) jury trial, 21.02

Miranda rights, 24.10
  petition, waiver of formal reading of, 4.12 pre-sentence report, waiver of, 14.06(c)(1), 37.01 presence of respondent at identification suppression hearing, waiver of, 22.03(b) presumption against waiver of rights, 24.13(c) probable-cause hearing, waiver of right to, 4.30 pro se proceedings, waiver of right to counsel and, 4.05 transfer to adult court, waiver of hearing on. See Adult court, transfer or waiver to “Wanted” clients, 3.29-3.33
  Want of prosecution, dismissal for, 15.03
  Ward and guardian. See Parents and guardians

Warrants arrest. See Arrest warrants; Searches and seizures bench warrants. See Bench warrants search warrants. See Searches and seizures Weather conditions, obtaining records of, 8.19(c)(3) Withdrawal of plea. See Guilty pleas

Witnesses
  accomplices as corroboration of accomplice’s incriminating testimony required to support adjudication, 35.04 defense witnesses, as, 10.12, 33.23 prosecution witnesses, as, 31.03, 35.04, 36.04 admonishment of, 34.02 adverse. See Adverse witnesses alibi, 8.03, 33.22
  arrest for failure to appear when subpoenaed, 10.07 assault complainants, 31.07
  character witnesses
    expert evidence of personality traits, 33.21 form of examination, 33.17, 33.18 preparing to testify, 33.20
    qualification of, 33.18 rebuttal by prosecution, 33.17 rules governing testimony, 33.17 selection of, 33.19
  child witnesses competency to testify, 30.05 defense cross-examination of, 31.08 exclusion of parent of child prosecution witness, 27.11 complainants, 31.04-31.08
    co-respondents as, 10.12, 30.06, 31.03, 33.23, 35.04, 36.04
court witnesses, 31.13, 33.25

cross-examination. See Cross-examination defense
generally, 33.01-33.25
compulsory process to obtain, 4.31(c), 10.04-10.05
disclosure of pretrial statements of,
27.12(b), 33.03
dispositional hearing, at, 38.09-38.11, 38.19, 38.22-38.23 dry run of examination, 10.09(c) explaining role to, 10.09(a) failure to appear or flight of, 10.02, 10.07
impeachment of. See Impeachment interviews of, 8.09, 8.10 keeping track of, 8.08, 10.02 missing-witness inference, 10.08(a), (b) order of testimony, 33.02(a) planning testimony of, 33.02
preparing to testify, 10.09
presenting testimony of, 33.02 probable-cause hearing presenting, 4.34, 4.35 right to present, 4.31(c) right to present, 9.09(b)(4), 33.04
selection of, 10.01
subpoena of, 10.02
surprise by, 33.24
unavailable, 10.02, 10.07, 15.02 depositions, 9.07(e), 10.02 detention of material witnesses, 9.07(d), 9.09(b)(7), 9.10(a), 10.02
discovery of prior convictions of prosecution witnesses, 9.07(c), 9.09(b)(5), 27.12(a)(2) discovery of prior statements of defense witnesses, 27.12(b) expert cross-examination of, 33.21
character evidence, 33.21
defense experts, 11.01-11.04, 33.11-33.16, 38.22-38.23
education of counsel by, 11.04(a), 31.09
hypothetical questions, 33.14, 38.21
personality evidence, 33.21 preparing defense experts, 11.04(b), 33.16
prosecution experts, 31.09
qualification of, 33.12(a), 33.12(b) reputable texts, use of, in cross-examining, 31.09, 33.16
rule on witnesses, exemption from, 27.11, 31.09
stipulation to qualifications of, 33.12(b) structure of testimony, 33.13
superseding of, 10.03 hostile, 4.34, 31.13, 33.25
identification witnesses
cross-examining at trial, 31.05 suppression of testimony of. See Identification evidence impeachment of. See Impeachment interviews of. See Interviews; Investigation jury, communication of witness with, ground for mistrial, 34.11(a) keeping track of, 8.08, 10.02
list of prosecution witnesses, 9.07(b), 17.06 locating, 8.03, 8.06, 8.07 material witness, detention of, 9.07(d), 9.09(b)(7), 9.10(a), 10.02
missing witness inference, 10.08, 31.13, 36.06 order of testimony of defense witnesses,
33.02(a)
orders that witnesses talk to defense, 8.13, 9.07(d), 9.09(b)(6)
perjured testimony. See Perjury and falsehoods police. See Police prior convictions of. See Impeachment prior inconsistent statements by. See Impeachment
probable-cause hearing procurement witnesses.
See Probable-cause
hearings
generally, 31.01-31.14
cross-examination. See Cross-examination discovery
prior convictions, 9.07(c), 9.09(b)(5), 27.12(a)(2)
prior statements, 9.07(c), 9.09(b)(5), 22.03(f), 27.12(a)(1)
impeachment. See Impeachment list of, respondent’s right to, 9.07(b), 17.06
missing-witness inference, 10.08(a), (c), 36.06
probable-cause hearing, 4.29; 4.31(a),
(c), 4.32; 4.33
suppression hearing, 22.02; 22.03(c), (f); 22.04
surprise, prosecutor’s claim of, 31.14 quieting, when objection made, 34.02 rape complainants, 31.06 reputation for untruthfulness, 31.12, 33.06 respondent as. See Respondent rule on witnesses, 22.03(c), 27.11
subpoenas. See Subpoenas suppression hearing. See Suppression hearings surprise and impeachment of own witness defense witnesses, 33.24
prosecution witnesses, 31.14
taking statements from, 8.10-8.12 tender of, by prosecution, 31.13 theft victim, 31.04 unavailable, and Confrontation Clause exceptions, 30.04 venue change and, 20.03, 20.03(a) Words and phrases
delinquency cases, terminology of, 2.02, 4.01, 14.02, 17.02, 38.03(c)
double jeopardy, same offense, 17.08(b)
hearsay, 30.04
lesser included offenses, 36.05
interrogation, 24.08(b)
plea colloquy, 14.26(c)
Work camps, 38.03(a) Work product doctrine
generally, 9.10(b), 9.13
asserted by prosecution, 9.10(b) protection against discovery by prosecution,
5.05, 8.10, 9.13, 16.04, 27.12(b), 33.03,
33.24
Work release, pretrial detention alternatives, 4.21(e) Writs
certiorari, 39.02(a), 39.03(a) coram nobis, 39.03(a) habeas corpus. See Habeas corpus, writs of habeas corpus ad testificandum, 10.03 mandamus. See Mandamus, writs of prohibition. See Prohibition, writs of Written interrogatories. See Interrogatories
Y Youth gangs
pretrial detention and membership in, 4.21(d)(1) members, interrogation of, 3.05
Youth Services Division, police department, 3.05, 3.14
Table of Authorities
(References are to section numbers)

Table of Cases

A

A.B., State in the Interest of, 219 N.J. 542, 99 A.3d 782 (2014), 8.05
Abbate v. United States, 359 U.S. 187 (1959), 17.08(g)
Abel, United States v., 469 U.S. 45 (1984), 30.03(c), 31.01(a)
A.C., IV v. People, 16 P.3d 240 (Colo. 2001), 21.01
Acker, State v., 133 Hawai’i 253, 327 P.3d 931 (2014), 31.02
Acker, State v., 871 N.W.2d 603 (N.D. 2015), 30.03(c)
Adams v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 278 (1972), 4.29, 4.33, 9.09(b)(1)
Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143 (1972), 23.09
Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418 (1979), 12.18, 12.20, 13.06, 13.06(c) Addison, People v., 116 A.D.2d 472, 496 N.Y.S.2d 742 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t (1986), 22.06(d)
Adkins v. Warden, 710 F.3d 1241 (11th Cir. 2013), 28.03(b)
Adonsoto, Commonwealth v., 475 Mass. 497, 58 N.E.3d 305 (2016), 24.18
A.G., In re, 148 Ohio St. 3d 118, 69 N.E.3d 646 (2016), 17.08(a) Agnello v. United States, 269 U.S. 20 (1925), 33.06
Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964), 23.07(b), 23.17(a), 23.32(a), 23.32(b), 23.32(c) Aguilar v. Woodford, 725 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 2013), 9.09(a) Aguirre, State v., 301 Kan. 950, 349 P.3d 1245 (2015), 24.11(b), 24.20(b)
Agurs, United States v., 427 U.S. 97 (1976), 9.05, 9.08, 9.09(a), 9.09(b)(2), 9.09(b)(5), 37.02(c) Aikins v. State, 256 Ind. 671, 271 N.E.2d 418 (1971), 31.10
A.K., In the Interest of, 825 N.W.2d 46 (Iowa 2013), 21.01, 39.02(a) Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985), 11.03(a), 11.03(b), 12.13, 13.06, 13.06(c), 38.07, 38.09
Akinsade, United States v., 686 F.3d 248 (4th Cir. 2012), 14.07
Al-Bayyinah, State v., 356 N.C. 150, 567 S.E.2d 120 (2002), 25.03(c) Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266 (1994), 4.28(a) Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28 (1957), 9.09(b)(5)
Aleman v. Village of Hanover Park, 662 F.3d 897 (7th Cir. 2011), 24.04(d), 24.22, 33.09
Alexander, United States v., 888 F.3d 672 (2nd Cir. 2018), 23.15(c)
Alford v. Haner, 446 F.3d 935 (9th Cir. 2006), 23.07(c)
Alexander v. Louisiana, 405 U.S. 625 (1972), 21.03(b)
Alfredo A. v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. 4th 1212, 865 P.2d 56, 26 Cal. Rptr. 623 (1994), 4.28(a) Ali v. Hickman, 584 F.3d 1174 (9th Cir. 2009), 28.03(b) Ali v. United States, 520 A.2d 306 (D.C. 1987), 30.07(a) Al-Lamadani v. Lang, 624 Fed. Appx. 405 (6th Cir. 2015), 3.18
Allen, United States v., 813 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 2016), 23.19
Allen v. Commonwealth, 287 Va. 68, 752 S.E.2d 856 (2014), 24.21
Allen v. United States, 164 U.S. 492 (1896), 36.16
Allen R., In re, 127 N.H. 718, 506 A.2d 329 (1986), 11.03(a) Almeida, United States ex rel., v. Baldi, 195 F.2d 815 (3d Cir. 1952), 9.09(b)(6)
Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266 (1973), 23.24, 23.29, 23.30 Alonso J., In re, 58 Cal. 4th 924, 320 P.3d 1127, 169 Cal. Rptr. 3d 661 (2014), 14.22(a)
Alston, State v., 88 N.J. 211, 440 A.2d 1311 (1981), 23.15(e), 23.24
Alvarado v. State, 486 P.2d 891 (Alaska 1971), 17.05
Alvarez, People v., 20 N.Y.3d 75, 979 N.E.2d 1173, 955 N.Y.S.2d 846 (2012), 27.08
Alvarez, State v., 318 N.J. Super. 137, 723 A.2d 91 (1999), 30.02(b)
Alvarez, United States v., 519 F.2d 1036 (3d Cir. 1975), 12.09, 12.15(b) Alvarez v. Ercole, 763 F.3d 223 (2d Cir. 2014), 31.01(a)
A.M. v. Butler, 360 F.3d 787 (7th Cir. 2004), 24.04(b), 24.05(e), 24.10(b), 39.03(b) Amado v. Gonzalez, 758 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2014), 9.09(a) Amadeo v. Zant, 486 U.S. 214 (1988), 7.05
Amendment to Rules of Criminal Procedure – Rule 3.370(b), 596 So. 2d 1036 (Fla. 1992), 36.14
Amos v. United States, 255 U.S. 313 (1921), 23.18(a) Anderl, Commonwealth v., 329 Pa. Super. 69, 477 A.2d 1356 (1984), 24.10(b) Anders, State v., 331 S.C. 474, 503 S.E.2d 443 (1998), 30.06(a) Anderson, People v., 20 Cal. 3d 647, 574 P.2d 1235, 143 Cal. Rptr. 88 (1978), 30.07(b)
Anderson, People v., 6 Cal. 3d 628, 493 P.2d 880, 100 Cal. Rptr. 152 (1972), 7.09
Anderson, United States v., 929 F.2d 96 (2d Cir. 1991), 24.04(a), 24.04(d)
Anderson v. Calderon, 232 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 2000), 4.28(a) Anderson v. Charles, 447 U.S. 404 (1980), 33.06
Anderson v. City of Atlanta, 778 F.2d 678 (1985), 5.09
Anderson v. Smith, 751 F.2d 96 (2d Cir. 1984), 24.11(b)
Anderson v. Terhune, 516 F.3d 781 (9th Cir. 2008) (en banc), 24.11(a) Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463 (1976), 9.12, 22.05(b)
Andrews v. State, 2018 WL 2252180 (Fla. May 17, 2018), 11.03(b) Angelos, United States v., 433 F.3d 738 (10th Cir. 2006), 23.22(a) Anonymous v. Superior Court in and for the County of Pima, 14 Ariz. App. 502, 484 P.2d 655 (1971), 20.04, 20.05
Antazo, In re, 3 Cal. 3d 100, 473 P.2d 999, 89 Cal. Rptr. 255 (1970), 4.27(e)
Anthony S., In re, 162 A.D.2d 325, 557 N.Y.S.2d 11 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1990), 7.05
Anthony W., In re, 388 Md. 251, 879 A.2d 717 (2005), 35.04
Antonio T., State v., 352 P.3d 1172 (N.M. 2015), 24.12
Anyanwu, State v., 681 N.W.2d 411 (Minn. App. 2004), 14.05
Apodaca v. Oregon, 406 U.S. 404 (1972), 21.01
Appeal No. 977 from Circuit Court of Baltimore County, In re, 22 Md. App. 511, 323 A.2d 663 (1974), 30.06(b) Arcega, People v., 32 Cal. 3d 504, 651 P.2d 338, 186 Cal. Rptr. 94 (1982), 12.15(b) Ardo in v. Arnold, 653 Fed. Appx. 532 (9th Cir. 2016), 36.02, 36.15
Arizona v. Evans, 514 U.S. 1 (1995), 23.03
Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279 (1991), 24.04(a) Arizona v. Gant, 556 U.S. 332 (2009), 23.08(a), 23.08(b), 23.26
Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987), 23.12, 23.17(g), 23.19, 23.20, 23.22(a), 23.22(b)
Arizona v. Johnson, 555 U.S. 323 (2009), 23.09, 23.10, 23.27, 23.28
Arizona v. Mauro, 481 U.S. 520 (1987), 24.08(b)
Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675 (1988), 22.03(d), 23.18(a), 24.11(a), 24.11(c)
Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497 (1978), 17.08(e), 29.01, 34.11(d)(2)
Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753 (1979), 23.08(b)
Arkansas State Police v. Wren, 2016 Ark. 188, 491 S.W.3d 124 (2016), 9.07(f)
Armstrong, United States v., 517 U.S. 456 (1996), 17.01
Arnold, People v., 98 N.Y.2d 63, 772 N.E.2d 1140, 745 N.Y.S.2d 782 (2002), 22.05
Arvizu, United States v., 534 U.S. 266 (2002), 23.06(a), 23.09
A.S. v. State, 923 N.E.2d 486 (Ind. App. 2010), 4.05, 39.03(a)
Ash, United States v., 413 U.S. 300 (1973), 25.06
Ash, United States v., 461 F.2d 92 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (en banc), rev’d on other grounds, 413 U.S. 300 (1973), 9.09(b)(7)
Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143 (1944), 3.14
Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436 (1970), 17.08(b)(2), 17.08(f)
Asherman, State v., 193 Conn. 695, 478 A.2d 227 (1984), 9.09(b)(7)
Askew, United States v., 529 F.3d 1119 (D.C. Cir. 2008) (en banc), 23.10
Atencio v. Arpaio, 674 Fed. Appx. 623 (9th Cir. 2017), 5.09
Atkins, United States v., 843 F.3d 625 (6th Cir. 2016), 28.03(b)
Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002), 24.05(b)
Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, 532 U.S. 318 (2001), 4.28(a), 23.07(c)
Aubree C., In the Matter of a Proceeding Involving the Interstate Compact on Juveniles, 2018 WL 3462521 (N.Y. Family Ct., Monroe County May 9, 2018), 4.26(b)
Aubrey v. Gadbois, 50 Cal. App. 3d 470, 123 Cal. Rptr. 365 (1975), 4.15
Augenblick, United States v., 393 U.S. 348 (1969), 9.09(b)(4)
Austin v. Plumley, 565 Fed. Appx. 175 (4th Cir. 2014), 38.28
Austin M., People v., 2012 IL 111194, 975 N.E.2d 22, 363 Ill. Dec. 220 (2012), 2.03
Avery, State v., 80 Wis. 2d 305, 259 N.W.2d 63 (1977), 13.04
Avery v. Alabama, 308 U.S. 444 (1940), 15.02
Avery v. Georgia, 345 U.S. 559 (1953), 21.03(b)
A.W. by and through Doe v. State, 2017 WL 3224190 (8th Cir. July 31, 2017), 14.07
A.W.J., United States v., 804 F.2d 492 (8th Cir. 1986), 13.19
Ayers v. Hudson, 623 F.3d 301 (6th Cir. 2010), 24.13(b)

B

Baca, State v., 97 N.M. 379, 640 P.2d 485 (1982), 23.32(c)
Baccino, State v., 282 A.2d 869 (Del. Super. 1971), 23.33
Bac Tran, People v., 80 N.Y.2d 170, 603 N.E.2d 950, 589 N.Y.S.2d 845 (1992), 30.06(a) Baer v. Neal, 879 F.3d 769 (7th Cir. 2018), 36.06, 36.11(a) Bagley, United States v., 473 U.S. 667 (1985), 9.09(a) Bagley, United States v., 877 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2017), 23.17(d), 23.22(d), 23.37
Bailey v. United States, 568 U.S. 186 (2013), 23.06(c), 23.22(c)
Bailey, People v., 102 A.D.3d 701, 958 N.Y.S.2d 173 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013), 31.05
Bailey, United States v., 444 U.S. 394 (1980), 17.03(c), 36.01, 36.13
Bailey, United States v., 743 F.3d 322 (2d Cir. 2014), 23.04(d)
Baker v. McCollan, 443 U.S. 137 (1979), 4.28(a), 15.04(b)
Baker v. Smith, 477 S.W.2d 149 (Ky. 1971), 4.15
Baldi, United States ex rel. Almeida v., 195 F.2d 815 (3d Cir. 1952), 9.09(b)(6)
Balicki, Commonwealth v., 436 Mass. 1, 762 N.E.2d 290 (2002), 23.22(b)
Ball v. United States, 470 U.S. 856 (1985), 17.08(b)(2)
Ball v. United States, 163 U.S. 662 (1896), 17.08(c)
Ballard, State v., 190 N.J. 270, 920 A.2d 80 (2005) 17.01
Ballard v. State, 420 Md. 480, 24 A.3d 96 (2011), 24.11(c)
Ballew v. Georgia, 435 U.S. 223 (1978), 21.01
Banjoman, State v., 178 W. Va. 311, 359 S.E.2d 331 (1987), 33.20
Banks v. Dretke, 540 U.S. 668 (2004), 7.05, 9.09(a) Banks, State in the Interest of, 402 So. 2d 690 (La. 1981), 4.15
Banks, United States v., 540 U.S. 31 (2003), 23.21
Banks v. Commonwealth, 2015 WL 3533197 (Ky. App. 2016), 23.11(b), 23.11(c)
Banks v. United States, 516 A.2d 524 (D.C. 1986), 20.05
Banks-Harvey, State v., 152 Ohio St. 3d 368, 96 N.E.3d 262 (2018), 23.08(c), 23.38
Bankston, United States v., 820 F.3d 215 (6th Cir. 2016), 4.05
Barber, People v., 94 Ill. App. 3d 813, 419 N.E.2d 71, 50 Ill. Dec. 204 (1981), 23.36
Barber, United States v., 777 F.3d 1303 (11th Cir. 2015), 23.15(d)
Barber v. Page, 390 U.S. 719 (1968), 4.31(c)
Barefoot v. Estelle, 463 U.S. 880 (1983), 13.05(b)
Barker, State v., 149 Ohio St. 3d 1, 73 N.E.3d 365 (2016), 24.18
Barker v. State, 52 Ark. App. 248, 916 S.W.2d 775 (1996), 33.20
Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514 (1972), 4.16, 4.21(d)(3), 15.04(b), 15.04(c)
Barnes, United States v., 713 F.3d 1200 (9th Cir. 2013) (per curiam), 24.20(b)
Barnes v. Joyner, 751 F.3d 229 (4th Cir. 2014), 36.14
Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837 (1973), 35.06(f)
Barone, United States v., 330 F.2d 543 (2d Cir. 1964), 23.20
Barret, United States v., 848 F.3d 524 (2d Cir. 2017), 30.06(b)
Barroso, Commonwealth v., 122 S.W.3d 554 (Ky. 2003), 9.09(b)(3)
Barry, United States v., 979 F. Supp. 2d 715 (M.D. La. 2013), 24.10(b)
Bartlett, State v., 271 Mont. 429, 898 P.2d 98 (1995), 4.05
Bastaldo, Commonwealth v., 472 Mass. 16, 32 N.E.3d 873 (2015), 25.03, 33.02(b)
Batista, People v., 113 A.D.2d 890, 493 N.Y.S.2d 608 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1985), 30.07(c)
Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), 28.03(b)
Battie v. Estelle 655 F.2d 692 (5th Cir. 1981), 12.15(a) Batts, Commonwealth v., 163 A.3d 410 (Pa. 2017), 13.01
Bauder, State v., 181 Vt. 392, 924 A.2d 38 (2007), 7.09
Bauzo-Santiago, United States v., 867 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2017), 14.18
Bazinet, United States v., 462 F.2d 982 (8th Cir. 1972), 23.24
B.C. v. Plumas Unified School District, 192 F.3d 1260 (9th Cir. 1999), 23.34
Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660 (1983), 4.27(c), 38.03(c), 39.04
Beasley, State v., 152 Ohio St. 3d 470, 97 N.E.3d 474 (2018), 14.22(a) Beck, United States v., 602 F.2d 726 (5th Cir. 1979), 23.13
Beck v. Alabama, 447 U.S. 625 (1980), 36.05
Beck v. Ohio, 379 U.S. 89 (1964), 23.08(a), 23.12, 23.29, 23.37
Becker, State v., 74 Wis. 2d 675, 247 N.W.2d 495 (1976), 13.04, 17.04(a) Beckwith v. United States, 425 U.S. 341 (1976), 24.08(a) Bedessie, People v., 19 N.Y.3d 147, 970 N.E.3d 380, 947 N.Y.S.2d 357 (2012), 11.01(a), 24.22
Beecher v. Alabama, 408 U.S. 234 (1972), 24.03
Beecher v. Alabama, 389 U.S. 35 (1967), 24.03, 24.04(a), 24.05(c)
Bell v. City of Chicago, 835 F.3d 736 (7th Cir. 2016), 23.24
Bell v. Superior Court, 117 Ariz. 551, 574 P.2d 39 (Ariz. App. 1977), 4.28(a) Bell v. Wolfish. 441 U.S. 520 (1979), 4.28(a), 5.09, 23.15(b), 32.02
Bell, People v., 126 A.D.3d 718, 5 N.Y.S.3d 227 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015), 28.03(b)
Bell, State v., 287 N.C. 248, 214 S.E.2d 53 (1975), 28.03(c)
Bemore v. Chappell, 788 F.3d 1151 (9th Cir. 2015), 11.02
Benitez, People v., 120 A.D.3d 705, 991 N.Y.S.2d 133 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2014), 36.11(a)
Benjamin v. State, 116 So. 3d 115 (Miss. 2013), 24.08(b), 24.11(c)
Benjamin L., In the Matter of, 92 N.Y.2d 660, 708 N.E.2d 156, 685 N.Y.S.2d 400 (1999), 4.25, 15.04(b), 25.10(b)
Bennett v. Stirling, 842 F.3d 319 (4th Cir. 2016), 36.11(a) Bennett v. Superintendent Graterford SCI, 886 F.3d 268 (3d Cir. 2018), 36.06
Bennett v. United States, 763 A.2d 1117 (D.C. 2000), 31.11
Beno, State v., 116 Wis. 2d 122, 341 N.W.2d 668 (1984), 10.04
Beno, United States v., 324 F.2d 582 (2d Cir. 1963), 30.07(a) Benoiit, State v., 126 N.H. 6, 490 A.2d 295 (1985), 24.09, 24.10(b)
Bentley v. Crist, 469 F.2d 854 (9th Cir. 1972), 27.01
Bentley v. State, 930 A.2d 866 (Del. 2007), 30.07(c)
Benton County Juvenile Dep’t, State ex rel., v. Cardiel, 18 Or. App. 49, 523 P.2d 1057 (1974), 13.13
Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969), 17.08(a) Ben-Yisrayl v. Davis, 431 F.3d 1043 (7th Cir. 2005), 36.11(a) Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78 (1935), 9.09(a), 36.11(a) Berget, State v., 826 N.W.2d 1 (S.D. 2013), 12.15(a) Berghuis v. Smith, 559 U.S. 314 (2010), 3.06, 21.03(b)
Berghuis v. Thompkins, 560 U.S. 370 (2010), 24.10, 24.11(c) Bergrin, United States v., 885 F.3d 416 (6th Cir. 2018), 12.19(a) Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984), 3.06, 23.04(b), 23.04(c), 23.05, 23.06(c), 23.11(b), 23.18(a), 24.07, 24.08(a) Berrios, People v., 28 N.Y.2d 361, 270 N.E.2d 709, 321 N.Y.S.2d 884 (1971), 22.06(d)
Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 511 (1851), 37.02(c)
Bershchansky, United States v., 788 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2015), 23.17(g)
Berthiaume v. Smith, 875 F.3d 1354 (11th Cir. 2017), 28.03(c)
Berumen v. State, 182 P.3d 635 (Alaska App. 2008), 23.21
Bethea, United States v., 888 F.3d 864 (7th Cir. 2018), 14.29(b) Betterman v. Montana, 136 S. Ct. 1609 (2016), 15.04(b), 34.01
Betts, State v., 194 Vt. 212, 75 A.3d 629 (2013), 23.18(a), 23.32(b) Bevel, State v., 231 W. Va. 346, 745 S.E.2d 237 (2013), 24.13(c) Beville v. State, 71 N.E.3d 13 (Ind. 2017), 9.10(a) Bey v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 856 F.3d 230 (3d Cir. 2017), 25.03, 35.06(f)
Bielicki v. Superior Court, 57 Cal. 2d 602, 371 P.2d 288, 21 Cal. Rptr. 552 (1962), 23.15(b) Biles v. United States, 101 A.3d 1012 (D.C. 2014), 9.09(a) Billings, State ex rel. R.L.W. v., 451 S.W.2d 125 (Mo. 1970), 20.04
Bills, State ex rel. T.J.H. v., 504 S.W.2d 76 (Mo. 1974), 13.13
Bingham v. Commonwealth, 550 S.W.2d 535 (Ky. 1977), 13.18
Birchfield v. North Dakota, 136 S. Ct. 2160 (2016), 23.08(a), 23.14, 23.17(g), 23.18(a) Bird, State v., 308 Mont. 75, 43 P.3d 266 (2002), 27.01
Biswell, United States v., 406 U.S. 311 (1972), 23.16
Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), 23.17(g)
Black v. Romano, 471 U.S. 606 (1985), 38.03(c)
Black, United States v., 707 F.3d 531 (4th Cir. 2013), 23.04(b), 23.09, 23.11(a) Black v. Montgomery County, 835 F.3d 358 (3d Cir. 2016), 4.28(a) Black v. State, 2017 Wyo. 135, 405 P.3d 1045 (2017), 9.07(c), 27.01, 36.11(a) Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199 (1960), 24.03, 24.05(b) Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63 (1977), 14.18, 14.26(b), 14.29(b) Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974), 14.29(b) Blackston v. Rapelje, 780 F.3d 340 (6th Cir. 2015), 30.03(c), 30.04(c), 31.01(a) Blair v. Pitchess, 5 Cal. 3d 258, 486 P.2d 1242, 96 Cal. Rptr. 42 (1971), 22.03(d)
Blair, State v., 691 S.W.2d 259 (Mo. 1985), 24.19
Blakeney v. State, 236 So.3d 11 (Miss. 2017), 9.09(a), 9.09(b)(1), 9.09(b)(6), 24.13
Blakeney v. United States, 77 A.3d 328 (D.C. 2013), 12.20
Bland, United States v., 472 F.2d 1329 (D.C. Cir. 1972), 13.04
Blank v. State, 406 Md. 526, 959 A.2d 1180 (2008), 33.09(a) Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932), 17.08(b)(2), 24.13(a) Blocker, United States v., 354 F. Supp. 1195 (D. D.C. 1973), 24.05, 24.10(a) Blok, United States v., 188 F.2d 1019 (D.C. Cir. 1951), 23.15(b)
Blueford v. Arkansas, 566 U.S. 599 (2012), 17.08(e), 17.08(e)
B.M.H., In re, 177 Ga. App. 478, 339 S.E.2d 757 (1986), 4.05
Board of Education of Independent School District No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002), 23.02(a), 23.34
Bobby v. Bies, 556 U.S. 825 (2009), 17.08(f)
Boggs v. State, 667 So. 2d 765 (Fla.1996), 28.03(a) Bond, State v., 237 Wis. 2d 633, 614 N.W.2d 552 (2000), 24.08(b)
Bond v. United States, 529 U.S. 334 (2000), 23.15(d), 23.23
Booker, United States v., 728 F.3d 535 (6th Cir. 2013), 23.14
Booth, United States v., 455 A.2d 1351 (D.C. 1983), 23.15(c)
Boss, People v., 261 A.D.2d 1, 701 N.Y.S.2d 342 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1999) (per curiam), 20.03(b)
Botello-Rosales, United States v., 728 F.3d 865 (9th Cir. 2013) (per curiam), 24.09, 24.10(b)
Bounds v. Smith, 430 U.S. 817 (1977), 4.31(d)
Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987), 22.03(d), 30.04(c), 30.06(a) Bowman, State v., 588 A.2d 728 (Maine 1991), 17.05
Bowman, State ex rel. Mitchell v., 54 Wis. 2d 5, 194 N.W.2d 297 (1972), 20.04
Bowman, United States v., 884 F.3d 200 (4th Cir. 2018), 23.04(b), 23.11(b), 23.11(c), 23.28
Boyce, People v., 89 A.D.2d 623, 452 N.Y.S.2d 676 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1982), 25.03(b)
Boyd, State v., 275 Kan. 271, 64 P.3d 419 (2003), 22.03(d)
Boyd, State v., 271 Or. 558, 533 P.2d 795 (1975), 17.08(b)(2)
Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886), 9.12, 23.08(b), 23.15(d)
Boyd v. United States, 473 A.2d 828 (D.C. 1984), 29.03(a) Boyer v. Louisiana, 569 U.S. 238 (2013), 15.04(b)
Boyken, State v., 217 N.W.2d 218 (Iowa 1974), 36.06
Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969), 14.26(c), 14.29(a), 14.29(b) Boykins, State v., 173 W. Va. 761, 320 S.E.2d 134 (1984), 25.03(b)
Bracy v. Gramley, 520 U.S. 899 (1997), 20.04
Braden v. 30th Judicial Circuit Court, 410 U.S. 484 (1973), 15.04(b)
Bradley, People, 154 A.D.3d 1279, 63 N.Y.S.3d 159 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2017), 9.07(a) Bradshaw, United States v., 490 F.2d 1097 (4th Cir. 1974), 23.24
Bradshaw v. Stumpf, 545 U.S. 175 (2005), 14.29(b)
Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), 4.31(c), 9.09(a), 31.11
Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742 (1970), 14.26(c)
Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532 (1897), 24.04(c)
Branham, State v., 153 N.C. App. 91, 569 S.E.2d 24 (2002), 24.14(b)
Bravo-Fernandez v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 352 (2016), 17.08(c), 17.08(f) Brawner, United States v., 471 F.2d 969 (D.C. Cir. 1972), 33.21
Brazeal, State v., 247 Or. 611, 431 P.2d 840 (1967), 36.03
Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519 (1975), 13.17, 17.08(a), 20.05, 34.11(d)(2)
Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249 (2007), 23.04(b), 23.23, 23.27, 23.28, 23.29
Brent v. State, 63 Md. App. 197, 492 A.2d 637 (1985), 20.05
Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387 (1977), 4.03, 22.03(d), 24.11(a), 24.13(a), 24.13(b), 24.13(c)
Brewster v. Beck, 859 F.3d 1194 (9th Cir. 2017), 23.25
Bridgeforth, People v., 28 N.Y.3d 567, 69 N.E.3d 611, 46 N.Y.S.3d 824 (2016), 28.03(b) Bridgeforth v. Superior Court, 214 Cal. App. 4th 1074, 154 Cal. Rptr. 3d 528 (2013), 9.09(a) Bingham City v. Stuart, 547 U.S. 398 (2006), 23.20
Brignoni-Ponce, United States v., 422 U.S. 873 (1975), 23.06(a), 23.10, 23.12, 23.22(b), 23.29, 23.30
Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160 (1949), 23.07, 30.07(a) Brinson v. Walker, 547 F.3d 387 (2d Cir. 2008), 30.07(c)
Britt v. North Carolina, 404 U.S. 226 (1971), 4.31(d), 9.09(b)(8), 11.03(a)
B.R.K., In the Matter of Welfare of, 658 N.W.2d 565 (Minn. 2003), 23.15(b)
Broadnax, State v., 98 Wash. 2d 289, 654 P.2d 96 (1982), 23.22(c)
Brock-Miller v. United States, 887 F.3d 298 (7th Cir. 2018), 14.29(b) Brocksmith, People v., 162 Ill. 2d 224, 642 N.E.2d 1230, 205 Ill. Dec. 113 (1994), 36.05
Brodie v. United States, 295 F.2d 157 (D.C. Cir. 1961), 37.02(d)
Brookhart v. Janis, 384 U.S. 1 (1966), 27.01
Brooks, State v., 304 S.W.3d 130 (Mo. 2010), 24.24
Brooks, State v., 193 Vt. 461, 70 A.3d 1014 (2013), 24.08(b)
Brooks v. Florida, 389 U.S. 413 (1967), 24.03, 24.04(b)
Brooks v. Oklahoma, 456 U.S. 999 (1982), 17.08(b)(2)
Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605 (1972), 9.09(b)(1), 9.12, 10.10, 11.03(b), 12.15(a), 27.13, 32.02, 33.03, 33.05
Brown, Commonwealth v., 2018 WL 2452643 (Pa. June 1, 2018), 30.04(c)
Brown, In re, 439 F.2d 47 (3d Cir. 1971), 39.02(a) Brown, People v., 399 Mich. 350, 249 N.W.2d 693 (1976), 12.15(a) Brown, People v., 121 A.D.2d 733, 504 N.Y.S.2d 457 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1986), 25.03(a) Brown, State v., 286 Kan. 170, 182 P.3d 1205 (2008), 24.04(c), 24.06
Brown, State v., 879 So. 2d 1276 (La. 2004), 21.01
Brown, State v., 216 N.J. 508, 83 A.3d 45 (2014), 23.15(b)
Brown, State v., 442 N.J. Super. 153, 121 A.3d 878 (2015), 27.05(a)(2)
Brown, State v., 179 Vt. 22, 890 A.2d 79 (2005), 12.24
Brown, United States v., 448 F.3d 239 (3d Cir. 2006), 23.09, 23.32(a), 3.32(b)
Brown v. Brown, 847 F.3d 502 (7th Cir. 2017), 18.10(a), 36.06
Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 (1975), 22.05(a), 23.37, 23.38, 23.39, 24.19, 24.20

1138
Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936), 24.03
Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161 (1977), 14.12, 17.08(b)(2), 17.08(d)
Brown v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 834 F.3d 506 (3d Cir. 2016), 18.10(a) Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47 (1979), 23.04(b), 23.09, 23.11(a), 23.11(c), 23.29
Brown v. United States, 411 U.S. 223 (1973), 22.05(a) Browne, United States v., 834 F.3d 403 (3d Cir. 2016), 10.14(c)
Bruce, State v., 655 S.W.2d 66 (Mo. App. 1983), 5.03(a) Brumbach, State v., 273 Or. App. 552, 359 P.3d 490 (2015), 30.03(c), 30.07(a) Bruner, United States v., 657 F.2d 1278 (D.C. Cir. 1981), 23.32(c) Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968), 18.10(a), 30.06(a) Bryant, People v., 10 Cal. App. 5th 396, 215 Cal. Rptr. 3d 740 (2017), 38.03(c)
Bryant, People v., 117 A.D.3d 1586, 986 N.Y.S.2d 287 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dept. 2014), 37.02(c)
Bryant, United States v., 461 F.2d 912 (6th Cir. 1972), 33.25
B.S. v. State, 886 So. 2d 1062 (Fla. App. 2004), 39.04
B.S., In the Interest of, 192 Ill. App. 3d 886, 549 N.E.2d 695, 140 Ill. Dec. 44 (1989), 38.23
Buchanan v. Kentucky, 483 U.S. 402 (1987), 9.12, 12.15(a), 38.07
Buckalew, State v., 561 P.2d 289 (Alaska 1977), 14.05
Buckery, People v., 130 A.D.3d 640, 12 N.Y.S.3d 291 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015), 25.03(a) Buckner, People v., 35 Cal. App. 3d 307, 111 Cal. Rptr. 32 (1973), 23.21
Budd, State v., 185 Wash. 2d 566, 374 P.3d 137 (2016), 23.18(a) Budder v. Addison, 851 F.3d 1047 (10th Cir. 2017), 13.01
Budzyn, People v., 456 Mich. 775, 66 N.W.2d 229 (1997), 27.05(a)(2)
Bueno, People v., 2018 CO 4, 409 P.3d 320 (Colo. 2018), 9.09(a) Bullcoming v. New Mexico, 564 U.S. 647 (2011), 30.04(c)
Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430 (1981), 17.08(c)
Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U.S. 543 (1968), 23.18(a) Bunkers, United States v., 521 F.2d 1217 (9th Cir. 1975), 23.35
Burch v. Louisiana, 441 U.S. 130 (1979), 21.01
Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465 (1921), 23.36
Burgess, State v., 156 N.H. 746, 943 A.2d 727 (2008), 38.05(a), 38.16(b), 38.26
Burgos, United States v., 579 F.2d 747 (2d Cir. 1974), 10.08(b)
Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978), 17.08(d), 32.01, 35.05
Burns, People v., 494 Mich. 104, 832 N.W.2d 738 (2013), 30.04(c)
Burns v. Martuscello, 890 F.3d 77 (2d Cir. 2018), 5.09
Burston, United States v., 806 F.3d 1123 (8th Cir. 2015), 23.15(c)
Burt v. Titlow, 134 S. Ct. 10 (2013), 14.01

1139
Burton, People v., 6 N.Y.3d 584, 848 N.E.2d 454, 815 N.Y.S.2d 7 (2006), 23.15(a) Bush, United States v., 647 F.2d 357 (3d Cir. 1981), 23.32(c)
Butler, State v., 232 Ariz. 84, 302 P.3d 609 (2013), 23.18(a)
Butler v. State, 102 So. 3d 260 (Miss. 2012), 25.03(c)
Butler v. United States, 414 A.2d 844 (D.C. 1980), 20.04, 20.05
Butts, In the Matter of, 157 N.C. App. 609, 582 S.E.2d 279 (2003), 2.03, 14.01
Bynum v. United States, 262 F.2d 465 (D.C. Cir. 1958), 23.37

C

Caballero, People v., 55 Cal. 4th 262, 282 P.3d 291, 145 Cal. Rptr. 3d 286 (2012), 13.01
Cable, State v., 51 So. 3d 434 (Fla. 2010), 23.21
Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433 (1973), 23.24, 23.25
Caffrey, State v., 332 N.W.2d 269 (S.D. 1983), 24.04(d), 24.05(a) Cage v. Louisiana, 498 U.S. 39 (1990), 36.06
Cain, Commonwealth v., 361 Mass. 224, 279 N.E.2d 706 (1972), 24.10(a) Caldwell v. Mississippi, 472 U.S. 320 (1985), 11.03(a) California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121 (1983), 24.08(a) California v. Ciralo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986), 23.15(c), 23.16
California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149 (1970), 4.31(c)
California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984), 9.08, 9.09(b)(7)
Callahan v. Wilson, 863 F.3d 144 (2d Cir. 2017), 23.07(d) Cameron, In re, 68 Cal. 2d 487, 439 P.2d 633, 67 Cal. Rptr. 529 (1968), 24.05(c)
Camou, United States v., 773 F.3d 932 (9th Cir. 2014), 23.08(b)
Camp v. Neven, 606 Fed. Appx. 322 (9th Cir. 2015), 9.12
Campbell, State v., 300 P.3d 72 (Kan. 2013), 23.20
Campbell v. Louisiana, 523 U.S. 392 (1998), 21.03(b)
Campbell v. United States, 373 U.S. 487 (1963), 27.12(c)
Campbell v. United States, 365 U.S. 85 (1961), 27.12(c)
Campbell v. United States, 450 A.2d 428 (D.C. 1982), 30.07(a) Candelaria, State v., 144 N.M. 797, 192 P.3d 792 (N.M. App. 2008), 15.03
Cannedy v. Adams, 706 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2013), 8.06
Cantave, People v., 21 N.Y.3d 374, 993 N.E.2d 1257, 971 N.Y.S.2d 237 (2013), 30.07(b)
Capers, United States v., 627 F.3d 470 (2d Cir. 2010), 24.20(b)
Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., 556 U.S. 868 (2009), 20.04, 20.05
Cardenas, United States v., 9 F.3d 1139 (5th Cir. 1993), 18.10(a) Carey v. Musladin, 549 U.S. 70 (2006), 14.04(c), 27.08
Carey, People ex rel., v. White, 65 Ill. 2d 193, 357 N.E.2d 512, 2 Ill. Dec. 345 (1976), 21.01
Carillo v. County of Los Angeles, 798 F.3d 1210 (9th Cir. 2015), 9.09(a) Carlson v. Fewins, 801 F.3d 668 (6th Cir. 2015), 23.20, 23.21
Carmona, People v., 233 A.D.2d 142, 649 N.Y.S.2d 432 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1996), 22.06(d)
Carneiro, United States v., 861 F.2d 1171 (9th Cir. 1988), 23.17(c) Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506 (1962), 24.13(c)
Carpenter v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 348 (2014) (per curiam), 23.15(c), 23.21
Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348 (2014) (per curiam), 23.15(c), 23.21
Carroll v. Commonwealth, 54 Va. App. 730, 682 S.E.2d 92 (2009), 14.22(a) Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925), 23.11(a), 23.24
Carruthers v. State, 272 Ga. 306, 528 S.E.2d 217 (2000), 7.03(c)
Carter, State v., 412 A.2d 56 (Me. 1980), 22.03(d)
Carter, State v., 16 S.W.3d 762 (Tenn. 2000), 4.28(a) Carter v. Kentucky, 450 U.S. 288 (1981), 33.05, 36.07
Carter v. United States, 530 U.S. 255 (2000), 36.05
Casal, State v., 103 Wash. 2d 812, 699 P.2d 1234 (1985), 9.10(a) Cash v. Williams, 455 F.2d 1227 (6th Cir. 1972), 23.23
Casiano, People v., 148 A.D.3d 1044, 50 N.Y.S.3d 439 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017), 36.11(a) Casiano-Jiménez v. United States, 817 F.3d 816 (1st Cir. 2016), 33.07
Castagnola, State v., 145 Ohio St. 3d 1, 46 N.E.3d 638 (2015), 23.17(a), 23.17(f)
Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977), 21.03(b)
Castellanos, United States v., 478 F.2d 749 (2d Cir. 1973), 36.17
Castellanos v. Small, 766 F.3d 1137 (9th Cir. 2014), 28.03(b)
Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc), 5.09
Catalan v. Cockrell, 315 F.3d 491 (5th Cir. 2002), 9.09(b)(1)
Catanzaro, Commonwealth v., 441 Mass. 46, 803 N.E.2d 287 (2004), 23.22(c)
Causey, State in the Interest of, 363 So. 2d 472 (La. 1978), 12.16, 12.21
C.B., In re, 708 So. 2d 391 (La. 1998), 21.01
C.B., In the Matter of the Petition of, 122 P.3d 1065 (Colo. App. 2005), 38.08
C.D.L., In the Matter of the Welfare of, 306 N.W. 2d 819 (Minn. 1981), 30.07(b)
Ceballos, State v., 266 Conn. 364, 832 A.2d 14 (2003), 36.11(a) Ceccolini, United States v., 435 U.S. 268 (1978), 23.37
Cedeno, People v., 27 N.Y.3d 110, 50 N.E.3d 901, 31 N.Y.S.3d 434 (2016), 18.10(a)
C.E.E., In the Interest of v. Juvenile Officer, 727 S.W.2d 451 (Mo. App. 1987), 39.04
Cejas, United States v., 761 F.3d 717 (7th Cir. 2014), 10.14(c)
Cervantes, State v., 87 Wash. App. 440, 942 P.2d 382 (1997), 36.06
Chadwick, United States v., 433 U.S. 1 (1977), 23.08(a), 23.08(b), 23.26
Chafin v. State, 246 Ga. 709, 273 S.E.2d 147 (1980), 9.07(b)
Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973), 9.09(b)(4), 9.10(b), 13.05(b), 30.03(b), 31.13, 33.04, 33.25, 34.10
Chandler v. Florida, 449 U.S. 560 (1981), 20.03(b), 27.05(a)(1)
Chapin v. United States, 341 F.2d 900 (10th Cir. 1965), 14.29(b)
Chapman, State v., 209 Mont. 57, 679 P.2d 1210 (1984), 9.10(a) Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18 (1967), 37.02(a) Chapman v. United States, 365 U.S. 610 (1961), 23.08(b), 23.16, 23.18(b), 23.20
Charles, United States v., 722 F.3d 1319 (11th Cir. 2013), 30.04(c) Chartier v. State, 124 Nev. 760, 191 P.3d 1182 (2008), 18.10
Chase, United States v., 135 F. Supp. 230 (N.D. Ill. 1955), 15.04(b)
Chatman, Commonwealth v., 260 Va. 562, 538 S.E.2d 304 (2000), 12.21
Chelette, State v., 558 So. 2d 770 (La. App. 1990), 38.03(c)
Chen, State v., 208 N.J. 307, 27 A.3d 930 (2011), 25.05
Cherry v. Estelle, 507 F.2d 242 (5th Cir. 1975), sub subsequent history in 424 F. Supp. 548 (N.D. Tex. 1976), 11.03(a) Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969), 23.08(a), 23.19
Chitty, United States v., 760 F.2d 425 (2d Cir. 1985), 12.15(a) Chrisman, State v., 100 Wash. 2d 814, 676 P.2d 419 (1984), 23.19
Christopher T., In re, 129 Md. App. 28, 740 A.2d 69 (1999), 2.03, 4.05
Circuit Court for Winnebago County, State ex rel. Mateo D.O. v., 280 Wis. 2d 575, 696 N.W.2d 275 (Wis. App. 2005), 20.05, 26.01
Cissna v. State, 170 Ind. App. 437, 352 N.E.2d 793 (1976), 5.03(a)
City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765 (2015), 23.20
City of Canton, Ohio v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989), 6.10
City of Defiance v. Kretz, 60 Ohio St. 3d 1, 573 N.E.2d 32 (1991), 7.03(c)
City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, 531 U.S. 32 (2000), 23.08(c), 23.25, 23.29
City of Ontario v. Quon, 560 U.S. 746 (2010), 23.15(d)
City of Revere v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 463 U.S. 239 (1983), 5.09
City of Seattle v. Erickson, 188 Wash. 2d 721, 398 P.3d 1124 (2017), 28.03(b)
City of Topeka v. Grabauskas, 33 Kan. App. 2d 210, 99 P.3d 1125 (2004), 23.11(b) Clancey, People v., 56 Cal. 4th 562, 299 P.3d 131, 155 Cal. Rptr. 3d 485 (2013), 14.06(c)(2)
Clark, People v., 453 Mich. 572, 556 N.W.2d 820 (1996), 36.02
Clark, State v., 364 S.W.3d 540 (Mo. 2012), 30.07(c), 31.03
Clark v. Arizona, 548 U.S. 735 (2006), 12.22, 33.21, 35.05, 35.06(c) Clark v. Caspari, 274 F.3d 507 (8th Cir. 2001), 25.03(a) Clark v. Smith, 403 U.S. 946 (1971), 24.09
Clark v. State, 994 N.E.2d 252 (Ind. 2013), 23.04(b)
Clary, People v., 494 Mich. 260, 833 N.W.2d 308 (2013), 24.24
Class v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 798 (2018), 14.29(b) Clawson, State v., 270 S.E.2d 659 (W. Va. 1980), 24.13(a) Clay, In the Interest of, 246 N.W.2d 263 (Iowa 1976), 13.19
Clay, People v., 88 A.D.2d 14, 926 N.Y.S.2d 598 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2011), 30.04(a) Clay, United States v., 630 Fed. Appx. 377 (6th Cir. 2015), 23.32(b)
Clay, United States v., 640 F.2d 157 (8th Cir. 1981), 23.22(c)
C.L.B. v. Juvenile Officer, 22 S.W.2d 233 (Mo. App. 2000), 39.04
Clewis v. Texas, 386 U.S. 707 (1967), 24.05(b), 24.05(d), 24.20(a) Clingan v. United States, 400 F.2d 849 (5th Cir. 1968), 33.25
C.M. (A Juvenile), United States v., 485 F.3d 492 (9th Cir. 2007), 24.14(b)
Cobb, United States v., 185 F.3d 1193 (11th Cir. 1999), 18.10(b)
Coco, State ex rel., 363 So. 2d 207 (La. 1978), 24.02
Coggins v. Buonora, 776 F.3d 108 (2d Cir. 2015), 3.18, 9.09(b)(5)
Cohen, United States v., 481 F.3d 896 (6th Cir. 2007), 23.27
Cole v. Arkansas, 333 U.S. 196 (1948), 9.09(b)(2), 36.06, 35.07
Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1 (1970), 4.03, 4.29, 4.31(d), 9.09(b)(1), 21.02(a), 25.02
Coleman v. Alabama, 389 U.S. 22 (1967), 21.03(b)
Coleman v. Burnett, 477 F.2d 1187 (D.C. Cir. 1973), 4.31(c) Coleman v. Kemp, 778 F.2d 1487 (11th Cir. 1985), rehearing denied, 782 F.2d 896 (11th Cir. (1986), 20.03(b)
Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722 (1991), 4.03
Coles, State v., 218 N.J. 322, 95 A.3d 136 (2014), 23.06(a), 23.18(b)
Collins, State in the Interest of, 288 So. 2d 918 (La. App. 1973), 27.09
Collins, United States v., 510 F.3d 697 (7th Cir. 2007), 23.20
Collins v. Auger, 577 F.2d 1107 (8th Cir. 1978), 12.15(a) Collins v. City of Harker Heights, Texas, 503 U.S. 115 (1992), 6.10
Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663 (2018), 23.15(b), 23.15(c), 23.22(d), 23.24
Colon v. Rozum, 649 Fed. Appx. 259 (3d Cir. 2016), 18.10(a) Colonnade Catering Corp. v. United States, 397 U.S. 72 (1970), 23.16
Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367 (1987), 23.08(c), 23.25
Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986), 22.03(d), 23.38, 24.03, 24.04, 24.04(a), 24.05, 24.05(b), 24.05(c), 24.06, 24.10, 24.10(a), 24.14(a), 24.16
Colorado v. Spring, 479 U.S. 564 (1987), 24.03, 24.04(d), 24.10(a), 24.10(b)
Colvard, State v., 296 Ga. 381, 768 S.E.2d 473 (2015), 23.18(b)
Colville, People v., 20 N.Y.3d 20, 979 N.E.2d 1125, 955 N.Y.S.2d 799 (2012), 36.05
Combs v. United States, 408 U.S. 224 (1972), 23.15(b)
Commonwealth v. Anderl, 329 Pa. Super. 69, 477 A.2d 1356 (1984), 24.10(b)
Commonwealth v. Barroso, 122 S.W.3d 554 (Ky. 2003), 9.09(b)(3)
Commonwealth v. Bastaldo, 472 Mass. 16, 32 N.E.3d 873 (2015), 25.03, 33.02(b)
Commonwealth v. Batts, 163 A.3d 410 (Pa. 2017), 13.01
Commonwealth v. Brown, 2018 WL 2452643 (Pa. June 1, 2018), 30.04(c) Commonwealth v. Cain, 361 Mass. 224, 279 N.E.2d 706 (1972), 24.10(a) Commonwealth v. Catanzaro, 441 Mass. 46, 803 N.E.2d 287 (2004), 23.22(c)
Commonwealth v. Chatman, 260 Va. 562, 538 S.E.2d 304 (2000), 12.21
Commonwealth v. Tassone, 468 Mass. 391, 11 N.E.3d 67 (2014), 30.04(c)
Commonwealth v. Thomas, 358 Mass. 771, 267 N.E.2d 489 (1971), 23.15(c)
Commonwealth v. Thornley, 406 Mass. 96, 546 N.E.2d 350 (1989), 25.03(c) Commonwealth v. Walker, 625 Pa. 450, 92 A.3d 766 (2012), 11.01(a), 11.01(b)
27.12(c)
Cone v. Bell, 556 U.S. 449 (2009), 9.09(a) Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270 (D.C. 2013), 35.05
Conn, State v., 278 Kan. 387, 99 P.3d 1108 (2003), 23.08(a) Connecticut v. Johnson, 460 U.S. 73 (1983), 35.06(f)
Conner v. State, 327 P.3d 503 (Nev. 2014), 28.03(b)
Connolly v. Commonwealth, 377 Mass. 527, 387 N.E.2d 519 (1979), 35.05
Connor, State v., 292 Conn. 483, 973 A.2d 627 (2009), 4.05
Cook, Commonwealth v., 371 Mass. 832, 359 N.E.2d 949 (1977), 33.09
Cook, People v., 37 N.Y.2d 591, 338 N.E.2d 619, 376 N.Y.S.2d 110 (1975), 30.07(a) Cooke v. State, 977 A.2d 803 (Del. 2009), 2.03, 14.01
Cool v. United States, 409 U.S. 100 (1972), 32.01, 33.04, 35.05
Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971), 23.18(a), 23.22(b), 23.24
Coons, People v., 75 N.Y.2d 796, 551 N.E.2d 587, 552 N.Y.S.2d 94 (1990), 36.14
Cooper, United States v., 133 F.3d 1395 (11th Cir. 1998), 23.23
Cooper v. Dupnik, 963 F.2d 1220 (9th Cir. 1992), 24.03
Cooper v. Griffin, 455 F.2d 1142 (5th Cir. 1972), 24.10(b)
Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348 (1996), 12.16, 12.17, 12.20
Corbitt v. New Jersey, 439 U.S. 212 (1978), 9.12, 12.15(a), 33.03
Cordova, State v., 109 N.M. 211, 784 P.2d 30 (1989), 7.09
Corley v. United States, 556 U.S. 303 (2009), 24.15
Corgold v. United States, 367 F.2d 1 (9th Cir. 1966), 23.36
Corona v. State, 64 So. 3d 1232 (Fla. 2011), 9.07(e), 30.04(c)
Coronado v. State, 835 S.W.2d 636 (Tex. Crim. App. 1992), 23.34
Cortez, United States v., 449 U.S. 411 (1981), 23.09, 23.12, 23.22(b), 23.29, 23.34
Cost v. State, 417 Md. 360, 10 A.3d 184 (2010), 9.09(b)(6) Costarelli v. Massachusetts, 421 U.S. 193 (1975), 39.02(a) County Court of Ulster County v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140 (1979), 35.06(f)
County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 137 S. Ct. 1539 (2017), 23.07(d)
County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44 (1991), 4.25, 4.28(a), 4.38, 24.15 Cowley v. Stricklin, 929 F.2d 640 (11th Cir. 1991), 11.03(a) Cox v. Turley, 506 F.2d 1347 (6th Cir. 1974), 4.18
Cox v. United States, 473 F.2d 334 (4th Cir. 1973), 13.04
Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012 (1988), 27.01
C.P., State in the Interest of, 212 N.J. Super. 222, 514 A.2d 850 (1986), 17.04(b)
Crace v. Herzog, 798 F.3d 840 (9th Cir. 2015), 36.05
Craighead, United States v., 539 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2008), 24.08(a) Crandall, United States v., 748 F.3d 476 (2d Cir. 2014), 27.01
Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986), 13.05(b), 24.03, 24.22, 30.03(c), 31.05, 33.04, 34.10
Crank, State v., 105 Utah 332, 142 P.2d 178 (1943), 24.16
Crane, State v., 329 P.3d 689 (N.M. 2014), 23.15(d)
Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), 4.30, 9.07(c), 18.10(a), 22.05(b), 30.04(a), 30.04(c), 30.06(a), 31.01(a)
Creek, In re, 243 A.2d 49 (D.C. 1968), 24.02
Creek v. Stone, 379 F.2d 106 (D.C. Cir. 1967), 39.07
Crews, United States v., 445 U.S. 463 (1980), 23.37, 25.07
Crick v. Smith, 729 F.2d 1038 (6th Cir. 1984), 13.04
Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28 (1978), 17.08(b)(1)
Cronic, United States v., 466 U.S. 468 (1984), 15.02
Croby v. United States, 506 U.S. 255 (1993), 27.01
Cross v. United States, 335 F.2d 987 (D.C. Cir. 1964), 18.05
Cross v. United States, 325 F.2d 629 (D.C. Cir. 1963), 27.01
Crowe v. County of San Diego, 608 F.3d 406 (9th Cir. 2010), 24.03, 3.18, 24.04(b)
Cruz, People v., 129 A.D.3d 119, 10 N.Y.S.3d 214 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2015), 25.03(a) Cruz v. New York, 481 U.S. 186 (1987), 18.10(a) C.S., In re, 115 Ohio St. 3d 267, 874 N.E.2d 1177 (2007), 4.05
C.T.F., In the Interest of, 316 N.W.2d 865 (Iowa 1982), 15.04(b)
Cudjo v. Ayers, 698 F.3d 752 (9th Cir. 2012), 30.03(b), 33.04
Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568 (1961), 24.03, 24.05, 24.05(b), 24.10(a) Culver, Commonwealth v., 51 A.3d 866 (Pa. Super. 2012), 29.02
Cummings, People v., 31 N.Y.3d 204, 99 N.E.3d 877, 75 N.Y.S.3d 484 (2018), 30.04(b)(1)
Cupp v. Murphy, 412 U.S. 291 (1973), 23.08(d)
Cupp v. Naughten, 414 U.S. 141 (1973), 35.06(f)
Curlew, State v., 459 A.2d 160 (Me. 1983), 24.21
Curran v. Delaware, 259 F.2d 707 (3d Cir. 1958), 8.14
Currier v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 2144 (2018), 17.08(b)(2), 17.08(f), 18.02
Curry, People v., 2017 WL 2870482 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t July 6, 2017), 4.05
Curry, State v., 988 S.W.2d 153 (Tenn. 1999), 19.04
Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335 (1980), 9.09(b(1), 9.12, 10.10, 10.12, 27.13
C.W.M., In the Matter of, 407 A.2d 617 (D.C. 1979), 12.21

D

Dahl, In the Matter of the Welfare of, 278 N.W.2d 316 (Minn. 1979), 13.13
Dahl, State v., 874 N.W.2d 348 (Iowa 2016), 11.03(b), 12.24
Dailey, United States v., 524 F.2d 911 (8th Cir. 1975), 25.03(c), 25.04
Dalia v. United States, 441 U.S. 238 (1979), 23.17(f), 23.17(g), 23.21
Dalton S., In re Interest of, 273 Neb. 504, 730 N.W.2d 816 (2007), 4.05
Dandel, State ex rel., v. Superior Court, 127 Ariz. 184, 619 P.2d 12 (1980), 12.16
Daniel, State v., 589 P.2d 408 (Alaska 1979), 23.25
Daniel V. v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. App. 4th 28, 42 Cal. Rptr. 3d 471 (2006), 20.05, 26.01
Daniels, State v., 182 N.J. 80, 861 A.2d 808 (2004), 10.10
Dansbury v. State, 193 Md. App. 718, 1 A.3d 507 (2010), 10.08(a) Darden v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 168 (1986), 36.11(a) Daryl T., People v., 161 A.D.3d 47, 74 N.Y.S.3d 190 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2018), 12.23
Daugherty, State v., 94 Wash. 2d 263, 616 P.2d 649 (1980), 23.15(c)
Davies, United States v., 768 F.2d 893 (7th Cir. 1985), 5.03(a) Davila, United States v., 569 U.S. 597 (2013) , 14.05
Davila v. Davis, 137 S. Ct. 2058 (2017), 4.03, 9.09(b)(1)
Davis, People v., 352 P.3d 950 (Colo. 2015), 4.05
Davis, State v., 155 Vt. 417, 584 A.2d 1146 (1990), 14.05
Davis, United States v., 793 F.3d 712 (7th Cir. 2015) (en banc), 17.01
Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974), 9.10(b), 13.05(a), 22.03(f), 30.07(c), 30.07(e), 31.01(a), 31.11
Davis v. Ayala, 135 S. Ct. 2187 (2015), 27.02, 28.03(b)
Davis v. Commissioner of Correction, 319 Conn. 548, 126 A.3d 538 (2015), 14.29(b)
Davis v. Johnson, 354 F.2d 689 (6th Cir. 1966), aff’d after remand, 376 F.2d 840 (6th Cir. 1967), 15.02
Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721 (1969), 23.37
Davis v. North Carolina, 384 U.S. 737 (1966), 24.03, 24.05(b)
Davis v. State, 261 Ga. 221, 403 S.E.2d 800 (1991), 4.04
Davis v. United States, 564 U.S. 229 (2011), 23.03
Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994), 22.03(d), 24.11(a), 24.11(c)
D.H., In re, 666 A.2d 462 (D.C. 1995), 15.04(b)
D.H., State v., 340 So. 2d 1163 (Fla. 1976), 17.04(b)
Diamond, State v., 905 N.W.2d 870 (Minn. 2018), 9.12
Diatchenko v. District Attorney, 466 Mass. 655, 1 N.E.3d 270 (2013), 13.01
Diaz, People v., 3 Misc.3d 686, 777 N.Y.S.2d 856 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., Kings Cty. 2004), 12.05(a) Dickens, United States v., 775 F.2d 1056 (9th Cir. 1985), 33.09(a) Dickerson v. Fogg, 692 F.2d 238 (2d Cir. 1982), 25.04
Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000), 3.06, 24.03, 24.07
Dickey v. Florida, 398 U.S. 30 (1970), 15.04(b)
Dickson, State v., 322 Conn. 410, 141 A.3d 810 (2016), 25.01, 25.05(a) DiFrancesco, United States v., 449 U.S. 117 (1980), 34.11(d)(1)
Dillingham v. United States, 423 U.S. 64 (1975), 15.04(b)
Dineen, State v., 296 N.W.2d 421 (Minn. 1980), 23.13
Dinitz, United States v., 424 U.S. 600 (1976), 17.08(e), 29.01, 34.11(d)(1)
Dionisio, United States v., 410 U.S. 1 (1973), 9.12
DiPaola v. Riddle, 581 F.2d 1111 (4th Cir. 1978), 7.05
Di Re, United States v., 332 U.S. 581 (1948), 23.37
Disbrow, People v., 16 Cal. 3d 101, 545 P.2d 272, 127 Cal. Rptr. 360 (1976), 24.23
Discoe, State v., 334 N.W.2d 466 (N.D. 1983), 24.05(c)
District Attorney’s Office for Third Judicial District v. Osborne, 557 U.S. 52 (2009), 13.04
District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577 (2018), 23.07(d)
Dixon v. United States, 548 U.S. 1 (2006), 35.05
Dixon, State v., 967 A.2d 1114 (Vt. 2008), 13.11
Dixon, United States v., 509 U.S. 688 (1993), 14.12, 17.08(b)(2)
D.M., In re, 140 Ohio St. 3d 309, 18 N.E.3d 404 (2014), 13.08
Dockery, United States v., 294 A.2d 158 (1972), 22.03(f)
Dodson v., People v., 30 N.Y.3d 1041, 89 N.E.3d 1254 67 N.Y.S.3d 574 (2017), 14.29(b)
Dodt, People v., 61 N.Y.2d 408, 474 N.Y.S.2d 441, 462 N.E.2d 1159 (1984), 22.03(d)
Doe, State v., 149 Idaho 353, 233 P.3d 1275 (2010), 38.03(c)
Doe v. Renfrow, 475 F. Supp. 1012 (N.D. Ind. 1979), aff’d in part, remanded in part, 631 F.2d 91 (7th Cir. 1980), 23.36
Doe v. State, 88 N.M. 347, 540 P.2d 827 (N.M. App. 1975), 23.34
Doe ex rel. Doe v. Little Rock School District, 380 F.3d 349 (8th Cir. 2004), 23.34
Doe, In the Interest of, 77 Hawai‘i 435, 887 P.2d 645 (1994), 23.34
Doe, In the Interest of, 130 Idaho 811, 948 P.2d 166 (Idaho App.1997), 24.08(a), 24.12
Doe, State v., 104 N.M. 107, 717 P.2d 83 (N.M. App. 1986), 39.04
Doe, United States v., 703 F.2d 745 (3d Cir. 1983), 23.07(b) Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647 (1992), 15.04(b), 22.03(a) Don Mc., In re, 344 Md. 194, 686 A.2d 269 (1996), 38.03(c)
Donovan, United States v., 429 U.S. 413 (1977), 24.19
Doody v. Ryan, 649 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc), 24.04(b)
Dorney, People v., 17 Ill. App. 3d 785, 308 N.E.2d 646 (1974), 22.03(d)
Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415 (1965), 30.04(a), 31.01(a), 31.14
Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963), 4.03, 39.02(b)
Douglas L., In re, 625 A.2d 1357 (R.I. 1993), 30.07(c)
Dow v. Virga, 729 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir. 2013), 9.09(b)(5)
Dow Chemical Co. v. United States, 476 U.S. 227 (1986), 23.16
Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342 (1990), 17.08(f)
Downs, United States v., 230 F.3d 272 (7th Cir. 2000), 25.03(b) Downum v. United States, 372 U.S. 734 (1963), 17.08(e), 34.11(d)(2)
Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976), 3.06, 24.07, 24.24, 33.06, 33.09(a) Drain v. Woods, 595 Fed. Appx. 558 (6th Cir. 2014), 28.03(b)
Drake, State v., 139 N.H. 662, 662 A.2d 265 (1995), 23.34
Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487 (1963), 39.02(b)
Drayton, United States v., 536 U.S. 194 (2002), 23.04(b), 23.18(a), 33.04
Dreyer, State ex rel. Juvenile Department of Multnomah County v., 328 Or. 332, 976 P.2d 1123 (1999), 19.01, 37.02(e), 38.03(a) Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162 (1975), 12.15(a), 12.16, 12.17, 12.20, 27.01
Drury v. State, 368 Md. 331, 793 A.2d 567 (2002), 24.08(b)
D.S., In the Matter of the Welfare of, 306 N.W.2d 882 (Minn. 1981), 35.04
D.T., In the Interest of, 335 N.W.2d 638 (Iowa App. 1983), 13.13
Dubose, State v., 285 Wis. 2d 143, 699 N.W.2d 582 (2005), 11.01(b), 25.02
Dugan, In re, 334 N.W.2d 300 (Iowa 1983), 35.04
Dukes v. Warden, 406 U.S. 250 (1972), 14.29(a) Dumas, In the Interest of, 357 Pa. Super. 294, 515 A.2d 984 (1986), 23.33, 23.34
Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979), 23.04(b), 23.04(d), 23.06(a), 23.06(b), 23.06(c), 23.06(d), 23.07(d), 23.09, 23.10, 23.37, 23.38, 23.39, 24.19, 24.20
Dunbar, People v., 423 Mich 380, 377 N.W.2d 262 (1985), 13.15
Duncan, United States v., 712 F. Supp. 124 (S.D. Ohio 1988), 33.25
Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145 (1968), 17.05, 20.01(b) null
Elmer v. State, 114 So. 3d 198 (Fla. App. 2012), 31.10
El Vocero de Puerto Rico v. Puerto Rico, 508 U.S. 147 (1993) (per curiam), 27.08
Engle v. Isaac, 456 U.S. 107 (1982), 36.03
Espinoza, State v., 112 Wash. 2d 819, 774 P.2d 1177 (1989), 20.05 Ess, State v., 453 S.W.3d 196 (Mo. 2015), 37.02(a) Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544 (7th Cir. 2017), 5.09
Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439 (7th Cir. 2017), 5.09
Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 430 F.3d 140 (3d Cir. 2005), 23.15(c), 23.21
Estelle v. Williams, 425 U.S. 501 (1976), 4.27(c), 27.01, 27.08, 35.06(f)
Estevez, People v., 155 A.D.3d 650, 64 N.Y.S.3d 236 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017), 22.05
Estrada, In re, 1 Ariz. App. 348, 403 P.2d 1 (1965), 24.10(a) Estrada, United States v., 733 F.2d 683 (9th Cir. 1984), 23.32(c)
Evans v. Michigan, 568 U.S. 313 (2013), 17.08(c), 32.01, 35.01
Evans v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. 3d 617, 522 P.2d 681, 114 Cal. Rptr. 121 (1974), 9.09(b)(7)
Everett, United States ex rel., v. Murphy, 329 F.2d 68 (2d Cir. 1964), 24.04(c) Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387 (1985), 39.02(b)
E.W. v. Dolgos, 884 F.3d 172, 176 (4th Cir. 2018), 23.07(d)
Ewell, United States v., 383 U.S. 116 (1966), 15.04(b)
Ex Parte Chaddock, 369 S.W.3d 880 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012), 17.08(b)(2)
Ex Parte Cruse, 474 So. 2d 109 (Ala. 1985), 13.19
Ex Parte Whisenant, 466 So. 2d 1006 (Ala. 1985), 24.09
Ex Parte Willis, 455 So. 2d 917 (Ala. 1984), 31.01(a)

F

F-, in the Matter of, 2 I.&N. Dec. 517 (Central Office 1946), 14.07
Facebook, Inc. v. Superior Court. 4 Cal. 5th 1245, 417 P.3d 725, 233 Cal. Rptr. 3d 77 (2018), 8.16
Fair v. State, 27 N.E.2d 427 (Ind. 1933), 23.25
Fare v. Michael C., 442 U.S. 707 (1979), 24.02, 24.05(d), 24.07, 24.10, 24.10(a), 24.11(a), 24.14(a) Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975), 4.05, 9.09(b)(2), 27.01
Farina v. Secretary, Florida Department of Corrections, 536 Fed. Appx. 966 (11th Cir. 2013), 36.11(a) Farris, State v., 109 Ohio St. 3d 519, 849 N.E.2d 985 (2006), 24.20(e) Faucher, State v., 227 Wis. 2d 700, 596 N.W.2d 770 (1999), 28.03(a) Fellers v. United States, 540 U.S. 519 (2004), 24.13(b), 24.20(b)
Ferguson, In re, 5 Cal. 3d 525, 487 P.2d 1234, 96 Cal. Rptr. 594 (1971), 9.09(b)(5)
Ferguson, People v., 114 A.D.2d 226, 498 N.Y.S.2d 800 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1986), 7.05
Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570 (1961), 9.09(b)(1)
Ferguson v. State, 301 Md. 542, 483 A.2d 1255 (1984), 23.37, 23.39
Fermin, People v., 36 A.D.3d 934, 828 N.Y.S.2d 546 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2007), 36.02
Fernandez, People v., 82 A.D.2d 922, 440 N.Y.S.2d 677 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1981), 25.03(c)
Fernandez, State v., 712 So. 2d 485 (La. 1998), 24.14(a) Fernandez v. California, 134 S. Ct. 1126 (2014), 23.18(b)
Fernow, State v., 328 S.W.3d 429 (Mo. App. 2010), 17.03(a) Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191 (1957), 22.05(b), 24.03, 24.05, 24.05(b)
Fisher, United States v., 711 F.3d 460 (4th Cir. 2013), 14.29(b)
Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976), 9.12, 22.05(b)
Fisher v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority, 690 F.2d 1133 (4th Cir. 1982), 24.15
Fixel v. Wainwright, 492 F.2d 480 (5th Cir. 1974), 23.15(c)
Flannery, United States v., 451 F.2d 880 (1st Cir. 1971), 33.05
Fletcher v. Weir, 455 U.S. 603 (1982), 24.24, 33.06
Flippo v. West Virginia, 528 U.S. 11 (1999), 23.16
Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington, 566 U.S. 318 (2012), 23.08(c), 23.14
Flores-Montano, United States v., 541 U.S. 149 (2004), 23.30
Florez, State v., 134 N.J. 570, 636 A.2d 1040 (1994), 9.10(a) Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429 (1991), 23.06(c), 23.11(b), 23.37
Florida v. Harris, 568 U.S. 237 (2013), 23.07
Florida v. Jardines, 569 U.S. 1 (2013), 23.15(c), 23.16, 23.22(b)
Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248 (1991), 23.18
Florida v. J.L., 529 U.S. 266 (2000), 23.03, 23.07, 23.09, 23.10, 23.19, 23.32(a), 23.32(b), 23.32(c), 23.32(d)
Florida v. Nixon, 543 U.S. 175 (2004), 2.03, 13.19, 14.01, 21.02(c), 33.07, 36.05
Florida v. Powell, 559 U.S. 50 (2010), 24.09
Florida v. Rodriguez, 469 U.S. 1 (1984), 23.11(c)
Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983), 22.03(d), 23.04(a), 23.04(b), 23.04(d), 23.05, 23.06, 23.06(a), 23.06(b), 23.06(c), 23.06(d), 23.09, 23.10, 23.11(b), 23.12, 23.18(a), 23.37
Florida v. Wells, 495 U.S. 1 (1990), 23.08(c), 23.25
Florida v. White, 526 U.S. 559 (1999), 23.24
Flowers, People v., 23 Mich. App. 523, 179 N.W.2d 56 (1970), 23.18(b)
Flowers v. State, 842 So. 2d 531 (Miss. 2003), 33.09
Floyd v. Vannoy, 894 F.3d 143 (5th Cir. 2018) (per curiam), 9.09(a) Foldesi, State v., 131 Idaho 778, 963 P.2d 1215 (Idaho App. 1998), 23.23
Fong Foo v. United States, 369 U.S. 141 (1962), 17.08(c)
Fontaine v. California, 390 U.S. 593 (1968), 15.04(b)
Fontaine v. United States, 411 U.S. 213 (1973), 14.29(b)
Ford v. Georgia, 498 U.S. 411, 424 (1991), 7.05
Ford v. Wainwright, 477 U.S. 399 (1986), 12.17, 13.05(b)
Fordyce, People v., 200 Colo. 153, 612 P.2d 1131 (1980), 24.05(c)
Foreste, United States v., 780 F.3d 518 (2d Cir. 2015), 23.06(a) Forrest, United States v., 620 F.2d 446 (5th Cir. 1980), 23.23
Foster, United States v., 100 F.3d 846 (10th Cir. 2006), 23.22(a) Foster v. California, 394 U.S. 440 (1969), 25.02, 25.03(d)
Foster v. Chatman, 136 S. Ct. 1737 (2016), 28.03(b) Foucha v. Louisiana, 504 U.S. 71 (1992), 12.20, 12.23, 39.06
Fowlkes, United States v., 804 F.3d 954 (9th Cir. 2015), 23.14
Fowler, United States v., 476 F.2d 1091 (7th Cir. 1973), 24.02, 24.12
Frady, United States v., 456 U.S. 152 (1982), 36.03
Francis v. Franklin, 471 U.S. 307 (1985), 35.06(f), 36.13
Frank C., In the Matter of, 70 N.Y.2d 408, 516 N.E.2d 1203, 522 N.Y.S.2d 89 (1987), 15.04(a) Franklin v. State, 855 A.2d 274 (Del. 2004), 13.18
Franklin, State v., 174 W. Va. 469, 327 S.E.2d 449 (1985), 27.08
Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978), 9.10(a), 23.17(c), 23.31
Frazier v. Cupp, 394 U.S. 731 (1969), 23.18(b), 29.02
Frederick, People v., 500 Mich. 228, 895 N.W.2d 541 (2017), 23.18(a) Freeman, United States v., 735 F.3d 92 (2d Cir. 2013), 23.09, 23.32(a) Freeman v. State, 121 So. 3d 888 (Miss. 2013), 8.19(a)(3)
Frei, State v., 831 N.W.2d 70 (Iowa 2013), partially overruled on an unrelated point in Alcala v. Marriott International, Inc., 880 N.W.2d 699 (Iowa 2016), 36.06
Frendak v. United States, 408 A.2d 364 (D.C. 1979), 12.24
Freshment, State v., 309 Mont. 154, 43 P.3d 968 (2002), 18.05
Fry, People v., 92 P.3d 970 (Colo. 2004), 4.30, 30.04(c)
Frye v. United States, 293 F. 1013, 1014 (D.C. Cir. 1923), 33.11
Fuentes v. Griffin, 829 F.3d 233 (2d Cir. 2016), 9.09(a) Fulton, Commonwealth v., 179 A.3d 475 (Pa. 2018), 23.08(b)
Fulwood v. Stone, 394 F.2d 939 (D.C. Cir. 1967), 4.15
Fuqua, People v., 122 A.D.3d 1249, 996 N.Y.S.2d 410 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2014), 10.08(a) Fuqua v. Ryan, 890 F.3d 838 (9th Cir. 2018), 5.09

G

Gabaree v. Steele, 792 F.3d 991 (8th Cir. 2015), 31.09
Gagliardi, United States v., 506 F.3d 140 (2d Cir. 2007), 10.14(c)
Gagnon, United States v., 470 U.S. 522 (1985), 27.01, 27.02
Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973), 4.33, 13.04, 13.05(a), 13.05(b), 39.04
Gainey, United States v., 380 U.S. 63 (1965), 35.06(f)
Gall v. Scroggy, 603 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 2010), 39.08
Gallagher. People ex rel., v. District Court, 656 P.2d 1287 (Colo. 1983), 9.09(b)(7)
Gallardo-Mendez, United States v., 150 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 1998), 17.08(f) Gallegos v. Colorado, 370 U.S. 49 (1962), 24.04(b), 24.05(a), 24.14(a) Galpin, United States v., 720 F.3d 436 (2d Cir. 2013), 23.17(f)
Gamez-Orduno, United States v., 235 F.3d 453 (9th Cir. 2000), 9.09(a) Ganias, United States v., 755 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2014), 23.17(g)
Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 (1979), 20.03(b), 21.02(a), 27.05(a)(1), 27.08, 28.03(b), 28.03(c) Garcia, People v., 2 Cal. 5th 792, 391 P.3d 1153, 216 Cal. Rptr. 3d 75 (2017), 14.22(a) Garcia, State v., 301 P.3d 658 (Kan. 2013), 24.04(b)
Garcia, State v., 18 P.3d 1123 (Utah App. 2001), 35.05
Garcia v. City of Riverside, 817 F.3d 635 (9th Cir. 2015), 23.07(d)
Garcia v. Long, 808 F.3d 771 (9th Cir. 2015), 24.11(a) Gardner, State v., 135 Ohio St. 3d 99, 984 N.E.2d 1025 (2012), 23.31
Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. 273 (1968), 23.18(a) Garibay, United States v., 143 F.3d 534 (9th Cir. 1998), 24.10
Garland v. Cox, 472 F.2d 875 (4th Cir. 1973), 15.02
Garner, United States v., 439 F.2d 525 (D.C. Cir. 1970), 22.03(d)
Garner v. United States, 424 U.S. 648 (1976), 24.10
Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. 773 (1985), 14.12, 17.08(b)(2), 17.08(d)
Garries, People v., 645 P.2d 1306 (Colo. 1982), 9.09(b)(7)
Garrison v. State, 28 Md. App. 257, 345 A.2d 86 (1975), 23.15(c) Garrity v. New Jersey, 385 U.S. 493 (1967), 12.15(a), 23.18(a) Gasaway v. State, 249 Ind. 241, 231 N.E.2d 513 (1967), 7.03(c)
Gaskins, State v., 866 N.W.2d 1 (Iowa 2015), 23.08(b)
Gaston, State v., 192 Wash. App. 1032, 2016 WL 398317 (2016), 7.03(c)
Gaudette, Commonwealth v., 441 Mass. 762, 808 N.E.2d 798 (2004), 10.10
Gault, In re, 387 U.S. 1 (1967), 2.02, 2.03, 4.03, 4.05, 4.12, 4.14, 9.09(b)(2), 13.05(a), 15.02, 20.01(b), 21.01, 24.02, 24.05(a), 24.10(a), 24.14(a), 24.22, 27.02, 27.03, 27.09, 30.01, 30.04(a), 33.05, 38.02
G.C. v. Owensboro Public Schools, 711 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2013), 23.34
Geaslen, People v., 54 N.Y.2d 510, 430 N.E.2d 1280, 446 N.Y.S.2d 227 (1981), 9.09(a) Geauga County Court of Common Pleas, Juvenile Division, State ex rel. Plain Dealer Publishing Company v., 90 Ohio St. 3d 79, 734 N.E.2d 1214 (2000) (per curiam), 27.08
Geboy v. Gray, 471 F.2d 575 (7th Cir. 1973), 13.04
Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976), 9.09(b)(1), 27.02, 27.11, 33.09(b)
General v. State, 367 Md. 475, 789 A.2d 102 (2002), 36.06
Gennusa v. Canova, 748 F.3d 1103 (11th Cir. 2014), 24.17
George Anthony W., State v., 200 W. Va. 86, 488 S.E.2d 361 (1996), 24.15
George G., In re, 64 Md. App. 70, 494 A.2d 247 (1985), 20.05
George, State in the Interest of, 430 So. 2d 289 (La. App. 1983), 38.24
Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42 (1992), 28.03(b)
Georgia v. Randolph, 547 U.S. 103 (2006), 23.02(a), 23.18(b)
Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975), 3.14, 4.03, 4.07(b), 4.22, 4.28(a), 4.29, 4.31(c), 4.33, 4.38, 23.07(d), 24.13(a), 24.15
Gholson v. Estelle, 675 F.2d 734 (5th Cir. 1982), 12.15(a) Gibbs v. Frank, 387 F.3d 268 (3d Cir. 2004), 12.15(a) Gibson v. Zahradnick, 581 F.2d 75 (4th Cir. 1978), 12.15(a) Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), 9.09(b)(1)
Gifford, United States v., 727 F.3d 92 (1st Cir. 2013), 23.32(c) Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972), 9.09(b)(5), 31.03
Giles v. California, 554 U.S. 353 (2008), 30.04(c)
Giles v. Maryland, 386 U.S. 66 (1967), 9.09(b)(5)
Gill, State v., 755 N.W.2d 454 (N.D. 2008), 23.16
Gillenwater, United States v., 717 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2013), 33.07
Gilroy, State v., 313 N.W.2d 513 (Iowa 1981), 5.03(a) Gingerich v. State, 979 N.E.2d 694 (Ind. App. 2012), 13.07
Giordenello v. United States, 357 U.S. 480 (1958), 23.07(b)
Girard, State v., 34 Or. App. 85, 578 P.2d 415 (1978), 36.03
Girts v. Yanai, 501 F.3d 743 (6th Cir. 2007), 36.11(a) G.K., In the Matter of, 497 P.2d 914 (Alaska 1972), 20.04
Gladys R., In re, 1 Cal. 3d 855, 464 P.2d 127, 83 Cal. Rptr. 671 (1970), 17.04(b), 20.05
Glass, State v., 583 P.2d 872 (Alaska 1978), 7.09
Gleason, State v., 404 A.2d 573 (Me. 1979), 4.15
Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court, 457 U.S. 596 (1982), 27.08
Glover, United States v., 755 F.3d 811 (7th Cir. 2014), 23.17(c), 23.32(b)
Glover v. State, 248 Ark. 1260, 455 S.W.2d 670 (1970), 28.03(a) G.M. Leasing Corp. v. United States, 429 U.S. 338 (1977), 23.20, 23.29
Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389 (1993), 4.05, 14.29(b) Godoy v. Spearman, 861 F.3d 956 (9th Cir. 2017) (en banc), 36.14 dism’d, 69 N.Y.2d 1000, 511 N.E.2d 91 (1987), 15.03, 22.03(a) Gokey, People v., 60 N.Y.2d 309, 457 N.E.2d 723, 469 N.Y.S.2d 618 (1983), 23.08(b)
Goldberg v. United States, 425 U.S. 94 (1976), 5.05, 8.12(d), 9.10(b)
Golden v. State, 341 Ark. 656, 21 S.W.3d 801 (2000), 12.16, 12.21
Goldstein, People v., 6 N.Y.3d 119, 843 N.E.2d 727, 810 N.Y.S.2d 100 (2005), 30.04(a), 30.04(b)(1), 30.04(c), 33.11
Gomes, Commonwealth v., 470 Mass. 352, 22 N.E.3d 897 (2015), 25.03
Gomez, People v., 198 Colo. 105, 596 P.2d 1192 (1979), 9.09(b)(7) Gongora v. Thaler, 710 F.3d 267 (5th Cir. 2013), 33.05, 36.11(a) 655, 337 P.3d 129 (2014), 23.24
Gonzales, United States v., 164 F.3d 1285 (10th Cir. 1999), 8.13
Gonzales v. Beto, 405 U.S. 1052 (1972), 21.03(a), 27.05(a) Gonzales v. Commissioner of Correction, 308 Conn. 463, 68 A.3d 624 (2013), 4.03
Gonzales v. United States, 348 U.S. 407 (1955), 9.09(b)(2)
Gonzalez, People v., 115 A.D.2d 73, 499 N.Y.S.2d 400 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1986), aff’d, Gonzalez v. Huerta, 826 F.3d 854 (5th Cir. 2016), 23.33
Gonzalez-Lopez, United States v., 548 U.S. 140 (2006), 30.04(c)
Goodman, Commonwealth v., 454 Pa. 358, 311 A.2d 652 (1973), 20.05
Goodman v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, 613 Fed. Appx. 610 (9th Cir. 2015), 3.18
Goodwin, United States v., 457 U.S. 368 (1982), 12.15(a), 13.04, 14.17
Gordon v. County of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2018), 5.09
Gould v. United States, 255 U.S. 298 (1921), 7.05, 22.07
Gouveia, United States v., 467 U.S. 180 (1984), 15.04(b), 24.13(a) Graddy v. State, 277 Ga. 765, 596 S.E.2d 109 (2004), 22.03(d)
Graham, State v., 277 Ark. 465, 642 S.W.2d 880 (1982), 24.05(b)
Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989), 23.07(d)
Graham v. Florida, 560 U.S. 48 (2010), 13.01, 24.10(b)
Grannis v. Ordean, 234 U.S. 385 (1914), 13.04, 13.05(b)
Grant, United States v., 887 F.3d 131 (3d Cir. 2018), 13.01
Grant, United States v., 349 F.3d 192 (5th Cir. 2003), 23.23
Granville, State v., 423 S.W.3d 399 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014), 23.08(c)
Gray v. Commonwealth, 480 S.W.3d 253 (Ky. 2016), 24.04(d)
Gray v. Maryland, 523 U.S. 185 (1998), 18.10(a) Gray v. Mississippi, 481 U.S. 648 (1987), 28.03(d)
Gray v. Moore, 520 F.3d 616 (6th Cir. 2008), 27.01
Grayson, United States v., 438 U.S. 41 (1978), 33.06
Green, United States v., 618 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2010), 38.03(c)
Green v. Arn, 809 F.2d 1257 (6th Cir. 1987), subsequent history in 839 F.2d 300 (6th Cir. 1988), 27.02
Green v. Georgia, 442 U.S. 95 (1979), 30.03(b), 31.13, 33.04
Green v. Reynolds, 57 F.3d 956 (10th Cir. 1995), 13.04
Green, United States v., 670 F.2d 1148 (D.C. Cir. 1981), 23.11(b)
Greene, People v., 110 A.D.3d 827, 973 N.Y.S.2d 239 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013), 31.05
Greenholtz v. Inmates of the Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex, 442 U.S. 1 (1979), 9.09(b)(2), 13.04
Greenwald v. Wisconsin, 390 U.S. 519 (1968), 24.04(b)
Greer, People v., 42 N.Y.2d 170, 366 N.E.2d 273, 397 N.Y.S.2d 613 (1977), 30.07(b)
Greer v. City of Highland Park, Michigan, 884 F.3d 310 (6th Cir. 2018), 23.21
Gregory v. States United, 369 F.2d 185 (D.C. Cir. 1966), 8.13
Grenz, State v., 243 N.W.2d 375 (N.D. 1976), 13.07, 13.19
Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965), 33.05
Griffin v. Denney, 347 S.W.3d 73 (Mo. 2011), 9.09(a) Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), 4.31(c), 4.31(d), 11.03(a), 39.02(b)
Griffin v. Wisconsin, 483 U.S. 868 (1987), 23.02(a), 23.18(b), 23.36
Griffin, State v., 273 Conn. 266, 869 A.2d 640 (2005), 24.10(b)
Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551 (2004), 23.15(c), 23.16, 23.17(f)
Groppi v. Wisconsin, 400 U.S. 505 (1971), 20.03(b)
Grubbs, United States v., 547 U.S. 90 (2006), 23.17(f), 23.17(g) Grueninger v. Director, Virginia Department of Corrections, 813 F.3d 517 (4th Cir. 2016), 24.08(b)
Grumbley v. Burt, 591 Fed. Appx. 488 (6th Cir. 2015), 7.05
G.T., In the Interest of, 409 Pa. Super. 15, 597 A.2d 638 (1991), 17.04(b)
Guido, State v., 40 N.J. 191, 191 A.2d 45 (1963), 31.14
Guilbert, State v., 306 Conn. 218, 49 A.3d 705 (2012), 11.01(a), 11.01(b)
Guilford, People v., 21 N.Y.3d 205, 991 N.E.2d 204, 969 N.Y.S.2d 430 (2013), 24.20(a) Gumm, State v., 73 Ohio St. 3d 413, 653 N.E.2d 253 (1995), 29.03(a) Gumm v. Mitchell, 775 F.3d 345 (6th Cir. 2014), 9.09(a), 36.11(a) Gustafson v. Florida, 414 U.S. 260 (1973), 23.08(a), 23.26
Gutierrez, People v., 58 Cal. 4th 1354, 324 P.3d 245, 171 Cal. Rptr. 3d 421 (2014), 13.01
Gutierrez, People v., 214 Cal. App. 4th 343, 153 Cal. Rptr. 3d 832 (2013), 4.31(c)
Gutierrez v. State, 177 So. 3d 226 (Fla. 2015), 36.03
Guy v. Wisconsin, 509 U.S. 914 (1993), 23.22(c)
Guzman v. Secretary, 663 F.3d 1336 (11th Cir. 2011), 9.09(b)(5)
Guzman v. State, 283 Ark. 112, 672 S.W.2d 656 (1984), 23.18(a)

H

Hager, State v., 271 N.W.2d 476 (N.D. 1978), 27.12(c) Hair v. United States, 289 F.2d 894 (D.C. Cir. 1961), 23.40
Halbert v. Michigan, 545 U.S. 605 (2005), 4.03, 39.02(b)
Hale, United States v., 422 U.S. 171 (1975), 30.03(c)
Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596 (1948), 24.02, 24.03, 24.04(b), 24.05, 24.05(a), 24.10(b)
Hall, People v., 18 N.Y.3d 122, 960 N.E.2d 399, 936 N.Y.S.2d 630 (2011), 10.08(b)
Hall, People v., 10 N.Y.3d 303, 886 N.E.2d 162, 856 N.Y.S.2d 540 (2008), 23.14
Hall, People v., 120 A.D.3d 588, 991 N.Y.S.3d 114 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2014), 18.01
Hall, United States v., 565 F.2d 917 (5th Cir. 1978), 23.18(a) Hall v. Haws, 861 F.3d 977 (9th Cir. 2017), 35.06(f), 36.04
Hall v. Hughes, 232 Fed. Appx. 683 (9th Cir. 2007), 23.07(c) Hall v. State, 751 So. 2d 1161 (Miss. 1999), 35.04
Hall v. Warden, Lee Arrendale State Prison, 686 Fed. Appx. 671 (11th Cir. 2017) (per curiam), 27.01
Hall v. Zenk, 692 F.3d 793 (7th Cir. 2012), 36.14
Hallman, United States v., 365 F.2d 289 (3d Cir. 1966), 23.12
Halverson, State v., 192 N.W.2d 765 (Iowa 1971), 13.07
Halvnik v. Maryland Department of Safety and Correctional Services, 2015 WL 7301702 (Md. Ct. Special App. 2015), cert. denied, 446 Md. 705, 133 A.3d 1110 (Table) (2016), 12.23
Ham v. South Carolina, 409 U.S. 524 (1973), 28.03(c)
Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52 (1961), 4.03, 21.02(a) Hamlung v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974), 17.03(c), 21.03(b), 28.03(c), 30.03(c), 36.13
Hampton, United States v., 718 F.3d 978 (D.C. Cir. 2013), 31.02
Hampton v. United States, 269 A.2d 441 (D.C. 1970), 29.03(a) Hand, State v., 149 Ohio St. 3d 94, 73 N.E.3d 448 (2016), 21.01
Handa, United States v., 892 F.3d 95 (1st Cir. 2018), 15.04(b)
Handman, United States v., 447 F.2d 853 (7th Cir. 1971), 33.05
Handy, People v., 20 N.Y.3d 663, 988 N.E.2d 879, 966 N.Y.S.2d 351 (2013), 9.09(b)(6)
Hankerson v. North Carolina, 432 U.S. 233 (1977), 35.05, 35.06(f), 36.03
Hankins, State v., 155 So. 3d 1043 (Ala. Crim. App. 2011), 17.03(a) Hanrahan, People ex rel., v. Felt, 48 Ill. 2d 171, 269 N.E.2d 1 (1971), 9.01, 9.02
Hardin, United States v., 539 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2008), 23.36
Haring v. Prosise, 462 U.S. 306 (1983), 14.29(b)
Harlan, People v., 109 P.3d 616 (Colo. 2005), 27.05(a)(2)
Harris, Commonwealth v., 491 Pa. 402, 421 A.2d 199 (1980), 23.13
Harris, People v., 2018 WL 3117030 (N.Y. Ct. App. June 26, 2018), 35.01
Harris, People v., 77 N.Y.2d 434, 568 N.Y.S.2d 702, 570 N.E.2d 1051 (1991), 23.37
Harris, State v., 229 Wis. 2d 832, 601 N.W.2d 682 (Wis. App. 1999), 27.01
Harris, United States v., 403 U.S. 573 (1971), 23.32(b)
Harris, United States v., 321 F.2d 739 (6th Cir. 1963), 23.07
Harris v. Alexander, 548 F.3d 200 (2d Cir. 2008), 36.07
Harris v. Hardy, 680 F.3d 942 (7th Cir. 2012), 28.03(b)
Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971), 12.15(a), 22.05(a), 23.38, 24.23, 33.06, 33.09(a)
Harris v. O’Hare, 770 F.3d 224 (2d Cir. 2014), 23.20
Harris v. Oklahoma, 433 U.S. 682 (1977) (per curiam), 17.08(b)(2), 17.08(d)
Harris v. Rivera, 454 U.S. 339 (1981), 21.02(b), 35.08, 36.01
Harris v. State, 458 Md. 370, 182 A.3d 821 (Md. App. 2018), 10.08(a) Harris v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. 3d 786, 567 P.2d 750, 140 Cal. Rptr. 318 (1977), 4.04
Harris v. Thompson, 698 F.3d 609 (7th Cir. 2012), 30.05
Harris v. United States, 390 U.S. 234 (1968), 23.22(b)
Harris v. Washington, 404 U.S. 55 (1971), 17.08(f)
Harrison, State v., 805 S.W.2d 241 (Mo. App. 1991), 17.03(a) Harrison v. United States, 392 U.S. 219 (1968), 15.04(b), 22.05(a), 22.05(b), 23.38, 24.20(b), 33.06
Harte v. Board of Commissioners of County of Johnson, Kansas, 864 F.3d 1154 (10th Cir. 2017), 23.17(c), 23.17(g) Hartfield v. State, 516 S.W.3d 57 (Tex. App. 2017), 15.04(b)
Hartley, State v., 103 N.J. 252, 511 A.2d 80 (1986), 24.20(b)
Hashime, United States v., 734 F.3d 278 (4th Cir. 2013), 24.08(a) Haskell, Commonwealth v., 438 Mass. 790, 784 N.E.2d 625 (2003), 22.07
Haskell v. Superintendent Greene SCI, 866 F.3d 139 (3d Cir. 2017), 9.09(b)(5)
Hasting, United States v., 461 U.S. 499 (1983), 33.05
Hatcher, United States v., 473 F.2d 321 (6th Cir. 1973), 23.17(a) Havens, United States v., 446 U.S. 620 (1980), 23.38, 33.06, 33.09(a) Hawk v. Olson, 326 U.S. 271 (1945), 15.02
Hawkins v. New York State Dep’t of Corrections and Community Supervision, In the Matter of, 140 A.D.3d 34, 30 N.Y.S.3d 397 (N.Y. App. Div. 3d Dep’t 2016), 13.01
Hawkins v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. 3d 584, 586 P.2d 916, 150 Cal. Rptr. 435 (1978), 4.29
Hawkins v. United States, 324 F.2d 873 (5th Cir. 1963), 31.03
Hayes v. Brown, 399 F.3d 972 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc), 9.09(b)(5)
Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811 (1985), 23.04(d), 23.06(b), 23.37
Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963), 3.06, 3.15, 24.04(c)
Haynes, United States v., 729 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2013), 27.01, 36.16
Head, State v., 136 Wash. 2d 619, 964 P.2d 1187 (1998), 35.08
Heald, State v., 314 A.2d 820 (Me. 1973), 22.03(d)
Heath, United States v., 259 F.3d 522 (6th Cir. 2001), 23.15(c)
Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82 (1985), 14.12, 17.08(g)
Heien v. North Carolina, 135 S. Ct. 530 (2014), 23.03, 23.28
Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25 (1993), 5.09
Helstoski, United States v., 442 U.S. 477 (1979), 7.03(c) Hembree, State v., 368 N.C. 2, 770 S.E.2d 77 (2015), 30.07(a)
Henderson, In re, 199 N.W.2d 111 (Iowa 1972), 2.03
Henderson, State v., 116 Ariz. 310, 569 P.2d 252 (1977), 25.03(b)
Henderson, State v., 289 Neb. 271, 854 N.W.2d 616 (2014), 23.17(f)
Henderson, State v., 208 N.J. 208, 27 A.3d 872 (2011), 11.01(a), 25.02
Henderson, United States v., 241 F.3d 638 (9th Cir. 2000), 23.23
Henderson v. Kibbe, 431 U.S. 145 (1977), 36.03
Henderson v. Morgan, 426 U.S. 637 (1976), 14.29(b)
Henderson v. United States, 568 U.S. 266 (2013), 39.02(a)
Henry v. State, 123 So. 3d 1167 (Fla App. 2013), 31.01(a), 31.03
Henry v. United States, 361 U.S. 98 (1959), 23.07(d), 23.37
Hensley, United States v., 469 U.S. 221 (1985), 23.04(b), 23.09, 23.27, 23.28, 23.31
Herem, State v., 384 N.W.2d 880 (Minn. 1986), 24.10(b)
Hermanek, United States v., 289 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2002), 31.13
Hernandez, Commonwealth v., 456 Mass. 528, 924 N.E.2d 709 (2010), 7.09, 23.26
Hernandez, United States v., 574 F.2d 1362 (5th Cir. 1978), 24.11(b)
Hernandez v. Chappell, 878 F.3d 843 (9th Cir. 2017), 12.09
Hernandez v. Martel, 824 F. Supp. 2d 1025 (C.D. Cal. 2011), 12.09
Hernandez v. State, 124 So. 3d 757 (Fla. 2013), 14.07
Hernandez v. Texas, 347 U.S. 475 (1954), 21.03(b)
Herndon, State v., 215 S.W.3d 901 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), 37.02(d)

1162
Herring v. United States, 555 U.S. 135 (2009), 23.03
Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57 (1924), 23.15(c) Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460 (1983), 4.28(a) Hezzie R., In the Interest of, 219 Wis. 2d 848, 580 N.W.2d 660 (1998), 21.01
Hibl, State v., 290 Wis. 2d 595, 714 N.W.2d 194 (2006), 25.05
Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495 (1947), 9.10(b)
Hicks, State v., 768 S.E.2d 373 (N.C. App. 2015), 36.06
Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177 (2004), 23.04(a), 23.11(b)
Hill, People v., 153 A.D.3d 413, 60 N.Y.S.3d 23 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2017), 23.15(b)
Hill v. California, 401 U.S. 797 (1971), 23.07
Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52 (1985), 14.29(b)
Hill v. United States, 858 A.2d 435 (D.C. 2004), 24.08(b)
Hillard, State v., 421 So. 2d 220 (La. 1982), 30.07(c)
Hilliard, State v., 318 S.E.2d 35 (W. Va. 1983), 24.04(a) Hillsman, People v., 1999 WL 33437900 (Mich. App. 1999), 27.05(a)(2)
Hilton, Commonwealth v., 443 Mass. 597, 823 N.E.2d 383 (2005), 24.10(b), 24.13(b)
Hines, State v., 173 Wis. 2d 850, 496 N.W.2d 720 (1993), 36.14
Hinton, United States v., 423 F.3d 355 (3d Cir. 2005), 30.04(c)
Hinton v. Alabama, 134 S. Ct. 1081 (2014) (per curiam), 8.04, 11.01(b), 11.03(a), 11.04(b) Hoback v. Alabama, 607 F.2d 680 (5th Cir. 1979), 11.03(a) Hobson v. United States, 226 F.2d 890 (8th Cir. 1955), 23.15(c)
Hodge, People v., 154 A.D.3d 963, 63 N.Y.S.3d 448 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017), 14.05
Hodge, United States v., 19 F.3d 51 (D.C. Cir. 1994), 22.03(e)
Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966), 24.17
Hogan, State v., 297 Minn. 430, 212 N.W.2d 664 (1973), 24.14(a) Hoggins, State v., 718 So. 2d 761 (Fla. 1998), 24.24
Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 U.S. 560 (1986), 27.01, 28.03(a) Holifield, State in the Interest of, 319 So. 2d 471 (La. App. 1975), 24.05(b), 24.05(e), 24.10(a), 24.10(b)
Holley, People v., 26 N.Y.3d 514, 45 N.E.3d 936, 25 N.Y.S.3d 40 (2015), 25.03(c)
Holman, People v., 2017 IL 120655, 91 N.E.3d 849, 418 Ill. Dec. 889 (2017), 13.01
Holmes, People v., 81 N.Y.2d 1056, 619 N.E.2d 396, 601 N.Y.S.2d 459 (1993), 23.04(b), 23.11(a), 23.11(b), 23.13
Holmes v. South Carolina, 547 U.S. 319 (2006), 9.09(b)(4), 18.10(b), 30.04(b)(2), 33.04, 34.10
Holt v. Virginia, 381 U.S. 131 (1965), 17.01, 20.06, 34.09
Honer, United States v., 225 F.3d 549 (5th Cir. 2000), 25.03(c) Honeycutt v. Donat, 535 Fed. Appx. 624 (9th Cir. 2013), 24.13(a) Hook, State v., 356 S.C. 421, 590 S.E.2d 25 (2003), 33.09
Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730 (2002), 5.09
Hopkins, In the Interest of, 227 So. 2d 282 (Miss. 1969), 27.03, 27.11
Hopkins, State v., 108 Ariz. 210, 495 P.2d 440 (1972), 36.03
Hopkins v. Reeves, 524 U.S. 88 (1998), 36.05
Hopper v. Evans, 456 U.S. 605 (1982), 36.05
Hopson, People v., 3 Cal. 5th 424, 396 P.3d 1054, 219 Cal. Rptr. 3d 717 (2017), 30.04(c)
Horton v. Allen, 370 F.3d 75 (1st Cir. 2004), 30.04(c)
Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128 (1990), 23.08(b), 23.22(a), 23.22(b)
Horton, People v., 11 Cal. 4th 1068, 906 P.2d 478, 47 Cal. Rptr. 516 (1996), 4.04
Hosford v. State, 525 So. 2d 789 (Miss. 1988), 33.09(a) Houston, People v., 42 Cal. 3d 595, 724 P.2d 1166, 230 Cal. Rptr. 141 (1986), 24.13(a) Howard, People v., 50 N.Y.2d 583, 408 N.E.2d 908, 430 N.Y.S.2d 578 (1980), 23.11(b), 24.08(a)
Howard, State v., 825 N.W.2d 32 (Iowa 2012), 24.04(c)
Howard, United States v., 773 F.3d 519 (4th Cir. 2014), 14.07
Howe, State v., 129 N.H. 120, 523 A.2d 94 (1987), 22.03(d) Howes v. Fields, 565 U.S. 499 (2012), 24.08(a) Hoyt v. Florida, 368 U.S. 57 (1961), 21.03(b)
Hubbell, United States v., 530 U.S. 27 (2000), 9.12, 23.38, 23.40
Huddleston, State v., 924 S.W.2d 666 (Tenn. 1996), 4.28(a), 24.15
Hudson, State v., 286 N.J. Super. 149, 668 A.2d 457 (1995), 36.06
Hudson, United States ex rel., v. Brierton, 699 F.2d 917 (7th Cir. 1983), 25.03(a) Hudson v. Louisiana, 450 U.S. 40 (1981), 17.08(d)
Hudson v. Michigan, 547 U.S. 586 (2006), 23.03, 23.21
Hudson v. Palmer, 468 U.S. 517 (1984), 23.15(b)
Huebler, State v., 275 P.3d 91 (Nev. 2012), 9.09(a) Huggler, People v., 50 A.D.3d 471, 378 N.Y.S.2d 493 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 1976), 22.03(b)
Hughes v. State, 490 A.2d 1034 (Del. 1985), 28.03(c)
Humbert v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore City, 866 F.3d 546 (4th Cir. 2017), 23.07(d), 23.17(c), 31.02
Humphries, State v., 181 Wash. 2d 708, 336 P.3d 1121 (2014), 2.03
Hunsberger, State v., 418 S.C. 335, 794 S.E.2d 368 (2016), 15.04(b) Hunter, United States v., 708 F.3d 938 (7th Cir. 2013), 24.11(c)
Hurd v. Terhune, 619 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 2010), 24.11(a), 24.24
Hurles v. Ryan, 752 F.3d 768 (9th Cir. 2014), 20.04
Hurst v. Florida, 136 S. Ct. 616 (2016), 32.01, 35.03, 36.06 International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324 (1977), 21.03(b)
Iowa v. Tovar, 541 U.S. 77 (2004), 4.05, 14.29(b)
Irby, State v., 170 Wash. 2d 874, 246 P.3d 796 (2011), 27.01
Ireland, State v., 11 Or. App. 264, 500 P.2d 1231 (1972), 9.09(b)(5)
Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717 (1961), 20.03(b), 28.03(a) Irving, State in the Interest of, 434 So. 2d 543 (La. App. 1983), 38.23
Irwin v. Superior Court, 1 Cal. 3d 423, 462 P.2d 12, 82 Cal. Rptr. 484 (1969), modified in In re Tony C., 21 Cal. 3d 888, 582 P.2d 957, 148 Cal. Rptr. 366 (1978), 23.09
Ish, State v., 170 Wash. 2d 189, 241 P.3d 389 (2010), 31.13, 36.11(a) Isiah B., In Interest of, 176 Wis. 2d 639, 500 N.W.2d 1231 (1993), 23.35
I.T., State v., 4 N.E.3d 1139 (Ind. 2014), 12.15(a) Ivan V. v. City of New York, 407 U.S. 203 (1972), 32.01

J
Jabbaar, State v., 991 N.E.2d 290 (Ohio App. 2013), 14.05
Jackson, People v., 103 A.D.3d 814, 959 N.Y.S.2d 540 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013), 24.11(b)
Jackson, State v., 239 Conn. 629, 687 A.2d 485 (1997), 9.10(a)
Jackson, State v., 878 N.W.2d 422 (Iowa 2016), 23.18(b)
Jackson, State v., 454 So. 2d 398 (La. App. 1984), 25.03(c)
Jackson, State v., 742 N.W.2d 163 (Minn. 2007), 23.16
Jackson, State v., 102 Wash. 2d 432, 688 P.2d 136 (1984), 23.32(a) Jackson, United States v., 390 U.S. 570 (1968), 12.15(a)
Jackson, United States v., 2018 WL 748372 (D. N.M. February 7, 2018), 17.01
Jackson v. Conway, 763 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2014), 24.12
Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964), 12.15(a), 24.03, 30.02(a)(2), 33.09
Jackson v. Fogg, 589 F.2d 108 (2d Cir. 1978), 25.04
Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972), 12.18
Jackson v. State, 166 So. 3d 195 (Fla. App. 2015), 30.07(a) Jackson v. United States, 250 F.2d 897 (5th Cir. 1958), 32.02
Jackson v. United States, 404 A.2d 911 (D.C. 1979), 24.05(b), 36.06
Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307 (1979), 9.09(b)(2), 32.01, 35.03, 36.01
Jacobsen, United States v., 466 U.S. 109 (1984), 23.03, 23.15(d), 23.22(b), 23.36
Jacobson v. Anderson, 203 Ariz. 543, 57 P.3d 733 (Ariz. App. 2002), 11.01(b), 11.03(a) Jacumin, State v., 778 S.W.2d 430 (Tenn. 1999), 7.09
James, United States v., 712 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2013), 30.04(c)
James v. Kentucky, 466 U.S. 341 (1984), 7.05, 33.05, 36.07
James v. State, 912 So. 2d 940 (Miss. 2005), 27.05(a)(2)
J.A.N., In the Interest of, 346 N.W.2d 495 (Iowa 1984), 24.14(b)
Janis, United States v., 428 U.S. 433 (1976), 23.39
Jasper, State v., 174 Wash. 2d 96, 271 P.3d 876 (2012), 30.04(c) Jauch v. Choctaw County, 874 F.3d 425 (5th Cir. 2017), 3.14, 4.28(a) J.B. v. State, 418 So. 2d 423 (Fla. App. 1982), 38.08
J.D.B. v. North Carolina, 564 U.S. 261 (2011), 3.06, 22.03(d), 23.04(b), 24.05(a), 24.08(a), 24.10(b), 24.22
J.D.C., In re, 594 A.2d 70 (D. C. 1991), 27.08
J.D.F., In the Interest of, 553 N.W.2d 585 (Iowa 1996), 24.04(c)
Jean-Paul, State v., 295 P.3d 1072 (N.M. App. 2013), 23.21
J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127 (1994), 21.03(b), 28.03(b)
J.E.C., In re Welfare of, 302 Minn. 387, 225 N.W.2d 245 (1975), 13.15
Jeffers, United States v., 342 U.S. 48 (1951), 22.03(d), 23.15(b), 23.20
Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S. 137 (1977), 12.15(a), 14.12, 17.08(d), 36.05
Jencks v. United States, 353 U.S. 657 (1957), 9.11
Jenkins, United States v., 420 U.S. 358 (1975), 35.08
Jenkins, United States v., 92 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 1996), 23.23
Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231 (1980), 12.15(a), 24.24, 30.03(c), 33.06
Jenkins v. Artuz, 294 F.3d 284 (2d Cir. 2002), 31.03
Jenkins v. McKeithen, 395 U.S. 411 (1969), 4.31(c), 13.05(a) Jenkins v. United States, 380 U.S. 445 (1965), 36.16
Jenkins v. United States, 75 A.3d 174 (D.C. 2013), 30.04(c), 30.06(a) Jensen, State v., 147 Wis. 2d 240, 432 N.W.2d 913 (1988), 36.14
Jenson, United States v., 462 F.3d 399 (5th Cir. 2006), 23.06(a) Jernigan v. Louisiana, 446 U.S. 958 (1980), 23.09
Jerrell C.J., In the Interest of, 283 Wis. 2d 145, 699 N.W.2d 110 (2005), 24.04(b), 24.04(d), 24.05(a), 24.05(b), 24.05(d), 24.05(e), 24.10(b), 24.14(a), 24.14(b)
Jesse W. v. Superior Court of San Mateo County, 26 Cal. 3d 41, 603 P.2d 1296, 160 Cal. Rptr. 700 (1979), 17.08(h)
J.G., In the Interest of, 119 Wis. 2d 748, 350 N.W.2d 668 (1984), 13.16
Jiminez, People v., 21 Cal. 3d 595, 580 P.2d 672, 147 Cal. Rptr. 172 (1978), partially overruled on an unrelated point in People v. Cahill, 5 Cal. 4th 478, 853 P.2d 1037, 20 Cal. Rptr.2d
582 (1993), 22.03(d)
Jiminez, People v., 863 P.2d 981, 982 (Colo. 1993), 24.10(b)
Jimmy D., In the Matter of, 15 N.Y.3d 417, 938 N.E.2d 970, 912 N.Y.S.2d 537 (2010), 22.03(d), 24.05(a)
J.M., In re, 619 A.2d 497 (D.C. 1992), 23.18(a)
J.M., In re, 2006 WL 649627 (Ohio App. March 16, 2006), 30.05
J.M., In re, 172 Vt. 61, 769 A.2d 656 (2001), 12.17
J.M., State v., 182 N.J. 402, 866 A.2d 178 (2005), 13.05(b), 13.07
J.M., State ex rel., v. Taylor, 276 S.E.2d 199 (W. Va. 1981), 4.05
J.M.J., In the Interest of, 726 N.W.2d 621 (S.D. 2007), 24.09
J.M.W., In the Matter of, 411 A.2d 345 (D.C. 1980), 39.05
Joe Z. v. Superior Court, 3 Cal. 3d 797, 478 P.2d 26, 91 Cal. Rptr. 594 (1970), 9.01
Joel J., 33 In re, A.D.3d 344, 823 N.Y.S.2d 7 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2006), 19.03(b)
Johnson, Commonwealth v., 574 Pa. 5, 828 A.2d 1009 (2003), 27.02
Johnson, People v., 215 Ill. App. 3d 713, 575 N.E.2d 1247, 159 Ill. Dec. 187 (1991), 7.03(c)
Johnson, People v., 160 A.D.3d 516, 76 N.Y.S.2d 18 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2018), 14.29(b)
Johnson, State v., 312 Conn. 687, 94 A.3d 1173 (2014), 25.05, 25.08
Johnson, State v., 255 Neb. 865, 587 N.W.2d 546 (1998), 31.01(a)
Johnson, United States v., 457 U.S. 537 (1982), 23.15(b), 23.15(c), 23.19, 23.38
Johnson, United States v., 323 U.S. 273 (1944), 17.05, 20.01(b), 20.03(a)
Johnson, United States v., 889 F.3d 1120 (9th Cir. 2018), 23.25
Johnson, United States v., 885 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2018), 23.10
Johnson, United States v., 850 F.3d 515 (2d Cir. 2017), 14.29(b)
Johnson, United States v., 710 F.3d 784 (8th Cir. 2013), 39.04
Johnson, United States v., 656 F.3d 375 (6th Cir. 2011), 23.18(b)
Johnson, United States v., 713 F.2d 633 (11th Cir. 1983), 7.05
Johnson v. California, 545 U.S. 162 (2005), 28.03(b)
Johnson v. Commonwealth, 259 Va. 654, 529 S.E.2d 769 (2000), 27.08
Johnson v. Fabian, 735 N.W.2d 295 (Minn. 2007), 38.05(a), 38.16(b), 38.26
Johnson v. Folino, 705 F.3d 117 (3d Cir. 2013), 9.09(a) Johnson v. Louisiana, 406 U.S. 356 (1972), 21.01, 23.38
Johnson v. Mississippi, 486 U.S. 578 (1988), 38.20
Johnson v. Mississippi, 403 U.S. 212 (1971), 20.04
Johnson v. State, 314 So. 2d 573 (Fla. 1975), 13.04
Johnson v. State, 43 S.W.3d 1 (Tex. Crim. App. 2001) (en banc), 28.03(a) Johnson v. Thibodeaux City, 887 F.3d 726 (5th Cir. 2018), 23.06(a), 23.11(b)
Johnson v. United States, 529 U.S. 694 (2000), 39.05
Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10 (1948), 23.07(d), 23.16, 23.18(a), 23.20, 23.29, 23.37, 23.40
Johnson v. Uribe, 700 F.3d 413 (9th Cir. 2012), as amended on denial of rehearing in 700 F.3d 413 (9th Cir. 2012), 14.13, 14.29(b)
Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938), 24.11(a), 24.13(c), 26.01, 27.01
Jones, Commonwealth v., 362 Mass. 497, 287 N.E.2d 599 (1972), 3.06
Jones, State v., 706 P.2d 317 (Alaska 1985), 7.09
Jones, State v., 666 N.W.2d 142 (Iowa 2003), 23.35
Jones, State v., 521 N.W.2d 662 (S.D. 1994), 15.04(b)
Jones, State v., 450 S.W.3d 866 (Tenn. 2014), 30.07(a)
Jones, State v., 99 Wash. 2d 735, 664 P.2d 1216 (1983), 12.24
Jones, United States v., 565 U.S. 400 (2012), 23.16
Jones, United States v., 893 F.3d 66, 2018 WL 3028685 (2d Cir. June 19, 2018), 23.15(c)
Jones, United States v., 234 F.3d 234 (5th Cir. 2000), 23.39
Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745 (1983), 2.03, 13.19, 14.01, 21.02(c), 33.07
Jones v. Cunningham, 313 F.2d 347 (4th Cir. 1963), 9.09(b)(1)
Jones v. Harrington, 829 F.3d 1128 (9th Cir. 2016), 24.11(a)
Jones v. Kirchner, 835 F.3d 74 (D.C. Cir. 2016), 23.17(g), 23.21
Jones v. Medlin, 807 S.E.2d 849 (Ga. 2017), 9.07(f), 9.09(a), 39.03(a) Jones v. State, 282 Ga. 784, 653 S.E.2d 456 (2007), 23.15(b)
Jones v. Sterling, 210 Ariz. 308, 110 P.3d 1271 (2005), 11.01(b), 11.03(a)
Jones v. United States, 463 U.S. 354 (1983), 12.14, 12.22, 12.23, 12.24, 35.05
Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257 (1960), 23.15(b), 23.23
Jones v. United States, 357 U.S. 493 (1958), 23.02(a)
Jones v. United States, 168 A.3d 703 (D.C. 2017), 23.08(b), 23.15(d), 23.37, 23.38
Jonnevin B., In re, 93 A.D.3d 572, 942 N.Y.S.2d 43 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2012), 19.03(b)
Jorn, United States v., 400 U.S. 470 (1971), 17.08(c), 17.08(e), 34.11(d)(2)

1169
Jose D., In the Matter of, 66 N.Y.2d 638, 485 N.E.2d 1025, 495 N.Y.S.2d 360 (1985), 38.08
Jose Luis Q., In the Matter of, 64 A.D.2d 600, 408 N.Y.S.2d 510 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1978), 38.15
Joshua, State in the Interest of, 327 So. 2d 429 (La. App. 1976), 4.28(a), 26.01
J.R., State ex rel., v. MacQueen, 163 W. Va. 620, 259 S.E.2d 420 (1979), 39.05
J.S.S., In the Matter of, 20 S.W.2d 837 (Tex. App. 2000), 38.07
J.T. v. O’Rourke, 651 P.2d 407 (Colo. 1982), 4.28(b)
Juan P., In re, 114 A.D.3d 460, 980 N.Y.S.2d 397 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2014), 19.03(b)
Juarez, United States v., 672 F.3d 381 (5th Cir. 2012), 14.07
Jumper, United States v., 497 F.3d 699 (7th Cir. 2007), 24.11(a) Juniper v. Zook, 876 F.3d 551 (4th Cir. 2017), 9.09(a) Juraneck, State v., 287 Neb. 846, 844 N.W.2d 791 (2014), 24.08(b)
Jurek v. Estelle, 623 F.2d 929 (5th Cir. 1980), 22.05(b)
Juvenile Male, United States v., 564 U.S. 932 (2011), 14.07
Juvenile Male v. Commonwealth, 255 F.3d 1069 (9th Cir. 2001), 13.04
JV-111701 v. Superior Court In and For County of Maricopa, 163 Ariz. 147, 786 P.2d 998 (Ariz. App. Div. 1 1989), 4.17
J.V.R., In the Interest of, 127 Wis. 2d 192, 378 N.W.2d 266 (1985), 13.07
J.W.L., In the Matter of the Welfare of, 732 N.W.2d 332 (Minn. App. 2007), 23.22(a)

K

Kahinu, State v., 53 Hawai‘i 536, 498 P.2d 635 (1972), 31.02
Kahan, United States v., 415 U.S. 239 (1974), 22.05(b)
Kansas v. Cheever, 134 S. Ct. 596 (2014), 9.02, 9.12, 12.15(a), 22.05(b)
Kansas v. Ventris, 556 U.S. 586 (2009), 24.13, 24.23, 33.06, 33.09(a) Karo, United States v., 468 U.S. 705 (1984), 23.02(a), 23.15(b), 23.16, 23.17(d), 23.40
Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972), 9.12, 12.15(a), 23.38 in State v. Herem, 384 N.W.2d 880 (Minn. 1986), 24.10(b)
Kinney v. Lenon, 425 F.2d 209 (9th Cir. 1970), 4.16, 4.21(d)(3)
Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148 (2018), 23.07(d)
Kittle-Aikeley v. Strong, 844 F.3d 727 (8th Cir. 2016), 23.34
Klapholz, United States v., 230 F.2d 494 (2d Cir. 1956), 23.37
Klein, State v., 156 Wash. 2d 103, 124 P.3d 644 (2005), 12.23
Klessig, State v., 211 Wis. 2d 194, 564 N.W.2d 716 (1997), 4.05
Kline, In re, 113 A.3d 202 (D.C. 2015), 9.09(a) Kline, State v., 717 S.W.2d 849 (Mo. App. 1986), 17.03(a) Klopf v. North Carolina, 386 U.S. 213 (1967), 15.04(b)
K.M., State in the Interests of, 173 P.3d 1279 (Utah 2007), 14.29(b)
Knapp, People v., 124 A.D.3d 36, 995 N.Y.S.2d 869 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2014), 24.05(b)
Knapp, State v., 285 Wis. 2d 86, 700 N.W.2d 899 (2005), 24.20(e)
Knedler, People v., 329 P.3d 242 (Colo. 2014), 24.10(b)
Knights, United States v., 534 U.S. 112 (2001), 23.15(b), 23.18(a) Knotts, United States v., 460 U.S. 276 (1983), 23.16
Knowles v. Iowa, 525 U.S. 113 (1998), 23.08(a), 23.08(d), 23.26
Kocsis, People v., 137 A.D.3d 1476, 28 N.Y.S.3d 466 (N.Y. App. Div. 3d Dep’t 2016), 20.05
Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983), 23.04(a), 23.09, 23.11(b) Kooima, State v., 833 N.W.2d 202 (Iowa 2013), 23.28, 23.32(a) Kovacs v. United States, 744 F.3d 44 (2d Cir. 2014), 14.07
Koza v. State, 718 P.2d 671 (Nev. 1986), 24.11(c)
K.P., State in the Interest of, 167 N.J. Super 290, 400 A.2d 840 (1979), 30.07(b) Krulевич v. United States, 336 U.S. 440 (1949), 18.10(d), 30.06(a) Kruse, State v., 306 S.W.3d 603 (Mo. App. 2010), 23.15(c), 23.22(b) Kubsch v. Neal, 838 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2016) (en banc), 33.04
Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137 (1999), 33.11
Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995), 6.02(a), 9.09(a), 24.04(d)
Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001), 23.02(a), 23.15(b), 23.15(c), 23.16
Kysar, People v., 158 A.3d 544, 69 N.Y.S.3d 649 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2018), 9.07(b)

L

Labat v. Bennett, 365 F.2d 698 (5th Cir. 1966), 21.03(b)
Lacy, People v., 25 A.D.2d 788, 270 N.Y.S.2d 1014 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 1966), 22.05(a) Lafler v. Cooper, 566 U.S. 156 (2012), 4.03
LaFollette, State ex rel., v. Raskin, 34 Wis. 2d 607, 150 N.W.2d 318 (1967), 12.15(b)
Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. 333 (1978), 9.12, 27.13, 33.05
Lall, United States v., 607 F.3d 1277 (11th Cir. 2010), 24.04(d), 24.10, 24.10(a) Lamay, State v., 140 Idaho 835, 103 P.3d 448 (2004), 23.08(b)
Lamb, State v., 321 N.C. 633, 365 S.E.2d 600 (1988), 7.03(c)
Lambert v. Beard, 537 Fed. Appx. 78 (3d Cir. 2013), 9.09(a) Lambert v. Warden Greene SCI, 861 F.3d 459 (3d Cir. 2017), 30.04(c)
Lancaster, State v., 116 F.3d 1419 (11th Cir. 1997), 5.09
Land, State v., 435 N.J. Super. 249, 88 A.3d 193 (2014), 29.02
Lane v. Williams, 455 U.S. 624 (1982), 14.29(b)
Lankford v. Gelston, 364 F.2d 197 (4th Cir. 1966), 23.19
Lara, United States v., 815 F.3d 605 (9th Cir. 2016), 23.15(b)
Lariviere, State v., 527 A.2d 648 (R.I. 1987), 7.03(c) Lark v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 566 Fed. Appx. 161 (3d Cir. 2014), 28.03(b)
Larrson v. United States, 24 F.2d 82 (7th Cir. 1928), overruled in United States v. Mitrione, 357 F.3d 712, 718 (7th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 543 U.S. 1097 (2005), 37.02(c) Larson, State v., 941 S.W.2d 847 (Mo. App. 1997), 9.07(a) LaSalle National Bank, United States v., 437 U.S. 298 (1978), 9.11
Lastorino, People v., 185 A.D.2d 284, 586 N.Y.S.2d 26 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1992), 22.06(d)
Latham, State v., 30 Wash. App. 776, 638 P.2d 592 (1982), 7.03(c) Laureys, United States v., 866 F.3d 432 (D.C. Cir. 2017), 12.08(b)
LaVallee, United States ex rel. Durocher v., 330 F.2d 303 (2d Cir. 1964), 14.29(b)
Lavalleur, State v., 289 Neb. 102, 853 N.W.2d 203 (2014), 31.06
Laville, United States v., 480 F.3d 187 (3d Cir. 2007), 23.07(c)
Lavine v. Milne, 424 U.S. 577 (1976), 35.06(c) Lawhorn v. Allen, 519 F.3d 1272 (11th Cir. 2008), 4.28(a) Lawley, State v., 91 Wash. 2d 654, 591 P.2d 772 (1979), 21.01
Lawrence, State v., 344 N.W.2d 227 (Iowa 1984), partially overruled on an unrelated point in Lawrence, State v., 344 N.W.2d 227 (Iowa 1984), partially overruled on an unrelated point in State v. Liddell, 672 N.W.2d 805 (Iowa 2003) , 20.05
Lawrence, United States v., 471 F.3d 135 (D.C. Cir. 2006), 35.01
Lawson, People v., 163 Ill. 2d 187, 644 N.E.2d 1172, 206 Ill. Dec. 119 (1994), 11.03(a) Lawson, State v., 352 Or. 724, 291 P.3d 673 (2012), 25.02, 25.08
Lawson v. United States, 514 A.2d 787 (D.C. 1980), 27.04(b)
Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6 (1969), 35.06(f)
Le Blanc, Commonwealth v., 407 Mass. 70, 551 N.E.2d 906 (1990), 23.07(a) Lebron, People v., 184 A.D.2d 784, 585 N.Y.S.2d 498 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1992), 22.06(d)
Ledwon, People v., 153 N.Y. 10, 46 N.E. 1046 (1897), 35.04
Lee, In re, 282 Mich. App. 90, 761 N.W.2d 432 (2009), 19.01
Lee, State v., 298 Ga. 388, 782 S.E.2d 249 (2016), 2.03
Lee, State v., 190 N.J. 270, 920 A.2d 80 (2007), 17.01
Lee v. County Court, 27 N.Y.2d 432, 267 N.E.2d 452, 318 N.Y.S.2d 705 (1971), 12.15(b)
Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530 (1986), 18.10(a), 22.05(b), 30.04(a), 30.04(c), 30.06(a), 30.06(b), 31.01(a), 37.02(d)
Lee v. Kemna, 534 U.S. 362 (2002), 10.07, 15.02
Lee v. United States, 221 F.2d 29 (D.C. Cir. 1954), 23.13
Lefkowitz, United States v., 285 U.S. 452 (1932), 23.15(b) Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801 (1977), 9.12, 12.15(a), 23.18(a) Leftwich, People v., 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994), 23.32(c)
Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. 477 (1972), 22.03(d)
Lenarz, State v., 301 Conn. 417, 22 A.3d 536 (2011), 24.17
Lent v. Wells, 861 F.2d 972 (6th Cir. 1988), 33.05
Leon, United States v., 468 U.S. 897 (1984), 22.05(a), 23.07(b), 23.17, 23.17(a), 23.17(c), 23.17(e), 23.17(f), 23.17(g), 23.32(a), 23.39
Leonard, United States v., 609 F.2d 1163 (5th Cir. 1980), 12.15(a) Lerma, People v., 2016 IL 118496, 47 N.E.3d 985, 400 Ill. Dec. 20 (2016), 11.01(a), 11.01(b)
Lessane, People v., 142 A.D.3d 562, 36 N.Y.S.3d 231 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2016), 18.10(c)
Levene, Commonwealth v., 492 Pa. 287, 424 A.2d 865 (1980), 30.07(b) Levetto v. Lapina, 258 F.3d 156 (3d Cir. 2001), 23.22(c)
Levy, State v., 156 Wash. 2d 709, 132 P.3d 1076 (2006), 36.03
Lewis v. Connecticut Comm’r of Correction, 790 F.3d 109 (2d Cir. 2015), 9.09(a) Lewis v. State, 259 Ind. 431, 288 N.E.2d 138 (1972), 24.14(a)
Lewis v. United States, 445 U.S. 55 (1980), 7.03(c)
Lewis v. United States, 146 U.S. 370 (1892), 27.01
L.G.T., In the Interest of, 216 So. 2d 54 (Fla. App. 1968), 39.02(b)
L.H. v. Schwarzenegger, 519 F. Supp. 2d 1072 (E.D. Cal. 2007), 39.05
Liberty Coins, LLC v. Goodman, 880 F.3d 274 (6th Cir. 2018), 23.16
Libretti v. United States, 516 U.S. 29 (1995), 14.29(b)
Liddell, State v., 672 N.W.2d 805 (Iowa 2003), 20.05, 21.02(a) Lilly v. Virginia, 527 U.S. 116 (1999), 18.10(a), 30.06(b)
Lindsey v. Commonwealth, 293 Va. 1, 795 S.E.2d 311 (2017), 35.06(a) Lines, People v., 13 Cal. 3d 500, 531 P.2d 793, 119 Cal. Rptr. 225 (1975), 12.09, 38.09
Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618 (1965), 23.38
Lippert v. State, 664 S.W.2d 712 (Tex. Crim. App. 1984), 23.22(c)
Little, In re, 404 U.S. 553 (1972), 20.06
Little v. Armontrout, 835 F.2d 1240 (8th Cir. 1987) (en banc), 11.03(a) Livingston v. State, 458 So. 2d 235 (1984), 36.14
L.J., In the Matter of, 26 Or. App. 461, 552 P.2d 1322 (1976), 12.21
L.J.W., In re, 370 A.2d 1333 (D.C. 1977), 18.10(a)
Lloyd v. State, 909 So. 2d 580 (Fla. App. 2005), 31.03
Locke, State v., 90 S.W.3d 663 (Tenn. 2002), 36.05
Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586 (1978), 28.03(a), 33.05
Lockwood, State v., 43 Or. App. 639, 603 P.2d 164 (1979), 36.06
Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979), 23.08(a), 23.16, 23.17(e), 23.17(f), 23.17(g), 23.18(a) Long, United States v., 439 F.2d 628 (D.C. Cir. 1971), 23.32(c) Longoria v. Pinal County, 873 F.3d 699, 705 (9th Cir. 2017), 23.07(d) Longus v. United States, 52 A.3d 836 (D.C. 2012), 30.07(c), 31.11
Loper v. Beto, 405 U.S. 473 (1972), 33.09
Lopez, People v., 229 Ill. 2d 322, 892 N.E.2d 1047, 323 Ill. Dec. 55 (2008), 23.04(b), 24.08(a) Lopez, State v., 271 Conn. 724, 859 A.2d 898 (2004), 27.01
Lopez, United States v., 437 F.3d 1059 (10th Cir. 2006), 24.04(d), 24.20(a) Lopez-Cruz, United States v., 730 F.3d 803 (9th Cir. 2013), 23.08(b), 23.15(d), 23.18
Lopez-Valuenzuela v. Arpaio, 770 F.3d 772 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc), 4.28(a) Los Angeles v. Patel, 135 S. Ct. 2443 (2015), 23.02(a), 23.16
Los Angeles County v. Rettele, 550 U.S. 609 (2007), 23.06(c), 23.22(c) Loud Hawk, United States v., 474 U.S. 302 (1986), 15.04(b)
Lovasco, United States v., 431 U.S. 783 (1977), 15.04(b)
Love, People v., 56 Cal. 2d 720, 366 P.2d 33, 16 Cal. Rptr. 777 (1961), 33.02(b) Lovely v. United States, 169 F.2d 386 (4th Cir. 1948), 30.07(a) Lowe v. State, 800 So. 2d 552 (Miss. App. 2001), 22.03(d)
Lowenfield v. Phelps, 484 U.S. 231 (1988), 36.16
L.O.W. v. District Court, 623 P.2d 1253 (Colo. 1981), 4.15, 4.27(b) Lozada, State v., 357 N.J. Super. 646, 815 A.2d 1002 (2003), 18.05
Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Florida, 138 S. Ct. 1945 (2018), 17.01
Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984), 7.03(c), 34.10
Lujan v. Garcia, 734 F.3d 917 (9th Cir. 2013), 24.09, 24.11(c), 24.20(b), 33.06
Lunbery v. Hornbeak, 605 F.3d 754 (9th Cir. 2010), 30.03(b), 33.04
Lyle, State v., 854 N.W.2d 378 (Iowa 2014), 13.01
Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528 (1963), 24.03, 24.04(c), 24.04(d)
Lyons v. State, 388 S.W.2d 950 (Tex. Crim. App. 1965), 25.08

M

MacCollom, United States v., 426 U.S. 317 (1976), 4.31(d)
Machetti v. Linahan, 679 F.2d 236 (11th Cir. 1982), 21.03(b) Machibroda v. United States, 368 U.S. 487 (1962), 14.29(b)
MacDonald, United States v., 456 U.S. 1 (1982), 15.04(b)
MacDonald, United States v., 435 U.S. 850 (1978), 15.04(b)
MacKenna v. Ellis, 263 F.2d 35 (5th Cir. 1959), 15.02
Madigan, Commonwealth v., 449 Mass. 702, 871 N.E.2d 478 (2007), 9.10(a) Madison v. Commissioner, Ala. Dept. of Corrections, 677 F.3d 1333 (11th Cir. 2012), 28.03(b)
Maes, People v., 194 Colo. 235, 571 P.2d 305 (1977), 24.14(b)
Mahaffy, United States v., 693 F.3d 113 (2d Cir. 2012), 9.09(a) Mahrt v. Beard, 849 F.3d 1164 (9th Cir. 2017), 14.29(b)
Maine v. Superior Court of Mendocino County, 68 Cal. 2d 375, 438 P.2d 372, 66 Cal. Rptr. 724 (1969), 26.01
Malcolm v. United States, 332 A.2d 917 (D.C. 1975), 22.03(d) Malenya, United States v., 736 F.3d 554 (D.C. Cir. 2013), 38.03(c)
Mallides, United States v., 473 F.2d 859 (9th Cir. 1973), 23.09
Mallory, State v., 270 S.C. 519, 242 S.E.2d 693 (1978), 30.07(b)
Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957), 24.15
Maltese, State v., 222 N.J. 525, 120 A.3d 197 (2015), 24.11(a) Mancusi v. DeFortе, 392 U.S. 364 (1968), 23.15(b)
Mandujano, United States v., 425 U.S. 564 (1976), 24.08(a) Manor v. State, 221 Ga. 866, 148 S.E.2d 305 (1966), 4.29
Mansfield v. State, 422 Md. 269, 29 A.3d 569 (2011), 17.08(e)
Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977), 25.01, 25.02, 25.03(c), 25.04
Manuel v. City of Joliet, Ill., 137 S. Ct. 911 (2017), 4.28(a), 24.15
Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), 23.02(a), 23.33
Mareska v. Bernalillo County, 804 F.3d 1301 (10th Cir. 2015), 23.04(d), 23.06, 23.07(d), 23.31
Mareska v. State, 534 N.E.2d 246 (Ind. App. 1989), 17.05
Marion, United States v., 404 U.S. 307 (1971), 15.04(b)
Marron v. United States, 275 U.S. 192 (1927), 23.17(g)
Marshall, People v., 26 N.Y.3d 495, 45 N.E.3d 954, 25 N.Y.S.3d 58 (2015), 25.03(c)
Marshall, State v., 882 N.W.2d 68 (Iowa 2016), 24.13
Martin, People v., 51 Cal. 4th 75, 244 P.3d 496, 119 Cal. Rptr.3d 99 (2010), 38.03(c)
Martin, United States v., 507 F.2d 428 (7th Cir. 1974), 28.03(c)
Martin Linen Supply Co., United States v., 430 U.S. 564 (1977), 17.08(c), 36.01
Martin v. Indiana, 438 F. Supp. 234 (N.D. Ind. 1977), aff’d, 577 F.2d 749 (7th Cir. 1978), 25.03(b)
Martin v. Musteen, 303 Ark. 656, 799 S.W.2d 540 (1990), 9.07(f)
Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. 228 (1987), 35.05
Martin v. State, 60 A.3d 1100 (Del. 2013), 30.04(c)
Martin v. State, 865 N.W.2d 282 (Minn. 2015), 37.02(c)
Martin v. United States, 991 A.2d 791 (D.C. 2010), 27.02
Martin v. Virginia, 365 F.2d 549 (4th Cir. 1966), 9.09(b)(1)
Martin, People v., 51 Cal. 4th 75, 244 P.3d 496, 119 Cal. Rptr. 3d 99 (2010), 38.03(c)
Martin, State v., 145 N.H. 362, 761 A.2d 516 (2000), 22.03(d)
Martinez, State v., 319 Conn. 712, 127 A.3d 164 (2015), 7.03(c)
Martinez, State v., 124 N.M. 721, 954 P.2d 1198 (N.M. App. 1998), 9.07(b)
Martinez, United States v., 486 F.3d 855 (5th Cir. 2007), 23.32(a), 23.32(c), 23.39
Martinez v. Illinois, 134 S. Ct. 2070 (2014) (per curiam), 17.08(b)(1), 17.08(c), 34.11(d)(2)
Martinez v. Mares, 613 Fed. Appx. 731 (10th Cir. 2015), 3.18
Martinez v. Ryan, 566 U.S. 1 (2012), 4.03
Martinez-Fuerte, United States v., 428 U.S. 543 (1976), 23.29, 23.30
Martinez-Rios, United States v., 595 F.3d 581 (5th Cir. 2010), 30.04(c)
Marvel v. United States, 380 U.S. 262 (1965), 14.29(b)
Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990), 23.19, 23.22(a), 23.22(d)
Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990), 27.01

1177
Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79 (1987), 23.03, 23.17(b), 23.17(f), 23.17(g), 23.22(a) Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366 (2003), 23.07(c)
Maryland v. Shatzer, 559 U.S. 98 (2010), 24.11(c)
Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408 (1997), 23.28
Mascarenas v. State, 80 N.M. 537, 458 P.2d 789 (1969), 4.31(c)
Mason v. Arizona, 504 F.2d 1345 (9th Cir. 1974), 8.04
Massachusetts v. Painten, 368 F.2d 142 (1st Cir. 1966), cert. dismissed, 389 U.S. 560 (1968), 23.19, 23.37
Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984), 23.07(b), 23.17, 23.17(f), 23.17(g)
Massachusetts v. Upton, 466 U.S. 727 (1984), 23.32(b), 23.32(d)
Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), 24.13, 24.13(a), 24.13(c), 33.09
Massie, People v., 137 Ill. App. 3d 723, 484 N.E.2d 1213, 92 Ill. Dec. 358 (1985), 30.07(b)
Matafeo, State v., 71 Haw. 183, 787 P.2d 671 (1990), 9.09(b)(7)
Matarranz v. State, 133 So. 3d 473 (Fla. 2013), 28.03(a) Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319 (1976), 11.03(a), 13.06, 14.29(a) Mathis v. United States, 391 U.S. 1 (1968), 24.08(a) Matlock, United States v., 415 U.S. 164 (1974), 22.03(d), 22.03(e), 23.18(a), 23.18(b)
Matter of Neary, 84 N.E.3d 1194 (Ind. 2017), 3.19(a), 24.17
Matthew N., In re, 216 Cal. App. 4th 1412, 157 Cal. Rptr. 3d 233 (2013), 14.29(b)
Matthews, State v., 6 Wash. App. 201, 492 P.2d 1076 (1971), 30.07(b)
Mattox v. United States, 146 U.S. 140 150 (1892), 36.14
Mauricio, Commonwealth v., 477 Mass. 588, 80 N.E.3d 318 (2017), 23.08(b), 23.08(c)
Maxwell v. Roe, 628 F.3d 486 (9th Cir. 2010), 9.09(a) Maxwell v. Stephens, 348 F.2d 325 (8th Cir. 1965), 23.18(b)
Mayer v. City of Chicago, 404 U.S. 189 (1971), 39.02(b)
Mayfield, United States v., 189 F.3d 895 (9th Cir. 1999), 18.10(c)
Mayhew, United States v., 380 F. Supp. 2d 961 (S.D. Ohio 2005), 30.04(c)
M.C., In the Matter of, 527 N.W.2d 290 (S.D. 1995), 27.08
McBeth v. Rose, 111 Ariz. 399, 531 P.2d 156 (1975), 13.04
McBride v. United States, 441 A.2d 644 (D.C. 1982), 30.07(d)
McCarley v. Kelly, 801 F.3d 652 (6th Cir. 2015), 30.04(c)
McCarthy, State v., 156 Vt. 148, 589 A.2d 869 (1991), 30.07(a) McCarthy v. United States, 394 U.S. 459 (1969), 14.29(b)
McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279 (1987), 21.03(b)
McCormick, United States v., 502 F.2d 281 (9th Cir. 1974), 23.24
McCormick v. Parker, 821 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 2016), 9.09(a) McCoy v. Louisiana, 138 S. Ct. 1500 (2018), 2.03, 14.01, 21.02(c), 33.07
McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300 (1967), 9.10(a), 23.32(b)
McCullum, State v., 98 Wash. 2d 484, 656 P.2d 1064 (1983), 35.05
McDaniel v. North Carolina, 392 U.S. 665 (1968), 22.05(a) McDaniels v. Warden Cambridge Springs SCI, 700 Fed. Appx. 119 (3d Cir. 2017), 17.08(c), 36.17
McDonald, State v., 312 N.C. 264, 321 S.E.2d 849 (1984), 31.14
McDonald v. United States, 335 U.S. 451 (1948), 18.08, 22.03(d), 23.15(c), 23.29
McDonough v. Fernandez-Rundle, 862 F.3d 1314 (11th Cir. 2017), 8.12(d)
McDonough Power Equipment, Inc. v. Greenwood, 464 U.S. 548 (1984), 28.03(b), 28.03(c)
McElroy, United States v., 697 F.2d 459 (2d Cir. 1982), 9.09(a) McFee, State v., 721 N.W.2d 607 (Minn. 2006), 14.07
McGriff, State v., 76 Hawai‘i 148, 871 P.2d 782 (1994), 30.04(a), 36.11(a)
McGuire, People v., 148 A.D.3d 1578, 51 N.Y.S.3d 726 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2017), 18.10(c)
M.C.H., State ex rel., v. Kinder, 317 S.E.2d 150 (W.Va. 1984), 4.03, 4.17, 4.27(b)
McIntosh, People v., 96 N.Y.2d 521, 755 N.E.2d 329, 730 N.Y.S.2d 265 (2001), 23.04(b)
McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984), 4.05, 27.01
McKeiver v. Pennsyltuvania, 403 U.S. 528 (1971), 20.01(b), 21.01, 27.08, 36.16
McKenna, State v., 166 N.H. 671, 103 A.3d 756 (2014), 24.08(a) McKenzie v. State, 103 So.3d 84 (Ala. Crim. App. 2010), 14.29(b)
McKinney v. Rees, 993 F.2d 1378 (9th Cir. 1993), 30.07(a) McKnight, State v., 131 Hawai‘i 379, 319 P.3d 298 (2013), 24.11(c) McKnight v. United States, 183 F.2d 977 (D.C. Cir. 1950), 23.08(a) McKoy v. North Carolina, 494 U.S. 433 (1990), 30.03(a) McKune v. Lile, 536 U.S. 24 (2002), 14.22(a)
McLean v. United States, 377 A.2d 74 (D.C. 1977), 31.06
McMahon, State v., 94 So. 3d 468 (Fla. 2012), 14.05
McMillan v. Pennsylvania, 477 U.S. 79 (1986), 35.06(f)
McMann, United States ex rel. Wilson v., 408 F.2d 896 (2d Cir. 1969), 4.31(d)
McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), 24.15
McNeal v. State, 412 S.W.3d 886 (Mo. 2013), 36.05
McNeill, United States v., 484 F.3d 301 (4th Cir. 2007), 23.07(c) McTush, People v., 81 Ill. 2d 513, 410 N.E.2d 861, 43 Ill. Dec. 727 (1980), 22.03(d)
McWilliams v. Dunn, 137 S. Ct. 1790 (2017), 11.01(b), 11.03(a), 12.08(b), 12.13
Mebratu, United States v., 543 Fed. Appx. 137 (3d Cir. 2013), 10.14(c)
Medina, State v., 147 N.J. 43, 685 A.2d 1242 (1996), 36.06
Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437 (1992), 12.16
Megantz v. Ash, 412 F.2d 804 (1st Cir. 1969), 15.02
Melcher, State v., 140 N.H. 823, 678 A.2d 146 (1996), 30.07(a) Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, 557 U.S. 305 (2009), 11.01(b), 30.04(a), 30.04(c)
Melendres v. Arpaio, 695 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2012), permanent injunction affirmed in relevant part in Melendres v. Arpaio, 784 F.3d 1254 (9th Cir. 2015), 23.28
Mempa v. Rhay, 389 U.S. 128 (1967), 4.03
Mena, People v., 54 Cal. 4th 146, 277 P.3d 160, 141 Cal. Rptr. 3d 469 (2012), 26.01
Mendenhall, United States v., 446 U.S. 544 (1980), 23.04(b), 23.06(c), 23.18(a) Mendenhall v. State, 18 So. 3d 915 (Miss. App. 2009), 31.10
Mendiola-Martinez v. Arpaio, 836 F.3d 1239 (9th Cir. 2016), 5.09
Meneese, State v., 174 Wash. 2d 937, 282 P.3d 83 (2012), 23.33
Menna v. New York, 423 U.S. 61 (1975), 14.29(c)
Mercado, People v., 68 N.Y.2d 874, 501 N.E.2d 27, 508 N.Y.S.2d 419 (1986), 23.15(b)
Mergen, United States v., 764 F.3d 199 (2d Cir. 2014), 31.10
Merritt, United States v., 293 F.2d 742 (3d Cir. 1961), 23.16
Mershon, State v., 43 Wash. App. 132, 715 P.2d 1156 (1986), 17.08(h)
Meyer, State v., 78 Hawai‘i 308, 893 P.2d 159 (1995), 23.22(b)
Meyers, In re, 25 N.C. App. 555, 214 S.E.2d 268 (1975), 24.02
Mezzanatto, United States v., 513 U.S. 196 (1995), 14.29(c)
M.H.P., In the Interest of, 830 N.W.2d 216 (N.D. 2013), 17.08(c)
Michael, In re, 423 A.2d 1180 (R.I. 1981), 17.04(b)
Michael W., In the Matter of, 122 Misc. 2d 243, 470 N.Y.S.2d 319 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1983), 20.05
Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948), 30.07(a), 33.17
Michigan v. Bryant, 562 U.S. 344 (2011), 30.04(c)
Michigan v. Chesternut, 486 U.S. 567 (1988), 23.04(b)
Michigan v. DeFillippo, 443 U.S. 31 (1979), 23.07(a), 23.07(c), 23.08(a) Michigan v. Doran, 439 U.S. 282 (1978), 4.28(a), 17.03(c)
Michigan v. Harvey, 494 U.S. 344 (1990), 24.13(c)
Michigan v. Jackson, 475 U.S. 625 (1986), 3.19(t), 4.03, 22.03(d), 24.11(a), 24.13(a), 24.13(b), 24.13(c), 24.23, 33.06, 33.09(a)
Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983), 7.09, 23.08(a), 23.10, 23.26, 23.27
Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975), 24.07, 24.11(a), 24.11(b)
Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692 (1981), 23.02(a), 23.04(d), 23.06(c), 23.06(d), 23.20, 23.22(c), 24.19
Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990), 23.29
Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25 (1976), 12.15(a) Mikulewicz, State v., 462 A.2d 497 (Me. 1983), 24.05(c)
Milan v. Bolin, 795 F.3d 726 (7th Cir. 2015), 23.02(a), 23.21
Millan, United States v., 817 F. Supp. 1086 (S.D.N.Y. 1993), 29.02
Miller, State v., 159 N.C. App. 608, 583 S.E.2d 620 (2003), aff’d per curiam, 358 N.C. 133, 591
S.E.2d 520 (2004) (mem.), 17.03(a)
Miller, State v., 2016 WL 1244403 (S.C. 2016), 23.17
Miller, United States v., 771 F.2d 1219 (9th Cir. 1985), 27.12(c)
Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460 (2012), 13.01, 24.05(a), 24.10(a), 24.10(b)
Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. 104 (1985), 24.03
Miller v. Maddox, 866 F.3d 386 (6th Cir. 2017), 4.28(a) Miller v. Pate, 386 U.S. 1 (1967), 9.09(b)(5)
Miller v. Quatsoe, 348 F. Supp. 764 (E.D. Wis. 1972), 13.04, 13.07, 17.04(a) Miller v. State, 815 S.W.2d 582 (Tex. Crim. App. 1991), 36.06
Miller v. United States, 357 U.S. 301 (1958), 23.21
Miller-El v. Cockrell, 537 U.S. 322 (2003), 28.03(b)
Miller-El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. 231 (2005), 28.03(b)
Mills, State v., 354 Or. 350, 312 P.3d 515 (2013), 35.03
Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978), 12.04, 12.15(a), 23.20, 23.29, 24.03, 24.23, 33.06,
33.09(a)
Minnesota v. Carter, 525 U.S. 83 (1998), 23.15(b), 23.15(c)
Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366 (1993), 23.02(a), 23.08(d), 23.10, 23.22(b)
Minnesota v. Olson, 495 U.S. 91 (1990), 23.15(b), 23.19, 23.20, 23.23
Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146 (1990), 3.06, 3.19, 22.03(d), 24.11(c)
Minor, In the Interest of a, 205 Ill. App. 3d 480, 563 N.E.2d 1069, 150 Ill. Dec. 942 (1990), 27.08
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), 3.09, 9.12, 22.03(d), 23.04(e), 23.18(a), 24.01, 24.01, 24.07, 24.08(a), 24.09, 24.10(a), 24.11(a), 24.11(b), 24.11(c), 24.12, 24.13(c), 24.20, 33.06, 33.09(a) Mirenda, United States v., 443 F.2d 1351 (9th Cir. 1971), 8.13
Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718 (1982), 21.03(b)
Missouri v. Hunter, 459 U.S. 359 (1983), 17.08(b)(2)
Missouri v. McNeely, 569 U.S. 141 (2013), 23.14
Missouri v. Seibert, 542 U.S. 600 (2004), 3.06, 22.03(d), 24.20
Missouri Public Defender v. Waters, State ex rel., 370 S.W.3d 592 (Mo. 2012), 6.07
Mitchell, People v., 21 N.Y.3d 964, 993 N.E.2d 405, 970 N.Y.S.2d 919 (2013), 14.29(b)
Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314 (1999), 38.26
Mitchell, People v., 2 N.Y.3d 272, 810 N.E.2d 879, 778 N.Y.S.2d 427 (2004), 24.10(b), 25.13(a)
Mitchell, State ex rel., v. Bowman, 54 Wis. 2d 5, 194 N.W.2d 297 (1972), 20.04
Mitrione, United States v., 357 F.3d 712 (7th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 543 U.S. 1097 (2005), 37.02(c)
M.L.B. v. S.L.J., 519 U.S. 102 (1996), 39.02(b)
M.L.C., State v., 933 P.2d 380 (Utah 1997), 4.15
M.L. DeJ., In re, 310 A.2d 834 (D.C. 1973), 4.21(b)(1)
M’Naghten’s Case, 8 Eng. Rep. 718 (1843), 12.22
Mobley, State v., 240 N.C. 476, 83 S.E.2d 100 (1954), 23.07(a) Modeste v. State, 760 So. 2d 1078 (Fla. App. 2000), 30.07(b)
Mohi, State v., 901 P.2d 991 (Utah 1995), 13.01
Moi, In re, 184 Wash. 2d 575, 360 P.3d 811 (2015), 17.08(f)
Money v. Leach, 3 Burr. 1742, 97 Eng. Rep. 1075 (K.B.1765), 23.07(c)
Monge v. California, 524 U.S. 721 (1998), 17.08(d)
Monroe, People v., 925 P.2d 767 (Colo. 1996), 22.03(d)
Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961), 5.09, 22.03(d)
Montejo v. Louisiana, 556 U.S. 778 (2009), 3.19(f), 4.03, 22.03(d), 24.11(c), 24.13(a), 24.13(b), 24.13(c)
Montgomery, State v., 39 So. 3d 252 (Fla. 2010), 36.05
Montgomery, State ex rel., v. Padilla, 239 Ariz. 314, 371 P.3d 642 (Ariz. App. 2016), 27.01
Montgomery, State ex rel., v. Padilla 237 Ariz. 263, 349 P.3d 1100 (Ariz. App. 2015), 27.01
Montoya, State v., 333 P.3d 935 (N.M. 2014), 31.06
Montoya de Hernandez, United States v., 473 U.S. 531 (1985), 23.14, 23.30
Moody v. United States, 163 A.2d 337 (D.C. 1960), 23.36
Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103 (1935), 9.09(b)(5)
Moore, People v., 321 P.3d 510 (Colo. App. 2010), 27.05(a)(2)
Moore, State v., 321 N.C. 327, 364 S.E.2d 648 (1988), 11.03(a)
Moore, State v., 149 Ohio St. 3d 557, 76 N.E.3d 1127 (2016), 13.01
Moore, State v., 334 Or. 328, 49 P.3d 785 (2002), 30.04(a)
Moore, United States v., 709 F.3d 287 (4th Cir. 2013), 37.02(c)
Moore v. Arizona, 414 U.S. 25 (1973), 15.04(b)
Moore v. Berghuis, 700 F.3d 882 (6th Cir. 2012), 22.03(d), 24.11(c)
Moore v. Illinois, 408 U.S. 786 (1972), 9.09(b)(5)
Moore v. Secretary Pennsylvania Department of Corrections, 640 Fed. Appx. 159 (3d Cir. 2016), 8.06, 31.03
Moore v. United States, 429 U.S. 20 (1976), 30.02(c), 35.08
Moore v. United States, 432 F.2d 730 (3d Cir. 1970) (en banc), 15.02
Moore, State v., 343 S.C. 282, 540 S.E.2d 445 (2000), 25.03(a), 25.04
Morales, Commonwealth v., 462 Mass. 334, 968 N.E.2d 403 (2012), 23.08(a) Muras, United States v., 233 F. Supp. 160 (D. Mont. 1964), 24.04(d)
Morgan, People v., 149 A.D.3d 1148, 51 N.Y.S.3d 218 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2017), 33.07
Morgan, United States v., 786 F.3d 227 (2d Cir. 2015), 30.03(c) Morgan v. Illinois, 504 U.S. 719, 727 (1992), 21.01, 21.08(a) Morgan v. United States, 304 U.S. 1 (1938), 9.09(b)(2)
Morris, People v., 126 A.D.3d 813, 4 N.Y.S.3d 305 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015), 23.15(c)
Morris v. Cain, 186 F.3d 581 (5th Cir. 1999), 36.06
Morris v. D’Amario, 416 A.2d 137 (R.I. 1980), 4.15
Morris v. Slappy, 461 U.S. 1 (1983), 15.02
Morrison, People v., 156 A.D.3d 126, 66 N.Y.S.3d 682 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2017), 17.08(f)
Morrison, State in the Interest of, 406 So. 2d 246 (La. App. 1981), 4.31(c)
Morrison, United States v., 449 U.S. 361 (1981), 24.17
Morrissette v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972), 4.33, 13.04, 13.05(a), 13.18, 39.04, 39.05
Morrow, State ex rel., v. Lewis, 55 Wis. 2d 502, 200 N.W.2d 193 (1972), 4.25
Morse v. Fusto, 804 F.3d 538 (2d Cir. 2015), 9.09(b)(5), 9.09(b)(6)
Moses, People v., 32 A.D.3d 866, 823 N.Y.S.2d 409 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2006), 22.03(e)
Mosley, United States v., 454 F.3d 249 (3d Cir. 2006), 23.23, 23.27
Mosley v. Butler, 762 F.3d 579 (7th Cir. 2014), 8.06
Moss v. Weaver, 525 F.2d 1258 (5th Cir. 1976), 4.28(a), 24.13(a) Moya v. United States, 761 F.2d 322 (7th Cir. 1985), 23.11(b) Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93 (2005), 23.06(c), 23.22(c)
Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975), 35.05, 35.06(d), 35.06(f)
Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305 (2015) (per curiam), 23.07(d)
Mулваня v. Sheriff of Rock Island County, 850 F.3d 849 (7th Cir. 2017), 5.09
Munoz, State v., 126 N.M. 535, 972 P.2d 847 (N.M. 1998), 24.08(a) Munroe, State v., 244 Wis. 2d 1, 630 N.W.2d 223 (Wis. App. 2001), 23.39
Murchison, In re, 349 U.S. 133 (1955), 20.04
Murguia v. Municipal Court, 15 Cal. 3d 286, 540 P.2d 44, 124 Cal. Rptr. 204 (1975), 17.01
Murphy, United States v., 703 F.3d 182 (2d Cir. 2012), 23.18(a), 23.28, 23.37, 24.09
Murphy, United States v., 516 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2008), superseded on another issue by Fernandez v. California, 134 S. Ct. 1126 (2014), 23.18(b)
Murphy v. Florida, 421 U.S. 794 (1975), 20.03(b), 28.03(a), 28.03(c)
Murray, State v., 469 S.W.3d 921 (Mo. App. 2015), 4.05
Murray, United States v., 736 F.3d 652 (2d Cir. 2013), 33.04
Murray, United States ex rel. v. Owens, 341 F. Supp. 722 (S.D.N.Y. 1972), rev’d on other grounds, 465 F.2d 289 (2d Cir. 1972), 39.03(b)
Murray v. Carrier, 477 U.S. 478 (1986), 7.05, 22.07
Murray v. United States, 380 U.S. 527 (1965), vacating 333 F.2d 409 (10th Cir. 1964), 23.15(b)
Murtagh, State v., 169 P.3d 602 (Alaska 2007), 8.13
Musacchio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 709 (2016), 32.01, 35.03

N

Nakamitsu, State v., 140 Hawai‘i 157, 398 P.3d 746 (2017), 7.03(c), 14.05
Nakamitsu, State v., 138 Hawai‘i 51, 375 P.3d 1289 (Table) (Hawai‘i App. 2016), ruling on other issues aff’d, 140 Hawai‘i 157, 398 P.3d 746 (2017), 7.03(c) Nappi v. Yelich, 793 F.3d 246, 248 (2d Cir. 2015), 31.01(a)
Natal, United States v., 849 F.3d 530 (2d Cir. 2017) (per curiam), 31.09
Nathanson v. United States, 290 U.S. 41 (1933), 23.17(a) National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989), 23.33
Navarette, State v., 294 P.3d 435 (N.M. 2013), 30.04(c) Navarette v. California, 134 S. Ct. 1683 (2014), 23.09, 23.32(a) Navy, State v., 386 S.C. 294, 688 S.E.2d 838 (2010), 24.20(b)
Neal, United States v., 577 Fed. Appx. 434 (6th Cir. 2014), 23.32(b)
Nebraska Press Ass’n v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), 15.02, 20.03(b), 27.05(a)(1), 28.03(c)
Neely v. Pennsylvania, 411 U.S. 954 (1973), 14.29(a) Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188 (1972), 25.02
Nelson, People v., 53 Cal. 4th 367, 266 P.3d 1008, 135 Cal. Rptr. 3d 312 (2012), 24.11(c)
Nelson, United States v., 725 F.3d 615 (6th Cir. 2013), 30.04(c)
Nelson v. Colorado, 137 S. Ct. 1249 (2017), 36.06, 37.03
Nelson v. Heyne, 491 F.2d 352 (7th Cir. 1974), 39.07
Nett, State v., 207 W. Va. 410, 533 S.E.2d 43 (2000), 28.05
Nevada v. Jackson, 569 U.S. 505 (2013), 33.04
New Jersey v. Portash, 440 U.S. 450 (1979), 7.03(c), 9.12, 12.15(a), 22.05(a), 22.05(b), 24.23, 33.09(a)
New Jersey v. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), 7.09, 23.01, 23.02(a), 23.33, 23.34, 23.35, 23.36, 24.40, 24.06, 24.12, 30.03(a) Newlon v. Armontrout, 885 F.2d 1328 (8th Cir.1989), 36.11(a) Newmaker v. City of Fortuna, 842 F.3d 1108 (9th Cir. 2016), 23.07(d)
New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981), 23.08(a), 23.08(b), 23.17(g), 23.20, 23.22(a), 23.26
New York v. Harris, 495 U.S. 14 (1990), 23.37, 24.19
New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984), 24.07, 24.08(a) New York, United States ex rel. Negron v., 434 F.2d 386 (2d Cir. 1970), 27.01
Newman, United States v., 490 F.2d 993 (10th Cir. 1974), 23.13
N.H.B., In the Matter of, 769 P.2d 844 (Utah App. 1989), 27.08
Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268 (1951), 23.29
Nigel H., In the Matter of, 136 A.D.3d 1033, 26 N.Y.S.3d 301 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2016), 19.03(b)
Nikim M., In re, 144 A.D.3d 424, 41 N.Y.S.3d 474 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2016), 27.03
Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157 (1986), 2.03
Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984), 22.03(d), 23.37, 23.38, 24.20(a), 24.20(c), 24.20(d)
Nixon, United States v., 418 U.S. 683 (1974), 9.10(c)
N.L. v. State, 989 N.E.2d 773 (Ind. 2013), 38.03(c)
NLRB v. Robbins Tire & Rubber Co., 437 U.S. 214 (1978), 9.02
Nobles, United States v., 422 U.S. 225 (1975), 5.05, 9.10(b), 9.12, 9.13, 22.05(b), 33.03, 33.06, 33.09(a) Noel, State v., 236 W. Va. 335, 779 S.E.2d 877 (2015), 23.25
Nofoa, State v., 135 Hawai‘i 220, 349 P.3d 327 (2015), 30.04(c)
Nomura, State v., 79 Hawai‘i 413, 903 P.2d 718 (1995), 36.03
Nora, United States v., 765 F.3d 1049 (9th Cir. 2014), 23.17(d), 23.19, 23.37
Norman v. State, 452 Md. 373, 156 A.3d 940 (2017), 23.10
Norris v. Lester, 545 Fed. Appx. 320 (6th Cir. 2013), 4.28(a), 24.15
North, United States v., 735 F.3d 212 (5th Cir. 2013), 23.19
Norwood v. City of Richmond, 203 Va. 886, 128 S.E.2d 425 (1962), 38.17(b) Novembrino, State v., 105 N.J. 95, 519 A.2d 820 (1987), 7.09, 23.17
Novotny, State v., 297 Kan. 1174, 307 P.3d 1278 (2013), 25.02
Null, State v., 836 N.W.2d 41 (Iowa 2013), 13.01

O

Ocampo v. Vail, 649 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2011), 30.04(c)
Ochoa, State v., 792 N.W.2d 260 (Iowa 2010), 23.10, 23.15(b)
O’Connor v. Donaldson, 422 U.S. 563 (1975), 12.18
O’Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709 (1987), 23.02(a), 23.15(b), 23.35
Oddone, People v., 22 N.Y.3d 369, 3 N.E.3d 1160, 980 N.Y.S.2d 912 (2013), 33.04
O.F., In the Interest of, 773 N.W.2d 206 (N.D. 2009), 5.03(a) Ofield, State v., 635 S.W.2d 73 (Mo. App. 1982), 31.03
Ohio v. Clark, 135 S. Ct. 2173 (2015), 30.04(c)
Ohio v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 493 (1984), 14.12, 17.08(d)
Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), 30.04(c)
Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33 (1996), 23.18(a) Okatan, United States v., 728 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2013), 24.24
Olazabal, United States v., 610 Fed. Appx. 34 (2d Cir. 2015), 37.02(d)
Old Chief v. United States, 519 U.S. 172 (1997), 30.02(b), 30.03(a), 30.03(c), 30.07(a) Olden v. Kentucky, 488 U.S. 227 (1988), 4.31(c), 13.05, 30.04(b)(2), 30.03(c), 31.01(a), 33.04
Olivares-Rangel, United States v., 458 F.3d 1104 (10th Cir. 2006), 23.37, 23.39
Oliveira, State v., 961 A.2d 299 (R.I. 2008), 24.13(b)
Oliver, In re, 333 U.S. 257 (1948), 27.08
Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170 (1984), 23.15(c)
Opperman, State v., 247 N.W.2d 673 (S.D. 1976), 23.25
Oquendo, State v., 223 Conn. 635, 613 A.2d 1300 (1992), 23.13
Oregon v. Bradshaw, 462 U.S. 1039 (1983), 24.11(c)
24.20(c), 24.20(d)
Oregon v. Hass, 420 U.S. 714 (1975), 7.09, 24.23, 33.06, 33.09(a) Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667 (1982), 17.08(e), 34.11(d)(1)
Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 U.S. 492 (1977), 24.08(a) Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690 (1996), 23.09
Orozco v. Texas, 394 U.S. 324 (1969), 23.05, 24.08(a) Ortiz, Commonwealth v., 478 Mass. 820, 90 N.E.3d 735 (2018), 23.18
Ortiz, United States v., 422 U.S. 891 (1975), 23.11(b), 23.30
Ortiz v. Yates, 704 F.3d 1026 (9th Cir. 2012), 31.01(a) Ortiz-Hernandez, United States v., 427 F.3d 567 (9th Cir. 2005), 23.07(d) Osborn v. State, 672 P.2d 777 (Wyo. 1983), 14.29(a) Ostrem, State v., 535 N.W.2d 916 (Minn. 1995), 25.03(c)
O’Sullivan v. Boerckel, 526 U.S. 838 (1999), 39.03(b)
Ousley, Commonwealth v., 393 S.W.3d 15 (Ky. 2013), 23.13, 23.15(c)
Owens, United States v., 484 U.S. 554 (1988), 31.01(a) Owens v. Duncan, 781 F.3d 360 (7th Cir. 2015), cert. dismissed, 136 S. Ct. 651 (2016), 35.08

P

Pabon, People v., 28 N.Y.3d 147, 65 N.E.3d 688, 42 N.Y.S.3d 659 (2016), 35.08
Pacer, People v., 6 N.Y.3d 504, 847 N.E.2d 1149, 814 N.Y.S.2d 575 (2006), 30.04(c)
Pacheco-Lopez, United States v., 531 F.3d 420 (6th Cir. 2008), 24.07
Padilla, Commonwealth v., 923 A.2d 1189 (Pa. Super. 2007), 7.03(c)
Page, State v., 11 Ohio Misc. 31, 228 N.E.2d 686 (C.P., Cuyahoga Cty. 1967), 12.14
Pakula, People v., 89 Ill. App. 3d 789, 411 N.E.2d 1385, 44 Ill. Dec. 919 (1980), 23.15(c)
Paniagua-Garcia, United States v., 813 F.3d 1013 (7th Cir. 2016), 23.28
Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. 584 (1979), 12.18, 12.19(b)
Parker, State v., 399 So. 2d 24 (Fla. App. 1981), review denied, 408 So. 2d 1095 (Fla. 1981),
23.15(c)
Parker, State v., 391 S.C. 606, 707 S.E.2d 799 (2011), 17.08(e), 34.11(d)(1)
Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363 (1966), 21.03(a), 36.14
Parker v. Randolph, 442 U.S. 62 (1979), 18.10(a) Parkin v. State, 238 So. 2d 817 (Fla. 1970), 12.15(b)
Paroline v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1710 (2014), 38.03(c)
Paroutian, United States v., 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962), aff’d after remand, 319 F.2d 661 (2d Cir. 1963), 23.38, 23.40
Patane, United States v., 542 U.S. 630 (2004), 24.03, 24.20
Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375 (1966), 12.15(a), 12.16, 12.17, 12.20
Patrick, People v., 233 Ill. 2d 62, 908 N.E.2d 1, 330 Ill. Dec. 149 (2009), 7.03(c)
Patrick W., In re, 104 Cal. App. 3d 615, 163 Cal. Rptr. 848 (1972), 13.13
Patterson, In the Interest of, 210 Kan. 245, 499 P.2d 1131 (1972), 10.14(c)
Patterson, People v., 93 N.Y.2d 80, 710 N.E.2d 665, 688 N.Y.S.2d 101 (1999), 10.14(c)
Patterson, United States v., 340 F.3d 368 (6th Cir. 2003), 23.09
Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977), 12.22, 35.03, 35.05, 35.06(f)
Patton v. Yount, 467 U.S. 1025 (1984), 15.02, 20.03(b), 28.03(a) Pauley v. Gross, 1 Kan. App. 2d 736, 574 P.2d 234 (1977), 4.15
Pauly v. White, 874 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2017), 23.07(d)
Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560 (1958), 23.05, 24.03, 24.04(a), 24.04(b)
Payne v. Tennessee, 501 U.S. 808 (1991), 21.03(b)
Payner, United States v., 447 U.S. 727 (1980), 23.15(a), 23.38
Peacock, People v., 68 N.Y.2d 675, 496 N.E.2d 683, 505 N.Y.S.2d 594 (1986), 23.07(a) Pearse v. State, 880 So. 2d 561 (Fla. 2004), 31.10
Peele, People v., 12 N.Y.2d 890, 188 N.E.2d 265, 237 N.Y.S.2d 999 (1963), 30.07(b)
Peltier, United States v., 422 U.S. 531 (1975), 23.39
Pelullo, United States v., 14 F.3d 881 (3d Cir. 1994), 17.08(f)
Pena, People v., 131 A.D.3d 708, 16 N.Y.S.3d 184 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015), 25.03(b)
Peña-Rodriguez v. Colorado, 137 S. Ct. 855 (2017), 27.05(a)(2), 37.02(c)
Pennsylvania v. Muniz, 496 U.S. 582 (1990), 24.07
Penry v. Johnson, 532 U.S. 782 (2001), 12.15(a)
People v. Addison, 116 A.D.2d 472, 496 N.Y.S.2d 742 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1986), 22.06(d)
People v. Anderson, 20 Cal. 3d 647, 574 P.2d 1235, 143 Cal. Rptr. 88 (1978), 30.07(b)
People v. Anderson, 6 Cal. 3d 628, 493 P.2d 880, 100 Cal. Rptr. 152 (1972), 7.09
People v. Arcega, 32 Cal. 3d 504, 651 P.2d 338, 186 Cal. Rptr. 94 (1982), 12.15(b)
People v. Arnold, 98 N.Y.2d 63, 772 N.E.2d 1140, 745 N.Y.S.2d 782 (2002), 22.05
People v. Bac Tran, 80 N.Y.2d 170, 603 N.E.2d 950, 589 N.Y.S.2d 845 (1992), 30.06(a) People v. Bedessie, 19 N.Y.3d 147, 970 N.E.2d 380, 947 N.Y.S.2d 357 (2012), 11.01(a), 24.22
People v. Bell, 126 A.D.3d 718, 5 N.Y.S.3d 227 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015), 28.03(b)
People v. Berrios, 28 N.Y.2d 361, 270 N.E.2d 709, 321 N.Y.S.2d 884 (1971), 22.06(d)
People v. Boss, 261 A.D.2d 1, 701 N.Y.S.2d 342 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1999) (per curiam), 20.03(b)
People v. Boyce, 89 A.D.2d 623, 452 N.Y.S.2d 676 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1982), 25.03(b)
People v. Bridgeforth, 28 N.Y.3d 567, 69 N.E.3d 611, 46 N.Y.S.3d 824 (2016), 28.03(b)
People v. Brocksmith, 162 Ill. 2d 224, 642 N.E.2d 1230, 205 Ill. Dec. 113 (1994), 36.05 People v. Brown, 399 Mich. 350, 249 N.W.2d 693 (1976), 12.15(a) People v. Brown, 121 A.D.2d 733, 504 N.Y.S.2d 457 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1986), 25.03(a)
People v. Bryant, 10 Cal. App. 5th 396, 215 Cal. Rptr. 3d 740 (2017), 38.03(c)
People v. Bryant, 117 A.D.3d 1586, 986 N.Y.S.2d 287 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dept. 2014), 37.02(c)
People v. Buckner, 35 Cal. App. 3d 307, 111 Cal. Rptr. 32 (1973), 23.21
People v. Budzyn, 456 Mich. 775, 66 N.W.2d 229 (1997), 27.05(a)(2)
People v. Bueno, 2018 CO 4, 409 P.3d 320 (Colo. 2018), 9.09(a) People v. Burns, 494 Mich. 104, 832 N.W.2d 738 (2013), 30.04(c)
People v. Burton, 6 N.Y.3d 584, 848 N.E.2d 454, 815 N.Y.S.2d 7 (2006), 23.15(a) People v. Caballero, 55 Cal. 4th 262, 282 P.3d 291, 145 Cal. Rptr. 3d 286 (2012), 13.01
People v. Cantave, 21 N.Y.3d 374, 993 N.E.2d 1257, 971 N.Y.S.2d 237 (2013), 30.07(b)
People v. Carmona, 233 A.D.2d 142, 649 N.Y.S.2d 432 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1996), 22.06(d)
People v. Carrington, 18 Misc.3d 1147(A), 859 N.Y.S.2d 897, 2008 WL 650055 (N.Y. Cty. Court, Westchester Cty. 2008), 30.05
People v. Casiano, 148 A.D.3d 1044, 50 N.Y.S.3d 439 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017), 36.11(a)
People v. Cedeno, 27 N.Y.3d 110, 50 N.E.3d 901, 31 N.Y.S.3d 434 (2016), 18.10(a)
People v. Chatman, 14 A.D.3d 620, 789 N.Y.S.2d 208 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2005), 22.05
People v. Clancy, 56 Cal. 4th 562, 299 P.3d 131, 155 Cal. Rptr. 3d 485 (2013), 14.06(c)(2)
People v. Colville, 20 N.Y.3d 20, 979 N.E.2d 1125, 955 N.Y.S.2d 799 (2012), 36.05 People v. Cook, 37 N.Y.2d 591, 338 N.E.2d 619, 376 N.Y.S.2d 110 (1975), 30.07(a) People v. Coons, 75 N.Y.2d 796, 551 N.E.2d 587, 552 N.Y.S.2d 94 (1990), 36.14
People v. Cruz, 129 A.D.3d 119, 10 N.Y.S.3d 214 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2015), 25.03(a)
People v. Curry, 2017 WL 2870482 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t July 6, 2017), 4.05 People v. Davis, 352 P.3d 950 (Colo. 2015), 4.05
People v. Davydov, 144 A.D.3d 1170, 43 N.Y.S.3d 74 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2016), 18.10(c), 10.08(c)
People v. Del Rio, 165 Cal. App. 4th 439, 80 Cal. Rptr. 3d 615 (2008), 14.07
People v. Diaz, 3 Misc.3d 686, 777 N.Y.S.2d 856 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., Kings Cty. 2004), 12.05(a)
People v. Disbrow, 16 Cal. 3d 101, 545 P.2d 272, 127 Cal. Rptr. 360 (1976), 24.23
People v. Dodson, 30 N.Y.3d 1041, 89 N.E.3d 1254 67 N.Y.S.3d 574 (2017), 14.29(b)
People v. Dott, 62 N.Y.2d 408, 474 N.Y.S.2d 441, 462 N.E.2d 1159 (1984), 22.03(d)
People v. Dorney, 17 Ill. App. 3d 785, 308 N.E.2d 646 (1974), 22.03(d)
People v. Dunbar, 423 Mich 380, 377 N.W.2d 262 (1985), 13.15
People v. Estevez, 155 A.D.3d 650, 64 N.Y.S.3d 236 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017), 22.05
People v. Ferguson, 114 A.D.2d 226, 498 N.Y.S.2d 800 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1986), 7.05
People v. Fermin, 36 A.D.3d 934, 828 N.Y.S.2d 546 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2007), 36.02
People v. Fernandez, 82 A.D.2d 922, 440 N.Y.S.2d 677 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1981), 25.03(c)
People v. Flowers, 23 Mich. App. 523, 179 N.W.2d 56 (1970), 23.18(b)
People v. Fordyce, 200 Colo. 153, 612 P.2d 1131 (1980), 24.05(c)
People v. Frederick, 500 Mich. 228, 895 N.W.2d 541 (2017), 23.18(a) People v. Fry, 92 P.3d 970 (Colo. 2004), 4.30, 30.04(c)
People v. Fuqua, 122 A.D.3d 1249, 996 N.Y.S.2d 410 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2014), 10.08(a)
People v. Garcia, 2 Cal. 5th 792, 391 P.3d 1153, 216 Cal. Rptr. 3d 75 (2017), 14.22(a) People v. Garries, 645 P.2d 1306 (Colo. 1982), 9.09(b)(7)
People v. Gokey, 60 N.Y.2d 309, 457 N.E.2d 723, 469 N.Y.S.2d 618 (1983), 23.08(b)
People v. Goldstein, 6 N.Y.3d 119, 843 N.E.2d 727, 810 N.Y.S.2d 100 (2005), 30.04(a), 30.04(b)(1), 30.04(c), 33.11
People v. Gomez, 198 Colo. 105, 596 P.2d 1192 (1979), 9.09(b)(7)
People v. Greene, 110 A.D.3d 827, 973 N.Y.S.2d 239 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2013), 31.05
People v. Greer, 42 N.Y.2d 170, 366 N.E.2d 273, 397 N.Y.S.2d 613 (1977), 30.07(b)
People v. Guilford, 21 N.Y.3d 205, 991 N.E.2d 204, 969 N.Y.S.2d 430 (2013), 24.20(a) People v. Gutierrez, 58 Cal. 4th 1354, 324 P.3d 245, 171 Cal. Rptr. 3d 421 (2014), 13.01
People v. Gutierrez, 214 Cal. App. 4th 343, 153 Cal. Rptr. 3d 832 (2013), 4.31(c)
People v. Hall, 18 N.Y.3d 122, 960 N.E.2d 399, 936 N.Y.S.2d 630 (2011), 10.08(b)
People v. Hall, 10 N.Y.3d 303, 886 N.E.2d 162, 856 N.Y.S.2d 540 (2008), 23.14
People v. Harlan, 109 P.3d 616 (Colo. 2005), 27.05(a)(2)
People v. Harris, 2018 WL 3117030 (N.Y. Ct. App. June 26, 2018), 35.01
People v. Harris, 77 N.Y.2d 434, 568 N.Y.S.2d 702, 570 N.E.2d 1051 (1991), 23.37
People v. Hill, 153 A.D.3d 413, 60 N.Y.S.3d 23 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2017), 23.15(b)
People v. Hillsman, 1999 WL 33437900 (Mich. App. 1999), 27.05(a)(2) <table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Case</th>
<th>Citation</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>People v. Hodge, 154 A.D.3d 963, 63 N.Y.S.3d 448 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2017)</td>
<td>14.05</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Holley, 26 N.Y.3d 514, 45 N.E.3d 936, 25 N.Y.S.3d 40 (2015)</td>
<td>25.03(c)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Hopson, 3 Cal. 5th 424, 396 P.3d 1054, 219 Cal. Rptr. 3d 717 (2017)</td>
<td>30.04(c)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Houston, 42 Cal. 3d 595, 724 P.2d 1166, 230 Cal. Rptr. 141 (1986)</td>
<td>24.13(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Howard, 50 N.Y.2d 583, 408 N.E.2d 908, 430 N.Y.S.2d 578 (1980)</td>
<td>23.11(b), 24.08(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Jiminez, 21 Cal. 3d 595, 580 P.2d 672, 147 Cal. Rptr. 172 (1978), partially overruled on an unrelated point in People v. Cahill, 5 Cal. 4th 478, 853 P.2d 1037, 20 Cal. Rptr.2d 582 (1993)</td>
<td>22.03(d)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Jiminez, 863 P.2d 981, 982 (Colo. 1993)</td>
<td>24.10(b)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Kaufman, 457 Mich. 266, 577 N.W.2d 466 (1998) (per curiam)</td>
<td>22.03(e)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Kennedy, 2018 WL 3213033 (Mich. June 29, 2018)</td>
<td>11.03(b)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Knedler, 329 P.3d 242 (Colo. 2014)</td>
<td>24.10(b)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Kocsis, 137 A.D.3d 1476, 28 N.Y.S.3d 466 (N.Y. App. Div. 3d Dep’t 2016)</td>
<td>20.05</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Lacy, 25 A.D.2d 788, 270 N.Y.S.2d 1014 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 1966)</td>
<td>22.05(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Lastorino, 185 A.D.2d 284, 586 N.Y.S.2d 26 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1992)</td>
<td>22.06(d)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Lawson, 163 Ill. 2d 187, 644 N.E.2d 1172, 206 Ill. Dec. 119 (1994)</td>
<td>11.03(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Lebron, 184 A.D.2d 784, 585 N.Y.S.2d 498 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1992)</td>
<td>22.06(d)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Ledwun, 153 N.Y. 10, 46 N.E. 1046 (1897)</td>
<td>35.04</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Leftwich, 869 P.2d 1260 (Colo. 1994)</td>
<td>23.32(c)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Lerma, 2016 IL 118496, 47 N.E.3d 985, 400 Ill. Dec. 20 (2016)</td>
<td>11.01(a), 11.01(b)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Lessane, 142 A.D.3d 562, 36 N.Y.S.3d 231 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2016)</td>
<td>18.10(c)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
People v. Lines, 13 Cal. 3d 500, 531 P.2d 793, 119 Cal. Rptr. 225 (1975), 12.09, 38.09
People v. Lopez, 229 Ill. 2d 322, 892 N.E.2d 1047, 323 Ill. Dec. 55 (2008), 23.04(b), 24.08(a) People v. Love, 56 Cal. 2d 720, 366 P.2d 33, 16 Cal. Rptr. 777 (1961), 33.02(b)
People v. Maes, 194 Colo. 235, 571 P.2d 305 (1977), 24.14(b)
People v. Marshall, 26 N.Y.3d 495, 45 N.E.3d 954, 25 N.Y.S.3d 58 (2015), 25.03(c)
People v. Martin, 51 Cal. 4th 75, 244 P.3d 496, 119 Cal. Rptr. 3d 99 (2010), 38.03(c)
People v. Massie, 137 Ill. App. 3d 723, 484 N.E.2d 1213, 92 Ill. Dec. 358 (1985), 30.07(b)
People v. McGuire, 148 A.D.3d 1578, 51 N.Y.S.3d 726 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2017), 18.10(c)
People v. McIntosh, 96 N.Y.2d 521, 755 N.E.2d 329, 730 N.Y.S.2d 265 (2001), 23.04(b)
People v. McTush, 81 Ill. 2d 513, 410 N.E.2d 861, 43 Ill. Dec. 727 (1980), 22.03(d)
People v. Mena, 54 Cal. 4th 146, 277 P.3d 160, 141 Cal. Rptr. 3d 469 (2012), 26.01
People v. Mitchell, 21 N.Y.3d 964, 993 N.E.2d 405, 970 N.Y.S.2d 919 (2013), 14.29(b)
People v. Monroe, 925 P.2d 767 (Colo. 1996), 22.03(d)
People v. Moore, 321 P.3d 510 (Colo. App. 2010), 27.05(a)(2)
People v. Morgan, 149 A.D.3d 1148, 51 N.Y.S.3d 218 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2017), 33.07
People v. Morris, 126 A.D.3d 813, 4 N.Y.S.3d 305 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015), 23.15(c)
People v. Morrison, 156 A.D.3d 126, 66 N.Y.S.3d 682 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2017), 17.08(f)
People v. Moses, 32 A.D.3d 866, 823 N.Y.S.2d 409 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2006), 22.03(e)
People v. Nelson, 53 Cal. 4th 367, 266 P.3d 1008, 135 Cal. Rptr. 3d 312 (2012), 24.11(c)
People v. Oddone, 22 N.Y.3d 369, 3 N.E.3d 1160, 980 N.Y.S.2d 912 (2013), 33.04
People v. Pabon, 28 N.Y.3d 147, 65 N.E.3d 688, 42 N.Y.S.3d 659 (2016), 35.08
People v. Pacer, 6 N.Y.3d 504, 847 N.E.2d 1149, 814 N.Y.S.2d 575 (2006), 30.04(c)
People v. Pakula, 89 Ill. App. 3d 789, 411 N.E.2d 1385, 44 Ill Dec. 919 (1980), 23.15(c)
People v. Patrick, 233 Ill. 2d 62, 908 N.E.2d 1, 330 Ill. Dec. 149 (2009), 7.03(c)
People v. Patterson, 93 N.Y.2d 80, 710 N.E.2d 665, 688 N.Y.S.2d 101 (1999), 10.14(c)
People v. Peele, 12 N.Y.2d 890, 188 N.E.2d 265, 237 N.Y.S.2d 999 (1963), 30.07(b)
People v. Pena, 131 A.D.3d 708, 16 N.Y.S.3d 184 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015), 25.03(b)
People v. Perez, 243 Cal. App. 4th 863, 196 Cal. Rptr. 3d 871 (2016), 24.04(c)
People v. Perkins, 28 N.Y.3d 432, 68 N.E.3d 679, 45 N.Y.S.3d 860 (2016), 25.03(b)
People v. Perry, 133 A.D.3d 410, 18 N.Y.S.3d 539 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2015), 25.03(b)
People v. Perry, 128 Misc.2d 430, 488 N.Y.S.2d 977 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., N.Y. Cty. 1985), 22.06(d)
People v. Pokovich, 39 Cal. 4th 1240, 141 P.3d 267, 48 Cal. Rptr. 3d 158 (2006), 12.15(a), 33.09
People v. Pratt, 759 P.2d 676, 683 (Colo. 1988), 33.20
People v. Rahming, 26 N.Y.2d 411, 259 N.E.2d 727, 311 N.Y.S.2d 292 (1970), 22.03(d)
People v. Raymond, 314 P.3d 836 (Colo. 2013), 24.04(c)
People v. Raosto, 50 A.D.3d 508, 856 N.Y.S.2d 86 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2008), 22.05
People v. Reid, 24 N.Y.3d 615, 26 N.E.3d 237, 2 N.Y.S.3d 409 (2014), 23.08(d)
People v. Retamozzo, 25 A.D.3d 73, 802 N.Y.S.2d 426 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2005), 22.05
People v. Rivera, 41 Cal. 3d 388, 710 P.2d 362, 221 Cal. Rptr. 562 (1985), 24.11(a)
People v. Robinson, 123 A.D.3d 1062, 999 N.Y.S.2d 499 (N.Y. App. Div. 2d Dep’t 2014), 25.03(b)
People v. Ryan, 12 N.Y.3d 28, 904 N.E.2d 808, 876 N.Y.S.2d 672 (2009), 23.06(a) People v. Sanders, 26 N.Y.3d 773, 47 N.E.3d 770, 27 N.Y.S.3d 491 (2016), 23.22(b)
People v. Santiago, 17 N.Y.3d 661, 958 N.E.2d 874, 934 N.Y.S.2d 746 (2011), 11.01(a), 31.05
People v. Sapp, 98 A.D.2d 784, 469 N.Y.S.2d 803 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1983), 25.03(b)
People v. Shafier, 483 Mich. 205, 768 N.W.2d 305 (2009), 24.24
People v. Shiga, 6 Cal. App. 5th 22, 210 Cal. Rptr. 3d 611 (2016), 4.05 People v. Smith, 264 Cal. App. 2d 718, 70 Cal. Rptr. 591 (1968), 20.05
People v. Smith, 30 N.Y.3d 626, 92 N.E.3d 789, 69 N.Y.S.3d 566 (2017), 4.03
People v. Smith, 27 N.Y.3d 652, 57 N.E.3d 53, 36 N.Y.S.3d 861 (2016), 30.07(c)
People v. Smith, 122 A.D.3d 1162, 997 N.Y.S.2d 534 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2014), 25.03(c)
People v. Sotelo-Urena, 4 Cal. App. 5th 732, 209 Cal. Rptr. 3d 259 (2016), 11.01(b)
People v. Spencer, 60 Cal. 2d 64, 383 P.2d 134, 31 Cal. Rptr. 782 (1963), 12.15(b)
People v. Stevens, 498 Mich. 162, 869 N.W.2d 233 (2015), 20.04, 34.09
People v. Stevens, 386 Mich. 579, 194 N.W.2d 370 (1972), 12.15(b), 22.04, 22.05
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Case</th>
<th>Citation</th>
<th>Paragraph</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>People v. Superior Court of Los Angeles</td>
<td>142 Cal. App. 3d 29, 190 Cal. Rptr. 721 (1983), 38.17(b)</td>
<td>1195</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Superior Court of Santa Clara County</td>
<td>15 Cal. 3d 271, 539 P.2d 807, 124 Cal. Rptr. 47 (1975), 21.01</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Talley</td>
<td>410 Mich. 378, 301 N.W.2d 809 (1981), 22.03(e)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Tate</td>
<td>367 Ill. App. 3d 109, 853 N.E.2d 1249, 304 Ill. Dec. 883 (2006), 23.22(c)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Teresford</td>
<td>149 A.D.3d 170, 49 N.Y.S.3d 414 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2017), 36.15</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Teresinki</td>
<td>30 Cal. 3d 822, 180 Cal. Rptr. 617, 640 P.3d 753 (1982), 23.37</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Thomas</td>
<td>22 N.Y.3d 629, 8 N.E.3d 308, 985 N.Y.S.2d 193 (2014), 24.04(d)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Thomas</td>
<td>21 N.Y.3d 226, 991 N.E.2d 200, 969 N.Y.S.2d 426 (2013), 10.08(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Torres</td>
<td>2012 IL 111302, 962 N.E.2d 919, 357 Ill. Dec. 18 (2012), 30.04(c)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Torres</td>
<td>54 Misc.3d 1220(A), 54 N.Y.S.3d 612 (Table), 2017 WL 740983 (N.Y. Court</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Vilardoni</td>
<td>76 N.Y.2d 67, 555 N.E.2d 915, 556 N.Y.S.2d 518 (1990), 9.09(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Walker</td>
<td>211 Ill. 2d 317, 812 N.E.2d 339, 285 Ill. Dec. 519 (2004), 30.02(b)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Ward</td>
<td>95 A.D.2d 351, 466 N.Y.S.2d 686 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1983), 24.05(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Watson</td>
<td>36 Ill. 2d 228, 221 N.E.2d 645 (1966), 11.03(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Wesley</td>
<td>428 Mich. 708, 411 N.W.2d 159 (1987), 14.05</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. West</td>
<td>3 Cal. 3d 595, 477 P.2d 409, 91 Cal. Rptr. 385 (1970), 14.18</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. White</td>
<td>123 Ill. App. 2d 102, 259 N.E.2d 357 (1970), 9.07(b)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. White</td>
<td>401 Mich. 482, 257 N.W.2d 912 (1977), 12.15(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Wiggins</td>
<td>31 N.Y.3d 1, 795 N.E.3d 303, 72 N.Y.S.3d 1 (2018), 15.04(b)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Williams</td>
<td>204 Ill. 2d 191, 788 N.E.2d 1126, 273 Ill. Dec. 250 (2003), 33.09</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Williams</td>
<td>127 A.D.3d 1114, 7 N.Y.S.3d 434 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015), 25.03(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Willis</td>
<td>215 Ill. 2d 517, 831 N.E.2d 531, 294 Ill. Dec. 581 (2005), 4.28(a)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>People v. Zamorano</td>
<td>301 A.D.2d 544, 754 N.Y.S.2d 645 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2003), 22.05</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

People ex rel. Carey v. White, 65 Ill. 2d 193, 357 N.E.2d 512, 2 Ill. Dec. 345 (1976), 21.01

People ex rel. Gallagher v. District Court, 656 P.2d 1287 (Colo. 1983), 9.09(b)(7)

People ex rel. Hanrahan v. Felt, 48 Ill. 2d 171, 269 N.E.2d 1 (1971), 9.01, 9.02

People in the Interest of R.A.D., 196 Colo. 430, 586 P.2d 46 (1978), 21.01

Peoples, State, v. 240 Ariz. 244, 378 P.3d 421 (2016), 23.15(d)

Perdue, United States v., 8 F.3d 1455 (10th Cir. 1993), 24.08(a)

Perea, State v., 322 P.3d 624 (Utah 2013), 11.01(a), 24.22

Perez, Commonwealth v., 477 Mass. 677, 80 N.E.3d 967 (2017), 13.01

Perez, People v., 243 Cal. App. 4th 863, 196 Cal. Rptr. 3d 871 (2016), 24.04(c)

Perez, United States v., 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 579 (1824), 34.11(d)(2), 36.17

Perkins, People v., 28 N.Y.3d 432, 68 N.E.3d 679, 45 N.Y.S.3d 860 (2016), 25.03(b)

Perkins, United States v., 887 F.3d 272 (6th Cir. 2018), 23.17(g)

Perkins v. Commonwealth, 834 S.W.2d 182 (Ky. App. 1992), 34.10

Perolisi, State v., 183 W.Va. 686, 398 S.E.2d 512 (1990), 33.25

Perotti v. State, 806 P.2d 325 (Alaska App. 1991), 20.05

Perry, People v., 133 A.D.3d 410, 18 N.Y.S.3d 539 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2015), 25.03(b)

Perry, People v., 128 Misc.2d 430, 488 N.Y.S.2d 977 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., N.Y. Cty. 1985), 22.06(d)

Perry v. Commonwealth, 390 S.W.3d 122 (Ky. 2013), 30.05

Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. 272 (1989), 27.02, 27.11, 33.09(b)

Perry v. New Hampshire, 565 U.S. 228, (2012), 25.01, 25.02, 25.05, 36.06

Peseti, State v., 101 Hawai’i 172, 65 P.3d 119 (2003), 9.09(b)(3)

Peters, United States v., 625 F.2d 366 (10th Cir. 1980), 27.12(c)

Peters v. Kiff, 407 U.S. 493 (1972), 21.03(b)

Peterson, State v., 525 S.W.2d 599 (Mo. App. 1975), 23.18(b)

Peterson, State v., 181 Vt. 436, 923 A.2d 585 (2007), 24.20(e)

Peterson v. State, 24 So. 3d 686 (Fla. App. 2009), 36.06

Peterson v. United States, 351 F.2d 606 (9th Cir. 1965), 4.31(d)

Petion v. State, 48 So. 3d 726 (Fla. 2010), 35.08

Petition of Provoo, 17 F.R.D. 183 (D. Md. 1955), aff’d per curiam, 350 U.S. 857 (1955), 15.04(b)

Petrocelli v. Baker, 869 F.3d 710 (9th Cir. 2017), 12.15(a) Peyton, United States v., 745 F.3d 546 (D.C. Cir. 2014), 23.18(b)
Phillips, United States v., 146 F. Supp. 3d 837 (E.D. Mich. 2015), ruling on another issue aff’d, 677 Fed. Appx. 294 (6th Cir. 2017), 24.07
Phillips v. Ornosky, 673 F.3d 1168 (9th Cir. 2012), 9.09(b)(5)
Phinney, State v., 235 Neb. 486, 455 N.W.2d 795 (1990), 13.18
(5th Cir. 1971), 23.33, 23.36
Pierce, State v., 136 N.J. 184, 642 A.2d 947 (1994), 7.09
Piland v. Clark County Juvenile Court, 85 Nev. 489, 457 P.2d 523 (1969), 15.04(b)
Pilon v. Bordenkircher, 444 U.S. 1 (1979), 32.01
Pima County Juvenile Action No. J-77027-1, In the Matter of the Appeal in, 139 Ariz. 446, 679 P.2d 92 (Ariz. App. 1984), 12.15(a), 13.06, 38.07
Pimental, United States v., 755 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2014), 24.15
Pittman v. County of Madison, Ill., 746 F.3d 766 (7th Cir. 2014), 5.09
Pittman by Hamilton v. County of Madison, Illinois, 863 F.3d 734 (7th Cir. 2017), 30.02(b)
Place, United States v., 462 U.S. 696 (1983), 23.02(a), 23.04(d), 23.06(a), 23.08(b), 23.12,
23.22(b)
Plaisted, People v., 2 A.D.3d 906, 767 N.Y.S.2d 518 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2003), 30.07(b)
Platt v. Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 376 U.S. 240 (1964), 17.05, 20.01(b)
P.M.P., State in the Interest of, 200 N.J. 166, 975 A.2d 441 (2009), 4.03, 24.13(a) Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400 (1965), 4.31(c), 30.04(a) Pokovich, People v., 39 Cal. 4th 1240, 141 P.3d 267, 48 Cal. Rptr. 3d 158 (2006), 12.15(a), 33.09
Polk, State v., 812 N.W.2d 670 (Iowa 2012), 24.04(c)
Pollack, United States v., 534 F.2d 964 (D.C. Cir. 1976), 9.09(a) Poole, United States v., 450 F.2d 1082 (3d Cir. 1971), 28.03(c)
Pope v. State, 569 So. 2d 1241 (Fla. 1990), 36.14
Portuondo v. Agard, 529 U.S. 61 (2000), 9.12, 10.10, 24.24, 33.02(a) Powell, Commonwealth v., 527 Pa. 288, 590 A.2d 1240 (1991), 37.02(d)
Powell, United States v., 469 U.S. 57 (1984), 17.08(f), 35.03, 36.18
Powell, United States v., 929 F.2d 1190 (7th Cir. 1991), 23.23
Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), 9.09(b)(1), 15.02
Powell v. Collins, 332 F.3d 376 (6th Cir. 2003), 12.13
Powell v. Galaza, 328 F.3d 558 (9th Cir. 2003), 36.12
Powell v. Nevada, 511 U.S. 79 (1994), 4.28(a), 24.15
Powell v. State, 673 S.W.2d 403 (Tex. App. 1984), 30.07(b)
Powell v. Texas, 492 U.S. 680 (1989), 12.15(a), 24.13(b), 24.13(c) Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400 (1991), 28.03(b)
Pratt, People v., 759 P.2d 676 (Colo. 1988), 33.20
Presley v. Georgia, 558 U.S. 209 (2010) (per curiam), 27.08
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1 (1986), 27.08, 28.03(c)
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501 (1984), 27.08, 28.03(b), 28.03(c), 28.05
Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964), 23.24, 23.26
Preston, United States v., 751 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc), 24.05, 24.05(b)
Price, People v., 29 N.Y.3d 472, 80 N.E.3d 1005, 58 N.Y.S.3d 259 (2017), 10.14(c)
Price, United States v., 383 U.S. 787 (1966), 22.03(d)
Price, United States v., 925 F.2d 1268 (10th Cir. 1991), 23.15(b)
Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323 (1970), 17.08(b)(2), 17.08(f)
Price v. Superior Court, 25 Cal. 4th 104, 625 P.3d 618, 108 Cal. Rptr.2d 409 (2001), 17.05
Price v. Vincent, 538 U.S. 634 (2003), 17.08(e)
Prieto, State v., 366 Wis. 2d 794, 876 N.W.2d 154 (Wis. App. 2015), 9.07(b) Privette v. State, 320 Md. 738, 580 A.2d 188 (1990), 36.03
Privott, State v., 203 N.J. 16, 999 A.2d 415 (2010), 23.10
Procunier v. Atchley, 400 U.S. 446 (1971), 24.05
Provoo, Petition, 17 F.R.D 183 (D. Md. 1955), aff’d per curiam, 350 U.S. 857 (1955), 15.04(b)
Pruitt v. Neal, 788 F.3d 248 (7th Cir. 2015), 11.02
PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robbins, 447 U.S.74 (1980), 7.09
P.S.C., In re, 143 Ga. App. 887, 240 S.E.2d 165 (1977), 37.02
Public Defender, Eleventh Judicial Circuit of Florida v. State, 115 So. 3d 261 (Fla. 2013), 6.07
Puerto Rico v. Sanchez Valle, 136 S. Ct. 1863 (2016), 17.08(g)
Pugh v. Rainwater, 557 F.2d 1189 (5th Cir. 1977), rev’d en banc, 572 F.2d 1053 (5th Cir. 1978), 4.27(c) Purkett v. Elem, 514 U.S. 765 (1995), 28.03(b)
Putnal v. State, 814 S.E.2d 307 (Ga. 2018), 11.03(b)
P.V. v. District Court in and for the Tenth Judicial District, 199 Colo. 357, 609 P.2d 110 (1980), 15.04(b), 26.01
P.W.N., In the Interest of, 301 N.W.2d 636 (N.D. 1981), 13.16
Pyles, Commonwealth v., 423 Mass. 717, 672 N.E.2d 96 (1996), 19.03(b)

Q

1198
Q.D., State v., 102 Wash. 2d 19, 685 P.2d 557 (1984), 17.04(b)
Quercia v. United States, 289 U.S. 466 (1933), 36.13
Quick v. State, 599 P.2d 712 (Alaska 1979), 24.14(a) Quinn, State v., 64 Md. App 668, 498 A.2d 676 (1985), 24.11(c)
Quino, State v., 74 Haw. 161, 840 P.2d 358 (1992), 23.13
   1st Dep’t 1978), 23.13
   30.06(b)

R

R.A.B., In re, 197 Ill. 2d 358, 757 N.E.2d 887, 259 Ill. Dec. 24 (2001), 21.02(a)
R.A.B., In the Matter of, 399 A.2d 81 (D.C. 1979), 35.04
Racine, State in the Interest of, 433 So. 2d 243 (La. App. 1983), 38.23
R.A.D., People in the Interest of, 196 Colo. 430, 586 P.2d 46 (1978), 21.01
Raddatz, United States v., 447 U.S. 667 (1980), 22.03(d), 22.03(e), 22.07
Raheem v. Kelly, 257 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2001), 25.03(b), 25.04
Rahming, People v., 26 N.Y.2d 411, 259 N.E.2d 727, 311 N.Y.S.2d 292 (1970), 22.03(d)
Ramadon, People v., 314 P.3d 836 (Colo. 2013), 24.04(c)
Rambo, United States v., 365 F.3d 906 (10th Cir. 2004), 24.08(b), 24.11(b), 24.11(c)
Ramirez, United States v., 523 U.S. 65 (1998), 23.21
Ramirez, United States v., 676 F.3d 755 (8th Cir. 2012), 23.20
Ramirez v. Commonwealth, 479 Mass. 331, 94 N.E.3d 809 (2018), 17.01
Ramon M., In re, 22 Cal. 3d 419, 584 P.2d 524, 149 Cal. Rptr. 387 (1978), 12.21
Ramsey, United States v., 431 U.S. 606 (1977), 23.09
Rankins, United States v., 675 Fed. Appx. 231 (4th Cir. 2017), 14.05
Raosto, People v., 50 A.D.3d 508, 856 N.Y.S.2d 86 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dept. 2008), 22.05
Rathbone v. State, 448 So. 2d 85 (Fla. App. 1984), 38.17(a) Rastrom v. Robbins, 440 F.2d 1251 (1st Cir. 1971), 15.02
Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980), 22.03(d), 23.08(d), 23.13, 23.15(a), 23.37, 23.38, 23.39, 24.19
   24.12
Razmilovic, United States v., 507 F.3d 130 (2d Cir. 2007), 36.17
R.B., State in the Interest of, 200 N.J. Super. 573, 491 A.2d 1311 (1985), 18.10(a)
R.D.S., In the Matter of, 359 A.2d 136 (D.C. 1976), 4.31(c)
Reaves, United States v., 512 F.3d 123 (4th Cir. 2008), 23.32(d)
Recchia v. City of Los Angeles Department of Animal Services, 889 F.3d 533 (9th Cir. 2018), 23.15(d)

1199
Rechenski v. Williams, 622 F.3d 315 (3d Cir. 2010), 38.03(c)
Recio, United States v., 884 F.3d 230 (4th Cir. 2018), 10.14(c) Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433 (1961), 24.03, 24.04(b), 24.05, 24.05(b), 24.05(d), 24.20(a) Reed v. Duter, 416 F.2d 744 (7th Cir. 1969), 39.02(b) Reed v. Ross, 468 U.S. 1 (1984), 7.05, 35.03, 35.06(f)
Reed v. State, 125 Ga. App. 568, 188 S.E.2d 392 (1972), 13.07
Rees, State v., 748 A.2d 976 (Me. 2000), 24.03
Reeves v. Warden, 346 F.2d 915 (4th Cir. 1965), 23.18(b)
Regalado v. California, 374 U.S. 497 (1963), 23.16
Register, In the Matter of, 84 N.C. App. 336, 352 S.E.2d 889 (1987), 19.04
Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980), 23.06, 23.09, 23.11(c), 23.13, 23.37
Reid, People v., 24 N.Y.3d 615, 26 N.E.3d 237, 2 N.Y.S.3d 409 (2014), 23.08(d)
Reid, State v., 194 N.J. 386, 945 A.2d 26 (2008), 23.15(d)
Reid v. State, 428 Md. 289, 51 A.3d 597 (2012), 23.04(d) Remmer v. United States, 347 U.S. 227 (1954), 36.14, 37.02(a) Renico v. Lett, 559 U.S. 766 (2010), 17.08(e)
Resendiz-Ponce, United States v., 549 U.S. 102 (2007), 17.03(c)
Rey v. State, 897 S.W.2d 333 (Tex. Crim. App. 1995), 11.03(a) Reyes v. Lewis, 833 F.3d 1001 (9th Cir. 2016), 24.20(b)
Reynolds, In the Matter of, 317 Or. 560, 857 P.2d 842 (1993), 21.01
Reynolds, United States v., 345 U.S. 1 (1953), 9.10(c)
R.G.W., State in the Interest of, 135 N.J. Super. 125, 342 A.2d 869 (1975), aff’d, 70 N.J. 185, 358 A.2d 473 (1976), 12.21
Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291 (1980), 24.01, 24.08(b), 24.13
Rice v. Collins, 546 U.S. 333 (2006), 28.03(b)
Rice v. White, 660 F.3d 242 (6th Cir. 2011), 28.03(b)
Richard S. v. Carpinello, 589 F.3d 75 (2d Cir. 2009), 12.23
Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385 (1997), 23.21
Richardson, State v., 210 Wis. 2d 694, 563 N.W.2d 899 (1997), 30.03(a) Richardson v. Marsh, 481 U.S. 200 (1987), 18.10(a) Richardson v. State, 246 So. 2d 771 (Fla. 1971), 9.07(b)
Richardson v. United States, 468 U.S. 317 (1984), 17.08(e)
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980), 27.05(a)(1), 27.08, 27.11
Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987), 14.12, 14.17, 14.18, 14.25, 17.08(d) Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723 (1963), 21.03(a), 28.03(a) Rife v. Oklahoma Department of Public Safety, 854 F.3d 637 (10th Cir. 2017), 5.09
Riggan v. Virginia, 384 U.S. 152 (1966), 23.17(a) Riggins v. Nevada, 504 U.S. 127 (1992), 27.01
Riley, United States ex rel., v. Franzen, 653 F.2d 1153 (7th Cir. 1981), 24.11(a) Riley v. California, 134 S. Ct. 2473 (2014), 9.12, 22.03(d), 23.02(a), 23.08(a), 23.08(b), 23.08(c), 23.13, 23.15(d), 23.25
Riley v. McDaniel, 786 F.3d 719 (9th Cir. 2015), 36.06
Rincher v. State, 632 So. 2d 37 (Ala. Crim. App. 1993), 24.04(c)
Ring v. United States, 419 U.S. 18 (1974), 31.03
Rios v. United States, 364 U.S. 253 (1960), 23.13, 23.15(b), 23.23
Rippo v. Baker, 137 S. Ct. 905 (2017) (per curiam), 20.04, 20.05
Ristaino v. Ross, 424 U.S. 589 (1976), 28.03(c) Rivas v. Fischer, 780 F.3d 529 (2d Cir. 2015), 8.03
Rivenbark, State v., 311 Md. 147, 533 A.2d 271 (1987), 30.06(a) Rivera v. Delaware, 429 U.S. 877 (1976), 12.22, 35.05
Rivera, People v., 41 Cal. 3d 388, 710 P.2d 362, 221 Cal. Rptr. 562 (1985), 24.11(a) Rivera, State v., 268 Conn. 351, 844 A.2d 191 (2004), 30.04(c)
R.J.W. v. State, 910 So. 2d 357 (Fla. App. 2005), 32.02
R.L.R. v. State, 487 P.2d 27 (Alaska 1971), 12.19(b), 21.01, 27.01, 27.08
R.L.W., State ex rel., v. Billings, 451 S.W.2d 125 (Mo. 1970), 20.04
Roach, State v., 234 Neb. 620, 452 N.W.2d 262 (1990), 23.08(b)
Robeles-Ortega, United States v., 348 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2003), 23.39
Roberts, United States v., 262 F.3d 286 (4th Cir. 2001), 37.02(c)
Roberts v. LaVallee, 389 U.S. 40 (1967), 4.31(d)
Roberts v. Russell, 392 U.S. 293 (1968), 30.06(a) Roberts v. United States, 445 U.S. 552 (1980), 23.18(a) Roberts v. United States, 325 F.2d 290 (5th Cir. 1963), 9.09(b)(1)
Robertson v. Goldman, 179 W. Va. 453, 369 S.E.2d 888 (1988), 4.27(c)
Robinson, People v., 68 N.Y.2d 541, 503 N.E.2d 485, 510 N.Y.S.2d 837 (1986), 30.07(a)
Robinson, People v., 123 A.D.3d 1062, 999 N.Y.S.2d 499 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2014), 25.03(b)
Robinson, State v., 185 Vt. 232, 969 A.2d 127 (2009), 23.32(b)
Robinson, United States v., 485 U.S. 25 (1988), 33.05
Robinson, United States v., 414 U.S. 218 (1973), 23.08(a), 23.08(b), 23.26, 23.28
Robinson, United States v., 430 F.3d 537 (2d Cir. 2005), 37.02(d)
Robinson v. Tennessee, 392 U.S. 666 (1968), 24.20
Robinson v. United States, 357 A.2d 412 (D.C. 1976), 35.04
Rockin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952), 23.07(d), 23.14, 23.21
Rock v. Arkansas, 483 U.S. 44 (1987), 13.05(b), 30.03(b), 33.04
Rockford, State v., 213 N.J. 424, 64 A.3d 514 (2013), 23.21
Rockwell v. Brown, 664 F.3d 985 (5th Cir. 2011), 23.07(c) Roderick P., \textit{In re}, 7 Cal. 3d 801, 500 P.2.d 1, 103 Cal. Rptr. 425 (1972), 24.10(a) Rodriguez, State v., 128 Hawai‘i 200, 286 P.3d 809 (2012), 23.38
Rodriguez, United States v., 518 F.3d 1072 (9th Cir. 2008), 24.11(a) Rodriguez v. McDonald, 872 F.3d 908 (9th Cir. 2017), 24.10(a), 24.11(c)
Rodriguez v. State, 109 A.3d 1075 (Del. 2015), 29.03(a) Rodriguez v. State, 187 So. 3d 841 (Fla. 2015), 23.38
Rodriguez v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 1609 (2015), 23.06(a), 23.28
Rodriguez-Vega, United States v., 797 F.3d 809 (2012), 24.11(a) Rodriguez v. State, 109 A.3d 1075 (Del. 2015), 29.03(a)

Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470 (2000), 2.03, 13.19, 38.28
Roesser v. State, 294 Ga. 295, 751 S.E.2d 297 (2013), 17.08(f)
Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534 (1961), 24.03, 24.16, 33.09(a) Rogers v. United States, 422 U.S. 35 (1975), 27.02
Rogerson, State v., 855 N.W.2d 495 (Iowa 2014), 27.01
Rollerson v. United States, 127 A.3d 1220 (D.C. 2015), 18.10, 18.10(b) Romine v. Head, 253 F.3d 1349 (11th Cir. 2001), 36.11(a) Romo, United States v., 669 F.2d 285 (5th Cir. 1982), 33.09(a) Rompilla v. Beard, 545 U.S. 374 (2005), 9.09(b)(1)
Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005), 13.01
Rosales-Lopez v. United States, 451 U.S. 182 (1981), 28.03(c) Rosales-Mireles v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 1897 (2018), 39.02(a) Rose, State v., 112 N.J. 454, 548 A.2d 1058 (1988), 27.08
Rose v. Clark, 478 U.S. 570 (1986), 36.01
Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545 (1979), 21.03(b)
Roseborough, State v., 2010 WL 1694531 (Ohio App. April 23, 2010), 11.02
Ross, United States v., 456 U.S. 798 (1982), 23.08(b), 23.17(g), 23.19, 23.24, 23.32(b)
Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974), 11.03(a) Ross v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 81 (1988), 28.03(a), 28.03(b)
Ross v. State, 106 Nev. 924, 803 P.2d 1104 (1990) (per curiam), 10.08(a) Rothgery v. Gillespie County, Texas, 554 U.S. 191 (2008), 4.03, 24.13(a) Rouse v. State, 243 So. 2d 225 (Fla. App. 1971), 9.07(b)
Routhier v. Sheriff, Clark County, 93 Nev. 149, 560 P.2d 1371 (1977). . . . . . . 4.31(c), 9.09(b)(1)
Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53 (1957), 9.09(b)(4), 9.10(a)
R.R., \textit{State ex rel.}, v. Schmidt, 63 Wis. 2d 82, 216 N.W.2d 18 (1974), 39.05
R.S.M. v. State, 911 So. 2d 283 (Fla. App. 2005), 23.33
Ruiz, United States v., 536 U.S. 622 (2002), 9.09(a), 14.29(b)
Ruiz, United States v., 623 Fed. Appx. 378 (9th Cir. 2015), 23.32(b)
Ruiz v. Craven, 425 F.2d 235 (9th Cir. 1970), 24.19
Ruiz v. State, 265 Ark. 875, 582 S.W.2d 915 (1979), 20.03(b) Rushen v. Spain, 464 U.S. 114 (1983), 27.01, 27.02, 37.02(a) Rushton, State v., 260 Or. App. 765, 320 P.3d 672 (2014), 7.03(c)
Russell, United States v., 205 F.3d 768 (5th Cir. 2000), 27.02
Russell C., In re, 120 N.H. 260, 414 A.2d 934 (1980), 15.04(a)
Russell v. United States, 369 U.S. 749 (1962), 17.03(c)
Russell v. United States, 701 A.2d 1093 (D.C. 1997), 36.11(a) Rutledge v. United States, 392 A.2d 1062 (D.C. 1978), 23.32(b), 23.32(d) R.W.S., In the Interest of, 728 N.W.2d 326 (N.D. 2007), 27.01
Ryan, People v., 12 N.Y.3d 28, 904 N.E.2d 808, 876 N.Y.S.2d 672 (2009), 23.06(a)

S

Sabbath v. United States, 391 U.S. 585 (1968), 23.21
S.A.C., In the Matter of the Welfare of, 529 N.W.2d 517 (Minn. App. 1995), 17.04(b)
Safford Unified School District # 1 v. Redding, 557 U.S. 364 (2009), 23.07(d), 23.15(d), 23.33, 23.34, 23.35
Sago, State v., 2013 WL 1943006 (Minn. App. 2013), 35.08
Sahr, State v., 812 N.W.2d 83 (Minn. 2012), 17.08(c)
St. Louis v. Drolet, 67 Ill. 2d 43, 364 N.E.2d 61, 7 Ill. Dec. 74 (1977), 37.03
Salamon, State v., 287 Conn. 509, 949 A.2d 1092 (2008), 23.37
Salas, United States v., 889 F.3d 681 (10th Cir. 2018), 39.02(a) Salavea, State v., 151 Wash. 2d 133, 86 P.3d 125 (2004), 17.04(a) Salerno, United States v., 481 U.S. 739 (1987), 4.15, 4.27(c)
Sales v. Harris, 675 F.2d 532 (2d Cir. 1982), 31.05
Salim, United States v., 690 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2012), 27.01
Salinas v. Texas, 570 U.S. 178 (2013), 24.24, 33.06
Salsedo, United States v., 447 F. Supp. 1235 (E.D. Cal. 1979), vacated, United States v. Torres, 622 F.2d 465 (9th Cir. 1980) (per curiam), 22.03(e), 22.03(f)
Salvucci, United States v., 448 U.S. 83 (1980), 9.12, 12.15(a), 22.05(a), 23.15(a), 23.15(e), 33.06
Sam v. State, 401 P.3d 834 (Wyo. 2017), 13.01
Sampson, United States v., 385 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2004), 18.05
Samson v. California, 547 U.S. 843 (2006), 23.02(a), 23.10
Sanabria v. United States, 437 U.S. 54 (1978), 17.03(c), 17.08(c), 35.08
Sanchez v. Hartley, 810 F.3d 750 (10th Cir. 2016), 4.28(a) Sanders, People v., 26 N.Y.3d 773, 47 N.E.3d 770, 27 N.Y.S.3d 491 (2016), 23.22(b)
Sanders, United States v., 479 F.2d 1193 (D.C. Cir. 1973), 25.03(c)
Sanders v. Jones, 2018 WL 1616961 (6th Cir. April 4, 2018), 23.07(d)
Sandridge, United States v., 863 F.3d 755 (7th Cir. 2017), 38.03(c) Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510 (1979), 35.06(f), 36.01
San Juan-Cruz, United States v., 314 F.3d 384 (9th Cir. 2002), 24.09
Santana, United States v., 427 U.S. 38 (1976), 23.07(c), 23.20
Santana v. Collazo, 714 F.2d 1172 (1st Cir. 1983), 39.07
Santiago, People v., 17 N.Y.3d 661, 958 N.E.2d 874, 934 N.Y.S.2d 746 (2011), 11.01(a), 31.05
Santiago, State v., 53 Hawai‘i 254, 492 P.2d 657 (1971), 24.23
Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971), 14.18, 14.26(c), 14.29(b)
Santos, People v., 86 N.Y.2d 869, 658 N.E.2d 1041, 635 N.Y.S.2d 168 (1995), 32.01
Sapp, People v., 98 A.D.2d 784, 469 N.Y.S.2d 803 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1983), 25.03(b)
Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania, 537 U.S. 101 (2003), 34.11(d)(2) Satterwhite v. Texas, 486 U.S. 249 (1988), 24.13(c), 37.02(a) Saulsbury, United States v., 878 F.3d 946 (10th Cir. 2017), 23.08(b), 23.08(c), 23.22(b)
Sawyer, People v., 297 Kan. 902, 305 P.3d 608 (2013), 22.05
Sawyer, State v., 297 Kan. 902, 305 P.3d 608 (2013), 20.04, 20.05
Scales, State v., 518 N.W.2d 587, 592 (Minn. 1994), 24.18
Schad v. Arizona, 501 U.S. 624 (1991), 36.05
Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253 (1984), 4.03, 4.15, 4.16, 4.17, 4.18, 4.21(d)(3), 4.27(b), 4.28(a) Schaufele, State v., 325 P.3d 1060 (Colo. 2014), 23.14
Scheffer, United States v., 523 U.S. 303 (1998), 33.04
Scher v. United States, 305 U. S. 251 (1938), 23.24
Schiro v. Farley, 510 U.S. 222 (1994), 17.08(c), 17.08(f)
Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966), 9.12, 23.14
Schmidt v. Foster, 891 F.3d 302 (7th Cir. 2018), 4.03
Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705 (1989), 36.05
Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973), 22.03(d), 23.05, 23.18(a), 24.03
Schneider v. City of Jackson, 226 S.W.3d 332 (Tenn. 2007), 9.10(c) Schowgurow v. State, 240 Md. 121, 213 A.2d 475 (1965), 21.03(b)
Schwab, United States v., 886 F.2d 509 (2d Cir. 1989), 30.07(b) Schware v. Board of Bar Examiners, 353 U.S. 232 (1957), 12.14
Schwartz, State v., 327 P.3d 1108 (N.M. App. 2014), 27.01
Scott, State v., 229 N.J. 469, 163 A.3d 325 (2017), 30.07(e)
Scott, United States v., 437 U.S. 82 (1978), 17.08(c), 35.08
Scott, United States v., 677 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2012), 30.07(a)
Scott, United States v., 284 F.3d 758 (7th Cir. 2002), 30.04(c) Scott K., In re, 24 Cal. 3d 395, 595 P.2d 105, 155 Cal. Rptr. 671 (1979), 23.18(b)
Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91 (1945), 22.03(d)
Scrotsky, State v., 39 N.J. 410, 189 A.2d 23 (1963), 23.02(a), 23.36
Scurlock, State v., 286 Or. 277, 593 P.2d 1159 (1979), 17.04(a) Szczebelek, United States v., 402 F.3d 175 (3d Cir. 2005), 23.02(a) Sealed Juvenile, United States v., 781 F.3d 747 (5th Cir. 2015), 38.03(c)
Secretary of Public Welfare v. Institutionalized Juveniles, 442 U.S. 640 (1979), 12.18
Sedaghaty, United States v., 728 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 2013), 23.17(g), 23.22(a)
See v. City of Seattle, 387 U.S. 541 (1967), 23.16, 23.29
Sell, Commonwealth v., 504 Pa. 46, 470 A.2d 457 (1983), 23.15(e)
Sellers, United States v., 784 F.3d 876 (2d Cir. 2015), 14.07
Sells v. State, 109 A.3d 568 (Del. 2015), 28.03(b) Serfass v. United States, 420 U.S. 377 (1975), 17.08(b)(1)
Serna, State v., 235 Ariz. 270, 331 P.3d 405 (2014), 23.10
Serrano, United States v., 856 F.3d 214 (3d Cir. 2017), 17.08(d)
Serrano-Acevedo, United States v., 892 F.3d 454 (1st Cir. 2018), 23.22(d), 23.37, 23.38
Sessoms v. Grounds, 776 F.3d 615 (9th Cir. 2015), 24.11(c)
Settle, State v., 122 N.H. 214, 447 A.2d 1284 (1982), 23.15(e)
Sexton v. Beaudreaux, 138 S. Ct. 2555 (2018) (per curiam), 25.02
Sgro v. United States, 287 U.S. 206 (1932), 23.17(g)
S.H., State in the Interest of, 61 N.J. 108, 293 A.2d 181 (1972), 24.04(b), 24.05(a), 24.10(b), 24.14(a)
Shaffer, People v., 129 A.D.3d 54, 7 N.Y.S.3d 708 (N.Y. App. Div. 3d Dep’t 2015), 14.07
Shaffer, People v., 483 Mich. 205, 768 N.W.2d 305 (2009), 24.24
Shannon A., In re, 60 Md. App. 399, 483 A.2d 363 (1984), 38.15
Sharp v. Rohling, 793 F.3d 1216 (10th Cir. 2015), 19.04, 24.04(c)
Sharp v. United States, 132 A.3d 161 (D.C. 2016), 23.28
Sharpe, United States v., 470 U.S. 675 (1985), 23.04(d), 23.06(a), 23.06(b), 23.06(d), 23.27
Shaw v. Wilson, 721 F.3d 908 (7th Cir. 2013), 17.06
Shaw, United States v., 707 F.3d 666 (6th Cir. 2013), 23.18(a)
Shawn M., In the Matter of, 105 Nev. 346, 775 P.2d 700 (1989) (per curiam), 35.01
Shea v. Louisiana, 470 U.S. 51 (1985), 3.19(f), 24.11(c)
Shelton v. State, 287 Ark. 322, 699 S.W.2d 728 (1985), 24.05(a), 24.05(b), 24.20(a) Sheppard v. Maxwell, 384 U.S. 333 (1966), 20.03(b)
Sheriff of Washoe County v. Vasile, 96 Nev. 5, 604 P.2d 809 (1980), 9.10(a) Shiga, People v., 6 Cal. App. 5th 22, 210 Cal. Rptr. 3d 611 (2016), 4.05
Shipley v. California, 395 U.S. 818 (1969), 23.08(a) Short, State v., 851 N.W.2d 474 (Iowa 2014), 7.09, 23.02(b)
Shuford v. Conway, 666 Fed. Appx. 811 (11th Cir. 2016), 3.18, 23.14
Shuman ex rel. Shertzer v. Penn Manor School District, 422 F.3d 141 (3d Cir. 2005), 23.34
Shurn v. Delo, 177 F.3d 662 (8th Cir. 1999), 36.11(a) Shuttlesworth v. City of Birmingham, 394 U.S. 147 (1969), 23.29
Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40 (1968), 23.04(b), 23.05, 23.06(c), 23.08(a), 23.08(d), 23.10, 23.11(b), 23.11(c), 23.37
Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505 (1961), 23.16
Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920), 23.37
Simmons, State v., 57 Wis. 2d 285, 203 N.W.2d 887 (1973), 8.13
Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968), 9.07(c), 9.12, 11.03(b), 12.15(a), 22.05(a), 22.05(b), 25.01, 25.02, 25.03(c), 33.06
Simmons v. United States, 444 A.2d 962 (D.C. 1982), 10.08(a) Simon, State v., 680 S.W.2d 346 (Mo. App. 1984), 24.09
Simpson, State v., 95 Wash. 2d 170, 622 P.2d 1199 (1980), 7.09, 23.15(e), 23.23, 23.25
Simpson v. Florida, 403 U.S. 384 (1971), 17.08(f)
Simpson v. Warren, 475 Fed. Appx. 51 (6th Cir. 2012), 36.11(a) Sims v. Engle, 619 F.2d 598 (6th Cir. 1980), 13.17
Sims v. Georgia, 389 U.S. 404 (1967), 24.03, 24.04(a), 24.05(b), 24.06
Sims v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 538 (1967), 24.04(a), 24.06, 30.02(a)(2)
Sims v. Labowitz, 877 F.3d 171 (4th Cir. 2017), 23.13
Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24 (1965), 21.02(a) Singletary v. United States, 383 A.2d 1064 (D.C. 1978), 22.03(b)
Singleton v. Commonwealth, 364 S.W.3d 97 (Ky. 2012), 23.29
Sivak v. Hardison, 658 F.3d 898 (9th Cir. 2011), 9.09(b)(5)
S.J., In re, 686 A.2d 1024 (D.C. 1996) (per curiam), 4.28(a) Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358 (2010), 20.03(b), 28.03(c) Skipper v. South Carolina, 476 U.S. 1 (1986), 34.10
Slatten, United States v., 865 F.3d 767 (D.C. Cir. 2017), 18.10(b)
Slaughter, Commonwealth v., 482 Pa. 538, 394 A.2d 453 (1978), 30.07(e)
Sloan v. State, 584 S.W.2d 461 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1978), 25.03(c)
Stockbower, State v., 79 N.J. 1, 397 A.2d 1050 (1979), 23.25
Slocum, People v. 133 A.D.3d 972, 20 N.Y.S.3d 440 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2015), 24.11(c)
Slovik v. Yates, 556 F.3d 747 (9th Cir. 2009), 30.07(c)
Smalis v. Pennsylvania, 476 U.S. 140 (1986), 17.08(c), 35.08
Smith, Commonwealth v., 470 Pa. 220, 368 A.2d 272 (1977), 23.18(a)
Smith, In re, 63 Misc. 2d 198, 310 N.Y.S.2d 617 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1970), 37.03
Smith, People v., 264 Cal. App. 2d 718, 70 Cal. Rptr. 591 (1968), 20.05
Smith, People v., 30 N.Y.3d 626, 92 N.E.3d 789, 69 N.Y.S.3d 566 (2017), 4.03
Smith, People v., 27 N.Y.3d 652, 57 N.E.3d 53, 36 N.Y.S.3d 861 (2016), 30.07(c)
Smith, People v., 122 A.D.3d 1162, 997 N.Y.S.2d 534 (N.Y. App. Div., 3d Dep’t 2014), 25.03(c)
Smith, State v., 203 Neb. 64, 277 N.W.2d 441 (1979), 24.04(c)
Smith, State v., 286 Kan. 402, 184 P.3d 890 (2008), 23.12, 23.28
Smith, State v., 317 N.C. 100, 343 S.E.2d 518 (1986), 24.14(b)
Smith, State v., 418 S.W.3d 38 (Tenn. 2013), 27.05(a)(2)
Smith, State v., 675 P.2d 521 (Utah 1983), 32.02
Smith, United States v., 794 F.3d 681 (7th Cir. 2015), 23.04(b)
Smith v. Black, 904 F.2d 950 (5th Cir. 1990), ruling on another issue vacated, 503 U.S. 930 (1992), 9.09(a) Smith v. Cain, 565 U.S. 73 (2012), 9.09(a) Smith v. Curry, 580 F.3d 1071 (9th Cir. 2009), 36.16
Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 443 U.S. 97 (1979), 27.08
Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374 (1969), 15.04(b)
Smith v. Illinois, 469 U.S. 91 (1984), 3.06, 3.19(f), 22.03(d), 24.11(a), 24.11(c)
Smith v. Illinois, 390 U.S. 129 (1968), 13.05(a), 31.01(a), 38.20
Smith v. Massachusetts, 543 U.S. 462 (2005), 17.08(c), 32.02, 35.08
Smith v. Phillips, 455 U.S. 209 (1982), 9.09(a), 27.05(a), 28.03(a), 37.02(a)
Smith v. State, 484 So. 2d 560 (Ala. Crim. App. 1986), 2.03, 14.01, 24.10
Smith v. State, 918 A.2d 1144 (Del. 2007), 24.10(b)
Smith v. State, 388 Md. 468, 880 A.2d 288 (2005), 33.02(b)
Smith v. United States, 133 S. Ct. 714 (2013), 35.05
Smith v. United States, 431 U.S. 291 (1977), 28.03(c)
Smith v. United States, 344 F.2d 545 (D.C. Cir. 1965), 23.37
Smith v. United States, 309 F.2d 165 (9th Cir. 1962), 14.29(b)
Smith v. United States, 709 A.2d 78 (D.C. 1998) (en banc), 36.06
Snapp, State v., 174 Wash. 2d 177, 275 P.3d 289 (2012), 23.26
Snell, State v., 142 N.M. 452, 166 P.3d 1106 (N.M. App. 2007), 24.08(a) Snyder, Commonwealth v., 413 Mass. 521, 597 N.E.2d 1363 (1992), 23.35
Snyder v. Louisiana, 552 U.S. 472 (2008), 28.03(b)
Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97 (1934), 9.09(b)(7), 27.01
Sobol v. Perez, 289 F. Supp. 392 (E.D. La. 1968), 17.01
Sochor v. Florida, 504 U.S. 527 (1992), 37.02(a) Sokolow, United States v., 490 U.S. 1 (1989), 23.06(a), 23.09
Solberg v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. 3d 182, 561 P.2d 1148, 137 Cal. Rptr. 460 (1977), 22.05
Solem v. Stumes, 465 U.S. 638 (1984), 22.03(d)
Solesbee v. Balkcom, 339 U.S. 9 (1950), 13.05(b)
Somers, United States v., 496 F.2d 723 (3d Cir. 1974), 29.02
Soo Park v. Thompson, 851 F.3d 910 (9th Cir. 2017), 8.13, 9.09(b)(6)
Sotelo-Urena, People v., 4 Cal. App. 5th 732, 209 Cal. Rptr. 3d 259 (2016), 11.01(b)
Soto-Zuniga, United States v., 837 F.3d 992 (9th Cir. 2016), 9.07(c)
South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976), 23.24, 23.25
Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959), 24.03, 24.04(b), 24.04(d), 24.05(b), 24.05(d)
Spare, State v., 374 S.C. 264, 647 S.E.2d 706 (S.C. App. 2007) , 38.03(c) Sparklin, State v., 296 Or. 85, 672 P.2d 1182 (1983), 24.13(a) Sparks, State v., 336 Or. 298, 83 P.3d 304 (2004), 30.03(a) Spaziano v. Florida, 468 U.S. 447 (1984), 12.15(a), 36.05
Specht v. Patterson, 386 U.S. 605 (1967), 13.05(b), 38.17(b), 38.24
Speed, State v., 265 Kan. 26, 961 P.2d 13 (1998), 27.08
Speed v. United States, 562 A.2d 124 (D.C. 1989), 35.05
Speights, United States v., 557 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1977), 23.35
Spencer, In re, 63 Cal. 2d 400, 406 P.2d 33, 46 Cal. Rptr. 753 (1965), 12.15(b)
Spencer, People v., 60 Cal. 2d 64, 383 P.2d 134, 31 Cal. Rptr. 782 (1963), 12.15(b)
Spencer v. Kemp, 781 F.2d 1458 (11th Cir. 1986), 7.05
Spencer v. Texas, 385 U.S. 554 (1967), 12.15(a) Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969), 23.17(a), 23.32(a), 23.32(b), 23.32(c)
S.S.E., In the Matter of the Welfare of, 629 N.W.2d 456 (Minn. App. 2001), 30.07(b)
Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1 (1951), 4.27(c)
Staley, In re, 67 Ill. 2d 33, 364 N.E.2d 72, 7 Ill. Dec. 85 (1977), 27.01
Standefer v. United States, 447 U.S. 10 (1980), 9.11, 36.01
Stanford v. Texas, 379 U.S. 476 (1965), 23.17(f)
Stano v. State, 473 So. 2d 1282 (Fla. 1985), 24.21
Stansbury v. California, 511 U.S. 318 (1994) (per curiam), 3.06, 24.08(a) Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3 (2013) (per curiam), 23.20
Stapelkemper, In the Matter of, 172 Mont. 192, 562 P.2d 815 (1977), 12.21
State, Village of Eden Prairie v. Housman, 288 Minn. 546, 180 N.W.2d 251 (1970), 15.03
State v. Acker, 133 Hawai‘i 253, 327 P.3d 931 (2014), 31.02
State v. Acker, 871 N.W.2d 603 (N.D. 2015), 30.03(c)
State v. Aguirre, 301 Kan. 950, 349 P.3d 1245 (2015), 24.11(b), 24.20(b)
State v. Albano, 67 Haw. 398, 688 P.2d 1152 (1984), 14.29(b)
State v. Al-Bayyinah, 356 N.C. 150, 567 S.E.2d 120 (2002), 25.03(c)
State v. Albino, 312 Conn. 763, 97 A.3d 478 (2014), 36.11(a) State v. Alvarez, 318 N.J. Super. 137, 723 A.2d 91 (1999), 30.02(b)
State v. Anders, 331 S.C. 474, 503 S.E.2d 443 (1998), 30.06(a) State v. Antonio T., 352 P.3d 1172 (N.M. 2015), 24.12
State v. Aryanwv, 681 N.W.2d 411 (Minn. App. 2004), 14.05
State v. Asherman, 193 Conn. 695, 478 A.2d 227 (1984), 9.09(b)(7)
State v. Avery, 80 Wis. 2d 305, 259 N.W.2d 63 (1977), 13.04
State v. Baca, 97 N.M. 379, 640 P.2d 485 (1982), 23.32(c)
State v. Ballard, 190 N.J. 270, 920 A.2d 80 (2005), 17.01
State v. Banjoman, 178 W. Va. 311, 359 S.E.2d 331 (1987), 33.20
State v. Banks-Harvey, 152 Ohio St. 3d 368, 96 N.E.3d 262 (2018), 23.08(c), 23.38
State v. Barker, 149 Ohio St. 3d 1, 73 N.E.3d 365 (2016), 24.18

1208
State v. Beasley, 152 Ohio St. 3d 470, 97 N.E.3d 474 (2018), 14.22(a) State v. Becker, 74 Wis. 2d 675, 247 N.W.2d 495 (1976), 13.04, 17.04(a) State v. Bell, 287 N.C. 248, 214 S.E.2d 53 (1975), 28.03(c)
State v. Beno, 116 Wis. 2d 122, 341 N.W.2d 668 (1984), 10.04
State v. Benoit, 126 N.H. 6, 490 A.2d 295 (1985), 24.09, 24.10(b)
State v. Berget, 826 N.W.2d 1 (S.D. 2013), 12.15(a) State v. Betts, 194 Vt. 212, 75 A.3d 629 (2013), 23.18(a), 23.32(b)
State v. Bird, 308 Mont. 75, 43 P.3d 266 (2002), 27.01
State v. Blair, 691 S.W.2d 259 (Mo. 1985), 23.07(d), 24.19
State v. Bond, 237 Wis. 2d 633, 614 N.W.2d 552 (2000), 24.08(b)
State v. Bowman, 588 A.2d 728 (Maine 1991), 17.05
State v. Boyd, 275 Kan. 271, 64 P.3d 419 (2003), 22.03(d)
State v. Boyd, 271 Or. 558, 533 P.2d 795 (1975), 17.08(b)(2)
State v. Boyken, 217 N.W.2d 218 (Iowa 1974), 36.06
State v. Boykins, 173 W. Va. 761, 320 S.E.2d 134 (1984), 25.03(b)
State v. Brazeal, 247 Or. 611, 431 P.2d 840 (1967), 36.03
State v. Broadnax, 98 Wash. 2d 289, 654 P.2d 96 (1982), 23.22(c)
State v. Brooks, 304 S.W.3d 130 (Mo. 2010), 24.24
State v. Brooks, 193 Vt. 461, 70 A.3d 1014 (2013), 24.08(b)
State v. Brown, 286 Kan. 170, 182 P.3d 1205 (2008), 24.04(c), 24.06
State v. Brown, 879 So. 2d 1276 (La. 2004), 21.01
State v. Bruce, 655 S.W.2d 66 (Mo. App. 1983), 5.03(a)
State v. Brumbach, 273 Or. App. 552, 359 P.3d 490 (2015), 30.03(c), 30.07(a) State v. Buckalew, 561 P.2d 289 (Alaska 1977), 14.05
State v. Budd, 185 Wash. 2d 566, 374 P.3d 137 (2016), 23.18(a) State v. Burgess, 156 N.H. 746, 943 A.2d 727 (2008), 38.05(a), 38.16(b), 38.26
State v. Butler, 232 Ariz. 84, 302 P.3d 609 (2013), 23.18(a) State v. Cable, 51 So. 3d 434 (Fla. 2010), 23.21
State v. Caffrey, 332 N.W.2d 269 (S.D. 1983), 24.04(d), 24.05(a) State v. Campbell, 300 P.3d 72 (Kan. 2013), 23.20
State v. Candelaria, 144 N.M. 797, 192 P.3d 792 (N.M. App. 2008), 15.03
State v. Carrawell, 481 S.W.3d 833 (Mo. 2016), 22.03(d), 23.08(b)
State v. Carrillo, 156 Ariz. 125, 750 P.2d 883 (1988), 24.05
State v. Carter, 412 A.2d 56 (Me. 1980), 22.03(d)
State v. Carter, 16 S.W.3d 762 (Tenn. 2000), 4.28(a) State v. Casal, 103 Wash. 2d 812, 699 P.2d 1234 (1985), 9.10(a) State v. Castagnola, 145 Ohio St. 3d 1, 46 N.E.3d 638 (2015), 23.17(a), 23.17(f)
State v. Ceballos, 266 Conn. 364, 832 A.2d 14 (2003), 36.11(a) State v. Chelette, 558 So. 2d 770 (La. App. 1990), 38.03(c)
State v. Chapman, 209 Mont. 57, 679 P.2d 1210 (1984), 9.10(a) State v. Chrisman, 100 Wash. 2d 814, 676 P.2d 419 (1984), 23.19
State v. Chute, 908 N.W.2d 578 (Minn. 2018), 23.15(c)
State v. Clark, 364 S.W.3d 540 (Mo. 2012), 30.07(c), 31.03
State v. Clawson, 270 S.E.2d 659 (W. Va. 1980), 24.13(a) State v. Coles, 218 N.J. 322, 95 A.3d 136 (2014), 23.06(a), 23.18(b)
State v. Colvard, 296 Ga. 381, 768 S.E.2d 473 (2015), 23.18(b)
State v. Conn, 278 Kan. 387, 99 P.3d 1108 (2003), 23.08(a) State v. Connor, 292 Conn. 483, 973 A.2d 627 (2009), 4.05
State v. Cordova, 109 N.M. 211, 784 P.2d 30 (1989), 7.09
State v. Crane, 329 P.3d 689 (N.M. 2014), 23.15(d)
State v. Crank, 105 Utah 332, 142 P.2d 178 (1943), 24.16
State v. Curlew, 459 A.2d 160 (Me. 1983), 24.21
State v. Curry, 988 S.W.2d 153 (Tenn. 1999), 19.04
State v. Dahl, 874 N.W.2d 348 (Iowa 2016), 11.03(b), 12.24
State v. Daniel, 589 P.2d 408 (Alaska 1979), 23.25
State v. Daniels, 182 N.J. 80, 861 A.2d 808 (2004), 10.10
State v. Daugherty, 94 Wash. 2d 263, 616 P.2d 649 (1980), 23.15(c)
State v. Davis, 155 Vt. 417, 584 A.2d 1146 (1990), 14.05
State v. DeCristofaro, 102 R.I. 193, 229 A.2d 613 (1967), 31.01(a) State v. Deffenbaugh, 217 Kan. 469, 536 P.2d 1030 (1975), 30.07(c)
State v. Dent, 123 Wash. 2d 467, 869 P.2d 392 (1994), 35.03
State v. D.H., 340 So. 2d 1163 (Fla. 1976), 17.04(b)
State v. Diamond, 905 N.W.2d 870 (Minn. 2018), 9.12
State v. Dickson, 322 Conn. 410, 141 A.3d 810 (2016), 25.01, 25.05(a) State v. Dineen, 296 N.W.2d 421 (Minn. 1980), 23.13
State v. Discoe, 334 N.W.2d 466 (N.D. 1983), 24.05(c)
State v. Dixon, 967 A.2d 1114 (Vt. 2008), 13.11
State v. Doe, 149 Idaho 353, 233 P.3d 1275 (2010), 38.03(c)
State v. Doe, 104 N.M. 107, 717 P.2d 83 (N.M. App. 1986), 39.04
State v. Dubose, 285 Wis. 2d 143, 699 N.W.2d 582 (2005), 11.01(b), 25.02
State v. Earls, 214 N.J. 564, 70 A.3d 630 (2013), 23.15(d)
State v. Easter, 130 Wash. 2d 228, 922 P.2d 1285 (1996), 24.24
State v. Edwards, 98 Wis. 2d 367, 297 N.W.2d 12 (1980), 22.03(d)
State v. Ehtesham, 309 S.E.2d 82 (W. Va. 1983), 22.03(e) State v. Ellington, 151 Idaho 53, 253 P.3d 727 (2011), 37.02(c)
State v. Espinoza, 112 Wash. 2d 819, 774 P.2d 1177 (1989), 20.05
State v. Ess, 453 S.W.3d 196 (Mo. 2015), 37.02(a) State v. Farris, 109 Ohio St. 3d 519, 849 N.E.2d 985 (2006), 24.20(e) State v. Faucher, 227 Wis. 2d 700, 596 N.W.2d 770 (1999), 28.03(a) State v. Fernandez, 712 So. 2d 485 (La. 1998), 24.14(a) State v. Fernow, 328 S.W.3d 429 (Mo. App. 2010), 17.03(a) State v. Florez, 134 N.J. 570, 636 A.2d 1040 (1994), 9.10(a) State v. Foldesi, 131 Idaho 778, 963 P.2d 1215 (Idaho App. 1998), 23.23
State v. Franklin, 174 W. Va. 469, 327 S.E.2d 449 (1985), 27.08
State v. Frei, 831 N.W.2d 70 (Iowa 2013), partially overruled on an unrelated point in Alcala v. Marriott International, Inc., 880 N.W.2d 699 (Iowa 2016), 36.06
State v. Freshment, 309 Mont. 154, 43 P.3d 968 (2002), 18.05
State v. Garcia, 301 P.3d 658 (Kan. 2013), 24.04(b)
State v. Garcia, 18 P.3d 1123 (Utah App. 2001), 35.05
State v. Gardner, 135 Ohio St. 3d 99, 984 N.E.2d 1025 (2012), 23.31
State v. Gaskins, 866 N.W.2d 1 (Iowa 2015), 23.08(b)
State v. Gaston, 192 Wash. App. 1032, 2016 WL 398317 (2016), 7.03(c)
State v. George Anthony W., 200 W. Va. 86, 488 S.E.2d 361 (1996), 24.15
State v. Gill, 755 N.W.2d 454 (N.D. 2008), 23.16
State v. Gilroy, 313 N.W.2d 513 (Iowa 1981), 5.03(a) State v. Girard, 34 Or. App. 85, 578 P.2d 415 (1978), 36.03
State v. Glass, 583 P.2d 872 (Alaska 1978), 7.09
State v. Gleason, 404 A.2d 573 (Me. 1979), 4.15
State v. Graham, 277 Ark. 465, 642 S.W.2d 880 (1982), 24.05(b)
State v. Granville, 423 S.W.3d 399 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014), 23.08(c)
State v. Grenz, 243 N.W.2d 375 (N.D. 1976), 13.07, 13.19
State v. Griffin, 273 Conn. 266, 869 A.2d 640 (2005), 24.10(b)
State v. Guido, 40 N.J. 191, 191 A.2d 45 (1963), 31.14
State v. Guilbert, 306 Conn. 218, 49 A.3d 705 (2012), 11.01(a), 11.01(b)
State v. Gumm, 73 Ohio St. 3d 413, 653 N.E.2d 253 (1995), 29.03(a) State v. Hager, 271 N.W.2d 476 (N.D. 1978), 27.12(c)
State v. Halverson, 192 N.W.2d 765 (Iowa 1971), 13.07
State v. Hand, 149 Ohio St. 3d 94, 73 N.E.3d 448 (2016), 21.01
State v. Hankins, 155 So. 3d 1043 (Ala. Crim. App. 2011), 17.03(a) State v. Harris, 229 Wis. 2d 832, 601 N.W.2d 682 (Wis. App. 1999), 27.01
State v. Harrison, 805 S.W.2d 251, 511 A.2d 80 (1986), 24.20(b)
State v. Head, 136 Wash. 2d 619, 964 P.2d 1187 (1998), 35.08
State v. Heald, 314 A.2d 820 (Me. 1973), 22.03(d)
State v. Hembree, 368 N.C. 2, 770 S.E.2d 77 (2015), 30.07(a) State v. Henderson, 116 Ariz. 310, 569 P.2d 252 (1977), 25.03(b)
State v. Henderson, 289 Neb. 271, 854 N.W.2d 616 (2014), 23.17(f)
State v. Henderson, 208 N.J. 208, 27 A.3d 872 (2011), 11.01(a), 25.02
State v. Herem, 384 N.W.2d 880 (Minn. 1986), 24.10(b)
State v. Herndon, 215 S.W.3d 901 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007), 37.02(d)
State v. Hibl, 290 Wis. 2d 595, 714 N.W.2d 194 (2006), 25.05
State v. Hicks, 768 S.E.2d 373 (N.C. App. 2015), 36.06
State v. Hill, 199 N.J. 545, 974 A.2d 403 (2009), 10.08(a) State v. Hillard, 421 So. 2d 220 (La. 1982), 30.07(c)
State v. Hilliard, 318 S.E.2d 35 (W. Va. 1983), 24.04(a) State v. Hines, 173 Wis. 2d 850, 496 N.W.2d 720 (1993), 36.14
State v. Hogan, 297 Minn. 430, 212 N.W.2d 664 (1973), 24.14(a) State v. Hoggins, 718 So. 2d 761 (Fla. 1998), 24.24
State v. Hopkins, 108 Ariz. 210, 495 P.2d 440 (1972), 36.03
State v. Howard, 825 N.W.2d 32 (Iowa 2012), 24.04(c)
State v. Howe, 129 N.H. 120, 523 A.2d 94 (1987), 22.03(d)
State v. Huddleston, 924 S.W.2d 666 (Tenn. 1996), 4.28(a), 24.15
State v. Huebler, 275 P.3d 91 (Nev. 2012), 9.09(a) State v. Humphries, 181 Wash. 2d 708, 336 P.3d 1121 (2014), 2.03
State v. Hunsberger, 418 S.C. 335, 794 S.E.2d 368 (2016), 15.04(b)
State v. Ibarra, 953 S.W.2d 242 (Tex. Crim. App. 1997), 22.03(d)
State v. Irby, 170 Wash. 2d 874, 246 P.3d 796 (2011), 27.01
State v. Ireland, 11 Or. App. 264, 500 P.2d 1231 (1972), 9.09(b)(5)
State v. Ish, 170 Wash. 2d 189, 241 P.3d 389 (2010), 31.13, 36.11(a) State v. I.T., 4 N.E.3d 1139 (Ind. 2014), 12.15(a) State v. Jabbaar, 991 N.E.2d 290 (Ohio App. 2013), 14.05
State v. Jackson, 239 Conn. 629, 687 A.2d 485 (1997), 9.10(a) State v. Jackson, 878 N.W.2d 422 (Iowa 2016), 23.18(b)
State v. Jackson, 454 So. 2d 398 (La. App. 1984), 25.03(c)
State v. Jackson, 742 N.W.2d 163 (Minn. 2007), 23.16
State v. Jackson, 102 Wash. 2d 432, 688 P.2d 136 (1984), 23.32(a) State v. Jacumin, 778 S.W.2d 430 (Tenn. 1999), 7.09
State v. Jasper, 174 Wash. 2d 96, 271 P.3d 876 (2012), 30.04(c)
State v. Jean-Paul, 295 P.3d 1072 (N.M. App. 2013), 23.21
State v. Jensen, 147 Wis. 2d 240, 432 N.W.2d 913 (1988), 36.14
State v. J.M., 182 N.J. 402, 866 A.2d 178 (2005), 13.05(b), 13.07
State v. Johnson, 312 Conn. 687, 94 A.3d 1173 (2014), 25.05, 25.08
State v. Johnson, 255 Neb. 865, 587 N.W.2d 546 (1998), 31.01(a) State v. Jones, 706 P.2d 317 (Alaska 1985), 7.09
State v. Jones, 666 N.W.2d 142 (Iowa 2003), 23.35
State v. Jones, 521 N.W.2d 662 (S.D. 1994), 15.04(b)
State v. Jones, 450 S.W.3d 866 (Tenn. 2014), 30.07(a) State v. Juranek, 287 Neb. 846, 844 N.W.2d 791 (2014), 24.08(b)
State v. Kahinu, 53 Hawai‘i 536, 498 P.2d 635 (1972), 31.02
State v. K.C., 207 So.3d 951 (Fla. App. 2016), 23.08(b), 23.13, 23.15(d)
State v. Kennedy, 846 N.W.2d 517 (Iowa 2014), 30.04(c)
State v. Kido, 102 Hawai‘i 369, 76 P.3d 612 (Hawai‘i App. 2003), 10.10
State v. King, 300 P.3d 732 (N.M. 2013), 24.11(a)
State v. Kinn, 288 Minn. 31, 178 N.W.2d 888 (1970), partially overruled on an unrelated point in State v. Herem, 384 N.W.2d 880 (Minn. 1986), 24.10(b)
State v. Klein, 156 Wash. 2d 103, 124 P.3d 644 (2005), 12.23
State v. Klessig, 211 Wis. 2d 194, 564 N.W.2d 716 (1997), 4.05
State v. Kline, 717 S.W.2d 849 (Mo. App. 1986), 17.03(a) State v. Knapp, 285 Wis. 2d 86, 700 N.W.2d 899 (2005), 24.20
State v. Kooima, 833 N.W.2d 202 (Iowa 2013), 23.28, 23.32(a) State v. Kruse, 306 S.W.3d 603 (Mo. App. 2010), 23.15(c), 23.22(b)
State v. Lamay, 140 Idaho 835, 103 P.3d 448 (2004), 23.08(b)
State v. Lamb, 321 N.C. 633, 365 S.E.2d 600 (1988), 7.03(c)
State v. Larrieviere, 527 A.2d 648 (R.I. 1987), 7.03(c)
State v. Larson, 941 S.W.2d 847 (Mo. App. 1997), 9.07(a) State v. Latham, 30 Wash. App. 776, 638 P.2d 592 (1982), 7.03(c)
State v. Lavalleur, 289 Neb. 102, 853 N.W.2d 203 (2014), 31.06
State v. Lawley, 91 Wash. 2d 654, 591 P.2d 772 (1979), 21.01 State v. Lawrence, 344 N.W.2d 227 (Iowa 1984), partially overruled on an unrelated point in State v. Liddell, 672 N.W.2d 805 (Iowa 2003), 20.05
State v. Lawson, 352 Or. 724, 291 P.3d 673 (2012), 25.02, 25.08
State v. Lee, 298 Ga. 388, 782 S.E.2d 249 (2016), 2.03
State v. Lee, 190 N.J. 270, 920 A.2d 80 (2007), 17.01
State v. Lenarz, 301 Conn. 417, 22 A.3d 536 (2011), 24.17
State v. Levy, 156 Wash. 2d 709, 132 P.3d 1076 (2006), 36.03
State v. Liddell, 672 N.W.2d 805 (Iowa 2003), 20.05, 21.02(a) State v. Locke, 90 S.W.3d 663 (Tenn. 2002), 36.05
State v. Lockwood, 43 Or. App. 639, 603 P.2d 1231 (1979), 36.06
State v. Lopez, 271 Conn. 724, 859 A.2d 898 (2004), 27.01
State v. Lopez, 907 N.W.2d 112 (Iowa 2018), 17.03(a), 32.01
State v. Lozada, 357 N.J. Super. 468, 815 A.2d 1002 (2003), 18.05
State v. Luby, 904 N.W.2d 453 (Minn. 2017), 2.03
State v. Lyle, 854 N.W.2d 378 (Iowa 2014), 13.01
State v. Mallory, 270 S.C. 519, 242 S.E.2d 693 (1978), 30.07(b)
State v. Maltese, 222 N.J. 525, 120 A.3d 197 (2015), 24.11(a) State v. Marshall, 882 N.W.2d 68 (Iowa 2016), 24.13
State v. Martin, 145 N.H. 362, 761 A.2d 516 (2000), 22.03(d)
State v. Martinez, 319 Conn. 712, 127 A.3d 164 (2015), 7.03(c)
State v. Martinez, 124 N.M. 721, 954 P.2d 1198 (N.M. App. 1998), 9.07(b)
State v. Matafeo, 71 Haw. 183, 787 P.2d 671 (1990), 9.09(b)(7)
State v. Matthews, 6 Wash. App. 201, 492 P.2d 1076 (1971), 30.07(b)
State v. McCarthy, 156 Vt. 148, 589 A.2d 869 (1991), 30.07(a) State v. McCullum, 98 Wash. 2d 484, 656 P.2d 1064 (1983), 35.05
State v. McMahon, 94 So. 3d 468 (Fla. 2012), 14.05
State v. McFee, 721 N.W.2d 607 (Minn. 2006), 14.07
State v. McGriff, 76 Hawai‘i 148, 871 P.2d 782 (1994), 30.04(a) State v. McKenna, 166 N.H. 671, 103 A.3d 756 (2014), 24.08(a) State v. McKnight, 131 Hawai‘i 379, 319 P.3d 298 (2013), 24.11(c)
State v. Medina, 147 N.J. 43, 685 A.2d 1242 (1996), 36.06
State v. Melcher, 140 N.H. 823, 678 A.2d 146 (1996), 30.07(a) State v. Meneese, 174 Wash. 2d 937, 282 P.3d 83 (2012), 23.33
State v. Mershon, 43 Wash. App. 132, 715 P.2d 1156 (1986), 17.08(h)
State v. Meyer, 78 Hawai‘i 308, 893 P.2d 159 (1995), 23.22(b)
State v. Mikulewicz, 462 A.2d 497 (Me. 1983), 24.05(c)
State v. Miller, 159 N.C. App. 608, 583 S.E.2d 620 (2003), aff’d per curiam, 358 N.C. 133, 591 S.E.2d 520 (2004) (mem.), 17.03(a) State v. Miller, 2016 WL 1244403 (S.C. 2016), 23.17
State v. Mills, 354 Or. 350, 312 P.3d 515 (2013), 35.03
State v. M.L.C., 933 P.2d 497 (Me. 1997), 4.15
State v. Mobley, 240 N.C. 476, 83 S.E.2d 100 (1954), 23.07(a) State v. Mohi, 901 P.2d 991 (Utah 1995), 13.01
State v. Montgomery, 39 So. 3d 252 (Fla. 2010), 36.05
State v. Montoya, 333 P.3d 935 (N.M. 2014), 31.06
State v. Moore, 321 N.C. 327, 364 S.E.2d 648 (1988), 11.03(a) State v. Moore, 149 Ohio St. 3d 557, 76 N.E.3d 1127 (2016), 13.01
State v. Moore, 334 Or. 328, 49 P.3d 785 (2002), 30.04(a) State v. Munoz, 126 N.M. 535, 972 P.2d 847 (N.M. 1998), 24.08(a)
State v. Munroe, 244 Wis. 2d 1, 630 N.W.2d 223 (Wis. App. 2001), 23.39
State v. Murray, 469 S.W.3d 921 (Mo. App. 2015), 4.05
State v. Murtagh, 169 P.3d 602 (Alaska 2007), 8.13
State v. Nakamitsu, 140 Hawai‘i 157, 398 P.3d 746 (2017), 7.03(c), 14.05
State v. Nakamitsu, 138 Hawai‘i 51, 375 P.3d 1289 (Table) (Hawai‘i App. 2016), ruling on other issues aff’d, 140 Hawai‘i 157, 398 P.3d 746 (2017), 7.03(c)
State v. Navarette, 294 P.3d 435 (N.M. 2013), 30.04(c)
State v. Noel, 236 W. Va. 335, 779 S.E.2d 877 (2015), 23.25
State v. Nofoa, 135 Hawai‘i 220, 349 P.3d 327 (2015), 30.04(c)
State v. Null, 836 N.W.2d 41 (Iowa 2013), 13.01
State v. Ochoa, 792 N.W.2d 260 (Iowa 2010), 23.10, 23.15(b)
State v. Ofield, 635 S.W.2d 73 (Mo. App. 1982), 31.03
State v. Oliveira, 961 A.2d 299 (R.I. 2008), 24.13(b)
State v. Opperman, 247 N.W.2d 673 (S.D. 1976), 23.25
State v. Oquendo, 223 Conn. 635, 613 A.2d 1300 (1992), 23.13
State v. Ostrem, 535 N.W.2d 916 (Minn. 1995), 25.03(c)
State v. Pablo R., 139 N.M. 744, 137 P.3d 1198 (N.M. App. 2006), 23.33
State v. Parker, 399 So. 2d 24 (Fla. App. 1981), review denied, 408 So. 2d 1095 (Fla. 1981), 23.15(c)
State v. Parker, 391 S.C. 606, 707 S.E.2d 799 (2011), 17.08(e), 34.11(d)(1)
State v. Peoples, 240 Ariz. 244, 378 P.3d 421 (2016), 23.15(d)
State v. Perez, 322 P.3d 624 (Utah 2013), 11.01(a), 24.22
State v. Perea, 183 W.Va. 686, 398 S.E.2d 512 (1990), 33.25
State v. Peterson, 525 S.W.2d 599 (Mo. App. 1975), 23.18(b)
State v. Phinney, 235 Neb. 486, 455 N.W.2d 795 (1990), 13.18
State v. Plain, 898 N.W.2d 801 (Iowa 2017), 21.03(b), 30.07(a) State v. Polk, 812 N.W.2d 670 (Iowa 2012), 24.04(c)
State v. Prieto, 366 Wis. 2d 794, 876 N.W.2d 154 (Wis. App. 2015), 9.07(b)
State v. Privott, 203 N.J. 16, 999 A.2d 415 (2010), 23.10
State v. Q.D., 102 Wash. 2d 19, 685 P.2d 557 (1984), 17.04(b)
State v. Quinn, 64 Md. App. 668, 498 A.2d 676 (1985), 24.11(c)
State v. Rees, 748 A.2d 976 (Me. 2000), 24.03
State v. Reid, 194 N.J. 386, 945 A.2d 26 (2008), 23.15(d)
State v. Richardson, 210 Wis. 2d 694, 563 N.W.2d 899 (1997), 30.03(a) State v. Rivenbark, 311 Md. 147, 533 A.2d 271 (1987), 30.06(a) State v. Rivera, 268 Conn. 351, 844 A.2d 191 (2004), 30.04(c)
State v. Roach, 234 Neb. 620, 452 N.W.2d 262 (1990), 23.08(b)
State v. Robinson, 6 Ariz. App. 424, 433 P.2d 75 (1967), 23.07(a) State v. Robinson, 185 Vt. 232, 969 A.2d 127 (2009), 23.32(b)
State v. Rockford, 213 N.J. 424, 64 A.3d 514 (2013), 23.21
State v. Rodrigues, 128 Hawai’i 200, 286 P.3d 809 (2012), 23.38
State v. Rogerson, 855 N.W.2d 495 (Iowa 2014), 27.01
State v. Rose, 112 N.J. 454, 548 A.2d 1058 (1988), 27.08
State v. Roseborough, 2010 WL 1694531 (Ohio App. 2010), 11.02
State v. Rushton, 260 Or. App. 765, 320 P.3d 672 (2014), 7.03(c)
State v. Ryce, 368 P.3d 342 (Kan. 2016), 23.14
State v. Sago, 2013 WL 1943006 (Minn. App. 2013), 35.08
State v. Sahr, 812 N.W.2d 83 (Minn. 2012), 17.08(c)
State v. Salamon, 287 Conn. 509, 949 A.2d 1092 (2008), 23.37
State v. Salas, 408 P.3d 383 (Wash. App. 2018), 36.11(a) State v. Salavea, 151 Wash. 2d 133, 86 P.3d 125 (2004), 17.04(a) State v. Sawyer, 297 Kan. 902, 305 P.3d 608 (2013), 20.04, 20.05
State v. Scales, 518 N.W.2d 587, 592 (Minn. 1994), 24.18
State v. Schaufele, 325 P.3d 1060 (Colo. 2014), 23.14
State v. Schwartz, 327 P.3d 1108 (N.M. App. 2014), 27.01
State v. Scott, 229 N.J. 469, 163 A.3d 325 (2017), 30.07(e) State v. Scrotsky, 39 N.J. 410, 189 A.2d 23 (1963), 23.02(a), 23.36
State v. Scurlock, 286 Or. 277, 593 P.2d 1159 (1979), 17.04(a) State v. Serna, 235 Ariz. 270, 331 P.3d 405 (2014), 23.10
State v. Short, 851 N.W.2d 474 (Iowa 2014), 7.09, 23.02(b)
State v. Simmons, 57 Wis. 2d 285, 203 N.W.2d 887 (1973), 8.13
State v. Simon, 680 S.W.2d 346 (Mo. App. 1984), 24.09
State v. Simpson, 95 Wash. 2d 170, 622 P.2d 1199 (1980), 7.09, 23.15(e), 23.23, 23.25
State v. Stockbower, 79 N.J. 1, 397 A.2d 1050 (1979), 23.25
State v. Small, 162 Ohio App.3d 375, 833 N.E.2d 774 (2005), 14.29(b)
State v. Smith, 286 Kan. 402, 184 P.3d 890 (2008), 23.12, 23.28
State v. Smith, 203 Neb. 64, 277 N.W.2d 441 (1979), 24.04(c)
State v. Smith, 317 N.C. 100, 343 S.E.2d 518 (1986), 24.14(b)
State v. Smith, 418 S.W.3d 38 (Tenn. 2013), 27.05(a)(2)
State v. Smith, 675 P.2d 521 (Utah 1983), 32.02
State v. Snapp, 174 Wash. 2d 177, 275 P.3d 289 (2012), 23.26
State v. Snell, 142 N.M. 452, 166 P.3d 1106 (N.M. App. 2007), 24.08(a)
State v. Spare, 374 S.C. 264, 647 S.E.2d 706 (S.C. App. 2007), 38.03(c)
State v. Sparklin, 296 Or. 85, 672 P.2d 1182 (1983), 24.13(a) State v. Sparks, 336 Or. 298, 83 P.3d 304 (2004), 30.03(a) State v. Stigger, 2006 WL 2194507 (N.J. Super. 2006), 27.05(a)(2)
State v. Stock, 140 N.M. 676, 147 P.3d 885 (N.M. App. 2006), 15.04(b)
State v. Stoddard, 206 Conn. 157, 537 A.2d 446 (1988), 7.09, 24.13(a) State v. Stuart, 279 Wis. 2d 659, 695 N.W.2d 259 (2005), 30.04(c)
State v. Stukes, 416 S.C. 493, 787 S.E.2d 480 (2016), 36.03
State v. Sugar, 84 N.J. 1, 417 A.2d 474 (1980), 24.17
State v. Summers, 506 S.W.2d 67 (Mo. App. 1974), 31.03
State v. Swaney, 787 N.W.2d 541 (Minn. 2010), 30.04(c)
State v. Swanson, 707 N.W.2d 645 (Minn. 2006), 10.10
State v. Sweet, 879 N.W.2d 811 (Iowa 2016), 13.01
State v. Talkington, 301 Kan. 453, 345 P.3d 258 (2015), 23.15(b)
State v. Teamer, 151 So. 3d 421 (Fla. 2014), 23.09, 23.27
State v. Terrell, 283 N.W.2d 529 (Minn. 1979), 22.03(e) State v. Thaden, 210 Neb. 622, 316 N.W.2d 317 (1982), 31.01(a) State v. Thamer, 777 P.2d 432 (Utah 1989), 25.02
State v. Thomas, 878 S.W.2d 76 (Mo. App. 1994), 30.07(b)
State v. Thomas, 536 S.W.2d 529 (Mo. App. 1976), 30.07(e) State v. Thomas, 152 Ohio St. 3d 15, 92 N.E.3d 821 (2017), 30.07(a) State v. Thompson, 886 N.W.2d 224 (Minn. 2016), 23.14
State v. Thompson, 419 S.C. 250, 797 S.E.2d 716 (2017), 23.07(d), 23.17
State v. Thorpe, 274 N.C. 457, 164 S.E.2d 171 (1968), 24.10(b)
State v. Tichenor, 2016 WL 4151375 (Az. App. 2016), 23.17(c)
State v. Tidwell, 775 S.W.2d 379 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1989), 22.03(d)
State v. Tiedemann, 162 P.3d 1106 (Utah 2007), 9.09(b)(6)
State v. Tucker, 219 Conn. 752, 595 A.2d 832 (1991), 19.03(a) State v. Ulestad, 127 Wash. App. 209, 111 P.3d 276 (2005), 27.01
State v. Valenzuela, 239 Ariz. 299, 371 P.3d 627 (2016), 23.18(a) State v. Vargas, 213 N.J. 301, 63 A.3d 175 (2013), 23.20
State v. Victor, 167 So. 3d 118 (La. App. 2014), 4.05
State v. Wacaser, 794 S.W.2d 190 (Mo. 1990) (en banc), 28.03(a) State v. Wade, 531 S.W.2d 726 (Mo. 1976), 24.15
State v. Walker, 352 N.W.2d 239 (Iowa 1984), 24.14(b)
State v. Walker, 182 Wash. 2d 463, 341 P.3d 976 (2015), 36.11(a) State v. Walsh, 731 A.2d 696 (R.I. 1999), 31.10
State v. Wang, 312 Conn. 222, 92 A.3d 220 (2014), 8.04
State v. Warner, 762 So. 2d 507 (Fla. 2000), 14.06(c)(2)
State v. Washington, 832 N.W.2d 650 (Iowa 2013), 38.05(a), 38.26
State v. Washington, 866 S.W.2d 950 (Tenn. 1993), 19.03
State v. Watkins, 362 S.W.3d 530 (Tenn. 2012), 17.08(b)(2)
State v. Watson, 321 Md. 47, 580 A.2d 1067 (1990), 33.20
State v. White, 887 N.W.2d 172 (Iowa 2016), 23.04(b)
State v. White, 142 Ohio St. 3d 277, 29 N.E.3d 939 (2015), 23.07(d), 36.06
State v. Whitlow, 45 N.J. 3, 210 A.2d 763 (1965), 12.15(b)
State v. Wiley, 61 A.3d 750 (Me. 2013), 24.04(c)
State v. Williams, 162 W. Va. 348, 249 S.E.2d 752 (1978), 25.03(a) State v. Wilson, 845 So. 2d 172 (Fla. 2003), 14.05
State v. Worsham, 227 So.3d 602 (Fla. App. 2017), 23.13, 23.25
State v. W.R. Jr., 181 Wash. 2d 757, 336 P.3d 1134 (2014), 35.05
State v. Wright, 221 N.J. 456, 114 A.3d 340 (2015), 23.18(c)
State v. Wright, 444 N.J. Super. 347, 133 A.3d 656 (2016), 24.08(b)
State v. Yang, 196 Wis. 2d 359, 538 N.W.2d 817 (Wis. App. 1995), 27.05(a)(2)
State v. Young, 117 N.M. 688, 875 P.2d 1119 (1994), 24.10(b)
State v. Zuber, 227 N.J. 422, 152 A.3d 197 (2017), 13.01
State ex rel. Coco, 363 So. 2d 207 (La. 1978), 24.02
State ex rel. Day v. Silver, 210 W.Va. 175, 556 S.E.2d 820 (2001), 17.03(b)
State ex rel. Griffin v. Denney, 347 S.W. 3d 73 (Mo. 2011), 9.09(a)
State ex rel. J.M. v. Taylor, 276 S.E.2d 199 (W. Va. 1981), 4.05
State ex rel. Juvenile Department of Multnomah County v. Dreyer, 328 Or. 332, 976 P.2d 1123 (1999), 37.02(e) State ex rel. J.R. v. MacQueen, 163 W. Va. 620, 259 S.E.2d 420 (1979), 39.05
State ex rel. Juvenile Department of Multnomah County v. Dreyer, 328 Or. 332, 976 P.2d 1123 (1999), 37.02(e), 38.03(a)
State ex rel. LaFollette v. Raskin, 34 Wis. 2d 607, 150 N.W.2d 318 (1967), 12.15(b)
State ex rel. Mateo D.O. v. Circuit Court for Winnebago County, 280 Wis. 2d 575, 696 N.W.2d 275 (Wis. App. 2005), 20.05, 26.01
State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder, 317 S.E.2d 150 (W. Va. 1984), 4.03, 4.17, 4.27(b)
State ex rel. Missouri Public Defender v. Waters, 370 S.W.3d 592 (Mo. 2012), 6.07
State ex rel. Mitchell v. Bowman, 54 Wis. 2d 5, 194 N.W.2d 297 (1972), 20.04
State ex rel. Morrow v. Lewis, 55 Wis. 2d 502, 200 N.W.2d 193 (1972), 4.25
State ex rel. Plain Dealer Publishing Company v. Geauga County Court of Common Pleas, Juvenile Division, 90 Ohio St. 3d 79, 734 N.E.2d 1214 (2000), 27.08
State ex rel. R.L.W. v. Billings, 451 S.W.2d 125 (Mo. 1970), 20.04
State ex rel. R.R. v. Schmidt, 63 Wis. 2d 82, 216 N.W.2d 18 (1974), 39.05
State ex rel. T.J.H. v. Bills, 504 S.W.2d 76 (Mo. 1974), 13.13
State in the Interest of A.B., 219 N.J. 542, 99 A.3d 782 (2014), 8.05
State in the Interest of Banks, 402 So. 2d 690 (La. 1981), 4.15
State in the Interest of Causey, 363 So. 2d 472 (La. 1978), 12.16, 12.21
State In the Interest of Collins, 288 So. 2d 918 (La. App. 1973), 27.09
State in the Interest of C.P., 212 N.J. Super. 222, 514 A.2d 850 (1986), 17.04(b)
State in the Interest of George, 430 So. 2d 840 (La. 1979), 30.07(b)
State in the Interest of H.C., 106 N.J. Super. 583, 256 A.2d 322 (Juvenile and Domestic Relations Ct., Morris Co. 1969), 12.21
State in the Interest of Holifield, 319 So. 2d 471 (La. App. 1975), 24.05(b), 24.05(e), 24.10(a), 24.10(b)
State in the Interest of Irving, 434 So. 2d 543 (La. App. 1983), 38.23
State in the Interest of J.A., 195 N.J. 324, 949 A.2d 790 (2008), 30.04(c)
State in the Interest of Joshua, 327 So. 2d 429 (La. App. 1976), 4.28(a), 26.01
State in the Interest of K.P., 167 N.J. Super. 290, 400 A.2d 840 (1979), 30.07(b)
State in the Interest of Morrison, 406 So. 2d 246 (La. App. 1981), 4.31(c)
State in the Interest of P.M.P., 200 N.J. 166, 975 A.2d 441 (2009), 4.03, 24.13(a)
State in the Interest of Racine, 433 So. 2d 243 (La. App. 1983), 38.23
State in the Interest of R.B., 200 N.J. Super. 573, 491 A.2d 1311 (1985), 18.10(a)
State in the Interest of S.H., 61 N.J. 108, 293 A.2d 181 (1972), 24.04(b), 24.05(a), 24.10(b), 24.14(a)
State in the Interest of V.A., 212 N.J. 1, 50 A.3d 610 (2012), 13.01
State in the Interest of V.M., 363 N.J. Super. 529, 833 A.2d 692 (2003), 27.03, 27.11
State in the Interest of K.M., 173 P.3d 1279 (Utah 2007), 14.29(b)
Stenson, In re, 174 Wash. 2d 474, 276 P.3d 286 (2012), 9.09(a) Stephan v. State, 711 P.2d 1156 (Alaska 1986), 24.18
Stephens, in the Interest of, 501 Pa. 411, 461 A.2d 1223 (1983), 17.08(h)
Stephenson v. Neal, 865 F.3d 956 (7th Cir. 2017), 27.01
Steven S., In re, 91 Cal. App. 3d 604, 154 Cal. Rptr. 196 (1979), 37.02
Steven S., People v., 498 Mich. 162, 869 N.W.2d 233 (2015), 20.04, 34.09
Stevens, People v., 386 Mich. 579, 194 N.W.2d 370 (1972), 12.15(b), 20.04, 20.05
Stevens, United States v., 559 U.S. 460 (2010), 17.01
Stevens v. State, 94 Okla. Crim. 216, 232 P.2d 949 (1951), 28.05
Stigger, State v., 2006 WL 2194507 (N.J. Super. 2006), 27.05(a)(2)
Stinson v. City of Milwaukee, 2013 WL 5447916 (E.D. Wis. 2013) at *18, rulings on other issues aff’d in part and appeal dism’d in part, 868 F.3d 516 (7th Cir. 2017 (en banc), 9.09(b)(5)

Stirone v. United States, 361 U.S. 212 (1960), 36.06

Stitts v. Wilson, 713 F.3d 887 (7th Cir. 2013), 8.03

Stock, State v., 140 N.M. 676, 147 P.3d 885 (N.M. App. 2006), 15.04(b)

Stoddard, State v., 206 Conn. 157, 537 A.2d 446 (1988), 7.09, 24.13(a)

Stokes v. Fair, 581 F.2d 287 (1st Cir. 1978), 13.04

Stokes, United States v., 733 F.3d 438 (2d Cir. 2013), 23.38

Stone, United States v., 401 F.2d 32 (7th Cir. 1968), 23.18(b)

Stone v. State, 348 Ark. 661, 74 S.W.3d 591 (2002), 22.03(d)

Stone v. State, 419 S.C. 370, 798 S.E.2d 561 (2017), 34.07(b)

Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483 (1964), 23.15(b), 23.18(b), 23.23

Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 (1967), 23.38, 25.02, 25.03(a)

Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263 (1999), 7.05, 9.09(a), 9.09(b)(5)

Strunk v. United States, 412 U.S. 434 (1973), 15.04(b)

Stuart, State v., 279 Wis. 2d 659, 695 N.W.2d 259 (2005), 30.04(c)

Stukes, State v., 416 S.C. 493, 787 S.E.2d 480 (2016), 36.03

Styers v. Smith, 659 F.2d 293 (2d Cir. 1981), 25.03(a)

Sublette v. State, 365 So. 2d 775 (Fla. App. 1978), app. dism’d, 378 So. 2d 349 (Fla. 1979), 24.14(b)

Sugar, State v., 84 N.J. 1, 417 A.2d 474 (1980), 24.17

Sullivan v. Louisiana, 508 U.S. 275 (1993), 36.01, 36.06

Sult v. Weber, 210 So. 2d 739 (Fla. App. 1968), 39.03(a)

Summers, State v., 506 S.W.2d 67 (Mo. App. 1974), 31.03

Summers v. Dretke, 431 F.3d 861 (5th Cir. 2005), 30.04(c)

Superior Court of Los Angeles, People v., 142 Cal. App. 3d 29, 190 Cal. Rptr. 721 (1983), 38.17(b)

Superior Court of Santa Clara County, People v., 15 Cal. 3d 271, 539 P.2d 807, 124 Cal. Rptr. 47 (1975), 21.01

Sussman v. Jenkins, 636 F.3d 329 (7th Cir. 2011), 31.01(a), 31.06

S.W., In re, 124 A.3d 89 (D.C. 2015), 24.10(a)

Swaney, State v., 787 N.W.2d 541 (Minn. 2010), 30.04(c)

Swanson, State v., 707 N.W.2d 645 (Minn. 2006), 10.10

Sweed v. State, 351 S.W.3d 63 (Tex. Crim. App. 2011), 36.05

Sweet, State v., 879 N.W.2d 811 (Iowa 2016), 13.01

Swenson v. Bosler, 386 U.S. 258 (1967), 4.03
Tabron v. United States, 444 A.2d 942 (D.C. 1982), 30.07(c) Tabron v. Arizona, 410 U.S. 351 (1973), 27.01
Taglavore v. United States, 291 F.2d 262 (9th Cir. 1961), 23.14
Tague v. Louisiana, 444 U.S. 469 (1980), 22.03(d)
Talkington, State v., 301 Kan. 453, 345 P.3d 258 (2015), 23.15(b)
Talley, People v., 410 Mich. 378, 301 N.W.2d 809 (1981), 22.03(e)
Tane, United States v., 329 F.2d 848 (2d Cir. 1964), 23.37
Tanner v. United States, 483 U.S. 107 (1987), 27.05(a), 37.02(a) Tanner v. Yukins, 867 F.3d 661 (6th Cir. 2017), 32.01
Tarango v. McDaniel, 837 F.3d 936 (9th Cir. 2016), 36.14, 37.02(c)
Tarter v. Raybuck, 742 F.2d 977 (6th Cir. 1984), 23.34
Tassone, Commonwealth v., 468 Mass. 391, 11 N.E.3d 67 (2014), 30.04(c)
Tate, People v., 367 Ill. App. 3d 109, 853 N.E.2d 1249, 304 Ill. Dec. 883 (2006), 23.22(c)
Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395 (1971), 4.27(c), 38.03(c)
Tateo, United States v., 377 U.S. 463 (1964), 17.08(d)
Tatum v. Foster, 847 F.3d 459 (7th Cir. 2017), 4.05
Tatum v. Moody, 768 F.3d 806 (9th Cir. 2014), 4.28(a) Tavera, United States v., 719 F.3d 705 (6th Cir. 2013), 9.09(a)
Taylor, United States v., 487 U.S. 326 (1988), 15.03
Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400 (1988), 27.01, 33.03, 33.04
Taylor v. Kentucky, 436 U.S. 478 (1978), 32.02, 35.06(c), 36.07
Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975), 21.03(b)
Taylor v. State, 407 Md. 137, 963 A.2d 197 (2009), 31.11
Taylor v. United States, 414 U.S. 17 (1973), 27.01
Taylor v. United States, 286 U.S. 1 (1932), 23.15(c)
Taylor v. United States, 282 F.2d 16 (8th Cir. 1960), 14.29(b)
Taylor, United States v., 745 F.3d 15 (2d Cir. 2014), 18.10(a), 24.05(c)
Teamer, State v., 151 So. 3d 421 (Fla. 2014), 23.09, 23.27
Thompson v. United States, 444 U.S. 248 (1980), 17.08(g)
Thornley, Commonwealth v., 406 Mass. 96, 546 N.E.2d 350 (1989), 25.03(c)
Thornton v. United States, 541 U.S. 615 (2004), 23.08(a), 23.08(b), 23.26
Thorpe, State v., 274 N.C. 457, 164 S.E.2d 171 (1968), 24.10(b)
Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31 (1982), 17.08(d), 32.01, 37.02(d)
Tice v. Johnson, 647 F.3d 87 (4th Cir. 2011), 7.05
Tidwell, State v., 775 S.W.2d 379 (Tenn. Crim. App. 1989), 22.03(d)
Tiedemann, State v., 162 P.3d 1106 (Utah 2007), 9.09(b)(6)
Tien, United States v., 720 F.3d 464 (2d Cir. 2013), 14.29(b)
Tiffany A. v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. App. 4th 1344, 59 Cal. Rptr. 3d 363 (2007), 27.01
Tigano, United States v., 880 F.3d 602 (2d Cir. 2018), 15.04(b)
Titus v. State, 963 P.2d 258 (Alaska 1998), 28.03(a), 37.02(c)
T.J.H., State ex rel., v. Bills, 504 S.W.2d 76 (Mo. 1974), 13.13
T.M.J., In the Interest of, 110 Wis. 2d 7, 327 N.W.2d 198 (Wis. App. 1982), 13.08
Tolan v. Cotton, 134 S. Ct. 1861 (2014), 23.07
Tollett v. Henderson, 411 U.S. 258 (1973), 14.29(b)
Toomey, State v., 38 Wash. App. 831, 690 P.2d 1175 (1984), review denied, 103 Wash. 2d 1012 (1985), 13.15
Torres, People v., 2012 IL 111302, 962 N.E.2d 919, 357 Ill. Dec. 18 (2012), 30.04(c)
Torres, People v., 54 Misc.3d 1220(A), 54 N.Y.S.3d 612 (Table), 2017 WL 740983 (N.Y. County Court, Monroe Cty; January 15, 2017), 22.06(d)
Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465 (1979), 23.12, 23.20, 23.30
Touset, United States v., 890 F.3d 1227 (11th Cir. 2018), 23.30
Town of Newton v. Rumery, 480 U.S. 386 (1987), 3.07, 12.15(a) Townsend v. Bomar, 331 F.2d 19 (6th Cir. 1964), 9.09(b)(1)
Townsend v. Burke, 334 U.S. 736 (1948), 38.20
Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 (1963), 24.03, 24.05(c)
T.P.S. v. State, 590 S.W.2d 946 (Tex. Civ. App. 1979), 9.01
Tracey v. State, 152 So. 3d 504 (Fla. 2014), 23.15(d)
Trivette, United States v., 284 F. Supp. 720 (D. D.C. 1968), 25.03(c)
Tucker, State v., 219 Conn. 752, 595 A.2d 832 (1991), 19.03(a) Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927), 20.04
Turner, United States ex rel., v. Rundle, 438 F.2d 839 (3d Cir. 1971), 13.04
Turner v. Arkansas, 407 U.S. 366 (1972), 17.08(f)
Turner v. Fouche, 396 U.S. 346 (1970), 21.03(b)
Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466 (1965), 21.03(a), 27.05(a), 36.14
Turner v. Murray, 476 U.S. 28 (1986), 28.03(a), 28.03(c)
Turner v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 1885 (2017), 9.09(a)
Turner v. United States, 396 U.S. 398 (1970), 35.06(f)
Twiford v. Peyton, 372 F.2d 670 (4th Cir. 1967), 15.02
Two Minor Children, In the Matter of, 95 Nev. 225, 592 P.2d 166 (1979), 12.16
Tyvan B., In the Matter of, 84 A.D.3d 462, 923 N.Y.S.2d 60 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2011), 19.03(a), 19.03(b)
Tyvonne, In re, 211 Conn. 151, 558 A.2d 661 (1989), 17.04(b)

U

Ulestad, State v., 127 Wash. App. 209, 111 P.3d 276 (2005), 27.01
Under Seal, United States v., 819 F.3d 715 (4th Cir. 2016), 13.01
United States v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45 (1984), 30.03(c), 31.01(a) United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976), 9.05, 9.08, 9.09(a), 9.09(b)(2), 9.09(b)(5), 37.02(c)
United States v. Akinsade, 686 F.3d 248 (4th Cir. 2012), 14.07
United States v. Alexander, 888 F.3d 628 (2d Cir. 2018), 23.15(c)
United States v. Allen, 813 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 2016), 23.19
United States v. Alvarez, 519 F.2d 1036 (3d Cir. 1975), 12.09, 12.15(b)
United States v. Anderson, 929 F.2d 96 (2d Cir. 1991), 24.04(d), 24.20(a) United States v. Angelos, 433 F.3d 738 (10th Cir. 2006), 23.22(a) United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456 (1996), 17.01
United States v. Arvizu, 534 U.S. 266 (2002), 23.06(a), 23.09
United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300 (1973), 25.06
United States v. Ash, 461 F.2d 92 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (en banc), rev’d on other grounds, 413 U.S. 300 (1973), 9.09(b)(7)
United States v. Askew, 529 F.3d 1119 (D.C. Cir. 2008) (en banc), 23.10
United States v. Atkins, 843 F.3d 625 (6th Cir. 2016), 28.03(b)
United States v. A.W.J., 804 F.2d 492 (8th Cir. 1986), 13.19
United States v. Bagley, 877 F.3d 1151 (10th Cir. 2017), 23.17(d), 23.22(d), 23.37
United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394 (1980), 17.03(c), 36.01, 36.13
United States v. Bailey, 743 F.3d 322 (2d Cir. 2014), 23.04(d)

1225
United States v. Banks, 540 U.S. 31 (2003), 23.21
United States v. Bankston, 820 F.3d 215 (6th Cir. 2016), 4.05
United States v. Barber, 777 F.3d 1303 (11th Cir. 2015), 23.15(d)
United States v. Barnes, 713 F.3d 1200 (9th Cir. 2013) (per curiam), 24.20(b)
United States v. Barone, 330 F.2d 543 (2d Cir. 1964), 23.20
United States v. Barret, 848 F.3d 524 (2d Cir. 2017), 30.06(b)
United States v. Barry, 979 F. Supp. 2d 715 (M.D. La. 2013), 24.10(b)
United States v. Bauzo-Santiago, 867 F.3d 13 (1st Cir. 2017), 14.18
United States v. Bazinet, 462 F.2d 982 (8th Cir. 1972), 23.24
United States v. Beck, 602 F.2d 726 (5th Cir. 1979), 23.13
United States v. Beno, 324 F.2d 582 (2d Cir. 1963), 30.07(a) United States v. Bergrin, 885 F.3d 416 (6th Cir. 2018), 12.19(a) United States v. Berschhansky, 788 F.3d 102 (2d Cir. 2015), 23.17(g)
United States v. Bethea, 888 F.3d 864 (7th Cir. 2018), 14.29(b)
United States v. Biswell, 406 U.S. 311 (1972), 23.16
United States v. Black, 707 F.3d 531 (4th Cir. 2013), 23.04(b), 23.09, 23.11(a) United States v. Blok, 188 F.2d 1019 (D.C. Cir. 1951), 23.15(b)
United States v. Booker, 728 F.3d 535 (6th Cir. 2013), 23.14
United States v. Booth, 455 A.2d 1351 (D.C. 1983), 23.15(c)
United States v. Botello-Rosales, 728 F.3d 865 (9th Cir. 2013) (per curiam), 24.09, 24.10(b)
United States v. Bowman, 884 F.3d 200 (4th Cir. 2018), 23.04(b), 23.11(b), 23.11(c), 23.28
United States v. Bradshaw, 490 F.2d 1097 (4th Cir. 1974), 23.24
United States v. Brawner, 471 F.2d 969 (D.C. Cir. 1972), 33.21
United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975), 23.06(a), 23.10, 23.12, 23.22(b), 23.29, 23.30
United States v. Brown, 448 F.3d 239 (3d Cir. 2006), 23.09, 23.32(a), 23.32(b)
United States v. Browne, 834 F.3d 403 (3d Cir. 2016), 10.14(c)
United States v. Bruner, 657 F.2d 1278 (D.C. Cir. 1981), 23.32(c)
United States v. Bryant, 461 F.2d 912 (6th Cir. 1972), 33.25
United States v. Bunkers, 521 F.2d 1217 (9th Cir. 1975), 23.35
United States v. Burgos, 579 F.2d 747 (2d Cir. 1974), 10.08(b)
United States v. Burston, 806 F.3d 1123 (8th Cir. 2015), 23.15(c)
United States v. Bush, 647 F.2d 357 (3d Cir. 1981), 23.32(c)
United States v. Camou, 773 F.3d 932 (9th Cir. 2014), 23.08(b)
United States v. Capers, 627 F.3d 470 (2d Cir. 2010), 24.20(b)
United States v. Cardenas, 9 F.3d 1139 (5th Cir. 1993), 18.10(a) United States v. Carneiro, 861 F.2d 1171 (9th Cir. 1988), 23.17(c)
United States v. Carrigan, 804 F.2d 599 (10th Cir. 1986), 8.13
United States v. Carriger, 541 F.2d 545 (6th Cir. 1976), 23.15(c)
United States v. Castellanos, 478 F.2d 749 (2d Cir. 1973), 36.17

1226
United States v. Cejas, 761 F.3d 717 (7th Cir. 2014), 10.14(c)
United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1 (1977), 23.08(a), 23.08(b), 23.24, 23.26
United States v. Charles, 722 F.3d 1319 (11th Cir. 2013), 30.04(c)
United States v. Chase, 135 F. Supp. 230 (N.D. Ill. 1955), 15.04(b)
United States v. Chitty, 760 F.2d 425 (2d Cir. 1985), 12.15(a) United States v. Clay, 630 Fed. Appx. 377 (6th Cir. 2015), 23.32(b)
United States v. Clay, 640 F.2d 157 (8th Cir. 1981), 23.22(c)
United States v. C.M. (A Juvenile), 485 F.3d 492 (9th Cir. 2007), 24.14(b)
United States v. Cobb, 185 F.3d 1193 (11th Cir. 1999), 18.10(b)
United States v. Cohen, 481 F.3d 896 (6th Cir. 2007), 23.27
United States v. Collins, 510 F.3d 697 (7th Cir. 2007), 23.20
United States v. Cooper, 133 F.3d 1394 (11th Cir. 1998), 23.23
United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411 (1981), 23.09, 23.12, 23.22(b), 23.29, 23.34
United States v. Craighead, 539 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2008), 24.08(a) United States v. Crandall, 748 F.3d 476 (2d Cir. 2014), 27.01
United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 646 (1984), 15.02
United States v. Dailey, 524 F.2d 911 (8th Cir. 1975), 25.03(c), 25.04
United States v. Davies, 768 F.2d 893 (7th Cir. 1985), 5.03(a) United States v. Davila, 569 U.S. 597 (2013), 14.05
United States v. Davis, 793 F.3d 712 (7th Cir. 2015) (en banc), 17.01
United States v. Dawson, 305 Fed. Appx. 149 (4th Cir. 2008), 23.07(c)
United States v. Dellinger, 472 F.2d 340 (7th Cir. 1972), 28.03(c)
United States v. DeMarce, 513 F.2d 755 (8th Cir. 1975), 4.25
United States v. Dickens, 775 F.2d 1056 (9th Cir. 1985), 33.09(a) United States v. DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. 117 (1980), 34.11(d)(1)
United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600 (1976), 17.08(e), 29.01, 34.11(d)(1)
United States v. Di Re, 332 U.S. 581 (1948), 23.37
United States v. Dockery, 294 A.2d 158 (1972), 22.03(f)
United States v. Doe, 703 F.2d 745 (3d Cir. 1983), 23.07(b)
United States v. Downs, 230 F.3d 272 (7th Cir. 2000), 25.03(b)
United States v. Drayton, 536 U.S. 194 (2002), 23.04(b), 23.18(a) United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294 (1987), 23.15(c), 23.16
United States v. Dunn, 719 Fed. Appx. 746 (10th Cir. 2017) (per curiam), 23.17(f)
United States v. Duron-Caldera, 737 F.3d 988 (5th Cir. 2013), 30.04(c)
United States v. Edwards, 415 U.S. 800 (1974), 23.08(a) United States v. Eight Thousand Eight Hundred and Fifty Dollars, 461 U.S. 555 (1983), 15.04(b)
United States v. Estrada, 733 F.2d 683 (9th Cir. 1984), 23.32(c)
United States v. Ewell, 383 U.S. 116 (1966), 15.04(b)
United States v. Fisher, 711 F.3d 460 (4th Cir. 2013), 14.29(b)
United States v. Flannery, 451 F.2d 880 (1st Cir. 1971), 33.05
United States v. Flores-Montano, 541 U.S. 149 (2004), 23.30
United States v. Foreste, 780 F.3d 518 (2d Cir. 2015), 23.06(a) United States v. Forrest, 620 F.2d 446 (5th Cir. 1980), 23.23
United States v. Foster, 100 F.3d 1091 (7th Cir. 1997), 24.02, 24.12
United States v. Fowlkes, 804 F.3d 954 (9th Cir. 2014), 23.14
United States v. Frady, 456 U.S. 152 (1982), 36.03
United States v. Freeman, 735 F.3d 92 (2d Cir. 2013), 23.09, 23.32(a) United States v. Gagliardi, 506 F.3d 140 (2d Cir. 2007), 10.14(c)
United States v. Gagnon, 470 U.S. 522 (1985), 27.01, 27.02
United States v. Gainey, 380 U.S. 63 (1965), 35.06(f)
United States v. Gallardo-Mendez, 150 F.3d 1240 (10th Cir. 1998), 17.08(f)
United States v. Galpin, 720 F.3d 436 (2d Cir. 2013), 23.17(f) United States v. Gamez-Orduno, 235 F.3d 453 (9th Cir. 2000), 9.09(a) United States v. Gania, 755 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2014), 23.17(g)
United States v. Garibay, 143 F.3d 534 (9th Cir. 1998), 24.10
United States v. Garner, 439 F.2d 525 (D.C. Cir. 1970), 22.03(d)
United States v. Gifford, 727 F.3d 92 (1st Cir. 2013), 23.32(c)
United States v. Gillenwater, 717 F.3d 1070 (9th Cir. 2013), 33.07
United States v. Glover, 755 F.3d 811 (7th Cir. 2014), 23.17(c), 23.32(b)
United States v. Gonzales, 164 F.3d 1285 (10th Cir. 1999), 8.13
United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, 548 U.S. 140 (2006), 30.04(c)
United States v. Gouveia, 467 U.S. 180 (1984), 15.04(b), 24.13(a) United States v. Grant, 887 F.3d 131 (3d Cir. 2018) 13.01
United States v. Grant, 349 F.3d 192 (5th Cir. 2003), 23.23
United States v. Grayson, 438 U.S. 41 (1978), 33.06
United States v. Green, 618 F.3d 120 (2d Cir. 2010), 38.03(c)
United States v. Green, 670 F.2d 1148 (D.C. Cir. 1981), 23.11(b)
United States v. Gries, 872 F.3d 471 (7th Cir. 2017), 17.08(b)(2)
United States v. Grubbs, 547 U.S. 90 (2006), 23.17(f), 23.17(g)
United States v. Hale, 422 U.S. 171 (1975), 30.03(c)
United States v. Hall, 565 F.2d 917 (5th Cir. 1978), 23.18(a) United States v. Hallman, 365 F.2d 289 (3d Cir. 1966), 23.12
United States v. Hampton, 718 F.3d 978 (D.C. Cir. 2013), 31.02
United States v. Handa, 892 F.3d 95 (1st Cir. 2018), 15.04(b)
United States v. Handman, 447 F.2d 853 (7th Cir. 1971), 33.05
United States v. Hardin, 539 F.3d 404 (6th Cir. 2008), 23.36
United States v. Harris, 403 U.S. 573 (1971), 23.32(b)
United States v. Harris, 321 F.2d 739 (6th Cir. 1963), 23.07
United States v. Hashime, 734 F.3d 278 (4th Cir. 2013), 24.08(a) United States v. Hasting, 461 U.S. 499 (1983), 33.05
United States v. Hatcher, 473 F.2d 321 (6th Cir. 1973), 23.17(a) United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980), 23.38, 33.06, 33.09(a) United States v. Haynes, 729 F.3d 178 (2d Cir. 2013), 27.01, 36.16
United States v. Heath, 259 F.3d 522 (6th Cir. 2001), 23.15(c)
United States v. Helstoski, 442 U.S. 477 (1979), 7.03(c)
United States v. Henderson, 241 F.3d 638 (9th Cir. 2000), 23.23
United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221 (1985), 23.04(b), 23.09, 23.27, 23.28, 23.31
United States v. Hermanek, 289 F.3d 1076 (9th Cir. 2002), 31.13
United States v. Hernandez, 574 F.2d 1362 (5th Cir. 1978), 24.11(b)
United States v. Hinton, 423 F.3d 355 (3d Cir. 2005), 30.04(c)
United States v. Hodge, 19 F.3d 51 (D.C. Cir. 1994), 22.03(e)
United States v. Honer, 225 F.3d 549 (5th Cir. 2000), 25.03(c)
United States v. Howard, 773 F.3d 519 (4th Cir. 2014), 14.07
United States v. Hunter, 708 F.3d 938 (7th Cir. 2013), 24.11(c)
United States v. Hussain, 835 F.3d 307 (2d Cir. 2016), 23.26, 23.31
United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986), 30.06(a) United States v. Jackson, 390 U.S. 570 (1968), 12.15(a) United States v. Jackson, 2018 WL 748372 (D. N.M. February 7, 2018), 17.01
United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109 (1984), 23.03, 23.15(d), 23.22(b), 23.36
United States v. James, 712 F.3d 79 (2d Cir. 2013), 30.04(c)
United States v. Jeffers, 342 U.S. 48 (1951), 22.03(d), 23.15(b), 23.20
United States v. Jenkins, 420 U.S. 358 (1975), 35.08
United States v. Jenkins, 92 F.3d 430 (6th Cir. 1996), 23.23
United States v. Jenson, 462 F.3d 399 (5th Cir. 2006), 23.06(a) United States v. Johnson, 323 U.S. 273 (1944), 17.05, 20.01(b), 20.03(a) United States v. Johnson, 889 F.3d 1120 (9th Cir. 2018), 23.25
United States v. Johnson, 885 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2018), 23.10
United States v. Johnson, 850 F.3d 515 (2d Cir. 2017), 14.29(b)
United States v. Johnson, 656 F.3d 375 (6th Cir. 2011), 23.18(b)
United States v. Johnson, 713 F.2d 633 (11th Cir. 1983), 7.05
United States v. Johnson, 710 F.3d 784 (8th Cir. 2013), 39.04
United States v. Jones, 565 U.S. 400 (2012), 23.16
United States v. Jones, 893 F.3d 66, 2018 WL 3028685 (2d Cir. June 19, 2018), 23.15(c)
United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164 (1974), 22.03(d), 22.03(e), 23.18(a), 23.18(b)
United States v. Mayfield, 189 F.3d 895 (9th Cir. 1999), 18.10(c)
United States v. Mayhew, 380 F. Supp. 2d 961 (S.D. Ohio 2005), 30.04(c)
United States v. McCormick, 502 F.2d 281 (9th Cir. 1974), 23.24
United States v. McElroy, 697 F.2d 459 (2d Cir. 1982), 9.09(a) United States v. McGhee, 651 F.3d 153 (1st Cir. 2011), 14.07
United States v. McNeill, 484 F.3d 301 (4th Cir. 2007), 23.07(c)
United States v. Mebratu, 543 Fed. Appx. 137 (3d Cir. 2013), 10.14(c)
United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544 (1980), 23.04(b), 23.06(c), 23.18(a) United States v. Mergen, 764 F.3d 199 (2d Cir. 2014), 31.10
United States v. Merritt, 293 F.2d 742 (3d Cir. 1961), 23.16
United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196 (1995), 14.29(c)
United States v. Miller, 771 F.2d 1219 (9th Cir. 1985), 27.12(c)
United States v. Mirenda, 443 F.2d 1351 (9th Cir. 1971), 8.13
United States v. Mittrione, 357 F.3d 712 (7th Cir. 2004), vacated on other grounds, 543 U.S. 1097 (2005), 37.02(c)
United States v. Moore, 709 F.3d 287 (4th Cir. 2013), 37.02(c)
United States v. Morgan, 786 F.3d 227 (2d Cir. 2015), 30.03(c)
United States v. Mosley, 454 F.3d 249 (3d Cir. 2006), 23.23, 23.27
United States v. Murphy, 703 F.3d 182 (2d Cir. 2012), 23.18(a), 23.28, 23.37, 24.09
United States v. Murphy, 516 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2008), superseded on another issue by Fernandez v. California, 134 S. Ct. 1126 (2014), 23.18(b)
United States v. Murray, 736 F.3d 652 (2d Cir. 2013), 33.04
United States v. Natal, 849 F.3d 530 (2d Cir. 2017) (per curiam), 31.09
United States v. Neal, 577 Fed. Appx. 434 (6th Cir. 2014), 23.32(b)
United States v. Nelson, 725 F.3d 615 (6th Cir. 2013), 30.04(c)
United States v. Newman, 490 F.2d 993 (10th Cir. 1974), 23.13
United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975), 5.05, 9.10(b), 9.12, 9.13, 22.05(b), 33.03, 33.06, 33.09(a) United States v. Nora, 765 F.3d 1049 (9th Cir. 2014), 23.17(d), 23.19, 23.37
United States v. North, 735 F.3d 212 (5th Cir. 2013), 23.19
United States v. Okatan, 728 F.3d 111 (2d Cir. 2013), 24.24
United States v. Olazabal, 610 Fed. Appx. 34 (2d Cir. 2015), 37.02(d)
United States v. Olivaress-Rangel, 458 F.3d 1104 (10th Cir. 2006), 23.37, 23.39
United States v. Ortiz, 422 U.S. 891 (1975), 23.11(b), 23.30
United States v. Ortiz-Hernandez, 427 F.3d 567 (9th Cir. 2005), 23.07(d)

1231
United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554 (1988), 31.01(a) United States v. Pacheco-Lopez, 531 F.3d 420 (6th Cir. 2008), 24.07
United States v. Paniagua-Garcia, 813 F.3d 1013 (7th Cir. 2016), 23.28
United States v. Paroutian, 299 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1962), aff’d after remand, 319 F.2d 661 (2d Cir. 1963), 23.38, 23.40
United States v. Patterson, 340 F.3d 368 (6th Cir. 2003), 23.09
United States v. Pelullo, 14 F.3d 881 (3d Cir. 1994), 17.08(f)
United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531 (1975), 23.39
United States v. Perdue, 8 F.3d 1455 (10th Cir. 1993), 24.08(a) United States v. Perez, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 579 (1824), 34.11(d)(2), 36.17
United States v. Perkins, 887 F.3d 272 (6th Cir. 2018), 23.17(g)
United States v. Peters, 625 F.2d 366 (10th Cir. 1980), 27.12(c)
United States v. Peyton, 745 F.3d 546 (D.C. Cir. 2014), 23.18(b)
United States v. Pimental, 755 F.3d 1095 (9th Cir. 2014), 24.15
United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696 (1983), 23.02(a), 23.04(d), 23.06(a), 23.08(b), 23.12, 23.22(b)
United States v. Pollack, 534 F.2d 964 (D.C. Cir. 1976), 9.09(a) United States v. Poole, 450 F.2d 1082 (3d Cir. 1971), 28.03(c)
United States v. Powell, 469 U.S. 57 (1984), 17.08(f), 35.03, 36.18
United States v. Powell, 929 F.2d 1190 (7th Cir. 1991), 23.23
United States v. Preston, 751 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc), 24.05, 24.05(b)
United States v. Price, 383 U.S. 787 (1966), 22.03(d)
United States v. Price, 925 F.2d 1268 (10th Cir. 1991), 23.15(b)
United States v. Raddatz, 447 U.S. 667 (1980), 22.03(d), 22.03(e), 22.07
United States v. Rambo, 365 F.3d 906 (10th Cir. 2004), 24.08(b), 24.11(b), 24.11(c)
United States v. Ramirez, 523 U.S. 65 (1998), 23.21
United States v. Ramirez, 676 F.3d 755 (8th Cir. 2012), 23.20
United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606 (1977), 23.09
United States v. Rankins, 675 Fed. Appx. 231 (4th Cir. 2017), 14.05
United States v. Razmilovic, 507 F.3d 130 (2d Cir. 2007), 36.17
United States v. Reaves, 512 F.3d 123 (4th Cir. 2008), 23.32(d)
United States v. Recio, 884 F.3d 230 (4th Cir. 2018), 10.14(c)
United States v. Resendiz-Ponce, 549 U.S. 102 (2007), 17.03(c)
United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1 (1953), 9.10(c)
United States v. Robles-Ortega, 348 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2003), 23.39
United States v. Roberts, 262 F.3d 286 (4th Cir. 2001), 37.02(c)
United States v. Robinson, 485 U.S. 25 (1988), 33.05
United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973), 23.08(a), 23.08(b), 23.26, 23.28
United States v. Robinson, 430 F.3d 537 (2d Cir. 2005), 37.02(d)
United States v. Rodriguez, 518 F.3d 1072 (9th Cir. 2008), 24.11(a) United States v. Rodriguez-Vega, 797 F.3d 781 (9th Cir. 2015), 14.07
United States v. Romo, 669 F.2d 285 (5th Cir. 1982), 33.09(a) United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982), 23.08(b), 23.17(g), 23.19, 23.24, 23.32(b)
United States v. Ross, 703 F.3d 856 (6th Cir. 2012), 4.05
United States v. Ruiz, 536 U.S. 622 (2002), 9.09(a), 14.29(b)
United States v. Ruiz, 623 Fed. Appx. 378 (9th Cir. 2015), 23.32(b)
United States v. Russell, 205 F.3d 768 (5th Cir. 2000), 27.02
United States v. Salas, 889 F.3d 681 (10th Cir. 2018), 39.02(a) United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987), 4.15, 4.27(c)
United States v. Salim, 690 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2012), 27.01
United States v. Salsedo, 447 F. Supp. 1235 (E.D. Cal. 1979), vacated, United States v. Torres, 622 F.2d 465 (9th Cir. 1980) (per curiam), 22.03(e), 22.03(f)
United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83 (1980), 9.12, 12.15(a), 22.05(a), 23.15(a), 23.15(e), 33.06
United States v. Sampson, 385 F.3d 183 (2d Cir. 2004), 18.05
United States v. Sandidge, 863 F.3d 755 (7th Cir. 2017), 38.03(c)
United States v. Sanders, 479 F.2d 1193 (D.C. Cir. 1973), 25.03(c)
United States v. San Juan-Cruz, 314 F.3d 384 (9th Cir. 2002), 24.09
United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976), 23.07(c), 23.20
United States v. Saulsberry, 878 F.3d 946 (10th Cir. 2017), 23.08(b), 23.08(c), 23.22(b)
United States v. Schwab, 886 F.2d 509 (2d Cir. 1989), 30.07(b)
United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978), 17.08(c), 35.08
United States v. Scott, 677 F.3d 72 (2d Cir. 2012), 30.07(a) United States v. Scott, 284 F.3d 758 (7th Cir. 2002), 30.04(c)
United States v. Sczubelek, 402 F.3d 175 (3d Cir. 2005), 23.02(a) United States v. Sealed Juvenile, 781 F.3d 747 (5th Cir. 2015), 38.03(c)
United States v. Sedaghaty, 728 F.3d 885 (9th Cir. 2013), 23.17(g), 23.22(a) United States v. Sellers, 784 F.3d 876 (2d Cir. 2015), 14.07
United States v. Serrano, 856 F.3d 210 (2d Cir. 2017), 17.08(d)
United States v. Serrano-Acevedo, 892 F.3d 454 (1st Cir. 2018), 23.22(d), 23.37, 23.38
United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675 (1985), 23.04(d), 23.06(a), 23.06(b), 23.06(d), 23.27
United States v. Shaw, 707 F.3d 666 (6th Cir. 2013), 23.18(a) United States v. Slatten, 865 F.3d 767 (D.C. Cir. 2017), 18.10(b)
United States v. Sloan, 776 F.2d 926 (10th Cir. 1985), 12.13
United States v. Smith, 794 F.3d 681 (7th Cir. 2015), 23.04(b)
United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1 (1989), 23.06(a), 23.09
United States v. Somers, 496 F.2d 723 (3d Cir. 1974), 29.02
United States v. Soto-Zuniga, 837 F.3d 992 (9th Cir. 2016), 9.07(c)
United States v. Speights, 557 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1977), 23.35
United States v. Stevens, 559 U.S. 460 (2010), 17.01
United States v. Stokes, 733 F.3d 438 (2d Cir. 2013), 23.38
United States v. Stone, 401 F.2d 32 (7th Cir. 1968), 23.18(b)
United States v. Tane, 329 F.2d 848 (2d Cir. 1964), 23.37
United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463 (1964), 17.08(d)
United States v. Tavera, 719 F.3d 705 (6th Cir. 2013), 9.09(a) United States v. Taylor, 745 F.3d 15 (2d Cir. 2014), 18.10(a), 24.05(c)
United States v. Thomas, 447 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 2006), 23.23
United States v. Thompson, 772 F.3d 752 (3d Cir. 2014), 24.15
United States v. Tien, 720 F.3d 464 (2d Cir. 2013), 14.29(b)
United States v. Tigano, 880 F.3d 602 (2d Cir. 2018), 15.04(b)
United States v. Touset, 890 F.3d 1227 (11th Cir. 2018), 23.30
United States v. Trivette, 284 F. Supp. 720 (D. D.C. 1968), 25.03(c)
United States v. Under Seal, 819 F.3d 715 (4th Cir. 2016), 13.01
United States v. United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, 407 U.S. 297 (1972), 23.29
United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422 (1978), 27.02, 36.16
United States v. Uribe, 709 F.3d 646 (7th Cir. 2013), 23.27
United States v. Valdez Hocker, 333 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2003), 23.23
United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858 (1982), 4.31(c), 9.08, 9.10(a), 9.10(b), 9.13, 10.05, 11.03(b), 15.04(b), 33.04
United States v. Vallejo, 246 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2001), 30.03(c)
United States v. Vallejo, 237 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2001), 30.03(c)
United States v. Vasquez-Algarin, 821 F.3d 467 (3d Cir. 2016), 23.19
United States v. Vayner, 769 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2014), 10.14(c)
United States v. Velázquez, 749 F.3d 167 (3d Cir. 2014), 15.04(b), 22.03(a) United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515 (1996), 21.03(b)
United States v. Vole, 435 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1970), 8.13
United States v. Voustianouk, 685 F.3d 206 (2d Cir. 2012), 23.17(b)
United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967), 22.03(d), 23.14, 23.38, 25.01, 25.03(a), 25.03(b), 25.06
United States v. Wahl, 290 F.3d 370 (D.C. Cir. 2002), 35.01
United States v. Walker, 237 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2001), 23.23
United States v. Walker, 473 F.2d 136 (D.C. Cir. 1972), 20.05
United States v. Wall, 277 Fed. Appx. 704 (9th Cir. 2008), 23.32(c)
United States v. Walter, 870 F.3d 622 (7th Cir. 2017), 9.09(a) United States v. Walton, 763 F.3d 655 (7th Cir. 2014), 23.23
United States v. Ward, 598 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2010), 27.01
United States v. Washington, 431 U.S. 181 (1977), 23.18(a), 24.03 United States v. Washington, 869 F.3d 193 (3d Cir. 2015), 17.01
United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976), 23.06(c), 23.07(c), 23.18(a) United States v. Watson, 703 F.3d 684 (4th Cir. 2013), 23.06(c), 23.22(c)
United States v. Weatherspoon, 410 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2005), 36.11(a) United States v. Wells, 879 F.3d 900 (9th Cir. 2017), 7.03(c), 30.07(a) United States v. Werdene, 883 F.3d 204 (3d Cir. 2018), 23.17
United States v. Wheeler, 435 U.S. 313 (1978), 17.08(g)
United States v. Whitaker, 820 F.3d 849 (7th Cir. 2016), 23.15(a) United States v. White, 692 F.3d 235 (2d Cir. 2012), 30.07(c), 33.04
United States v. White, 454 F.2d 435 (7th Cir. 1971), 8.13
United States v. Whitten, 610 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2010), 21.02(b)
United States v. Williams, 842 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2016), 24.07
United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332 (1975), 34.11(d)(2)
United States v. Wolf Child, 699 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir. 2012), 38.03(c)
United States v. Woodard, 699 F.3d 1188 (10th Cir. 2012), 30.07(c)
United States v. Woodard, 694 F.3d 950 (8th Cir. 2012), 14.07
United States v. Wright, 489 F.2d 1181 (D.C. Cir. 1973), 33.03
United States v. Wysinger, 683 F.3d 784 (7th Cir. 2012), 24.09, 24.11(c)
United States v. Young, 470 U.S. 1 (1985), 36.11(a) United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, United States v., 407 U.S. 297 (1972), 23.29
United States ex rel. Almeida v. Baldi, 195 F.2d 815 (3d Cir. 1952), 9.09(b)(6)
United States ex rel. Durocher v. LaVallee, 330 F.2d 303 (2d Cir. 1964), 14.29(b)
United States ex rel. Everett v. Murphy, 329 F.2d 68 (2d Cir. 1964), 24.04(c)
United States ex rel. Hudson v. Brierton, 699 F.2d 917 (7th Cir. 1983), 25.03(a) United States ex rel. Negron v. New York, 434 F.2d 386 (2d Cir. 1970), 27.01
United States ex rel. Riley v. Franzen, 653 F.2d 1153 (7th Cir. 1981), 24.11(a) United States ex rel. Whitmore v. Malcolm, 476 F.2d 363 (2d Cir. 1973), 22.03(d)
United States ex rel. Wilson v. McMann, 408 F.2d 896 (2d Cir. 1969), 4.31(d)
United States Gypsum Co., United States v., 438 U.S. 422 (1978), 27.02, 36.16
Upjohn Co. v. United States, 449 U.S. 383 (1981), 5.05, 9.10(b), 9.13, 33.03
Uriarte, State v., 194 Ariz. 275, 981 P.2d 575 (Ariz. App. 1998), 27.11
Uribe, United States v., 709 F.3d 646 (7th Cir. 2013), 23.27
Usery v. Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 U.S. 1 (1976), 35.06(e)

V

V.A., State in the Interest of, 212 N.J. 1, 50 A.3d 610 (2012), 13.01
Valdez, People v., 53 A.D.3d 172, 861 N.Y.S.2d 288 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2008), 33.02(b)(4)
Valdez Hocker, United States v., 333 F.3d 1206 (10th Cir. 2003), 23.23

1235
Valdivia v. Schwarzenegger, 599 F.3d 984 (9th Cir. 2010), 39.05
Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30 (1970), 22.03(d), 23.08(a), 23.20
Valentine, State v., 240 Conn. 395, 692 A.2d 727 (1997), 31.10
Valenzuela, State v., 239 Ariz. 299, 371 P.3d 627 (2016), 23.18(a) Valenzuela-Bernal, United States v., 458 U.S. 858 (1982), 4.31(c), 9.08, 9.10(a), 9.10(b), 9.13, 10.05, 11.03(b), 15.04(b), 33.04
Vallejo, United States v., 246 F.3d 1150 (9th Cir. 2001), 30.03(c)
Vallejo, United States v., 237 F.3d 1008 (9th Cir. 2001), 30.03(c)
Vandiver, State v., 257 Kan. 53, 891 P.2d 350 (1995), 23.22(c)
Van Orden v. Schafer, 129 F. Supp. 3d 839 (E.D. Mo. 2015), 12.18
Vargas, State v., 213 N.J. 301, 63 A.3d 175 (2013), 23.20
Vasquez v. Hillery, 474 U.S. 254 (1986), 21.03(b)
Vasquez v. Jones, 496 F.3d 564 (6th Cir. 2007), 30.07(c)
Vasquez-Algarin, United States v., 821 F.3d 467 (3d Cir. 2016), 23.19
Vayney, United States v., 769 F.3d 125 (2d Cir. 2014), 10.14(c)
Vega, People v., 276 A.D.2d 414, 714 N.Y.S.2d 291 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 2000), 23.22(b)
Velazquez, United States v., 749 F.3d 167 (3d Cir. 2014), 15.04(b), 22.03(a) Velez v. Schmer, 724 F.2d 249 (1st Cir. 1984), 25.03(a), 25.04 Venalonzo v. People, 388 P.3d 868 (Colo. 2017), 31.09
Vermont v. Brillon, 556 U.S. 81 (2009), 15.04(b)
Victor, State v., 167 So. 3d 118 (La. App. 2014), 4.05
Victor v. Nebraska, 511 U.S. 1 (1994), 36.06
Vilardi, People v., 76 N.Y.2d 67, 555 N.E.2d 915, 556 N.Y.S.2d 518 (1990), 9.09(a) Villamonte-Marquez, United States v., 462 U.S. 579 (1983), 23.30
Villano v. United States, 310 F.2d 680 (10th Cir. 1962), limited on an unrelated point in United States v. Price, 925 F.2d 1268 (10th Cir. 1991), 23.15(b)
Virgil v. Superior Court, 268 Cal. App. 2d 127, 73 Cal. Rptr. 793 (1968), 23.25
Virginia, United States v., 518 U.S. 515 (1996), 21.03(b)
Virginia v. LeBlanc, 137 S. Ct. 1726 (2017), 11.03(a) Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164 (2008), 7.09, 23.07(a), 23.07(c), 23.08(a), 23.26
Vlandis v. Kline, 412 U.S. 441 (1973), 35.06(e)
V.M., State in the Interest of, 363 N.J. Super. 529, 833 A.2d 692 (2003), 27.03, 27.11
Void, People v., 170 A.D.2d 239, 567 N.Y.S.2d 216 (N.Y. App. Div., 1st Dep’t 1991), 22.06(d)
Vole, United States v., 435 F.2d 774 (7th Cir. 1970), 8.13
Voustianouk, United States v., 685 F.3d 206 (2d Cir. 2012), 23.17(b) Wacaser, State v., 794 S.W.2d 190 (Mo. 1990 (en banc), 28.03(a)
Wade, State v., 531 S.W.2d 726 (Mo. 1976), 24.15
Wade, United States v., 388 U.S. 218 (1967), 22.03(d), 23.14, 23.38, 25.01, 25.03(a), 25.03(b), 25.06
W.A.F., In the Matter of, 573 A.2d 1264 (D.C. 1990), 12.17
Wahl, United States v., 290 F.3d 370 (D.C. Cir. 2002), 35.01
Wainwright v. State, 504 A.2d 1096 (Del. 1986), 24.11(c)
Wainwright v. Sykes, 433 U.S. 72 (1977), 34.01
Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 218 (1985), 28.03(d), 28.05
Walker, Commonwealth v., 625 Pa. 450, 92 A.3d 766 (2012), 11.01(a), 11.01(b)
Walker, People v., 211 Ill. 2d 317, 812 N.E.2d 339, 285 Ill. Dec. 519 (2004), 30.02(b)
Walker, State v., 352 N.W.2d 239 (Iowa 1984), 24.14(b)
Walker, State v., 182 Wash. 2d 463, 341 P.3d 976 (2015), 36.11(a)
Walker, United States v., 237 F.3d 845 (7th Cir. 2001), 23.23
Walker, United States v., 473 F.2d 136 (D.C. Cir. 1972), 20.05
Walker v. State, 896 So. 2d 712 (Fla. 2005), 36.04
Walker v. State, 262 Ga. 694, 424 S.E.2d 782 (1993), 28.03(a) Wall, United States v., 277 Fed. Appx. 704 (9th Cir. 2008), 23.32(c)
Wall v. Florida, 397 U.S. 387 (1970), 17.08(g)
Wall v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39 (1984), 27.08
Walsh, State v., 731 A.2d 696 (R.I. 1999), 31.10
Walter, United States v., 870 F.3d 622 (7th Cir. 2017), 9.09(a)
Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649 (1980), 23.15(d), 23.17(g)
Walters, In re, 15 Cal. 3d 738, 543 P.2d 607, 126 Cal. Rptr. 239 (1975), 4.28(a) Walton, United States v., 763 F.3d 655 (7th Cir. 2014), 23.23
Wang, State v., 312 Conn. 222, 92 A.3d 220 (2014), 8.04
Ward, People v., 95 A.D.2d 351, 466 N.Y.S.2d 686 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1983), 24.05(a) Ward, United States v., 598 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2010), 27.01
Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470 (1973), 9.02, 9.09(b)(7), 9.12, 12.20, 18.10(b), 27.12(b)
Ware v. Louisiana Department of Corrections, 866 F.3d 263 (5th Cir. 2017), 5.09
Warger v. Shauers, 135 S. Ct. 521 (2014), 27.05(a)(2), 37.02(c)
Warner, State v., 762 So. 2d 507 (Fla. 2000), 14.05, 14.06(c)(2)
Warren, Commonwealth v., 475 Mass. 530, 58 N.E.3d 333 (2016), 23.11(b)
Washington, State v., 832 N.W.2d 650 (Iowa 2013), 38.05(a), 38.26
Washington, State v., 866 S.W.2d 950 (Tenn. 1993), 19.03
Washington, United States v., 431 U.S. 181 (1977), 23.18(a), 24.03
Washington, United States v., 869 F.3d 193 (3d Cir. 2015), 17.01
Washington v. Chrisman, 455 U.S. 1 (1982), 23.18, 23.19, 23.21
Washington v. Clemmer, 339 F.2d 715 (D.C. Cir. 1964), 4.31(c), 4.31(d)
Washington v. Secretary, Pennsylvania Dep’t of Corrections, 801 F.3d 160 (3d Cir. 2015), 18.10(a)
Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967), 9.09(b)(4), 10.05, 18.10(b), 33.04, 34.10
Washington v. United States, 461 A.2d 1037 (D.C. 1983), 30.07(c), 31.03
Waters, State ex rel. Missouri Public Defender v., 370 S.W.3d 592 (Mo. 2012), 6.07
Watkins, State v., 362 S.W.3d 530 (Tenn. 2012), 17.08(b)(2)
Watkins v. Sowders, 449 U.S. 341 (1981), 25.01, 25.02
Watson, People v., 36 Ill. 2d 228, 221 N.E.2d 645 (1966), 11.03(a) Watson, State v., 321 Md. 47, 580 A.2d 1067 (1990), 39.24, 33.20
Watson, United States v., 423 U.S. 411 (1976), 23.06(c), 23.07(c), 23.18(a) Watson, United States v., 703 F.3d 684 (4th Cir. 2013), 23.06(c), 23.22(c)
Watson v. State, 934 A.2d 901 (Del. 2007), 20.05
Watson v. United States, 249 F.2d 106 (D.C. Cir. 1957), 23.37
W.B. v. State, 356 So. 2d 884 (Fla. App. 1978), 30.06(b)
Weary v. Cain, 136 S. Ct. 1002 (2016), 9.09(a), 31.11
Weatherspoon, United States v., 410 F.3d 1142 (9th Cir. 2005), 36.11(a)
Weaver v. Massachusetts, 137 S. Ct. 1899 (2017), 27.08
Weaver v. United States, 295 F.2d 360 (5th Cir. 1961), 23.15(c) Weeden v. Johnson, 854 F.3d 1063 (9th Cir. 2017), 11.01(b)
Weinberger v. Salfi, 422 U.S. 749 (1975), 35.06(e)
Wells, United States v., 879 F.3d 900 (9th Cir. 2017), 7.03(c), 30.07(a) Welsh v. Wisconsin, 466 U.S. 740 (1984), 23.07(c), 23.15(c), 23.16, 23.20
Werdene, United States v., 883 F.3d 204 (3d Cir. 2018), 23.17
Wesley, People v., 428 Mich. 708, 411 N.W.2d 159 (1987), 14.05
West, People v., 3 Cal. 3d 595, 477 P.2d 409, 91 Cal. Rptr. 385 (1970), 14.18
West v. State, 137 Md. App. 314, 768 A.2d 150 (2000), 23.32(c)
West v. State, 169 S.W.3d 275 (Tex. App. 2005), 30.07(b)
Westover v. United States, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), 24.20
Wheeler, United States v., 435 U.S. 313 (1978), 17.08(g)
Wheeler v. State, 135 A.3d 282 (Del. 2016), 23.17(f)
Wheeler v. State, 560 So. 2d 171 (Miss. 1990), 36.06
Wheeler v. United States, 159 U.S. 523 (1895), 30.05
Whitaker, United States v., 820 F.3d 849 (7th Cir. 2016), 23.15(a) White, People v., 123 Ill. App. 2d 102, 259 N.E.2d 357 (1970), 9.07(b)
White, People v., 401 Mich. 482, 257 N.W.2d 912 (1977), 12.15(a) White, State v., 887 N.W.2d 172 (Iowa 2016), 23.04(b)
White, State v., 142 Ohio St. 3d 277, 29 N.E.3d 939 (2015), 23.07(d), 36.06
White, United States v., 692 F.3d 235 (2d Cir. 2012), 30.07(c), 33.04
White, United States v., 454 F.2d 435 (7th Cir. 1971), 8.13
White v. Crook, 251 F. Supp. 401 (M.D. Ala. 1966), 21.03(b)
White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59 (1963), 4.03
White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548 (2017) (per curiam), 23.07(d)
White v. Sowders, 644 F.2d 1177 (6th Cir. 1980), 13.18
White v. Stanley, 745 F.3d 237 (7th Cir. 2014), 23.20
White v. Woodall, 134 S. Ct. 1697 (2014), 33.05, 36.07, 38.26
Whitlow, State v., 45 N.J. 3, 210 A.2d 763 (1965), 12.15(b)
Whitmore, United States ex rel., v. Malcolm, 476 F.2d 363 (2d Cir. 1973), 22.03(d)
Whitten, United States v., 610 F.3d 168 (2d Cir. 2010), 21.02(b)
Whitus v. Georgia, 385 U.S. 545 (1967), 21.03(b)
Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996), 17.01, 23.28, 23.39
Wiggins, People v., 31 N.Y.3d 1, 795 N.E.3d 303, 72 N.Y.S.3d 1 (2018), 15.04(b)
Wiggins v. Smith, 539 U.S. 510 (2003), 9.09(b)(1)
Wilbur v. City of Mount Vernon, 989 F. Supp. 2d 1122 (W.D. Wash. 2013), 6.07
Wilburn v. State, 289 Ark. 224, 711 S.W.2d 760 (1986), 30.07(b)
Wiley, State v., 61 A.3d 750 (Me. 2013), 24.04(c)
Wilkinson, In re, 116 R.I. 163, 353 A.2d 199 (1976), 38.17(a) Wilkinson v. Austin, 545 U.S. 209 (2005), 13.04
Wilkinson v. Gingrich, 806 F.3d 511 (9th Cir. 2015), 17.08(f)
Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90 (1967), 9.07(a) Willbanks v. Missouri Department of Corrections, 522 S.W.3d 238 (Mo. 2017), 13.01
William A., In re, 313 Md. 690, 548 A.2d 130 (1988), 17.04(b)
William G., In re, 40 Cal. 3d 550, 709 P.2d 1287, 221 Cal. Rptr. 118 (1985), 23.33, 23.34
William M., In re, 3 Cal. 3d 16, 473 P.2d 737, 89 Cal. Rptr. 33 (1970), 4.15
William M., In the Matter of, 124 Nev. 95, 196 P.3d 456 (2008), 13.11
William S., In the Matter of, 70 Misc. 2d 320, 333 N.Y.S.2d 466 (N.Y. Fam. Ct. 1972), 18.05
Williams, Commonwealth v., 504 Pa. 511, 475 A.2d 1283 (1984), 24.14(a) Williams, People v., 204 Ill. 2d 191, 788 N.E.2d 1126, 273 Ill. Dec. 250 (2003), 39.13.1, 33.09
Williams, People v., 127 A.D.3d 1114, 4 N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2015, 25.03(a) Williams, State v., 162 W. Va. 348, 249 S.E.2d 752 (1978), 25.03(a) Williams, United States v., 842 F.3d 1143 (9th Cir. 2016), 24.07
Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), 9.12, 17.05, 21.01
Williams v. Georgia, 349 U.S. 375 (1955), 14.29(a)
Williams v. Illinois, 567 U.S. 50 (2012), 30.04(c)
Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235 (1970), 4.27(c)
Williams v. Jones 571 F.3d 1086 (10th Cir. 2009), 14.13
Williams v. Kaiser, 323 U.S. 471 (1945), 14.29(b)
Williams v. Louisiana, 136 S. Ct. 2156 (2016), 28.03(b)
Williams v. Martin, 618 F.2d 1021 (4th Cir. 1980), 11.01(b), 11.03(a) Williams v. Pennsylvania, 136 S. Ct. 1899 (2016), 20.04, 20.05
Williams v. Peyton, 404 F.2d 528 (4th Cir. 1968), 24.05(a) Williams v. Trammell, 539 Fed. Appx. 844 (10th Cir. 2013), 36.05 Williams v. True, 39 Fed. Appx. 830 (4th Cir. 2002), 28.03(a), 37.02(a) Williams v. York, 891 F.3d 701 (8th Cir. 2018), 5.09
Williamson v. United States, 512 U.S. 594 (1994), 18.10(a) Willis, People v., 215 Ill. 2d 517, 831 N.E.2d 531, 294 Ill. Dec. 581 (2005), 4.28(a) Willis, United States v., 257 F.3d 636 (6th Cir. 2001), 37.02(e)
Wilson, People v., 23 A.D.3d 682, 806 N.Y.S.2d 671 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2005), 28.03(b)
Wilson, United States v., 420 U.S. 332 (1975), 34.11(d)(2)
Wilson, United States ex rel., v. McMann, 408 F.2d 896 (2d Cir. 1969), 4.31(d)
Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603 (1999), 23.02(a), 23.15(b), 23.15(c), 23.19, 23.22(a)
Wilson v. State, 971 So. 2d 963 (Fla. App. 2008), 30.03(b)
Wilson v. United States, 391 F.2d 460 (D.C. Cir. 1968), 12.17
Winburn, In the Interest of, 32 Wis. 2d 152, 145 N.W.2d 178 (1966), 12.21
Windom v. State, 162 Idaho 417, 398 P.3d 150 (2017), 13.01
Winship, In re, 397 U.S. 358 (1970), 21.01, 32.01, 35.03, 36.06
Wise v. Commonwealth, 6 Va. App. 178, 367 S.E.2d 197 (1988), 25.03(c)
Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35 (1975), 20.04
Wolf Child, United States v., 699 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir. 2012), 38.03(c)
Wolf v. Britton, 509 F.2d 304 (8th Cir. 1975), 15.02
Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963), 23.07(d), 23.11(b), 23.32(b), 23.37, 23.39, 24.19
Wood v. Ercole, 644 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2011), 24.11(c)
Wood v. Milyard, 721 F.3d 1190 (10th Cir. 2013), 17.08(b)(2)
Woodard, United States v., 699 F.3d 1188 (10th Cir. 2012), 30.07(c)
Woodard, United States v., 694 F.3d 950 (8th Cir. 2012), 14.07
Woodcock v. City of Bowling Green, 679 Fed. Appx. 419 (6th Cir. 2017), 23.07(d)
Woodfox v. Cain, 772 F.3d 358 (5th Cir. 2014), 21.03(b)
Woods v. Clusen, 794 F.2d 293 (7th Cir. 1986), 24.05(a), 24.05(d), 24.05(e), 24.10(a) Woods v. Donald, 135 S. Ct. 1372 (2015), 27.02
Woods v. Etherton, 136 S. Ct. 1149 (2016), 30.04(c)
Wooten v. State, 464 So. 2d 640 (Fla. App. 1985), 31.01(a) Work v. United States, 243 F.2d 660 (D.C. Cir. 1957), 23.13, 23.16
W.R. Jr., State v., 181 Wash. 2d 757, 336 P.3d 1134 (2014), 35.05
Wright, State v., 221 N.J. 456, 114 A.3d 340 (2015), 23.18(c)
Wright, State v., 444 N.J. Super. 347, 133 A.3d 656 (2016), 24.08(b)
Wright, United States v., 489 F.2d 1181 (D.C. Cir. 1973), 33.03
Wright v. Georgia, 373 U.S. 284 (1963), 17.01
Wright v. State, 276 Ga. 419, 577 S.E.2d 782 (2003), 27.08
Wysinger, United States v., 683 F.3d 784 (7th Cir. 2012), 24.09, 24.11(c)

X

Xu v. State, 191 S.W.3d 210 (Tex. App. 2005), 24.08(b)

Y

Yadiel Roque C., In the Matter of, 17 A.D.3d 1168, 793 N.Y.S.2d 857 (N.Y. App. Div., 4th Dep’t 2005), 27.04(a)
Yang, State v., 196 Wis. 2d 359, 538 N.W.2d 817 (Wis. App. 1995), 27.05(a)(2)
Yarborough v. Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652 (2004), 24.03, 24.05, 24.05(a), 24.05(d)
Yates v. Aiken, 484 U.S. 211 (1988), 35.06(f)
Yates v. Evatt, 500 U.S. 391 (1991), 35.06(f), 37.02(a) Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85 (1979), 23.09, 23.10, 23.11(a), 23.22(c)
Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. 110 (2009), 17.08(c), 17.08(f) Yenawine v. Motley, 402 Fed. Appx. 997 (6th Cir. 2010), 24.11(c)
Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886), 23.29
Young, United States v., 470 U.S. 1 (1985), 36.11(a) Young v. Conway, 698 F.3d 69 (2d Cir. 2012), 23.37, 25.07
Young v. State, 374 P.3d 395 (Alaska 2016), 25.02, 25.03(c) Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982), 6.10
Youngblood v. West Virginia, 547 U.S. 867 (2006) (per curiam), 9.09(a)

Z

Zafiro v. United States, 506 U.S. 534 (1993), 18.10(c), 18.10(d)
Zamorano, People v., 301 A.D.2d 544, 754 N.Y.S.2d 645 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 2003), 22.05
Zappacosta, People v., 77 A.D.2d 928, 431 N.Y.S.2d 96 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1980), 20.05
Zedner v. United States, 547 U.S. 489 (2006), 15.04(a) Zimmerman, People v., 101 A.D.2d 294, 475 N.Y.S.2d 127 (N.Y. App. Div., 2d Dep’t 1984), 22.03(d)
Zion v. County of Orange, 874 F.3d 1072 (9th Cir. 2017), 23.07(d)
Zuber, State v., 227 N.J. 422, 152 A.3d 197 (2017), 13.01

Table of Statutes, Rules, Regulations, and Other Authorities

United States Code
18 U.S.C. § 3500(c) (2018) — 27.12(c)
28 U.S.C. § 1257(a) (2018) — 39.02(a) 28 U.S.C. § 2254(b) (2018) — 39.03(b)
28 U.S.C. § 2254(c) (2018) — 39.03(b)

Civil Rights Act

Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974

Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure
Rule 5(a) (2018) — 24.15
Rule 11(c)(1) (2018) — 14.05
Rule 11(f) (2018) — 14.29(c)
Rule 12(h) (2018) — 22.03(f)
Rule 14 (2018) — 18.10(c)
Rule 15(e) (2018) — 9.07(e)
Rule 16(a)(1)(E) — 9.07(c)
Rule 23(c) (2018) — 35.08
Rule 26.2(c) — 27.12(c)
Rule 29(b) (2018) — 32.02, 35.01
Rule 30 (2018) — 36.02
Rule 30(a) (2018) — 36.02
Rule 30(d) (2018) — 36.13
Rule 31(d) (2018) — 36.18
Rule 33(b)(1) (2018) — 37.02(c)
Rule 33(b)(2) (2018) — 37.02(c)

Federal Rules of Evidence

Rule 401 (2018) — 30.03(a)
Rule 404(a)(1) (2018) — 30.07(a)
Rule 404(b) (2018) — 30.07(a)
Rule 404(b)(2) (2018) — 30.07(a)
Rule 405 (2018) — 33.17
Rule 410 (2018) — 14.29(c)
Rule 413(a) (2018) — 30.07(a)
Rule 413(b) (2018) — 30.07(a)
Rule 414(a) (2018) — 30.07(a)
Rule 414(b) (2018) — 30.07(a)
Rule 606(b) (2018) — 27.05(a)(2)
Rule 608(b) (2018) — 30.07(b), 30.07(c)
Rule 609(a) (2018) — 30.07(b)
Rule 609(b) (2018) — 30.07(b)
Rule 609(d)(2) (2018) — 30.07(b)
Rule 611(b) (2018) — 33.09
Rule 611(c) (2018) — 33.25
Rule 613(a) (2018) — 31.10
Rule 613(b) (2018) — 31.10
Rule 614(a) (2018) — 33.25
Rule 801(a) (2018) — 30.04(b)
Rule 801(b) (2018) — 30.04(b)
Rule 801(c)(1) (2018) — 30.04(b)
Rule 801(c)(2) (2018) — 30.04(b)
Rule 802 (2018) — 30.04(c)
Rule 803 (2018) — 30.04(b)
Rule 803(6) (2018) — 30.04(b)(2)
Rule 803(21) (2018) — 33.17
Rule 804 (2018) — 30.04(b)
Rule 804(b)(1) (2018) — 22.05(b)
Rule 901 (2018) — 10.14(c)

Interstate Compact on Juveniles

Interstate Commission for Juveniles, ICJ Rules (effective, March 1, 2018) — 4.26(b)

State Constitutions

N.Y. Const., art. 1, § 12 — 23.19

State Statutes and Rules

ALa. Code

Ark. Code Ann.

Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code

§ 9-27-505(a) (2018) — 21.01

§ 602 (2018) — 17.04(a)
§ 604(a) (2018) — 17.04(a)
§ 627(b) (2018) — 3.06
§ 633 (2018) — 4.03
§ 636(a) (2018) — 4.17
§ 651 (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 654.2(a) (2018) — 19.01
§ 657(a)(1) (2018) — 15.04(a) § 676 (2018) — 27.08
§ 709(a) (2018) — 12.17
§ 778 (2018) — 37.02, 39.07
§ 781 (2018) — 39.08
§§ 790 - 794 (2018) — 14.06(b), 19.01
§ 800(a) (2018) — 39.02(c)
§ 800(d) (2018) — 39.02(b)
§§ 826-826.5 (2018) — 39.08

§ 16-8-105.5(4) (2018) — 12.23
§ 19-1-103(8)(a) (2018) — 17.04(a)
§ 19-2-105 (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 19-2-105(1)(a) (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 19-2-107 (2018) — 21.01
§ 19-2-509 (2018) — 4.15
§ 19-2-704 (2018) — 19.01
§ 19-2-903(1) (2018) — 39.02(a)

Rule 1 (2018) — 30.01
CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN.
§ 46b-133(b) (2018) — 4.15
§ 46b-133(e) (2018) — 4.31(a) § 46b-142(a) (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 46b-146 (2018) — 37.03, 39.08

D.C. CODE
§ 16-2307(f) (2018) — 13.08
§ 16-2307(g) (2018) — 20.04
§ 16-2310(a) (2018) — 4.01
§ 16-2312(e) (2018) — 4.01, 4.28(b), 4.31(c)
§ 16-2312(f) (2018) — 4.01, 4.28(b)
§ 16-2312(j) (2018) — 4.31(e), 20.04
§ 16-2315 (2018) — 12.11
§ 16-2315(a) (2018) — 12.11
§ 16-2315(b) (2018) — 12.14
§ 16-2315(c)(1) (2018) — 12.16, 12.18
§ 16-2315(c)(2) (2018) — 12.11
§ 16-2316(b) (2018) — 30.01
§ 16-2316(e)(2) (2018) — 27.08
§ 16-2322(c) (2018) — 39.06
§ 16-2324(a) (2018) — 39.07
§ 16-2335 (2018) — 39.08

D.C. SUPER. CT. JUV. RULES
Rule 16 (2018) — 9.01
Rule 33 (2018) — 37.02

Fla. Stat. Ann.
§ 985.35(2) (2018) — 30.01

Fla. Rules Crim. Proc.
Rule 3.370(b) (2018) — 36.14

Fla. Rules Jud. Admin.
Rule 2.330(f) (2018) — 20.05

Fla. Rules Juv. Proc.
Rule 8.060 (2018) — 9.01
Rule 8.060(a) (2018) — 27.12(a)(1)
Rule 8.060(b) (2018) — 27.12(b)
Rule 8.060(d) (2018) — 9.07(e)
Rule 8.095(d)(5) (2018) — 12.15(b)
Rule 8.130 (2018) — 37.02
Rule 8.130(a) (2018) — 37.02

Haw. Rev. Stat.
§ 571-32(h) (2018) — 4.15
§ 704-403 (2018) — 12.17

Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann.
ch. 705, § 405/1-5(6) (2018) — 27.08
ch. 705, § 405/5-401.5 (2018) — 24.18
ch. 705, § 405/5-415(1) (2018) — 4.17
ch. 705, § 405/5-501 (2018) — 4.17, 4.28(b)
ch. 705, § 405/5-501(1) (2018) — 4.28(b)
ch. 705, § 405/5-605(3)(a) (2018) — 30.01
ch. 705, § 405/5-720 (2018) — 39.04
ch. 725, § 5/104-14 (2018) — 12.15(b)
ch. 725, § 5/104-16(b) (2018) — 12.17

Ind. Code Ann.
§ 31-30.5-1-1(2) (2018) — 24.18
§ 31-32-10-1 (2018) — 9.01
§ 31-32-15-1 (2018) — 39.02(a)
§ 31-37-6-2 (2018) — 4.17
§ 31-37-11-2 (2018) — 15.04(a)

IND. RULE EVID.
Rule 606(b) (2018) — 27.05(a)(2)

IOWA CODE ANN.
§ 232.11(2) (2018) — 4.05
§ 232.39 (2018) — 27.08
§ 232.47(5) (2018) — 30.01

KAN. STAT. ANN.
§ 38-2354 (2018) — 30.01

ME. REV. STAT. ANN.
tit. 4, § 155(1) (2018) — 20.01(a)
tit. 15, § 3203-A(4-A) & (5)(C) (2018) — 4.28(b), 4.31(a)
tit. 15, § 3318-A(2) (2018) — 12.17
tit. 15, § 3318-A(9) (2018) — 12.15(b)

MD. CTS. & JUD. PROC. CODE ANN.
§ 3-8A-06(e) (2018) — 13.11

MASS. GEN. LAWS ANN.
ch. 119, § 52 (2018) — 17.04(b)
ch. 119, § 55A (2018) — 21.01
ch. 119, § 67 (2018) — 4.15

MICH. COMP. LAWS ANN.
§ 712A.17(2) (2018) — 21.01

MINN. STAT. ANN.
§ 260B.163(1)(c) (2018) — 27.08
§ 260B.176(1) (2018) — 4.15

Minn. Rules Juv. Delinquency Proc.
Rule 10.04(1)(A) (2018) — 27.12(a)(1), 27.12(a)(2)
Rule 13.04 (2018) — 30.01
Rule 16.01 (2018) — 37.02
Rule 20.01 (2018) — 12.11
Rule 20.01(9) (2018) — 12.15(b)
Rule 24.01(A) (2018) — 12.19(b)

Miss. Code Ann.
§ 43-21-105(i) (2018) — 17.04(b)

Mo. Rev. Stat.
§ 211.151(2), (4) (2018) — 4.18

Mont. Code Ann.
§ 41-5-349 (2018) — 4.18
§ 41-5-1502(1) (2018) — 21.01

Mont. Rule Evid.
Rule 606(b) (2018) — 27.05(a)(2)

Neb. Rev. Stat.
§ 27-1101(1) (2018) — 30.01
§ 43-248.01 (2018) — 3.06
§ 43-253(5) (2018) — 4.15, 4.17, 4.27(b)
§ 43-258 (2018) — 12.11

Nev. Rev. Stat.
§ 62D.040(4) (2018) — 30.01

§ 169-B:4(I) (2018) — 17.04(a)

N.J. Stat. Ann.
§ 2A:4A-73(a) (2018) — 19.01

N.M. STAT. ANN.
§ 32A-2-16(A) (2018) — 21.01

N.Y. CRIM. PROC. L.
§ 170.55(1) (2018) — 19.01
§ 310.10(2) (2018) — 36.14

N.Y. FAM. CT. ACT
§ 249-a (2018) — 4.05
§ 301.2(1) (2018) — 17.04(b)
§ 301.2(8) (2018) — 14.07
§ 302.1(2) (2018) — 17.04(a)
§ 302.2 (2018) — 17.07
§ 302.3(1) (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 302.3(2) (2018) — 20.03(a)
§ 302.3(4) (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 303.3 (2018) — 12.22
§ 304.1(3) (2018) — 4.17
§ 307.4(2) (2018) — 4.03
§ 311.5 (2018) — 35.07
§ 315.2 (2018) — 19.01, 37.02(e)
§ 315.2(1) (2018) — 19.01
§ 315.2(1)(a)-(g) (2018) — 19.01, 19.03
§ 315.2(1)(c) (2018) — 19.03(d)
§ 315.2(2) (2018) — 19.01
§ 315.2(3) (2018) — 19.01
§ 315.3 (2018) — 19.01
§ 315.3(1) (2018) — 19.01
§ 320.2(2) (2018) — 4.03
§ 320.4(1) (2018) — 4.01
§ 320.5(3) (2018) — 4.17, 4.21(c)
§§ 322.1-322.2 (2018) — 12.11, 12.16
§ 322.1(1) (2018) — 12.11
§ 322.1(2) (2018) — 12.14
§ 322.1(3) (2018) — 12.11
§§ 325.1-325.3 (2018) — 4.28(b)
§ 325.1(2) (2018) — 4.01
§ 325.2(3) (2018) — 4.31(a)
§ 325.3(1)(a)-(b) (2018) — 4.28(b)
§ 325.3(4) (2018) — 4.28(b)
§ 330.1 (2018) — 9.01
§§ 331.1-331.7 (2018) — 9.01
§ 331.4(1)(a) (2018) — 27.12(a)(1)
§ 331.4(1)(b)-(c) (2018) — 27.12(a)(2)
§ 331.4(2)(a) (2018) — 27.12(b), 33.03
§ 331.4(3)(a) (2018) — 22.02, 22.03(f)
§ 340.1 (2018) — 15.04(a)
§ 342.2(1) (2018) — 30.01
§ 343.1(2) (2018) — 30.05, 35.04
§ 343.1(3) (2018) — 35.04
§ 343.2(1) (2018) — 35.04
§ 344.1(2) (2018) — 30.07(b)
§ 344.2(3) (2018) — 35.04
§ 350.1 (2018) — 37.01
§ 351.1(5)(a) (2018) — 38.08
§ 352.1 (2018) — 19.01
§ 352.1(1) (2018) — 38.17(a)
§ 352.1(2) (2018) — 38.17(a), 38.19
§ 352.2(2) (2018) — 38.23
§ 352.2(3) (2018) — 38.24
§ 353.5 (2018) — 14.07
§ 353.6(1) (2018) — 4.27(c), 38.03(c)
§ 355.1(1)(a) (2018) — 37.02
§ 355.3 (2018) — 39.06
§ 355.3(6) (2018) — 3.31
§ 360.3 (2018) — 39.04
§ 360.3(4) (2018) — 39.04

§ 7B-2200 (2018) — 13.11
§ 7B-2408 (2018) — 30.01
§ 7B-2506(4), (22) (2018) — 4.27(c)

N.D. Century Code Ann.
§ 27-20-16(1)(e) (2018) — 4.18

§ 2151.358 (2018) — 37.03, 39.08

Rule 7(H) (2018) — 4.18

tit. 10A, § 2-2-403(B) (2018) — 4.15

§ 419C.005(1) (2018) — 17.04(a)
§ 419C.013(1) (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 419C.179 (2018) — 4.15
§ 419C.349(4)(a) (2018) — 13.11
§ 419C.349(4)(e) (2018) — 14.07

tit. 42, § 6302 (2018) — 17.04(a)
tit. 42, § 6327, Official Comment (2018) — 4.18
tit. 42, § 6327(a) (2018) — 4.18
tit. 42, § 6327(c) (2018) — 4.18
tit. 42, § 6332(a) (2018) — 4.28(b)
tit. 42, § 6338(b) (2018) — 35.04

R.I. Rules Juv. Proc.

Rule 9(b) (2018) — 30.01

S.D. Codified Laws

§ 26-7A-30 — 4.03
§ 26-7A-31 (2018) — 4.03
§ 26-7A-52 (2018) — 4.15
§ 26-7A-56 (2018) — 30.01

Tenn. Code Ann.

§ 37-1-114(c)(2) (2018) — 4.17
§ 37-1-114(c)(7) (2018) — 4.15, 4.17
§ 37-1-117(c) (2018) — 4.15

Tenn. Rules Evid.

Rule 404(b)(3) (2018) — 30.07(a)

Tenn. Rules Juv. Proc.

Rule 213 (2018) — 37.02

Tex. Fam. Code Ann.

§ 51.02(2)(A) (2018) — 17.04(b)
§ 51.02(2)(B) (2018) — 17.04(a)
§ 51.10(b) (2018) — 4.05
§ 54.03(c) (2018) — 21.01
§ 54.03(d) (2018) — 30.01
§ 54.03(e) (2018) — 35.04
§ 55.11(a) (2018) — 12.11
§ 56.01 (2018) — 39.02(a)
§ 56.01(g) (2018) — 39.02(c)

Utah Code Ann.
§ 78A-6-113(13) (2018) — 4.15

tit. 33, § 5102(2)(C) (2018) — 17.04(b)

Rule 1(d)(4) (2018) — 9.07(e)

Vt. Rule Evid.
Rule 606(b) (2018) — 27.05(a)(2)

§ 13.40.040(5) (2018) — 4.15, 4.27(b)
§ 13.40.050(6) (2018) — 4.15, 4.27(b)
§ 13.40.060(1) (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 13.40.060(2)(b) (2018) — 20.01(a)
§ 13.40.080 (2018) — 19.01
§ 13.40.080(2) (2018) — 19.01
§ 13.40.230(5) (2018) — 39.02(c)

Rule 1.6 (2018) — 27.01

W. Va. Code

§ 49-4-701(k) (2018) — 30.01
§ 49-4-705(c)(4) (2018) — 4.17
§ 49-4-705(d) (2018) — 4.17
§ 49-4-706(a) (2018) — 4.15
§ 49-4-709 (2018) — 21.01

Wis. Stat. Ann.

§ 938.23(1)(m)(a) (2018) — 4.05
§ 938.195 (2018) — 24.18
§ 938.299(4) (2018) — 30.01

§ 14-6-223(c) (2018) — 21.01

Wyo. Rules Evid.

Rule 1101(b)(3) (2018) & 1977 Committee Note — 30.01

American Bar Association, Formal Opinions

Formal Op. 06-441 (May 13, 2006) — 6.07

American Bar Association, Model Rules of Professional Conduct

Rule 1.1 (2018) — 6.07
Rule 1.2(a) (2018) — 2.03, 12.12
Rule 1.14(a) (2018) — 2.03, 12.12
Rule 1.14(a), Comment (2018) — 2.03, 12.19(b)
Rule 1.14(b) (2018) — 2.03
Rule 3.4(e) (2018) — 36.11

American Bar Association, Canons of Professional Ethics

Canon 39 (1937) — 8.13

American Bar Association, Code of Professional Responsibility

DR 7-106(C)(3) (1980) — 36.11
DR 7-106(C)(4) (1980) — 36.11
EC 6-4 (1980) — 6.07
EC 7-7 (1980) — 12.12
EC 7-12 (1980) — 12.12, 12.19(b)

American Bar Association, Standards for Criminal Justice

§ 3-3.4(h) (4th ed. 2015) — 8.13
§ 3-6.5(c) (4th ed. 2015) — 29.02
§ 3-6.5(d) (4th ed. 2015) — 29.02
§ 3-6.8 (4th ed. 2015) — 36.11(a)
§ 4-5.2(a) (4th ed. 2015) — 2.03
§ 4-5.2(b) (4th ed. 2015) — 2.03
§ 4-7.5(a) (4th ed. 2015) — 29.03(a)
§ 4-9.1(a)-(c) (4th ed. 2015) — 38.28
§ 6-1.9(a) (3d ed. 2000) — 20.05
§ 11-2.1(a) (3d ed. 1996) — 9.09(a) § 14-3.2 (4th ed. 2015) — 19.01
§ 15-3.1, Commentary (3d ed. 1996) — 27.01
§ 15-5.1, Commentary (3d ed. 1996) — 36.14
§ 15-5.2, Commentary (3d ed. 1996) — 36.15
§ 15-5.4, Commentary (3d ed. 1996) — 36.16
§ 15-5.6, Commentary (3d ed. 1996) — 36.18

American Law Institute, Model Penal Code

Institute of Judicial Administration-American Bar Association, Joint Commission on Juvenile Justice Standards

Standards Relating to Counsel For Private Parties

Standard 9.3(a), Commentary (1980) — 38.02

Standards Relating to Pretrial Court Proceedings
Standard 2.7(B) & Commentary (1980) — 27.01
Standard 5.3(C) (1980) — 4.04
Standard 5.3(C), Commentary (1980) — 4.04
Standard 6.1 & Commentary (1980) — 2.03
Standard 6.1(A) (1980) — 4.05
Standard 6.3 & Commentary (1980) — 2.03
Standard 6.5 & Commentary (1980) — 2.03
Standard 6.7 & Commentary (1980) — 2.03
Standard 7-6.2, Commentary (1989) — 33.21

Other Authorities:

2016 Flawed Forensics and Innocence Symposium, 119 W. VA. L. REV. 519 (2016), 31.09

Abrahamson, Shirley S., Criminal Law and State Constitutions: The Emergence of State Constitutional Law, 63 TEX. L. REV. 1141 (1985), 7.09

Abrams, Douglas E., Reforming Juvenile Delinquency Treatment to Enhance Rehabilitation, Personal Accountability, and Public Safety, 84 OR. L. REV. 1001 (2005), 4.16

Alexander, Lisa E., Vicinage, Venue, and Community Cross-Section: Obstacles to a State Defendant’s Right to Trial by a Representative Jury, 19 HASTINGS CONST. L. Q. 261(1991), 17.05

Alper, Ty, Anthony G. Amsterdam, Todd Edelman, Randy Hertz, Rachel Shapiro Janger, Jennifer McAllister-Nevins, Sonya Rudenstine & Robin Walker-Sterling, Stories Told and Untold: Lawyering Theory Analyses of the First Rodney King Assault Trial, 12 CLIN. L. REV. 1 (2005), 6.02(d)

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION STEERING COMMITTEE ON THE UNMET LEGAL NEEDS OF CHILDREN, AMERICA’S CHILDREN, STILL AT RISK (2001), 4.18

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL, BETRAYING THE YOUNG: HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS AGAINST CHILDREN IN THE U.S. JUSTICE SYSTEM (November 1998), 4.18

Amsterdam, Anthony G., Speedy Criminal Trial: Rights and Remedies, 27 STAN. L. REV. 525
Amsterdam, Anthony G., & Jerome Bruner, Minding the Law (2000), 6.06(a), 6.06(b) 6.06(c)

Amsterdam, Anthony G., & Randy Hertz, An Analysis of Closing Arguments to a Jury, 37 N.Y.L. Sch. L. Rev. 55 (1992), 36.12(a)

Barone, Patrick T., & Michael B. Skinner, Breaking the Spell of the Magic Question During Voir Dire, 39-Mar the Champion 22 (March 2015), 28.03(c)

Beyer, Marty, What’s Behind Behavior Matters: The Effects of Disabilities, Trauma and Immaturity on Juvenile Intent and Ability to Assist Counsel, 58 Guild Practitioner 112 (2001), 2.03, 12.17

4 Blackstone, William, Commentaries on the Law of England (1769), 17.04(b)

Brennan, William J., Jr., State Constitutions and the Protection of Individual Rights, 90 Harv. L. Rev. 489 (1977), 7.09
Brooks, Peter, Reading for the Plot: Design and Intention in Narrative (1992), 6.06(a), 6.06(c)

Bruner, Jerome, Acts of Meaning (1990), 6.06(a), 6.06(b)

Bruner, Jerome, Actual Minds, Possible Worlds (1986), 6.06(a)

Bruner, Jerome, Making Stories: Law, Literature, Life (2002), 6.06(a)

Bruner, Jerome, The Narrative Construction of Reality, 18 Crit. Inquiry 1 (1991), 6.06(a), 6.06(b)

Bureau Draft, A State Statute to Liberalize Criminal Discovery, 4 Harv. J. Legislation 105 (1966), 9.07

Burke, Kenneth, A Grammar of Motives (1945), 6.06(c)

Calkins, Richard M., Criminal Justice for the Indigent, 42 U. Det. L.J. 305 (1965), 9.07

Capers, I. Bennett, Real Women, Real Rape, 60 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 826 (2013), 31.06

Cicchini, Michael D., Combatting Prosecutor Misconduct in Closing Arguments, 70 Okla. L. Rev. 887 (2018), 7.03(c)

[CICERO], RHETORICA AD HERENNIUM, IV, xxviii, 36.06

C.J.S. Criminal Law (2006 & Supp.), 35.06(f)

C.J.S. Evidence (2008 & Supp.), 35.06(f)

Clarke, Stevens H., & Gary Koch, Juvenile Court: Therapy or Crime Control, and Do Lawyers Make a Difference, 14 LAW & SOC’Y REV. 263 (1980), 4.16

COMMITTEE ON IDENTIFYING THE NEEDS OF THE FORENSIC SCIENCES COMMUNITY, NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL, STRENGTHENING FORENSIC SCIENCE IN THE UNITED STATES: A PATH FORWARD (2009), 31.09

COOK, JOSEPH G., CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE ACCUSED — PRETRIAL RIGHTS (1972), 23.01

Cutler, Brian L., & Richard A. Leo, Analyzing Videotaped Interrogations and Confessions, 40-DEC THE CHAMPION 40 (December 2016), 24.04(d), 24.08(b), 24.22

Cutler, Brian L., & Richard A. Leo, False Confessions in the 21st Century, 40-MAY THE CHAMPION 46 (May 2016), 24.04(d), 24.08(b), 24.22

DALE, MICHAEL J. REPRESENTING THE CHILD CLIENT (2012), 39.07

Dougherty, Francis M., Annot., Admissibility and weight of extrajudicial or pretrial identification where witness was unable or failed to make in-court identification, 29 A.L.R.4th 104 (1984 & Supp.), 25.08

Drizin, Steven A., & Richard A. Leo, The Problem of False Confessions in the Post-DNA World, 82 N.C. L. REV. 891 (2004), 24.05(a), 24.05(b)
Drizin, Steven A., & Greg Luloff, Are Juvenile Courts a Breeding Ground for Wrongful Convictions?, 34 N. Ky. L. Rev. 257 (2007), 24.05(a), 24.10(b)

Duncan, Martha Grace, “So Young and So Untender”: Remorseless Children and the Expectations of the Law, 102 Colum. L. Rev. 1469 (2002), 38.16(b)

ELLMAN, STEPHEN, ROBERT D. DINNERSTEIN, ISABELLE R. GUNNING, KATHERINE R. KRUSE & ANN C. SHALLECK, LAWYERS AND CLIENTS: CRITICAL ISSUES IN INTERVIEWING AND COUNSELING (2009), 2.03

FEDERAL JUDICIAL CENTER, PATTERN CRIMINAL JURY INSTRUCTIONS (1987), 36.06

FEIGENSON, NEAL, & CHRISTINA SPIESEL, LAW ON DISPLAY: THE DIGITAL TRANSFORMATION OF LEGAL PERSUASION AND JUDGMENT (2009), 10.13

Feld, Barry C., The Constitutional Tension Between Apprendi and McKeiver: Sentence Enhancements Based on Delinquency Convictions and the Quality of Justice in Juvenile Courts, 38 Wake Forest L. Rev. 1111 (2003), 21.01

1261

Feld, Barry C., Real Interrogation: What Actually Happens When Cops Question Kids, 47 LAW & SOC’Y REV. 1 (2013), 24.10(b)

FLA. STANDARD JURY INSTRUCTIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES, 36.06

Fletcher, Robert L., Pre-Trial Discovery in State Criminal Cases, 12 STAN. L. REV. 293 (1960), 9.07

Follette, William C., Richard A. Leo, & Deborah Davis, Mental Health and False Confessions, in ELIZABETH KELLEY (ed.) REPRESENTING PEOPLE WITH MENTAL DISABILITIES (2017) [Electronic copy available at: https://ssrn.com/abstract=3028918], 12.04, 24.05(b)

Foote, Caleb, The Coming Constitutional Crisis in Bail, 113 U. PA. L. REV. 959 (1965), 4.27(c)

Garrett, Brandon L., Convicting the Innocent: Where Criminal Prosecutions Go Wrong (2011), 25.01

Garrett, Brandon L., Eyewitnesses and Exclusion, 65 Vand. L. Rev. 451 (2012), 25.03

Gass, William H., Tests of Time (2002), 6.06(a), 6.06(b)

Giannelli, Paul C., Forensic Science: Daubert’s Failure, __ Case Western Reserve L. Rev. __ (2017) (forthcoming), 31.09

Godsey, Mark, Blind Injustice: A Former Prosecutor Exposes the Psychology and Politics of Wrongful Convictions (2017), 31.02

Goffman, Alice, On the Run: Fugitive Life in an American City (2014), 23.17

Goldstein, Joseph, Anna Freud & Albert J. Solnit, Before the Best Interests of the Child (1979), 2.03

Goldstein, Irving, & Fred Lane, Goldstein Trial Technique (2d ed. 1969), 28.04

Gould, John B. & Richard A. Leo, One Hundred Years Later: Wrongful Convictions After a Century of Research, 100 J. CRIM. L. & CRIM. 825 (2010), 25.03

Green, Bruce, The Right to Two Criminal Defense Lawyers, 69 MERCER L. REV. 675 (2018), 14.17

Grisso, Thomas, Adolescents’ Decision Making: A Developmental Perspective on Constitutional Provisions in Delinquency Cases, 32 NEW ENGL. J. ON CRIM. & CIV. CONFINEMENT 3 (Winter 2006), 24.10(b)

GRISSO, THOMAS, EVALUATING COMPETENCIES: FORENSIC ASSESSMENTS AND INSTRUMENTS (1986), 24.10(b)

Grisso, Thomas, Juveniles’ Capacities to Waive Miranda Rights: An Empirical Analysis, 68 CALIF. L. REV. 1134 (1980), 24.10(b)

GRISSO, THOMAS, JUVENILES’ WAIVER OF RIGHTS: LEGAL AND PSYCHOLOGICAL COMPETENCE (1981), 4.05, 24.10(b)

Guggenheim, Martin, & Randy Hertz, J.D.B. and the Maturing of Juvenile Confession Suppression Law, 38 WASH. U. J. L. & SOC. POLICY 109 (2012), 24.08(a)

Guggenheim Martin, & Randy Hertz, Reflections on Judges, Juries and Justice: Ensuring the Fairness of Juvenile Delinquency Trials, in Symposium on Juvenile Justice Reform, 33 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 553 (1998), 21.01, 27.04(b)

HALL, JOHN WESLEY, JR., SEARCH AND SEIZURE (3d ed. 2000), 23.01

HASTIE, REID, STEVEN D. PENROD & NANCY PENNINGTON, INSIDE THE JURY (1983), 6.06(a)

Hertz, Randy, & James S. Liebman, Federal Habeas Corpus Practice and Procedure (7th ed. 2015), 39.03(b)

Holland, Paul, Sharing Stories: Narrative Lawyering in Bench Trials, 16 CLIN. L. REV. 195 (2009), 27.04(b)

Kairys, David, Juror Selection: The Law, A Mathematical Method of Analysis, and a Case Study, 10 AM. CRIM. L. REV. 771 (1972), 21.03(b)

Kershen, Drew, Vicinage, 29 OKLA. L. REV. 801 (1976); 30 OKLA. L. REV. 1 (1977), 17.05

Kozinski, Alex, Criminal Law 2.0, 44 GEO. L.J. ANN. REV. CRIM. PROC. v (2015), 30.2

LAFAVE, WAYNE R., SEARCH AND SEIZURE: A TREATISE ON THE FOURTH AMENDMENT § 6.1(b) (5th ed. & Supp.), 23.01, 23.19, 23.37

LAFAVE, WAYNE R., JEROLD H. ISRAEL, NANCY J. KING & ORIN S. KERR, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (4th ed. & Supp.), 17.05

LANDYNISKI, JACOB W., SEARCH AND SEIZURE AND THE SUPREME COURT – A STUDY IN CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION 45 (Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science, Ser. 84, No. 1, 1966), 23.07

Laurin, Jennifer E., Remapping the Path Forward: Toward a Systemic View of Forensic Science Reform and Oversight, 91 TEX. L. REV. 1051 (2013), 31.09

LaVigne, Michele, & Gregory J. Van Rybroek, Breakdown in the Language Zone: the Prevalence of Language Impairments among Juvenile and Adult Offenders and Why it Matters, 15 U.C. DAVIS J. JUV. L. & POL’Y 37 (2011), 24.10(b)

LEMPERT, RICHARD O., SAMUEL R. GROSS, JAMES S. LIEBMAN, JOHN H. BLUME, STEPHAN LANDSMA N & FREDRIC I. LEDERER, A MODERN APPROACH TO EVIDENCE: TEXT, PROBLEMS, TRANSCRIPTS AND CASES (4th ed. 2011), 30.01, 33.11

LEONARD, DAVID P., EDWARD J. IMWINKELRIED, DAVID H. KAYE, DAVID E. BERNSTEIN & JENNIFER L. MONOOKIN, THE NEW WIGMORE: A TREATISE ON EVIDENCE (2d ed. 2009), 30.01

Leverick, Fiona, Jury Instructions on Eyewitness Identification Evidence: A Re-Evaluation, 49 CREIGHTON L. REV. 555 (2016), 36.06

LOFTUS, ELIZABETH F., EYEWITNESS TESTIMONY (1996), 25.03

LOFTUS, ELIZABETH, JAMES M. DOYLE & JENNIFER E. DYSART, EYEWITNESS TESTIMONY: CIVIL AND CRIMINAL (4th ed. 2007), 25.03
Louisell, David W., Criminal Discovery: Dilemma Real or Apparent?, 49 CALIF. L. REV 56 (1961), 9.07

MARKLE, ARNOLD, THE LAW OF ARREST AND SEARCH AND SEIZURE (1974), 23.01

MEYER, PHILIP N., STORYTELLING FOR LAWYERS (2014), 29.03(a), 36.12(a)

Mink, Louis O., Narrative Form as a Cognitive Instrument, in ROBERT H. CANARY & HENRY KOZICKI (eds.), THE WRITING OF HISTORY: LITERARY FORM AND HISTORICAL UNDERSTANDING 129 (1978), 6.06(a)

MOENSSENS, ANDRE A., BETTY LAYNE DESPORTES & STEVEN D. BENJAMIN, SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCE IN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL CASES (7th ed. 2017), 30.01, 33.11

MURPHY, ERIN E., INSIDE THE CELL: THE DARK SIDE OF FORENSIC DNA (2015), 31.09

Nakell, Barry, Criminal Discovery for the Defense and the Prosecution — The Developing Constitutional Considerations, 50 N.C.L. REV. 437 (1972), 9.07

Nakell, Barry, The Effect of Due Process on Criminal Defense Discovery. 62 KY. L.J.
58 (1973-74), 9.07

National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, Report (1968), 23.17

National Research Council of the National Academies, Identifying the Culprit: Assessing Eyewitness Identification (National Academies Press 2014), 11.01(b), 25.03

NJP Litigation Consulting (Elissa Krauss & Sonia Chopra, eds.), Jurywork: Systematic Techniques (2d ed. 2012-13), 21.03(b), 28.03(b), 28.04

(available at https://www.nycla.org/siteFiles/Publications/Publications486_0.pdf), 19.03(b)

Peskin, Stephen H., Innovative Pre-Trial Motions in Criminal Defense, 1 Am. J. Trial Advocacy 35 (1977), 7.03(c)

Philipsborn, John T., Feature: When Fine Print Matters; Reviewing Mental Health Assessment and Testing-Related Literature and Test Manuals is a Key to Effectively Preparing and Examining Mental Health Experts, 37-FEB THE CHAMPION 40 (February 2013), 11.04(a), 31.09

Pinard, Michael, From the Classroom to the Courtroom: Reassessing Fourth Amendment Standards in Public School Searches Involving Law Enforcement Authorities, 45 Ariz. L. Rev. 1067 (2003), 23.36

Pinard, Michael, Limitations on Judicial Activism in Criminal Trials, 33 Conn. L. Rev. 243 (2000), 27.04(a)

President’s Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, Task Force Report: Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Crime (1967), 13.11

Prosser, Mary, Reforming Criminal Discovery: Why Old Objections Must Yield to New Realities, 2006 Wis. L. Rev. 541, 9.07

Puritz, Patricia, & Robin Walker Sterling, The Role of Defense Counsel in Delinquency Court, 25 Crim. Just. 16 (Spring 2010), 2.03

Puzzanchera, Charles, & Sean Addie, Delinquency Cases Waived to Criminal Court, 2010 (U.S. Dep’t of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, Feb. 2014), 13.01

Redlich, Allison D., The Susceptibility of Juveniles to False Confessions and False Guilty Pleas, 62 Rutgers L. Rev. 943 (2010), 24.05(a)

Roan, Ann M., Reclaiming Voir Dire, 37-Jul The Champion 22 (July 2013), 28.03(c)

Rosado, Lourdes M., & Riya S. Shah, Protecting Youth from Self-Incrimination When Undergoing Screening, Assessment and Treatment Within the Juvenile Justice System (Juvenile Law Center 2007), 12.15(a), 13.14, 38.07

Rotunda, Ronald, Judicial Disqualification in the Aftermath of Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal
Co., 60 Syracuse L. Rev. 247 (2010), 22.04

Rubenstein, Matthew, Overview of the Colorado Method of Capital Voir Dire, 34-Nov The Champion 18 (November 2010), 28.03(c)

Saltzburg, Stephen A., The Duty to Investigate and the Availability of Expert Witnesses, 86 Fordham L. Rev. 1709 (2018), 11.01(b), 11.03(a), 12.09

Shapiro, Stephen M., Kenneth S. Geller, Timothy S. Bishop, Edward A. Hartnett & Dan Himmelfarb, Supreme Court Practice (10th ed. 2013), 39.02(a)

1271

Slobogin, Christopher, Neuroscience Nuance: Dissecting the Relevance of Neuroscience in Adjudicating Criminal Culpability, 4 JOURNAL OF LAW & THE BIOSCIENCES 577 (December 2017), 12.07

Steinberg, Laurence, Adolescent Development and Juvenile Justice, 5 ANNUAL REV. CLIN. PSYCHOL. 459 (2009), 12.17

Sterling, Robin Walker, Role of Juvenile Defense Counsel in Delinquency Court (National Juvenile Defender Center 2009), 2.03

Tchekhov, Anton, Literary and Theatrical Reminiscences (Samuel S. Koteliansky trans. 1927), 6.06(b)

Tepfer, Joshua A., Laura H. Nirider & Lynda Tricarico, Arresting Development: Convictions of Innocent Youth, 62 Rutgers. L. Rev. 887 (2010), 24.05(a)

Tessmer, Charles W., Criminal Trial Strategy (1968), 28.04

Vargas, Manuel D., Representing Immigrant Criminal Defendants in New York State (5th ed. 2011), 14.07

Varon, Joseph A., Searches, Seizures and Immunities (2d ed. 1974), 23.01

Wald, Patricia M., Pretrial Detention for Juveniles, in Pursuing Justice for the Child 119-137 (Margaret K. Rosenheim, ed., 1976), 4.16, 4.18

Wall, Patrick M., Eyewitness Identification in Criminal Cases (1965), 25.03

Wigmore, John Henry, Evidence (vols. 1 & 10, 3d ed. 1940; vols. 2–7, 9, James H. Chadbourn rev. 1981 & Supp.), 13.05(a), 35.06(f)

Yarmey, A. Daniel, The Psychology of Eyewitness Testimony (1979), 25.03

Zeigler, Donald H., Young Adults as a Cognizable Group in Jury Selection, 76 Mich. L. Rev. 1045 (1978), 21.03(b)